There also reigns in Mendelssohn's piano music, taken as a whole, a certain sentimental elegiac trait on the one hand, and a nervous passionate excitement on the other, which has become a fundamental feature of all modern art. The plastic repose, the lovely, beatific harmony, in which Haydn's and Mozart's, and for the most part, too, Beethoven's creations glide away like silver swans, or like the eagle, in majestic flight, sailing through the sea of clouds, has vanished out of art. The blooming muse betrays a sickly tendency, and her announcements show at times a great resemblance to feverish dreams. While the triad of the three great masters, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, can be considered almost as a unity, whose elements have strengthened in a century's development, it may be said that the Melody so firmly founded by these masters has since fallen into an unquiet, wavering condition, and has more and more given way to ingenious but vague restless phrases floating up and down. Music is undergoing the same transformation that we see also in the phases of Painting; drawing steps back, the outlines of the forms melt more and more away, while the element of color presses into the foreground. This change was already prepared, on various sides, through Beethoven, in the works of his last period, and through Schubert, on the one hand, as it was through Hummel and the virtuoso tendency on the other, and it has been furthered by the general course of mental, moral, and artistic culture. And it stood out in the most marked manner, both on the positive and the negative side, precisely in the works of Schumann, of whom I have yet to speak somewhat more fully.

Of Mendelssohn's piano-forte works, therefore, I must content myself with remarking that, far as they fall behind the productions of his great overpowering and unapproachable predecessor, Beethoven, still they have in them a rich fullness of fascinating, genial tone-life. I will only name expressly, and wholly by way of example, the Concerto in D-minor; the superb Variations in E-flat; the beautiful Sonata in D for piano and violoncello; the Fugue compositions, not strict in form, to be sure, but full of life and soul, and always to be counted among the noblest products of the muse of tones; and perhaps, also, those very lovely and interesting inventions, the Lieder ohne Worte, on account of the important influence they have exerted in more ways than one. But it was the elfin, fairy element which the great artist succeeded in expressing in the most admirable and genial way; hence we find this manner of expression so frequently recurring with him, as it predominated in his surprisingly early and wonderful Midsummer Night's Dream Overture. In poetry and painting, likewise, at that time, there was a fond reawakening of these phantoms of elves and water nixies; with Mendelssohn they made their triumphant and most brilliant entry into the tone-realm, which possesses just the fittest means of expression for these airy creatures born of human fancy.

(Conclusion in next number.)

HOW ROSSINI WROTE "OTELLO," AS RELATED BY ALEXANDER DUMAS.

(Translated from Figaro, Paris.)

ROSSINI had just arrived at Naples, already preceded by a great reputation. The first person he met after leaving his carriage was, as might have been expected, the impresario of San Carlo. Barbaja was in front of the maestro, arms and heart open, and without giving him time to advance a step or speak a word, said:—

"I come to make you three offers, and I hope you will refuse no one of them."

"I will listen to them," replied Rossini, with that delicate smile that you know.

"I offer you my house for yourself and your attendants."

"I accept."

"I offer you my table for yourself and your friends."

"I accept."

"I make you an offer to write for me and my theatre a new opera."

"I don't accept!"

"How? You refuse to work for me?"

"Neither for you nor for anybody. I am not going to write any more music."

"You are mad, my dear sir."

"It is as I have the honor to assure you."

"And what did you come to Naples for?"

"To eat macaroni and sip ices. It is my delight."

"I will have ices prepared for you by my li-monadier, who is the first of Toledo; and I myself will cook macaroni for you that will make your mouth water."

"Diable! that becomes enticing."

"But you will give me an opera in exchange?"

"We will see."

"Take a month, two months, six months, all the time you desire."

"Say six months, then."

"It is understood."

"Let us go to supper."

From that evening the Barbaja palace was placed at the disposition of Rossini. The proprietor completely eclipsed himself; and the celebrated maestro was enabled to feel quite at home, in the strictest acceptance of the word. All his friends, or even simple acquaintances that he met in his promenades, he unceremoniously invited to Barbaja's table, to whom Rossini did the honors with perfect ease.

As to Barbaja, faithful to the rôle of cook that he had imposed upon himself, he every day invented some new dish, opened the oldest bottles of wine in his cellar, and treated all the strangers that Rossini brought to his house as if they had been the best friends of his father. Only, toward the end of the repast, in a careless way, and his lips weathed with smiles, he would slip between the fruit and the cheese some allusions to the forthcoming opera, and the brilliant success it must have. But whatever oratorical precaution the honest impresario made use of to remind his guest of the obligation he had contracted produced no more effect than would the three words at the feast of Belshazzar. These incidental reminders by Barbaja became unpleasant to Rossini, and he finally politely requested him to withdraw in the future from the dessert!

Meantime the months rolled away; the libretto had been long time finished, and as yet nothing signified that the composer had set himself at work. To dinners succeeded country parties,—the chase, fishing, horseback riding, etc. Barbaja was in a fury twenty times a day, and bursting with the envy of éclat. He controlled himself, however, for nobody had greater faith than himself in the incomparable genius of Rossini.

For five months Barbaja kept silent with exemplary resignation. But the morning of the first day of the sixth month, seeing that there was no more time to lose, he drew the maestro aside and held the following conversation with him:—

"Ah, my dear sir, do you know that it only lacks twenty-nine days for the fixed epoch?"

"What epoch?" asked Rossini with the surprise of a man to whom one has addressed an incomprehensible question, intended for another.

"The 30th of May."

"The 30th of May?"

Same pantomime.

"Did you not promise me a new opera to be produced on that date?"

"Ah, did I promise?"

"'Tis all nonsense now to pretend astonishment," cried the impresario, whose patience was at an end. "I have awaited the utmost delay, counting upon your genius and the extreme facility in work with which God has endowed you. Now it is impossible for me to wait longer; I must have my opera."

"Can't some old opera be arranged with a new name?"

"You think that possible?—and the artists expressly engaged to sing in a new opera?"

"You can put them under fine."

"And the public?"

"You can close the theatre."

"And the king?"

"You can hand in your resignation."

"All that is true to a certain point. But if neither the artists, the public, nor the king can keep me to my promise, I have given my word, sir, and Domenico Barbaja has never failed in his word of honor."

"That makes a difference!"

"Then promise me to begin to-morrow?"

"To-morrow, impossible; I have a fishing party at Fusaro."

"Very well," said Barbaja, thrusting his hands in his pockets, "we'll talk no longer about it. I will see what part it remains for me to take."

And he left without another word.

That evening Rossini ate his supper with a good appetite, and doing the honors at the impresario's table as if he had entirely forgotten the discussion of the morning. In withdrawing, he charged his servant to awaken him at daybreak, and to have the boat ready for Fusaro. He then went to his room and slept the sleep of the just.

Next day, the five hundred clocks which the blessed city of Naples possesses struck twelve, and Rossini's servant had not yet made an appearance; the sun darted his rays through the shutters. Rossini awoke with a bound, half rose in bed, rubbed his eyes and rang!—the bell rope remained in his hand.

He called through the window that looked into the court,—not a sound to be heard.

He shook the door of his room; it resisted all his efforts, being walled up on the outside.

Then Rossini, returning to the window, began to shout for help. He had not even the consolation of the response of an echo, the Barbaja palace being the deafest building in the world.

Only one resource remained to him: to jump from the fourth story window; but to the praise of Rossini it must be said that he never for one moment thought to do that.

After the lapse of a full hour, Barbaja showed his cotton cap at a window of the third floor. Rossini, who still stood at his own window, felt like flinging a tile at him; he contented himself, however, in overwhelming him with imprecations.

"Do you wish anything?" sang up the impresario in a wheedling tone.

"I wish to get out of this room at once!"

"You will get out when your opera is done."

"But this is arbitrary imprisonment!"

"Arbitrary if you like it: but I must have my opera."

"I will complain of this to all the artists, and we will see."

"I will put the artists under fine."

"I will inform the public!"

"I will close the theatre."

"I will go even to the king!"

"I will resign my position."

Rossini perceived that he was caught in his own net. Also, as a clever man, he changed his tone and manner, and said in a calm voice:—

"I accept the joke and will not be angry. But may I know when I am to have my liberty?"

"When the last scene of the opera is in my hands," replied Barbaja, lifting his cap.

"All right; send this evening for the overture."

At night Barbaja promptly received a sheet of music, upon which was written in large letters, "Overture of Otello."

The salon of Barbaja was filled with musical celebrities at the moment when he received the first installment from his prisoner. One of them immediately sat down to the piano to decipher the new chef d'œuvre, and concluded that Rossini was not a man, but that, like a god, he created without effort and without work, by the sole power of the will. Barbaja, rendered nearly frantic with joy, tore the sheet from the hands of the admirers and sent it to be copied. The next day he received another installment, on which was written "First Act of Otello." This, like the other, was immediately sent to the copyists, who performed their work with the mute passiveness that Barbaja had accustomed them to.

At the end of three days, the partition of Otello had been delivered and copied. The impresario could not calmly abide his happiness. He embraced Rossini, made the most touching and sincere excuses for the stratagem he had employed, and begged him to conclude his work by attending the rehearsals. "I will go myself to the artists," replied Rossini lightly, "and hear them sing their rôles. As to the orchestra, I will hear them at my rooms."

"Very well, my dear, make your own arrangements. My presence is not necessary, and I will admire your masterpiece at the general rehearsal. Yet once again, I beg you to pardon the way in which I have behaved."

"Not a word more of that, or I shall be angry."

"Then at the general rehearsal?"

"At the general rehearsal."

The day of the general rehearsal finally came: it was the evening prior to this famous 30th of May, which had cost Barbaja so many panics. The singers were at their posts, the musicians took their places in the orchestra, Rossini sat at the piano.

A few elegant ladies and privileged men occupied the proscenium boxes. Barbaja, radiant and triumphant, rubbed his hands, and walked back and forth, whistling. The overture was first played; wild applause shook the arches of San Carlo. Rossini arose and bowed.

"Bravo!" cried Barbaja. "Let us have the cavatina of the tenor."

Rossini reseated himself at the piano; everybody was silent; the first violinist raised his bow, and all re-began to play the overture. The same applauses, yet even more enthusiastic if possible, broke forth at its conclusion.

Rossini rose and bowed.

"Bravo! Bravo!" repeated Barbaja; "now let us pass to the cavatina."

The orchestra began for the third time to play the overture.

"Ah, there," cried Barbaja exasperated, "all that is delightful; but we have n't the time to play that from now till to-morrow! Begin the cavatina!"

But despite the injunction of the impresario, the orchestra continued none the less to play the overture. Barbaja threw himself upon the first violinist, and taking him by the collar, shouted in his ear: "Why the devil have you kept playing this for the last hour?"

"Why," he replied with a phlegm that would have done honor to a German, "we play what has been given us."

"But turn over the leaves, imbeciles!"

"We turn and turn, and find only the overture."

"How? only the overture!" cried the impresario paling, "it is then an atrocious mystification?"

Rossini rose and bowed.

But Barbaja had fallen motionless in an arm-chair. The prima donna, the tenor, everybody crowded around him. For a moment it was feared that he was stricken with apoplexy.

Rossini, grieved that his joke had taken so serious a turn, approached him with real anxiety.

But at sight of him, Barbaja bounded like a lion, roaring at him:—

"Away from here, traitor, or you suffer harm."

"Let us see! Let us see!" said Rossini smiling, "if there be no remedy."

"What remedy, villain? To-morrow is the day for the first representation!"

"What if the prima donna should be suddenly ill?" murmured Rossini in a low voice in the impresario's ear.

"Impossible! she would never be willing to draw upon herself the vengeance and sourness of the public."

"You might persuade her a little to it."

"That would be useless. You don't know Colbran."

"I thought you on the best terms with her."

"All the more reason."

"Will you permit me to try?"

"Do whatever you like: but I warn you that it will be lost time."

"Perhaps."

On the following day, the announcement appeared on the doors of the Saint-Charles that the first representation of Otello was postponed on account of the indisposition of the prima donna.

Eight days later, Otello was given.

Everybody to-day knows this opera: we have nothing to add. Eight days had been enough for Rossini to make Shakespeare's chef d'œuvre forgotten.

After the fall of the curtain, Barbaja, weeping with emotion, sought the maestro everywhere in order to press him to his heart; but Rossini, yielding doubtlessly to that modesty which is so becoming to success, had hidden himself from the ovation of the crowd.

The next day Domenico Barbaja rang for his prompter, who also filled the rôle of valet de chambre, and being full of impatience sent him to present to his guest the felicitations of the previous evening.

The prompter appeared.

"Go and pray Rossini to come down here," he said.

"Rossini is gone away," replied the prompter.

"How! gone away?"

"Left for Bologna at daybreak."

"Without a word to me?"

"Yes, Monsieur! he left you his adieux."

"Then go and ask Colbran if she will allow me to call upon her."

"Colbran?"

"Yes, Colbran! Are you deaf this morning?"

"Excuse me, but Colbran is gone."

"Impossible!"

"They left in the same carriage."

"The wretch! . . . She has left me to be Rossini's mistress."

"Pardon, sir, she is his wife."

"Ah, I am avenged!" said Barbaja with a peculiar smile.

RICHARD WAGNER TO THE NEW WORLD.

*Ille terrarum mihi præter omnes
Angulus ridet* —

HERR RICHARD WAGNER thinks — and probably some people agree with him — that he has said enough in European hearing about his artistic aims. "The Old World," he tells us, "and especially that part of it included in our new Germany, will hear no more from me directly on this subject." Herr Wagner, however, has considerably exempted the New World from the pains and penalties of his silence, and he has now written, for the North American Review, a paper, "The Work and Mission of my Life" which he leads us to believe no European editor could have torn from him with wild horses. Happy America! But why this preference? In the first place, because the Old World is hopeless. Beethoven was a giant, but after him came "the Jew Meyerbeer," with his coarseness and triviality; Mendelssohn, who could do no more than introduce into music a "graceful good society element;" and Schumann, "a tasteful composer of little, spirited, and pleasant songs and pieces for the piano," who took to writing symphonies, oratorios, and operas. Under the auspices of these men, and others like them, "the German intellect degenerated into a complete unproductiveness in art, severing the living and active bonds that bound it to a great national past, and undertaking to create, unaided, an art intended only for 'amateurs' and 'connoisseurs.'" Disgusted at all this, Herr Wagner looks hopefully to America as the place where the German spirit will soon reach "untrammelled development," for in that land the German mind can swell out in freedom, "unoppressed by the wretched burdens left upon it by a melancholy history." This, and much more like it, will please the master's transatlantic readers, and it really sounds very big and grand; but when we call to remembrance that the fullest Wagnerian expansion of the German art-spirit is represented by a drama compounded of gods, giants, dwarfs, talking birds and beasts, a magic ring, a flavor of incest, and a good deal of dreary music, the temptation arises to suggest an expansion of American protective duties in the form of a heavy poll-tax on German immigrants. — *D. MUSICAL MATTERS FROM FAR AND NEAR.

BY DR. EDUARD HANSLICK.

ON returning home, after a longish absence, we often find on our writing-table something which has altogether refused to turn up during our journey: materials for a feuilleton. Thus I was welcomed back by a neat pile of new musical works, newspapers, and letters, among which I found a great deal calculated to interest my readers as well as myself. Above all, there were several communications from Paris, where there is never any want of activity in the domain of music.

HISTORICAL BALLETS IN PARIS.

In a letter from a friend I find a description of the fête recently given by Gambetta, as President of the Chamber of Deputies. The newspapers have supplied their readers with plenty of particulars. But one part of it strikes me as sufficiently new and important to have attention again directed to it: I allude to the execution of various old dances. Gambetta had dances of the time of the Revolution executed in his salons with the original music and in the costume of the period. The first realization of this original idea, which rises far above mere amusement, I myself witnessed last year in Paris, and still retain a fresh and lively impression of it. The Paris Exhibitions, it must be acknowledged, greatly excelled in one respect all other undertakings of a similar nature; namely, in the extraordinary hospitality and unbounded sociableness displayed towards every visitor. Nowhere else had a foreigner, with good recommendations, a juror, a government commissary, or an exhibitor, enjoyed such ample opportunities for attending brilliant private parties as he enjoyed in Paris. The first dignitaries of the state and of the city, and, above all, the ministers, considered it their duty (a duty utterly ignored in other countries) to do the honors of Paris to foreigners. Almost every week one or other of the ministers gave a brilliant evening party, at which you heard the most celebrated singers and virtuosos. As a proof of the well-nigh unsurpassable richness and variety of the programmes on such occasions in the year 1867, I will mention an evening party given by Marshal Vaillant, Minister of Fine Arts, when a one-act comedy, an old comic operetta, and some unpublished operatic fragments of Meyerbeer's were performed in costume by the leading members of the Théâtre-Français, the Opéra-Comique, and the Grand Opéra. It seemed as if the best displays of the kind were exhausted in the palmy year of the Second Empire, and that nothing was left for the gatherings during the Exhibition of 1878. But the French always discover something new. On the 11th June last year, M. Bardoux, Minister of Public Instruction, offered his guests an entirely original and charming entertainment, namely, a historical concert in dances. This certainly comes under the category of novel surprises, and should excite emulation in other quarters. But such an idea cannot be carried out so easily, for it requires two persons with whom we do not often meet: a scholar conversant with dances, and a danseuse who is also a scholar. The minister found the former in Théodore de Lajarte, a man thoroughly well versed in the history of music, and the latter in Mlle. Laura Fonta, of the Grand Opera. The two between them arranged the whole entertainment in conformity with old choreographic drawings, pictures, and scores. We first witnessed, on a pretty stage at the extreme end of the large apartment, two much talked-of dances of the sixteenth century, the Pavane and the Volte, executed, in French Court costume of the period, by three female and three male dancers from the Opera. The Volte was one of the most popular, if not exactly the most moral, dances. It was requisite that the male dancer should be a strong man, a cavalier gail-lard; he had to whirl his partner round several times and then lift her high up in the air. Yet the Volte was danced at all Court balls, and Queen Margot was celebrated as a famous Volteuse. Completely unlike the Volte, the Pavane was full of ceremonious dignity, and danced by the gentlemen with cloak, sword, and covered head. For the first time in our lives we saw all this, like some old picture vivified, with our own eyes. The whole wound up with the famous "Flower Ballet" from Rameau's Indes Galantes (1753). Mademoiselle Fonta and twelve other ladies represented the flowers, round which blustered and sighed two male dancers under the masks of "Boreas and Zephyr." No description can convey, even approximately, a notion of the exceptionally charming picture, so historically true as regards costume, dances, and music. As already mentioned, Théodore de Lajarte, the learned keeper of the archives at the Grand Opera, superintended the musical part, which he had executed by merely five violins and a piano. This accompaniment proved much too small for the dimensions of the large apartment, which was acoustically bad; the music sounded somewhat as though it had come telephonically from Brussels or London.

A HISTORY OF INSTRUMENTATION.

The remark of some one near me that even Lully had employed 24 violins ("Les 24 violons du Roy") was the signal for a conversation on the different handling of the orchestra at different periods, and drew from me an expression of regret at our not yet possessing a History of Instrumentation. I remarked that, in the labors of Coussemaker, Fétis, Chrysander, and Ambros, we had merely valuable contributions for such a work, as far as regarded more especially oldish music, but no systematic account, coming down to our own days, of how men used to score at different periods and in different countries and schools. I did not know that a gentleman seated quite near me was then engaged on precisely such a work. His name was Henri Lavoix (Fils), and his book, just published in Paris by F. Didot, is called Histoire de l'Instrumentation depuis le 16ième siècle jusqu'à nos jours. The work fills up a gap in the literature of musical history, and is not the first instance of the French anticipating the Germans in musical erudition. Lavoix's Histoire de l'Instrumentation supplements and admirably illustrates G. Chouquet's History of French Opera, and Lajarte's Catalogue raisonné of the Grand Opera, to speak only of works of the most recent date. It contains a mine of information set forth lucidly and pleasingly. It traces the origin of instruments back to the Middle Ages, and follows their development down to the scores of Richard Wagner, while it admirably characterizes the style of instrumentation patronized by various nations and their most eminent composers. If there is anything we miss in the book it is tables with musical examples and diagrams. The latter are best found in the richly illustrated new work, Les Instruments à Archet, by A. Vidal, and the former in Berlioz. These works have recently been supplemented, too, by an admirable and welcome monograph, Les Types des Instruments, published in the Gazette Musicale by that thoroughly profound and clever Parisian critic, Jean Weber. — *Lond. MR. JOSEFFY'S DEBUT IN NEW YORK.

THE young Hungarian pianist, Rafael Joseffy, who made at Chickering Hall last night his first appearance in America, achieved an instant and brilliant success. If little has been heard about him here, it is because hitherto he has almost confined his sphere of activity to Vienna, and musical news is longer and more uncertain in reaching us from Vienna than from any other part of the world. Musicians and connoisseurs, however, were not ignorant of his popularity in the Austrian capital; and the concert last night was attended by a throng of accomplished and expectant listeners who watched the performance with the most critical care. In the applause of such an audience an artist finds the best ratification of his title to fame.

To most of the assemblage we presume that Joseffy was a great surprise. When we hear of a phenomenal young pianist, especially of the modern school, we usually think of a "pounder." Joseffy is anything but that. He is brilliant, yet not noisy, dashing without clatter. Neither does he dazzle us with flashes of irregular splendor, or overcome us with outbursts of passion and tempest. His playing, full as it is of light, of life, of glowing color and of strong feeling, is justly measured and exquisitely symmetrical. Indeed, 't is most brilliant when 't is most delicate. It is when Joseffy executes the softest passages of Chopin that we feel surest in declaring him the most dashing of all pianists. His execution is not more remarkable for its facility than for its nicety. There is perhaps no pianist now living whose work is so clean. Every note has its exact value and makes its exact effect. Every phrase is so clear that it shines; and every little embellishment keeps its outlines perfect. Nor is his precision the result of mere mechanical practice. It seems, on the contrary, to be the simplest expression of a poetical nature highly endowed with a sense of the beauty of form and proportion. Coupled with this elegance of execution is a wonderful — we are tempted to say an unparalleled — beauty of touch. By touch we mean the sensuous quality of the tone evoked from the instrument through some indefinable art in striking the key, — an art wholly distinct from that of execution, which has to do with combinations and successions of notes rather than with the timbre of each one. If Joseffy's style was a surprise, his tone was a revelation. Few of us believed that the piano could produce sounds so sweet and so varied. Whenever he pressed the key-board he dropped jewels from his fingers.

He played last night with the assistance of an orchestra sympathetically and adroitly conducted by Dr. Damrosch. His first selection was Chopin's beautiful Concerto in E minor. The opening Allegro was played with extreme elegance and a composure that seemed to give the audience some astonishment. The Romanza was warmer. In the Rondo the blood of the artist coursed still more rapidly, and here we had one of the most remarkable exhibitions of virtuosity on the pianoforte that we can call to mind. It roused a storm of enthusiasm, and the performer was recalled again and again. Next came a group of solo pieces; in Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue Mr. Joseffy's style did not differ very materially from that of other interpreters; in two of his own transcriptions, or études, based on Boccherini's Minuet and Chopin's Waltz in D-flat, he displayed some of the choicest graces of his execution, although it must be confessed that he added little of value to the themes chosen for embellishment, and that he robbed them of characteristic charms. For a recall he played "La Danza," from Liszt's Venezia e Napoli. Lastly, in Liszt's E-flat Concerto, he manifested powers in a more stately vein than the first part of the entertainment had called forth, and so he kept the delight of the audience increasing to the very end.

The last test of an artist is in the ability to interpret the deepest thoughts of the grandest composers. It is in this that Von Bülow is great. What Joseffy may be in this respect cannot be determined from the selections presented last night. — Tribune, Oct. 14.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XV.

YOUR picture is not quiet enough. Things don't keep their place. A picture that's running around might as well be a mouse. You make too much point of everything. You make everything count. Look! there's a whole! Your picture is not. It is all in parts. Things torment you. Don't hook your eye upon an object and draw it up here just as a lobster catches his food. Don't begin by making exceptions! Begin with your rule. Better have things under-cooked than over-done. Food over-done is not fit to give to a beggar.

Be critical; and keep things where they are. Keep them in the frame. Hang what people say — "That head stands out so well — from the frame!"

Painting is the representation of things that are away from you. You paint what is beyond you. First, the sky; then the distance; next, middle ground; last, foreground, with figures, perhaps. Don't make things too visible! Give people spectacles; but don't spoil your work!

You would all paint better if you did n't think so much of what other people will say about your work. Suggestion is the biggest thing in the world. It is a great deal bigger than a fact. Paint the vague something that you see. Don't try to be smarter than nature.

Distance never lends anything but enchantment. Don't lose your distance! Crack ahead! You're a little bit too conscientious; I mean about painting. I want to see you get vagueness, distance, the subjections which one thing has to another. Learn to sacrifice one thing to surrounding objects! You see a calf staring over a fence. You paint your calf as he looks to you; but if you paint the sky as you think you see it, without any reference to its relation to the calf, you'll find your sky stuck fast to his ears, instead of being four thousand miles away. But I'm not going to bother you any more. Yours truly!

Get your mind off of your work for a minute and then go at it like a cataract.

I've carried that portrait as far as I can carry it safely. I know that I am ambitious; and I know that I should like to go on with it as long as I could see anything to do. But I know that if I did so I should carry it steadily backwards; so I oblige myself to stop where I am. I tried to represent an impression. I have done that; and to go and get other qualities that I should like would be to sacrifice something of the simplicity and dignity of the whole.

If you want to make an impression, you must sacrifice as many details as possible. Keep your figure strong, and undisturbed by little things that hinder, not help, and it will strike the beholder like an apparition. If you are going to paint a ghost, you don't give him sixteen rows of buttons. A great sweep of vague drapery, and a figure in it.

But some people would never be satisfied with that. After a Beethoven Symphony they want a little Jim Crow tacked on to the end of it to make it pretty.

Your background is too yellow. It makes you think of paint. Anybody would know that you painted it with yellow-ochre. The best thing you can do is to paint it right out with black and white and cobalt, and paint your yellow tints into that. Don't bury your figures under a tombstone of yellow ochre, so that after a year's time, when they come to light, they look wriggling and distressed, as if they had been buried alive.

You get a thing yellow by painting it of some other color, and then using the yellow only where it is needed. If you are painting a tiara of gold, paint the band solidly with black and white, and then touch in the yellow-ochre, full and frankly, and the tremble of the blue or black will help the color of the gold.

You must "go in" for something! You can't go in for nothing at all.

It isn't always the thing you see that's the best. Put in all the pretty things that please your fancy, and you destroy the simplicity of the whole.

You must n't be so ambitious!

"How can I help it?"

You can't.

"I was told when in Europe, to 'work, work.' So I began to paint early in the morning, almost before light" —

An excellent time to paint — when you can't see color!

"Yes; and I painted all day, sometimes without eating, even working late at night by gas-light. I did that seven years, until I lost my health."

And now for seven years you ought to go out of doors, sit under a pine-tree, and say, "What a fool! What a fool!"

THE Hereford Festival (156th meeting of the three Choirs of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester) began September 9, with a service, followed by Elijah, with Mme. Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Meses. Enriques and Patey, Messrs. McGuckin, W. H. Cummings, and Santley as soloists. Second day, Purcell's Te Deum, and Bach's Christmas Oratorio (parts 1 and 2), with Miss Thursby, Mme. Patey, Mr. Cummings, etc., and Spohr's Psalm: "How lovely are thy dwellings." Third day, Dr. Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio, The Light of the World (Miss Thursby, Mme. Patey, Messrs. Cummings and McGuckin for tenors, and Mr. Santley, bass; after which, Haydn's Imperial Mass. There were also evening miscellaneous concerts, and a concert of chamber music.

OUR PLANS.

As with the waning year the musical season grows apace, threatening to be more absorbing and more multifarious than ever, we feel the need of all the room our little sheet affords for doing anything like justice to the musical interests and topics of the day. Our columns, therefore, will be henceforth devoted almost exclusively to musical subjects, although we are not bound always to exclude a brief contribution upon other arts, or even of a purely literary character, — for instance, a short poem now and then, if very good! The literary element so far has hardly amounted to enough, in quantity at least, to justify its introduction in a paper like this, while we have wanted all the space it occupied for matters purely musical or in some way related to music. Miss Knowlton's interesting reports of the lamented Wm. M. Hunt's "Talks on Art" will still go on until her stock of notes is exhausted; but beyond this we can make no promises regarding any art but music. We look for more of those readable and instructive articles from Mrs. Ritter, in continuance of the series so charmingly begun with her "Study" on George Sand and Chopin. That was music, poetry, art, nature, all in one! Mr. W. F. Apthorp will still be a frequent contributor, sometimes furnishing, as he has so well done before, an editorial "leader." Nor will any of our valued correspondents and contributors be wanting, while new writers will be coming to the front.

Just now we want more room particularly, — and we intend to take it, — first, for musical intelligence, a summary of events in all parts of the musical world; and secondly, for brief reviews of the more important musical publications. We have still further plans in petto to be matured before the expiration of the present year and volume, for enlarging the scope of this journal, so as to make it more fully an exponent of the musical activity that centres here in Boston, while it will keep an outlook upon what is passing elsewhere, and make more full report of it than heretofore.

IS ROBERT FRANZ A FAILURE?

I HAVE been much surprised, since I wrote an article on "Additional Accompaniments to Bach and Handel Scores," which was published in the Atlantic Monthly for August, 1878, to find a great divergence in opinion on this subject among musicians I have chanced to talk with. I had thought Franz's position in this matter as undisputed among unprejudiced musicians as I now think it unassailable. The opponents of Franz in Germany can be fairly ranked in two classes: those of the first class are not musicians, and those of the second are composers, much of whose work in the same field has been so severely (and to my mind so justly) criticised by Franz and his friends, that their attitude toward him must needs have a polemical character. In the wholly rabid condition of what might be called "musical politics" in Germany, it was humanly unavoidable that such a publication as Franz's notable "Open Letter to Dr. Eduard Hanslick" should estrange from him both Johannes Brahms and Josef Joachim, and their legion of sworn admirers.

But certain private expressions of opinion by musicians who have no manner of personal connection with the quarrel between Franz and Julius Schaeffer, on one side, and the Leipzig

Bach-Verein, on the other, have struck me as so well worthy of consideration, from their wholly unpartisan origin, that I would here try to answer at least some of them.

Much stress has been laid upon the undoubted fact that, with the exception of the "St. Matthew-Passion," the Franz scores of Bach Cantatas that have been performed in Boston (the "Magnificat" and the "Christmas Oratorio") made a very unsatisfactory effect. This is certainly prima facie evidence against Franz. But it would have been nothing short of miraculous if these Cantatas had made a satisfying effect, given under the conditions they then were given under. I would not be thought for a moment to hint at any incompetency in the musicians (singers and players) who took part in these performances; the difficulty did not lie there in the least. The difficulty lay wholly in either a total want of appreciation, or a total disregard, of the fact that the musical conditions these scores demand are different, loco calce, from those demanded by the works our choral societies habitually produce. It is well known that Bach's Church Cantatas were written for very small vocal masses; even the slightest study of his scores will show that his treatment of orchestral instruments, in respect to their mutual dynamic relations, differed totally from that of composers of a later period. In his style of instrumentation Bach shows little or no regard for that superior power of the strings over the wooden wind which was the basis of orchestration in Mozart's and Haydn's day. In fact, Bach's orchestral scores look much more like chamber-music than they do like what is nowadays considered as orchestral writing. Even in forte passages his oboe or flute parts have an importance in the contrapuntal web of the music such as no composer of a later period would have thought of giving them. Each separate voice in Bach's orchestra is as important musically, and should be made so dynamically, as the others. It is very evident that the modern practice of doubling the violin and viola parts, so as to give them the supremacy in the orchestra, cannot give his scores their due effect. Now Franz has scored his "additional accompaniments" wholly in harmony with Bach's style, and the rules that apply to the proper production of a Bach score apply with equal force to the production of Franz's arrangements.

The dynamic relation between orchestra and chorus is also an important matter. It is quite plain that choral compositions in which not only the orchestra as a whole, but every single instrumental part, plays so important a role as in Bach's, will suffer greatly by having the choir so large and powerful as virtually to overbalance the instruments. The true conditions for the proper performance of a Bach Cantata are to have every vocal and instrumental part equally, or very nearly equally, strong. It is almost needless to say that these conditions have never been observed here. Our orchestra has been composed in the same way, and has borne the same relation to the chorus, as in performances of "Elijah," "The Creation," and other works which are scored on a totally different principle. The flutes, oboes, and clarinets have been wholly unable to assert themselves against the strings, and have been, moreover, rendered doubly impotent by their position on the stage, surrounded and deadened as they were by large choral masses, and by having their tone reach the audience filtered through that of the violins and violas, a process which is admirably adapted to give full effect to Beethoven symphonies, but which works much ruin with Bach.

A CALIFORNIA MUSICAL INVENTION.

THE BOW PIANO AND THE VIOLIN PIANO.

THE following history and description of a curious, possibly a valuable musical instrument, which many will remember to have seen at the Philadelphia Exposition, we print for what it is worth. Not having witnessed it ourselves, we cannot judge of its importance. The article, as we received it from a writer in California, who is well informed upon the subject, is introduced by brief historical accounts of the various bow instruments of the violin family, and of the piano-forte by itself. But this is matter so familiar as to be unessential to an understanding of the new invention, so that, considering the length of the article for our small space, we make bold to omit it, and come to the point at once. We have no doubt of the great ingenuity of the invention, but only time and artists can decide whether it be a real gain to music as an art. Whether it is not better that the violin should be a violin, and the piano a piano, each filling the distinctive sphere in art which it has always done, is a question which will force itself upon our mind. The mechanical invention may be very interesting in itself, but the æsthetic, the artistic question is the one on which the whole matter turns. Whether pianists will compose better music, and perform it better, by having a quasi violin, or viol, or violoncello ingrafted on their Chickering or Steinway "Grand," — that seems to be the question. As a general experience, all such mongrel products of the marriage of instruments of different temperament and genius have proved very unsatisfactory to true artists and musicians. But now hear our correspondent: —

THE BOW PIANO.

The first attempt at making a "bow piano" was made in 1610, when Hans Hayden of Nurnberg in Germany turned out an instrument which he called "Gamba work." This new instrument had a finger-board and was shaped like a piano of that time. It was supplied with gut strings, and by pressure on the keys these strings were thrown against small wooden rollers covered with parchment and rubbed with resin. These rollers, connected by a very narrow belt, were governed by a larger wheel, and a pedal connected with the larger wheel put the whole apparatus in motion and, by means of friction, produced the sounds. Hayden's bow piano was improved upon by Johann Hohlfield of Berlin in 1757, and his improvement consisted simply in covering the rollers, instead of parchment, with horse-hair also rubbed with resin, against which the strings were pressed by the same means. After Hohlfield, seven or eight persons made experiments with the view of constructing a bow piano, but no record exists of what they succeeded in perfecting. J. Carl Greiner, one of the best piano-makers of his time, revived the idea of a bow piano, and in the free town of Wetzlar, now belonging to Prussia, in 1783, invented one which had two key-boards, the upper to play the piano and the lower the bow piano. It was three feet eight inches long, one foot eight inches broad, and one foot high.¹

Greiner was the first who made an endless bow of parchment operating over rollers, the strings being pressed against the bow. It is not known how far it was a success. Carl Greiner, at his death, was succeeded in his business by his cousin Hans Greiner, the father of Frederic and George Greiner, but he was so occupied with the manufacture of piano-fortes that he paid no attention to the bow piano. The idea rested from 1783 till 1835, when Frederic and George began to experiment on the bow piano. Many of their experiments were very costly, and at length the brothers came to the conclusion that only by using the natural shape of the violin, viola, violoncello and bass, which had not before been tested, could the sound of the violin be properly imitated by means of four endless horse-hair bows passing over rollers.

The new idea proved the correct one, and the new instrument was pronounced a decided success. This bow piano was arranged in this way: A double bass, a violoncello, a viola, and a violin, were fastened in such a way that one followed the other according to size. These instruments were then surrounded by a frame giving the appearance of a small grand piano, and furnished with gut strings, rendering notes from the lowest bass to the highest treble, at that time intended for but six octaves. The key-board was so arranged that on pressing down the keys a small lever, resting on the hind part of the key and at the same time connected upward with the gut, pressed the string against the bow. Each of the four instruments had its bow made of horse-hair, endless in its action, and passing over two rollers. These four bows were put in action by a fly-wheel connected with the rollers, the fly-wheel being governed by a treadle. Each of the four violins had four bridges, and over these sixteen bridges seventy-three strings passed.

The sound was produced in the same manner as in a piano-forte, namely, by pressing the keys, but on the bow piano the sounds could be prolonged indefinitely by simply continuing the pressure on the keys, an attribute not possessed by the piano-forte. The performer was able, by greater or less pressure on the keys, to regulate the volume of sound and render the notes with more or less expression. On completing the new instrument, the Greiners gave concerts in Wetzlar, their native town, in the neighboring towns, in Frankfort-on-the-Main, and at many of the most fashionable bathing-places, where they were received with the greatest favor by the aristocracy and musical authorities. At Frankfort the celebrated composer and musician, Aloys Schmitt, frequently played on it, and expressed himself as highly delighted with the bow piano. He complimented the inventors on the success of their experiments, which had exceeded all expectations. Schmitt recommended the brothers Greiner to Emil Steinkühler, his most proficient scholar, and the latter, who is now a musical director and composer in Lille in the northern part of France, and received from Louis Napoleon the highest distinction, the "Golden Medal of Merit," played on the instrument very frequently, and spoke of it in unmeasured terms of praise.

In Weisbaden the Duchess of Nassau sent for the inventors to bring the bow piano to her castle. The lady was delighted at the performance of Steinkühler on this instrument. At Ems, the Queen of Greece heard the bow piano, and expressed great satisfaction. Prince Fürstenberg, an excellent judge and patron of music, was much delighted with it. By an Englishman, George Greiner was induced to take his invention to England, where it proved a great attraction, and was highly approved by the composer, Moscheles. On returning to Germany, Greiner and his brother resumed the manufacture of piano-fortes, and continued it till 1848, when George left for America, leaving the bow piano with his brother in Germany. After some years, George received a letter from his brother stating that the gut-strings getting so dry had lost their elasticity and broke, and that to replace so many strings appeared to him too costly and tedious an undertaking, even for once in two years, for many persons. On hearing this George Greiner took no more pains with the bow piano, but discarding the whole idea turned his attention, while in America, to the invention of a more durable and simple instrument, to solve the question whether there could not be constructed an instrument having steel wire instead of gut-strings, and simple upright-moving horse-hair bows, producing sounds similar to those of other bow instruments.

THE VIOLIN PIANO.

After completing his plans and drawings, G. Greiner left Sacramento, California, in June, 1871, and visited his native town in Germany, and there, with his own hands, made the new "Violin Piano," having steel wires and upright-moving horse-hair bows. During the progress of the work new ideas of improvement so constantly presented themselves that five years passed away before the violin piano reached its present degree of perfection, and was a satisfaction to its inventor. The news of its completion drew crowds of the nobility to his rooms, and he was invited to visit Frankfort-on-the-Main and give there a concert, but he was unable to accept, as the Centennial Exposition was close at hand. In 1876 the new instrument was exposed at the Exhibition in Philadelphia, and a few months after its arrival a part of the roof of the main building fell in, and as it was raining heavily in the night time, the violin piano and quantities of other goods were more or less injured. At the close of the Centennial, the instrument, after being thoroughly overhauled and repaired, was removed the following spring to Chicago, and thence to Sacramento, thus showing satisfactorily that it can stand all fatigues of transportation and any change of climate. At the Exposition the violin piano was constantly the attraction for admiring crowds who seemed never weary of listening to its notes, and predicted a handsome fortune for the persevering inventor. During the progress of the Centennial Exhibition, six months, all the Eastern papers of any prominence made favorable notice of the violin piano. Emil Seifert — a performer on the violin and a musical critic of established ability, acknowledging that there had been felt for a long time a desire to produce, on the piano, continuous sounds similar to those of the violin — writing to the Philadelphia Public Ledger, thus speaks of the new instrument: —

"George Greiner, of Sacramento, California, exhibits a unique and interesting instrument, of which he is the inventor, that is, a violin piano, or a piano which, in addition to the ordinary tone, gives a prolonged note similar to a violin or a cello, and produced by the same means, that is, drawing the bow of horse-hair across the strings. The form is similar to that of a grand piano, but the principle can be introduced in any shaped piano. The stringing consists of ordinary steel piano-strings of seven octaves. Each tone has a string, and each string has an upright violin bow. The bow arrangement is made of a steel frame, between which the violin bows are placed. This frame, with the enclosed bows, is put in motion by a pedal causing a perpendicular movement of the bows. The mechanism of the action is constructed so that a small upright lever fastened in the hind part of the key presses against the bent lever with a small roller, and this against the bow in order to produce the tone. The power of this tone depends upon the pressure upon the keys. Above the strings three wooden forms are suspended, which can be raised or lowered through different pedals. In these forms, damping buttons are placed which rest upon certain points of the string, thus originating flageolet-tones. In the first form, by which the dampers touch the centre of the string, the octave in flageolet tone is produced. In the second form the damper touches the third part of the string, and produces the fifth. In the third form the damper touches the fifth part of the string, producing the upper third. The entire three flageolet pedals are governed by the left foot."

In June last, Professor Kemenyi, the celebrated Hungarian violinist, visited Sacramento and gave several concerts. While in that city he visited Greiner's rooms for the purpose of seeing and hearing the violin piano. He expressed himself as highly delighted and gratified with the grand and genial ideas, and with the beautiful tones produced by the steel wires and violin bows. He sincerely wished that the new instrument would soon be generally introduced.

The violin piano can be used as a solo instrument, like the piano-forte. It can be used in churches, in private residences, and as an accompaniment to any kind of musical instrument, and also the human voice, when it gives very general satisfaction. As yet, no composer has written music intended particularly for this instrument, but there is now a large field for such composition. As the violin piano is capable of prolonged sounds, it will be found much easier to produce rich-sounding music for it than for the common piano, the full sound of which is of but momentary duration. The key-board of the violin piano is the same as that of the piano-forte, but the touch of the fingers is entirely different. In the former the player presses on the keys, producing a stronger or softer sound as he may wish, while on the common piano the fingering is a succession of strokes or hammering. The pedal which controls the bow frame of the violin piano can be moved by the performer's foot or by means of a crank governed by another person, or by clock-work if it should not be convenient for him to move the pedal for himself. At first all piano players find it difficult to play on the violin piano for the reason that they are accustomed to strike in a hammering way, whereas the performer on a violin piano must learn to press his fingers on the keys as the violinist does his bow on the strings. The true beauty and perfection of the violin piano can only be shown by a performer who thoroughly understands the instrument. To expect them from others would be as useless as to look for the latent beauties of the genuine Cremona from a novice whose knowledge of the violin causes him to be a welcome visitor at a negro break-down.

The action of the violin piano is much simpler than that of the piano-forte, and can be used a great length of time without requiring any repairing. The friction of the horse-hair on the polished steel wires is so slight that the bows can be used for years without the loss of a single hair, a resin of peculiar composition being used for sharpening the bows. Should circumstances require the insertion of a new bow, it can readily be done, and the same character of sound will be retained; while in the case of the piano-forte, should a new hammer be required, it is difficult to produce the same character. The sound of the violin piano, like the violin itself, improves the longer it is played upon.

From what has been above written concerning it, it will be apparent that there is no reason why the violin piano should not become a leading musical instrument. The attention of manufacturers is called to the fact that the instruments differ so widely that the manufacture of violin pianos will not interfere with that of piano-fortes, and that the general introduction of the former will establish a new and important industry, giving employment to thousands of artisans in factories, which may be carried on in connection with piano-forte establishments. It would be a matter of regret should the violin piano remain longer withheld from the musical world. In the violin piano there is a new and interesting field in which composers who thoroughly understand the instrument may display their genius and ability.

The writer feels satisfied that the violin piano is destined to become a general favorite with all lovers of music, and that should one or more piano-makers purchase the inventor's patent and enter upon the manufacture of violin pianos, they would be well rewarded for their labor and outlay, besides receiving the gratitude of the music-loving public.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

THIS is the season when those little whorls of five to seven migratory artists, which go walking over our wide country nearly all the year, come down upon the city to engage a little brief attention before the bigger planetary bodies that give concerts, the regular organizations, have got the steam up for their annual revolutions. (There's a mixed metaphor for you!) But many of these little concert companies are like planets, too, in that they are satellites about some central star; one of them actually takes the name of "Pleiades;" whether the "lost Pleiad" is among them we are not informed. In plain prose Boston has been visited of late by various small concert companies, who give us the old miscellaneous sort of solo programmes, strings of solos, each calculated to entrap an encore.

We have had the Carlotta Patti troupe three times, with the great Music Hall hardly half filled. But the humor of applause prevailed with plentiful encoring. Mme. Patti is what she always was, a very brilliant, finished, and in every technical way accomplished vocalist. She can make perfect runs and trills, and she can flash arpeggios, every note distinct and bright, throughout a wide soprano compass; she can execute with the precision of an instrument the most difficult and florid passages; she can hold out a high tone, swelling and diminishing its volume to a marvelous degree, and she is very fond of doing it. In fact she is a complete music box in perfect order. Everybody knows it, and everybody says it; there is but one mind about her; so that our humble opinion can hardly go astray in this. But the singing is without one spark of soul or feeling; the only expression is a certain genial good-naturedness, the same in all she does. The Aria from Rigoleto, therefore, and that other bright but soulless Verdi melody, Ermami, inwolami, found the right interpreter in her. Dr. Arne's "Where the bee sucks" was given with a playful grace. And her Spanish songs, though some of those wild shouts were coarsely overpowering, were given with a dash and freedom, as well as a fine execution, that pleased her audience mightily.

For support Mme. Patti had Sig. Ciampi-Cellai, apparently a Frenchman, of good presence, whose voice is a baritone of good quality, afflicted with tremolo. He sang well worn Arias by Verdi, Faure, Mattei, etc., but made no strong impression. The pianist, Mr. Henry Ketten, is remarkable in some respects. There is great decision, certainty, distinctness in his touch, and in his phrasing; every detail comes most clearly out. He has great execution, and great strength, which shows itself as much in his delicate passages as in his frequently too boisterous fortissimos. Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, was very effectively rendered. For an encore he played Liszt's transcription of Beethoven's Turkish March, with clock-like precision of time and accent (rightly so), and admirably in all respects. His own little genre compositions ("Margaret at the spinning wheel," "Spanish Serenade," and "Castagnetta") showed a delicate fancy and were exquisitely played. His paraphrase on Frust, too, was clever in its way. But we were less pleased with his interpretations of Chopin, particularly the Polonaise in A-flat, in which the heroic temper ran too wild and fierce; it was extremely noisy.

Decidedly the finest artist of the group was the violoncelist, Mr. Ernest De Munck, whose tone, style, feeling, execution, place him among the real masters of his (when so handled) most expressive instrument. He made a fine impression with Piatti's Fantasia on the Somnambula, introducing that ever beautiful "Phantom chorus." Schubert's "Le Desir," also made a capital theme for the instrument, but Servais's variations, in their forced transformations for effect, to show off the player, were not all in keeping with it, as Beethoven's variations always are, however unexpected.

Miss Persis Bell will be remembered here as a strong and healthy Western girl, who became one of the foremost of Mr. Eichberg's violin pupils, playing the Bach Chaconne, and works of like calibre, in a way that astonished people. Several years since she went abroad for further study and now comes back married, a well trained singer with a sweet voice, as well as a violinist. Sig. Leandro Campanari, and his wife, Persis Bell Campanari, gave their first concert last Monday evening at Union Hall, before an audience appreciative but far from numerous. The Signor is a young man, of small and delicate mould, with face "sickled o'er with the pale cast of thought," evidently of a sensitive nature, who plays the violin with great purity and sweetness of tone, and a good deal of execution. His tone is not large, and he inclines more to the emotional than to a vigorous, manly style, seeming most in his element in the "Elegie" by Bassini and the "Sonata" (Heaven save the mark!) by Paganini. Yet there is something poetic in his feeling, which was shown to more advantage in the Andante and Polonaise by Viouxtemp, of which he played the latter movement with great fire and verve. In the great Schumann Quintet (first movement) with Pianoforte by Mr. Lang, and Messrs. Allen and the brothers Heindl, he led a good performance with spirit and intelligence; so, too, the delightful Quartet by Haydn, in B-flat, Op. 20, No. 2, which closed the entertainment.

Mme. Campanari showed such sustained power and mastery in her violin solo, the Air brillant by Viouxtemp, that we wondered at her seeking a new career as singer. She has a good voice, sweet and full, with a pleasant timbre or tone-color, and she sang three little songs by Gounod in a style simple and expressive. But Rossini's "Una voce" is somewhat beyond her power of easy execution; in the high passages her voice seemed strained, and there was a certain pupil-like uncertainty in the whole effort.

Mr. Lang, besides his masterly piano playing in the Schumann Quintet, played the first movement of Rubinstein's Concerto, Op. 45, which is of a highly romantic and Fantasia-like Sonata form, and very interesting. Mr. Fenalosa sketched in the orchestral accompaniment on a second piano.

We trust this artist couple will be heard again, and by a larger audience.

The Redpath Lyceum crowd has enjoyed two more concerts. We can speak only of the last (Tuesday evening, October 21), which certainly was, in one point of view, a remarkable sign of the times, — a sign of progress, if things are what they seem. It was simply a classical Chamber Concert (Violin Quartets, etc.), in the great Music Hall (an unfit place, of course), and actually listened to with respectful silence, and heartily applauded after every number by two thousand people! Such things were never seen six years ago. The managers had announced Mme. Gerster for that evening, but ill health delayed her coming over to this country, and the whole programme had to be changed. It was an original thought to engage an excellent Quintet Club from New York, consisting of Miss Lina Anton, pianist, and the Herren Richter and Van Gelder, violinists, Kiech for viola, and Müller, 'cello. Also Miss Matilda Philippa, the contralto, and Signor Runcio, a fine tenor, one of the new members of Col. Mapleson's opera troupe. The vocal selections, though well sung, were of a hackneyed kind compared to the instrumental, which were: A beautiful String Quartet of Haydn (Op. 64, No. 5 in D); Beethoven's Romanza in F; Violin Solo by Herr Richter; piano solo: a tarantella and the great Toccata and Fugue in D minor by Bach, very creditably rendered by Miss Anton; a slow movement from Rubinstein's Quartet in E-flat (Op. 17, No. 2); the Canzonetta from Mendelssohn's Quartet, Op. 13; an Adagio and a Schlummerlied (Carl Schubert and F. Ries) for 'cello solo; and three movements of the Schumann Quintet with piano. Verily a bountiful quantity, considering the quality, for the digestion of a great popular audience!

Here our review must pause for want of room. There is more to speak of which occurred that evening.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHICAGO, OCT. 15. — Our musical season has been somewhat tardy in commencing this year, and although we have had a number of concerts, they were mostly of minor importance. Yet in the near future a number of fine entertainments are coming to us, and as early as next week the Strakosch Italian Opera Troupe will visit our city. It will be an honor for me to transmit to the JOURNAL word-echoes of our music, accompanied by such reflections as are called up in the mind by the tone-pictures that will be given in my hearing. In this Western land, where all is activity, and the rush of the money-makers lends an excitement to the scene, our musical circles are often affected by spasmodic influences, sometimes disadvantageous to our steady progress. The love of change and novelty often enters into the public liking to such a degree as to make us seem capricious in our taste. What the public will support most enthusiastically one season will pass without much notice the next, and some new fancy will be the idol of the hour. In matters of home effort this uncertainty of public taste is often a serious hindrance to positive advancement. Many musical organizations have held their own for a short period upon the tidal wave of success, only to find themselves engulfed by the changing currents of public disapprobation, which the breath of a new sensation called into being. In the musical circles, when considered in their widest sense, there is no fixed standard of judgment, but the emotional element of caprice seems to be, to a large extent, the prevailing element. As long as this condition is a fact, so long will there be an uncertainty in regard to the public support given to praiseworthy undertakings for the advancement of art.

During the past season our home organizations had to make every effort to keep themselves financially strong enough to live, and although they offered to the public interesting concerts at which noble works were performed, their success was but that uncertain one that a breath can sweep away. Yet our public gave $58,000 for an opera season of two weeks, which surely indicated that money was plenty enough. As I look out upon the opening season, and watch the active preparations that are being made by our home musical societies for the public's pleasure, I can but wish that they will receive that appreciation and hearty support which they so richly merit. But uncertainty must be made to give way before a steadfast standard of taste on the part of the public, which will support that which is excellent and beautiful because they love it, before our musical enterprises obtain a healthy, life-sustaining existence. To do this, there is but one way, namely, to educate the public musically, until they appreciate what is beautiful by knowing why it is so. This education can only become generally operative when the wealthy music-lovers are willing to offer tribute to the art they call beautiful by paying something toward its support. When we see that some of our rich people aid in the advancement of music by helping to support liberally the undertakings of our home societies, then we will realize that the art is taking a positive hold in their regard. Then musical culture will no longer be an affection but a reality.

From these reflections I turn to notice briefly some of the concerts of the month. The first of any note was a Pianoforte recital by Miss E. M. Huntington of New York. She had the assistance of Mrs. C. D. Stacy, Mr. James Gill, and Mr. Frank Baird. The pianoforte selections were "Ende vom Lied," Schumann; Polonaise in A-flat, Chopin; 1st movement of the Concerto in C minor, Raff; "Rhapsodie" No. 10, Liszt; and smaller pieces by Henselt, Rubinstein, and Scherwenka. While the lady's playing indicated study, and showed a fine technique, and in the brilliant numbers there was a splendid display of power, yet the refinement, and sentiment that the musical listener loves to observe was lacking.

On Saturday, October 4, Mr. H. Clarence Eddy gave his first organ recital with the following programme: —

Fantasia and Fugue in G minor (Book II., No. 4).
Bach (1685-1750).
"Allegretto" in B-flat Lemmens (1823-).
Introductions and Variations, Op. 45. Merkel (1827-).
(Theme from Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in E, Op. 109).
Songs: (a) "Es war ein Traum" Lassen (1813-).
(b) "Du meine Seele"

Mr. James Gill.
Organ Symphony in G minor, No. 8, Op. 43.
(New) C. M. Widor.
I. Allegro, — II. Adagio, — III. Intermezzo,
Allegro, — IV. Allegretto, V. Finale Viaces.
(First time in this country.)

Aria: "O ruddier than the Cherry" (from "Acis and Galatea") Handel (1685-1759).

Mr. James Gill.
"Orpheus," a Symphonic Poem Liszt (1811-).
Concert-Satz in E-flat minor Thiele (1818-1848).

Mr. Eddy was greeted enthusiastically by the audience, and his playing was so artistic as to win for him still greater appreciation. The programme was well arranged to show the ability of the organist. Perhaps the interest may be said to centre in the New "Organ Symphony" of Widor. It is a work of much beauty, although rather long to come late on a programme. It brings out new effects in organ playing, however, and will interest musicians, even if it may not claim public admiration from the first hearing. Mr. James Gill sang the pretty songs of Lassen in an enjoyable manner, and he made a marked success of the Handel Aria. I have never heard the gentleman sing with a better appreciation of the different shades of sentiment than at this recital.

Mr. S. G. Pratt gave a pianoforte recital under the auspices of Park Institute, presenting selections from Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Dupont, and Liszt. He had an appreciative audience which seemed to enjoy his playing very much. Between the numbers came some songs from Schumann, Franz, Schöndorf, and one by Mr. Pratt. They were sung by a tenor voice.

At Herabey Hall on Saturday last we had the first Chamber Concert of the season by Mr. Eddy, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Eichheim, assisted by Miss Denmore, soprano. They played the Trio No. 8, of Haydn, and the Trio Op. 1, No. 1, of Beethoven. Mr. Lewis played, besides, a Romanze from Op. 27, by Ries; and Miss Denmore sang three songs by Rubinstein and one by Kirehner. As this was the first appearance of these gentlemen in trio-playing this season, they were not as fully in sympathy with one another as they will be after more opportunity of practice together. While their performance had many enjoyable points, it was not such as to carry the critical listener beyond the limits of qualified praise.

Mr. Emil Liebling has underlined for a number of "Musical Evenings" to be given by himself and pupils. I attended the first one, and saw the results of his teaching in some intelligent playing by his pupils.

Mr. W. S. B. Mathews will shortly give a number of lectures upon musical subjects, illustrated by good pianoforte playing from the works of the representative composers. He has been very successful in this line of work, and is creating and extending musical interests, in a way calculated to advance a love for what is best in art. C. H. B.

BALTIMORE, OCTOBER 21. — Since the beginning of the month we have had several concerts, the Italian Opera has but just departed, and the Peabody Conservatory has opened; so that the season may be said to have fairly commenced.

Important additions are to be made to the Conservatory programme. A chorus is now being formed which will meet once a week during the winter for the cultivation of oratorio music with a view to producing an oratorio in the spring, if practicable. There will also be a series of twenty-three string quartets (weekly) for the special benefit of the members of the chorus. All this will be under the direction of Prof. Fritz Fincke, who has been appointed vocal instructor (for German music, Prof. Baraldi continuing to teach according to the Italian method). Prof. Fincke is from the good little city of Wismar, near Schwerin, the capital of Mecklenburg, and brings with him the most satisfactory credentials from Dr. Langhans, and other eminent foreign authorities. He has been for some years director of three singing societies, two in Wismar, and one in Schwerin, is a good violinist and organist, and has earned some reputation abroad as a critic and lecturer on musical topics. Besides taking charge of the chorus and string quartets, Mr. Fincke will lead the violins in the orchestra. The symphony concerts are to be put on a more reliable footing this winter — peculiarly. Subscriptions will be taken as usual, but there will be a sufficient appropriation from the Institute to insure a larger orchestra than that of last season. Annual membership tickets are again being sold at the rate of $10, admitting the holder to eight symphony concerts, eight public rehearsals, twenty-three string quartets, the lectures of the director, and to the Peabody chorus if qualified. Certainly a good many privileges for ten dollars!

Season tickets for the symphony concerts are put at $5, admitting one person to eight concerts and to the public rehearsals; double season tickets, admitting two persons, $8. I doubt very much whether a symphony orchestra can be had anywhere for less than these figures. The programme for these has not yet been decided on, as the orchestra will not begin rehearsing until December.

The Wednesday Club, of which I wrote you last winter, proposes to pay considerable more attention to music hereafter than it has done.

The new hall of the club (which is in a most prosperous condition financially) is almost completed, and it is intended to give a number of small operas and concerts for the benefit of its members. A chorus is also being formed, to consist of one hundred voices, which will soon begin regular weekly practices under the direction of Mr. Fincke.

Of the concerts lately given here that of Miss Katie Cecilia Gaul deserves special mention. This young lady returned to Baltimore, her native city, after an absence of some eight years, which were mainly spent at the Stuttgart Conservatory. She was also under the tuition of Liszt, at Weimar. Her playing shows the careful attention to detail and the fine phrasing for which the Stuttgart school is so celebrated. After giving her concert here Miss Gaul left for New York to give one performance, and then proceeded to Cincinnati, where she has been engaged by Mr. Thomas to play in concert during the coming season.

The Italian opera, under Max Strakosch, gave four performances last week to poor houses, owing, no doubt, to the exceedingly close weather, for the leading characters are very good, and the fact that the overlying Trovatore, Lucia, and Traviata were selected should have made it the more popular. The Aida performance was the only one which calls for special attention. The troupe is probably the best, as regards the leading performers, that Max Strakosch has ever had. The Misses Singer, and De Belocca, and the Messrs. Petrovich, Storti, and Castelmari each combine, more or less, a good voice with true histrionic instincts. They rendered Verdi's last opera in a manner deserving the highest commendation.

The single concert recently given here by Carlotta Patti was a most inartistic affair throughout, if we except the 'cello playing of Mr. De Munkel, the selections for the most part being of the extremely frivolous order.

Last evening your correspondent had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Anton Streleski, the recently arrived pianist. Piano Recitals are of rare occurrence here. Mr. Streleski played from memory the following rather lengthy programme, and in a manner to keep the interest alive to the close:—

Toccata and Fugue D minor	Back—Trusty.
Rondo A minor	Mozart.
Giga A major	Handel.
Sonata D minor Op. 31, No. 2	Beethoven.
Barcarolle, Valse A-flat, Nocturne C-sharp, Ballade, G minor, Etude Op. 10, No. 3, Polonaise A-flat	Chopin.
Caprice Russe	Tchaikowski.
Faschingsschwank aus Wien	Schumann.
La Revenue	Szemelenyi.
Minuetto	Schubert.
Elsa's Brautgang, (Lohengrin)	Wagner—Liszt.
Galop	Rubinstein.

He is a young man, only twenty-two years of age, of fine healthy physique, and his touch is both powerful and subtle. His most satisfactory performances were the Beethoven Sonata, the Nocturne in C-sharp, and the Ballad from Chopin, and the Tchaikowski, Schumann and Wagner selections. The Russian caprice exhibited a fabulous technique, and the break-neck speed of the Rubinstein galop was something wonderful to listen to.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN is really coming, and will conduct a performance of several of his compositions (The Prodigious Son, probably In Memoriam, and other works) at the first Handel and Haydn Concert for the season, Sunday evening, Nov. 23. Rehearsals have commenced with unusual alacrity, nearly 600 singers in the chorus. — The Messiah will be given Dec. 28, and Israel in Egypt on Easter Sunday. — Miss Emma Thursby is definitively engaged for the triennial Festival in May.

THE programme of the second Philharmonic Concert (Listemann's Orchestra) will be found among our advertisements.

THE Enterpe has decided to give five Concerts this season: namely, on the third Wednesday of December, January, February, March, and April, as before, in Mechanics Hall. The New York artists of last year are engaged for two of the Concerts and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club for three. The programmes will consist always of two pieces, string Quartets or Quintets, namely three by Beethoven, two by Mozart, and one each by Haydn, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Raff.

RAFAEL JOSEFFY, the Hungarian pianist, famed for the delicacy of his playing, will give three recitals in Horticultural Hall, Oct. 30, 31, and Nov. 1.

MR. STETSON will begin a series of operatic performances at the Globe Theatre, October 27, by a company consisting almost entirely of resident musicians. Auber's Crown Diamonds will be given by the following well known singers: Miss Laura Schirmer, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Charles R. Adams, Mr. Alfred Wilkie, Mr. Frank Moulton, Mr. Henry G. Peakes, Mr. Clarence E. Hay. There will be a chorus of forty, and Mr. John C. Mullaly will be the musical director.

OPERA. — Faustina had delighted audiences at the Boston Theatre last week, and this week has been succeeded by a return to Pinafore, both by the "Ideal (!) Opera Company," which consists, however, of real singers, not shadowy sprites and nixies, to wit: Miss Adelaide Phillips, Miss Mary Beebe, Messrs. M. W. Whitney, Fossenden, Barnaby, and others. — The Emma Abbott Company opened at the Park Theatre on Monday evening with Gounod's Fra Diavolo, Miss Abbott as Marguerite, Mrs. Seguin as Siebel, Mr. W. H. Macdonald as Mephisto, A. E. Stoddard as Valentine, and Tom Karl as Faust. On Tuesday, the Bohemian Girl; Wednesday, Mignon; Thursday, Friday, and to-day's matinee, Paul and Virginia (first time); this evening, the Chimes of Normandy.

FOREIGN.

LONDON. The scheme of the 24th series of Saturday concerts at the Crystal Palace is announced. There will be twenty-three concerts, eleven before and twelve after Christmas, commencing October 4. Mr. Augustus Manns continues as conductor. Among the important features will be these:—

Beethoven: The nine Symphonies, played in their chronological order (at the last nine Concerts of the Series). The First Movement of an unfinished Violin Concerto.

Haydn: Symphony in E-flat, No. 8 of Salomon Set (first time at these concerts). Symphony in D, "La Chasse," No. 5 of Rieter-Biedermann's New Edition (first time at these concerts).

Mozart: Symphony in C (No. 6). Serenade for Strings, "eine kleine Nachtmusik," composed in 1787 (first time at these concerts). Ballet Music to "Idomeneo" (first time at these concerts).

Schumann: The four Symphonies, played in their chronological order (before Christmas).

Mendelssohn: "Antigone" (with condensed reading), the choral parts to be sung by Leslie's Choir. The concert will be conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie, and his celebrated choir will on this occasion sing several of its most favorite unaccompanied pieces. Scotch Symphony. Overture for Strings.

Schubert: A "Schubert Programme" will open the after-Christmas series, on the 31st January, in commemoration of Schubert's birthday.

Wagner: "Faust Overture." "Siegfried-Idyll." Brahms: Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Piano-forte Concerto.

Amongst the works which are new to our programmes are the following:—

H. Hoffmann: Symphony, "Frithjof."

Raff: "Spring Symphony (No. 8, in A).

Liszt: Symphonic Poem, No. 12, "The Ideal" (after Schiller).

Wagner: Scenes from "Die Meistersinger," as arranged for the Concert-room by the composer.

Verdi: Ballet Music, "The Four Seasons" (from I Vespri Siciliani). Overture to "Aroldo."

Rubinstein: Symphonie Dramatique.

Ponchielli: "Danza delle Ore" (from "La Gioconda").

Mancinelli: Overture and Selection from the incidental Music to "Cleopatra."

Bazzini: Overture to "King Lear."

Forani: Concert Overture, No. 1, in C.

Berlioz: Selections from "Roméo et Juliette" and "La Damnation de Faust."

Gounod: "Procession Sacrée" and Selection from the Ballet Music to "Polyeucte."

Delibes: Cortège de Bacchus and Divertissement from the Ballet "Sylvia."

Saint-Saëns: "Le Rouet d'Omphale."

Svendsen: "Carnaval de Paris" and Rhapsodie Norvégienne No. 4.

Dvorák: Slavonian Dances, Second Series.

Among the works of the English School intended to be brought forward are: Prelude and Funeral March from "Ajax," by Sterndale Bennett; Prelude and Fugue for Orchestra, by G. E. Davenport; Scherzo, by A. C. Mackenzie; a Concerto for Piano-forte, by C. H. H. Parry (Pianist, Mr. Dannreuther); and an Instrumental Piece by each of the four composers who have held the Mendelssohn scholarship: Dr. Arthur Sullivan, Dr. C. Swinerton Heap, Mr. William Shakespeare, Mr. Francis Corder.

In addition to the important works enumerated, the programmes will be interspersed with lighter pieces, the special favorites of the Crystal Palace audience, amongst which may be named:—

Funeral March of a Marionette	Gounod.
Mignon Gavotte	Ambroise Thomas.
Minuet for Strings	Boccherini.
Air de Ballet and Shepherd Melody	Schubert.
Two Minuets (from Serenade No. 1)	Brahms.
Dance of Nymphs and Reapers	Sullivan.
Air and Gavotte (Suite in D)	Back.
Gavotte for Strings	Bazzini.
Largo	Handel.
Vorspiel to Third Act, King Manfred	Reinecke.
Dance of Persian Slaves (Le Roi de Lahore)	Messner.

Our brief resumé (Sept. 27) of the Birmingham Festival, was accidentally clipped of its last two lines, and so omitted to mention Israel in Egypt as the grand concluding feature of the festival.

HERR RICHARD WAGNER is a person terrifying to the librettist. Roche's description of a day passed with the composer, the former hammering out the words, the latter the music, is very entertaining. Wagner arrived at seven o'clock, and they worked without respite until midday: Roche bent over his desk, writing and erasing; Wagner strode to and fro, bright of eye, vehement of gesture, shouting, singing, striking the piano, and constantly bidding poor Roche "Go on! Go on!" An hour or two after noon Roche, hungry and exhausted, let fall his pen, almost fainting. "What's the matter?" asked the composer. "I am hungry." "True; I had forgotten all about that; let us have a hurried snack and go on again." Night came and found them still at work. "I was shattered, stupefied," says Roche, "My head burned, my temples throbbed. I was half mad with my wild search after strange words to fit the strange music. He was erect still, vigorous and fresh as when we commenced our task, walking up and down, striking his infernal piano, terrifying me at last, as I perceived dancing about me on every side his eccentric shadow, cast by the fantastic reflections of the lamp, and crying to me over, 'Go on! go on!' while trumpeting in my ears cabalistic words and supernatural music."

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF CARL VAN BRUYCK.

THAT period of intimate union between poetry and music which began with this century, and which now seems near its end, is commonly designated as the "romantic." The opposition of the so-called classical and romantic schools consists in the predominance of the plastic formal element, the measured, even flow of composition and expression in the former, as contrasted with the tendency to vague and shadowy outlines, and a superabundance of emotional expression in the latter. In this sense composers like Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven in his first two periods are classical. On the contrary, the venerable old Bach has in him a strong romantic element, which is most singularly shown, for instance, in the Adagio of his "Italian Concerto." In the works of Beethoven's third period, as in those of Schubert, this spirit of romance reveals its mystical and demoniacal depths on the one hand, while on the other it displays its brilliant richness and variety of color.

Full of this romantic spirit are the little tone-pictures, frequently mere breaths, of Chopin, scion of the chivalrous, ill-fated Polish nation, its most important representative in the musical domain of art. I say "the little" pictures, because in them lies the centre of gravity of his artistic significance; because these smaller forms, which he has chiefly cultivated, were the best adapted to his very one-sided, yet, within narrow limits, truly genial endowment. Thoroughly a son of his fatherland, his brilliant, highly-colored Polonaises and his now bold and fiery, now dreamy, melancholy Mazurkas form the bright side of his wholly idiosyncratic, but often morbidly affected, and immeasurably crisped and curled productions. Yet it would be unjust not to speak also of his Concertos, especially the one in E minor, whose orchestral introduction is so deeply conceived, and filled with such a noble, serene spirit, that even Beethoven might have written it; as, strange to say, among the works of Beethoven, who otherwise has not the least in common with Chopin, there is at least one piece (not to mention the Adagio of the C-sharp minor Sonata) which might have sprung from Chopin; namely, the very short Adagio of the G-major Concerto, which breathes (I might say) that faint and deathlike spirit which we feel so frequently in Chopin's ethereal tone-pictures, for which nuance of mood the French possess the significant expression, languissant.

On the other hand there are many other works of this composer which are anything but "ethereal," and which require in the player's hands muscles and cords of iron, together with an exceptional physical elasticity and power of stretching. This is true, for example, of his twelve grand, and for the most part very poetic and inspired, Etudes, which represent tolerably well the very Chimborazo of technical difficulty, and might form the culminating point of a Gradus ad Parnassum for to-day. But much as we may lament this fantastical luxuriance of tone-phrasing, and wish to exclude it from the art, on the other hand it cannot be denied that this element (for example in the Concerto above named, which might be called a musical Klingsor) has been handled with an exquisite, enchanting fineness. Like a cascade of pearly champagne foam, these musical waterspouts soar aloft and sink back again into the basin full of gold fishes; the silver moonbeams sparkle and glisten through them; it is the "moonlit magic night" of the romantic into which we gaze, or, rather, which rings out from these tone-images.

But the romanticist par excellence is that wonderful artist and tone-poet, Robert Schumann. . . . In his first artist period, which seems in many respects the most remarkable of all, Schumann devoted himself entirely to the composition of piano music and of songs. At the same time it seems characteristic that his genius chose by preference the smaller forms, although often connected together in cycles of several pieces, for the expression of his inmost musical and human life of intellect, imagination, and emotion. We have, to be sure, also out of his first period, two solo Sonatas in F-sharp and G minor, and then a third work (in F minor), which he at first superscribed "Concerto without orchestra," but afterwards as a Sonata, — all three extremely remarkable compositions, in which a boundless genial tone-faculty reveals itself, but partly also, almost more, the wild eruptions of an excited Faust-like spirit, struggling in the maelstrom of a dark and stormy imagination after some settled form. Especially the F-sharp minor Sonata is a real musical volcano crater, thoroughly pervaded with this demoniacal glow, although from the midst of the flames there sound out now and then most lovely siren voices, as well as sportive shouts of cobolds, especially in the Adagio, and in the middle portion of the Scherzo, with its striking, bold, and grotesque recitative passage.

The Concert sans Orchestre, with the wonderfully beautiful and deep-felt variations for a middle part, which certainly shows as little of the style-peculiarity of the Concerto as of the Sonata (hence his wavering in the choice of a title), contains, in its remarkable finale, a piece of such an individual stamp, and such a thoroughly peculiar spirit, that none like it can be found in the whole piano-forte literature, — a magical play of shadows, vanishing away like the fancies of an opium intoxication. But amid the waves and whirlpools of the mightily excited sea of tones, amid the now whispering, now gigantically swelling billows of the strangest harmonies (oft of which, indeed, the old Bach peeps), there moves a solemn, measured, deep-felt song, — until at last the demons get the upper hand, and the work, already stormy on the whole, roars itself out in a tornado. Still a fourth larger work of this period, of equal wealth of fancy and of feeling, a Fantasia in C major (dedicated to Liszt), may be particularly mentioned here on account of the significant motto prefixed to it, namely, the verses of Friedrich Schlegel: —

"Durch alle Töne tönet
Im bunten Erdentraume
Ein leiser Ton gezogen
Für den, der heimlich lauschet." 1

There is also a great work of Variations (in C-sharp minor) which dates from this first period of Schumann's productivity, a work as sombre in its ground tone as those just named, but running out into a triumphant, jubilant finale, in which this form is treated both with genial (but not willful!) freedom, and with exceeding splendor, — a work in its way as grand and noble as the variation works of Bach and Handel, to which we have before alluded. Schumann calls it, to be sure, "Etudes," with the qualifying adjective "Symphoniques;" but he has chosen this title chiefly with regard to the technical (and other!) difficulty of their execution; while the term "symphonic" denotes Schumann's, one may say, orchestral treatment of the piano-forte, which principally through him and Liszt became so universally predominant.

It is also characteristic that Schumann, in this youthful period, felt himself drawn to make a piano-forte transcription of Paganini's violin Etudes, — as ingenious a one as could be expected from so rare and fine a head. It shows the interest which Schumann took at the same time in the technique of playing. In fact the development of technique, under the hands of the great virtuosos at that time, was not without influence on Schumann's art. His imagination would not, perhaps, have run riot in this direction in such an unlimited, unbridled way, had there not been the hands (and heads to correspond) with power to execute such things, — for every composer must desire to have his works transferred from paper into live existence, — therefore it must at least be possible. (For the rest, the process in the history of art is just the reverse; the development of practical virtuosity is called forth by the increased means of art.) In fact, it is Schumann's works of this first period that unfold all the marvelous full play of the modern piano-forte, but, on the whole, in a thoroughly artistic and poetic way.

1 'Mid all the chords that vibrate through Earth's strangely chequered dream,
There runs a note, whose gentle tone
Is heard aright by him alone
Who lists with care extreme.

These works, whatever else may be objected to them from certain rigorous and well-justified æsthetic standpoints, contain such magical, strange harmonies, that whoever has once been taken by their charm will not so easily and soon get free from it again. But I will also add that it is not altogether without danger to give one's self up without resistance and without reserve to this charm, and that one had better, at least in the presence of tender youth, station himself like a warning "(and not a seductive!) Eckart before this — Venusberg, whose grotto, to be sure, is overhung and decked with loveliest roses, but with the deadly nightshade also. The fragrance which rises from these tone-blossoms is so intoxicating, and weaker senses are so benumbed by it, that they too easily lose all sensibility for the chaste, simple beauty, the translucent clearness of the earlier art.

I must naturally content myself here with this general characterization of the Schumann muse, as it appears most pregnantly in the works of his first period, although I have spoken more of their dusky splendor, and hardly at all yet of their more charming side, which they disclose particularly in the smaller, cyclical tone-pictures, like the so-called "David's-Bündler-Dances," the "Novellettes," the singular "Kreisleriana," the "Kinder-Szenen" full of grace; nor have I dwelt upon the sparkling, bold, fantastic humor that surprises us, for example, in the "Carnival Scenes," the "Faschings-Schwank aus Wien," and in Opus 20, which is expressly designated by the title "Humoreske," although occasionally, perhaps, this humor is more startling than it is edifying.

Striking as the juxtaposition may sound, nevertheless it may be said that the old master Bach and this most genial representative of the last completed phase of art, in all other respects so entirely heterogeneous, come close together in this, that these two are the greatest harmonists, as Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven are the greatest melodists, that German art has produced, — only that this profound development of the wonderfully rich world of harmony in the two masters proceeds upon a wholly different way, and hence with a wholly different effect. With Bach this superabundant wealth of harmonies (which naturally includes the boldest use of dissonances) appears more secondary in the course of his wonderful contrapuntal involutions, whereas with Schumann it appears as the primary element, determining the forms. Hence, with Bach, it oftener strikes the eye and inner hearing of the score-student than the immediate sense of hearing; but with Schumann it stands out most palpably, and of all the art-elements which blend in the impression, it awakens the most strained attention.

Nor can the fact be overlooked, that this fineness of the harmonic as well as of the rhythmic element reached its extremest limit in Schumann, as did the power of counterpoint in Bach (witness some portions of his abstruse "Art of Fugue"); as did the wonderful command of musical ideas in Beethoven, in the finale of whose Ninth Symphony, as in some of his last Quartets and Sonatas, there is scarcely any fixed and rounded art form perceptible.

And Schumann seems to have felt this himself, for his extremely critical sense for all kinds of art (as one may see in the two volumes of his collected writing-) could not have been wanting for his own art. Hence, in his second period, he cultivated the great art forms handed down by the "masters" more assiduously; he reduced the use of technique to a somewhat simpler measure; he emancipated himself more from the control of the piano, and concentrated his superabundant power in the great forms of orchestral and vocal music, — alas! only to overstrain it in the end, and fall himself a victim to the demons, with whom he had played so bold a game, and who, above all, in his Manfred music, shot up once more such lurid tongues of flame. . . .

ON ROBERT SCHUMANN'S "MUSIC AND MUSICIANS."¹

BY F. L. RITTER.

AMONG all recent English publications of writings on musical subjects, I know of none fitter to be placed in the hands of rising artists, and intelligent art-lovers, than those of Schumann, of which one series has lately been published, and a second series will soon appear. Though they were written under the immediate influence of the various artistic events occurring during a period of about ten years, — from 1834 to 1843, — and, be it remembered, for a weekly musical journal, which had to record and to portray the passing events of the musical world for the temporary perusal and benefit of the reader of the day, we meet in them with comparatively little that bears the mark of a tribute paid to the art taste of that time, or that has for us a merely historical importance. To be sure, Schumann established the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, with no mercantile intention of bowing down to the undisciplined taste of blasé audiences, or tickling the unripe judgment of musical groundlings, in order to make his enterprise succeed in a pecuniary way. His purpose was a far nobler one. He started with the honest endeavor to make his paper the organ of the most intelligent minds of the German musical art world, and by this means to exercise a beneficial artistic and æsthetic influence over his readers. The great imperishable musical treasures of Bach, Beethoven, Schubert, had to be made known to a public which reveled, knee-deep, in the musical sweetmeats of Italian confectionery. Herz and Hünten reigned supreme in the concert room as well as in the parlor. New æsthetic problems had to be solved and explained. New art principles, as deduced from the immortal works of the great Viennese trio — Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, — had to be expounded and lived up to; in short the paradise of easy-going Philistinism had to be removed and replaced by a new art world, teeming with new, far-reaching ideas. New, vigorous, organic life had to be infused into the body of art; indifference, pedantry, ignorance, had to be exposed in the pillory of ridicule, sarcasm, and honest indignation. The young, eager art world looked out for an intrepid, ideal leader. Schumann stepped into the arena and, coûte que coûte, boldly took up the fight for the new cause. Around him a band of young enthusiastic warriors gathered, revolution on their banner, tearing down and scattering to the four winds the old stereotyped fences that easy-going conservatism had built up, in order to hem in the new art spirit awakened especially by that deaf giant who, regardless of all theories consecrated by long habit, threatened to crush the carefully nourished butterflies under the weight of his mighty steps.

Music, as an art, was for Schumann, in its entire significance, a subject of the deepest concern; he attributed to it a sacred importance and an ethical function. He considered it as the promoter of the purest and most ideal happiness. He kept, while writing about art and artists, one principle in view, — to contribute with all his understanding and energy to the purification and exaltation of musical art in all its phases. This is the fundamental key to all his articles, this is the motive power of all his criticism. He did not speak of the heroes of musical art, in order to add trivial praise to their recognized greatness, but with a view to foster a clearer understanding of the ideal bearing of their glorious deeds. He did not criticize mediocre works of the musical time-servers, the "one-day butterflies," merely to administer a just rebuke; but, like the broad-minded artist and critic that he was, he endeavored honestly and impartially to recognize the temporary good such deeds may possibly have in store, directing at the same time the attention of the striving artist to the deteriorating influence of that which he considered unworthy of the true musician. Highly instructive in this respect are the papers speaking of the works of Herz, Hünten, Kalkbrenner, Thalberg, and others of this stamp. While recording the dazzling achievements of his great contemporaries, he never was carried away by mere personal admiration, to such an extent as to lose control over his better judgment. Glorifying, with all the openness of his generous nature, in the enthusiastic recognition which these achievements received at the hands of an excited public, he was strong enough to preserve his manhood from such exaggerated adulation as we often see exhibited with regard to mere "busy mediocrity," as to success mostly due to smart managerial means and intrigues.

He fearlessly expressed his own opinion, and blamed where he found occasion to blame; but such opinion, such blame, was invariably couched in respectful, and often poetical language. Read, for instance, the papers on Mendelssohn, Heller, Liszt, Hiller, Henselt, Chopin, and Burgmüller. But, of course, having been their equal and in some respects their superior, though too modest an artist to entertain such pretensions — (with what reverence did he not look up to Mendelssohn's mastery over form, to Chopin's originality!) — he was well qualified to appreciate the whole bearing and importance of the deeds and works of these splendid artists. The interest of true art first, and then that of the artist. "I love not the men whose lives are not in unison with their works;" and "If talent of the second rank masters the form it finds and makes use of, we are satisfied; but from talent of the first rank we demand that the form should be enlarged. Genius must bring forth in freedom." And then again: "People say it pleased, or it did not please. As if there were nothing higher than the art of pleasing the public;" for "the artist should be cheerful as a Grecian god, in his intercourse with life and men, but when these dare to approach too near, he should disappear, leaving nothing but clouds behind him."

The paper on Meyerbeer's Huguenots will show how indignant, nay, how bitter he could become, when, from his lofty idea about art, he sees it used for the gratification of mere personal vanity and selfish ends. With deep indignation he writes, after having assisted at the first performance of the opera at Leipzig: "I agreed at once with Florestan, who, shaking his fist towards the opera, let fall the words: 'In Il Crociato I still counted Meyerbeer among musicians; in Robert Le Diable I began to have my doubts; in Les Huguenots I place him at once among Franconi's circus people.' I cannot express the aversion which the whole work inspired in us; we turned away from it, — we were weary and inattentive from anger." These are hard words. Although Meyerbeer deserved, in many respects, the scathing rebuke, I think Schumann, in his holy anger, was unable, for the time being, to recognize the really grand and beautiful pages with which this finest of all Meyerbeer's scores abounds. It is, however, very rarely that we find the great artist and critic overstep his customary moderation in judging others, to the degree that borders on injustice. The paper has, however, another and deeper meaning for the unprejudiced reader, — a meaning which reaches farther than mere personal disgust at Meyerbeer's sins against true art. It proves, at the same time, with what high expectations these young German composers looked upon the production of a much praised new opera. They were dissatisfied with existing German operatic matters in general; the then successful German opera composers, ignoring Beethoven, ignoring Weber, wrote in imitation of the Italians and the French. Schumann and his friends had declared a war of extermination upon all art endeavors that clashed with their eminently German views. But in spite of their lofty theories about a real national German opera, the thing would not come forward. Although the "Junge Brauseköpfe" put hands to the plough themselves, there was always something missing to prevent the expected success of their operatic creations. Hence the discouragement, the utter disappointment, with which they gave vent to their feelings, while experiencing the great success of works in which so much ran contrary to their artistic taste and ideal; and still deeper must this displeasure have been, since they had reason to claim the composer of Les Huguenots as one of their nation!

Wagner understood the whole situation much better. Out of the great chaos of French-German-Italian modern operatic form, he cut the material for his "Musical Drama," and enriched, intensified it by means of the symphonic conquests of Beethoven's great instrumental works, throwing off, as he went on, step by step, all that appeared to him foreign to his artistic intentions and dramatic aims. He succeeded finally in putting forward his new national German musico-dramatic art-work. He again took up the old German war cry against all operatic elements hailing from Italy or Paris. But, as it is never given to any mortal to please everybody, especially when he is still alive, and so hot-headed an innovator as Wagner proves to be, — who, seeing with the eyes of mere amusement seekers, is so unreasonable as to expect from the opera public any belief and faith in ideal art-principles, a hitherto unheard-of thing in the operatic world? — the German people, and some of the most cultivated classes, fail to recognize the great national importance of Wagner's musico-dramatic achievements. He and his friends meanwhile battle on bravely, confident of future victory.

To the young artist Schumann will ever remain a noble example. Having had many hard struggles to encounter, both from inward and outward causes, in order to penetrate to and conquer that eminence which he subsequently held as an artist and a composer, he never once faltered with regard to the use of the noble means that gained for him his exalted place. Madame Ritter has justly said in the preface to the English edition of the above writings: "It would be difficult to overestimate the value of Schumann's labor as a critic. His influence was not destructive or depressing; it was beneficent and inspiring." In this spirit the papers will still be read and reread, infusing encouragement, hope, and cheerfulness into many an artist's breast, when depressed and weary from the discouraging effects of temporarily unsuccessful battles with the Pharisees and Philistines that pretentiously parade in the temple of art.

It is highly interesting and instructive to follow up the bent and growth of Schumann's genius as shadowed in these writings, which afford a psychological glimpse into the inner workshop of the great artist. At the start the sacred enthusiasm, but not yet purified and intensified by sufficient practical experience, the glowing richness of his poetical nature, still gains supremacy over clear philosophical views. His first papers (like his first works) display almost a tropical richness of imagery, from the entanglement of which it appears at times difficult to extricate the writer's meaning or æsthetic views. It is touching to see him inwardly struggle in order to grasp the æsthetic importance and meaning of the great forms of Bach and Beethoven; this goes hand in hand with his practical attempts to gain mastery over those forms. Schumann, the young critic, was an exacting master to Schumann the young composer. In many of his articles we can understand, between the lines, his happiness when success apparently crowned his arduous endeavors, or the temporary discouragement when the goal of his deepest desires seemed to lie, as it were, beyond his reach.

As the powers of his creative faculties ripen, his critical views become less clothed in poetical metaphor; the æsthetic vista becomes clearer and more definite, the judgment widens, wavering less between the different contrasting views of "Florestan, Eusebius, and master Raro." But arrived at this point in his career as a writer, he laid down his pen, having, for the time being, fulfilled his mission as a musical critic, leaving to other hands the precious duty of carrying out what he so gloriously, and at great sacrifice, had commenced.

Having thus endeavored to point out the general critical bearing and importance of these writings, I shall make it my task in the following numbers to examine, so far as time and space will allow, what were Schumann's (the critic Schumann) æsthetic views regarding the ideal functions of music. Were these views, as here and there expressed, in harmony with his own method of composing, as well as with that of other composers?

MUSICAL FORM: FALSE NOTIONS OF ORIGINALITY.

PROFESSOR MACFARREN, in his "Inaugural Address of the Fifty-Eighth Year (1879-80)" of the Royal Academy of Music, London, gives the following sound advice to young incipient composers.

"It has been the wont of recent criticism to rest very much upon the claim to be considered original, and some remarks upon the performances of even the best among us have been to the purpose that such and such a composition wanted originality. Believe me, there never was so unsound a remark and so uncritical criticism upon the endeavors and upon the achievements of pupils. One may look into the history of art and find upon proof that, whether in our beautiful music or in other manifestations of genius, beginners have wrought in the manner, in the idiom, in the phraseology of their time, and working in its accepted vernacular they have gained control of their own thoughts. Thoughts need manipulation, exercise, development, quite as much as do the fingers of a player or the vocal organs of a singer; and when one has learned to think, when one can dispose of one's thoughts at discretion, then if the mind of the thinker have some individuality itself, have something different from the minds of other men, the means have been attained for the expression of that individuality; but he who in the first instance aims to be unlike his fellows becomes eccentric, angular, peculiar, possibly ugly, but by all means ungenial. And we must be content if we can, as Shakespeare did in English, — begin writing the English of his contemporaries, branching out afterwards into his great individuality; as Mozart did in music, as Beethoven after him, and as others have done of less note than those, begin by writing such phrases, by conducting our musical thoughts in such channels as form the language of those great men who have gone before us; and then when we can conduct our thoughts, our own originality, if we possess it, will come out and will stamp the true musician a genius.

"Of all things resist the persuasion that the great forms of music have been exhausted. Such, believe me, is not the case, — music would cease to demand our respect and our confidence were it so; but we must feel, on the contrary, that art has the strongest likeness to nature in this fact, — that its works are formed upon a traceable plan. The structure of a flower, the development of a fruit, the anatomy of every animal, show consistency and coherence of parts, and reason for every incident of the whole formation having the exact place, the exact function, the exact use that it has; and in musical composition there is just the same necessity for regulation, for order, for adjustment. We look at the works of the great masters, and they seem so completely perfect as they stand, that it must have been impossible for them ever to have been otherwise than as we know them; but with the greatest of musicians the same care has been spent on the elaboration, the construction, the arrangement of their most perfect works that is necessary for the youngest student to apply to his first attempt. In some instances, most especially in the case of Beethoven, there is evidence of the process through which these works have grown into their perfection, for it was his habit to write down from moment to moment, thoughts as they rose in his mind, and again from moment to moment to write down modifications of these thoughts, and from his earliest entrance on the pursuit of art he carried everywhere a note-book, resting or walking. Even at night this book was placed under his pillow, and if, in a restless hour, he was visited by a musical thought, instantly was this written in his book. Mostly it is the habit of a musician to conserve such a thought in his mind till he has rounded it into the rhythmic order in which he chooses to present it; but in this one case we see the whole process, and can as closely trace the formation of the thoughts of Beethoven as we can trace the flower from its seedling, from its first germination in the earth, from its putting out its bud, to its springing into full blossom; and the many, many changes which his thoughts undergo before they reach the form in which we find them, prove that with all his genius, with all his greatness, there was the still greater quality in him of striving ever for improvement. Let us take from that a lesson: let us believe we never can be perfect, but let us aim at improvement, improvement, and improvement. And though we may not produce, either in composition or in performance, a perfection, believe me that true painstaking was never in vain, and the attempt which is accompanied with true heart, with good will, and with a perfect wish for the best, will assuredly make its mark. Yes, it is not too much to say that the works of art which stand before the world for our veneration, for our reverence, for our imitation, it may be, — these are the footprints of the Creator. He has put his stamp on the noblest of all his creations—the mind of man, and left his image on the works that man produces; however far from the attainment of the greatest, every smaller thing that we attempt and that we accomplish, with a continual will to make at any rate our nearest approach to perfection, will assuredly tend to elicit for us the confidence of those we meet, and respect for all we do. The matter of originality brings to consideration the freedom which every true artist must feel when he has mastered all those principles, which are not the fetters, but the guides of his imagination, and the same freedom which is exercised in the working of an artist must be exercised by the teachers of artists. No one can conscientiously teach by a prescribed and fixed system."

MALIBRAN.

[From Grove's Dictionary of Music.]

MALIBRAN, MARIA FELICITA, one of the most distinguished singers the world has ever seen, was born March 24, 1808, at Paris, where her father, Manuel Garcia, had arrived only two months before. When three years old she was taken to Italy, and at the age of five played a child's part in Paër's "Agnese" at the Fiorentini, Naples. So precocious was she that, after a few nights of this opera, she actually began to sing the part of Agnese in the duet of the second Act, a piece of audacity which was applauded by the public. Two years later, she studied solfeggi with Panzeron, at Naples; and Herold, happening to arrive about the same time, gave her her first instruction on the piano. In 1816 Garcia took her to Paris with the rest of his family, and thence to London in the autumn of 1817. Already speaking fluently Spanish, Italian, and French, Maria picked up a tolerable knowledge of English in the two and a half years she spent in London. Not long after, she learned German with the same facility. Here, too, she had good teaching on the piano, and made such rapid progress that, on her return to Paris in 1819, she was able to play J. S. Bach's clavier-works, which were great favorites with her father. In this way she acquired sound taste in music.

At the early age of fifteen she was made by her father to learn singing under his own direction; and, in spite of the fear which his violent temper inspired, she soon showed the individuality and originality of her genius. Two years had barely elapsed when (1824) Garcia allowed her to appear for the first time before a musical club which he had just established. There she produced a great sensation, and her future success was confidently predicted. Two months later Garcia returned to London, where he was engaged as principal tenor; and here he set on foot a singing-class, in which the education of Maria was continued, if not completed. Fétis says that it was in consequence of a sudden indisposition of Mme. Pasta, that the first public appearance of Maria was unexpectedly made; but this account is not the same as that given by Ebers or by Lord Mount-Edgcumbe. The latter relates that, shortly after the repair of the King's Theatre, "the great favorite Pasta arrived for a limited number of nights. About the same time Ronzi fell ill, and totally lost her voice, so that she was obliged to throw up her engagement and return to Italy. Madame Vestris having seceded, and Caradori being unable for some time to perform, it became necessary to engage a young singer, the daughter of the tenor Garcia, who had sung here for several seasons. She was as yet a mere girl, and had never appeared on any public stage; but from the first moment of her appearance she showed evident talents for it both as singer and actress. Her extreme youth, her prettiness, her pleasing voice, and sprightly, easy action, as Rosina in Il Barbiere di Siviglia, in which part she made her début, gained her general favor; but she was too highly extolled, and injudiciously put forward as a prima donna, when she was only a very promising debutante, who in time, by study and practice, would in all probability, under the tuition of her father, a good musician, but (to my ears, at least) a most disagreeable singer, rise to eminence in her profession. But in the following year she went with her whole family (all of whom, old and young, are singers tant bons que mauvais) to establish an Italian opera in America, where, it is said, she is married, so that she will probably never return to this country, if to Europe." Ebers says, "her voice was a contralto, and managed with great taste." Her début took place June 7, 1825. She was immediately afterwards engaged for the remainder of the season (about six weeks) at £500. On July 23, she sang Felicia in the first performance of Meyerbeer's Crociato. At the end of the season, Garcia went, with his daughter, to the provincial festivals, and then embarked for New York. In this new sphere Maria rapidly improved, and acquired confidence, experience, and the habit of the stage. She appeared in Otello, Romeo, Don Giovanni, Tancredi, Cenerentola, and in two operas written for her by her father, L'amante astuto, and La Figlia dell'aria. She had scarcely made her début when the enthusiasm of the public knew no bounds; and, in the midst of her popularity, Garcia gave her in marriage to M. Malibran, an elderly and seemingly wealthy French merchant, in spite of her repugnance to the union. This marriage, celebrated March 25, 1826, was as unhappy as it was ill-assorted; a year had hardly elapsed before the young wife found herself, on Malibran's bankruptcy, free to leave him, and she at once seized the opportunity. In September, 1827, she had returned to France. Preceded by a bright reputation, she began by reaping a harvest of applause in private concerts, followed in January, 1828, by a great and genuine success at Galli's benefit, in Semiramide. Her genius for dramatic singing was at once recognized, though her style was marred by a questionable taste in her choice of ornament. This she had, in Paris, the best opportunity of correcting, both by the advice of kindly critics and the example of accomplished singers. Engaged for the season at the Italian opera, she made her début April 8. The public, at first doubting, soon welcomed her as a really great singer, and were particularly struck with wonder and delight at the novelty and originality of her style. In the season of 1829 Malibran made her reappearance in London, where she shared the applause of the public with Sontag, and the same result followed her singing with that artist at Paris, in the autumn. Engaged again at the Italian opera in the same capital in January, 1830, she was paid frs. 1,075 for each representation. This was less than she had received from Laporte in London. For he had given her frs. 13,333.33 a month, an odd sum, unless it meant frs. 40,000 for three months; and she stipulated only to appear twice a week, making each of those appearances cost frs. 1,666.66, or about £66. Though she certainly continued to draw no higher salary at the Paris Opera in 1830 and 1831, and her charge for singing at private concerts in London, 1829, was 25 guineas, yet Mr. Alfred Bunn engaged her, soon after, for nineteen nights at £125 per night, payable in advance.

to sing each season in London and Paris with ever-increased éclat. In 1830 an attachment sprang up between her and De Bériot; and this ended only with her life. They built in 1831 a handsome villa in a suburb of Brussels, to which they returned after every operatic campaign. In the summer of 1832, a sudden inspiration took this impulsive artist to Italy in the company of Lablache, who happened to pass through Brussels; and an Italian tour was improvised, which was a sort of triumphal progress. Milan, Rome, Naples, and Bologna were visited with equal success.

On her return to Brussels in November, Mme. Malibran gave birth to a daughter, who did not live; she had already a son. In the following spring she came to London, and sang at Drury Lane, in English Opera, receiving frs. 80,000 for 40 representations, with two benefits which produced not less than frs. 50,000. The prices offered to her increased each year to an unprecedented extent. She received at the Opera in London, during May and June 1835, £2,775 for 24 appearances. Sums the like of which had not been heard of before in such cases were paid to her at the provincial festivals in England, and her last engagement at Naples was for frs. 80,000 for 40 nights, with two and a half benefits, while that which she had accepted at Milan from the Duke Visconti, the director of La Scala, was, exclusively of some other profitable conditions, frs. 450,000 for 185 performances, namely 75 in 1835-36, 75 in 1836-37, and 35 in the autumn of 1838.

Having played here in English versions of Sonnambula and Fidelio, Malibran returned to Naples, where she remained until May, 1834, proceeding then to Bologna, and thence to Milan. She soon came back, however, to London for a flying visit; and was singing at Sinigaglia in July. On the 11th of the next month she went to Lucca, where her horses were taken from her carriage, which was drawn to her hotel by enthusiastic admirers after her last appearance. She next went to Milan, where she signed the above-mentioned scrittura, and thence to Naples, where she sang during the Carnival. Here she met with an accident, her carriage being upset at the corner of a street; and she suffered injuries which prevented her from appearing in public for a fortnight. Even then, she made her first appearance with her arm in a sling, which added to the interest of the occasion. From Naples she went, in the same triumphant manner, to Venice, her arrival being announced by fanfares of trumpets. There she was besieged with fresh enthusiasm, which followed her on her return to Paris and London. She returned in August to Lucca, where she played in Ines di Castro, written for her by Persiani, and in Maria Stuarda.

At this juncture her marriage was annulled by the courts at Paris, and on March 26, 1836, she married De Bériot, with whom she returned immediately to Brussels.

In the following April, once more in London, Mme. Malibran de Bériot had a fall from her horse. She was dragged some distance along the road, and received serious injuries to her head, from which she never entirely recovered; but her wonderful energy enabled her for a time to disregard the consequences of this accident. She returned to Brussels, from whence she went to Aix-la-Chapelle, and gave two concerts there with De Bériot. In September she had come to England again, for the Manchester Festival,—at which her short, brilliant life came to an end. She had arrived, with her husband, after a rapid journey from Paris, on Sunday, September 11, 1836. On the following evening she sang in no less than fourteen pieces. On the Tuesday, though weak and ill, she insisted on singing both morning and evening. On Wednesday, the 14th, her state was still more critical, but she contrived to sing the last sacred music in which she ever took part, "Sing ye to the Lord," with thrilling effect; but that same evening her last notes in public were heard, in the Duet, with Mme. Caradori Allan, "Vanne se alberghi in petto," from Andronico. This was received with immense enthusiasm, the last movement was encorced, and Malibran actually accomplished the task of repeating it. It was her last effort. While the concert-room still rang with applause, she was fainting in the arms of her friends; and a few moments later she was conveyed to her hotel. Here she died, after nine days of nervous fever, in the prostration which naturally followed upon the serious injuries her brain had received from the accident which had befallen her in the midst of a life of perpetual excitement. She died on Friday, Sept. 23, 1836, about twenty minutes before midnight, under the care of her own doctor, a homœopath, Belluomini, who had declined to act with the two regular physicians who had at first attended her. Two hours after her death, De Bériot was, with Belluomini, in a carriage on his way to Brussels, to secure the property of his late wife. She was buried on October 1, in the south aisle of the collegiate church, Manchester. She was but twenty-eight years of age when she died. Her remains were soon afterwards removed to Brussels, where they were reinterred in the cemetery of Lacken, where a mausoleum was erected by De Bériot, containing a bust of the great singer by the celebrated sculptor Geefs.

It is difficult to appreciate the charm of a singer whom one has never heard. In the case of Maria Malibran it is exceptionally difficult, for the charm seems to have consisted chiefly in the peculiarity of timbre and unusual extent of her voice, in her excitable temperament which prompted her to improvise passages of strange audacity upon the stage, and on her strong musical feeling which kept those improvisations nearly, but not quite, always within the bounds of good taste. That her voice was not faultless, either in quality or uniformity, seems certain. It was a contralto, having much of the soprano register superadded, and with an interval of dead notes intervening, to conceal which she used great ingenuity, with almost perfect success. It was, after all, her mind that helped to enslave her audience; without that mental originality, her defective vocal organ would have failed to please where, in fact, it provoked raptures. She was a phenomenal singer; and it is one misfortune of the present generation that she died too young for them to hear her.

Many portraits of Malibran have appeared, none very good. A large one, after Hayter, representing her with a harp, as "Desdemona," is usually accounted the best; but it is only indifferent. Another, by R. J. Lane, A. R. A., showing her made up as "Fidalma," and then, afterwards, in a stage-box, in her usual dress, is much better.

Several biographies have appeared of this extraordinary person, with anecdotes of whom it would be easy to fill a volume; that which was written by the Comtesse Merlin is little better than a romance. Malibran composed and published many nocturnes, songs, and chansonnettes; some of the unpublished pieces were collected and published by Troupenas at Paris under the name of "Dernières Pensées musicale de Marie-Félicité Garcia de Bériot," in 4to. J. M.

MISS JULIET FENDERSON, whose singing was so well received at the Philharmonic symphony concert, is pursuing her studies with Eugene Thayer. She is receiving numerous engagements, and later in the season will appear in oratorio.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XVI.

"How shall I finish this picture!"

Call it finished.

"But no one would buy it as it is."

Would they buy it any quicker if it were finished?

"Perhaps not. But if anybody talks of buying one of my things the remark is always made, 'I suppose that you intend to finish it more!'"

Just say that the picture is in the market for finish, and that you will finish it to that extent for which the purchaser will pay. If you notice, you will find that the people who want you to "finish" your pictures are not the people who will buy them.

If you are determined to paint, you won't mind what kind of things you use to paint with. I remember when I sketched that ploughing-scene I had only a butter-box for a palette, a brush or two and a palette-knife. For rubbing in a velvet coat sometimes nothing works better than the palm of your hand.

If you have a large surface to paint over, get sash-tools from the paint-shop, and do it at once. I believe that the old painters used these brushes, certainly for skies, backgrounds, and draperies. At any rate they painted broadly and frankly, and they could not have done it with such brushes as we buy nowadays, — long, flimsy, weak things, or else stiff and unyielding. If you want to know what brushes to use, watch the painters at work on windows and doors.

Be frank and fearless about your work! Get rid of the timidity that makes you fear to hurt your drawing.

"Yes; but" —

Don't say but! Swallow the word but! Why, how are you going to sketch out of doors if you are going to be so afraid? You'll fear that some one will go by and see you! What if you had something to do right here in Boston? I would sit down opposite the Tremont House if I wished to, — unless the horse-cars were coming.

If you were copying in the Louvre, you'd plant your easel before a Raphael and go to work. What if people do stare? If you're busy you won't know it; and then it has always been done and always will be. Go on as if you were in the desert of Sahara, and only a camel looking at you!

You'll have to make a sacrifice of everything before you can draw. Especially, you're not to mind everything that everybody says. Keep all that you feel for your work.

It is not by trying that you get on. It's by not being afraid! People who question what you are doing will never pay your board. You will have to look at things differently from the way in which you have been in the habit of looking at them. Don't be troubled because I correct you! Correct? What is it to be corrected? Is not it to be helped? If I get you where you are afraid to say "but" you'll go on well. You have too much conscience. It is the New England habit, and it is always in the way of your drawing fearlessly. Come, put your drawing right up there near the model! Nobody will laugh at it. You are all in the same boat. Consider this your own studio, and do as you please in it!

You can't do good work unless you are physically in order for it. It requires as much strength to paint well as to plough.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

BOSTON PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA. — The nucleus of the Harvard Symphony Orchestra, enrolled as a separate organization under the direction of Mr. Bernhard Listemann, made its first appearance in the Music Hall on Friday evening, Oct. 24. For so small a band (only 32 instruments — 4 first violins, 2 cellos and 2 basses), — convenient for popular concerts here, and for mobilization among neighboring towns, — and considering that the programme was rather overweighted with brilliant, noisy, heavy specimens of the modern school of instrumentation (needing, more than the sincere and modest older music, a large orchestra), the new Philharmonics, and their very competent and thorough leader, rendered excellent report of themselves. The fruits of unsparing critical rehearsal were obvious enough in the precision, the clearness, the good light and shade, and telling quality of each and every effort. A larger proportion of strings was of course desirable, particularly in the modern pieces, where Kurus, Boreas, and all the wind gods, are so systematically set loose to scour the plain and swallow up the gentler sounds. Mr. Listemann, considering his nervous temperament, agreeably surprised us by the self-possession and the firm, quiet, but controlling and efficient manner with which he conducted the whole concert. The violins, with Mr. Allen at their head, were prompt and sure in their attack, and phrased with perfect unity, playing with spirit and with delicacy throughout. There were two or three younger new men among the violins, and a new and excellent clarinetist, — for the rest it was the nucleus of our usual orchestra, here kept in constant practice and coöperation for the larger uses when they come. The programme was as follows: —

Overture, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner.
Chaconne. Adapted for Orchestra by J. Raff (New)	Hack.
"Ma la Sola," from "Beatrice di Tenda."	Donizetti.
Miss Juliet E. Fenderson.
Concerto for Violin, "Andante and Finale."	Mendelssohn.
Timothée d'Adamowski.
(His first appearance in America.)
"Tasso," Lamento e Trionfo, Symphonie	Liszt.
Poem	J. Svendsen.
"Carnival of Paris," Episode (New)
"Casta Diva," with Recitative, from "Norma"	Bellini.
Miss Juliet E. Fenderson.
Violin Solos,
(a.) "Nocturne"	Chopin.
(b.) "Hungarian Dance"	Brahms.
Timothée d'Adamowski.
Waltz, "Geschichten aus dem Wiener Wald"	J. Strauss.
Torchlight Dance, No. 1, in B-flat.	Meyerbeer.

The Tannhäuser Overture has become rather hackneyed, but the first taste of the trim and lively quality of the brave little orchestra was quickening to the sense; and indeed it was refreshing to hear an orchestra after so many months. Of the newer works Liszt's Tasso was the most poetic and imposing, in itself and in the presentation; yet we think one such thing enough for any programme. Svendsen's "Carnival" was a wild, outrageous, screaming Witches' Sabbath; an ingenious, audacious, brilliant, and exceedingly difficult specimen of that sort of caricature of art which we could wish, with Dr. Johnson, were impossible. The Strauss Waltz (Stories from the Vienna forest) was in refreshing contrast, and, but for the introduction of the insipid, sentimental cithern, welcome to all ears. The Meyerbeer "Torchlight Dance," with its grotesque, bloated melody on the bass tuba, showed how big a crash can be produced by a few instruments. All these things were certainly played well.

But now for gentler and sincerer strains; now for the serene sky and the divine repose of older, truer Art, and more convincing, even with a "still, small voice." First and greatest was the Chaconne, — Bach's grandest of all solos for the violin, whose power and charm reside so intrinsically in its musical ideas, and their most genial, masterly development, that the outlines can bear magnifying and coloring through a full orchestral transcription, such as Raff has here successfully made. The power and beauty of the work were admirably brought out, the color contrasts heightened, and the crescendos and great climaxes intensified, but not exaggerated, in the writing and the rendering. Every phrase and motive, and all the polyphonic interweaving, was distinct and fine. The only thing which we could question was the somewhat too fast tempo of the middle portion, where the development becomes exciting, and the individual instruments have so much melodic work to do each in its own way. It gave an impression of uneasy, anxious effort to keep in. For the solo violinist such quickening of the pulse at times is natural and not offensive; but the orchestral body needs a steadier movement. The piece was closely listened to and heartily enjoyed.

Next, the two movements from the Mendelssohn Concerto, in which the principal violin was nicely and judiciously accompanied. Mr. Adamowski, the young Pole of whom we have before spoken, won the general sympathy by his very presence, and his sincere, modest, graceful manner and bearing. His playing at once approved itself by its pure intonation, its fine, clear phrasing, as well as breadth of style, intelligent conception, depth of feeling, and well-nigh faultless execution. There was nothing meretricious about it; no false ornament nor affectation; it was all simple, genuine, and manly. His tone is not of the largest, but yet powerful and searching. He is too young to have developed into a great violinist, but the promise is excellent; and indeed his whole appearance and performance was most interesting. The audience could not refrain from open applause in the midst of each movement. Being recalled he played a graceful Serenade by Haydn, with good pianoforte accompaniment by Mr. C. L. Capen. The Chopin Nocturne was exquisitely played, and the Hungarian Dance was given with great fire and freedom.

Miss Fenderson has a rich and large soprano voice, which seems to be well trained, although there is a slight tendency to the tremolo. Her singing is good, though not particularly sympathetic. We should prefer to hear her in more interesting selections. The recitative preceding "Casta Diva" was the most impressive thing she did.

HERR RAFAEL JOSEFFY, the young Hungarian "piano virtuoso" (virtuoso in the best sense), after setting New York wild with musical enthusiasm, came last week to us, — came and played and conquered. With this difference: here no discordant sounds were mingled in the general chorus of delight; there some jealous croaks were heard, promptly rebuked of course. The three concerts were given on Thursday and Friday evenings, and Saturday afternoon, in Horticultural Hall, a room of the right size for the best effect of the piano-forte. On the first evening Joseffy was accompanied in two pieces by a very small but select orchestra, under the able direction of Mr. B. J. Lang. This was the programme: —

Overture, "Prometheus" Beethoven.
Concerto (E minor) Chopin.
Herr Joseffy and Orchestra.

Allegro from the "Italian Symphony" Mendelssohn.
Piano Solo:
a. Chromatische Fantasie und Fuge J. S. Bach.
b. Menuett, Transcribed by R. Joseffy Boccherini.
c. Etude on Chopin's Valse (D-flat) R. Joseffy.
Herr Joseffy.
Hungarian Fantasia Liszt.
Herr Joseffy and Orchestra.

The two purely orchestral selections were nicely suited to the occasion, and were played with spirit and refinement, as was also the long and pregnant introduction to the Chopin Concerto. A very few bars sufficed to convince the audience of the marvelous touch of the pianist, as well as of a perfect technique, felt in the simplest passages and phrases quite as palpably as afterwards in the most elaborate and difficult ornamental development and bravura. Indeed, we dare not say that we have ever heard in any artist (Rubinstein, Von Bülow, Essipoff, included) a more near approach to absolute perfection in every element of technique and of execution. The evenness and ease of all the runs and arpeggios; the commanding, penetrating power, always expressively graduated and shaded; the positive intensity (so different from "pounding") with which significant single tones were struck and made to vibrate through, and through the listener; the singularly soft and velvety pianissimos, never blurred nor muffled, and with the finest discrimination of all degrees and shades between pianissimo and piano; on the other hand, decided strength and power, wherever required, whether sustained and broad, or startling and electric; the staccato and legato alike perfect; and the faultless style, proportion, unity throughout, — all the qualities, in short, of the peerless executant were felt in this, as in every one of his performances.

And the interpreter satisfied no less than the executant. He plays with soul and feeling, with a fine intelligence, making execution, technique, subordinate to the expression of the composer's meaning, the perfected means to an ideal and artistic end. When have we had all the power and beauty of that Concerto so brought out? Alike in the broad and noble Allegro, the soulful, exquisite Romanza, and the brilliant Rondo, flashing like diamonds in the sunlight? The only detail which we could have wished otherwise, was the startling force and splendor given to the concluding cadence by the Taussig double octaves in place of the simpler original; such coups de force are always questionable, at least unnecessary.

But, to our mind, his most remarkable performance was that of the Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue of Bach; especially the Fantasie, which we never before have heard when it was kept so all alive, from beginning to end, through all its free fantastic coruscations of arpeggios and runs, its dainty parenthetical bits of flowering arabesque, and its great breadths of rich and massive chords. The Fugue, so prepared, followed in the most clear and delicate, poetic style. The naive, pretty Boccherini melody was marvelously transfigured, decked out and bejeweled in Joseffy's most subtle and ingenious transcription, where the artist reveled in the full, free play of inexhaustible embellishment. And the sensuous delight and wonder which this excited was enhanced with an almost dizzy crescendo in his Etude on the Chopin Waltz; that was virtuosity carried to a white heat. We are about tired of Hungarian Fantasies and Rhapsodies, and we do not think Liszt's orchestra improves them; but there can be no doubt that this was a most brilliant, characteristic, vivid illustration of those well-worn national melodies, songs, and dances, with all the local color that could be desired.

That concert was a fresh sensation and surprise, even to old concert-goers. The result of it was the general feeling that here is a man who unites all the qualities of a complete pianist, with no weakness, no flaw anywhere. He can do whatever he pleases with his instrument (in this case a wonderfully sweet, sonorous Chickering), and his true musical instinct, his cultured taste, prompt him to do good things, and not waste such faculties on trash.

The second concert was without orchestra, and consisted wholly of piano solos, namely these: —

- (1) Sonate. — Op. 53, C major Beethoven.
- (2) a. Fuga A minor J. S. Bach.
b. Bourrée Padre Martini.
c. Gavotte
d. Vogel als Prophet (Bird as a Prophet), Novellette No. 2, D major Schumann.
e. Moment Musical, A-flat major Schubert.
f. Auf dem Wasser zu singen (To sing on the water) Schubert — Liszt.
- (3) a. Etudes, Op. 10 (C-sharp minor, E major G-flat major) Chopin.
b. Nocturne
c. Valse, E minor
d. Tanszarabeske, No. 2 Joseffy.
e. Spinnerlied (Flying Dutchman) Wagner — Liszt.
(4) Tarantella Venezia e Napoli Liszt.

Only the greatest artists have given us so fine a rendering of that Beethoven sonata, which has been the stalking-horse for so many concert virtuosos. On this first hearing there was something a little strange to us in his conception and his treatment of it which we could not define to our own mind. Throughout we doubted whether Joseffy had the breadth, the depth, and the intensity of nature which fits one to be peculiarly an exponent of Beethoven's music. His rendering did not lack force or manliness, and yet it was the feminine side of the giant which seemed mostly to come out. All the finesse of the composition — and there is a great deal of it, particularly in the Rondo with its breathless, fiery speed, and almost fairy fancy — he exhibited in a clearer light and finer outline than we ever heard before. In those most trying passages for the fingers, where groups of twofold rhythm in the one hand struggle against those that are threefold in the other, each was heard with a distinctness without any scrambling, the like of which we cannot recall. And where the theme is kept up in the upper octave, supported by a continuous trill in the same hand, while the left hand rushes up and down in rapid scales (staccato, too), all the three parts asserted themselves at once most bravely and with equal vividness. The Prestissimo, too, of the Finale, was surpassingly quick and perfect. Some, no doubt, wondered at so much pianissimo in so bold and fiery a Sonata; and so did we somewhat, until, having become at home more with his manner, when he repeated it in the matinée of the next day, we could accept his rendering and yield ourselves up to it with much less reserve. Some day we hope to hear him play some more, a good deal more, of Beethoven.

The Fugue and Bourrée of Bach, with florid themes, and woven into a most delicate and subtle tissue, were most exquisitely given; could we only always hear Bach's things played as these were, and that Chromatic Fantasie, any audience would fall in love with them! The quaint Gavotte by Martini was delightful both in matter and in manner. Schumann's little Bird reverie could not have been more exquisitely and feelingly expressed; and the Novellette, a work of more pretension, was an eloquent interpretation. But what could be more delicious than Joseffy's rendering of the two Schubert pieces, particularly the Barcarole, which is one of Liszt's happiest transcriptions?

We have not room to dwell on the admirable and characteristic rendering of the Chopin pieces. The remainder of the programme might all come under the rubric of the "arabesque," as well as the artist's own florid and extremely ornamental setting of some familiar Viennese dance tunes of the "Blue Danube" order. Surely, light fingers never flew more deftly through all the labyrinthine intricacies of such fairy frost-work. The Spinnerlied and Tarantella were, perhaps, too much of the same order to come all together. But that is a vein in which Joseffy seems to be supreme, and he can play upon the senses of an audience with it as long as his fancy listeth and the impulse lasts. We might call it musical lace work; we examine a few specimens of fine lace and feel that we have seen all there is or can be of it; with all its endless variation, it is essentially the same thing to the end of the chapter. But the ladies find it otherwise! And so they did with these tone-arabesques.

This second programme was essentially repeated in the matinee of Saturday, on which we suspend comment for the present, to allow a chance for afterthoughts and the supplying of any omissions in this hasty record of impressions.

IS ROBERT FRANZ A FAILURE?

II.

It has been said of Franz's "additional accompaniments" to Bach and Handel arias that they overload the original compositions with counterpoint, or, as I have heard it expressed, "you cannot see the simply beautiful melody for the contrapuntal dust which surrounds it." This is indeed a grave charge, and requires to be gravely met. I will attempt to answer it, together with the very self-evident proposition that "what Franz has added is not Bach." The gaps in Bach's scores absolutely need filling up in some way; this is admitted on all hands, and may be considered a settled fact. Leaving aside, for the moment, the question whether this filling up is to be done on the organ or by orchestral instruments (a matter of quite secondary importance), it may be said that only two ways of writing the "additional accompaniments" have been suggested. The first, or Franz, method is to write these "accompaniments" in a pure polyphonic style, working out contrapuntal figures that are to be found in the original parts, so as to make the Bach score and the added parts blend into an organic whole. The second, or anti-Franz, method is to fill out the gaps with the simplest plain harmony, thus throwing the original parts into the strongest possible relief. This second plan has one (to me questionable) advantage: it leaves the listener in no doubt as to what notes Bach actually wrote, and what has been added by modern hands. Bach's freely flowing parts, full of musical vitality as they are, stand out against the neutral harmonic background with unmistakable distinctness. But I fail to see what is gained by this, beyond satisfying a mere historico-archæological curiosity in the listener. It does not give him any more of Bach than the other method does (for the original parts are preserved intact in both), and gives it him accompanied in a way that we know both by tradition and by internal evidence to be diametrically opposed to Bach's style; for all accounts unite in telling us that Bach himself was in the habit of treating all figured basses polyphonically, and often in a very elaborate contrapuntal style. It is evident to the meanest capacity that no man can count upon the wholly inconsiderable chance of filling out the composer's figured, or unfigured basses, exactly as Bach himself would; such a thing is not to be thought of, and no one ever claimed that Franz has done it. But he has made such an exhaustive study of Bach's manner, his native genius has been so fructified by long appropinquity with Bach's works, that it may be fairly claimed for him that his additions are as near an approximation to Bach's style as we can look for to-day. This is so true that persons more anxious to obtain unquestioned authenticity than musical beauty have even reproached him with writing "additional accompaniments" that blend so nicely with the original parts, that the listener cannot tell which is Franz and which is Bach. That is indeed a reproach with a vengeance. Tell me till doomsday that a Franz-Bach score is not Bach, pure and simple, and I readily admit it; but I answer that by far the greater number of Bach scores, filled out in mere plain harmony, are not Bach either, and, what is worse, they are not even in Bach's style—nay (speaking from my own personal musical convictions), they are not in any respectable style at all. As for "Bach pure and simple," it is an article that in very many cases is not to be had for the asking, and we must content ourselves with a substitute. Let those individuals who are bent upon putting salt upon the tail of every note that came from Bach's pen, and pocketing it without fear of its pedigree being counterfeited, follow performances score in hand, and pick out what they find to be genuine.

But is this, after all, the right spirit to listen to great music in? Is music a thing to be enjoyed only after its authentic date and parentage has been settled—just like a collection of old coins? I think far otherwise.

As for "contrapuntal dust obscuring a beautiful melody," take any of the most elaborate of Franz's arrangements, say for instance, the tenor air "Der Glaube ist das Pfand der Liebe" in the Cantata "Wer da glaubet und getauft wird." Listening to it with even the dullest ears I cannot find that the melody is obscured in a single instance. Take the original parts, adding an accompaniment of mere chords, and you have the beautiful melody in absolute rags against a background that only serves to make its scant dress the more visible. I ask any musician to say frankly whether he can conceive of a great composer's really intending such another discrepancy in character between a melody and bass on the one hand, and the accompanying voices on the other. Is it possible that Bach, who has never written out anything in this mongrel style, can have wished it to be applied to a large number of his most glorious inspirations? Speaking in terms of four-part writing, and imagining Bach's original parts to be sentient beings (that is truly no great stretch of fancy), what must be the state of mind of a treble or bass part at finding a dull modern tenor or alto refuse to follow its most beautiful suggestions, and torpidly hang around its neck, as it were, doing just enough to prevent actual cacophony! A leading voice wishes to be followed, and followed willingly and intelligently; Bach's parts sketch out designs for the others to execute; they do not ask merely for support, they cry aloud for active coöperation; they do not say to the accompaniment (in the old technical sense of the term), "Take us upon your shoulder, that we may the better disport ourselves in the eyes of men," but rather, "Come, take your own active part in the work we are seeking to accomplish; we cannot do it alone, but must have genial and skillful help from you; as you share in the work, so shall you share in the reward."

In a word, — and this no unprejudiced person has yet denied, — Franz has developed the incomplete scores of Bach into something that can stand forth as a coherent and finely organized whole; every fibre in them is alive, and all parts work together by the same means to a common end. But the "greatest possible neutrality" school, with their plain harmonic filling out, have in no wise done this; their "accompaniments" do not blend with the original parts, they do not form an organic whole, but merely give us two incongruous parallel entities, which agree with each other only well enough to prevent actual mutual excommunication — and not always that.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHICAGO, OCT. 29. — Our musical season may be said to be fairly open, for we are now having two weeks of Italian Opera from the Strakosch Company. I have attended a number of performances, and heard all the new artists several times. The opening night gave us Faust with the following cast: —

Mlle. La Blanche . . .	as . . .	Marguerite.
Miss Lancaster . . .	as . . .	Siebel.
Miss Arcone . . .	as . . .	Marta.
Signor Lazarini . . .	as . . .	Faust.
Signor Storti . . .	as . . .	Valentine.
Monsieur Castelmarty . . .	as . . .	Mephistopheles.

Mlle. La Blanche (Miss Davenport) is a graceful young lady, with a good idea of acting; and her stage presence is always suggestive of the character that she may be representing, thus showing that she has given faithful study to the ideal of her rôles. Her voice is not large, but of the light soprano character; sweet and sympathetic in the high notes, although her lower tones are rather weak and uneven. She acted the part of Marguerite much better than she sang it. Yet portions of her music were given very effectively, and considering her limited experience she may take courage for the future from her effort. To color the various notes of the voice so that they may adequately manifest the emotions of the character is the aim of true art. Our fair débutante gave more expression to her acting than to her singing. There was sympathy in the voice, it is true, but the joyous ring of the happy maiden was not there, nor did her sorrow in the later scenes of the opera receive adequate vocal representation. In the jewel song particularly, one felt her inability to give it with that joyous and sparkling tone which so well expresses the merry-hearted maiden. The trill which opens the song was very poorly executed. Signor Storti, who took the small rôle of Valentine, is a baritone with an expressive voice of much power; and he sings well, while his acting was the best I have seen of the part. M. Castelmarty made the rôle of Mephisto the central figure in the opera. His acting stamps him as a fine artist, while his telling voice is used with a skill that indicates purpose and conception. He is one of the best artists in the company. Signor Lazarini made a very weak Faust. Miss Lancaster made but little of Siebel's music. The chorus is one of the worst I ever had the misfortune to hear. I can imagine nothing more frightful than their appearance and — I must not say singing, for their discordant voices have no approach to anything musical. They come upon the stage and interrupt the music of the opera as a terrible nightmare destroys the lovely picture of sweet fancy's fairest dream, even by the spectre of its own hideousness.

Tuesday evening gave us the time-worn Il Trovatore, which was only made notable by the first appearance of the dramatic prima donna, Mlle. Singer.

I regret that I cannot follow the critics of our daily press, and become enthusiastic over the vocal and dramatic abilities of Mlle. Singer. She has a very large voice, extremely powerful in its carrying quality, and she may rightly claim the name of a dramatic prima donna. Yet she has a very uncomfortable tremolo, which she uses all the time, even in the mezzo voce. In the chest notes her voice can exhibit great power, but the character of the sound is not strictly musical. In the ensemble singing she can be heard above chorus and orchestra with a volume of tone that is astonishing to an audience, and completely awakens their enthusiasm. Her appearance on the stage is stately, and her acting dramatic, while she may be said to belong to the emotional school. The constant use of the tremolo causes her intonation to be at times uncertain, and she falls from the key occasionally. As Leonora she had plenty of opportunity to show the emotional characteristic of her voice, and she improved it so successfully as to win applause. In the trio at the end of the first act her voice manifested its full power, and the people seemed to be delighted. To me it was a passion made so intense as to be beyond the limit of control, and if the term raving may be applied to singing, it would perhaps stand in place. Yet I would not say that she had but poor abilities, for her Aida, which I saw later, stamped her as an artist of more than ordinary accomplishments. In the approach to the circle of the great artists of the world she as yet stands at the doorway, hindered, perhaps, by some of the faults I have named.

Mlle. de Belocca is a pretty little lady, with a rich mezzo-soprano voice, which she uses with smoothness and grace. Her acting was not dramatic enough for the rôle of Azucena, nor her voice large enough to suit the full requirements of the part. Yet her tones were sweet and agreeable, particularly in the middle part of the voice. It is not a contralto voice, nor fitted for such a rôle as that of the gipsy. Sig. Petrovich proved himself to be a tenor with a good healthy voice of the robusto order. He took the high C in the "di quella pira" with a ringing tone that was pure and telling, and won thereby the admiration of the audience. In acting he is only mediocre, and his singing cannot be regarded as strictly artistic, although it has many excellent qualities. Sig. Storti, as the Count, did some very fine singing. His style is good, and his voice smooth and rich. He won his way into favor at once, and his acting and singing show him to be one of the most talented members of the company.

Wednesday evening I listened to Mignon, Mlle. La Blanche taking the title rôle. Miss Litta was Filina, M. Castelmari, Lotario, and Sig. Lazari, Guglielmo. The part of Mignon contains music which is too low to suit Mlle. La Blanche's voice; and, although she acted well, and looked the character, the music was too trying for a voice of that kind. She was in sympathy with her rôle, however, and did her best to produce a picture of the impulsive child-woman that Goethe painted in such warm colors. Miss Litta sang the music of the Filina part with fine execution, but she has not the abandon necessary to give the character that dash and grace that should mark its representation. M. Castelmari's make-up in the part of Lotario was artistic in the extreme, and his acting and singing was the best we have ever had in this rôle. He gave a manly dignity to the character, and his scenes with Mignon were very expressive, and highly enjoyable. He had that sympathy that draws others into its circle, and he won the audience by the power of his art.

Thursday gave us Alka. To say that Mlle. Singer acted the rôle of Alka finely is only a just record. Her conception was intelligent and marked with a dignity of bearing fitting the character. The rôle of Alka is one particularly adapted to her voice, and as it gives full scope for the use of her emotional and dramatic powers it is not surprising that she makes it one of her very best parts. In the concerted music in the first act her voice was heard above the orchestra, chorus, and other parts, with a power of tone thrilling in its immense volume. In the scene in which she pictures her love for Radames, and at the same time her fear for her father's safety in his encounter with the Egyptian hosts, the various emotions of a perplexed mind, and a troubled heart, were given such truthful manifestations as to stamp them with the appearance of reality. In the duet with Amneris, where she discloses her love for Radames, she was also very expressive. She used the mezzo voce with pleasing contrast to her larger tones. In the last scene she also sang and acted very effectively. The great fault in her singing is the constant use of the tremolo. It mars her best efforts, and gives a coloring to the voice not always agreeable to listen to. Passion of an intense character, and great volume of voice she has, and her conception of character is worthy of an artist; but her method of singing will not win her the highest appreciation. Mlle. de Belocca sang Amneris agreeably, but her voice was not dramatic nor large enough to give to the character its best representation. Still she sings well. After Miss Cary where shall we find an Amneris? Sig. Petrovich sang the part of Radames with much power, and although he is not great, was not a weak point in the cast. Sig. Storti and M. Castelmari gave their rôles with the finish of accomplished artists. Commendation can go no further.

Friday evening Miss Litta sang Lucia. She was greeted with a large and enthusiastic house. She executed her music with much brilliancy, and in the mad scene won great applause for her fine singing. In action she has improved very much since last year. Saturday we had Trovata, with Mlle. La Blanche. I missed the performance, but learn that the young lady made her best effort of the week. A number of concerts demand attention, also some mention of Mlle. Singer as Norma, but my letter has already run beyond the proper limit, and these must wait until another time.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., OCT. 31. — Since I wrote you last, there have been two concerts worthy of record. The first on Oct. 14, was given by Wilhelmj, in connection with Bach's orchestra. The programme was as follows: —

Overture, Euryanthe C. M. von Weber.
Vorspiel, Lohengrin Wagner.
Concerto for Violin (with a Cadence by Wilhelmj), with Orchestra Acc. Beethoven.

Mr. Wilhelmj.
Scene and Aria, Freischütz, Weber.
Mme. Jenny Valley.

Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 14 Liszt.
Overture, Mignon Thomas.
{ a. Andante and Intermezzo, Solo for Violin with Orchestra Vogrich.
b. Largo, Solo for Violin with Organ Acc. Hummel.

Mr. Wilhelmj.
Bridal Song, From the Symphony "Laendliche Hochzeit" Goldmark.
Air, Hungarian Ernst.

Mr. Wilhelmj.
Turkish Patrol Michaelis.

I have nothing to add to the numerous commendations of the great violinist. Unfortunately, he omitted the Handel Largo. The orchestra accompanied badly, but in the other numbers surpassed itself. Mme. Valley's method is poor, and her style very unsatisfactory.

The Musical Society gave The Creation last night, Mr. Eugene Luening being conductor. The soloists were Mr.

Franz Remmert, who sang admirably, but sometimes over-sentimentalized his part; Mr. Chas. Knorr, who has excellent points and is on the whole acceptable in spite of a bad or rather imperfect school; Miss Jennie Jerzykiewicz, a young singer fresh from seven years of study in Germany, with a light, pure, clear, well-trained voice and good style; and Miss Susie Macaulay, also a young soprano with considerable French and Italian training, with a light voice, somewhat nasal in quality, especially below and on certain vowels, but on the whole a very desirable singer. The chorus deserves high praise, and Mr. Luening is to be congratulated on the very marked success of his work.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE score of the overture to "Rip van Winkle," by Mr. George W. Chadwick (of Lawrence, Mass.), a student at the Conservatorium in Leipzig, which won the palm there among all the compositions offered at the annual examination, or Haupt-Prüfung, in June last, is now in the hands of the Concert Committee of the Harvard Musical Association, and probably will be performed in the first Symphony Concert (Dec. 11). The programme of that concert also includes the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the Overture to Romance, by Schubert, the "Marche de Nuit" from Berlioz's L'Enfance du Christ (first time), and a Concerto not yet decided on.

— The plans of the Euterpe are now completed. The programmes for the five concerts in Mechanic's Hall are as follows: —

Dec. 10. — Quartet, E-flat, Haydn; Quintet, Op. 29, Beethoven.

Jan. 14. — Quartet, C major, Mozart; Quartet, Op. 192, No. 2, Raff.

Feb. 11. — Quartet, Op. 74, Beethoven; Quartet, Op. 41, No. 3, Schumann.

March 10. — Quartet, Op. 132, Beethoven; Quartet, Op. 44, No. 1, Mendelssohn.

April 14. — Quartet, E-flat, Cherubini; Quintet, G minor, Mozart.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club will open the season. The New York Philharmonic Club will play in the last two concerts.

— Ernst Perabo has returned, after a second residence in Leipzig, not in such good health as his many friends had hoped to see him. He receives his pupils at No. 10 Derie St. The Gazette says: "While abroad, Mr. Perabo was not idle, as is evidenced by the music published by him in Leipzig. Among these are 'Drei Studien,' for piano, brilliant and interesting works of a high order of merit, thoughtful and musicianly in treatment, and of value to students from both an artistic and technical point of view. The second study is dedicated to Professor Wentzel, of the Leipzig Conservatory, and the third to Professor Ernst Friedrich Richter. Among the other works are a series of short pieces under the title of 'After School,' the first five of which have appeared here, but the sixth, consisting of five more, under the title 'A Picnic,' are now printed for the first time. They are all charming and dainty in idea, and gracefully treated. These and the others of Mr. Perabo's foreign publications can be had of Mr. Arthur P. Schmidt."

— Our noble Boston Music Hall is not yet out of danger. We stated several weeks ago that the only hope of safety lay in the purchase by its friends of the controlling interest in its stock, now held by one man and for the benefit of that man's creditors. Two parties have been competing for the possession of those 560 shares, but with opposite motives. The first party seek to buy on speculation, and would play into the hands of the would-be destroyers. But the present owner declined to close with them, provided the friends of the Hall would subscribe for all his shares at a fixed price, greatly above par, within a reasonable time. Such friends were not wanting, and, to our certain knowledge, on Saturday, Oct. 25, the subscription for the 560 shares was fully made up by gentlemen who wish to save the building for a Music Hall. Yet when the amount was formally offered, it appeared that some new sinister influence had been at work, so strong as to induce the present holder to recede from his proposal, though he may yet relent. And there it now hangs trembling in the balance. The friends who so readily agreed to take the stock knew that they were paying much too high a price for it; but they only wished to save the Hall; they acted from a generous sentiment, for the good of music, and for the honor of old Boston, and not from a hope of dividends, or from a willingness to speculate upon the chances of its destruction. Should the property become theirs, the interests and uses of the Hall could be in no better hands.

— The season tickets for the Handel and Haydn Society's Concerts are in good demand. — Subscription papers for the eight Harvard Symphony Concerts may be found at the Music Hall, at Chickering's, and at Ditson's, Prüfer's, and Schmidt's music stores, until Dec. 1. The orchestra will have for its nucleus the Philharmonic Orchestra of Mr. Listemann, and it will be as much larger, and the rehearsals as frequent and as thorough, as the number of subscribers will permit. The same with regard to solo talent, vocal and instrumental. The sooner the subscription lists are filled, the stronger will the committee be for carrying out their scheme of first-class concerts.

— There is to be a series of five classical concerts in Sanders Theatre, (Cambridge), this season, under the direction of Professor J. K. Paine. The entire number will be given by the Boston Philharmonic Club, with Mr. Listemann conductor, and a symphony will be produced at each concert. Among the pieces performed will be Beethoven's Symphonies in C minor and in F, Weber's overture to "Oberon," and "Invitation à la Danse;" Mozart in E minor, Goetz's new symphony, a work by Saint Saëns, and compositions by Bach, Schumann, and Wagner. Papers are open for subscription.

— The Boylston Club will give a concert in Music Hall, November 14, when Astorga's Stabat Mater will be produced and Mr. Adamowski will play.

— Mr. John A. Preston will give a series of four piano recitals at Winchester, beginning November 24, assisted by Mr. C. N. Allen, Mr. Wulf Fries, and others.

— Gran's opera bouffe troupe will begin a season of two weeks at the Boston Theatre, next Monday evening, with La Fille de Mme. Angot. Other operas of the week will be La Grande Duchesse, Giroflé Girofla, and La Perichole. The company includes singers of great repute, among them being Mlle. Paola Marie, Mlle. Angele, and M. Victor Capoul.

— Vocal clubs will be glad to know that a new and superior reprint of the beautiful Psalm of Goetz: "By the waters of Babylon," will presently be published, by Carl Prüfer, in West Street.

NEW YORK. — First let us offer heartily the right hand of fellowship to the new Musical Review, of which Messrs. A. MacMartin, Gustav Kobbé, and J. C. Rodrigues are the editors and proprietors. We congratulate New York on now having a respectable and high-toned journal devoted to the art of music, and not trading on the interests of mere music trade, relying for support and sympathy more on quality than overwhelming quantity of matter. The founders of the new Review clearly have a high and worthy aim. They seek to promote the art of music as such, and to educate and raise the public taste. Their writing so far shows knowledge and ability, and a gentlemanly style and spirit. The paper is very handsomely printed, in convenient form, each weekly number consisting of twenty pages, and it has decidedly a look of refinement. We understand that there is capital in the enterprise, ensuring independence, and enabling the proprietors to employ good contributors. Three numbers have appeared, richly stocked with matter well worth reading. Its articles about Joseffy are almost exhaustive, reproducing criticisms from other sources, and showing also that the "fledgling" Review can strike a hard blow, if need be, in the way that it exposes the motive of certain disparaging criticisms on this admirable pianist; for instance: "Mr. Joseffy plays at Chickering Hall, and not at another hall; Mr. Joseffy's orchestra is led by Dr. Damrosch, and not by another conductor; Mr. Joseffy's success hurts the aspirations of another clever and ambitious pianist who happens to be in the salary roll of another piano house. All these influences united work against Mr. Joseffy. In short, all this apparently artistic turmoil is nothing but a mean, petty war of the managers of a hall, the manufacturers of a piano, and the employers of a pianist, against the employers of another pianist and managers of another hall." To all which we say, Amen!

— The Mapleson Opera season is progressing feebly at the Academy of Music, bringing out old, threadbare operas like Traviata, Travolta, Rigoleto, to begin with, followed by Fraust and Carmen. Gerster comes not, and is not expected. And now it is said that Di Munka and Marie Rose are not to join the troupe, as was expected, after Christmas; but, as Mme. Trebelli-Bettini's London engagement expires then, she may perhaps come over here in January. The Musical Review (Oct. 30) says: —

"Even including the performance of Bizet's Carmen on Monday night, Mr. Mapleson's season has brought forth nothing of importance so far. Pretty much as it was at the beginning of the season last year, when Miss Hank and Carmen were made to do duty for the absent Gerster, the subscribers are forced to wait for whatever may be forthcoming as a compensation for the high prices Mr. Mapleson exacts from those who desire the privilege of attending the performances at the Academy of Music. So far their compensation has been meagre. The small army of nobodies in the operatic world brought hither will not be likely to satisfy the average opera-goers, who above all things crave for an operatic star of the first magnitude. At present they are enjoying an opera season at Nilson prices with half a dozen débutantes in place of a prima donna."

— It is rumored that the Chickering Hall series of Symphony Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Gotthold Carlberg, will not be continued this season.

— The first concert of the Symphony Society, Dr. L. Damrosch, conductor, takes place this evening at Steinway Hall. The programme includes Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; Volkmann's, "To the Night," for alto solo (Miss Drasdil) and orchestra (new); Raff's "Walpurgis Night," for orchestra; "A Faust Overture," Wagner; Schubert's "Home Sickness," Miss Drasdil; and Liszt's "Festival Sounds" (first time).

CINCINNATI. — The College Orchestral Concerts promise a financial success, over eight hundred seats being subscribed for on the first day of the sale. So it used to be in Boston.

LISZT ON CHOPIN.

A NEW edition of Liszt's book, Chopin, has been published in Leipzig by Breitkopf and Härtel. Not only is its language French, but its getting-up as well, — magnificent large type on milk-white paper. That German publishers can produce such volumes à la Firmin Didot, we knew long ago; but we do not know why they so seldom and so exceptionally will do so. One relishes a book twice as much when it is handsome and well printed. As a rule, German books resemble savory food served up in coarse earthenware dishes upon a table without a cloth; the readers of Breitkopf and Härtel's new edition eat off silver. The fare itself — known and appreciated for twenty years — contains no new ingredients, but has remained unaltered. It is with sincere pleasure that we have glanced once more through this book of a clever and amiable man. It is perhaps not given to everybody to go through it conscientiously line for line; for this, one must be something of a visionary, or, best of all, a woman. Liszt so loses himself at times in poetic descriptions and reflections, and strays so far from his theme, Chopin, that we almost grow alarmed lest he should not find his way back. As a master of the art of modulation, he does so, however, most agreeably; after long lyric fancies about love, the fair sex, art, Polish and French women, etc., he always returns to Chopin, who, both as artist and as man, was especially dear to him. It is a question whether anybody unacquainted with Liszt's literary style would ever guess by whom the book was written. From the numerous picturesque descriptions, such, for instance, as the exceedingly exact and neat accounts of Polish dances and national costumes, the reader might suppose the author to be a painter. To judge, however, by the diffuse philosophical arguments and poetic fancies, he should be a poet, a lyricist steeped in reflection. A musician is the last person we should suppose him to be. Even in a purely material sense, the musical element occupies the smallest amount of space in the book, though the latter is written by one distinguished musician on another. Even when characterizing Chopin's compositions and playing, Liszt nearly always employs pictorial and poetic means. He renounces every musical sign, and in the whole volume, extending over 300 pages, does not introduce the shortest example in musical notation. Thus he has pursued the same method as in his famous book, Den Bohémiens et de leur Musique en Hongrie. Our readers will recollect the work and the commotion it excited in Hungary. The assertion first put forth by Liszt, and supported with a degree of plausibility which bordered on proof, that Hungarian national music was derived from the Gypsies, kindled against him a violent feeling of bitterness, though that feeling was wisely soon suppressed. It was in this book that I first felt struck by the intellectually sensitive manner, reminding one of Lamartine, in which Liszt paraphrases, so to speak, his theme. Such magnificent rhetorical fireworks, however, seemed to me provided at the expense of the information which we expect in a book concerning the subject of which that book is supposed to treat. Liszt was then — exactly twenty years ago — kind enough to embody in a letter his views as to this part of my criticism. His words strike me as having an important bearing on all his literary labors, and shall, therefore, be rescued from oblivion. The principal portion, translated from the German, runs thus: "The scientific side of my subject was in my eyes of subordinate importance; for that I should scarcely have taken up my pen. An artist, and, if you choose, a poet, I wanted to see and describe nothing of my subject but its poetical and psychological side. I required from language that it should paint — with less fire and charm, it is true, but on that account with more precision than music — the impressions which, untouched by learning and polemics, come from the heart and speak to the imagination. Descriptive poetic prose is not very usual in Germany, and I can, therefore, understand that, from the title of my book, people expected rather a lecture or an essay than a poem in prose. But what a small circle of readers would take an interest in the little which can be asserted with certainty on this topic! On the other hand, the expression of the most delicate and most profound feelings, whenever they are capable of animating an entire art, is attractive enough for a wider circle, which embraces not musicians alone, but all persons who are susceptible to music." On this principle, Liszt gives us in his Chopin, also, a poème en prose rather than a book on music, properly so called. Yet no one will listen without profiting largely to what this celebrated, this always well-bred and amiable man, has to say. The warmth of heart which invariably pierces through Liszt's writings invests them with a kind of sacred charm far exceeding all grace of style. Liszt is ever full of love for his subject, whether he be writing about Chopin, about R. Wagner, or about Robert Franz. Fired with enthusiasm, he leads us all round their works, as in a garden, from flower to flower, and, should he happen to come across a bed that is faded, or has run wild, he does not mention it upbraidingly, but in a tone of excuse. He only can love who knows how to spare.

A WAGNERIAN ATTACK ON SCHUMANN.

There could not exist, probably, a more glaring contrast to Liszt's loving description of Chopin than the estimate of Robert Schumann in the latest number of Richard Wagner's Bayreuther Blätter. No one, we suppose, is deceived as to the person from whom the abusive article, signed, "Joseph Rubinstein," really emanated. A man who has favored the public with nine volumes of Collected Writings possesses a dangerous claim to be recognized by his style. In matter and form the article is exclusively Wagnerian; Joseph Rubinstein, the pianist, who, in a not very creditable manner, introduces himself to the public as whipping-boy, has probably at most had nothing to do with the matter but to beat up the pianoforte examples as the game for which the hunter so yearned. Who does not at once recognize Wagner's style, that knotted mass of creeping, poisonous, verbal serpents, so indefatigably darting out their tongues in garrulous hate? Yes, the style is recognizable and clearly marked: "Es steht ihm an der Stirn geschrieben, Dass er nicht mag eine Seele lieben."¹

It is really the most laughable thing imaginable that the same Richard Wagner, who not long since publicly declared once more that he despised journalism, should himself publish a journal, and one which stands out as a remarkably black spot in the history of the press. As we know, his custom in these Bayreuther Blätter is to indulge partly in adoration of himself and partly in depreciation of others. What position ought to be taken up towards the columns filled with most stinking self-praise is something which must be determined by every one according to his individual taste and sense of smell. But the case, I think, is different with respect to Wagner's journalistic efforts, running parallel with those columns, to befoul the Ideals of the German people, and render despicable and ridiculous Brahms one day and Schumann the next. These are not things on which we can be silent.

The Bayreuth article comprises two heads. In the first place, an enumeration of the faults of every conceivable kind, which are said to disfigure Schumann's compositions, and then an earnest warning to public and artists to have as little to do as possible with the said compositions, "which distort taste and feeling." We will not go into the various details with which the writer of the article finds fault in Schumann; if only because we would not encourage even the shadow of an opinion that no criticism must be pronounced on great artists, but that all they do should simply be admired. On the contrary, the opinion we hold is that musical criticism and musical history are generally much too panegyrical towards great composers, and by no means analyze such men as Bach, Handel, Gluck, and Beethoven, with the unprejudiced freedom employed by our best literary historians in estimating Schiller or Goethe. We would not defend the feeling of toothless reverence which glorifies indiscriminately all the worst, as well as the best, which Schumann has written, and thus merely betrays the fact that it does not understand the best. "The critics are always at perfect liberty to direct my attention to my faults," wrote Grillparzer in his diary; "but, be it observed, hat in hand." This outward respect, so intentionally outraged in the Bayreuth article, is the very least a genius of Schumann's rank has a right to demand from his critics. But we owe him much more than this. One of the noblest and most highly-gifted composers of whom Germany can boast, Robert Schumann reigns in the heart of every one who has any heart for music. The German nation looks on him as its most precious possession, and he alone who recognizes and feels all the worth of that possession has a right to judge severely any little details in it. By indulging only in censure, and, moreover, sneering censure, towards Schumann, the author of the Bayreuth article betrays himself, and shows that envy and jealousy have deprived him of his last remnant of critical power. Wagner rejects not only Schumann's weaker compositions, but actually the four Symphonies, the Pianoforte Quar-

"Yes, on his forehead is it written:

With love for none was he ever smitten."

test, the Manfred overture — they are all "made up by arranging side by side almost uninterrupted rows simply of cobbler's patches." "We find everywhere in them," we are told, "the same business with separate shreds and patches, which are pulled and stretched in all kinds of ways but to no purpose; the attempt to change them into thoughts is not successful." The B major Symphony, with its spring-like freshness, belongs, Wagner assures us, in style to "ballet music," while he calls the gracefulness of its themes "childish nothingness."

But what offends the reader more painfully than aught else is that not only Schumann's ability, but his character as an artist, his purity and honor, are audaciously assailed. It is asserted that Schumann, who drew everything up from the depths of his own soul, was not "true"! His "everlasting beating about ought," we are told, "to have procured for him at least the nimbus of exemplary intention and endeavor." Schumann deceived the world as to the fundamental deficiencies of his music by means of "devices with dazzled and piquant touches, which he does not hesitate to employ with the necessary profusion." Pursuing the contrary course to Franz Schubert, who was "thoroughly honorable," Schumann, by certain "little expedients, gave himself a false appearance of profundity and primitive originality." The virtuosic style of the pianoforte compositions too, in Schumann's case, "become something thoroughly false and external," etc., etc.

And why, we inquire, does Wagner now consider it necessary to make this spiteful attack on a composer whose works have only just succeeded in fighting their way to merited appreciation, after their creator has been lying in his grave for twenty years? Let every one listen! Because it is owing to a partiality for Schumann's works that "the names of Haydn and of Mozart are now found but seldom adorning our concert programmes"! This tender care for Haydn and Mozart is in Wagner's mouth a piece of ridiculous hypocrisy, and the assertion based upon it as absurd as would be the attempt to prevent the numerous performances of Tannhäuser and Lohengrin because they kept back the operas of Gluck, Mozart, and Beethoven. What is new and full of vitality will always exercise its right side by side with what is classical and old, and men of progress should defend and not combat this right. But Wagner claims this right, the right of actual existence, exclusively for himself alone. The conclusion of the article — a most unmistakable specimen, by the way, of Wagner's most characteristic style — betrays in a passing ebullition the real ground of the attack on Schumann. Here is this remarkable piece of writing: "Thus we have found that even in the outward domain of our art it was not given to Schumann to be naïf and true, and we conclude with the wish that as many as possible may withdraw as speedily as possible from any intercourse with, and any influence of, an author who, according to what has been shown above, cannot fail to exert an injurious and distorting effect on taste and feeling, which is precisely what we, who are hoping for a new revelation of the true spirit of art, cannot be too anxious to preserve pure and undefiled." By this imminent new revelation, in Bayreuth, of the true spirit of art, nothing else is, of course, meant than Wagner's Parsifal, about the success of which we, in our turn, judging from the horrible book, "cannot be too anxious." No! no new revelations of Wagner's will succeed in replacing the old revelations of Schumann! Not more seldom, but more frequently and more devoutly than before, shall we listen to them; for, if one thing was still wanting to complete the light thrown on Schumann, it was the sulphurous flash of excommunication hurled at him from Bayreuth. — Lond. Mus. World.

THE "ORIGIN OF ENGLISH OPERA."

THE above is the title of an article which I find copied in DWIGHT'S JOURNAL, and which proves to be an account of Gay's "Beggar's Opera."

Now I have lying before me a copy of that play, "the third edition, to which is added the overture in score, and the music prefixed to each song. London. . . . MDCCXXXIII."

The songs are fifty-eight in number, not one of which has music composed for it; all were written to the popular melodies of that day. Was this an "Opera"?

Well, we do live and learn!

I had supposed that the masques of the day of Elizabeth, James, and Charles I., were somewhat of the nature of opera; that Davenant's (died 1668) entertainments "in Stilo recitativo" — Siege of Rhodes, etc., — were really English operas, at least as the term was then understood; and that works of Locke, Banister, Purcell, and their contemporaries, would even now be called by that title — not to mention Addison's "Rosamond," unfortunately set to music by a man with little talent and less genius, — Clayton. But if the "Beggar's Opera" was "the origin of English opera," it is clear that my suppositions were woful mistakes! A. W. T.

LOWELL MASON.

BY A. W. THAYER.

LOWELL MASON, Doctor of Music, was born at the scattered hamlet of Medfield, some eighteen miles southwest of Boston, in Massachusetts, January 8, 1792, and died at Orange, in New Jersey, August 11, 1872.

The population of New England was then small; there were no cities, and very few places which in Europe would have been termed villages, and the people were distributed over wide spaces. Temptations to vice and idleness were reduced to their lowest terms, and the boys, rarely enjoying the advantages of schooling more than two or three months in the winter, had abundant leisure to devote to their favorite pursuits. The number of men of that generation, in the main self-taught, who became eminent in all walks of life is astonishing. Mason's passion was music. His small means were devoted to the purchase of instruments and of the instruction books then in vogue, and his genius and perseverance, unaided by teachers, conquered their difficulties. He has recorded of himself that "he spent twenty years of his life in doing nothing save playing upon all manner of musical instruments that came within his reach;" but they were years, as it proved, well spent in preparing him for the great work of his life — the purification and reformation of music in the churches, and the introduction of singing and reading of music as a regular branch of study in the public schools. The local tradition of a village a few miles from Medfield records his appearance as a visitor in the evening "singing school," when about twenty years of age, enchanting the young people by his beauty and the tones of his violoncello.

At sixteen the youth was leader of the choir in the local church, and a teacher of singing classes. He even undertook the instruction of a band. At the first meeting appeared instruments entirely new to him; on the pretext of putting them in order and tune he retained them in his hands, and at the next weekly meeting he had mastered them sufficiently to meet the demands upon him as instructor.

A short digression is here necessary. At the period of the American Revolution it may be almost literally said that there was neither popular poetry nor music in the English colonies, save psalmody and psalm tunes. Watts's psalms and hymns, sent in manuscript to the president of Harvard College, had in great measure superseded Ainsworth, Sternhold and Hopkins, the Bay Psalm Book, and Tate and Brady, and had been published in Boston, one edition of a part of them by Dr. Franklin in Philadelphia; but the melodies, so far as the present writer has been able to discover, had remained unchanged. Some of them, like the "Old Hundredth," were worthy of their place in public worship, but their constant use, without harmonies, and with no organ to support them, had deprived them of all life and interest. It was at that period that a few tunes of lively rhythms and imitations, a sort of poor glee, with texts from the psalm books, were brought to Boston from England. The oldest known to the writer give the name Stephenson as composer. To sing them, choirs possessed of a certain amount of training were necessary; and, where choirs in the New England churches did not already exist, they were soon formed and, in evening singing-classes, taught to sing in parts. The tunes of Tansur, A. Williams, J. Arnold, and other English composers were learned, but the glee tunes became the universal favorites; and William Billings of Boston, a natural genius with no education, and others, made them models (1770–1810) of a host of similar compositions. These men neither had, nor could have, any knowledge of the principles of musical composition, and, of course, offended every canon of criticism. Recent American writers have greatly exaggerated both the extent to which this class of tunes was used and their evil effects upon the dignity and solemnity of public worship; but true it is that they became a serious evil, and one which it seemed hardly possible to eradicate. As early as 1810–12 the large choir of Park Street Church, in Boston, out of which grew the Handel and Haydn Society of that city, had set its face and example against the so-called "fuguing tunes," while the Episcopal churches, in which organs are usually found, had never, it seems, used them. But isolated choirs in cities could produce no widespread and lasting effect; a man of skill, knowledge, and judgment was needed, one who should take up the work as a vocation, a mission. Young Mason was to be the man, than whom no person living could have less foreseen the fact.

In 1812, at twenty years of age, he accepted a position in a bank at Savannah in the State of Georgia, where he immediately turned his musical knowledge to advantage in leading and instructing choirs. It was his good fortune to find there one thoroughly instructed musician, with whom he studied harmony and the art of composition. This man was F. L. Abel, a member of the well-known family of that name. Mason found himself constantly impeded and embarrassed in his public musical labors by the want of a collection of psalm tunes in accordance with his taste and judgment; and this led him, with the aid of Abel, to form a manuscript collection for his own use. The basis of this collection was the Sacred Melodies of William Gardiner — or, rather, its distinguishing feature, besides its correctly figured bass, was a large selection from the exquisite melodies which Gardiner had extracted from the instrumental works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and their contemporaries, and adapted to English psalms and hymns.¹ The best classes of the psalm tunes then in vogue in England were well represented; and the few excursions beyond the limits of good taste are excusable in a young man, and were introduced more for choir-practice than for use in the church. There was no printing office in that part of the United States of a capacity to produce a collection of music, and in 1821 Mr. Mason visited Boston, in hope of finding a publisher there. There were so many collections already before the public, that no one would venture to print it, although its author demanded nothing for the copyright, but such a supply as he needed for use in Savannah. Negotiations were then opened with the Directors of the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, now in the sixth year of its existence, and already famous in New England for its oratorio performances, especially of The Messiah and Creation. But it must not be forgotten that the population of Boston was then under 45,000, and the people in the neighboring towns — within concert-going distance — were less than two thirds that number. The society was necessarily small, and, though established in the only city of the United States in which it could have lived, its income was limited, and the question pressed, whether it would be prudent to assume the risk of the undertaking. It was at length decided in favor of the (then) bold course. It was agreed that, if Dr. G. K. Jackson, the organist of the society, an Englishman thoroughly educated in the solid English school, should be able, after a complete and thorough examination, to give a certificate of his full approval of the work, the society would print and publish it as its own work, and (as is stated) would assume all costs and divide any profits equally with the compiler. Mr. Mason gave the writer an amusing account of his interviews with Dr. Jackson. The doctor, sipping from a bottle of gin, sat and listened to the tunes in regular succession, sometimes interrupting with criticisms and suggestions, which the young man soon found he might adopt or not according to his own judgment, since at the next meeting they were all forgotten by Jackson. Some pieces by the doctor himself were inserted, and the result was a certificate, closing with the words: "It is much the best book of the kind I have seen published in this country, and I do not hesitate to give it my most decided approbation."

This, with a similar document from F. L. Abel, occupy a page of the original edition. The society took good care to add to the value of the Doctor's eulogium, by dedicating the work to him, "As a testimony of the high estimation in which he is held for his exquisite taste, profound knowledge, and unrivaled skill in the art and science of music." And so in 1821 (with date 1822) appeared the Boston Handel and Haydn Society collection of church music, etc., etc., copyrighted by Joseph Lewis, secretary of the society. It was a matter of policy for all who were pecuniarily concerned, that the book should come before the public as being actually the work of the society, and its preface, to those who know its real history, excites here and there a smile; for instance, the audacious statement (unless Mr. Mason in Savannah might be considered as an important part of the association in Boston) that "the society have for some time been engaged, with much labor and at considerable expense, in collecting materials for the present work." Again, speaking of the adaptations of melodies from the great masters to the purposes of psalmody, we read: "These works are among the materials to which the Handel and Haydn Society have had access, and they have exercised their best judgment in making such selections from them as would most Beethoven's Trio, Opus 11, beautifully adapted to a text beginning "Now night in silent grandeur reigns."

enrich the present work. They consider themselves as peculiarly fortunate in having had, for the accomplishment of their purpose, the assistance of Mr. Lowell Mason, one of their members now resident in Savannah, whose taste and science have well fitted him for the employment, and whose zeal for the improvement of church music has led him to undertake an important part in selecting, arranging, and harmonizing the several compositions."

The new book was introduced into the then universal New England evening "singing schools," and so into the choirs. The first edition was sold off with profit during the first year, and constantly enlarged editions, both in matter and number, to the tenth or eleventh followed in the course of the next dozen years.

It was the profits of this book which enabled the Handel and Haydn Society to tide over the period of its youth, and establish itself as one of the distinguishing institutions of Boston, as it still remains; it was the effect of this book which began the generation of a new, healthy, and purer taste in music throughout New England; moreover it attracted attention to Mr. Mason, and the perfection of his Savannah choir, cultivated upon it, becoming known in Boston, a formal invitation was extended to him by "a large committee, consisting of different denominations of Christians," to return to Boston and "take a general charge of music in churches there." The invitation was accepted, and in 1827, at the age of thirty-five, he established himself there.

(Concluded in next number.)

ON ROBERT SCHUMANN'S "MUSIC AND MUSICIANS."¹

BY F. L. RITTER.

THE representatives of music's æsthetic meaning may be divided into two classes: those who assign to music no other æsthetic powers and functions than those of expressing a certain degree of formal beauty, as produced by means of a clever arrangement of musical (measured) sounds into pleasing melodies and harmonies, this latter element, however, being admitted only as a subordinate, and often importunate, servant of the melody; and those who assign to music, as one of its most important æsthetic qualities, the ideal function of expressing emotions and feelings often of such decided character as may be pointed out to the hearer by means of the more exact words of the poet. Among the first class we meet those critics who stand, in general, towards the practice of music, as amateurs, and who endeavor to get at music's æsthetic meaning by an abstract method of analysis; but for want of sufficient practical experience as composers, they are able to grasp only one part of the phenomena embodied in the musical art-work. Among the second class we find the composers, and the intelligent reproductive artists, who consider the musical art-work in its complexity and amplitude. Rhythm, Melody, and Harmony, the three fundamental elements of every composition, each one possessing, at certain moments, an independent æsthetic characteristic meaning, consequently are of equal importance to the composer; or, as Schumann said, "Music resembles chess. The Queen (melody) has the most power, but the King (harmony) turns the scale;" and, we may add, the men (rhythm) direct the meaning of the steps (moves) of the first two.

There was a time when J. J. Rousseau found occasion to say: "Le musicien lit peu." But that time has long gone by; the musician of to-day not only reads much, but he also takes up the pen, and, like a well-armed warrior, fights battles in the interest of his art. He is no more satisfied with mere technical knowledge (harmony, counterpoint) regarding composition, nor with the traditional empirical on-dits about the æsthetic life of art. He courageously looks around him in the world of poetry, art, and science, and endeavors to investigate, philosophically, the intimate connection of his special art with the other arts, and with life in general. For who is better fitted to talk about the inner ideal life of music than he whose heart has felt most deeply the divine vitality of music's creations? The dry scientist may satisfy his curiosity by counting and fixing the vibrations of the different sounds of the tone element, in order to be able to prove, mathematically, that music does not express anything beyond the mere production of beautifully arranged tones. The musically one-sided philosopher may see in those melodies and harmonies nothing but pleasing tone-forms, void of all ideal meaning; the mystic life of the tone-element may appear to him a fiction, and not well fitted for any rational use. To the creative musician this tone element, in its mysterious richness and complexity, will ever remain the symbol of ideal life in its varied aspects, and the establishment of this fact will receive its fullest recognition at the hands of those only who are able to bring in aid of their philosophical investigation, not alone a method of abstract analysis, but also the inevitable advantage of the practical experience of the composer. Hence the vain attempts of former, musically-uneducated philosophers to assign music its true place among the family of arts. To Leibnitz and Kant it was nothing but an agreeable combination of measured sounds. Hegel assigned to it the expression of mere outward, formal beauty. Voltaire said, sarcastically, that "that which was not fit to be spoken was good enough to be sung."¹ Others confined themselves to the mere mention of the existence of music, but avoided penetrating into its mysterious æsthetic life. But the greater number of philosophers, ignoring the fact that the work of the composer is just as much the product of the mental powers as that of the painter, the sculptor, the architect, the poet, spoke disparagingly of the tone-art and its disciples. "Sonate, que me veux-tu," exclaimed many, but, lacking the right musical understanding and thorough education, they were unable to catch the satisfactory answer.

On the other hand, the musician who formerly exercised the functions of a critic, the ferocious knight of the abstract theoretical rules, was satisfied to examine a musical composition in order to see whether it sinned against the almighty "thorough bass;" the discovery of a fault against musical grammar, as he understood it, was sufficient to condemn the work and its author. Thus the poet-composer stood between two fires. Carl Maria von Weber, not satisfied with the existing situation, took up the pen and furnished some good material from the point of view of the creative composer. Though he committed the sin of recommending his master, Abt Vogler's corrections of some of Bach's harmonized chorals, his writings on music were, on the whole, a step forward. Fred. Rochlitz, the refined and genial editor of the once influential Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, spoke many an encouraging word in the interest of a truer appreciation of musical art and artists. His work, Für Freunde der Tonkunst, contains many valuable papers that touch upon important æsthetic questions regarding music. The fantastic and highly original E. Th. A. Hoffmann wrote pages glowing with enthusiastic appreciation of the deep art-spirit, as revealed in the creations of Ritter Gluck, in Mozart's Don Giovanni, and in Beethoven's instrumental works. He found in those compositions more than merely agreeable melodies, more than thorough bass and counterpoint can teach.

The spiritual and enthusiastic Marx founded his Berliner Musik Zeitung, and fought bravely in the interest of a worthier recognition of music's nobler æsthetic functions, in the sense of expressing definite emotions and feelings. In his "Compositionslehre," "Die Malerei der Tonkunst," "Die Musik des 19ten Jahrhunderts," and other important works, he prepared many a useful stone towards the erection of a truer æsthetic foundation. Schumann and his "Davidsbründer" took up the cudgel and fought the Philistines on all sides. Berlioz, in France, swung a brave pen, and from his standpoint insisted upon the recognition of music's power to express more than mere vague emotions. Dr. Ambros, in his excellent (though, unfortunately, unfinished) "History of Music," in Die Grenzen der Musik und Poesie, as well as in many other publications on musical art, spoke many a powerful word in the interest of the same cause. Otto Jahn, though not a musician by profession, but a man well acquainted, theoretically and practically, with the whole breadth of musical art, — he composed and published Lieder, — furnished, in his "Mozart," some highly valuable contributions. To these, and many more departed writers and artists, as well as to those still in the harness, may be attributed, in more than one sense, the great change that has taken place during the last forty or fifty years regarding a truer appreciation of music's æsthetic nature. Philosophers can no more afford to devote to musical art a few passing remarks only, or to pass it over in utter silence, not knowing how to get at its sublime vitality.

Thus, the musicians, considering the short time since they stepped into the arena of musico-philosophical criticism, have reason to be satisfied with the good results so far obtained. The flimsy warnings of philosophical friends, that the creative powers may be impaired by the exercise of critical powers, — "science will drive poetry out," we are told, — will be accepted no longer. The experience of the modern musician is, that the more broadly his mind is developed, the richer the experience of human life which surrounds him, the deeper and more universal his understanding and enjoyment of art will be. But supposing, for a moment even, that the above assertions were true, then the answer of the musicians would be: Since you one-sided (musically) critics have tried for a long time in vain to lift the veil from the mystery of music's æsthetic meaning and function; and since your philosophical pirouettes, everlastingly describing the same figure executed upon one leg, do not bring us one step nearer to the solution of the question, — without the material help of the musician, the creator of the work, let us, for the time being, sacrifice a few symphonies and operas, stored away in our minds, and let us help you to pull the heavily laden cart out of the swamp. You anxiously consult physiology, you fervently tap at the door of psychology, but neither of these sciences have lent you much help as yet. Your endeavors to explain the creator's (composer's) work by throwing doubt upon the nature of the means he employs, in order to fashion his works according to the ideal as pictured in his imagination, will remain unsuccessful indeed! You have so far pulled too long on the wrong end of the rope; change your tactics, become composers for a time, merely for the useful experience of the thing, and surely a more harmonious understanding will be the result of that change. The horizon once freed from confusing mists, musical art will live a still grander and less hampered existence. When this, by the musician so much wished, for, happier situation of art-life has been brought about, he will thoughtfully return again to his scores, and, instead of finding in the philosophical critic a continual opponent, — a natural enemy as it were, everlastingly bent on misunderstanding the composer's aims, on discovering by means of a false method of criticism imagined faults, or busy breaking the tiles on the roof of the composer's art-temple, to see whether there is anything inside fit for rational use, — composer and art critic will walk hand in hand in mutual sympathy and understanding. Is this a mere illusion? By no means. Look at the æsthetic treatment of the other arts. The fundamental æsthetic laws are universally understood and accepted (I mean by the connoisseur); here and there, in some minor points only, there may, as there always will, exist differences of opinion.

To be sure the material of music is more subtle than that of the other arts; its true philosophical appreciation offers the mind greater difficulties, not insurmountable, however, in the end. Thus far a comprehensive system of musical æsthetics, resting on invariable foundations, has not been written, either by the musician or by the philosopher. We are still cutting stones for such a sound foundation. But in order to accomplish the task successfully the philosopher must become more of a musician, and the musician more of a philosopher.

Many encouraging signs of the approach of such a wished-for epoch are already appearing on the horizon of modern musical culture; and musical art, in more than one respect, will be the gainer by it. Musical criticism, now exercised to a large — too large — extent by half-educated musical amateurs, will then be raised to a nobler, a more dignified, position. Where we now experience confusion and uncertainty of æsthetic-critical views, — where servile favoritism frequently drives sterling merit into the background, — where the historical knowledge and memory of every newly appointed critic does not reach farther than yesterday, — where fashion foolishly attempts to dictate laws in matters of art, — where the acquirement of the indispensable knowledge of the laws of composition in its entire meaning is most desired and least to be found, — where serious art principles are often pool-pooled for want of faith and want of intellectual penetration, we shall have true criticism. All these drawbacks, which now weigh so heavily upon the healthy development of musical art, will disappear as chaff disappears before the wind. That the golden age of critical justice will then arrive is, of course, not to be expected. But it will be more satisfactory to cross one's sword with a peer than to receive a dagger blow in the back from a poltroon. There always will remain important questions to be solved, which will afford occasion enough for men not to be all of the same opinion about art and artists.

ASTORGA, AND HIS STABAT MATER.¹

EMANUELE, BARON D'ASTORGA, born at Palermo, 1681; died at the Schloss Raudnitz, in 1736. . . .

We know too little of his history to satisfy our curiosity; but what we do know has a singularly tragic interest. When the curtain of the past is lifted, and we are permitted to look upon so much of the drama of his life as history has preserved, our eyes are met, at the first, with a terrible sight, that of a son compelled to witness the execution of his own father. That father, the Marchese Capece de Roffrano, unsuccessful in an insurrection against the contemptible tyranny of Philip Fifth of Spain, was condemned with many other Sicilian nobles to the scaffold, that son, the young Astorga, was led to the place of execution, and there bound and so held by the headsman's servants that he was forced to look upon the quivering corpse of his father. With senses paralyzed by the awful scene, he lingered long around the spot, and his pale, grief-laden face was exciting in his countrymen a bitterer resentment than any which their political troubles had aroused, when the Countess Ursini, more a friend to him and the world than she knew, was moved with pity and sent him to the Convent of Astorga in Spain. There, in the seclusion of the cloister, bereft of home, fortune, and even of family name, Music found him and claimed him for her own, and gave him a name and a patent of nobility beyond the reach of earthly power to affect.

A few years later, on leaving this retreat and entering into the world, he obtained, by the influence of his protectress, the title of Baron d'Astorga. The unfortunate end of a romantic attachment which he formed while on a diplomatic mission at the Court of Parma, sent him to Vienna. There his pale, handsome face, his mild, quiet, and aristocratic bearing added to the attention which his rare musical gifts attracted, and made him the idol of a society which he adorned. Several years were passed in a romantic life of travel, in the course of which he visited England, where he composed for the "Society of Ancient Musick," London, in 1713, his world-renowned "Stabat Mater."

This work is almost an autobiography. Through it all the influence of that great sorrow which overshadowed his youth is seen and felt; and if at times, through the rifts in the cloud which rested on the spirit of the master, the sunshine comes in, the golden light is always tempered with a tint of sadness. This music is the expression of a soul that had come out of great tribulation and was consecrated to Art by such a real, great grief that not even the anticipations of the glory of Paradise could suppress the echo of his early sadness. The serious, quiet, and unaffected delivery of his pure musical thought, the truthfulness with which his musical utterance expresses the story of the famous hymn, the graceful and original melody of the voices, the freedom from sentimentality, and the almost cloister-like reserve and tenderness which breathes through his measures stamp the work before us as that of a pure, truthful, and devout child of art. Such music is not every-day music, but it is music for all time, and, from the intellectual straining after effect which pervades and poisons the literature and the art of the present day, to such we turn with a grateful feeling of relief. In such music as Astorga's, God and Art speak to us alike, calling us to come and renew our strength at the fountain of perpetual youth. W. N. E.

VOCAL CLUBS. — Every true lover of music must watch with pleasure the rapid spread of Choral Societies, at the public concerts of which we have the results of the labor of many months, cheerfully given by the members, not only for their individual gratification, but as we can testify from our own experience, really with an abstract desire to make known those works which are passed over by ordinary concert-givers, who are necessarily compelled to consult commercial rather than artistic value in the selection of their programmes. But with every hope that such institutions may continue to flourish and increase, we should be glad if by their side well-organized private societies for the cultivation of either vocal or instrumental music could be more extensively formed. Thibaut, in his excellent work on "Purity in Musical Art," after eloquently advocating the establishment of these delightful social unions, especially dwells upon the necessity of guarding against the intrusion of that frivolity which too often creeps into such gatherings. "The first and most essential condition for such a society," he says, "is that the members are judiciously chosen, that genuine lovers of art combine together, that care is taken to secure an equal distribution of voices, and to nourish to the full the love and enjoyment of true art. Consequently an evening devoted to singing must take precedence of all ordinary eating and drinking engagements, and all the members must feel that an association that requires their united efforts to form and maintain must not be at the mercy of other ordinary pleasures, especially as, while in other gatherings the absence of one is not much felt, here the absence of a single voice may quite possibly bring the whole thing to a dead lock, and this even in choruses, where a single efficient voice may be an indispensable support to the rest." These words cannot be too much taken to heart; and as we have now so many competent musical amateurs, and the means for collecting a library are placed within easy reach, there can be no reason why such societies should languish for want of members or for material to carry on their good work. — London Musical Times.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

THE BOYLSTON CLUB gave the first concert of its seventh season in the Music Hall, on Friday evening, November 14. Of course the hall was crowded with its enthusiastic guests, unwilling to lose a note of the fine singing. The programme was as follows: —

Stabat Mater	Astorga.
Mixed chorus, solos and organ.
Christmas Carol	Osgood.
Mixed chorus.
The Gondolier, Op. 28	Schubert.
Male chorus.
"The Mountains are Cold"	Brahms.
Italian Barcarole, Op. 44
Female chorus.
Violin solos, Romanza	Jonchim.
Scherzo	Spuhr.
Timothée d'Adamowski.
The Forest Mill, Op. 96, No. 2	Nessler.
Male chorus.
"Day is at Last Departing," Op. 184, No. 1	Ruff.
Female chorus.
"The Long Day Closes"	Sullivan.
Male chorus.
May Dew, Op. 95, No. 1	Rheinberger.
Mixed chorus.
The Forget-me-not, Op. 533, No. 1	Abt.
Male chorus.
Glee, "Hark! how the Birds" g.	Gahee.
Mixed chorus.

Earnest lovers of the best in art may be truly grateful to this Club for consecrating a good half of its hours of practice, as it has done for several years, to the study of some solid, serious, noble work by some great old master, of whom we knew too little, if we were not wholly ignorant, before. In this spirit the Club had already mastered, for the benefit and culture of true friends of music, the Requiem by Palestrina, an eight-part Motet by Bach, a Requiem by Cherubini, and other works of high import. And now we have to thank the conductor, Mr. Osgood, and his faithful choir, for a first hearing of this famous, though so little known, great work, the Stabat Mater, by Emanuel Astorga. The strange, sad story of the man, born in Sicily, in 1681 — four years before the birth of Bach and Handel — was translated in this Journal, from Riehl's "Musikalische Charakterköpfe," thirteen years ago. From this and other sources the former president of the Boylston Club, Mr. W. N. Bayres, compiled the sketch so thoughtfully and chastely written, of which we have copied the greater part on another page. Riehl closed his essay (1858) with these words: "Admirers of Astorga have, within a few years, had his noblest work, the Stabat Mater, engraved, not for the sake of gain, but to gratify their own enthusiasm enough to kindle something of the same in others. No publisher's name appears on the title page of the score; it is only decorated by a simple cross; and then he adds, sarcastically: "It is the cross, to which the ideal tone-poetry of the olden time has been nailed by modern music-makers!"

The score, as it then existed, with only a string quartet accompaniment, to be filled out at discretion by some one at the organ — who in fact had to supply nearly all the accompaniment to the solo numbers, — was hardly suited for performance by choral societies. Robert Franz, in 1864, gave it more nearly a complete orchestral instrumentation, representing the organ part by two clarinets and two bassoons, performing the pious task in the same reverent spirit, and with the same taste and judgment that he has shown in his additional accompaniments to scores of Bach and Handel. He also condensed the orchestral parts in a piano-forte accompaniment, well suited to the organ, as appeared in the judicious and effective manner in which Mr. G. W. Sumner played it on the great organ of our Music Hall.

The whole work (lasting an hour) is in a most serious, tender, noble vein; learned, contrapuntal, full of feeling, full of meaning and of beauty. It was written out of the inmost heart and spirit of the composer, who was "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." But simply as music, as an inspired art-creation, it is a masterpiece, which should be heard more than once to be appreciated, although it made a deep impression on a very large proportion of the audience. An instrumental prelude of some length, of mournful character, with expressive polyphonic interweaving of melodic parts, leads in the opening chorus: Stabat Mater dolorosa, etc., which unfolds with marvelous richness and impressiveness. It is grief made musical, without the slightest taint of sentimental commonplace. At the words, Pertransiit gladius, could we not all feel, as Riehl says, how "the basses stalk on demoniacally in chromatic passages against the billowy upper voices, cutting as with a sword of sharpness into their melodic web?" "Few composers, he adds, "so send the martyr feeling through the bone and marrow of the hearer, as the otherwise so mild Astorga. This is the sword that went through the young man's soul on the place of execution, when it severed his father's life; and, perhaps, he has here unconsciously set the history of his own agony in notes." This chorus was extremely well sung, the voices blending in rare euphony.

No. 2, covering the two stanzas: O! quam tristis, etc., is a beautiful Terzet for soprano, alto, and bass, in which the voices have a tenderness, a spiritual melodic grace, worthy of Bach himself. The accompaniment, too, is highly interesting, the basses moving in a majestic figure of their own. The three singers, Mrs. J. W. Weston, Mr. W. H. Fessenden, and Mr. Clarence E. Hay, proved themselves equal to the truly musical, expressive rendering of their parts.

3. A double duet, first of soprano and alto, followed by tenor and bass, in a somewhat livelier tempo (poco Andante, 3-8 measure), and for the first time in the major (E-flat), continues the hymn through four more stanzas (Quis est homo, and Pro peccatis). The two female voices seem to sustain and comfort one another in unconsciously ornate, sweet, sympathetic phrases. Here the contralto of Miss Welsh was heard in music well adapted to her. The tenor and bass proceed each in solo for some time, and then unite. The bass part has a flowing movement, which was given with great evenness and rich volume by Mr. Hay; and Mr. Fessenden's sweet tenor voice and refined style appeared to excellent advantage.

4. Then follows an Alla Breve chorus, Eia Mater, which is perhaps the driest portion of the work, yet dignified and rich in contrapuntal harmony. The (mezzo) soprano aria (No. 5), Sancta Mater, has an intense dramatic pathos, which came out well in the rich and sympathetic voice of Mrs. Weston. No. 6, duet, Fac me tecum, for alto and tenor, calls for no special remark.

7. Chorus. The sombre hue of the work as a whole is momentarily enlivened by the tempo giusto and full major harmony upon the words: Virgo virginum præclara, which yields, however, in the next sentence, to a sad minor motive at fac me tecum plangere, with which it alternates. This is one of the most beautiful of the choruses.

8. The bass aria, Fac me plagis (in B-flat major, Andantino, 3-8), is a noble melody, a calm and cheerful aspiration for a share in the agonies and triumph of the cross. It includes the Inflammatus, which it treats in the same temperate and even style, sincere and deep in feeling, getting up no great exciting conflagration, as Rossini does in his most brilliant soprano aria on the same text. Truly is it said that this Stabat Mater is not "sensuous" music! It is quiet, chaste, and mostly sombre; but it is sincere and deep, and in its very abstinence from strong, outward color contrasts, in its reliance on the expressive power of fine-felt, subtle counterpoint, and pure thematic development, is it not refreshing to ears continually assaulted by the sensational "effects," the clamorous appeals, of recent "musical reformers?"

9. The Requiem closes with a long, elaborate and varied chorus, in which a solemn Adagio introduces a lively imitative Allegro movement. It includes the words Quando corpus morietur, and the Paradisi gloriam, which are such striking features in Rossini's music, but does not treat them in any exceptional way; the general musical drift of the chorus as a whole is not changed to take advantage of these tempting words. Paradisi gloriam, strange to say, echoes in the minor the very strains just before sung in the major to the words palmam victoriae. Riehl says: "Is it not the soul steeped in sorrow, consecrated to Art by the depth of misfortune, which even in the glory of Paradise cannot suppress an echo of yearning sadness?" The Amen continues the same minor movement to great length, bringing the great work to a peaceful close through a beautiful harmonic cadence, ending with the ecclesiastical major third of the tonic.

Again we thank the Boylston Club for giving us a hearing of this noble work, so well interpreted on the part of solo singers, chorus and organist. The latter showed great discrimination in the choice of stops, sometimes reproducing the sound of violins quite palpably. If anything was wanting it was now and then a greater weight of bass. In the singing the only defect noticeable was a want of uniformity in the pronunciation of the Latin text.

The part-songs were fresh and choice selections in the main. We could have wished, however, that their number had been more limited; however beautiful, and however finely sung, after listening for two hours attention will flag, and the songs begin to sound all alike. But the singing of most of them was as nearly perfect as we can well imagine. In sweet, pure quality of voices, in the balance of parts, in execution, phrasing, light and shade, etc., the Club surpassed itself. Nothing could be more delicate, more sweet and musical than the sopranos in the female part-songs. That Italian Barcarole, with "Fidelin" for a refrain, was indeed a dainty bit. Mr. Osgood's Christmas Carol, too, was a complete success and had to be repeated. Mr. Adamowski played his violin solos with all the unaffected grace and purity of style which he has shown before, and, in answer to a warm recall, performed his own transcription of a Chopin Nocturne in E-flat.

PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA. There was a considerably larger audience at the second concert (Nov. 7). The programme was as follows:—
Overture, Leonore, No. 3, Op. 72. Beethoven.
"Le Rouet d'Omphale." Symphonique Poem, Op. 31. Saint-Saëns.

Concert-Stück, in F-minor, for Piano, Op. 79. C. M. v. Weber.
Miss Henrietta Maurer.

Songs: Widmung Schumann.
Gretchen and Spinnrade Schubert.

Miss May Bryant.
"Leonore," Symphonie, in E (two movements). Raff.
Polonaise, No. 2, in E (adapted for orchestra by Carl Müller-Berghaus) Liszt.

Piano Solo, "Valse de Concert" Joseph Wieniawski.
Miss Henrietta Maurer.

Fantasia, "Caprice" Vieuxtemps.
Scotch Songs, with accompaniment of piano, violin and violoncello, Op. 108, Nos. 7 and 17. Beethoven.

Miss May Bryant, Messrs. H. Strauchauer, C. N. Allen, and Wulf Fries.
Two Slavonic Dances, Op. 42. Anton Dvorak.
No. 5, Allegro vivace. No. 6, Allegretto scherzando.

Here was the same preponderance of "new-school" music as before. But the concert opened with the noblest of Overtures, which was remarkably well rendered for so small an orchestra, four first violins, and other strings in proportion, being quite inadequate to the great crescendo near the end. Saint-Saëns's queer and pretty fancy of a spinning-wheel Symphony, with Hercules for spinner, was executed to a charm; this fantastic trifle had evidently had an exceptional amount of critical rehearsal spent upon it, and it tickled the listening sense so that a smile lit every face. As for Raff's Leonore Symphony, we could accept two parts as better than the whole, but we should hardly choose the March for one of them; it is catching, but too tediously spun out. The arrangement of Liszt's showy Polonaise was a dazzling display of instrumentation, full of color contrasts and striking effects, which were most skillfully and vividly brought out, — but is such a thing really worth the pains? The Fantasia-Caprice by Vieuxtemps is a more natural and flowing sort of music; it was well instrumented, but it seemed very lengthy at that late stage of the programme, — much more so than it does in Vieuxtemps' own solo violin performance. The two Slavonic Dances, though not particularly original, were graceful, bright, and characteristic. In all, the orchestra shows more and more the benefit of Mr. Listemann's thorough training and his sensitive and firm control.

Miss Henrietta Maurer, who appears very young, with prepossessing girlish ways, has been studying for a number of years at the Conservatory in Moscow, under the direction of Nicolas Rubinstein. Her performance in Weber's brilliant, well-worn show-piece, was highly creditable in the main; her execution was clear and fluent, and yet in parts somewhat constrained and pupil-like, and lacking force. There was more freedom and more charm in her rendering of Wieniawski's Waltz, and more particularly of Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" variations. She won the sympathy of her audience, however, from the first.

Miss May Bryant has much to recommend her as a singer; a rich and sympathetic mezzo-soprano voice; judicious method, and a tasteful style. Schumann's impassioned "Du meine Seele" seemed too much for her, nervous as she was, to begin with; it should be sung by a tenor, and perhaps we shall never again hear sung with so much real fire and abandon as our lamented Kreissmann used to sing it. Nor was her "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" a marked success. We enjoyed her much more in the two Scotch ballads "The Lovely Lass of Inverness," and "Faithful Johnnie" with Beethoven's beautiful accompaniments; the latter was particularly charming, though there was no need of singing so many verses, and both ballads would have sounded better in a smaller room.

MR. HENRY G. HANCHETT commenced a series of Recitals, on Tuesday evening, October 21, at his Studio, No. 157 Tremont St. The invited company quite filled the room. Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen sang. The programme was interesting, to-wit:—

Sonata, Op. 53, in C major Beethoven.
Recitativo, Giunse Alfin il Momento } Mozart.
Aria, Deh Dirmi.

Mrs. Allen.
Toccata in D-flat Op. 31, No. 2 Mayer.
Etude in F, Op. 23, No. 1 } Rubinstein.
Barcarolle in G major.

Waldesrauschen Liszt.
Oh that we two were maying Gounod.
Nuit d'Etoiles Widor.
Dame Nightingale Taubert.

Mrs. Allen.
Fantasiestücke, Op. 1 Schaeffer.
No. 1. Allegro, E-flat minor.

No. 2. Adagio molto, E-flat major.
Berceuse, D-flat major Chopin.
Polonaise, A-flat major, Op. 53 }

We were obliged to lose all but the last three numbers; but we had a peculiar pleasure in hearing once more those genial little pieces by Schaeffer, which years ago were introduced to us in Mr. Dresel's concerts. These, and the Chopin pieces following, Mr. Hanchett rendered con amore, the only fault being a certain lack of repose and evenness of style.

For Thursday evening, November 13, Mr. Hanchett had announced a second Recital, with another Beethoven Sonata, and selections from Chopin, Rubinstein, Weber (Rondo Brilliant), Raff, and Liszt. But the illness, for the week preceding, of the concert-giver prevented his playing more than a small portion of the programme. Of what he did give, we found the "Eclogues" by Raff, Op. 106 (a form invented, we believe, by Thomaschek), rather interesting. The singer also, Mme. Cappiani, was disabled; so that the weather seemed to have the lion's share in the fulfillment of the programme. Rubinstein's A minor Sonata for piano and violin is promised for a future recital.

MR. EDWARD B. PERRY, the blind pianist, gave a Recital of Piano Music, on the 12th inst., at Mr. Junius W. Hill's room in Tremont St. Unfortunately we could not avail ourselves of the tempting invitation of so choice a programme as the following, with so artistic an interpreter as Mr. Perry:—

(1) a. Aufschwung, Op. 12, No. 2
b. Warum? Op. 12, No. 3
c. Traumewirren, Op. 12, No. 7 } Schumann.
d. Nachtstueck, from Op. 23,
e. Novellette, Op. 21, No. 4.

(2) Sonata in B-flat minor, Op. 35 Chopin.
Grave — Doppio movimento — Scherzo —
Marcia Funebre — Presto.

(3) a. La Gondola, Op. 13, No. 2 Henselt.

b. Intermezzo, from "Carnival of Milan," Von Bülow.
c. Why? E. B. Perry.
d. La Gazelle. Pièce caractéristique Kullik.
(4) a. Berceuse, Op. 57 } Chopin.

BOSTON CONSERVATORY. The matinée, under the direction of Julius Eichberg, November 4, at Wesleyan Hall, offered some things too rarely heard, which we were sorry to lose. This was the programme:—

(1) Trio in E flat. — Op. 100 Schubert.
Messrs. Herm. P. Chelius, Albert Van Raalte, and Wulf Fries.

(2) Song. — "Al desio," from "Marriage of Figaro." Mozart.
Mrs. Chas. Lewis.

(3) a. March funèbre Chopin.
b. La Fileuse Roff.
c. Nocturne in G minor Chopin.
d. Elsa's Brautzug Wagner — Liszt.

e. Nocturne in D flat. } Chopin.
f. Polonaise in C sharp minor. }

Mr. Herm. P. Chelius.
(4) Song. — "Above in her chamber" (with Violin obligato.) Eichberg.
Mrs. Chas. Lewis.

(5) Quatre Grandes Marches. — Op. 74 Schumann.
Allegro, Moderato, Muetoso, Allegro.
Mr. Herm. P. Chelius.

We have heard warm praise of Mr. Chelius's playing in the great Schubert Trio; and the Schumann Marches, if they were the four vigorous and fiery ones which we know as Op. 76, showed that he knows how to go out of the beaten track for good selections.

The continuation and completion of "Talks on Art," by the late W. M. Hunt, is necessarily deferred to another number of the JOURNAL.

IS ROBERT FRANZ A FAILURE?

III.

WERE it not almost superfluous, I might suggest again (as I did in my article in the Atlantic Monthly) that all the objections made to Franz's "additional accompaniments" on the ground of over-elaborate contrapuntal treatment, applies with equal force to Mozart's very celebrated accompaniments to the airs "O Thou, that tellest," and "The people that walked," in Handel's Messiah. But it may be said that, in general, Franz has employed elaborate imitative counterpoint only where the character of the original parts absolutely demanded such treatment. In the tenor air, "Uimm'nich Dir zu Eigen lim," in the "Saba-Cantata," for instance, Franz's accompaniment is in the simplest four-part harmony, the easy and graceful leading of the voices alone distinguishing it from common accords plaqués. Here the very character of the composition itself demanded simplicity of treatment; but, to take another example from the same cantata, a mere glance at the original bars and oboe-da-caccia parts in the air "Gold aus Ophir ist zu schlecht" will show that such sustained simplicity is wholly out of the question here. The original parts are too elaborate to be wedded to a purely harmonic accompaniment. I cannot conceive how any one, really studying Franz's work in this air, can fail to see that it is not only a marvel of contrapuntal writing, but an equally fine example of artistic good taste.

Another charge brought against Franz is, that he has made too large use of orchestral instruments in his accompaniments, instead of confining himself to the organ. There can be no doubt that the organ was used, and intended to be used, by Bach and Handel themselves, and to use it now would seem, at first sight, to be the naïve solution of the problem. It must be clearly understood, also, that Franz expresses no preference for orchestral instruments over the organ, but uses them because he is, in a certain sense, forced to by circumstances. The instrument used by the composers themselves in accompanying airs and recitatives was either a Regal or a Rückpositiv, an arrangement which enabled the organist, in one case, and both organist and organ-pipes in the other, to be stationed in immediate proximity to the singer. This is a matter of the greatest importance; without this proximity a fine musical effect is impossible, and to form an adequate idea of its paramount importance, one has only to conceive of the effect that would be produced by four men playing a Beethoven string-quartet, seated at the four corners of the Music Hall platform. Now there are very few concert halls in Germany which boast an organ of any sort; the Regal (small, portable organ) has gone out of use, although it would be easy to have one made at any time, were the money only forthcoming. But until the powers that be show the same interest in Bach that was shown in Wagner at Bayreuth, and have small portable organs, with two manuals and pedal, built especially for the performance of his cantatas, nothing remains but to do as Franz has done, and choose the best practicable representative of the organ, which is, in general, a quartet of clarinets and bassoons. To show how little Franz insists upon the use of orchestral instruments in his "additional accompaniments," we have the fact that he has written two separate accompaniments to the "Saba-Cantata," one for orchestral instruments and the other for the organ. Any one can take his choice in the matter, only, if the organ-part be selected, let it not be played on an instrument like that in our Music Hall, where the action does not speak promptly, and where both organist and pipes are at a great distance from the singer.

But it has also been brought forward that, admitting the use of orchestral instruments, Franz's instrumentation (regarded simply as a matter of scoring) is bad and ineffective. To this I can reply intelligently only after hearing a Franz-Bach score performed as it was intended to be. Yet there are certain facts which are suggestive of much. At the performance last season of the St. Matthew Passion, no one could have overlooked the fact that the soprano air "Aus Liebe will mein Heiland sterben," accompanied by two flutes and a clarinet, made a more thoroughly fine effect, in respect to the harmonious blending of voice and instruments, than did any other solo number in which obligato wind instruments were used. Is this superior effect to be attributed to the fact that here we had only the original parts (which, in this instance, are complete in themselves, there being no basso continuo), and that Franz had had no hand in the matter? To my mind, it is simply and solely to be attributed to the very different fact that in this air, and in this air alone, the flute and clarinet players left their usual posts at the back of the orchestra, and placed themselves immediately beside the singer. In the other solo numbers, where obligato parts for wind instruments were played from the middle or rear ranks of the orchestra, — that is, at a distance from the singer, — the effect of Bach's original parts was just as bad as that of Franz's additional clarinet and bassoon parts. Let us once try the effect of placing Franz's reed quartet, together with the original obligato instruments, in a compact group around the singer, with one or two double-basses and 'celli immediately behind them, and then see whether Franz's scoring is bad or not! Until such an experiment has been made, no one has the right to judge it.

It would be too much to claim for Franz to say that what he has done for Bach and Handel scores leaves nothing to be regretted. Perfection is a hard thing to arrive at, especially in so extremely difficult a matter. Perhaps in some instances he has allowed his native genius to overstep the true limits — that is very possible. Yet cannot we pardon such excesses, when we realize the fact that none but a genius like his could have accomplished the admirable work he has done? Writing "additional accompaniments" in free counterpoint is not a thing that requires musical skill and training merely; a man must have the true sacred fire in him to feel himself warranted to attempt such a task, and if he cannot at all times quite restrain his genius, let us be consoled by the thought that that genius alone could have done the great work at all. And, upon the whole, who, save Mozart, has done this sort of work so well as Franz, with all his occasional redundancy?

And now a few earnest words to those persons who think that Franz's admirers have exercised, or tend to exercise, an unfortunate influence upon modern musical productiveness by their praises of his work on Bach and Handel scores. It has been said that these men would put a check upon original composition, and have composers to-day seek their highest glory in mere editor's back-work; that Franz himself, a man of undoubtedly rare and high musical gifts, has nothing to show for himself but some sets of songs with pianoforte accompaniment, and his "additional accompaniments" to Bach and Handel. But tell me, in Heaven's name, have Brahms or Raff, by their symphonies, has Gounod, by his operas, or Wagner by his music-dramas, done the world of music a service that can be compared in value with that of putting the great St. Matthew Passion into a performable shape? One thing they assuredly have done; they have won more glory for themselves. Brahms has set his stamp upon the times with his C-minor symphony; Gounod is known as the composer of "Faust," whereas Franz is but called the "editor" of Bach. Not a very high-sounding title, although we may remember what a mess Brahms once made of it when he turned his hand to this sort of "editing." But it seems to me that this is looking at the question from a totally false point of view. Franz has done the world of music a very eminent service; let that be enough, and let his glory take care of itself. So soon as a man writes music "for the sake of glory," he has himself to look to; that is not the world's business in the least; if he thinks he can set his stamp upon the times, and feels that his stamp is worth setting, let him try his uttermost to do so, but he must work long and give strong and convincing proofs of his mettle before he can claim any encouragement from his contemporaries. A young musician may have the ambition to write a symphony; very well, let him do so if he please, but let him remember also that the world is in no want of symphonies unless they be supremely fine ones; that no living mortal, save his personal friends and his music-teacher, cares one jot whether he writes a symphony or not, and that the chances are strongly in favor of his contributing to that limbo of shot-rubbish which no one will care to pick over. Encourage him at the outset? Why he has no earthly claim upon encouragement, any more than I have upon the votes of the community at the next presidential election. But if that same young musician sets himself to write "additional accompaniments" to a Bach or Handel score, we know in the beginning that his task is a high one; the world of music absolutely needs as much of Bach and Handel as it can get, and he should be encouraged to the uttermost. The chances of his doing the work well are not great, to be sure, but we cannot afford to lose even such chances as they are. I cannot think that personal ambition in the fine arts is a thing that can fairly claim sympathy or encouragement. It seems to me even that the man of genius who throws personal ambition to the dogs, and does his best to serve art, is a more respectable person than he who has the vanity to suppose the welfare of art to be identified with himself, and works for art cum gloria, rather than for art alone.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHICAGO, NOV. 15. — There was nothing particularly of interest, in the last week of the Strakosch opera, except a performance of Rigoletto, in which Signor Storte had the title rôle, and the appearance of Mlle. Singer as Norma. The daily press here gave very enthusiastic notices of her performance, and again I find myself unable to follow them in their unqualified commendation. She gave the character a fine dramatic interpretation, but musically she did not afford me much pleasure. The use of the tremolo marred her execution, until in rapid passages it was almost impossible to follow the notes with a satisfying certainty. Her acting however fine, could hardly compensate for a false method of singing. The lyric stage demands artists skilled vocally, as well as dramatically. A happy union of these two talents brings the possessor into the higher ranks of artistic life, and wins for him the admiration of the world. In these days the advent of a truly great dramatic prima donna would be an event to hail with delight, for we have far too few in the world's catalogue of artists.

Thursday evening the Beethoven Society gave its first reunion, offering the following programme: —

- Adante and Variations, for Piano and 'Cello Mendelssohn.
Messrs. Wolfsohn and Eichheim.
Quintet: "Bethania," for Voices Lassen.
Miss Dutton, Mrs. Johnson, Messrs. Knorr,
Gill, and Morawski.
Concerto Militaire, for Violin Buzzi.
Mr. Mark Kaiser.
Aria: "Honor and Arms," from "Samson" . . . Handel.
Mr. Ivan Morawski.
{ Lorely Seeling.
{ Toccata (Manuscript) Brandeis.
Mr. Carl Wolfsohn.
Horn Quartet: "Pilgrim's Chorus" Wagner.
(From Tannhäuser.)
Messrs. Schantz, Beckmann, White and Bruus.
Quartet, for Piano and String Instruments . Rheinberger.
Messrs. Wolfsohn, Rosenbecker, Allen, and Eichheim.

These reunions are given every month by the society to its patrons, and are intended to afford an opportunity for the performance of chamber music, while their larger concerts are devoted to great choral works. The Andante of Mendelssohn was well performed. The vocal Quintet by Lassen is a very pretty composition, giving a solo to each voice, followed by a graceful refrain in which the voices blend with a harmonious nicety, that still admits of contrast. Mr. Ivan Morawski, a baritone, from New York, made his first appearance this season, singing the Aria from Handel's Samson, in a correct style, and with a voice that was very agreeable to listen to. The Quartet by Rheinberger, which closed the concert, was very happily performed, the gentlemen being in sympathy with each other, and interested in the work they were interpreting.

Wilhelmj and Herr Vogrich appeared at a concert in aid of the "Alexian Brothers' Hospital." The great violinist played a concerto by Paganini; "Andante and Intermezzo" by Vogrich, and the "Hungarian dances" of Brahms. The musical world knows how grandly Wilhelmj plays, and it is only necessary to state that he made an appearance in public, for all lovers of the art to understand what pleasure had been given the audience. The violin composition by Mr. Vogrich was enthusiastically received. The audience gave the composer the honor of an acknowledgment by calling him before them to receive their applause.

The Chamber Concert, at Read's Temple of Music, offered this programme: —

- (1.) Trio, No. 1 Haydn.
Miss Ingersoll, Messrs. Lewis and Eichheim.
(2.) Romance from 2d Concerto, Op. 27 . . . Wieniawski.
Wm. Lewis.
(3.) Andante from Trio, Op. 12 Hummel.
(4.) Romanza "Alla Stella Confidente" . . . Robaudi.
Mr. C. H. Brittan.
Cello Obligato by Mr. Eichheim.
(5.) Trio, Op. 102 Raff.

The instrumental portion of the programme was very enjoyable, and the audience expressed their appreciation by a close attention, and by keeping that silence that shows that the charm of the music is the ruling power in the assemblage.

The Chamber Concerts at Hershey Hall have given us the following trios: Mozart's in E No. 3; the "Ghost Trio," Op. 70, Beethoven; Trio in C minor (manuscript), F. G. Gleason; and Trio in F, Op. 42, Gade. They were played by Messrs. Eddy, Lewis, and Eichheim. We are having a larger number of concerts of this class than ever before, and it gives the music student a fine opportunity to acquaint himself with works of this character.

Monday evening last, Mr. Emil Liebling gave his first recital of pianoforte music, presenting these numbers:—

- (1.) Trio, D minor, Op. 63 Schumann.
- Messrs. Liebling, Lewis, and Balaska.
- (2.) Tenor Aria. Crispino e La Comare . . . Ricci.
- Mr. Ed. Schultze.
- (3.) { a. Menuetto, Op. 17, No. 2 Moszkowski.
- { b. Gavotte, Op. 123, No. 1 Reinecke.
- Emil Liebling.
- (4.) Sonata, Op. 7 Grieg.
- Emil Liebling.
- (5.) Song, "Impatience" Schubert.
- Mr. Ed. Schultze.
- (6.) { a. Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2 } Chopin.
- { b. Barcarolle, Op. 60 }
- { a. Polonaise, Op. 13 }
- (7.) { b. Etude, Op. 27, No. 6 } Scharwenka.
- { c. Polonaise, Op. 14, No. 2 } Rubinstein.

Mr. Liebling has a good technique, plenty of power, and he is what may be termed a brilliant player. His conception is marked by artistic intelligence, and many of his interpretations have a charm about them that seems to come from his own idea rather than from following any particular school of pianoforte playing. With my own taste his ideas do not always accord, for I miss an inner sense in his playing that should touch the feelings so truly that they would be drawn into a perfect sympathy with the interpretation. One may admire the pianist who plays with ease, grace and brilliancy, but the player whose music goes directly to the heart makes a home there, even for himself.

At the present time, while our city is all excitement on account of General Grant's visit, and while there is a perfect rush of receptions, banquets, and army reunions, and the whole fashionable and business circle seems given up to rounds of gayety, comes Herr Joseffy, the great pianist, to give some pianoforte recitals. Amid all this excitement it is not to be wondered that he is greeted by only small audiences, for it is only the faithful few who are mindful of the claims of this great player, and who quietly pass beyond the din of military displays, and pay a willing homage to this able representative of high art. I have had the pleasure of listening to two concerts by Joseffy, and would express one word of delight for the enjoyment he gave. The programmes were the same as those given in your city but a short time since, and I will not therefore transcribe them. It seems to me that human ability can go no further in regard to technique; for delicacy, refinement, and well measured contrasts are manifested in such a perfect manner as to deprive criticism of even a foundation for comment. The only way that I can regard the playing of Joseffy is to think that music, being a universal art, has many means for manifesting the beautiful in sound, and that in this remarkable playing may be found the delicate shadings, the softly caressing utterances, and that brilliancy that is fairy-like in its grace, carried on to the utmost limit of human perfection. In that sphere of art where grace and delicacy are controlling powers, one must place Joseffy, as their master. He does not represent the heroic side, after the manner of a Rubinstein, perhaps, nor the intellectuality of Von Bülow, but the poetic grace of a nature attuned to the more delicate phases of art is manifested in such a remarkable way as to class him with the most wonderful players that the world has produced. As master of the delicate phases of pianoforte playing he seems to stand apart from all the rest of the world, not perhaps greater than others who have visited us before, but as an interpreter of a new and different character.

C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., NOV. 15. — The Heine Quartette gave a concert of chamber music here, Nov. 8, with the following programme:—

- (1.) String Quartet, Op. 17 Rubinstein.
- (2.) Sonata, for Piano and Violin, Op. 8 Grieg.
- (3.) Serenade for Violin, Viola, and Cello, Op. 8 Beethoven.
- (4.) Piano Quartet, Op. 108, No. 2 Reissiger.
- (Two Movements.)

The Rubinstein Quartet is an interesting but not a great work, for its themes, though treated in a musician-like way, are not intrinsically noble or inspiring. He seems to be most at home in the invention of sentimental melodies of no great depth. — The Grieg Sonata is freaky and disjointed. Grieg seems to be at his best in short piano pieces, "Character-stücke." — The Reissiger Quartet was pleasing, even after Beethoven. The defects of the performance were a tone lacking in breadth, and often more or less rough and scratchy, and the immaturity of conception here and there inseparable from the youth of the players. Its merits were a clear and sure execution and conscientious interpretation up to the limits of their present capacity.

Grau's Opera Company gave Fatinitza here Nov. 10, 11, 12, and gave it very poorly. There was not a singer of any great merit, and the orchestra was ridiculously small.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE first concert of the sixty-fifth season by the Handel and Haydn Society will be given in Music Hall to-morrow evening, when Mr. Arthur Sullivan will make his first appearance in the United States and direct the performance of his overture In Memoriam and his oratorio The Prodigal Son. The programme will also include the Halle-lujah chorus from Beethoven's The Mount of Olives and Berlioz's The Flight into Egypt. The soloists of the evening will be Miss Edith Abell, Miss May Bryant, Mr. W. J. Winch, and Mr. J. F. Winch.

The third concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, last evening, offered: Overture to Manfred, Schumann; Serenade in D minor, Op. 69, for strings only, R. Volkmann ('cello solo by Wulf Fries); Grieg's Piano Concerto, Op. 16, played by Herr S. Liebling; Liszt's "Les Preludes;" "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saëns; Turkish March, Michaelis; Polonaise from Meyerbeer's Struensee. Mr. Liebling was down also for a Minuetto by Schubert, and a Pasquade by Gottschalk; and Miss Fanny Kellogg for two new songs: "Ever near thee," by Raff, and "On a March night," by Taubert.

Mr. Arthur Foote last Saturday evening gave an Organ Concert at the First Church, in which he played: Prelude and Fugue in C, by Bach; Handel's second Concerto, in B-flat; Mendelssohn's Sonata in F minor; Allegretto, by Gade, and a March by Moscheles. Vocal quartets were sung by Miss Louisa Gage, Mrs. Jennie M. Noyes, Mr. W. H. Fessenden, and Mr. C. E. Hay. Every seat in the church was occupied.

In the advertisement of the New England Conservatory of Music, in another column, the advantages of the Conservatory method of musical education are set forth seriatim and in full. The reasons are clearly and concisely given, and cannot easily be gainsaid, whatever may be said in favor of separate individual instruction.

Subscription lists for the fifteenth season of Harvard Symphony Concerts remain at the Music Hall and music stores through the present month. Subscribers may select their seats and receive their tickets on the first three days of December, after which the public sale will be opened. The first concert will be December 11. The orchestra will have for its nucleus the Philharmonic Orchestra, with about double its number of strings, and with Mr. Bernard Listemann at the head of the violins, Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducting. The first programme is as follows:—

1. Overture to "Rosamunde" Schubert.
2. Triple Concerto, for piano, violin, and 'cello Beethoven.
3. Marche de Nuit, from "L'Enfance du Christ" Berlioz.
4. Overture to "Hilp van Winkle" (first time) G. W. Chadwick.
5. Fifth Symphony (C minor) Beethoven.

Joseffy will give three more concerts in Boston early in the winter.

Mr. Charles R. Adams, who has had so much experience as leading tenor in the Imperial Opera at Vienna, offers to prepare pupils for the operatic stage, — certainly a rare opportunity. He also has a plan for establishing a local operatic society upon a solid footing in this city. The Sunday Herald tells us: "His plan contemplates the organization of an operatic singing society upon a similar plan to that of the other singing societies, depending upon a list of subscription members to assume the expenses of the society, as in the Boylston, Apollo, and Cecilia clubs. The enjoyment offered in the study of operatic music will certainly attract an excellent membership for the actual work of the new organization, and the opportunity to hear standard operas given by fresh voices from the ranks of Boston singers will unquestionably prove attractive to patrons of other club organizations. Mr. Adams will, by his plan, practically give to Boston an operatic training school, and, with such an established institution, it seems hardly possible that this city will be left without good English opera performances in the future, as it has been so largely in the past. The success of Crown Diamonds showed what can be done in this direction, and Mr. Adams should meet with generous support in his new undertaking. Mr. Adams contemplates beginning work on Tannhäuser, or Lohengrin, and following with Halevy's L'Eclair and Herold's Le Pré aux Clercs."

Kemenyi, the Hungarian violinist, gave a concert at Wellesley College, Nov. 10, in which he played the Scena Cantabile of Spohr; transcriptions from Schubert and Chopin; his own "Valse Noble;" the Chaconne of Bach; a Paganini Etude; and a transcription (his own, of course) of Rossini's "Largo al factotum," with an introductory Cadenza!

NEW YORK. — The Oratorio Society, conducted by Dr. Leopold Damrosch, announces its seventh season. Elijah will be given at the first, and the Messiah at the second, concert. For the last concert is promised the first complete performance in New York of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music. This will be given in St. George's Church, and not, like the other oratorios, in Steinway Hall. The soloists already secured for the season are Miss Thursty, Miss Drasdil, and Messrs. Simpson, M. W. Whitney, and Remmertz.

Mr. Wilhelm Müller, "Solo Violoncellist to H. M. the Emperor of Germany," announces a series of four chamber-music soirées, of which Mr. Müller naively declares: "In plan and character these soirées will be similar to those given in Berlin by the celebrated 'Joachim Quartette,' of which the undersigned was a member." These soirées will be given at Steinway Hall, and the dates will be November 26th, December 23d, January 20th, and February 17th; and Miss Lina Anton, and Messrs. S. B. Mills, Max Pinner, and Franz Rummel are promised as soloists. — Musical Review.

Of "Her Majesty's Opera" the Review says: "Already eleven subscription nights of the Opera season have elapsed, and, except some good representations of Linda, Faust, and Martha, Mr. Mapleson has been unable to discharge his promises to his subscribers and the public. Our London correspondent was probably informed by some of Mr. Mapleson's friends there that Mlle. Marimon had been engaged and was soon to sail to this city. There is good reason to believe that Mlle. Marimon is ready to accept Mr. Mapleson's offer, provided that she could see some money in advance, and that Mr. Mapleson's agent failing to do that the lady refuses to leave. A rumor is also in circulation to the effect that Mr. Mapleson knew that Mme. E. Gerster was not coming to America this season when the manager of "Her Majesty's Opera" invited our public to take seats at the Academy at an advanced price. It seems that Mme. Gerster is not altogether satisfied with the manner Mr. Mapleson discharged his part of the late contract with her. At any rate, it is time for Mr. Mapleson to make a formal announcement of his intentions. He has received a large sum of money from us, promising to give us what he has not given us. His present company may be excellent, but he has pledged to give us more than that. We hear that he is trying to raise money here in order to satisfy Mlle. Marimon's demands. We hope he may succeed, and, furthermore, we wish he would enable us to contradict all these rumors."

The first of the five chamber-music soirées of the New York Philharmonic Club occurred on Wednesday evening of last week in Chickering Hall. The programme included Beethoven's String Quintet, G major, Opus 29; Concerto, A minor, for pianoforte, flute, and violin, by Bach, with accompaniment of string quintet; String Quartet, G minor, by Grieg; a piano solo by Miss Florence Copleston, who also played in the Bach concerto; and songs by Miss Antonio Henne, soprano.

The season of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society has opened brilliantly. The Academy of Music was crowded at the first rehearsal yesterday afternoon, and Mr. Theodore Thomas, who returns as conductor, received a cordial greeting. Everything indicates that this will be the most brilliant season in the history of the society. The sale of seats is unprecedentedly large, and the musical features will be exceptionally attractive. The programme yesterday included the "King Lear" overture of Berlioz, the Tchaikowski Piano Concerto, played by Mr. Franz Rummel, Siegmund's Love Song, from Wagner's "Walküre," sung by Signor Campanini; "Siegfried's Death," from "Die Gotterdämmerung," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. The first concert will take place this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. — Tribune, Nov. 18.

FOREIGN.

LONDON. — The fourth Crystal Palace Concert, Mr. Manns, conductor, offered Schumann's Symphony in C, Aria (Queen of Night), from Mozart's Zauberflöte, sung by Mme. Schuch-Proaska; Allegro con brio, for violin and orchestra (in C), Beethoven, solo violin, Mr. Carrodus; Gavotte and Titania's Aria from Mignon; Romanes and Rondo, from Molique's Violin Concerto in A minor; and "Dance of the Hours," Ballette, from "La Gioconda," by A. Ponchielli (first time). The event of the concert and the week was the performance of the first movement of the unfinished Violin Concerto by Beethoven, only recently brought to light. Hellmesberger completed it, making use of the motives and designs contained in the portion written, and it was produced for the first time in Vienna at the centenary of the birth of Beethoven. The MS. was preserved in the library of the Viennese Society of the Friends of Music. It is an early work, apparently contemporaneous with the Septour, the Prometheus ballet, and the first Symphony (say 1800); its principal theme indeed is strikingly analogous with that of the Symphony in the same key. But it is of slight value compared with the great Beethoven Concerto in D, and evidently Beethoven did not think it worth while to go on with it. It has only the interest of a curiosity.

Miss Lillian Bailey's success in London has been very decided. After her triumph at the Monday popular concert on the 3d inst., she was at once engaged for the oratorio of Judas Maccabeus, at Manchester, and for a performance of Max Bruch's Lay of the Bell, conducted by Bruch himself. Miss Bailey, at the Monday popular concert, sang recitative and aria, "Lusinghe più care," by Handel, and the cavatina, "Und ob die Wolke," from Weber's Der Freischütz. The London Times says, "Miss Bailey sang extremely well, and was recalled after both songs."

LEIPZIG. — Gewandhaus Concert (October 9): Overture, "Genoveva" (Schumann); Violin Concerto, D minor (Spohr); Violin Suite (Reinecke); Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven); Vocal Soli. Easter Concert (October 21): Overture, "Leonore" (Beethoven); Violin Concerto (Mendelssohn); Symphony, A major (Rubinstein); Vocal Soli. Gewandhaus Concert (October 23): Concerto for Violoncello (Popper); Symphony, E flat major (Haydn); Violoncello Solo pieces (Chopin, Popper, Monsigny); Air from "Euryanthe" (Weber), etc.

"IDOMENEO" IN VIENNA.¹

A NOTABLE event took place the day before yesterday at the Imperial Opera-House; Mozart's grand heroic opera of Idomeneo was performed there. The words: "For the first time" figuring in the playbill applied, however, only to the new house. The real first performance of Idomeneo in Vienna was given on the 13th of May, 1806, and then, after four other representations, the work reposed for full thirteen years, down to 1819, when all attempts at reanimating it entirely ceased. It was not, consequently, for Vienna, but for the present race of those here who love music that Idomeneo passed for the first time over the boards. The most venerable old gentlemen whose shiny white heads were scattered about the pit could, at most, only have been "taken" as little boys when Idomeneo was given here for the first time.

Performances of this work are everywhere seldom, but Dresden, Munich, and Berlin long since set us a good example. In other cities the plan (now adopted here also) of performing in chronological succession all Mozart's operas led to the resumption of Idomeneo; such was the case in Frankfurt, where even the composer's Zaida was included in the series. The limits of this musico-historical festival were extended in grand style two years ago at Cassel; from a series of Mozart-performances there sprang an entire history of German opera in eighteen stage-representations, the first work being Gluck's Iphigenie and the last Wagner's Lohengrin. Between these came the most remarkable operas of Mozart, Dittersdorf, Winter, Weigl, Beethoven, Spohr, Weber, Marschner, Kreutzer, Meyerbeer, Schubert, Lortzing, Schumann, Nicolai, and Flotow. This was a brilliant and, moreover, in the present deplorable dearth of novelties, a very practical notion.

A performance of Idomeneo demands nowadays almost as much courage as trouble.

We offer, therefore, the management of the Imperial Opera-House our warmest thanks, for we had long since abandoned the hope of meeting the much-tryed King of Crete elsewhere than in the score. The feelings with which, after studying it afresh, I clapped to that score, did not, I frankly confess, allow me to build very courageously and confidently on the success of the performance. I entered the theatre rather cast down, but found my expectations greatly exceeded both in the impression produced by the opera on myself directly and in the effect it had on the public. Grave doubts as to the success of the work were fairly admissible. The mere fact that a grand opera like Idomeneo, dating from the period of its composer's greatest freshness, never could obtain a firm footing anywhere, is a striking phenomenon, as is also the circumstance that, when the worship of Mozart was strongest, this same Idomeneo was performed extremely seldom. This cannot be caused by external obstacles alone (such, for instance, as difficulty in casting, getting up, etc.); without some internal reason existing in the work itself, it appears to me inconceivable and abnormal that the latter would have been neglected in Vienna for over sixty years. As I sat anxiously awaiting the performance, everything risky struck me as being doubly so. Is the opera possible? I kept asking myself. First comes the libretto! That is the source of all mischief. The book of Idomeneo is in bad taste, empty, wearisome, and all in the indescribably antiquated garb proper to the mythological opera of gods and heroes. What a ereotyped stage figures! The King is to sacrifice his son for the purpose of appeasing the wrath of Neptune, but prefers laying down his own life, while the son offers himself for his father, and the son's beloved is ready to perish for the young man, till at last a tin-voiced oracle cuts through this coil of noble sentiments, and re-unites, alive and contented, those who have so worried themselves for nothing. All these exalted kings, princes, princesses, and high priests, with their proud gestures and exaggerated phrases, smell mouldy. I would simply direct attention to the fact that the libretto, so antiquated for us, was old-fashioned even when the Abbé Varesco, of Salzburg, cobbled it together for Mozart in 1780. Campra, the French composer, had set the same story seventy years previously, and had his "Tragédie lyrique," Idoménée, performed at the Paris Grand Opera in 1712. It is incomprehensible how the old Italian Court festival opera, that artificial exotic, could keep its ground so long in Germany; and it is incomprehensible how these lifeless figures, with their hollow and pompous verses, could exist ten years after Goethe wrote his Götz von Berlichingen.

And how injuriously the old libretto influenced the musical form of Idomeneo! The opera contains, exclusive of the very numerous and very long recitatives, six-and-twenty numbers; with the exception of a duet, a trio, and a quartet, together with a few marches and choral movements, these numbers are all airs. Leaving out of consideration the subordinate part of the high priest, which is written for a bass, Idomeneo requires exclusively high voices. One tenor (Ido- meneo) is pitted against three soprano parts, for Idamante was really intended for a castrato. These are arrangements which, utterly undramatic, strike us nowadays as simply unnatural; yet Mozart conformed to these rules of the old opera seria, which appear only partially vivified and brightened up by French influences, especially Gluck's. Thus, the music of Idomeneo belongs partly to the weakly bravura style of Italian opera seria, and partly to the stiff pathos of French tragedy. When one of the personages begins an air, it sounds as though he did so for the purpose of publicly making a speech about his feelings. Even the motive is mostly set forth in a highly impressive, sharply defined manner, as though the speaker were undertaking to prove a thesis. The working out, too, of the theme is conducted with the same cumbersome regularity which the incipient rhetorician learns in his "Chria:" the broadest development, numberless repetitions of words and sentences, and, finally, a bravura appendix as a Captatio benevolentia. This kind of vocal solo is totally unknown to us in modern opera, and still more so to the singer of the present day, as he discovers in his despair. Yet, despite all this, we must repeat, Idomeneo produced an unexpectedly strong impression on the assembly. You felt under the spell of a high and noble artistic mind. Mozart's incomparable genius holds sway here like some irresistible force of nature, bursting like the light and warmth of the sun through mouldering hedges and rotten hangings. When he wrote Idomeneo, he was in all the strength of youth; four-and-twenty in years, and fifty in his knowledge of art. He was able to fill the old operatic forms with precious material; he did not yet dare to put them on one side. How quickly, however, he freed himself from the constraint of superannuated formulas is proved by Die Entführung aus dem Serail, written the same year; in that work, the pathetic style of Constance is already surrounded by natural truthfulness replete with life and healthy humor. And only five years later he created Figaro and Don Juan, those first and unequalled models of a musical style, at once ideal and realistic, wherein the sensual beauty of the music grows simultaneously with the most animated dramatic expression. This was a newly discovered world of which former musicians had no presentiment, ay, a world which even Mozart himself, when he wrote Idomeneo, saw only as a dream. Don Juan, Figaro, and Die Zauberflöte — these are, properly speaking, the three mighty adversaries handed against Idomeneo. With these, the later Mozart supplanted the earlier. Directly we experienced in Don Juan, for the first time on the operatic stage, the glowing actuality of life, and distinguished in all the melodies the pulsation of our own feelings and desires — from that moment, Idomeneo necessarily struck us as strange, cold, and unintelligible. Idomeneo represents that uninterrupted, straight line of sublimity against which the mixture of tragedy and humor in Don Juan stands out so refreshingly, like a drama by Shakespeare against one by Corneille or Racine. Idomeneo was driven back, — and for a long time, too, — but not set aside, by Mozart's later operas; works of this kind may be overshadowed, but certainly not annihilated. The more our musically unproductive age, so poor in genius, busies itself with the masterpieces of a former period, the deeper and broader must become our interest in the historical connection of art, the more irresistibly is our attention directed to the forgotten Idomeneo.

Thus it came to pass that, on October 25th, every seat in the Opera-House, Vienna, was occupied by an audience who had brought with them not merely the proper reverential feeling, but, what is more, a delightful impressionability, and who allowed themselves to be impartially influenced by every beauty in the work. A mere success of respect, such as we feared, fell to the lot of the first act alone; the conclusion of the second act and the whole of the third found the public deeply moved. The triumph of young Mozart was here genuine and unconditional. The first act is that least calculated to enlist our sympathies; its predominating features are a monotonous succession of long recitatives and airs, and the dragging character of the ever pathetic, but effeminate melody. After what Mozart gave us in Don Juan, we cannot consider, for instance, the moving situation, when Idomeneo first meets his son, as musically rendered with sufficient energy. In the concluding scene of the first act, the music would probably strike us as poor, had we not the very picturesque ballet whereon to feast our eyes. We cannot say whether Alexander the Great would, as Oulibicheff assures us, have chosen no music save the D-major march for his entry into Babylon, but every one will remark with interest the enormous distance between the pale solemnity of the ceremonial music in Idomeneo and the swelling magnificence of our marches in Le Prophète and Tannhäuser nowadays. The second act — just like the first and the third — is opened by Ilia with an air; her sweet theme, "Se il Padre perdei," exhibits at the very third bar a direct tendency to Tamino's "Air with the Portrait," and a smile lighted up the faces of the audience as though at a joyful and unexpected meeting. The succeeding celebrated pieces, Idomeneo's air in D major (from which the rich bravura work has been broken out down to the tiniest stone), and the grand trio, did not appear to quite equal the high expectations which reverential readers had brought with them to the theatre after reading the masterly analyses of Otto Jahn and Oulibicheff. On the other hand, the grandiose final scene, with the storm and the appearance of the sea-monster, produced all due effect. This scene — a musico-historical monument from the way in which it was rendered with a power hitherto unknown by the orchestra and chorus — carries us away, as though it had been composed only yesterday, and composed, be it observed, by Mozart. It is considered the climax of the opera, and as such we, too, regarded it, till the animated performance revealed to us all the grandeur of the third act, before which everything that precedes, even the sea storm, must give way. The Raphael-like, serious beauty of the quartet, the exalted melancholy of the G minor chorus (with the high priest), and lastly, the whole of the grand scene of the sacrifice in the temple, produced a profound and gradually increasing effect. Nothing here reminds us of the rococo form and stilted style of the old heroic opera, but might without more ado take its place in Don Juan.

The management of the Opera-House and the public brought to the performance of Idomeneo a laudable quality: respect for what is great and classical. Both were richly rewarded, since they derived from the opera a more lively impression than they anticipated. Even granting that Idomeneo, though it is the duty and the desire of every educated person to become acquainted with it, may not draw, its success will certainly not be inferior to that achieved by Die Valkyrie, Die Macbeth, and other similar works, while the management of the Opera-House will, at least, have the consciousness of having fulfilled a noble duty — of having, in an æsthetic sense, behaved properly. This holds good likewise of the way in which the opera was put on the stage. Most managers think that, when getting up old classical operas, they may be very close and economical; that the music alone will do everything. For works of the Idomeneo school this would be an exceedingly pernicious maxim, which the management of the Imperial Opera-House has fortunately avoided. The mise-en-scène was in every respect magnificent. Concerning the embodiment of the sea-monster alone, we have our serious doubts. There dances over the waves a kind of gigantic bat, surmounted, to the surprise of every one, by a venerable head, with a long white beard. But the scene requires an actual and entire monster, and not one reaching merely to the neck; let us have, therefore, a fire-spitting dragon, instead of a winged rabbi. The principal characters were admirably cast. Of course, the style of Idomeneo, requiring as it does the art of broad-sustained song quite as much as virtuoso-like bravura, is strange to, and partially beyond the reach of, our singers, brought up in the music of Meyerbeer, Verdi, and Wagner. Measured by a strict Mozart-standard, the singing was unquestionably not perfect. We leave it to others to try offenders, and frankly own with respect to the relative excellence of all the leading artists charged with so difficult a task that we were much pleased and somewhat surprised. Mmes. Ehnn and Materna, Herren Müller and Labatt, fully deserved the applause so liberally bestowed on them. An especial acknowledgment is due, likewise, to the Capellmeister, Herr Fuchs, for shortening, with taste and skill, the score (no longer presentable in its original shape), simplifying some things and touching up others, as required, at one time by the idiosyncrasies of the singers, and, at another, by the exigencies of the operatic stage. Under his inspiring guidance, the entire performance went off admirably.

EDUARD HANSLICK:

VIENNA, October 27.

ON ROBERT SCHUMANN'S "MUSIC AND MUSICIANS."

BY F. L. RITTER.

MADAME RITTER, in the preface to Schumann's "Music and Musicians," says: "From his reviews and criticisms — based as they are on the firm foundation of thorough knowledge enlivened by the vital breath of poetical and philosophical reflection, and by such an occasional flash of humor as sheds clear light on many questions, whose solution we may vainly seek by the gleam of the student lamp, a code of musical æsthetics might be gathered." To this passage a writer in Macmillan's Magazine, Mr. E. Gurney, opposes his æsthetic views about music, and thinks "it will perhaps be tolerably clear that a 'code of musical æsthetics,' such as the translator of the book before us has imagined to be discoverable in Schumann's writings, is something of which it is very hard to see the meaning and probability." Now, Mme. Ritter does not stand alone in the above opinion; others, and no lesser authorities than Dr. Franz Lietz and Dr. Ambros, imagined they had discovered excellent material for a code of musical æsthetics in Schumann's writings. However, Mr. Gurney, as we shall presently see, does not place much faith in the writings of musicians; it will therefore, perhaps, be instructive to examine Mr. Gurney's claims as a musical critic, especially as he is one of that class of amateur musical writers whose æsthetic views stand in direct opposition to those of the professional musician.

In his article on Schumann's writings, in the above Magazine, he says: "It (music) is supposed to be a mysterious art, and so technically abstruse that none but professors of it can know exactly what they are at, and be justified in speaking authoritatively on the subject; those who can write fugues must, it is thought, be in some way able to expound them."¹ Here le bout d'oreille of the amateur pierces visibly through; the reader at once gains the presentiment that the authority of the professor on musical subjects will in future be greatly shaken by the searching and infallible criticism of Mr. Gurney, who tells us distinctly that not much light is to be expected from the criticism of the professor, for "modern life," says Mr. Gurney, "which has fostered self-consciousness and introspection in many directions, doubtless furnishes examples of artists who have ventured on the perilous path of analysis; but the results hardly seem to establish, for the criticism of a creator, any special claim to clearness and acumen."

Those musicians who are under the impression that music expresses more than Mr. Gurney's criticism is willing to allow, will not receive much countenance from this æsthetic writer. He says, in an article in the Nineteenth Century ("On Music and Musical Criticism"): "Nor again will musicians be reduced by jealousy for the dignity of their art to prop it up by unreal supports and connections; and it is this latter tendency which I am most concerned to resist, inasmuch as music, like many other things, suffers most from its friends." Of course, in order to "prop up" his theory on real "supports and connections," this writer finds it necessary first to attempt to fashion some substantial pillars out of the elementary material of music. Amateur musical æstheticians are very fond of exhibiting their knowledge of musical theory; but, having acquired merely a smattering of the difficult subject, their attempts in this direction are generally failures. Mr. Gurney's similar attempt, as we shall presently see, has not been much of a success either. In the above article (Nineteenth Century) he tells us: "The central idea in my argument, which will affect its bearing in every detail, is the independent and isolated position of the emotions caused by music; and this I shall try to present both as a deduction and as a fact." Now let us examine, so far as space will allow, the substantial pillars, upon which this argument is placed. "The prime element in music," we are told, "is melody, i. e., notes in succession." Here the above writer announces himself at once as the "melodic" critic. "Melody is the amateur's war cry," says Schumann; and though melody, in a mere general sense, is to be considered as the supreme quality of any musical composition, a critical method, which rests on such a one-sided idea, describing the roof of the palace before the adequately built walls are visible, will not enlist much confidence on the part of the connoisseur. The intelligent musician, endeavoring to lay down the laws for "musical criticism," would no doubt begin his theory by considering tone as the prime element in music; and only then, when a second element, rhythm, has taken hold of the isolated sounds, poured life into them, the pulse beat, is a third agent possible, namely, melody. The musician will with right insist that the philosophical investigation of the elementary means of music be presented somewhat in chronological order. Random talk, be it ever so spiritual, cannot build up an available theory. The aesthetician, who overlooks this fundamental principle, will founder before he reaches the desired port.

In general, it cannot be affirmed that Mr. Gurney has given proof, while on the "perilous path of analysis," regarding melody and rhythm (his chronological order), of any "special claims to clearness and acumen." He mixes up melody and rhythm in a most distressing manner. "Melodic rhythm, in relation to the otherwise meaningless succession of sounds, may be better compared to light, revealing itself and objects at one instant of indivisible effect, and depending for its value on that with which it is associated." What is a melodic rhythm? Rhythm regulates harmony as well; it also appears often isolated. According to this writer's method we should have to admit three kinds of rhythm: the melodic, and the rhythmical rhythm.

This æsthetic aperçu is decidedly a confusion of subject matter. Mr. Gurney, however, does not admit rhythm as an element having its own meaning independent of melody; for he says, "Nor is the rhythm in any sense a frame-work or mould to be separately appraised, as in some degree the metre of a stanza may be considered the mould for the meaning to be poured into." We see that the writer has not much comprehension of the power and æsthetic importance of rhythm. Rhythm, as well as melody and harmony, has a right to be considered by itself, from an æsthetic point of view; it regulates the whole organism of a composition, impresses its characteristic marks on the very physiognomy of a musical artwork. To say "it is a self-understood fact that the rhythm regulates melody and harmony," is taking a too narrow view of the subject. The character of a certain succession of tones, called melody, or that of a harmonious passage, may be eminently changed by changing the rhythm. Such a rhythmical change alone is capable of conveying to our mind the idea of a new emotional meaning and expression. Had Mr. Gurney felt the æsthetic significance of rhythm, he would, no doubt, have discovered more in music than his article gives proof of.

"The fundamental principle of rhythm, equal measurement, is, as we have seen, common to all music, while a special rhythm may be common to several melodies, the identity being clearly marked and obvious to the ear. On the other hand the systems supplying the note-material, or available pitch-intervals (!), have been many; and confining ourselves to our modern scale-system, it could only be a matter of curiosity, in no way capable of striking the ear, if it were discovered that some particular series of notes could yield two intelligible melodies, by association with two different rhythms, differing in the position of the main accents." The reader will, no doubt, confess with me that this species of musical philosophy cannot very well serve as a model of "clearness and acumen," and that the writer was at sea respecting musical theory. Nor does the curious term, "pitch-interval" contribute much towards shedding more light on the subject. If Mr. Gurney had in mind that it would be a new discovery to associate two melodies differing in rhythm, the thing has been done repeatedly. To cite only two examples by great masters, the finale of Beethoven's Quintet in C major, and the well-known "Ball Scene" from Don Giovanni, in which three melodies, differing in rhythm, are associated. Every student of double counterpoint has had, no doubt, to write some part-exercises, in which the same melody, arranged in two different rhythms, appeared in the double quality as melody and accompaniment. This writer's philosophical views on harmony — an element in our modern music, of as much importance as melody itself — are just as inadequately presented as that on rhythm; a few stray sentences referring to Helmholtz's wonderful discoveries, were thought, in a lengthy article on "Music and Musical Criticism," sufficient to impart to the reader a clear understanding of the subject; and here again the "bug-bear" melody hangs obstinately at the heels of the critic's arguments. The whole part of the writer's attempts at explaining theoretically the three important fundamental elements of music, rhythm, melody, and harmony, is a confused jumble — in every way unsatisfactory to the intelligent musician, and, quite surely, utterly unintelligible to the mere amateur. And yet we are asked to believe that on such a tottering basis of would-be theoretical speculation, the higher laws of musical criticism may possibly be constructed. Schumann justly says: "The armed eye beholds the stars; the unarmed sees nought but clouds."

LOWELL MASON.

BY A. W. THAYER.

MASON became president of the Handel and Haydn Society, but the object of the association being the performance of oratorio, he soon found its sphere too contracted for the purposes he had in view. This, and other reasons, led to his parting from it, and to the establishment, about 1832, of the Boston Academy of Music, with Samuel A. Eliot, some years mayor of the city, at its head, but having Mr. Mason as its leading spirit. In 1835 the Boston Theatre was changed into a music hall, with the name Odéon, and here the Academy gave, with a very fine chorus, cantatas, madrigals, glees, and at length organized an orchestra, and taught the people to understand and enjoy the great symphonists. Mr. Mason's great object was universal musical education: and while the Handel and Haydn Society and the Academy were educating the public to appreciate the highest music, he was laboring, with a success worthy of his zeal and perseverance, to make singing and the reading of ordinary vocal music as common an acquirement as the simple rules of arithmetic or the outlines of geography.

The first step was so to explain the elementary rules of writing and reading music that every one might be made easily to understand them. His success in this was such that no quack method of "making music easy" has ever been able to obtain any lasting footing in New England; nor does any pupil of a New England public school desire any other notation than such as was good enough for Handel and Beethoven. Next he gathered classes to whom he imparted his methods of teaching, which were based upon a thorough study of the system of Pestalozzi — awakened their enthusiasm, and thus soon had an able body of disciples to aid him in a project which he had for some time cherished — nothing less than making singing and reading music compulsory branches of instruction in the public schools! Anything more hopeless could hardly have been planned. He was obliged to prove that children could be made to comprehend the meaning of staves and notes — a page of music being then to most people as blind as a column of hieroglyphics. He did prove it, by concerts of children whom he and Mr. George James Webb — a fine English musician, long his friend and coadjutor — had taught. One of Mr. Mason's eulogists says with truth: "It was a good while before he could get a hearing for his belief that little children could be taught to sing by note and to understand the rudiments of music as a science. A less resolute man than he would have been discouraged before he gained permission to experiment upon his theory in the common schools; and when, at last, consent was given grudgingly by the school authorities of Boston, he was forced to go to work upon his own responsibility, at his own charges, at the most unfavorable time, in the most undesirable way. But he succeeded so triumphantly that all the schools in Boston were, in 1838, thrown open to him."

Mr. Mason's path in these and many following years was not one of roses. Envy and malice did their most in decrying his merits and in exaggerating any mistake made by him or any failing that could be discovered, and the time came when others reaped where he had sown — in other words, the teaching in the schools was divided between himself and his assistants and his opponents. Perhaps the cause may have gained, as both parties were forced to do their best; but it was neither just nor generous towards Mr. Mason.

Another project of his, which has now become an institution in many parts of the United States, was the calling together conventions of music-teachers and amateurs. These, continuing ten or twelve days, were occasions of very great interest and value. Lectures on musical topics, especially upon the art of teaching singing-classes, with constant practice, and, finally, a concert or two, in which the members took part, filled the time, and thousands carried away with them their first and never-fading impression of the glorious power and beauty of a chorus of Handel, sung by a thousand voices with orchestral and organ accompaniment.

Simultaneously with all these labors the press was teeming with collections of vocal music by Mr. Mason alone, or in conjunction with Mr. Webb, for every possible demand — from the infant school to the societies for singing the highest music. Their sale was positively enormous. Single collections were distributed by hundreds of thousands. Not alone sacred music, but glees, madrigals, and four-part songs, for men's voices, women's voices, a mixed chorus, English, German, French, Italian, anything that was good of its kind that could be found in the large library which their editor had collected. That a handsome fortune at length rewarded his labors need hardly be stated.

Mr. Mason's first visit to Europe was in 1837, after ten years of incessant labor, partly for recreation, but more to make himself acquainted with the methods—especially in Germany—of musical instruction in schools of the various grades. There was nothing for him to learn! A pleasing and valuable volume of letters records his impressions and observations.

The last years of his life were spent with his elder children at Orange in New Jersey, where two of them resided—Daniel and Lowell—whose extensive publishing house was in New York and Orange, therefore a convenient place of residence.

But, as Mr. Mason's talent in teaching really amounted to genius, his services in Massachusetts were still demanded. The Public Board of Education of that State organized annual conventions of teachers, much on the model of the musical conventions above noticed, and to these he was annually called, not more for the musical instruction which he imparted than for the benefit of the example he set the members in the very best methods of teaching.

In the purchase of books for his library Mr. Mason by no means confined himself to such as he could read or use in works. He collected for the use of others, and with the intention of making a collection which after his death should be deposited in some institution of learning for the public benefit. Thus, being informed by a friend that the late Professor Dehn, of Berlin, was disposed to sell the finest and completest collection of the works of Matheson and Marpurg,—that in the Royal Library at Berlin excepted,—he immediately commissioned his friend to secure them, though there was not one among them that he himself could read. Upon those who sought to injure him he never retaliated, but bore calumny and detraction in silence,—he lived them down,—and many an opponent he changed to a friend by simply giving them the opportunity of knowing him personally. Here is a case in point: A young writer on musical topics in the periodical press, upon partial information, made a somewhat bitter attack upon him. No other notice was taken of it than was involved in Mr. Mason's inviting him to his house and giving him the free use of his library. Prejudice soon gave way to respect and admiration on his part, while on the other a kindly feeling grew up, which resulted in the loan of a handsome sum of money, to be repaid at convenience, without interest, to enable the young man to pursue his studies in Europe. Not until years had passed did the latter know, and then not from his benefactor, that the article above named had deeply pained and wounded him.

The writer freely confesses that he has differed from Mr. Mason on various matters of opinion and taste; but this confession can only add emphasis to the expression of his deep appreciation of his many great qualities.

TALKS ON ART.—SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

"Is that sketch of Miss B. like her?"

No matter if it is or is n't. To do it is the first thing. Have it like, is the second. The figure is elegant,—which is something that most people think nothing of, so much are they taken up with likeness. Then it is naïve! The head goes into the background in such an unconscious way. It is skillfully painted, and I know that you could not have done it two years ago.

"Then you think we do go on, even when we feel that we are not gaining as we ought to?"

You can't help going on; but you can't always see the steps. Nothing is hard if you take the right steps to do it. Of a sudden we find out that our teachers are great noodles; and in our despair at finding that we are so far behind where we ought to be, we try to jump over the river at one bound. You must throw in one stone at a time, and by and by you will see one floating on the top.—"Oh, but there's Susan Jane going on alone!"—Never mind; she has to come to the mud too, and then she must begin to throw in her stones and build her foundation. The people who have got the thing called "success" have reached it without knowing it.

You must know, before you start a drawing, just where your figure is going to come upon the canvas. See how Michael Angelo planned every corner of his work! Most of us put a little bit of a figure in the middle of a large background that is of no use. Look at the Greek coins: no waste space, every part filled. Then look at our cent, with the figure so small that it looks like a crow in a wilderness.

Don't dwell too much on what you have done! Go on, and don't paint each sketch as if it were to be the last thing you were to do in life. Believe that you are going to make hundreds of them, and go on to the next.

You must feel that there is a head under that hat! Draw a line through the hat where you know that the top of the head ought to come, and see how the hat looks then. Ostrich feathers won't take the place of brains.

When anything profiles you must have it profile to mean something.

People are apt to think that painting is simply skillful work.

Will it to be flat, and it will come so. Look at the work of the Japanese. They knew the thing, and then put it down. No high light in their decorations: flat tints, with due regard to values.

Be contented to do something in the direction in which the thing is, not in the way you feel it. Build up your power of doing actualities. Be convinced that you can't help putting in some of your own feeling and originality. Don't run around trying to be original, standing on your head or diving under water. Believe that if you work and let yourself go, all will come out right. If you work only for what you feel, and not for reality, you work all the time with one oar.

Don't be afraid of spoiling your work. You can't spoil anything in this world. There's a great deal of work to be done for the sake of learning how it is done. I've seen John Millet sit down in Millet's studio, and, without a word of encouragement, work three weeks from a plaster cast.

"But when we carry our things home"—

Your parents don't like them? Of course they don't, they have n't been through enough. Make a drawing equal to Michael Angelo, and there is n't a parent in this city that is going to know how good it is. They go to the Louvre and admire a drawing with Michael Angelo's name under it; but take away that name and put on another and they won't look at the drawing.

Don't mind what your friends say of your work. In the first place, they all think you're an idiot; in the next place, they expect great things of you; in the third place, they would n't know if you did a good thing. Until we come to study art we are not aware of the ignorance there is about it. Artists have to create their audiences. They have to do their own work and educate the public at the same time. Nobody cared for Corot's pictures at first. He had to teach people how to like them. The same with Raphael. His pictures were not understood; but he went on painting, and in time he was appreciated.

"I don't know what to do."

It's by working that you learn what to do. Take something to draw, and see how far you can carry it.

"What shall I take?"

Oh, something that you like.

"Tell me what, please."

Why, how can I tell? I might as well tell you what prayer to say!

That eye is light, and you are making it dark. You seem to think that the way to attack a thing is—to keep away from it. Don't always be trying to flank your work! You see your lion; and, to be sure of getting him, you turn square on your heel, take a steamer for Japan, and come round the world, to attack him in the rear.

Rembrandt says, "Gayly lay on your color, for all spirit will disappear in subsequent operations."

Painting is a still old thing. There's no whine about it. It does n't trouble anybody.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1879.

NOTICE.—Our JOURNAL for 1880, Vol. XL., will be mailed as usual to all the present subscribers, unless we receive an order to discontinue it. A prompt remittance will oblige the publishers.

SUBSCRIBERS living in musical circles, or members of musical societies, are requested to raise clubs among their friends, to whom the JOURNAL will be furnished at reduced rates, namely: for five copies, $10; for ten copies, $20, and an extra copy to the sender.

If every friend who values the paper and appreciates its aims, would only send us in the name of one new subscriber, it would not only place the JOURNAL at once on a firm footing, but would enable us to add to the amount, the variety, and excellence of its contents. Has it not earned the right to live and to improve?

HECTOR BERLIOZ'S "THE CHILDHOOD OF CHRIST."

MANY anecdotes have been told about the curious circumstances under which this or that famous piece of music was written; how Scarlatti took the theme of one of his fugues from his cat running across his harpsichord, how Rossini wrote "Di tanti palpiti" in a café, etc. It is not less incongruous that Berlioz's great sacred trilogy, or oratorio, should have been virtually begun at a corner of an écarté table. Berlioz was at a card-party one evening, and as, "by patience, and after thirty years of effort, he had succeeded in knowing not a single game of this sort," his friend Duc, the architect, asked him to keep himself from being bored by writing some music in his album. "I take a scrap of paper, draw some staves upon it, on which I soon jot down an andantino in four parts for the organ. I think that I find a certain character of artless, rustic mysticism about it, and the fancy takes me to write some words of the same sort to it. The organ-piece disappears, and becomes the chorus of the Shepherds of Bethlehem, bidding the infant Jesus farewell, at the departure of the Holy Family for Egypt. . . . Some days afterwards, I wrote the "Rest of the Holy Family" at home, beginning this time with the words, and a little fugued overture, for a little orchestra, in a little, innocent style, in F-sharp minor without any leading note. . . . A month later, when I no longer thought of my score, a chorus happened to be wanting in the programme of a concert that I was to conduct. It struck me as a good joke to put that of the Shepherds in my Mystery in its place, leaving it under the name of Pierre Ducré, music-master of the Sainte-Chapelle in Paris (1679). At the rehearsals the chorus-singers took a lively fancy to this ancestral music."

"The Childhood of Christ" is an oratorio in three parts, namely: "Herod's Dream," "The Flight into Egypt," and "The Arrival in Sais." As has been already hinted, the second part was written and performed before the remainder of the work was begun. Most of us remember the delightful impression it made a fortnight ago in the Music Hall, and how exquisitely Mr. William Winch sang the tenor solo. This, together with the fact that an extract from "Herod's Dream" is to be given at the first Symphony Concert of the Harvard Musical Association, makes it interesting to know something definite about a composition which has hitherto been a mere name to most of our musical public.

"The Childhood of Christ" was brought out entire in the Salle Herz in Paris on the 10th of December, 1854. Its success was complete and instantaneous, and went far towards comforting the composer for the terrible fiasco made some years previous by his "Damnation of Faust" at the Opéra-Comique. M. Joseph d'Ortigue wrote in the Journal des Débats after the performance:

"M. Hector Berlioz held a brilliant and numerous audience captive during a long concert, with a new score, the text of which he wrote, the music of which he composed, and the rehearsals and performances of which he conducted. Thus M. Berlioz has been his own collaborator, his own orchestral conductor, his own interpreter. Thus it is sufficiently clear and sharply cut. No evasion is possible. I, Berlioz, wrote what you read, and what you hear. This accent, this expression, this effect, it is I who intended them. It is my work, it is complete, it is one. . . .

"Gallant, brave, and generous Berlioz! This is how he bears his standard! Shatter that standard and you shatter him at the same blow; he would be a hero of art, even if he were not one of its most brilliant manifestations! Thus does he present himself before us after two years of silence, at the moment when we could have believed him to be in some German country, exciting that ardent sympathy of which the land of Schubert and Weber has been so prodigal towards him. He had, no doubt, prepared himself for a conflict, and here we see him find only a triumph." The whole of the article, which is very long, is evenly enthusiastic in its tenor; when we consider that a sacred composition by Berlioz, who had long since bid the church good-by, was thus written about by an uncompromising man like d'Ortigue, who was a tremendous ultramontane in religion, and a rampant ultraclassicist, or rather a pre-Raphaelite, in music (albeit a personal friend of the composer), it seems the highest praise that a mortal can well expect to win. D'Ortigue even says himself: "One may feel sure that I am not the least in the world embarrassed in saying here — in this place, where M. Berlioz signed his name but yesterday, and where he will sign it to-morrow¹ — that his new work is a marvel of taste, of art, of sentiment, and of originality. And I will reply to those who may accuse me of the crime of enthusiasm that for twenty years I have had leisure to administer to myself several good reductives, in imposing upon myself a diet of rather severe studies in plain-chant, and in musical modes, history, archæology, and philosophy, all of which are things, if not incompatible with the subject of my to-day's criticism, at least very different from it, and, as Montaigne says, 'from another cask.'"

The "Night March of Roman Soldiers" in "Herod's Dream" (which will be soon played here) is thus described: ". . . The basses murmur a mysterious rhythm; the muffled sounds of the united strings commence a night patrol; it is a patrol of Roman soldiers; we hear them defile with measured step under the gates, and follow the dusky circuit of the walls of Jerusalem. They draw near, little by little. A centurion, mounting guard at the door of his guard-house, stops them, and we have the following dialogue between the centurion and Polydorus, the officer of the patrol:—

Who goes there? — Rome! — Advance! — Halt! — Polydorus! — Why, soldier; I thought you were already on the banks of the Tiber. — By Bacchus! I should have been there, if Gallus, our illustrious prætor, had at last given me leave. — And Herod? — He dreams, he trembles; he sees traitors everywhere; he calls together his council every day. . . . In a word, he gives us trouble enough — Ridiculous tyrant! . . . But go on, go your rounds.

And the patrol continues its march, further and further off, until it is lost in a distant pianissimo. The theme of this march, treated in the fugued style, is of an original and gothic cut, and gives rise to charming melodic details. The instrumentation is sober and of rare elegance. The crescendo and decrecendo from piano to forte, and from forte to piano, indicate the approaching and retiring of the patrol. But it is always a night-march, and we can say that the brilliancy of this forte is not that of midday, of bright sunshine, but the brilliancy of links and torches.

"One word more. Polydorus, in his recitative, tells us the name of the Roman prætor.

"M. Berlioz has read his Augustin and his Amédée Thierry. He must have seen in the latter's "History of Gaul under the Roman Dominion," that the first prætor to whom Augustus confided the administration of the province of Egypt was really Cornelius Gallus, a native of Frejus. It was this same Gallus who governed Egypt when the Holy Family took refuge there, and, according to tradition, sought an asylum in Hermopolis Magna. All this, if we stick to the musical side of the question, has nothing to do with the matter, beyond all doubt, but it proves, at least, with what religious care M. Berlioz has conceived and thought out his work."

This is, no doubt, very ingenious in M. d'Ortigue, only one does not quite see what the prætor of Egypt has to do with one of Herod's soldiers in Jerusalem; but Berlioz's "religious care" may be safely taken for granted.

I have dwelt especially upon this night-march because it is the number in the trilogy about which most interest will be felt at present. It were even out of place here to say much about the oratorio as a whole. I believe, indeed, that it has not yet been given in America, and there are certainly no symptoms of its being soon given in Boston. One or two points, however, are interesting to note. Herod's air, in the first part, is an admirable example of what effective use can be made of an old church-mode in modern music, when a man of genius takes it in hand. The tonality of this air is based upon the following scale: g, a-flat, b-flat, c, d, e-flat, f-natural, g, which is essentially the Phrygian mode. The effect is singularly terrible and appalling.

In the third part of the work Berlioz has ventured upon a curious, but thoroughly happy, innovation in this form of composition. He has introduced what is to all intents and purposes a piece of chamber music, in the shape of a trio, in three well-defined movements, for a harp and two flutes. After the Holy Family have been received at the house of a charitable citizen of Sais, and provided with refreshment after their journey, the master of the house calls out:

"Take your instruments, my children, and let all trouble vanish before the flute in concert with the Theban harp."

It is a family concert in honor of the Christ-child. This trio is a little gem in its way, and deserves a place in the repertory of our best chamber concerts. W. F. A.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

HANDRL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. — The first concert of the sixty-fifth season of our old Oratorio Society, on Sunday evening, November 28, was a notable event. There have been greater in its history, but this one was unique, exceptional. For the first time an eminent composer from abroad appeared here to conduct in person a performance of two of his own more important works. The curiosity, of course, was great to see the clever and most popular English musician, whose name, through his songs, and still more through his "Pinafore" and other light operatic music, has become a household word among us. A very large audience was a foregone conclusion when the Society could present Dr. Arthur Sullivan in person. Not quite so great a crowd, however, as on certain annual occasions; for, besides the musical public proper, there is a large class in and about Boston who are just musical enough to care to hear The Messiah and Elijah, and but little else; these two sacred festivals they are bound always to attend religiously.

The programme was well selected for this peculiar occasion. The first part, which was under Mr. Zerrahn's direction, opened with Beethoven's superb Hallelujah chorus, which concludes his Christ on the Mount of Olives with a blaze of glory. It is laid out, as it were, in long lines, which suggest infinitude. The chorus singing was exceedingly impressive; and the orchestra of sixty instruments rendered excellent support in this as in all the numbers of the programme. Then followed the second part, "The Flight into Egypt," from Berlioz's L'Enfance du Christ. This exquisite selection was but indifferently well performed a year ago; it needed this repetition under better auspices to make its beauty felt. It has rare delicacy, and a poetic, naïve, pastoral feeling. The Overture, which represents the assembling of the shepherds at Bethlehem, impressed us as less artificial than before. It is simply quaint and rustic in its mingling of reed instruments, the Corno Inglese always predominating, and in its vague and musing melody. The chorus "Farewell of the Shepherds" is very lovely and full of tenderness. But the tenor solo, representing the Repose of the Holy Family, was this time sung so exquisitely by Mr. Wm. J. Winch that there was no resisting the call for a repetition, and by most of the audience it will be remembered as the purest gem of the whole evening; its perfectness was only marred at the end by the *Alleluia*s of the unseen angels being sung a little sharp. We trust that we shall some day have a chance to hear all three parts of this very beautiful and original creation of Berlioz.

Part Two began with Mr. Sullivan's In Memoriam Overture, composed some years ago in honor of his father. His reception was most hearty, and he had long to stand bowing acknowledgment to the unflagging applause. This short glimpse of his intelligent and genial face was all that was vouchsafed that night, for at once he turned to the orchestra and entered quietly and earnestly into the business of conducting. His manner is firm, precise, and without any flourish; but he is plainly master of the situation, and holds all his forces well in hand. In the rehearsals he had manifestly a rare faculty of making all go right, quietly insisting on the carrying out of his ideas. The Overture is a musicianly work, vigorous in themes, logical in development, clear and consistent in form, richly and skillfully instrumented, and worked up to a powerful climax when the organ comes in at the end.

The Prodigal Son, composed for the Festival at Worcester, England, in 1869, is really an early work. The Parable affords an excellent subject for musical treatment; but the shortness of the narrative required filling out with texts for choruses and solos which enforce the moral of the story. As a whole this short Oratorio impresses no one as a great work, but it was found exceedingly enjoyable. It is the work throughout of an accomplished musician, showing a sure and easy mastery of all the means at hand. It is clear and classical in form; melodious, rich, and sometimes ingenious in harmony; not over-ambitious in counterpoint, but quite at home in that; and remarkably brilliant and effective in its instrumentation. Fine as some of its choruses and arias are, it is the orchestral accompaniment that gives them a gleam of originality, and saves the thoroughly respectable good work from a certain level of commonplace. The Mendelssohnian influence is unmistakable in it. Naturally enough, for Sullivan was then a young man, he had held the first Mendelssohn scholarship at Leipzig, where Mendelssohn was still the ruling spirit; and it would have required a courage amounting almost to bravado for him to make his debut as composer in any marked departure from the conventional style of one so idolized in England. A great deal of tact is shown in the whole treatment of the text. In the tenor solo and chorus, "Let us eat and drink," a minor mood pervades its reckless, restless character; and the monotonous rhythmic figure of the violas, etc., which is ceaselessly reiterated, is very suggestive of a foraging excursion by night. The chorus and orchestral work was on the whole remarkably well done, although there were some instances of falling out of tune; especially in the repetition of the beautiful chorus with organ accompaniment, which went so well the first time. The solos, with the exception of the tenor, Winch, were less fortunate. Miss Edith Abell has an interesting voice and sang well, but the soprano part was hardly in her best range. Miss Mary Bryant has a rich contralto, and sings conscientiously, showing refinement and intelligence, and an artistic feeling which deserves to be encouraged; but nervous timidity sadly interfered with the success of her performance. Nor did Mr. J. F. Winch, in the bass solos, sing quite as well as he was wont to do a short time since. The organ accompaniment, by Mr. Lang, was always timely, tasteful, and effective.

The great assembly left the hall with a new admiration, and of a deeper kind, for Arthur Sullivan.

MR. EDWARD B. PERRY. — A truly musical and delightful occasion was the Piano-forte Recital given by this gentleman on Wednesday evening, November 26, at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons. The spacious ware-room on the second floor, which proves to be an excellent room for sound, was well filled with a large and appreciative audience. It surely was no mean victory of mind and genius over physical infirmity when such a programme as the following could be executed, all from memory, and not only with fine technical precision and elegance of style but also with poetic fire and sensibility, by a young man wholly blind: —

1. a. Aufschwung, Op. 12, No. 2, }
b. Warum? Op. 12, No. 3, } . . . Schumann.
c. Traumeswirren, Op. 12, No. 7, }
d. Nachtstueck, from Op. 23, }
e. Novellette, Op. 21, No. 4, }
2. Aria, "Pur dieci" Lotti.
Mrs. E. H. Allen.
3. Sonata in B-flat minor. Op. 35 Chopin.
Grave — Doppio movimento — Scherzo —
Marcia Funebre — Presto.
4. Song, "Spring Flowers" Reinecke.
Mrs. E. H. Allen.
6. a. La Gondola. Op. 13, No. 2 Henselt.
b. Intermezzo, from "Carnival of Milan" Von Bülow.
c. Why? E. B. Perry.
d. La Gazelle. Piece Caractéristique Kullak.
6. a. "Lullaby" Wilson.
b. "A Farewell" E. B. Perry.
c. "Four leaf Clover" E. B. Perry.
Mrs. E. H. Allen.
8. a. Berceuse, Op. 57, }
b. Ballade, Op. 47, } Chopin.

The series of familiar little pieces by Schumann we have seldom heard more truthfully and feelingly interpreted. The Chopin Sonata was remarkably well given, specially the Scherzo and the wild Presto Finale; and the Funeral March lost none of its old fascination.

The programme contained Liszt's fanciful interpretation of this grand descriptive Sonata, to wit: —

1. Grave. Doppio movimento. — Trials and conflicts of the young hero battling for fame, and cheered by thoughts of his distant lady.
2. Scherzo. — Triumphant return of the victorious warrior, and happy meeting of the lovers.
3. Marcia Funebre. — Attending the bride to her early grave. A hero's sorrow.
4. Presto. — Lament of the night wind over the lonely tomb.

The Berceuse and Ballade, too, were finely played. The Pièce caractéristique, by Kullak, was of a superficial, showy character, quite out of place in such fine company. Mr. Perry's own little compositions were agreeable and clever. Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen's singing was highly satisfactory, especially in the two songs in which she had the fine violin obligato accompaniment of her husband.

PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA. — We were obliged to lose the third concert (Dec. 2) of Mr. Listemann's finely trained little orchestra, of which we gave the programme in our last. The fourth concert occurred last evening, with the assistance of Miss Sara Barton, soprano (her first appearance in America after an absence of seven years), of Ole Bull (his first appearance this season), and of Mr. Charles R. Morse, the musical director at Wellesley College, as organist. The programme included: —

1. Symphonie, No. 1, for Organ and Orchestra.
(First Movement. New.) Alex. Guilmant.
Mr. Charles H. Morse and Orchestra.
2. Andante Soave ("Gretchen"), from Faust-Symphonie, Liszt.
(First time in Boston.)
3. Grand Aria (Il Profeta), "L'ingrato m'abbandona" Meyerbeer.
Miss Sara Barton.
4. Fantasia Hongroise Ridley-Kuhns.
Ole Bull.

5. "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Symphonique Poem.
Saint-Saëns.
(By special request.)
6. Slavonic Dances, Op. 46, Nos. 7 and 8. Anton Dvorak.
(New.)
7. The Lost Chord Sullivan.
(Piano and Organ.)
Miss Sara Barton.
8. Visions
Composed and performed by Ole Bull.
9. A Musical Joke, for Strings and Horns, Mozart.
10. L'Invitation a la Valse C. M. v. Weber.
(Adapted for Orchestra by Berlioz.)

We have to reserve comment for another number. So, also, of Mme. Cappiani's concert which occurred on Wednesday evening.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 24. — Last season we had three sets of orchestral concerts in full blast, but this year we are to have but two, namely, Dr. Damrosch's symphony concerts, and those given by the New York Philharmonic Society. Dr. Damrosch's first concert took place on Saturday evening, November 8, with the following orchestral numbers: —

- Seventh Symphony Beethoven.
"Walpurgisnacht" (from "Spring" Symphony) Raff.
"Eine Faust Ouverture" Wagner.
Symphonie Poem, "Festknecht" Liszt.

The house was very full, the audience enthusiastic, and the performance, in the main, admirable. Miss Drasdil was the only soloist and contributed greatly to the evening's enjoyment by her rendering of two selections, each with orchestral accompaniment.

Your readers are of course aware, by this time, that Mr. Thomas will direct the concerts of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, as well as those on this side of the river. To suit Mr. Thomas's convenience, the Brooklyn entertainments will be given on the Tuesdays which precede the Saturdays appropriated by the New York society. In this way Mr. Thomas contrives to accomplish the somewhat difficult feat of living in one city and superintending important musical interests in another, some five hundred miles distant. The Cincinnati people have little cause to complain of this arrangement, for they do not dislike the idea of our being compelled (?) to go to them for a leader. The New York public, blinded by an infatuated belief that no one but Thomas knows anything about an orchestra and its uses, merely contents itself with the fact that it has secured its well-beloved Theodore. But the Brooklynites! ah, there's the rub; they may either congratulate themselves that they have the first of everything, for it is generally believed that the programmes of their concerts will be literally repeated in our city; or, they may reflect that the Ohio leader is merely practicing upon them, using their concerts for rehearsals, in fact; at any rate, they can pay their money even if they do not take their choice. From all that can be learned they are inclined to grumble at the whole business and are seriously discontented with the substitution of Tuesday for Saturday evenings, as well as with the present plan of having but one rehearsal for each concert. This last infliction was severe upon the younger portion of the community, for the Brooklyn Academy had become a charming rendezvous and trying place on Philharmonic afternoons. However, those things are of the past, and it must be recollected that Cincinnati plays "first fiddle" now.

The first concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society occurred on Tuesday evening, November 18, with the following programme: —

- Overture, "King Lear" Berlioz.
Piano-forte Concerto (B-flat minor) Tchaikowsky.
Mr. Rummel.
Siegfried's Love-Song Wagner.
Sig. Campanini.
Ritt der Walküren Wagner.
Siegfried's death (Götterdämmerung) Wagner.
Fifth Symphony, Op. 67 Beethoven.

It is scarcely necessary to descant at length upon the different numbers, for they are all, with one exception, so well known. The concerto is a noble work, superb in instrumentation, grandly conceived, and faulty only in being so very diffuse. Mr. Rummel played the piano part very finely (from memory), and really seems to have improved since last winter. His manner is more quiet and self-contained, and he appears more like an artist and less like a school boy. In the use of the pedal he is as woefully deficient as formerly; at times he allows totally discordant chords to be blurred into each other in a distracting way. The defect could not have been the fault of the instrument, for he used a fine Steinway Grand of exceedingly pure tone and of admirable key and pedal action.

Campanini's lovely voice has rarely been heard to better advantage than in the Wagner "Love-Song" which sounded a little incongruous in Italian. He was warmly, indeed enthusiastically, recalled, and sang even better than in the first instance.

On Saturday evening, November 22, the New York Philharmonic Society's concert was given with nearly the same programme as the one just mentioned. The performance was a very good one. If one missed the delicacy and finish which formerly characterized orchestral performances under Mr. Thomas's baton, it must be remembered that through that gentleman's own efforts we have grown to be very critical and to expect a very great deal from him.

The Oratorio Society will give Elijah on Saturday evening, November 29. The soloists will be Mrs. Swift, Mrs. Sherwin, Miss Dradill, Mr. Simpson, and Mr. Whitney. The programme for the third concert is yet unannounced; but at the second we are promised the Messiah, and at the fourth and last (to be given in St. George's church), Bach's Passion Music.

Joseffy returns to this city next month, and will inaugurate a second series of concerts on December 15. ARGUS.

BALTIMORE, DEC. 1. — Since my last there has been little of general interest in music here. I give below the programmes of the last two of the chamber concerts which are given every Saturday evening at the instruction hall of the Peabody Conservatory; they will serve as an example of what the institution is accomplishing in this (in Baltimore) much neglected but all important department of the art: —

Saturday, Nov. 22. — String quartet, E-flat major, No. 1, for two violins, viola, and violoncello. Composed 1795, L. Cherubini; Messrs. Fincke, Allen, Schaefer, and Jungnickel. Cavatina, from the opera "The Water-Carrier," Mr. Wm. Lincoln, student of the Conservatory, second year. Scene and Cavatina, from the opera "Attila," G. Verdi; Miss Helen Winternitz, student of the Conservatory, second year. Piano quartet, E-flat major, work 16, for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello, L. van Beethoven; Miss Helen Todhunter, student of the Conservatory, fifth year, Messrs. Fincke, Schaefer, and Jungnickel.

Saturday, Nov. 29: —

W. A. Mozart:

(a) String quartet, E-flat, No. 14.

Messrs. Allen, Fincke, Schaefer, and Jungnickel.

(b) Countess's Air from Figaro.

Miss Marie Becker, ex-student of the Conservatory.

Franz Lachner:

Piano Quintet, A minor, No. 2. Work 145.

For piano, two violins, viola, and violoncello.

Mr. Ross Jungnickel, student of the Conservatory, fourth year, Messrs. Allen, Fincke, Schaefer, and Jungnickel.

Mr. Hammerik is engaged in correcting the proof of his fifth Norse Suite (dedicated to Gade), and is also at work completing the sixth of these characteristic compositions.

The "Germania Maennerchor," one of the leading German singing societies of our city, produced Mendelssohn's Athalia last week, with large chorus and orchestra. Owing to other engagements your correspondent was prevented from attending. C. F.

CHICAGO, NOV. 27. — This early hour of Thanksgiving morning I devote to writing my little record to the JOURNAL. As the mind reflects upon the progress the West has made in the musical art during the past ten years, there can but come over every honest soul a feeling of thankfulness. . . . But I return to the immediate musical matters.

First, I transmit a programme of the last concert given by Herr Joseffy, when, with the aid of a small orchestra, he played the following works: —

Concerto (E-flat) Liszt.
Concerto (E-flat) Beethoven.
Hungarian Fantasia, for Piano and Orchestra Liszt.

Again a very small audience greeted him, for there were attractions elsewhere, at an entertainment in honor of General Grant, that could not be resisted by a large number of our musical people. Much has been written in regard to the playing of this wonderful pianist, and the critics have vied with each other for superlative expressive of encomium. Yet it seems to me that the cooler heads have endeavored not to press their commendations beyond all bounds of reason. The classification of an artist's talents has often been made the groundwork of unhealthy comparisons, which assume the impossibility of there being a difference in greatness. That is, we find that one artist of renown is made to give way to another, and the last idol holds the highest place in this general estimation of abilities. Yet in the comparison there may be no logical ground whatever; for the accomplishments of each may be so different as to admit of no relation one with the other. It seems to me that as reflective comparison does not change in any way the real attainments made by persons, it only produces a false opinion detrimental to a healthy progress in art. We hear Joseffy's talent spoken of in terms implying that a greater than Rubenstein, or a Von Bülow is with us; and these representative musicians of the age are made to take the lower places. This is a false estimate of the accomplishments of each; for, as there are varieties in the vast sphere of the beautiful, so are there differences manifested in the talent of its representatives. Critics would do better to uphold the good for its worth, and condemn the false for its hideousness, rather than indulge in discourteous personalities. With the man as an individual the critic has nothing to do, for he stands or falls by his own degree of worth. — There is room on the mountain of excellence for many more great lights, and if each differs in ability the bow of promise will contain the more beauty.

The Germania Society, under the direction of Hans Balatka, gave its opening concert in Brand's Hall. The society has a male chorus of forty-five persons, which is supplemented by ladies' voices when it is necessary, for the performance of important works. They sang Hiller's "Easter Morning," (soprano solo by Miss Helene Balatka) and the finale of the first act of Rienzi, besides smaller pieces. Miss Mahla played Liszt's Second Rhapsodie very successfully, and Mr. Schultz added the tenor Romanza from Aida to the programme. The whole concert reflected honor upon the conductor.

At Reed's Temple of Music the following programme was offered at the last Chamber Concert given there: —

1. Quartet, Op. 18 Beethoven.
2. Valse Caprice Wieniawski.
3. Adagio Expressivo, from String Quintet, Op. 34 Win. Lewis.
4. Song, "The Sea hath its pearls" Onslow.
5. Quintet, Op. 107 Thiessen.

Mr. E. Schultz.
'Cello Obligato by Mr. Balatka.

In many respects it was the best the club has given us, and it afforded much pleasure to the appreciative audience.

Mr. Lewis won a hearty recall for his solo number.

Tuesday evening, November 18, came the English Opera Company under the direction of Mr. Max Maretzek, opening in his own work entitled "Sleepy Hollow." I gave it my close attention, expecting to hear a new departure in operatic representation. The score contains some very pretty music, and it is written in the Italian style. The scenery is pretty; and some of the numbers found a hearty appreciation at once. There seems to be a want of unity, however, in the construction of the work, for it is rather amusing to find Washington Irving's famous characters singing music of the Italian style. Nothing could be more out of place than to make Ichabod Crane, the schoolmaster, execute a prolonged trill in one of his songs; but he really attempts it, and if the baritone who took the part had been a better singer I think that he would have succeeded. The orchestral accompaniments contain some very pretty effects, and the whole work shows that an experienced musician has written it. The "Spinning Song," for the soprano, is a number that will always win its way. The opera should be given with a better company before it can have a fair opportunity to succeed.

The last Chamber Concert at Hershey Hall had this programme: —

1. Sonata in C minor, Op. 80, No. 2 (Piano and Violin) Beethoven.
2. Song: Air with variations Proch.
3. Grand Trio in E, Op. 83 (Piano, Violin, and Violoncello) Hummel.

Messrs. Eddy, Lewis, and Eichheim.

There was an appreciative audience and the playing was enjoyable.

A comical circular is going the rounds of the press, announcing the formation of a "Society for the Suppression of Music." When one realizes the magnitude of the undertaking he may almost smile at the boldness of human endeavor. Yet when we consider that occupation is necessary to supply energy with the incentive of growth, we become conscious that here is a work vast enough to tax human powers even to the end of time. I am rejoiced that this society can look out upon a boundless field of labor, and even extend their work into the world of the immortal, where the happy choir is said to be chanting everlasting praises. There is nothing like having plenty to do. C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., NOV. 27. — The most important musical event of the last two weeks was Herr Joseffy's concert, November 17. His programme was the now familiar one beginning with the "Waldstein" Sonata of Beethoven. His interpretation of this sonata I found thoroughly satisfactory, and his playing of the Bach fugue was perfection itself. His interpretations of Chopin were less satisfying, especially of the E major Etude, Op. 10, to which I was unable to reconcile myself. Of his technique there is nothing to be said but praise; it has already been sufficiently analyzed for your readers, and I need add nothing.

The Heine Quartet gave their second recital of chamber music November 24, with the following programme: —

- (1.) String Quartet, Op. 40 Carl Schubert.
- (2.) Duo Concertante for Two Violins, Op. 67 Spohr.
- (3.) Trio for Piano, Violin, and 'Cello, Op. 54 Fesca.
- (4.) Piano Quartet, Op. 3 Mendelssohn.

(Last movement.)

This is a very pleasing, though not great programme; and being within the reach of the players, so far as interpretation is concerned (their execution is fully equal to it), it was done very satisfactorily. Their tone impressed me better than heretofore.

The first of a series of pupil recitals was given at Milwaukee College, November 21, by Miss Kate A. Stark, a very talented pupil of Mr. John C. Fillmore, who has the musical department there. Here is the programme: —

- Sonata in E-flat, Op. 81, No. 3 Beethoven.

- a. Blumenstueck, Op. 19. } Schumann.
- b. "Why?" from Op. 13. }
- c. "Whims," from Op. 12. }
- a. Improvisu in A flat, Op. 29, } Chopin.
- b. Fantasia-Improvisu, in C-sharp minor Op. 68, }

Second Hungarian Rhapsody, with live Cadenza Liszt.

The Arion Club is to give Hoffman's "Cinderella," December 4th, with Sitta for the principal soloist.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE first Symphony Concert (15th season) of the Harvard Musical Association takes place next Thursday afternoon, at 3 o'clock. We have already given the programme; it only remains to add that the Trio Concerto by Beethoven is to be performed by Messrs G. W. Sumner, pianoforte, Edouard Heimendahl, violin, and Frederick Giese, violoncello, with orchestra. Carl Zerrahn will conduct, with Bernhard Listemann at the head of the violins. The orchestra, of 47 instruments, is constituted as follows: —

First Violins: Bernhard Listemann, C. N. Allen, Julius Akeroyd, Theodore Human, F. Listemann, Carl Meisel, J. C. Mullaly, Henry Suck. — Second Violins: Vincent Akeroyd, Carl Eichler, Julius Eichler, Richard Eltz, Henry Strauss, Carl Trautmann. — Violas: Edward Beyer, Henry Heindl, Aug. Schneider, E. Strasser, Carl Weiss. — Violoncellos: Wulf Fries, Carl Behr, Alex. Heindl, Wilhelm Rietzel, Aug. Suck. — Double Basses: H. A. Greene, L. Jennewein, Aug. Stein, H. Steimann.

Flutes: Edward Heindl, F. W. Schlimper. — Oboes: A. L. de Ribas, Carl Faulwasser. — Clarinets: Ernest Weber, O. A. Whitmore. — Bassoons: Paul Eltz, E. Regestein.

Horns: Edward Schormann, Carl Schumann, L. Lipoldt, A. Gumprecht. — Trumpets: E. M. Bagley, B. Bowson. — Trombones: G. A. Patz, A. Rigg, G. W. Stewart. — Tuba: W. C. Nichols. — Timpani: H. D. Simpson.

— The following will be the soloists at the performance of The Messiah, by the Handel and Haydn Society, Dec. 28: Miss Fanny Kellogg, Miss Emily Winsant, Mr. Christian Fritsch, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. There will be a public rehearsal on the afternoon of Dec. 26. For the Triennial Festival, next May, Miss Emma Thursby, Mrs. Alisa Osgood, and Miss Annie Louise Cary are engaged; and it is said that the society is negotiating also with Mme. Etelka Gerster.

— Mme. Cappiani, the accomplished vocal teacher, commenced a series of four concerts in Mechanics' Hall, Dec. 3, assisted by Mrs. Constance Howard, of New York, Mr. H. G. Hanchett, pianist, and a number of her pupils. The programme included a very wide range of vocal and instrumental compositions, all sufficiently light and pleasing. Among the composers represented were Liszt, Robert Franz, Costa, Raff, Von Weber, Rossini, Schubert, Silas, Handel, Verdi, Rubinstein, and Mozart. We hope to speak more fully of the concert in our next. For future dates see calendar.

— Mr. Adamowski, the young Polish violinist, has accepted a number of engagements with the Emma Thursby Company, and will appear with her in this city Dec. 11, (presumably in the Bay State Lecture Course). — Miss Thursby will make her first appearance here since her return from Europe in the Redpath Course, Dec. 9.

— The Apollo Club will give its first pair of concerts, in Music Hall, on the evenings of Dec. 8 and 12.

— The first concert of the season by the Cecilia will be given in Music Hall on the evening of Dec. 22, when Max Bruch's Odyseus will be performed, with orchestra. Mr. Charles R. Adams will sing the part of Odyseus.

— We are glad to hear that the success of the proposed course of five symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, under the direction of Professor Paine, is substantially secured. The Listemann Orchestra, increased to 40 instruments, will perform in all of them. The dates are Dec. 18, Jan. 8, Feb. 5, and 26, March 12. Among the works to be played are Beethoven's Fifth and Eighth Symphonies, Mozart's E-flat Symphony, Goetz's Posthumous Symphony, etc., Overtures to Fingal's Cave and Oleru, and works by Bach, Schumann, Wagner, Saint-Saëns, and others. Subscriptions for season tickets may be sent to C. W. Sever, University book store, Cambridge.

— The first of a series of four piano recitals, by Mr. John Preston, was given on Tuesday evening last, in Rangeley Hall, Winchester. The concerts were projected by a gentleman of the town, entirely in the interest of art, his desire being to present to intelligent and appreciative audiences works of the better class; good music, but not too far over the line, which is popularly supposed to divide the classical from the enjoyable. The performance on Tuesday evening leaves no room for doubt that this praiseworthy design will be successfully carried out. The programme was of a high order, Mr. Preston's selections including, besides a Beethoven Sonata as the pièce de résistance, compositions of Chopin, Handel, Bach, and Silas, and transcriptions by Liszt and Saint-Saëns. Mr. Preston is known as one of the most promising of our younger generation of pianists, and his playing was thoroughly satisfactory and very enjoyable throughout the wide range of the programme which we have indicated. Mr. Preston was assisted at this concert by Mrs. T. M. Carter, who sang very nicely and with excellent taste some very well selected numbers, one or two of which were reinforced by a corset obligato by Mr. Carter. The beautiful ful little hall was filled with an interested and well pleased audience, and its remarkable acoustic properties lent an added brilliancy to the Miller grand piano upon which Mr. Preston played. At the next concert of the series Mr. C. N. Allen will play, and Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen will sing. — Courier, Nov. 30.

— A little concert was given at the Commonwealth Hotel, Monday evening, which was attended by the guests of the house and their friends. The large dining-room was converted into a concert hall, and, with the aid of decorations and flowers, supplemented by the ladies' elaborate toilets, presented an elegant appearance. Miss Florence Holmes, Miss Louise Gage, and Mr. Clarence E. Hay were the vocalists of the evening, and their respective efforts were warmly received. Mr. Adamowski played several violin solos with the charming grace and finish which have already become recognized as peculiar to him. Miss Kate Nason's readings showed her to be a young lady of rich endowment and remarkable promise. Miss Gage and Mr. Hay, as our readers are aware, are of the quartet of the First church, where the music is always a great attraction. A gentleman present expressed what was evidently the feeling of the entire audience when he said, "In Miss Gage are happily united rare sweetness and purity of voice, with a charming dignity and simplicity of manner." — Ibid.

NEW YORK. — The first concert of the New York Oratorio Society, Dr. L. Damrosch conductor, took place last Saturday. Elijah was presented, and received with great enthusiasm. The singing of Mrs. Marie Louise Swift is highly praised. The other solo singers were Mrs. Amy Sherwin (a promising young soprano), Miss Draadil, and Messrs. Fritsch, Remmerts, and M. W. Whitney.

— Of Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood's first piano recital, in Steinway Hall, on Tuesday of last week, the new Musical Review says: "The programme was full of interest. The two important selections were Bach's Grand Fantasia and Fugue, G minor, for organ (arranged for piano-forte by Liszt), with which the recital opened, and Beethoven's last piano-sonata, C minor, Op. 111, in two movements, which followed the Bach selection. The rest of the programme consisted of one-movement selections from Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, and that talented composer, Moritz Moszkowski. Mr. Sherwood added to his correctness of delineation of Bach a modern coloring, which is regarded by some as in bad taste. In the Beethoven Sonata the player was most successful in the clearly melodic second movement: Arietta, Adagio molto semplice e cantabile. In playing Chopin Mr. Sherwood is entirely at home. His legato touch fits him for a perfect reproduction of his refined, intellectual conception of that delicate, poetic writer. The Nocturne, F-sharp, Op. 15, and the Grande Polonaise, A-flat, Op. 53, were the Chopin selections on this occasion; Schumann's Ende vom Lied and a Noctette, but especially his beautiful Wurmschen received full justice at Mr. Sherwood's hands. Moszkowski was represented by a Moment Musical, not so beautiful as one of Schubert's, but charming because of its improvisation-like character. The recital closed with Liszt's Waldesrauschen and Mephisto Waltz, which, although admirably played, were uninteresting to the hearers."

The second recital (according to the Tribune) was better attended than the first, and seemed to arouse a greater degree of popular interest. As on Tuesday, the programme was an exhausting one, and it was rendered most conscientiously. It opened with the great Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue arranged from J. S. Bach by Liszt. This was a scholarly and careful piece of work, although not especially attractive. Mr. Sherwood's playing in the Beethoven Sonata for piano and violin, Op. 12, No. 2, in E-flat, was much more interesting and sympathetic, and more full of life and vigor. The test pieces of the concert were seven of Chopin's Études. In these Mr. Sherwood was very uneven, yet at times very good. The Étude in C-sharp minor (Op. 25, No. 7) was charmingly done; so, too, was the one in E-flat major (Op. 10, No. 11), and also that in D-flat major (Op. 25, No. 8). On the other hand, his rendering of the Étude Sur les touches noires was flippant and trivial, and in the C minor Étude (Op. 10, No. 12) his execution, though brilliant, was uncertain. Mr. Sherwood had the assistance of Mme. Constance Howard, who played in an Impromptu by Reinecke, and showed a marked improvement since her debut last year, and of Brandt, the violinist, who played his part of the Beethoven Sonata charmingly, and gave an excellent performance of several Bach numbers for violin.

— The Opera season keeps on. The Tribune tells us: Miss Marimon, whom Mr. Mapleson offers as a substitute for Mme. Gerster, was a passenger on the City of Richmond, which was towed into Halifax yesterday with a broken shaft. The lady's first appearance at the Academy of Music will therefore be postponed a few days beyond the time the manager had probably set for it, and we must content ourselves with the plain fare to which we have become accustomed. Aida is so well done that almost any opera house might be proud of the representation. Faust, Martha, and Linda, are also creditably given; and in the Sunday performances of the Stabat Mater there is doubtless considerable profit. The subscribers have reason to congratulate themselves that in this season of dearth the voice and spirits of Campanini and Galassi never fail, and the taste and tact of Arditi are never at fault."

And later (Nov. 27): "During the performance of Carmina last night, at the Academy of Music, there was a curious illustration of what one good artist can do for an operatic representation. The first act was inexpressibly dull. Carman was lifeless, Don Jose was flat, the chorus was out of tune, Michael felt the general blight, nothing moved briskly on the stage, the audience grew more and more depressed. The second act opened in the same way. But suddenly when Del Pucante came upon the scene the whole company braced itself up. While he remained all went well. The various personages of the story, who had labored through their parts thus far in a perfunctory manner, began to act and sing, and the concerted number, which includes the Toreador song, was heartily encored. Alas! when Escanillo departed the lights went out again."

— The concert of the Staten Island Philharmonic Society this season will occur on Dec. 18, Jan. 23, Feb. 27, and April 2. The New York Philharmonic Club will play as last year. It is pleasant to hear that the sale of seats has been large, the subscription amounting to over $800 in six days, for the society has done excellent work in past seasons, and promises to do even better this year. At the first concert Miss Henne and Mr. Richard Hoffman will probably appear.

— The New York Vocal Union began its season last week, at Chickering Hall, with Schubert's "Miriam's Song of Triumph" (in which the soprano solo was charmingly done, they say, by Miss Beebe), and the usual assortment of part-songs and quartets.

— The Metropolitan concert company, limited capital $50,000, have begun the construction of a concert hall and garden on the south side of Forty-first Street, New York, the lot running from Broadway to Seventh Avenue. Rudolph Aronson is to conduct the orchestra, and the building is to contain all manner of modern improvements, and be constructed with a sliding iron roof so that it may be removed at pleasure.

— Mr. P. S. Gilmore makes no claim to whatever credit may be due to the originator of the national song "Columbia," which he promises to give to the public soon, saying that it is "an angelic inspiration" which came to him in a dream. Do Gilmore's angels secure copyright?

— The London correspondent of The Musical Review of this city announces that Mme. Esipoff will sail in December to join the Strakosch concert company, of which Miss Thursby is the vocalist.

— At the concert of the Philharmonic Club, at Chickering Hall, last Tuesday evening, the programme was as follows: Quartet, Op. 41, No. 1, Schumann; Sonata for piano and violin, Op. 78, Raff, Mr. Franz Rummel, and Mr. Richard Arnold; The Trumpeter of Saabkingen, Brückler, Mr. Franz Remmerts; Quintet, Op. 30, Goldmark, Mr. Franz Rummel, and string quartet.

THE Albany Musical Association, Mr. John G. Parkhurst conductor, will perform Mendelssohn's St. Paul on Tuesday evening, Dec. 9, with a chorus of one hundred and fifty voices, and the Germania Orchestra from Boston, with E. Listemann as leader. The soloists will be Miss Fanny Kellogg, Miss Isabelle Palmer Fassett (of Albany), Mr. W. H. Fessenden, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. A miscellaneous concert, by the same artists, and Mr. Howard M. Dow of Boston, as accompanist, will take place on the following evening.

PHILADELPHIA. — Mr. Charles H. Jarvis, the pianist has commenced a series of six concerts in the lecture room of the Academy of Arts. The scheme includes selections from Bach, Chopin, Bargiel, Gade, Haydn, Handel, Raff, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Rubinstein, Weber, Beethoven, Mozart, and other composers. His first programme (Nov. 13) was: — Quintet in E-flat Mozart.

Piano, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, and Horn.
Messrs. Jarvis, Helfrich, Schneider, Mueller, and Plagemann.
"Blondel's Lied" R. Schumann.
Mr. E. Gastel.
Piano Solos, Thirty minutes with Thalberg and Liszt.
Mr. C. H. Jarvis.
(a) "Troek'ne Blinmen" F. Schubert
(b) "Auben"
Mr. E. Gastel.
Grand Septuor J. N. Hummel.
For Piano, Oboe, Flute, Horn, Viola, Violoncello, and Contrabasso.
Messrs. Jarvis, Koch, Helfrich, Plagemann, Graner, Schmitz, and Albrecht.

CINCINNATI. — The directors of the College of Music have published a circular calling attention to the "orchestra classes" which have recently been opened in accordance with the original scheme of the institution. These classes, says the circular, are carefully organized with the view of teaching those who are studying orchestral instruments how to play in concerted music. It is a part of the plan of education of the College of Music to give, every season, a series of orchestra and chamber concerts, and this is the first opportunity ever offered in this country to study in an orchestra class, be graduated, and then actually to enter the orchestra. The students will be practiced in playing trios, quartets, and other chamber music for piano, string, and other instruments. They will also be taught to play the music of symphonies and other compositions for full orchestra. These classes are under the immediate direction of Mr. Thomas, and are open to both sexes, it being the purpose of Mr. Thomas to assist women to enter the orchestra as a profession. The College now has a corps of thirty-five teachers, recent accessions to the staff being Sig. Luigi Steffanone and Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen (singing), Miss Cecilia Gaul (piano), Professor Chris. Rothenmund (violin), and Mr. Henry Carter (organ theory and chorus-class).

— It is stated, on the authority of Mr. Theodore Thomas and the Cincinnati festival chorus committee, that the chorus for the festival of 1880 has advanced towards a satisfactory state of completion. The organizations represented in the chorus are the college choir, Orpheus, Maennerchor, Welsh choral society, the Cincinnati choral society, and the Germania Maennerchor. The report of these organizations makes a chorus of over seven hundred voices. With these there are some one hundred and fifty singers who do not belong to any society, which makes a sum total of eight hundred and fifty voices.

— More than a score of composers have sent in competitive scores for the Cincinnati prize of $1000, the cities represented being New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Hildesford (Me.), Winona (Minn.), Terre Haute (Ind.), Baltimore, Cleveland, Savannah (Ga.), Elmira (N. Y.), Beloit (Wis.), and Chicago. It is said that it is not difficult to fix the identity of the competitors, in the large cities at least. Mr. A. C. Guttersou is the Minnesota candidate, Mr. Sterritt the representative from Indiana, and Cincinnati's reputation, it is said, is sustained by the musical critic of one of its great dailies, and at least one other.

FOREIGN.

— The principal feature of interest in continental musical life (says the London Musical Times for November 1) has been the resumption of performances on the part of nearly all the leading concert institutions in France, Germany, and elsewhere. Thus the season of 1879-80 may be said to have commenced in earnest, for it is in the concert-room rather than in the opera-house where the musical activity of a nation finds its most genuine expression. At Paris, both the Châtelet Concerts, conducted by M. Colonne, and the Concerts Populaires, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, recommenced on the 19th ult. The last-named energetic chef-d'orchestre, encouraged by the signal success obtained by the revival last season of Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," intends during the coming winter to produce the same composer's music to "La Prise de Troie," an opera which has as yet never been performed. M. Pasdeloup also promises to persist in his performance of the "Lohengrin" music, which has hitherto proved so distasteful to a noisy portion of his audience. Berlin now possesses three institutions devoted to the performance of orchestral works, viz., the Sinfoniescapelle, the concerts conducted by Herr Biele, and the recently introduced Popular Concerts directed by Herr Julius Liebig; and it remains to be seen whether the existing musical element in the Prussian capital is sufficient to sustain the new undertaking by the side of its two long-established rivals. The Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts, of world wide reputation, commenced on the 9th ult. Among the numerous similar German institutions we will only instance the so-called "Gürzenich Concerts" of Cologne, under the direction of that veteran artist Ferdinand Hiller, which on the 31st ult. opened their new season, in the course of which the following artists have, among others, promised to cooperate: Mesdames Clara Schumann, Norman-Néruda, M.M. Johannes Brahms, Joseph Joachim, Anton Rubinstein, and Charles Gounod.

PARIS. — Concert Populaire (October 19): Scotch Symphony (Mendelssohn); Abandoned, orchestral arrangement by Saint-Saëns (Schumann); Impromptu Hongrois (Schubert); Airs de Ballet from "Féranors" (Rubinstein); Piano-forte Concerto, C minor (Beethoven); Overture, "Vêpres Siciliennes" (Verdi). Châtelet Concert (October 19): Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); "Sylvia," suite for orchestra (Léo Delibes); Grand Fantasia, Op. 15 (Schubert), arranged for piano-forte and orchestra by Liszt; Divertissement to "Les Erinnyes" (Massenet); Overture, "La Muette" (Auber). Concert Populaire (October 26): Symphony, C major (Schumann); Fragment from "Orphée" (Gluck); Serenade, executed by all the violins, violas, and violoncellos of the orchestra (Haydn); Pastoral Symphony (Beethoven); Spring Song (Mendelssohn); and "Danse des Sylphes" (F. Godefrid), arranged for the harp; Airs from "Sylvia" (Léo Delibes). Châtelet Concert (October 26): Symphony, G minor (Mozart); Rhapsody for orchestra (E. Lalo); Piano-forte Concerto, D minor (Brahms); "Danse Macabre" (Saint-Saëns); Serenade, Op. 8 (Beethoven), by all the first violins, violas, and violoncellos of the orchestra.

LEIPZIG. — The programme of the third Gewandhaus Concert was thus constituted: Part I. — Overture to Euryanthe, Weber; Recitative and Airs from Euryanthe (sung by Mad. Moran-Olden, from Frankfort-on-the-Main); Concerto for Violoncello, D. Popper (new and unpublished. Played by the composer). Part II. — Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, Haydn; Songs, Hermann Götz, Mozart (Mad. Moran-Olden); Violoncello Solos "Träumerei," Schumann; [Gavotte, Popper, (Herr D. Popper); "Chaconne" and "Rigodon," from Aline, Reine de Golconde, Monigny.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.¹

BRAHMS'S DEUTSCHES REQUIEM. — THE CONCERT SEASON. — THE FIRST GESELLSCHAFTS CONCERT.

THE history of art sometimes enters on strange and tortuous by-paths. It was the composer of Rigoletto who conquered for church-music, for the requiem, the entry into our Opera-House. Furthermore, it was he who made ready the way thither for our own Brahms; with his Manzoni Mass he was in the Imperial Opera-House the forerunner of the Deutsches Requiem, the Johannes of — Johannes. The custom of celebrating in the Opera-House, as elsewhere, All Souls' Day by a requiem, is of very recent date. Formerly, Robert le Diable used to be selected, obviously on account of the church-yard scene, which is characterized by a resurrection of the departed in tight fleshings. Strange to say, the All Souls' Day public took no offense at the adaptation of the church-yard to ballet purposes; they felt once more surrounded by all the horrors of the cemetery, and moved by a music of the sepulchre, emitting, in a genial admixture of ghost-like bassoon staccatos and far-sounding trombone chords, a genuine odor of corruption. This one scene from Robert was for opera-goers, on All Souls' Day, what the play of Müller und sein Kind is for the patrons of the spoken drama. But, four years ago, to the amazement of every one, Verdi came forward with a Mass for the Dead, which, with the obligatory four singers, he himself took about from one country to another. He did not choose the church or the concert-room for his purpose, but the theatre; in Paris, his Requiem resounded in the Opéra-Comique (!), and here in the Imperial Opera-House. It was so effective, with its beautiful strains, so beautifully sung, and produced such an impression as to justify its repetition after the departure of Verdi and his singers. The management of the Imperial Opera-House produced it for the next three years on All Souls' Day, at first to well-inclined audiences. At last satiety necessarily supervened, and, with the lowering of the standard of excellence on the part of the singers, the general effect sank below its original altitude. The notion of substituting for Verdi's work Brahms's Deutsches Requiem was the best and most praiseworthy one conceivable. We had long desired and advocated the reproduction of the latter composition, which always struck us as the gem of Brahms's creations. Twelve years have passed since Herbeck first ventured on a partial performance of it in the large Redoutensaal. Its unfavorable reception was then so little able to discourage us that we could very confidently prophesy a perfect revulsion of public feeling as regards the work. The performances of the complete score under Brahms's own direction (in 1871 and 1875) realized our hopes to the utmost. The performance, for instance, in the large room of the Musical Association, a performance raised so high by the incomparable singing of Mme. Wilt, is one of our most beautiful and most imperishable reminiscences. The performance in the theatre may stand as high musically; but the impression produced will never attain the reverential earnestness, the inward devotion, of a performance in a concert room. There is always a peculiar worldly something which diverts our attention in the auditorium of an opera-house with its boxes and theatrical accessories. For such performances, the concert-room is the medium — in our opinion the happy medium — between the theatre and the church. It is true that the latter enhances the gloomy solemnity of a requiem; the result, however, is not quite pure, but material; our attention is distracted by the solemnity of the sacred edifice from the pure work of art, and religious devotion glides unobserved into the place of æsthetic feeling. At performances of compositions like Brahms's Requiem, which, serving an invisible church, ignores all differences of creed, we do not wish to be ecclesiastically influenced, but to admire in a purely human way and receive into ourselves forever those means of grace which belong exclusively to beauty. At the Imperial Opera-House, the Deutsches Requiem found most powerful support, first in the admirable orchestra, then in the excellent chorus, considerably strengthened by the Vocal Association of the Society of the Friends of Music, and lastly and principally in the inspiring direction of the composer himself, to whom, as a matter of course, all the usual marks of honor were paid. The impression made by the grandiose composition, which is, at the same time so clear and kept within such just proportions, was profound and powerful. One thing ought to be duly appreciated as a satisfactory sign of a serious love of music in Vienna; and that is the fact that Brahms's Deutsches Requiem was able to attract and fascinate an audience on two successive nights.

The day before yesterday (Sunday), at noon, the annual grand host of pilgrims flocked for the first time this year towards the rooms of the Musical Union, where the Society's Concerts were about to begin. Before entering the room, let us examine a little the numerous concert advertisements on the notice-boards. Concerning the admirable quality of all the musical treats in store for us, we do not venture to doubt, but, as far as regards quantity, it strikes us the season will be one justifying the most fearful hopes. Let us contemplate the wealth in one branch only of concert compositions: chamber-music. With the rare exceptions of celebrated visitors, such as F. Laub, Jean Becker, and Joachim, this used to be represented solely by Hellmesberger's well-tried Quartet Society, a state of things which suited us very well. We now find, in addition to Hellmesberger's six Quartets, three Quartet Soirées announced by Herr Grün and colleagues: three, by Herr J. Winkler and colleagues; six Quartet Evenings, by Herr Radnitzky and colleagues; and, finally, three Subscription Concerts, by Herr Wallnöfer, in which singing alternates with chamber-music. Five series of similar performances simultaneously, that is obviously too much for Vienna, and will probably not prove very profitable either to the concert givers or to the public. One Quartet Series, besides Hellmesberger, with admirable performers and a thoroughly well chosen programme, appears to us the limit of due competition, a limit scarcely to be overstepped with any prospect of a remunerative result. Let us take a sample from our concert calendar as at present constituted: First week in December, Tuesday, Quartet, Grün; Thursday, Hellmesberger; Friday, Wallnöfer; Saturday, Radnitzky. Second week in December, Monday, Quartet, Winkler; Tuesday, Grün; Thursday, Hellmesberger; Saturday, Radnitzky, etc. Thus, leaving entirely out of consideration the regular grand Sunday concerts, we have four evenings in each week taken up with chamber-music, and the musical critics are very anxious to know how the innumerable virtuoso concerts, together with operatic novelties and the performances of "stars," are to be distributed over the three evenings left free.

The Society's Concert began with J. Seb. Bach's Cantata, "Wir danken dir, Gott!" This work shows us the great church-composer in the character, also, of a zealous, patriotic member of the Leipsic community. It is one of the four "Rathswahl-Cantaten," or, "Cantatas on the Election of Magistrates," which we possess from his pen, and which, as an old book of the words informs us, "was sung by the choro musico in the church of St. Nicholas after the sermon on the election of magistrates." We moderns, with our indifference about municipal matters, learn from the book that the election of a town magistrate was considered a very serious and sacred matter, and was observed as such. "Segne die, so uns regieren; die uns leiten, schützen, führen; segne, die gehorsam sind," thus and similarly, run the words of the Cantata, impressively loyal words, around which Sebastian Bach twined the most artistic beauties of his counterpoint. We, who elect so many municipal dignitaries cantatalessly and silently, without even Herr Eduard Strauss composing a "Municipal Election Polka" on them, listened to Bach's music with a very humble and reverential spirit. The overture of the Cantata must have sounded familiar to those among the nu-ence who recollected a "Suite of Bach's," scored by Herr Bachrich. In connection with the above arrangement, performed at the later Philharmonic Concerts, I felt bound, with all respect for Herr Bachrich's skill, to enter a protest against the way in which this arranging of Bach's instrumental works was gaining more and more the upper hand, and I remarked that one of the pieces set by Herr Bachrich for a string-band was actually to be found in the "Rathswahl-Cantata," No. 19, fully scored for trumpets and kettle-drums, with obbligato organ. For this I was very coarsely attacked in a "letter from a correspondent," that correspondent being some great Unknown, writing for the glory of Johann Sebastian Bachrich. The overture in question has now answered plainly enough instead of me. We heard the brilliantly festal composition for the first time with the full original instrumentation, the effect of which was marred only by a too screechy organ stop. Like so many similar works of the same master, the Cantata contains specimens of the most sublime Gothic architecture side by side with marvelous samples of Rococo. The solos were sung by Mlle. Auguste Krauss (called on after her air), Mme. Mathilde Scheler, Herr Patzelt-Norini, and Dr. v. Raindl, with that devotional spirit and painful effort inseparable from such forcing of the human voice. I cannot disguise the fact that, when listening to compositions in this style, I experience more sympathy for the singer than pleasure in what is sung. It strikes me as false and dangerous reverence, unfortunately only too general, always to soften down or ignore the fact that Bach wrote unpleasingly, uncongenially, and cruelly for the voice. The unconditional glorification of him as a writer of vocal as well as instrumental music has had many sad consequences, from some of the after-effects of which we are suffering even at the present day. Compared with Bach, Beethoven, who, in the D Mass and the Choral Symphony, was certainly not particular as to how he treated the voice, is absolutely a Rossini.

Three new vocal choruses: "Im Fuschertal," by Goldmark, given by the Vocal Union with delicate nicety of light and shade, met with a very favorable reception; the most genuine satisfaction was afforded us by the third ("Abschied"), on account of its great feeling and gradually culminating effect.

M. Marsick, the Belgian virtuoso on the violin, proved himself worthy of the favorable reports which had preceded him from Paris. In a Violin Concerto composed expressly for him by Saint-Saëns, he exhibited a tasteful, elegant style, and, more especially, extraordinary scale-technics. Never did we hear any one, not even Sarasate, execute scales in such a fabulously quick tempo and yet with such lightness and certainty. His tone, like that of most bravura players, is not very full, but it is sweet and correct. What we miss in this gentleman's grandeur and passion of interpretation, and even the elementary fire of temperament; everything flows from his bow with the same smoothness and delicacy. This was shown more especially in his rendering of the second and the third movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; they could scarcely have been executed more neatly, but they might assuredly be conceived more broadly and more energetically. M. Marsick's virtuosity, for which in runs no allegro is quick enough, seduced him into hurrying the tempo of the final movement at the expense of a proper balance of effect. M. Marsick, whose pleasing youthful appearance and quiet bearing favorably backed up the impression made by his play, was rewarded by loud applause and a re-call. We are not inclined to class M. Saint-Saëns's Violin Concerto among the most important works of its clever composer, who has, perhaps, lately been too prolific. The best thing about it, we fancy, is its simple clearness, which renounces all eccentric refinement and false pathos. On the other hand, the work offers us little of value in the way of new ideas; we sometimes imagine we are listening to a Rode or Beriot restored to youth. Beethoven's "March and Chorus" from The Ruins of Athens, an oft-heard but always highly effective stock piece of the Vocal Union, concluded the concert, at which Herr E. Kremser conducted with his accustomed care and ability.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

ON ROBERT SCHUMANN'S "MUSIC AND MUSICIANS."

BY F. L. RITTER.

It cannot be denied that, in an abstract philosophical sense, clever writers may give many valuable suggestions for further æsthetic investigation; but they must not flatter themselves that without the consummate understanding and knowledge of the material employed by the composer, they will be able to build up an æsthetic-musical theory, ignoring or disputing, at the same time, the artist's experience as laid down in his works. Goethe said:

"Wer den Dichter will verstehen Muss in Dichter's Lande gehn."

It would lead me too far to follow up Mr. Gurney's theoretical subtleties with regard to musical criticism. It is not astonishing that a critic, standing theoretically on such a one-sided, narrow platform, denies the composer the power of being able to express poetical sentiments, or poetical situations as suggested by outward scenes. The idea of "poetical conception" claimed by musicians as lying at the basis of Beethoven's and other composers' works, is, therefore, to be abandoned. Poetical conception, imaginable in details, does not penetrate complex musical structure. Such analysis as is usually attempted (for example the first movement of the Eroica) may be a slight concrete help and of interest, but in no way represents any mental process in Beethoven. The matchless structure stands out to the musical sense as unalterably right and coherent, and any one who appreciates it knows as much, and can tell as little of its secret, as Beethoven himself. The question will naturally arise: was Beethoven aware of the meaning of the word Eroica, when he wrote it on the title-page of his symphony? Did he write this title, suggesting such a world of sentiments and thoughts, in contradiction to the nature of his emotional and mental process when in the act of composing the work?

The above critic lets us infer that Beethoven labored under an illusion, that "with Beethoven in all his works the musical impulse came first; the melody might or might not turn out to present desirable affinities, but it was first and foremost a melody." How could Beethoven's, the composer's, impulse be otherwise than musical? Just as the painter's, the sculptor's, the architect's, the poet's are, with regard to the first conception of their respective art-works! Every one of these artists conceives the idea, and translates it in accordance with his special artistic material. All arts proceed from the same source, man in his entire, real and ideal, existence being the universal theme, and for men's sensuous perception art is created. Emotion is the prime source; and on the basis of emotion, sentiment, feeling, thought, the arts build up their different forms, each one of them serving as a vehicle for the different kind of sensations as perceived by men's consciousness. Herbert Spencer says: "Sensations excite ideas and emotions; these, in their turn, arouse other ideas and emotions; and so continuously. That is to say, the tension existing in particular nerves, or groups of nerves, when they yield us certain sensations, ideas, or emotions, generates an equivalent tension in some other nerve, or group of nerves, with which there is a connection; the flow of energy passing on, the one idea or feeling dies in producing the next."

I think it would be quite a feat of intellectual self-denial to remain, while listening to a Beethoven symphony, in such a one-sided emotional torpor, as to do justice to Mr. Gurney's "independent and isolated position of the emotions caused by music;" and as this writer denies that music has "any relation to the mental sphere," he naturally comes to the conclusion, that since music is merely the promoter of isolated emotional pleasure, there exists in reality very little difference between the moral effects of a Beethoven symphony, and an Italian sentimental aria; for, with regard to formal construction, the aria may be just as perfect as the symphony. The difference, it is thought, lies only in the preference this or that person attaches to the one or the other style of music. If this is to be accepted as the true standard of musical criticism, what an absurdity and waste of paper and time it is to comment on the superiority of the æsthetic beauties of the works of Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert. Pinafore, appealing to a larger class of people, is consequently to be rated higher! It is therefore not astonishing, while perusing Mr. Gurney's article on "Music and Musical Criticism," to see him land on a peculiarly constructed cosmopolitan platform,—but the cosmopolitan view of that kind of musical criticism must be pronounced as decidedly injurious to the growth and progress of a healthy musical art development. Justly remarks H. Spencer in another place: "That the cultivation of music has no effect on the mind, few will be absurd enough to contest. And if it has an effect, what more natural effect is there than this of developing our perception of the meanings or inflections, qualities, and modulations of the voice; and giving us a correspondently increased power of using them."

All arts having an intimate ideal connection, we are justified in perceiving in this particular art creation, some of the æsthetic qualities of that other. Poetry, for instance, appeals to the whole imaginative, ideal sense of man: it is, therefore, nothing arbitrary to claim for every other art a germ of "poetical conception." And if we go a step further, dividing the arts into two natural categories, those that are perceived by the eye—the plastic arts; and those that are perceived by the ear—music and poetry, it is most assuredly more arbitrary to separate music from its natural sister. Although that is more powerful in its principal realm, the representation of emotions; this in that of appealing to the more exact sense of reflection and thought; yet the ideal æsthetic thread that connects them, cannot be cut asunder without injury, if not to both, at least to one — music. A composer like Beethoven is not led blindly by the "melody," the mere musical effect, expressing solely some vague, isolated emotions; he is enabled to give his first conception, the melody, this or that decided emotional meaning. But being well aware of the concrete meaning of rhythm in all its variety and richness, as well as that of harmony, he is sure to reach his artistic purposes. He is not swayed to and fro by mere melodic form, like the one-sided "melodic" amateur. The complexity of the structure of his movement is the process of inspiration, regulated by an inevitable natural critical reflection.

Empiricism in art is unable to build up complex structure, though Mr. Gurney naively thinks that any one who has composed a melody must know how a composition is formed. The true composer, being well aware of his powers as a creator, is enabled to give, at the very start, to his creation, the peculiar characteristic physiognomy of an ideal existence — to appear as an ideal reflection or symbol of the world as he sees or conceives it. The composer cannot tell how these ideas come, neither can the painter, nor poet — but he can tell very well of what nature, character, meaning, they are when they come. When Beethoven wrote on the title-page of his third symphony "Eroica," he was just as sure of the inner definite meaning of his work as Goethe was when he wrote on the title-page of his drama, "Faust." Beethoven knew, of course, the limits of his art, for every art has its natural limits. He endeavored to portray the grandeur, the struggle for victory, the resignation, the despondency after defeat, of a heroic soul. But considered in its true light, these very emotional characteristics, as aroused in the composer's soul, on the contemplation of his subject, were his own; and thus the artist himself represents that hero. He did not attempt to give a biographical sketch of a particular hero, describing his gait, the favorite colors of his clothes, the fiery look of his eyes, etc., as the poet could; he simply endeavored to impress on our souls, by means of the peculiar power of his art, the inner life of a hero; and that side of the hero's ideal existence calls forth our sympathy, and affects us, both musically and poetically. Says Schumann: "That would be a small art indeed that merely possessed sounds but not speech, no symbol fitted to express the varying movements of the soul." It was a pertinent, deep remark of Schumann, when, endeavoring to speak of an important work by a new composer, he wished to know something of the composer's life, character, education, sensibility, etc. In music, perhaps more than in any of the other arts, the composer himself is the theme of the inner meaning of the work. Speaking of a work by L. Schunke, Schumann says: "It contains much of himself, his native politeness, his eccentricity, his quick brilliancy." As an expression of his own subjective experience we may take that passage from his letter to H. Dorn, in which he says, speaking of his marriage, so obstinately opposed by F. Wieck: "Indeed many marks of the battles Clara has cost me may have penetrated the music, and were, no doubt, understood by you. The Concerto, the Sonata, the Davidsthiind lertänze, the Kreislertiana, and the Noceletten were inspired almost entirely by her."

Although Schumann objected to elaborate poetical programmes, it was not that he deprecated a hint as to what the composer meant to express by his work: but he disapproved of it from a purely æsthetic point of view; he did not wish to have his imagination fettered by a circumscribing programme; he saw in a programme more than the composer was able to indicate by the programme. "It is the artist's lofty mission to shed light on the depths of the human heart," and all that "light" he was sure to receive from the art work itself, without the help of the programme, so explicit in its expression was music to him. That Schumann was well aware of the one-sided critical and æsthetic stand-point of the "melodic" amateur, may be seen by the following passage: "Melody is the amateur's war-cry, and certainly music without melody is no music. Therefore, you must understand what amateurs fancy the word means: anything easily, rhythmically pleasing." It is quite safe to say, that a critic who is everlastingly harping on the supremacy of melody, and has no adequate understanding of the divers other factors that enter into a composition of large form, is not well qualified to penetrate the complexity of a Beethoven symphonic form, and much less to appreciate the composer's æsthetic meaning lying beyond mere pleasing melody. "Shall dilettanti pooh-poo things aside that have cost artists weeks, months, years of reflection?"

From many of his writings, as well as from the titles and mottoes he gave his compositions, it may be gathered that Schumann was convinced of the power of music to express infinitely more than merely pleasing tone-forms appealing to vague, indefinite emotions. "Music is the most modern of all arts; it commenced as the simple exponent of joy and sorrow (major and minor). The ill-educated man can scarcely believe that it possesses the power of expressing particular passions, and therefore it is difficult for him to comprehend the more individual masters, such as Beethoven, and Schubert. We have learned to express the finer shades of feeling penetrating more deeply into the mysteries of harmony." . . . "The cultivated musician may study a Madonna by Raphael, the painter a symphony by Mozart with equal advantage." . . . "The æsthetic principle is the same in all arts, only the material differs." . . . Had Shakespeare not existed, would Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream have seen the light — though Beethoven has written many indeed, but unchristened? The following passage will give ample proof as to Schumann's belief in the composer's power to impart to his works poetical expression. Speaking of Berlioz's Symphony he says, among other things, "It seems as though the music sought to return to its origin before it was confined by laws of time, and to elevate itself to more unfettered language, more poetic accent — such as we find in the Greek Chorus, the language of the Bible, the prose of St. Paul."

I must limit myself to the above quotations from "Music and Musicians." The intelligent, thoughtful reader will be able, while perusing this rich source of intellectual enjoyment, to multiply those passages bearing on the subject here treated, and will agree with Madame Ritter, that "a code of musical æsthetics might be gathered" from Schumann's writings.

JOACHIM RAFF'S EIGHTH SYMPHONY.

(From the London Daily News.)

At the seventh concert of the Crystal Palace a new symphony by Joachim Raff was performed for the first time in England. The eighth work of its kind produced by the prolific composer (a ninth having been recently added), this symphony, classed as Op. 205, is written with a purpose, being entitled Frühlingsklänge (Spring Sounds). It belongs to the order of so-called "programme music," — the grandest and most successful example of which is Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Others by Raff bear specific titles, two of which, Lenore and Im Walde, have been heard at the Crystal Palace. In the work now referred to, the composer seems desirous of emulating the example of Beethoven, a task requiring, at least, more deliberation than Herr Raff is in the habit of bestowing even on his most elaborate works. That he is one of the most remarkable instrumental composers of the day can scarcely be questioned by any one acquainted with his productions; but it can also hardly be denied that the rapidity with which he sends forth compositions of the most ambitious kind is accompanied by a tendency to extreme diffuseness, a want of perfect coherence in structure and development, and a frequent excess of reiteration. These, indeed, are the general tendencies of the most modern school of composition, which seems to be largely influenced by the excited hurry so characteristic of life in the present day. Hence we have works, as long as the longest by the great composers, given to the public almost as soon as the ink with which they are written is dry; whereas with the past classics of the art a severe course of thoughtful fusion and amalgamation of materials, and an after-revision of the complete work, generally preceded its issue to the world. Even the greatest genius can scarcely dispense with such processes when desiring to do full justice to itself and to the art, and to insure permanency for the work. While possessing exceptional gifts and powers, Herr Raff apparently does not submit to these conditions, and among many evidences of this his new symphony may seemingly be classed. There are beauties scattered throughout, and some points that are at least original in treatment, while the instrumentation is masterly in its command of all the varied effects of orchestral coloring. The symphony takes fully three quarters of an hour in performance, and at the close it is impossible to avoid the impression that half that period of time is the utmost that its subject matter would justify. It consists of four divisions — an allegro, entitled "Frühlings Rückkehr;" another allegro, "In der Walpurgisnacht;" a largo, with the title, "Mit dem ersten Blumenstrauß;" and a finale vivace, called "Wanderlust." The principal theme of the first movement ("Spring's Return") is a very graceful melody, which is alternated with other subjects with great skill but unnecessary diffuseness. The following illustration of the Walpurgis revels is remarkable chiefly for its very clever scoring, being somewhat overstrained in the contrasted violence of its subjects. The gem of the symphony is the third movement, suggestive of the "First Noddy." This is so charming in the pervading grace of its melody, so full of interest in the treatment, and so consistent in general design and conduct, as to be free from objections that might be urged against other divisions of the symphony. The close of the largo, with its delicate gradations of diminishing sounds, left a vivid impression of its beauty. The finale is chiefly noticeable for prolonged expression of indeterminate restlessness, many of its phrases being trite and uninteresting, and their reiteration in inverse proportion to their musical value.

AN EVENING AT CHOPIN'S.

NARRATED BY FRANZ LISET.

It was assuredly not without our having to conquer a slightly misanthropical repugnance that Chopin could be induced to open his door and his piano to those who were entitled by friendship, as respectful as it was loyal, to urge him somewhat pertinaciously to such a step. More than one of us, no doubt, recollects the first evening's gathering extemporized, despite his refusal, at the time he lived in the Chaussée d'Antin. His room, thus unexpectedly invaded, was lighted by only a few tapers, grouped round one of Pleyel's pianos, of which he was especially fond on account of their somewhat veiled silver-like sonority, and of their easy touch, enabling him to obtain from them sounds that anybody might have thought proceeded from one of the harmonicas of which romantic Germany retained the monopoly, and which her old masters, wedding crystal with water, constructed so ingeniously. The fact of its corners being left in obscurity appeared to render the apartment limitless and merged in the darkness of space. Here and there, in a patch of half light, and enveloped in its whitish cover, might be perceived the indistinct outline of a piece of furniture, standing erect, like some spectre listening to the accents which had conjured it up. The light concentrated round the piano fell on the floor, gliding over it like a spreading wave, and combining with the fitful gleams on the hearth, whence, however, arose from time to time orange-colored flames, short and thick, like so many curious gnomes attracted by sounds of their own language. A single portrait, that of a pianist, a sympathetic and admiring friend, seemed invited as the constant auditor of the flux and reflux of tones which came to sigh, to thunder, to murmur, and to die away upon the surface of the instrument, as on the sea-shore, near which he was placed. The reverberating surface of the looking-glass, by a happy chance, reflected, to double them in our eyes, nothing save the fine oval face and the silky locks which so many pencils have copied, and which have just been reproduced by the graver for those who are charmed by an elegant pen.

Gathered around the piano in the zone of light were grouped several heads of brilliant renown. There was Heine, the saddest of humorists, listening with a compatriot's interest to accounts Chopin gave him concerning the mysterious country which his airy fancy also haunted, and the fairy regions of which he also had explored. Chopin and Heine understood one another at half a word and at half a tone, and the musician answered by astounding recitals the questions the poet asked him in a whisper about the unknown countries, and even about the "laughing nymph" who had her home there. On the evening to which we allude, Meyerbeer, for whom the expressions of admiration have long since been exhausted, was seated next to Heine. Himself a humorist, with his Cyclopean constructions, he spent long periods enjoying the delectable pleasure of following in detail the arabesques which enveloped in a transparent blonde net-work Chopin's thoughts. Further on was Adolphe Nourrit, that noble artist, passionate and ascetic at one and the same time, dreaming of the future with the fervor of the Middle Ages, a sincere and almost austere Catholic, who, in the later years of his life, refused to lend his talent to aught like superficial sentiment, and who served art with chaste and enthusiastic respect, accepting it in its divers manifestations, and considering it on all occasions only as a holy tabernacle, the beauty of which was the splendor of the True. Secretly undermined by a melancholy passion for the beautiful, his forehead seemed already to be growing into marble under the fatal shadow which the outburst of despair never explains, until it is too late, to mankind, so eager to learn the secrets of the heart, and so unfit to guess them.

Hiller, also, was there; with talent allied to that of Chopin, he was one of Chopin's most faithful friends. We frequently met at his house, and when, previous to the grand works he published afterwards, the first being his remarkable oratorio, Die Zerstörung Jerusalems, he was writing pieces for the piano, some of which, entitled Études, sketches full of vigor and perfect in their drawing, remind us of the studies of foliage in which landscape painters reproduce by chance an entire poem of light and shade with a single tree, a single branch, a single motive, happily and broadly treated.

Eugène Delacroix remained silent, absorbed by the apparitions which filled the air, and which we thought we heard rustle past us. . . . Was he asking himself what palette, what brushes, what canvas, he would need to endow those apparitions with the life of his art? Was he asking himself whether the canvas he had to find was one woven by Arachne, the brush a brush made out of a fairy's eyelashes, and the palette a palette prepared with the vapors of the rainbow? Was he smiling inwardly, well pleased at such suppositions, and abandoning himself entirely to the impression which gave them birth, thanks to the attraction felt by some men of great talent for those who are their opposites? The one among us who appeared nearest the tomb was Mickiewicz, the aged survivor of times that were no more. He listened to the Chants Historiques which Chopin translated into dramatic creations, in which, side by side with the popular text of the Polish bard, were once more heard, under the musician's fingers, the shock of arms, the song of the victors, the festival hymns, the lamentations of the illustrious prisoners, and the ballads on the dead heroes. Together the two recalled to mind the long series of glorious events, of victories, of kings, of queens, of hetmen, . . . till the old man, taking the present for an illusion, thought they were all resuscitated, so much life was there in their mere phantoms. Separated from aught else, the outline of Mickiewicz stood out sombre and dumb; Dante of the North, he appeared always to find "a foreign land bitter."

Buried in an arm-chair, with her elbow resting on a small table, sat Madame Sand, curiously attentive and gracefully subjugated. She invested what was going on with all the reverberation of her own ardent genius, which was gifted with the rare faculty, reserved for only a few chosen beings, of perceiving the beautiful under all the forms of art and of nature, — a faculty identical possibly with that second sight which all nations have recognized in inspired women.

ARGUMENT.

THE book of the Odysseus, written by the poet Graff, is called "Scenes from the Odyssey." It gives in lyrical form some of the adventures of Ulysses (Odysseus in the Greek) in his wandering return from the siege of Troy to his own kingdom, Ithaca. The title indicates a series of disconnected pictures or situations; but, after all, the story is told almost as consecutively as in Homer's great poem from which it is taken. The order of events is changed somewhat, for the apparent purpose of ensuring the presence of a male chorus throughout the cantata. In the original, the companions of Odysseus had perished before he reached Calypso's isle.

The first scene is in the island of Calypso. Almost ten years have passed since the fall of Troy. The bright-haired Helen, for whose recovery "many drew swords and died," has been carried by her husband to her home. The Greek princes who survived the war have reached their native land, — all but Odysseus. He, after long wandering, is thrown upon Calypso's isle, and for seven years has lain in the enchanted realm of the sea-nymph. In the first chorus, Calypso's maidens tell of their queen's unrequited love for the stranger. He sings a song of homesickness and longing for his faithful wife. Hermes, messenger of the gods, arrives, and gives him assurance of escape from the charmed island and of safe return to Ithaca.

In the second scene Odysseus and his comrades come to the bounds of the deep-flowing ocean, — a place where there is access to the under-world. Here he invokes the souls of the dead, much as a modern inquirer would consult a medium. There are weird choruses of the departed — children and brides and youths and old men; and the ghosts of Teiresias, the soothsayer, — a bass voice, — and Antikleia, the hero's mother, — an alto, — announce the chances of his return, and the dangers he must still encounter.

The third scene is the famous passage of Odysseus by the isle of the Sirens. He has stopped the ears of his companions, that they may not be drawn to the shore by the song of the enchantresses, and has caused himself to be bound to the mast, and forbidden his friends to loose him, however he may implore, — a not unnecessary precaution, if the veritable strain was as fascinating as that in the cantata.

The fourth scene is a storm at sea. The tempest is worked up by orchestra and chorus with tremendous effect. The ship of Odysseus is wrecked, and his companions perish; but Leukothea, the sea-nymph, appears to Odysseus, and under her protection he plunges into the water. She and her sister-nymphs sing, "We'll bear thee and guide thee safe." The wood-crested harbor appears; and the number ends with a lovely chorus of rest and sleep.

The fifth scene is Penelope's mourning, a pathetic song of sorrow for the unknown fate of her husband and of her son Telemachus, who has gone in quest of his father.

In the sixth scene we return to Odysseus, escaped from his shipwreck, naked and alone, upon the land of the Phæacians. The king's daughter, Nausikaa, and her maidens are playing ball and singing a charming song and chorus as they play. Odysseus presents himself as modestly as circumstances permit, and invokes the pity of Nausikaa. A beautiful duet follows, "Strangers and beggars come ever from Jove; relief should be speedy and cheerful." He is clothed, fed, and carried to the palace.

The seventh scene is the banquet of the Phæacians, at which the stranger is received with a chorus of welcome. The bands — tenors and basses in unison — sing of the fortunes of the Greek heroes, and allude to the unknown fate of Odysseus. The stranger weeps, and the king asks the reason of his sorrow. Odysseus announces himself, and prays a friendly escort to his home. The quartet and chorus which follow — "Nowhere abides such delight as in the homestead" — are built upon one of the loveliest melodies in the cantata. A chorus of the people, speeding the parting guest, ends the number.

Meantime the young nobles of Ithaca and the neighboring islands have been swarming in the palace of Odysseus, and devouring his substance, each importunate for the hand of the supposed widow. Penelope puts them off until she has finished a certain web she is weaving, and carefully unravels each night what she has wrought by day. The eighth scene presents her at her loom, praying, as she weaves, for her husband's return.

The ninth scene is the homeward voyage. The helmsman, a bass voice, sings a song, as the boatmen row, and Odysseus slumbers. Still sleeping, he is placed upon the shore of his own country, and the song of the boatmen is heard dying away in the distance. Odysseus wakes, and the goddess Pallas appears, and vouchsafes her aid in recovering his kingdom and wife from the besieging suitors. Short work is made of the suitors. The tenth scene contains the meeting of Odysseus and Penelope, and the cantata ends brilliantly with the rejoicing of the people.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XVIII.

GET the general form, lightly; next the shadows, loosely, — not too much indicated. Having blocked it out, begin to define forms, giving those lines which are most characteristic. Don't keep up this white-washing process of pat, patting! or your work will grow softy, softy.

"I'm afraid of losing my drawing!"

Lose it, lose it? Why, you seem to think that your drawing is good, you are so anxious to keep it. Throw it away! Drawing is not one of the "lost arts." If you do lose it, you can find it.

You are all too intelligent to draw. You seem to say, "This model has black hair. Black, black, black!" and you get it nothing but black. Why, the light on a stove-pipe is whiter than the shadow on a white shirt. You all know too much to draw. Everything that you know you put down in black lines. You know that she has a line between her lips, and you make a note of it with charcoal; and as charcoal is black, all your notes are black.

Is that all the charcoal you have? You seem to be trying to "make it go round," — like boarding-school butter.

You must set yourselves ahead by studying fine things. If you don't you never will do them. I've told you over and over again whose works to draw, — Michael Angelo, Raphael, Albert Dürer, Hans Holbein, Mantegna. Get hold of something of theirs; hang it up in your room; trace it, copy it, draw it from memory over and over, until you own it, as you own "Casablanca," and "Mary had a little lamb." You can't draw an eye well until you know how some great master has drawn it. That's why, in Europe, they would make you draw three years from the antique before they would allow you to touch a brush.

But I want you to get more fun out of your work, so I let you go ahead by first studying "masses." Now, as you are strong on masses, don't keep eternally working on what is your strong point. Find out where your work is weak, and strengthen that. If you were going to raise a plain, would you cover it with little piles of earth, or would you put it all in one pile, and by and by let it topple over?

"But what if we are in the bottomless pit and can't see our way out of it?"

You'll have so large a number of people with you that you won't be lonely, and can have a jolly good time. Besides, being at the bottom, you can get no farther down, and will soon begin to go up. And it's going on and up that's the fun of studying, not the arriving at a place. Arriving is the end.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. — The fifteenth series of Symphony Concerts opened on Thursday afternoon, December 11, with a much larger audience, and with better promise altogether, than for several years past. The orchestra, enumerated on the programme as forty-seven instruments, was still further increased by the addition of two more second violins, so that it really counted forty-nine. The continued and thorough drill which its nucleus (the Philharmonic Orchestra) has for several months received from Bernhard Listemann, told in the well-formed habits and improved morale of all the work of this much larger combination, — the strings numbering twice as many as those of the Philharmonic, — and Mr. Listemann himself was at the head of the violins, inspiring their performance with new life and certainty. We give once more the programme, which proved on the whole extremely interesting and impressive: —

Overture to "Rosamunde" Schubert.
Trio Concerto, in C, for Piano-forte, Violin, and Violoncello. Op. 86 Beethoven.
Allegro. — Largo. — Rondo alla Polacca.
G. W. Sumner, Edward Heimendahl, and Frederick Giese.
Marche Nocturne, from "L'Enfance du Christ" Berlioz.
Overture to "Rip Van Winkle" (first time) George W. Chadwick.
Fifth Symphony, in C minor, Op. 67 Beethoven.

The performance of the Schubert Overture, so large and noble in its more serious portions, and so delightful and full of charm and sunshine in the lighter part, revealed at once the quality and temper of the orchestra. It was given to the general satisfaction, even of the most critical. We are not without sympathy with some who have complained of the Trio Concerto of Beethoven as being too long and prolix in its first and third movements; and we felt moreover that the great Music Hall was hardly the place for the best effect of the three concerted instruments dealing in so much bravura and rapid ornamental passage-work. Yet it is a composition full of fine thoughts, well rewarding study. The opening, by the orchestra, is of that pregnant sort, giving assurance of something growing, something coming, which is so characteristic of Beethoven. Its theme is most suggestive; and it is worked out with masterly skill, and imaginatively, only at tiresome length, with what seems, if in fact it be not, too much literal reiteration. The Largo, on the other hand, too short, is wonderfully beautiful, deep, serene, religious in its feeling. And the Finale might be called the masterpiece of all Polaccas, so full it is of piquant life and grace and unflagging enthusiasm, but for its excessive length again. The three principals were quite at home in their work, and gave on the whole an excellent interpretation. The thin tone of Mr. Heimendahl's violin was somewhat disappointing in so large a place, nor was his intonation always faultless, but his execution was sure, and clear and brilliant. Mr. Giese's cello tone is something marvelous in its beauty, sweetness (at least in the upper range) and fullness; although in the energy of his attack in the lower notes it is sometimes rough. His phrasing is masterly, most satisfactory; and there is a graceful ease and con amore in his playing which is quite delightful. Mr. Sumner achieved the difficult piano part with his accustomed even, fluent style.

The extremely interesting and poetic work of Berlioz from which the Marche Nocturne was taken was described at length in our last number. This little night patrol of Herod's soldiers in the streets of Jerusalem, on the eve of the slaughter of the innocents, has a singularly imaginative and Oriental tone and color. Its rhythm, however, is anything but martial. The movement is rather of people huddled together in leisurely disorder, and its whole style so pastoral and peaceful, that we could more easily imagine it to mean a Caravan, or say the Holy Family on its journey into Egypt. The march begins in the distance, where you hear nothing but the measured, muffled beat of the bass. As soon as the movement grows distinct, the violins set in with a melody which is more cantabile and sentimental than march-like. It is only when it gets nearer that you hear a quickstep motive, a little upward phrase of horns, which reminds one very much of Schubert's marches. But, as in the extracts we have lately heard from "The Flight into Egypt," there is a beautiful, romantic mingling of soft reed tones now and then, which has a delicate and characteristic charm. The piece was nicely played.

Mr. Chadwick's Overture more than justified the interest with which it was anticipated. It is a fresh, genial, thoroughly well-wrought, consistent, charming work. As in most Overtures with titles, and no opera to follow, it may be hard to trace the story of Rip Van Winkle through it. The introduction, with its violoncello phrase, may mean, to be sure, the waking of the sleeper; there are weird, strange hints perhaps of the scene on the mountain; a sinking to sleep, and a half revival of consciousness again with the same cello phrase, and then a bright and exciting finale which may be the scene in the village square with all the life and bustle of the triumphant revolution. But all this is of slight account compared with the musical themes and progress and symmetrical unfolding of the work. The slow introduction impressed us as the finest part; it opens rich and broad, and when the horns come in it is positively stirring. The two principal themes, worked up singly and together throughout the long Allegro, are happily chosen and effective. The instrumentation is rich and varied, full of pleasing contrasts, never glaring, but all artistically blended; indeed, the young man seems entirely at home in the orchestra. We perceived none of those traits of Wagnerism which some have felt themselves called upon to find in his scoring; the brass, to be sure, is freely used, but only richly, not overpoweringly. Each instrument is sympathetically treated in accordance with its genius. The whole piece is certainly effective, and more than merely pleasing. If it have no very marked, decided originality, it betrays no slavish imitation; it is uncommonly free from Mendelssohnian echoes; perhaps it suggests Rietz now and then; but for the most part it only shows that his productive spirit has been cradled in the home and atmosphere of all good music, in the Leipzig of the past and of to-day. The Overture was received with the heartiest applause and every sign of satisfaction, which must have been gratifying to the friends of the young man from his native city, Lawrence, of this State. It will doubtless be repeated in a future concert of the series. We desire to correct an impression very naturally conveyed by the words in which the success of Mr. Chadwick's Overture at the annual examination in Leipzig was referred to on the programme; the expression "won the palm" was figurative, meaning that it won the chief praise of the critics, and not that it took the prize, for no prizes are awarded upon these occasions.

The concert ended grandly with the glorious

Fifth Symphony. Is it too much to say that it never had a better rendering in Boston? This most familiar of all Symphonies, a household word with us for forty years, still holds an audience spell-bound as almost no other work, — at least when it is so well interpreted, so powerfully brought out. The veteran Conductor, Carl Zerrahn, may well feel proud of that day's work. And, full of solid matter as the programme was, the whole was over at ten minutes short of two hours, and no one was weary.

MADAME LUISA CAPPANI gave the first of her series of four concerts on December 8, in Mechanics' Hall. The occasion was interesting in many ways, notably so from the fact of its bringing before the public the indisputably fine results of Mme. Cappiani's teaching, in the shape of several of her advanced pupils. Mme. Cappiani herself is a master of Italian dramatic singing; she both possesses the true traditions, and has the power of embodying the traditions, of the music of Donizetti, Rossini, Verdi, and Meyerbeer. Whatever one may think of this sort of music, considered from a purely musical point of view, there is no doubt that it demands a perfection of vocal method and technique which can have only a salutary influence when applied to every school of vocal composition. In the matter of style there may be serious distinctions to be drawn, but in the matter of vocal training the Italian school is unapproached. One cannot but feel that Donizetti, Verdi, and Meyerbeer have not that commanding position on our concert stage which they once held. Yet they have not been banished from it, and there seems to be no probability of their being so for some time to come. It is a matter of great importance that the style of singing which the works of these composers demand should be perpetuated. It has in it the elements of all fine singing, and the modifications to be made in it when applying it to music of other schools are slight and secondary. The singer who cannot sing Di pescator ignobile, or M'odi, ah, m'odi, thoroughly well, can have little hope of doing much that is artistically satisfying with In des Leben's Frühlingstagen, or the grand aria in the "Freischütz." The perfection of vocal method and style that is required by "Spirto gentil" will enable a singer to surpass his less accomplished rival in singing a Franz or Schubert song. The impression made by Mme. Cappiani's pupils was a singularly fine one; a certain amateurish nervousness in face of an audience was, of course, unavoidable; but the tone was well and securely formed, the phrasing broad and vital, without ungraceful sliding from one note to another. In a word, the pupils showed that they comprehended the gist of their instruction, and were in a fair way to make the noble style of singing a second nature. Mme. Cappiani's own selections, embracing some of the larger forms of dramatic song and some charming things by Robert Franz, were unreservedly enjoyed.

Variety was given the concert by some excellent piano-forte playing by Mr. Hanchett and Mme. Constance Howard, the latter a pupil of Mr. Sherwood. This lady made a decidedly brilliant impression. She has a finely developed technique, and plays with both fire and discretion. Her performance of one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies was especially creditable. We hope to have fuller opportunity at some future time to duly appreciate her talent.

FIRST EUTERPE CONCERT. — The second season of these successful Chamber Concerts opened auspiciously on Wednesday evening, Dec. 10, at Mechanic's Hall, with essentially the same select and numerous audience that graced these concerts from the first. The majority, we fancy, were disappointed at not finding that arrangement of the hall which added so much to the social, genial aspect, and to the hearty enjoyment of the concerts last year, when the artists were placed on a platform in the middle of the square room, surrounded by the listeners. The return to the ordinary plan of having the audience all face the music in stiff rows may have some acoustical advantages, but the sympathetic listening mood was chilled proportionally; it is a good thing to have the hearer meet the musical intention half way; many a shade of discord, many a little deviation from absolute precision of outline, is virtually (subjectively) canceled by that wise provision in our nature.

The programme consisted of just two works, both in the Sonata form of several movements, namely, a Quartet by Haydn, and a Quintet by Beethoven. The interpreters were the newly organized Mendelssohn Quintette Club, consisting of Edouard Heimendahl, first violin, Gustav Dannreuther, second violin, Thomas Ryan, first viola, Carl Meisel (an old friend whom it is pleasant to see back here again), second viola, and Frederick Giese, violoncello. The Club, all youthful looking men, with the exception of its one surviving founder, Mr. Ryan, was never so finely constituted. The new violinist, Mr. Heimendahl, as we have said above, has rather a slender tone, but his execution is intelligent and nice, and he proves himself an excellent quartet leader. The cellist is a decided gain, with his beautiful, rich tone, sometimes sounding like a wind instrument, his faultless phrasing, his great power, and free-and-easy, yet firm, sure style. The rendering of the Haydn Quartet — a light and graceful, in the Scherzo and Presto finale even playful one (it is in E-flat, sometimes marked Op. 83, No. 2), — was highly satisfactory, indeed delightful, putting the hearer in the best state of appetite for the richer, deeper, more impassioned Quintet of Beethoven, the old favorite in C, Op. 29 (Comp. 1801), which was also given last year. This was very impressively rendered, and the exceptionally short, though rich feast was over in an hour and a quarter, sending us all home with an appetite for more; would it not be safe to make a little more out of such choice opportunities, — to the extent at least of one shorter piece?

PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA. — While the larger and purely classical Symphony Concerts have begun, the smaller nucleus orchestra of Mr. Listemann, with its more mixed and "popular" programmes, and its plentiful encores, has completed the course laid out for itself for the present. The fourth concert (Dec. 5) offered extra bait for audience in the announcement of the veteran Norwegian violinist, Ole Bull, who charms the crowd as ever. He has the same richness and sweetness of tone; the same perfection in certain technical arts of violin playing, such as his remarkable staccato runs, his pure high flageolet tones, his rare faculty of playing short cantabile strains in four-part harmony, etc. Also the same dreamy, wild, old bard-like rhapsodizing style of seeming improvisation in rather vague and formless compositions of his own, as illustrated this time in a piece called "Visions." Besides this he played a Fantasie Hongroise, by Ridley-Kohne, with a great deal of spasmodic, sudden accent, and a great deal of fond pursuing of a receding tone (after his old way) into unfathomed depths of silence. There was encore after encore, answered with fantastic variations upon popular melodies, after the well-known manner of the man.

There was also another attraction in the first appearance, after an absence of seven years abroad, of the singer Miss Sara Barton, who has many friends about here. In a grand Aria from Meyerbeer's Prophet: "L'ingrato m'abbandona," she revealed a voice of very large calibre and power, musical in the higher tones, descending to great contralto depths, where the tones, though strong, are somewhat hollow, and a well-taught method. She also showed dramatic force and fire. Her most obvious defect in singing was too much of the staccato, setting the notes apart; which in her later pieces, slower melodies, the "Lost Chord," by Sullivan, and "Home, Sweet Home," for a recall, seemed like planting each note like a separate mile-stone in a painful pilgrimage; both were sung extremely slow, — perhaps the fault, in part, of the organ accompaniment.

The concert opened with the first movement (new) of a Symphony for organ and orchestra, by Guilmant, — a clear, decided, almost march-like movement, in which the organ (played by Mr. C. H. Morse) kept remarkably well up with the orchestra. The composition is so interesting that one would like to hear the whole of it. An Andante Soave ("Gretchen"), from Liszt's Faust Sinfonie, was suave indeed, cloyingly so, and too much in the sickly sentimental vein of Wagner; what is worse, you felt no progress in it; it seemed spell-bound to one spot as in a nightmare; it reminded us of a bear fastened to a stake, restlessly traveling round and round in his own tracks. Doubtless ingeniously instrumented, and finely played. The "Rouet d'Omphale," of Saint-Saëns, was again performed with exquisite precision, delicacy, and fine spirit. Mozart's "Musical Joke" (Musikalischer Spass), for strings and horns, is a take-off of the innocent and painfully serious efforts of a party of rustic amateurs (Musikanten) to execute a piece of several movements in very common-place and literal classic form. It is entirely empty of ideal contents, and a little tedious for our day. But it has some amusing hits, such as silly cadenzas lengthened out with pride, plenty of barren fifths, hopeless dilemmas with the horns, and in the finale a brave attempt at fugue, where Dux gets quickly through and waits for Comes. Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," the Berlioz adaptation, closed the concert and was the best number of the programme.

The last concert (Saturday afternoon, Dec. 13) was as follows: —

- | | |
|---|--------------|
| Overture "Midsummer Night's Dream" | Mendelssohn. |
| Allegretto Scherzando from Symphony in F, No. 8 | Beethoven. |
| La Captive | Berlioz. |
| Miss Ita Welsh. | |
| First and Second Movements from 1st Concerto, | Max Bruch. |
| (With Orchestral accompaniment.) | |
| Timothée d'Adamowski. | |
| "Leonore," Symphonie | Raff. |
| (Two movements.) | |
| Hungarian Rhapsodie, No. 2 | Liszt. |
| Song "Maid of Athens" | Gounod. |
| Miss Ita Welsh. | |
| Waltz, "Life let us cherish" | J. Strauss. |
| a. Hungarian Dance, No. 2 | J. Brahms. |
| b. Chopin Nocturne | A. Wilhelm. |
| Timothée d'Adamowski. | |
| "Carnival in Paris," Episode | Svendsen. |

The fairy Overture and the Beethoven Allegretto were delightfully presented. But to our feeling, and no doubt that of many more, the Raff "Leonore" movements, the Svendsen "Carnival," both very skillful and ingenious, and even the Hungarian Rhapsody (for orchestra), — a kind of thing which has now grown very hackneyed and too apt to haunt the idle mind, — were far less edifying than that buoyant and refreshing Strauss waltz, which is all that it pretends to be; and absence of pretension is a rare charm nowadays.

We own to being captivated by that very original, beautiful, and touching song of Berlioz, the "Captive," and by Miss Welsh's sympathetic and expressive rendering of its several stanzas, each of which had its own poetic, delicate orchestral accompaniment. Gomol's "Maid of Athens," though a good song and well sung, sounded commonplace after it. The two movements from Max Bruch's Violin Concerto, in G minor, were extremely interesting, full of sterling musical matter, wrought out in a masterly manner; and the young Polish violinist was at his best in their interpretation, playing with vigor and precision, with breadth of style, and with refinement and true feeling. His is the sensitive and moody temperament which is not always at its best, as many with less music and less genius in them are. His smaller pieces, too, were very finely played; but best of all was the "Legende" by Wieniawski, which he played con amore for an encore, with Mr. Capen, with whom he has a perfect understanding, for accompanist at the piano-forte. His other encore piece, "The Witches' Dance," by Bazzini, is less suited to Adamowski; he plays it too fast for any clear, bold outline, nor is the piece worth the pains.

The concert was well attended, and the whole series has created confidence in Mr. Listemann's and the musicians' effort to establish a well-drilled nucleus orchestra, which shall be permanent, convenient for use here at the centre, and in other places within easy reach. The next important service of the Philharmonic will be in the University concerts at Cambridge; what it will then undertake is not yet made known. We would seriously suggest, however, in all kindness, the correction of two obvious faults in the concerts it has already given: (1) their excessive length, through the indulgence of encores; (2) the overloading of the programmes with so much of the modern effect music, which, in spite of its brilliancy and ingenuity, very soon grows heavy, in fact, indigestible.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, DEC. 1. — On Tuesday evening of last week we had an operatic concert at Steinway Hall. Many of Mapleson's troupe took part in the programme, and Mr. Rummell played two or three solos in his forcible way. One of his selections was Chopin's well-known and frequently played Polonaise in A-flat, Op. 53. This noble work requires great breadth of conception, vigor of execution, and delicacy of shading. Mr. R. grievously over-did the matter, and in his efforts to be massive succeeded, mainly, in being heavy and turgid; and yet, singularly enough, he rendered a lovely Nocturne (by the same author) in a really charming way. Mr. Van Gelder caused a genuine sensation by his admirable performance of Wieniawski's "Legende," and received a well-merited recall, to which he responded with Schubert's "Serenade." This was played without any accompaniment. The other participants in the programme were Mlle. Valleria, Mme. Ambre, Sig. Rancio, Sig. Del Puente, and Herr Behrens.

I have omitted to mention that on Saturday, Nov. 22, "one more unfortunate" came to grief; a young lady, whose name I charitably withhold, made her debut as a pianiste. She was assisted by several excellent artists whose efforts were deservedly applauded. The accompanist was by all odds the worst who has ever had the hardihood to inflict himself upon artists or audience.

On Wednesday evening Mr. Wm. Mueller gave a Chamber music Solon, assisted by the N. Y. Quintet Club and by Mr. Franz Rummell; this was the programme: —

Quartet, Op. 18, No. 4 Beethoven.
Sonata, D, Op. 18 (P. F. & Cello) Rubinstein.
Messrs. Moller and Rummell.
Quintet, F minor, Op. 34 Brahms.
Mr. Rummell and Quintet Club.

The lovely Beethoven Quartet was admirably rendered, and needs no commendation from my pen or any other. The Sonata, also, in a very noble composition, but only Mr. Muller's exceptionally broad and full tone saved him from being hopelessly engulfed by the pianist's fortissimos; these latter were simply appalling. The Brahms Quintet furnished a curious illustration of musical possibilities, and may well be likened to a geometrical problem set to notes; at least it made that impression upon me. There seemed to be an arid waste of intricately involved harmonic progressions upon which the sun (of melody) but rarely shone.

On Saturday evening, Nov. 23, the Oratorio Society gave an Eljink, and did it most admirably, too. Mr. Whitney and Miss Draxill won new laurels for themselves, and the chorus work was carefully and artistically done.

AROUS.

DEC. 8. — The Philharmonic Club, of New York, gave the second Solon of its series on Tuesday evening, Dec. 2, in Chickering Hall. The programme was an excellent one as you will observe: — Quartet, Op. 41 Schumann.

Sonata, Piano and Violin, Op. 78 Riff.
Messrs. Arnold and Rummell.
Four Songs Bruckner.

Piano Quintet, Op. 30 Goldmark.

An attentive and appreciative audience, of perhaps six hundred persons, listened to a careful and artistic rendering of the above selections. The Schumann Quartet is always lovely, and was played upon this occasion with great care and faithfulness; the Scherzo was notably well done, and reflected great credit upon Mr. Arnold and his able constituents. The brilliant Sonata by Raff was capably played by Messrs. Arnold and Rummell; the latter gentleman, indeed, excelled himself, for he neither indulged in his usual pounding, nor did he utterly ignore the facts that the pedal — if used at all — must be handled (if that expression be allowable) with the utmost care and delicacy. It is by no means certain that the really artistic element, which is perhaps latent in Mr. R.'s organization, may not yet assert itself in a worthy and gratifying manner; at all events his efforts on Tuesday evening were highly creditable to his taste, judgment, and self-control.

The Goldmark Quintet is an ungrateful affair, and is a striking illustration of the way in which musicianly treatment can be expended upon themes and motives that are undeniably commonplace and in some instances even trivial. It is wearisome by reason of its excessive length. It was well played by Mr. Rummell and the club.

This same club is doing a capital work here and deserves hearty encouragement; since the days of the Mason and Thomas concerts we have had only sporadic cases of chamber music, until of late years Messrs. Arnold and Werner started the present organization. Mr. W. — who is the business man of the concert — has great energy, excellent administrative capacity, and an ardent desire to advance the interests of good music among us; long may he wave! The third Solon will occur on Tuesday, Jan. 6, 1880.

AROUS.

BALTIMORE, DEC. 15. — The following is the programme of the Seventh Student's Concert given on Saturday last at the Peabody Conservatory, and to my mind the most interesting of those instructive concerts thus far: —

J. Haydn. 1732-1809.
String-Quartet, B-flat major. Work 76. No. 1. The fourth from the last of his string-quartets.

Messrs. Allen, Fincke, Schaefer, and Jungnickel.

J. S. Bach 1685-1750.

(a) Air from the White-tide cantata. For soprano, organ, and violoncello obligato.

Miss Lizzie Krüger, ex-student of the Conservatory.

(b) Tocata, E minor. For piano.

Miss Agnes Hoen, student of the Conservatory, 6th year.

Arthur Sullivan. 1812-

Songs for soprano and piano.

"Let me dream again."

"The lost chord."

Miss Lizzie Krüger.

Emil Hartmann. 1836-

Serenade. A major. Work 24. Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello.

"Idyl."

"Romance."

"Rondo — finale."

Miss Sarah Schoenberg, student of the Conservatory, sixth year, Messrs. Fincke and Jungnickel.

The symphony concert, for want of sufficient subscriptions, will probably be pushed off into the middle of January, unless the Peabody Institution does the proper thing by advancing the requisite veritas rerum very soon.

On the 8th prox. Sullivan is to be welcomed here in a grand concert by a large orchestra and chorus, rehearsals for which are already in progress.

Julius Macenhaus was produced here last week by the Hebrew Young Men's Society under the direction of Rabbi Dr. Keyser.

CHICAGO, DEC. 10. — Our new music hall has been opened to the public. The Apollo Club gave the first performance, presenting Hofmann's Cinderella, with Miss Litta, Miss McCarthy, and Mr. Oscar Steins as soloists. They had an orchestra of about forty men, and the chorus numbered one hundred and fifty singers. Before speaking of the performance, a word or two in regard to the new hall may not be out of place. "Central Music Hall," as its name implies, is located in the centre of the business portion of our city, and is thus accessible to the people from the north, south, and west parts of the town, for all the great lines of horse-cars have their termini at this point. The architectural proportions of the building are such as to give it a rather imposing and handsome appearance. The musical interest, however, centres in the hall itself. The auditorium measures 121 feet in length by 86 in width, while it is high enough to be in good proportion. Two galleries run round the building in horse-shoe shape; the lower one being what is termed the dress-circle. In the ceiling is a beautiful skylight, covering an area of 1,000 square feet, which is filled with a pretty combination of stained glass, imparting a brilliant appearance to the roof. The floors rise gradually as they recede from the stage, thus affording, from every line of seats, a full view of the platform. The seats are theatre chairs, only more roomy than those in general use; and, although there are places for 2,000 persons, every seat is a good one. In the parquet-circle there are ten stall-boxes, and eight in the dress-circle above; while on either side of the upper gallery there are three pavilion boxes, handsomely decorated in silver and blue. The frescoing is varied in form and color, embracing numberless tints, from the soft grey to bright reds, with enough silver and gold to afford contrast. Indeed, the whole appearance of the hall is brilliant, and had it a theatre stage, it might be rightly termed an opera house. On either side of the stage are two vacant places, covered for the present with drapery, which in the near future are to be filled with the organ; this in outward appearance will be divided into two parts. The foyer is richly ornamented, and covered with a handsome carpet, and contains some large mirrors; it can be cut off from the auditorium by curtains, which may be drawn at pleasure. There are pretty dressing apartments for the ladies, and even a smoking-room for gentlemen, while every attention has been given to provide reception rooms for the artists and orchestra at the stage end of the hall. Chicago is greatly indebted to Mr. George B. Carpenter and the wealthy gentlemen who aided him in his enterprise for thus giving us a home for our many musical performances. While we may not boast of a hall as grand and imposing as the Music Hall of Boston, we have at least one that is elegant, roomy, and comfortable.

The Cinderella of Hofmann, although not as broad a work as his Fair Melusine, is a composition that contains some very beautiful music, and indicates that a talented musician has written it. Perhaps at times there is a suggestion of Wagner in the instrumentation, and one or two numbers contain a hint or two of a musical thought not altogether his own; yet there is uniform excellence in the construction of the work that speaks of talent, if not of genius. The first scene introduces us to the fairies in the grove, and contains some pretty choruses, and a little solo work for the Fairy Queen — (contralto voice). Scene II. "In the King's Land," introduces, besides the chorus, a long solo for the king (baritone). Scene III. opens with a solo for Cinderella (soprano), and contains some pretty music. Scene IV. introduces the ball-room music, and the meeting of Cinderella and the king. There is a very charming waltz movement and chorus in this portion of the work, and there is a brightness and beauty about it that seems to paint the picture of the fairy-like grace and mystic loveliness of the scene in tone-colors most attractive. Scene V. pictures the king in the Forest endeavoring to find Cinderella. One chorus — "Will o' the Wispas" — has a very interesting movement, and is very pleasing. The closing chorus — a march movement — is a very beautiful climax, and brings the little story to a charming termination.

The Apollo Club, under the direction of Mr. Tomlin, has made great progress since last season. Their singing had a finish and an excellence more marked than ever before. In this club every member is made to understand what promptness means, and there is an intelligence in their work that shows that each individual singer understands his part. Thus we find a unity in their chorus work that admits of expression and purpose. Miss Litta did as well as could be expected, considering that her voice is more adapted for brilliant music of the operatic style. Her singing was sweet and sympathetic, and, if not fully satisfactory, at least not displeasing. Mr. Steins, who came from St. Louis to sing the part of the king, has not a correct method, or school of singing; while he gave the music with some attempt at some expression and idea, yet he was not satisfying in the role. To Miss McCarthy one must accord full praise. On the day of the concert the lady who came from Boston to sing the music of the Queen was announced as unable to appear, and although Miss McCarthy had never seen the score until that morning, she prepared the long and difficult part for the evening performance. Of course she did not do herself justice, but she sang the music with but few shortcomings, and she deserves high praise for aiding the club in its emergency.

Saturday evening the Beethoven Society gave one of its monthly reunions, presenting to its many patrons the following attractive programme: —

Solos for Violin, (a) Preludium, (b) Menuet Riea.
Mr. Carl Becker.

Trio for Voices, "The Holy Night," Lawson.

Mrs. Stacy, Miss Moran, and Mrs. Hall.

Solo for Violoncello, (a) Ave Maria Schubert.

(b) Nocturne Chopin.

Mr. Fichels.

Piano, (a) Stumbrung, (b) Etude Wolf/John.

Carl Wolf/John.

Songs, (a) "Schweigamkeit," (b) "Du meinster"

Solo schuster Traum," Lawson.

Mr. James Gill.

Aria, from "La Cenerentola" Rossini.
 Miss Julia Moran.
 Quintet, for Piano and String Instruments . . . Schumann.
 Messrs. Wolfsohn, Rosenhecker, Becker, Allen, and Eichheim.

The most important number was the Quintet of Schumann, which was finely performed. Mr. Schoenfeld, a young pianist who has just returned from Europe, was announced to play, but as he was prevented by illness from appearing, Mr. Wolfsohn gave two of his own compositions instead. The Etude in a bright and pleasing composition. Next Tuesday the Berthoven Society will give Max Bruch's setting of "The Lay of the Bell," with solos, full orchestra, and chorus. At the present time we are having some concerts by the Mme. Carlotta Patti combination. The programmes have been of the popular order, embracing all the time-worn selections that Mme. Patti gave us years ago. Mr. Toedt, the tenor, was good enough to sing some German songs, which, amid all the commonplace selections of the other singers, were most refreshing. The time will shortly come when this "popular" order of programme will have to go out of existence; for one can see that even the artist of some name and skill has almost lost the power to hold the attention of an audience with them. Let us have real music, that proclaims its right to live by its noble sentiment and refined beauty. C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, DEC. 12. — The Arion Club gave the first performance in America of Hoffmann's Cinderella, Dec. 4. The libretto is admirably adapted to its purpose, and the music is evidently the work of a very talented and accomplished musician. The melodies and rhythms are fine and effective, the harmony abounds in unexpected and old, but beautiful, modulations and cadences, the instrumentation is very rich, and the characterization admirable.

The performance of the Club left little or nothing to be desired, and Mr. Tulline conducted better than I ever knew him to do, and that is saying a great deal.

The soloists were Litta, who did her part superbly, Miss Julia A. Wells, of Boston, who did hers to the dissatisfaction of everybody, and Mr. Oscar Steine, a St. Louis baritone, who was moderately successful.

Wilhelm played here again Dec. 7th, giving us a concert by Max Bruch, and a "Bridal Song" by Max Vogrich, with piano and string quintet accompaniment. He also led a quartet (the Heine family) in the Andante and variations from Schenker's D minor Quartet. The Heines played the first movement of a piano quartet by Reisziger, Op. 108. Mr. Vogrich played the first movement of the Romantic Appassionata and Liszt's Somnambul, and showed by what he did and what he did not do that he is a virtuoso and also that he is not a great artist. At least, if he is, he will need to show it in other things, and there is a strong presumption that he is not. Mme. Salvetti is not a singer in whose praise I can say much.

The Patti combination gave a concert here last night, with a light programme. Mme. Patti was in bad voice, in fact totally unfit to sing; she seems to have been in the same condition during the whole of her Western trip. It seems hardly honest to accept the high prices charged on the strength of her reputation. Such a thing might be excused once or twice, but when it is kept up for weeks it looks much like a swindle. Mr. De Munch has a noble, broad, sympathetic tone, and consummate execution. Mr. Ketten played a Handel Hourie and Mendelssohn's Capriccio, Op. 16, No. 2, in a very artistic and satisfactory way. His playing of the Liszt Second Rhapsody was astonishingly frank, and by no means poetic, but masterly in point of virtuosity. Mr. Toedt's tenor voice is powerful and well trained, and his style good for what he attempted. Sig. Clampi-Cellaj was on the whole less satisfactory.

The 267th (concert of the Musical Society brought us a miscellaneous programme of male choruses, soprano solos, (by Miss Jennie Dutton, of Chicago, a pleasing and good singer), violin solos, and, finally, Heinicke's "Schneeerittchen," a pleasing child's piece. (Märcchen). The choruses were done excellently. The violin solos were by Mr. Carl Troll, a new comer here, and were not remarkable either for good tone or for style or interpretation. His execution is very good. J. C. F.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE first University Concert occurred on Thursday evening of this week, at the Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. We shall report it in our next number.

— The second Harvard Symphony Concert comes on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 1. The programme will be found among our advertisements. In the third concert, Jan. 15, the Pothumoon Symphony by Hermann Goetz, which has been so much admired in Germany and England, will be given for the first time in this country. In the fourth concert, Jan. 22, the "Scotch" Symphony by Mendelssohn, and probably also the charming little "Oxford" Symphony by Haydn, the Entr'acte from Cherubini's Medea, a repetition of Mr. Chadwick's Rip Van Winkle Overture, etc. The Symphony Fantastique, by Berlioz, will figure in the fifth concert, Feb. 12; Beethoven's No. 4, in B-flat, in the sixth, with Mendelssohn's Ode by all the strings, and probably a Pianoforte Concerto played by Mr. Lang. The new feature of the seventh concert will be Professor Palma's "Spring"

Symphony. — Its first public performance. For the eighth and last in reserved the great Schubert Symphony "of heavenly length," and (first time) the Concertatic, Op. 86, for four horns with orchestra, by Schumann. Other interesting features of the series, solo artists, etc., will be announced in due time.

— Mr. Mapleson's Italian Opera Company will perform for two weeks at the Boston Theatre, beginning Dec. 23, with Mme. Marinon (who replaces Gerster) in La Sonnambula. The succeeding will be of the very familiar kind: Marta, La Figlia del Reggimento, Alba, Linca di Chiamoni, and La Traviata. The company includes Mme. Lablache, Mme. Caliste Piccoli (better known in Boston as Miss Huntley), Mme. Amara, Misses Marinon, Valerie, Hobbati, Cary, Signora Campanini, Del Puente, Grazi, Rinalini, Behrens, Telakli, Kuncia, Galassi, and Montidartit will conduct.

— The first of a series of four sacred concerts will be given in the new Novelty Theatre, corner Dover and Washington Streets, beginning to-morrow evening, when Rossini's Saint Peter will be sung. Mrs. Charles Lewis, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Charles R. Adams and Mr. D. M. Babcock will sustain the solo parts, and a full chorus of experienced singers will unite with an orchestra, to give a noteworthy rendering of this brilliant and always popular work. The second part of the concert will consist of a well selected and interesting programme of miscellaneous music by soloists and chorus.

— A season of twelve performances of English opera will be given in the Globe Theatre during next March, in which Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Schirmer, Miss Emma S. Howe, Mrs. George Upton, Miss McAnn, Miss Abbott, Miss Clara Poole, Miss Barton, Mr. Tower, Mr. Waut, Mr. Caniman, Mr. Mark Smith, Mr. Hay, Mr. Babcock and Mr. Charles R. Adams will take part. "La Juive," "The Mock Doctor," "Martha," "Pré aux Clercs," "Crown Diamonds," and "Tannhäuser" will be produced. The Boston Operatic Society — formed for the purpose of advancing this object — will furnish the chorus, which will number one hundred trained voices. There will be a full orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Zerrahn and Mr. Mullaly. The production and preparation of the operas will be under the immediate charge of Mr. Charles R. Adams, whose ability and ample experience fit him peculiarly for such work. The subscription price for the twelve performances, with reserved seat in orchestra or balcony, will be ten dollars. Subscription papers will be put in circulation at once.

— The programmes of the Josoff concerts have been made out in part, and certainly give promise of much enjoyment. The Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, Bernhard Listemann, conductor, will assist on all three occasions, and the following works will be among Josoff's selections: Tuesday evening, January 13 — concerto in E-flat, Beethoven; piano-forte solo; concerto in E-flat, Liszt. Friday evening, January 16 — concerto E minor, Chopin; piano-forte solo; Hungarian fantasia, Liszt. Saturday afternoon, January 17 — second concerto in F minor, Chopin; concerto in E-flat, Beethoven; Andante, Andante and Polaris, Chopin.

— Next Monday evening the Cecilia will perform with orchestra, for the first time here, a very interesting and important work, the Olysses (Ulysses) of Max Bruch. The Club has had prepared an Argument of its story, covering about the whole field of Homer's Olysses, which we copy on another page. Mr. Charles R. Adams is to sing the role of Ulysses, which suits him admirably. The Apollo Club, too, is preparing an important work for its next concert, the Odysseus at Cumae by Mendelssohn.

FOREIGN.

LOXDOX. The Musical Standard (Dec. 6) has the following paragraph: what is said in the latter portion of it is applicable to our own country as well as to England: —

"The winter musical season is now at its height. Classical music proper flourishes at the Crystal Palace and the Saturday and Monday Popular Concerts; and St. James's Hall is opened on almost every night of every week for a concert of some kind or other. Italian opera, at cheap prices, is running gayly at Her Majesty's Theatre, — Orion on Tuesday, Mignon on Wednesday, Curwen on Thursday, Lohengrin on Friday, and Alba to-day, representing the present state of affairs at that house. Concerts are being given nightly all over the country; and in the great centres high-class work is being done in all directions for the spread of a love of musical art amongst all classes. Birmingham, Manchester, Bristol, Liverpool, Leeds, Edinburgh, Glasgow, are all busy in this respect; and the lower towns have, most of them, their choral society, conducted by the indefatigable church-organist or local professor of music. In the midst of this musical life and activity, we would remind our readers of Hiller's remark about his own country, — that if there were less music, people would probably be more musical; and until public taste is cultivated to higher standards there is some fear that the spread of musical knowledge will not bring us any nearer the repute of being 'a musical nation.' Conductors and promoters of societies can do much by firmly and judiciously declining to produce what is not good, to elevate public taste. The amount of rubbish which often reaches us in the way of 'New Songs' for review — and some of which we are down in programmes only too often — proves how necessary it is to exercise care in the selection of material for concerts. The public will applaud almost anything; the responsibility rests with those who, knowing this fact, pander to the public, and secure for themselves temporary applause and profit by singing and playing such stuff."

— Maurice Dengerment, the twelve-year-old boy whose playing of the Mendelssohn violin concerto at a recent Crystal Palace exhibition took all London by storm, is said to be coming to this country next year. Nothing like his performance had been heard since Vieuxtemps's debut in the same piece and the same place twenty-five years before. His photographs show him a charming-looking little fellow in knickerbockers, with a refined, intelligent, and sympathetic face, and luscious, wavy hair. — Tribune.

— The ninth Crystal Palace Concert had for programme: Symphonie, "La Chasse" Haydn.
 Sonata, "Ah! perfido!" Beethoven.
 Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington.
 Concerto for Piano-forte and Orchestra (MS.)

Shakespeare.
 Pianoforte, Miss Kube.
 Recit., "La Dea di tutto or," and aria, "Bella adorata Incognita" Mercantante.
 Mr. Shakespeare.

Variations for the Orchestra on a theme by Haydn, Bruckna.
 Song, "In a distant land" Tausch.
 Largo, from "Sere" Humbel.
 Arranged for Organ, Solo Violin, Harp, Violina, and Viola, by Hellmesberger.

Overture, "Der Freischütz" Weber.
 Conductor August Manna.
 Miss Lillian Bailey was to have made her first appearance at these concerts, but owing to illness was compelled to disappoint the audience, who were, however, well supplied with a substitute in the person of Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, who made a great impression by her splendid singing of Beethoven's arena and Tausert's song.

Of Mr. Shakespeare's concerto much might be said in praise of the fertile fancy, graceful style, and thorough musicianship displayed in its composition. The scoring is excellent, and the pianoforte part afforded ample opportunity for Miss Kube to display her mastery of the instrument, and her thorough understanding of the meaning of the composer.

— M. Saint-Saëns is to make his first appearance to-day, when he will play his third concerto, for piano and orchestra, and conduct his poetic symphonique, "La Rouet d'Omphale."

MANCHESTER, ENO. — At a recent performance of Jud's Macbeth, under the direction of Charles Hallé, the principal singers were Miss Lillian Bailey, Mrs. Warren, Mme. Patey, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Herr Henschel. The Examiner says: "Miss Bailey's voice is a pure soprano of sympathetic quality, sweeter and more expressive indeed than powerful, but as the young artist never over-estimates her resources, the listener is never offended by anything like undue forcing. Miss Lillian Bailey has evidently enjoyed the advantages of most careful training, and she had certainly carefully studied the music. A more refined and correct delivery of the pathetic song 'Pious Oracles' we have seldom heard. At its end there was loud applause from every part of the hall, and even more enthusiastic manifestations of approval followed her brilliant delivery of 'From Mighty Kings,' which only wanted a little more abandon to be all that could be desired, and her not less effective rendering of 'So shall the lute and harp awake.' It will certainly be Miss Lillian Bailey's own fault if she does not secure a permanent place in the ranks of English oratorio singers."

LEIPZIG. — The great attraction at the sixth Gewandhaus Concert was Mme. Clara Schumann, who performed Beethoven's Concerto in G major, a Scherzo by Mendelssohn, and some pieces by Brahms. She was greatly applauded and recalled. The concert opened with an unpublished overture, entitled Frau Arcturius, composed by the late Franz von Holstein, and scored by his friend, Albert Dietrich. — M. Léo Delibes' comic opera, Le Roi et le Duc, has been favorably received at the Stadttheater.

PARIS. — At the Concert Populaire on Sunday, Nov. 23, M. L'Andou, director, the first act of Berlioz's La Prie de Trévise was sung. Other numbers of the programme were: Beethoven's first Symphony; Allegretto agitato of Mendelssohn; Larghetto by Handel, with solo solo; Murche Slave, by M. V. Jonckere.

— At the Châtelet, on the same day, the programme was: Fragments from Schumann's Manfred; Air from Rossini's Siege of Corinthe, sung by Faure; Serenade, Op. 8, of Beethoven; Fragments from Etienne Marrel, by Saint-Saëns; Overture to Oberon, M. Colonne, conductor.

MUNICH. — Herr Eduard Riel began on the 14th ult., at the Theatre Royal, the celebration of his fiftieth anniversary as basso there. In his honor Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor was performed, he himself impersonating Sir John Falstaff, a part in which he used greatly to distinguish himself. On the following Friday he appeared as Escalus in Lortzing's Wildschütz, and concluded the celebration a few days afterwards by undertaking the character of Dr. Bartolo in Der Barbier von Sevilla.

WHAT IS THE PHYSICAL BASIS OF UNITY BETWEEN THE DIFFERENT MOVEMENTS OF A SONATA?

UNITY is a conspicuous trait of the Beethoven Sonata. It extends not only through each separate movement considered by itself, but through the entire group of the three or four movements constituting the Sonata form. Let any one who is familiar with all the Sonatas, and in sympathy with them, ask himself whether a movement might not be transplanted from one Sonata to another of similar key without impairing the effect. Doubtless there are young musicians ready to assure me that this is quite possible, and that in some cases it might be done even with improved effect. But older musicians will universally dissent, I fancy. The Adagio of the Sonata pathétique belongs there, and in no other Sonata. Transplant it to the Sonata in C minor, Op. 10, or to the Op. 111, and it would be shockingly out of place. Again, play this very Adagio alone, and it produces a delightful effect, to be sure. But play it in connection with the tumultuous Allegro before it, and how much more beautiful it becomes! Some of this added beauty is derived from the contrast the slow movement then makes with the one before it, — a contrast, if possible, greater in the spirit of it than in the outer written form. Contrast is an essential element of the beautiful in music, because music is emotional.

The unity of each separate movement within itself we may easily understand. It lies in the preponderance of a leading motive, the succession of tonality, and the rhythmic balancing of the leading subject and episodes. But to find the source of unity between two movements not structurally related, and of different key and tempo, is not so easy. I have often sought for it in vain, and have often asked older and wiser musicians; but here their wisdom failed them. I was told that it is an ideal unity. Now what, I ask, is an ideal unity between two discourses apparently in different keys and with entirely different subjects? Is there, or can there be, an ideal unity without somewhere a physical basis? Remember that thought implies brain; nutrition implies digestion and absorption; all our moral ideas, nay, all the words we use to tell them with, are raised up out of the domain of the physical. And so I have always felt that there must somewhere be a physical basis of the unity of the different tempos of a Sonata.

This basis I think I recently stumbled on. It is in a stable of unit rhythmical pulsation running through all the movements of a Sonata, so that the entire Sonata may be artistically played with the metronome at the same figure (in-so-far, that is, as even a single movement can be artistically played by metronome). Yet this parenthetical reservation is by no means so serious as the casual reader would suppose, for a Sonata can be played with very fair effect at a uniform tempo, with only the rubatos that can be made within the measure.

Properly speaking, the unity of a movement lies equally in two elements: the movement or rate and manner of going, and the subject-matter. In a Sonata-piece there are at least three quite well defined ideas; and sometimes, as in the first movement of the Sonata appassionata, four. These are in different keys and totally unlike. They are held together by the uniform rhythmic pulsation in all of them, and by the sequence and comprehension of their tonality. They work together to leave upon the competent hearer a feeling of satisfaction, as from agreeable and coherent discourse.

This impression rests, much more than commonly supposed, in the uniform rhythmic pulsation. This we may immediately realize when we reflect how a decided change in the speed at the entrance of the second subject, as in the principal movement of a Sonata, impairs the unity. It may intensify the dramatic expression, but it certainly impairs the unity.

The tempo changes. An entirely new movement begins. Thus, for example, in Beethoven's first Sonata (F minor, Op. 2), we begin Allegro in F minor, 2-2 (half-note = 104, Czerny's tempo). It changes to Adagio 3-4 in F major; Czerny's tempo is eighth = 80. This, again, changes to Menuetto in F minor, 3-4 dotted half = 69. This again to Prestissimo 2-2, half = 104. We see here no stable rhythmic unit, except between the first movement and the last. There we stumble on one of the curiosities of tempo. In the first it is, 2-2 half = 104, Allegro; in the last the very same, but Prestissimo. Why? Because in the Allegro the fastest motion is of eighths, and the leading motion is of quarters. In the latter the motion is eighth triplets, that is at the rate of 624 notes in a minute instead of 416. This tempo is very fast. The Adagio in no way agrees with it. If, however, we take the metronome at 52 it will give us whole measures in the first movement, and quarter-notes in the second, and at this speed the second movement is very satisfactory. The Menuetto then follows at the same rate (the beats being measures again) with good effect. The finale as before. My pressure on the Czerny tempos may be excepted to, and perhaps ought to be. But to me the Adagio comes more satisfactorily when it pre-erves a definite ratio to the first movement. By making it very slightly slower, as 92 for eighths, the repose of it may be intensified. The beautiful Sonata in C, Op. 2, goes very well on the same plan. The metronome beats at 80 (Czerny), which gives half-notes in the first, eighths for the second, measures for the third and fourth. This tempo for the finale is extremely rapid. Czerny gives 58.

The Sonata in E-flat, Op. 7, sounds not badly at the rate of 60. This gives measures for the first movement, eighths for the second, two measures for the third, and half-measures for the finale. Czerny's marks are (on the same basis) 58, 80, 72 (measures), and 60. My theory agrees with his beginning and ending. He takes the "Largo, con gran espressione" much faster than I propose; and the Allegro, 3-4, much slower, and, in fact, as it seems to me, too slow. But it does not invalidate my theory of a basis of unity, if the tempos are locally varied by a small degree (imperceptible in hearing, except in an impression of greater or less repose). My tempo gives in the first movement 360 notes a minute, in the second at the sixteenth note motion 120; in the third 360, and at times (as also in the first movement) 720. The finale gives only 240 notes in a minute — hence the Allegretto.

Czerny's marks for Sonata Pathétique, if I have them correctly copied, are curious. They are for the Grave, "eighth = 92;" Allegro, "half = 144;" Adagio, "eighth = 54;" Rondo, "half = 96." Bülow, on the other hand, requires a sixteenth in the Grave to have the same time as a half in the Allegro. Czerny's Adagio is entirely too slow.

Taking 60 for the pulsation, it gives us eighths in the Grave, whole measures in the Allegro, eighths in the Adagio, and whole measures in the Rondo. In this way the two Allegros correspond with their 480 notes in a minute, and the slow movements agree in having but 120 to 180.

So, also, Czerny gives for the first two tempos of the Sonata in E, Op. 14, for the Allegro, "half = 66;" for the Allegretto, "dotted half = 69." The Rondo is "tempo comodo," and easily enough agrees with the first movement, although I have not the figures here. This uniformity obtains where I did not expect it. Thus, for example, Czerny marks the Sonata in E-flat, Op. 27, No. 1, Andante, "quarter = 66;" Allegro, "dotted quarter = 104" (disagreement); Allegro, "dotted half = 112;" Adagio, "eighth = 66;" Finale, "quarter = 132," or half = 66. Thus in this quasi Fantasia we have three of the five movements on a common unit of pulsation. The tempos of the "Moonlight" Sonata I neglected to copy. In the Appassionata Bülow gives Allegro, "dotted quarter = 126;" Andante, "eighth = 108;" Allegro, ma non troppo, "quarter = 132." So, also, in the apparently loosely connected but lively Sonata in A-flat, Op. 110, Czerny gives, Moderato, "quarter = 76;" Allegro molto, "dotted half = 120;" Adagio, "eighth = 66;" Fuga, "dotted quarter = 100." Bülow gives 69, 126 (= 63), 63, and 69. In the grand Opus 111, Czerny gives, "eighth = 108," "quarter = 132," and for the Arietta "dotted quarter = 63." Bülow's tempos are, "quarter = 52," "half = 66," and "dotted eighth = 48," which indicates a remarkably close correspondence, capable of being made yet closer without detriment, by taking the Arietta at 52, which perhaps improves it.

I have thus gone into the question at some length, for the ground was new and interesting to me. Perhaps it may be old to my readers. The real test of it, of course, is to be made by artists.

Is there a physical basis for the unity of the different movements in a Sonata? This is the question. W. S. B. MATHEWS.

ANTON DVORAK.

(Translated from the Neue Freie Presse.)

THE persons who attended the first Philharmonic Concert read in the programmes for the first time the name of Anton Dvorak, and, for the first time, heard a composition, "Slavische Rhapsodie für Orchester" (A-flat major, No. 3), by the Unknown aforesaid. Berlin, Breslau, and Pesth had preceded us in the performance of this composition; in most of the larger musical towns of Germany, and even in London, the work is to be found in the list of novelties for the season. Then the composer has achieved a position very rapidly? All at once, and yet very slowly. He had to go through bitter years of privation and heap up piles of compositions, ere fortune smiled on him, and he was lucky enough to become known and appreciated. Dvorak was born in 1841, in a Bohemian village, near Kralup, on the Moldau. All the week he had to help his father in the latter's trade, but was allowed to play on Sundays in church, and at dances. When he was a youth of eighteen, the yearning for more thorough instruction in music impelled him irresistibly to Prague, where that excellent musician, Director Pietsch, received him into the organ school. Dvorak at first earned the means of subsistence as a member of the band at the Bohemian Theatre, and subsequently as organist in several of the churches of Prague, with a brilliant annual salary of thirty, then sixty, and finally one hundred and twenty florins. Amid incessant cares and privations, he composed with uninterrupted and fiery zeal a large number of choruses, and wrote things for the chamber and the orchestra, including even to Czeckish operas at the Landestheater, without any amelioration of his wretched circumstances.

The happy notion then struck him of applying to the Minister of Instruction in Vienna for an "artist's stipend." These stipends are granted annually by the state to assist "young and talented artists without means." Most of them are with perfect justice awarded to painters and sculptors, the last part of whose professional education necessitates as a rule expensive travels for the purpose of study. Such exhibitions cannot possibly foster to an equal extent the native talent for composition; still even in this respect they have not failed to bring forth good fruit. It is true that in many instances talent does not realize all it at first seemed to promise. Nay, a number of talented persons apply who do not even promise anything. Among the petitions which, bending beneath the weight of scores, are annually forwarded to the Minister for a stipend, the largest number usually come from composers who, of the three indispensable qualifications — youth, want of means, and talent — possess only the first two and waive all claim to the third. It was then a very agreeable surprise when one day Anton Dvorak, a petitioner from Prague, sent in proofs of an intensive talent for composition, though it was a talent still in fermentation. We recollect, for instance, a symphony pretty wild and untrammelled, but, at the same time, so full of talent, that Herbeck, then a member of our committee, interested himself warmly for it. After that Dvorak received every year his artist's stipend, which freed him from his most oppressive musical forced drudgery. And in this position it seemed that matters were unfortunately destined to remain. Although such material assistance afforded by the state undoubtedly carries within it moral assistance as well, Dvorak remained in his native land without an appointment and without a publisher.

It was not till Brahms had been summoned by Herr Stremayr, the Minister, to replace Herbeck on the committee, that the recognition of Dvorak's talent took the necessary practical turn. Brahms, who by deed as well as by words aids every serious effort of pronounced talent, — himself remaining unobserved and silent as Schumann once used to do, — obtained a publisher for Dvorak, whose modesty amounted to timidity. Dvorak's "Slavische Tänze" and "Klänge aus Mähren" were now published by Simrock. The merit of being the first publicly to recognize the unknown composer belongs to L. Ehlert, who praises the above compositions with kindly eloquence in the Berliner National-Zeitung. "Here," says Ehlert, "is at last another instance of genuine talent, and moreover of genuinely natural talent. I consider 'Die Slavischen Tänze' a work which will go round the world. Heavenly naturalness flows through this music, and is the reason of its great popularity. There is no trace of aught artificial or labored. We have to do with something thoroughly artistic, and not with a pasticcio, made up at hazard of national reminiscences. As is always the case with broadly constituted talent, humor has a very large share in Dvorak's music. Dvorak writes such merry and original basses that they cause the heart of a real musician to leap again with joy. The duets, too, on some exceedingly pretty Moravian folk-songs, are of exhilarating freshness." So favorable was the opinion of one of our most eminent critics, though he was not acquainted with Dvorak's more important works for the orchestra and the chamber. Herr Taubert, Royal Prussian Capellmeister, had Dvorak's third "Rhapsodie" recently performed at one of the Symphony-Soirées of the Royal Chapel, an unusual mark of distinction, considering the classical and conservative character of the above concerts. Immediately afterwards, and likewise in Berlin, Joseph Joachim played Dvorak's Stringed Sextet. Thus they are thoroughly German authorities who have drawn Dvorak from his native obscurity and greeted him as a man of unusual talent. We emphasize this fact, because it refutes the ridiculous suspicion that Dvorak's reputation is the work of the National-Czeckish party. His fellow-countrymen in Prague naturally patronized in their way the composer of Czeckish operas, but "bei all ihrem Protegiren hätten er können" . . . ("despite all their patronage, he might," etc.). See Heine's Poems.

There has really been no propaganda at work on the part of Prague for Dvorak, and even had such a thing been attempted, how far does Czeckish pleading penetrate in the world of art? The national antipathy and political opposition, evident in certain Viennese opinions of Dvorak's "Rhapsodie," would here be without justification, even were such considerations ever allowable in matters of pure art. If any opposition was contemplated by the public and the critics against the art-descent of Dvorak's work, it has really affected not Prague — but Berlin. The "Rhapsodie" was received respectfully but not warmly. After the impression produced at the grand rehearsal, we expected it would have made a more lively impression. With its fresh, easy, flowing style, it has something about it which carries one away. By its national character and sensual charm, and also by the easy breadth of its form, which is somewhat diffusive and not stiffly put together, it reminds the hearer of Schubert. The very beginning preludes in an extremely happy fashion an andante motive first given by the harp alone, and then strengthened most pleasingly by the wind instruments, a motive which is reflective, not sorrowful; only breathing a little touch of sadness. When we have the same motive rhythmically abridged as an Allegro in three-four time, the effect is marvelous. Then onward it sweeps in a whirl of joyousness. He who could write the first fourteen bars of this score must be called a man of extraordinary talent, genuine and sound. The themes of the "Slavische Rhapsodie" are no national melodies, but free inventions of the composer. As its name implies, the "Rhapsodie" has not the set form of a Sonata or an Overture; it is in one movement, but many parts. It cannot be charged with being too mixed; the whole of it is carried out with two motives, which undergo all kinds of transformations effected with contrapuntal cleverness. It must, on the other hand, be regarded as a mistake that the composer does not know how to end at the right moment, but, after several preliminary starts, suddenly comes to a full stop or turns back again. Despite its length, the "Rhapsodie" does not weary for a moment; the mere charm of the instrumentation would not allow it to do so. Dvorak's orchestral effects, moreover, by no means belong to the artificial flowers sown at will on a piece of tapestry; they are natural blossoms, or rather something flowering brightly forth from out the musical germ, and not to be thought of apart from it. Everything in the work denotes an extraordinary feeling for genuine orchestral effect. EDUARD HANSLICK.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF HANDEL.

PART 27. CHAMBER MUSIC.¹

THE great edition of the works of Handel is now approaching completion. Sixty-four parts have already appeared, including the large majority of the oratorios, the whole of the miscellaneous sacred music, most of the secular cantatas, twenty-four of the operas, and the greater part of the instrumental works; and it is, we believe, confidently expected that the entire works of the composer will be published by the year 1885 — the bi-centenary of his birth. The present edition differs from all that have preceded it, not only in containing a large number of works which have not been previously published, but in giving many which have already appeared in a far more complete form than that to be found in earlier editions. As instances may be named the score of Israel in Egypt with the composer's original trombone parts, that of Saul with Handel's complete indications of the organ part, the warlike

Symphony in the second part of Joshua, and the final Choruses to the second and third parts of Belshazzar, all of which were new to musicians. The volume now before us presents some very interesting pieces now published for the first time.

It cannot, of course, be maintained that Handel's instrumental music will at all stand on the same level with his great oratorios. In the very nature of things this is impossible. The development of the modern orchestra, and of the form of the Sonata and Symphony by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, has caused the older forms to become almost, if not altogether, obsolete. When Handel wrote, the Symphony, as we now know it, had no existence; the Suite was its predecessor and its then representative; and most of Handel's instrumental works, whether entitled Sonatas, Trios, or Concertos, bear more or less relation to the Suites. In these days the Suite is no longer employed as a vehicle for musical thought, unless the composer wishes to write in the antique style. The interest, therefore, which is awakened by such music as this of Handel's is to a considerable extent, though by no means entirely, historical, not to say antiquarian.

The present volume contains the whole of Handel's chamber music which has come down to us. We first find fifteen solo Sonatas for flute, oboe, or violin, with a figured bass for the harpsichord. These in modern nomenclature would probably be called duets, as the harpsichord, though it only has the accompaniment, is of considerable importance in all the pieces; but Dr. Chrysander in his preface mentions a curious anomaly, namely, that while a composition for two violins and a figured bass was called a Trio, one for a single violin with a figured bass was called not a Duo but a Solo. It should be added that both works would also be entitled "Sonatas," — at that time a vague name as regards form, and applied to almost any extended piece of instrumental music other than a Suite.

The first works in this volume are fifteen Sonatas or Solos, of which six are for violin, seven for flute, and two for oboe, with an accompaniment for harpsichord. That the latter instrument was obligato is proved not only by the figured bass, but also by the fact that in some cases (for example in No. 5) passages are found for the harpsichord alone. With the exception of the Sonata in A, No. 3, which has been often played by Herr Joachim, Mr. Henry Holmes, and other violinists, this series of solos is almost entirely unknown. According to his usual custom, Handel has borrowed from himself, and arranged various movements from other works. Thus, the finale of the second Sonata is founded on that of the third Organ Concerto, while No. 11 is merely an arrangement as a solo for flute of the fifth Organ Concerto. In No. 13 (now printed for the first time), we find a very interesting movement founded on the subjects afterwards used for the Fugue in "From the censer" (Solomon).

The six Sonatas for two oboes and bass which come next in the volume have a special musical interest, as being beyond a doubt the earliest known works of Handel. They were written about 1696, when the composer was eleven years of age, and are now printed for the first time from a manuscript copy in the library of Buckingham Palace. Their interest is mainly historical; they are antiquated in style, but the contrapuntal skill shown in them proves that Handel as a boy was in precocity of genius but little behind Mozart.

The two sets of Trios (Ops. 2 and 5) which complete the present collection had been for the most part previously published by Walsh, and they are also included in Arnold's edition of Handel, though they are here supplemented by some numbers not before printed. To a large extent they are compilations from other works, and were probably written rather to meet the requirements of publishers than from any desire of production on the part of the composer. Thus in Op. 2 No. 4 contains the greater part of the Overture to Esther, with the first movement of the second Organ Concerto for a finale; while in Op. 5 we find in No. 1 the Overture to the Chandos Anthem, "I will magnify Thee;" in No. 2 the Overture to the "Jubilate;" in No. 4 that to Athalia; in No. 5 the Fugue in E minor from the first set of "Suites de Pièces," with some slight alterations, and transposed into G minor; while in No. 7 the Fugue is taken from the Overture to the Chandos Anthem, "O sing unto the Lord a new song," and the final minuet from the air "Lascia la Spina," in the second version of Il Trionfo del Tempo. In most of these Sonatas short movements, such as Bourrées, Gavottes, etc., are added to complete the work; but a large portion of the matter contained in them is, as has been said, put together from other sources. — *Lond. THE CONSERVATOIRE OF PARIS AND ITS CLASSICAL CONCERTS.

THE Conservatoire and its concerts are both interesting subjects, though not equally so. The concerts are probably the most perfect in the world, not excepting even those of Leipzig, Vienna, or London, each of which has claimed a similar honor. The Conservatoire, however, cannot justly be ranked so high. It is a useful institution, and does a good deal for the musical and dramatic arts in France; but there are schools in Italy, Germany, and Belgium, superior and more famous. In addition to numerous class and lecture rooms devoted to the teaching of various branches of the sister arts, the Conservatoire boasts a small, well-composed musical library, a fine museum of musical instruments (too seldom visited), and a tiny theatre or concert-room (for it serves both purposes); of which I shall speak more particularly. The library is at present in the charge of that erudite and singular composer, M. Wekerlin, — a bibliophile of the old sort, and the author of many charming works, literary as well as musical. Most of the manuscripts stored away on the shelves of the library are Prix-de-Rome compositions. I was first introduced to the secluded attractions of the Conservatoire library by M. Chouquet, the benevolent and learned custodian of the museum, who has managed, with the niggardly pecuniary assistance of the state, to accumulate in one small gallery the most complete collection of musical instruments with which I am acquainted. Amongst them are the pianos on which Auber, Herold, and Meyerbeer composed so many immortal works. Auber's is fitted up with an inkstand let into the wooden frame beside the keyboard, and the ivory keys still bear inky traces of the master's inspirations. Farther on is a guitar, once the property of Paganini, by whom it was presented to Hector Berlioz. The autographs of both are inscribed upon the face of the instrument. Paganini's signature is half effaced; that of Berlioz is clear, neat, and legible as his notation. A harpsichord close by is credited with having accompanied Beethoven on his travels, but M. Chouquet does not vouch for the truth of the story. Under a glass case in the centre of the gallery are several exquisite violins of Stradivarius and other famous makers. One of the elaborately painted and gilded harps, standing near a gigantic octochord at the end of the room, had been often touched by the Royal fingers of poor Marie Antoinette before it passed into the hands of M. Chouquet. The octochord itself merits inspection, as do the rare old harpsichords, spinets, serpents, and other obsolete instruments with which the museum is crowded, — an orderly crowding, mind you, for the custodian of all these treasures watches over them with almost paternal fondness. Wo betide the profane visitor who dares to disarrange a single clarinet, or to scratch a particle of paint off the invaluable Roeckels!

The head and Director of the Conservatoire is at present M. Ambroise Thomas, who succeeded to the post on the death of Auber. Auber in his turn had replaced Cherubini, — that rigid, formal old Italian, who hated, and was so well hated by, Berlioz. But M. Ambroise Thomas has no authority over the celebrated Société des Concerts, whose magnificent matinées have filled the theatres on Sundays for fifty-two seasons. The Société des Concerts is an independent association of artists, chiefly connected by professional ties with the Conservatoire, which is accustomed to give eighteen concerts every winter, between November and Easter-Sunday. On the evening of Easter-Sunday the season is closed by a sacred concert. Most of the members — four-score or thereabouts — of the band are men well on in years, and individually sufficiently educated and skilled in music to play solo if required. Long confraternity and the habit of playing together have welded the separate members into a harmonious whole such as could nowhere else be found. The most entire discipline at all times prevails. No one attempts to thrust himself more upon notice than his fellows; each is content to play his own part modestly and perfectly, and each considers himself amply rewarded if, by so doing, he contributes to the attainment of the desired effect. It is not surprising, then, that with such principles underlying its system the society has won so great a reputation.

The concerts are invariably vocal and instrumental, and, with rare exception, the programmes affect a sternly classical character.

Twice or thrice in a season room will be made for a new-comer (and all living composers are "new," in a sense, to the gray-beards of the Faubourg Poissonnière). On Sunday, for instance, Mr. Arthur Sullivan (whose "H. M. S. Pinafore" has been delighting you lately, I observe) was given a hearing. To correct the dash of profane lightness (!) added to the programme by the "In Memoriam" overture of the English composer, we had all Beethoven's music to the "Ruins of Athens," all Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," and Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus." From this you will get a fair notion of the entertainment usually supplied us. And right royal entertainment it is! A feast for kings.

Poor old George of Hanover and his daughter used to be assiduous attendants at the Conservatoire, and Queen Isabella may yet be met there. Apart from them and the Orleans princes, however, we have had few sprigs of royalty in France lately to enjoy these superb concerts. En revanche, we have had a liberal supply of presidents and ministers. Mme. Thiers occasionally patronized the Conservatoire; her husband less often, I believe. Marshal MacMahon belongs to the benighted class of men "who have no music in their souls," — a class justly considered suspicious by the poet. I remember seeing him listen to the "Eroica" symphony a few years ago. Imagine a martyr at the stake, a Hindoo fakir having knives thrust into him, or Job enduring the manifold misfortunes that came upon him! But if the marshal scorned the pleasure which soothes even the savage breast, his wife did not. Her portly — not to say ungainly — figure was frequently seen in the presidential box, exactly opposite the centre of the orchestra, — the best place in the hall. Next to this are the boxes reserved for the Directors of the Conservatoire and for the ministers. M. Ambroise Thomas was in his place, as usual, last Sunday. Close to him sat M. Jules Ferry, the new Minister of Fine Arts; and in a corner, apart, I noticed M. Léon Say, brooding, as it seemed to me, over the denunciation of the treaties of commerce, rather than listening to the "Ruins of Athens."

Charles Gounod now and then puts in an appearance in the neighborhood of Mme. Massart, but I have not remarked him for a long while. Nor have I this year seen Victor Joncières, the composer of "La Reine Berthe," the unfortunate opera lately produced by M. Halanzier, — who was wont to share one of the two journalists' boxes with myself and others worthier: M. Oscar Comettant, the critic of the Siècle; "Benedict" Jouvin, of the Figaro, and several besides.

As the little theatre of the Conservatoire can only accommodate about seven hundred or eight hundred people, and as all the seats are let to subscribers, the concerts are practically private. The outside public does get a stray place or two, but only when the regular subscribers do not use them. In fact, the Conservatoire is the most select and most fashionable place in Paris, — far more so than the Opera or the Elysée, to which any one who goes early enough is admitted.

The hall, or theatre, is a long, low, oblong room, rounded at both ends, and constructed chiefly of wood. The roof is slightly arched. In addition to a row of baignoires, there are two tiers of boxes and a small amphitheatre. The musicians are stationed partly on the stage and partly in front of it. At the extreme back are the trombones, the drums, and a couple of contrabasses. Then, less removed, come more contrabasses, violoncellos, the horns, trumpets, bassoons, and the other wood instruments. All these are arranged in straight rows on the stage. Just in front, in one long line, come the violas; and below these the first and second violins, forming two quadrant-shaped groups facing each other, to the right and left of the conductor. The choir, which numbers some seventy members, male and female, sits on benches in front of the violins, — the soprano and contraltos facing the basses and tenors. All the men, instrumentalists or vocalists, wear evening dress. The ladies are clad in white. When the executants are all comfortably seated, there is not much room left for the audience, — on the ground floor, at least.

But, though we might wish for a little more space at the Conservatoire, we have not a single other objection to make. As a concert-room the theatre is unmatched. Whether it be that unwittingly the architects hit upon the ideal form of a concert-hall, or whether its virtues come from age, certain it is that it is acoustically perfect. When the orchestra, conducted by M. Deldevez or M. Lamoureux, attacks the opening bars of some immortal work, — a Mendelssohnian symphony, perchance, — making the aged frame of the theatre quiver with music like a well-seasoned Amati or Stradivarius, I would not change my fauteuil in the Conservatoire for an Academic chair. Mundane cares are shaken off for one delightful moment as the glorious strains, as gloriously rendered, fill the room; and the passage from the blissful region of harmony within to the workaday world without shocks you like a rude waking from a dream.

HARRY MELTZER.

A WAGNERIAN APPEAL.

[THE Musical Review (New York) prints the following translation of a letter from Herr Hans von Wolzogen, one of Wagner's most fanatical admirers, to Mr. B. J. Lang, of Boston, Mass.]

BAYREUTH, October 2, 1879.

MOST HONORED SIR:

On Herr Wilhelm's sending us recently some accounts of the enormous progress [?] of Wagnerianism in America, Meister Wagner called to mind gratefully the numerous proofs of personal good-will which had come to him from thence in times past, and remembered with pleasure, among other things, the visit you once paid him in Switzerland. This has induced us to apply to you, at a period of great importance to the labor of the master's life, for kindly help in furthering this work through the American interest that has already been won to his cause.

You know that, after the imposing performances of the first festival at Bayreuth, in 1876, he succeeded in combining the various associations, which had hitherto worked only sporadically in Wagner's cause, into one general "Bayreuth Patrons' Union." The object of this body was gradually to unite together, through its representatives in Germany and abroad, all near and distant friends of the master's art and theories into a stout and enduring association. This association was to take upon itself to procure the necessary means for the master, that he might successfully develop a single, ephemeral festival into an institution, the founding of which has been the sole object of his whole life, the institution, namely, of permanently assured repetitions of those splendid examples of the purest style of artistic performance; thus rendering possible the periodical assembling together of the best artistic forces in Germany. These æsthetic experiences, repeated at regular intervals in Bayreuth, and based upon careful rehearsals under Wagner's incomparably genial leadership, might become a sort of living school of æsthetic culture, and a classical tradition for the noblest form of art.

As we have, unluckily, no tradition to fall back upon for the performance of the works of our immortal classic masters in a genuinely pure style, and as this lack can be made good to us only by the peculiar talent of a creative artist like Wagner, so would Wagner's own works be exposed, in turn, to a treatment utterly wanting in true style, after the master's death, unless the opportunity were offered him betimes to realize that which could not be obtained permanently through merely isolated cases, namely, the classical tradition of performance, by means of the regularly recurring formation of a considerable artistic body, meeting periodically for the purpose of practice and performance.

These periodical meetings would, furthermore, serve to monumentalize, beyond his life-time, Wagner's genial talent of performing in a pure style the works of our older masters, especially of our great symphonists, as an infallible tradition for the future. If this incomparable talent is not to be lost to art, the time must be very zealously utilized, considering the master's age, that the institution may be set on foot as soon as possible, and may have a profitable duration; for without the assurance of it, he himself could not make up his mind to waste his strength upon a merely isolated repetition of a festival, without the guaranty of further results.

He had promised the members of his "Patrons' Union" that his latest great work, Parsifal, should open the series of these periodical festivals, if enough interest were shown in the matter to enable him to begin with it, in 1880. This expectation has proved delusive; in the first place, because the rate of subscription to the necessary fund had been fixed at a very low figure, out of regard for the small means of a large number of German artists, so that now a list of members, which has in two years reached the number of 1,700, has not been able to raise 100,000 marks (about $25,000); and, in the next place, because our exertions to procure larger subscribers, in which we thought ourselves justified in again appealing only to German friends of art, met with scarcely any notice.

If we wish to make the beginning of the enterprise possible as early as 1881, we must now look to renewed agitation, to enable us at least to quadruple our small fund next year. In such case, an assured series of four great festivals could be guaranteed to take place in the course of the next ten years.

On these conditions alone would Wagner be ready to apply his energies to beginning the series with the performance of Parsifal. The three ensuing festivals, occurring every third year (1884, 1887, 1890), would consist of ideal performances of Wagner's other works, each one being repeated several times. With these would be combined rehearsals and performances of classical symphonic compositions, by the musicians collected in Bayreuth, under Wagner's leadership.

Should our Union come into possession of still larger means in the course of these ten years, then not only could the festival-plays be repeated oftener, but the symphony concerts could be given as especial performances in the intervening years; which would immensely increase the efficiency and influence of the institution.

Only such persons as shall have rendered these artistic experiences possible by their material aid are to take part in enjoying them; that is to say, only the members of the Patrons' Union; and then, according to the measure of their subscriptions. They will have the more extended rights, in the ratio that the larger amount of early subscriptions will procure for all participants the possibility of proportionately richer and more frequent artistic enjoyment.

At the beginning of this new agitation, we turn our eyes all the more to foreign countries, since our own native land has only proved hitherto that it does not possess the means to furnish the needed material aid to the ideal cause.

It is for our advantage, above all things, to win to ourselves the coöperation of single, active friends in various countries, who would be willing to exert themselves to enlist those of their fellow-countrymen who are already adherents of Wagner's art, and to collect their subscriptions to our fund. The manner of such collection must be determined by them, according to the existing conditions in their various countries; we can give only general directions. For the agitation of the matter in America, which, as we hear, favors the master so energetically, we know no friend of the cause in whom we could place greater confidence than yourself. We therefore hereby ask your coöperation.

That you may know something definite about our plans and aspirations, I send the following condensed announcement, which might, perhaps, be brought to the knowledge of your fellow-countrymen in the form of an advertisement in American newspapers, so that the affair may be made known as generally as possible at the outset.

"Richard Wagner is prepared to institute periodical repetitions of the great festivals in Bayreuth, by the most artistic forces in Germany, under his personal supervision.

"I order that such festivals may be given at least every third year, beginning with 1881: the Bayreuth Patrons' Union, which was founded for the purpose, is still in need of the sum of $100,000 which must be raised by that time.

"This sum is to be raised by large subscriptions during the year 1880.

"Only subscribers will obtain admission to the festivals.

"The following conditions apply to American subscribers:—

"1. Every subscriber of $100 obtains admission to eight separate performances of the festival-stage-plays in Bayreuth.

"2. The choice of performances is at the subscriber's option.

"3. Every repetition of the same play is to be accounted as the same performance.

"4. Whoever does not desire to visit a performance in person, can transfer his right to another person, after having the transfer indorsed by the board of directors of the Bayreuth Patrons' Union.

"5. Whoever wishes to visit only three performances of the next (first) festival-play in Bayreuth, but does not purpose attending the subsequent festivals, has to pay only $25, but has no right to transfer.

"The next (first) festival-play in Bayreuth will be Parsifal, by Richard Wagner.

"The performances of Parsifal will be followed in the ensuing festivals-years (1884, 1887, 1890), by the other works of Wagner; several being given at the same festival, as far as possible, and each work repeated several times."

Upon the appearance of this advertisement, a central committee would probably have to be formed, to receive and answer applications. Its address should be given at the end of the advertisement. It should announce itself to be in readiness to receive subscriptions, and strenuously urge that the same be paid by December 1, 1880, at the latest.

The festivals during the next ten years will most probably be arranged as follows, if we get the necessary money by 1881:—

1881. Parsifal (given 4 times).

1884. Tristan und Isolde,
 Die Meistersinger. } (3 times each.)

1887. Der Fliegende Holländer, Tannhäuser,
 Lohengrin. } (3 times each.)

1890. Das Rheingold,
 Die Walküre,
 Siegfried,
 Götterdämmerung. } (3 times each.)

In addition to these will be given, as the master sees fit, and according to the state of the treasury, either in the intervening years or during the festivals themselves, rehearsals and performances of symphonies, with entrance free to subscribers to the festivals.

The prices will be:—

For eight performances, or four performances and two repetitions of each, $100.

For the first three performances (Parsifal, and two repetitions of the same), $25.00.

For all the performances and repetitions (thirty-one in number), $400.00.

If this condensed statement is made very widely known in America, either through the press, or by other similar means, there can be no doubt but that you will procure for us very efficient aid from your country, and will materially help the master toward the realization of the labor of his life!

If you cannot devote yourself personally to this agitation, you doubtless know well disposed individuals who would undertake the office.

Although I am now on the 14th page of this letter, I have yet spoken very briefly, and have been able to touch upon many important points only cursorily. Yet I hope that you can picture the state of affairs with sufficient clearness. We must have the money in a year and a half. Then, and only then, will the master offer to all participants the work of his life. America is enthusiastic for his art, and able to give something for it; ten times more than his own native country. Let it be the task of his friends there to get as many subscribers, and as soon as possible. Let this task be confided to you, most honored Sir! Do what you can for the noblest cause of art. The article in the North American Review, "The Work and Mission of My Life," by R. Wagner, may be of ideal aid to you in the agitation. If musical aid is needed, our New York representative, Damrosch, and, we think, Thomas, will be the right men for the purpose. Damrosch seems not to be prepared to carry out the great pecuniary agitation. As, in this our new departure, Herr Schön, our representative in Worms, who alone has already raised 10,000 marks (about $2,500), has been appointed leader of the agitation in Germany, so be our honored Boston representative appointed leader of the agitation in America. The master himself, recalling your visit to him, has acceded to this determination.

You may be as sure of his heartiest and richest thanks and of the gratitude of all of us for your coöperation, as of your own satisfaction in the splendid fruits which will spring mainly from your endeavors in the highest cause of art.

In hopeful anticipation of these fruits, I call out to you: "To our meeting at Parsifal!" the motto of our community, and give you the best greetings from Wahnfried, remaining with the deepest respect,

Your most devoted,

HANS PAUL, FREIHERR VON WOLZOGEN.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1880.

THIS New Year's number of our JOURNAL has to ask indulgence for many short-comings. Half of the matter prepared for the number perished in the great fire of Sunday night, which in three hours reduced the noble building containing the offices of our publishers to bare empty walls. Fortunately the Riverside Press was at a safe distance from the flames, and it was possible at the eleventh hour to begin anew, and bring the paper out within a day or two of the usual date, though in great haste, involving the postponement of several little plans for its improvement.

HONOR SAVED.—Looking at the beautiful front wall (all that is left standing) of the Cathedral Block, on the day after the fire, our attention was caught by the sign of our publishers over the door. Smoke and flame had obliterated all the letters but the five composing the word HONOR, thus:—

HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & CO.

THE ORCHESTRAL QUESTION IN THE VOCAL CLUBS.

THE amateur singing clubs and societies, whose concerts are becoming year by year a more and more important feature of our musical season, began with the social practice of part-songs, mostly for male voices. By slow degrees, some of them enlarged their programme by grappling occasionally with some musical task of greater magnitude, more worthy of the splendid assemblages of voices and of talents which they had brought to bear on such a monotonous succession of small forms. Noble choruses from Antigone and Œdipus, parts of a Cherubini Requiem, etc., began to reward their pains, delight their audiences, and inspire the singers with a loftier aim. That was one step gained. The next was to take up entire works of large and noble character, like Schumann's Paradise and the Peri, Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-Night, etc., and present them with a mere piano-forte accompaniment. The third step, equally important,—nay, logically and necessarily involved in the last,—was much harder to accomplish. Slowly, timidly, and tentatively did any club brace itself up to the bold venture of giving one of these great works in its completeness, as the composer intended that it should be given,—with a full orchestral accompaniment.

One serious obstacle was the expense. An orchestra is a costly luxury. But, on the other hand, these clubs, resting on the annual assessments of their hundreds of "associate members," soon found their treasures equal to an occasional indulgence of this sort. If it costs $500 more to give the Midsummer Night's Dream properly,—that is, with orchestra,—and if the club has in its treasury $500 which it can well spare, how can there be any question of the true course to take? You wish to do the work? Then do it whole, and do it well; do it as Mendelssohn meant it; show that you are in earnest about it; all which is only possible through the coöperation of the orchestra.

But there are greater obstacles, as yet only partially, and not in all cases quite believingly and heartily, overcome. These reside not in the money question, not in any mere externals, but in the state of mind, the various degrees of musical taste and culture, the lack of musical knowledge, judgment, and experience of the individuals who compose the choir. There are prejudices, partialities, clings to a narrow and a simple, easy field, fears of venturing into too deep waters, jealousy of any overshadowing influence of instrumental over purely vocal sounds, apprehensions lest our fine voices may not be well enough heard, or lest we (the singers) may not hear them well enough ourselves, and many more such reasons. Of course, any singing club or circle has a perfect right to limit itself to any sphere, however narrow, it may please. Only, once on the upward path of higher aspiration and of grander work, it must inevitably press on and make thorough work of it, or fail and sink into insignificance. We think these clubs have reached a point in this matter where they must either go forward or fall back. They have themselves, by their few experiments in this direction, opened a vista of progressive high attainment, which they cannot now shut off and think to preserve any freshness of interest, or keep any sure hold on the sympathies either of the general musical public, or of their associate members who supply the sinews of their tuneless war.

The arguments for this belief are simply these:—

(1.) Wherever a club has tried it, has performed a noble work with orchestra, the experiment has been crowned with success, and has wrought conviction both in the outside listeners, and, what is more important, in many a doubting member of the singing club itself. There was no resisting such a test as one presented by one of the clubs a year or two ago, when Gade's Crusaders was once sung with orchestra, and a week afterwards repeated with only voices and piano-forte. The repetition actually fell flat; if it was not Hamlet with the rôle of Hamlet left out, it was at least Hamlet without scene, atmosphere, or background; musically, hardly the shadow, or a half suggestion, of the thing. Since that experience singing societies have been considerably less shy of the orchestra, and have even discovered that they could afford to employ it now and then.

(2.) With each advance in musical experience, it becomes more apparent to the most ordinary intelligence that, in works of this kind, the orchestration is not a mere ad libitum accompaniment, but an integral, essential element in the complete and complex whole. It cannot be set aside without vital harm to the whole spirit and intention of the work. It is a gross injustice to the composer to divest his composition of all means of expression save the single one of voices. More than that: not only is the orchestra an added means of expression, a great element of beauty, but in many such works it is so implicated in the whole structure of the work, so woven into its very texture, that its particular threads cannot be raveled out and leave the vocal web in an ideal sense complete. In a capella music, Palestrina and the like, the voice parts do make a complete whole in themselves; but it is far different in works composed for orchestra and voices, polyphonically interwoven, as in all the great vocal works of Bach and Handel, and in the oratorios, psalms, and secular cantatas of the modern masters.

(3.) The singers' fear of having their precious voices overshadowed by the instruments behind them is one that is sure of cure by habit. It is a necessity, and therefore they will soon accustom themselves to the strange element, so that they can "hear themselves" both "think" and sing in spite of all the double basses and the brass. To draw out from the tone-web these essential threads, leaving only those that are represented by the human voice, is no way to improve effect or get relief in the dilemma. As well might the Tenor, in a four-part song, request the Alto to be mute lest he should not be clearly heard!

But we may well take courage in this matter, since the fine examples of complete performance which the Cecilia and the Apollo Club have given us. And now we are glad to learn that the Boylston Club, to which we are indebted for so many fine productions of works of Palestrina, Bach, Astorga, Cherubini, is resolved to follow suit, and, yielding to the eloquent appeal of its earnest conductor, Mr. Osgood, will bring out ere long the beautiful 137th Psalm, by Goetz, complete, with orchestra.

MUSICAL PREJUDICE.

"Prejudice . . . talks enormous nonsense, and would like, from the summit of its insolence, to assume the regency over every part of the art of music."

HECTOR BERLIOZ.

THERE exists, no doubt, a large amount of unenlightened prejudice in every musical community; it is unquestionably difficult to free our musical judgments, even our musical likings and dislikings, from the influence of certain preconceived notions about the art, or about this or that school of composers. Some skeptics even go so far as to hint that the musical opinions of by far the greater part, not only of our public, but of musicians themselves, are governed entirely by prejudice. Yet it seems to me that the power of sheer prejudice over music-lovers, in general, has been vastly overrated; at least that a large proportion of the prejudice that unquestionably exists among us is by no means so gratuitous and foolish as some persons would have us believe.

To leave musicians by profession out of the question for the present, and to speak only of the more or less cultivated music-lovers, whose active interest in the art prompts them to hold very decided opinions, let us consider, for a moment, the very various points of view from which they are instinctively impelled to regard music. I am not speaking of those persons who are mere musical voluptuaries, with whom music goes in at one ear and out at the other, but of those who are inclined to take the art seriously.

Setting aside that cultured understanding of the art of music which is but seldom to be looked for in amateurs, it may be said that one of the rarest things to find in the average music-lover is catholicity of taste. Almost every one looks for a certain something in music, and unless he finds just that something the music fails to appeal strongly to his feelings; if he does find it, on the other hand, his feelings are duly worked upon, and all other considerations appear to him as of secondary moment. So long as the particular something he looks for is palpably there, the music may have whatever other qualities it will, he likes it. What this something is varies according to the individual; but I think that it is, in most instances, rather a general, not always important, characteristic of the music than a special or particular one, as the average music-lover is ever more amenable to general impressions than to the value of especial points. Let me try to make this clear by some examples.

There is a certain quaintness of style (to the modern ear), a seemingly calm monotony of regularly recurring musical figures, a general absence of sensationalism; and a modesty of dynamic effect in a great portion of the music of the Bach-Handel period. The same qualities may be found, in less degree, in most of the music of Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and of the young Beethoven.

Archæophilus finds these characteristics just suited to his musical taste; he consequently is fond of the older music in general. The wonderful beauty of form, the admirable evolution of the composition from its primordial theme, the perfect order in the harmony, and the grace and heart-moving sentiment of the melody which are to be found in the fine examples of the music of these by-gone periods may, very possibly, not be felt by him in the least; it is only the prevailing atmosphere, so to speak, of the music that he delights in.

In the music of our own day there is an intensity and variety of dynamic effect, an unrestrained passionateness of expression, an abundance of yearning chromatic dissonances and of somewhat turgid harmony, which give an impression of vastness and infinite struggle, which is just what most moves the soul of Neodizemon. He is consequently in favor of the new musical lights. It may be a matter of total indifference to him whether the music be coherent or not, whether its passionate expression be at the expense of beauty, or consonant with beauty. Its general atmosphere is congenial to him.

It is not strange, then, that Archæophilus should abhor Wagner and Brahms, and that Neodizemon should yawn at Bach. You call both of them prejudiced, because the one may leave the hall to smoke a cigarette during the performance of "Siegfried's Death-March," or the other may indulge himself in unparliamentary language so soon as he sees a Bach fugue down on the programme. I say, not so! Both well know that they are not going to hear what they want. If I dislike the smell of tobacco smoke, I cannot be fairly called prejudiced because I object to sitting in a smoking-car.

The real trouble with Archæophilus and Neodizemon is that the predominant musical likings of both are a matter of sheer Dr. Fell. The one is just as far from truly appreciating Bach as the other is from appreciating Wagner. You can fool either of them most egregiously. Let the one hear a succession of rampant harmonies fully scored for the modern orchestra, and he will swallow them unhesitatingly as grand music. The other will ride up to the seventh heaven of ecstasy on the wings of the dreariest and stupidest Pleyel variations, just as easily as he will on the divine pinions of Bach's E major fugue.

What both are after is mere manner, not matter; sheer external accidents of music, not "das Genie, ich meine den Geist."

I know I have taken very extreme cases, perhaps so extreme as to make shipwreck of the law. Yet it seems to me that a great deal of the indiscrimination with which the general musical judgment is afflicted is to be really attributed to this superficial way of looking at music, rather than to anything resembling unreasoning or unreasonable individual prejudice.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The annual performance of the great Christmas Oratorio, The Messiah, crowded the Music Hall, as it always does, with a devoted and delighted audience. It was one of the best performances, upon the whole, within our recollection. Every number was full of life, and power, and beauty. The chorus ranks were very full and the grand choruses rolled out with majestic volume, prompt and clear and well sustained. The soloists, with some allowance in behalf of Mr. Fritsch, the tenor, whose voice was not quite equal to some portions of his task (though he sang intelligently and like an artist, especially well in "Thou shalt dash them"), were highly satisfactory. Miss Fanny Kellogg, always interesting, showed a great improvement; she has rid herself of that explosive way which used to mar the beauty of her singing; and her fine upper voice has gained in power and sweetness of tone, while her execution and her sustaining power seem to be steadily gaining. Miss Winant's most remarkable and beautiful contralto tones, into which she knows how to throw a great deal of honest, true expression, charmed the audience. And our great basso, Mr. M. W. Whitney, was in all his glory; never have we heard him when his voice seemed so pure and noble, and so great! One of his final sub-bass tones made one think of the traditions of Lablache. And he was equally in his finest mood, singing it all con amore and with vital power.

The effect of the performance was greatly enhanced by the large orchestra (twelve first violins, with Bernhard Listemann at their head); and this increase was fortunate, since the organ by some accident was disabled through a great part of the evening. Mr. Zerrahn conducted as if he knew his forces, felt his power, knew and felt the inspired Handelian work, and enjoyed every note of it.

CAMBRIDGE. The first of the University Concerts was given December 13, at the Sanders Theatre. Like the Harvard Symphony Concerts, the subscription list had filled up slowly, but at last reached the point where it was considered safe to venture to give them. After all, the beautiful theatre was less than half filled at this first concert. The following was the programme:—

Overture to Ruy Blas, in C Minor, Op. 95 . . . Mendelssohn.
 Recitative and Aria, "Che farò senza Euridice," from Orpheus Gluck.
 Miss Mathilde Phillips.
 Symphony, No. 8, in F major, Op. 93 Beethoven.
 Introduction to Lohengrin Wagner.
 Recitative and Aria, "Ah! quel giorno," from Semiramide Rossini.
 Miss Mathilde Phillips.
 Overture to Oberon, in E major Von Weber.

The orchestra was the Boston Philharmonic, under the leadership of Bernhard Listemann, enlarged for this series of concerts to forty members. Their playing was admirable, it is almost superfluous to say, or to speak again of the marked improvement arising from the more frequent rehearsals necessary for the performances at the three series of orchestral concerts of the present season.

The admirable sonority of the Sanders Theatre seemed to give additional strength and volume to their playing, which on this evening was of their best. The Symphony and both Overtures were admirably rendered. Justice compels us to add that the Introduction to "Lohengrin" alone received the honor of an encore. Miss Mathilde Phillips sang with great acceptance Gluck's aria, and in response to a demand for a repetition of the aria from Semiramide gave instead the familiar "Mandolinata."

MAX BRUCH'S "ODYSSEUS."—The performance of this remarkable work complete, with chorus, male and female solo voices, and orchestra, in the Music Hall, December 23, was a new feather in the cap of the Cecilia, and a notable event of our present musical season. It had been very thoroughly and critically rehearsed under Mr. B. J. Lang, and in all its length, with all its difficulties, it was in the main very satisfactorily done. It will take more than one hearing to make

It universally appreciated; but the voice, we think, of those best qualified to judge was one of warm approval and delight. The argument of the poem, based, of course, on Homer's "Odyssey," and conforming for the most part very closely to its order of events, was printed in our last, and was in the hands of all the audience. Surely it afforded texts for almost every theme with which music ever has to deal,—at least outside of the Christian Church. We can only offer a few slight notes upon each of its ten "Scenes," preceded by a rather lengthy orchestral introduction, which, although refined and subtly wrought, and full of quiet beauties, we found somewhat monotonous and not setting one on tiptoe with great expectation, like the introductions, say, of Beethoven.

I. Odysseus on Calypso's Island. The opening chorus of Calypso's nymphs is fresh and charming, clear and spring-like in its three-part harmony, while it is one of the few really melodious pieces in the work. The accompaniment is of a very upbubbling character and full of charm. The shadow that falls upon the lucid harmony, as the thoughts turn to where Odysseus "sits and mourns," sighing for far-off Ithaca, is skillfully managed with that rare power of modulation shown throughout the work. Then we have the hero's lament,—an extremely simple, almost rudimentary melody, or musing chant, within a small compass of tones, written for baritone. Although not in the best range of Mr. C. R. Adams's voice, he showed such intelligence, such finished art in its delivery, and such perfect enunciation of the words,—one of the qualities which he possesses in a rare perfection,—that it produced a true impression. A trumpet passage introduces Hermes, who fills his soul with glad presage, and he embarks with his companions, the orchestra keeping up a measured figure quite suggestive of the sound of oars.

II. The sound of oars is still continued, until "the bounds of the deep-flowing ocean are reached," and they go down into the nether world, or Hades. Here begins a series of appalling pictures. Weird, sombre, ghost-like chords and modulations are employed with inexhaustible resources and with marvelous imaginative power. Spirits from the "rasty deep" greet them with wild, gruesome harmony. Odysseus offers solemn sacrifice, and the shades of the departed, lured by the smell of blood, sing a shuddering lament. Mournful choruses of children, of brides, of youths, prematurely cut off, follow with appropriate variety of expression and tone-color; then the shade of the old bard Teiresias warns him to give a wide berth to the Sirens; and finally the shade of his mother reminds him of his faithful wife Penelope beset by suitors. Finally, the whole troop of spirits cry out with new intensity of horror, and all vanish one by one. Musically, all this is made palpable with masterly power, especially of instrumentation, until it is quite time for an entire change of scene and a return to cheerful daylight. "Fly! Fly!" and as they row away, the agonized wail in the orchestra with which the scene concludes is terribly impressive.

III. The Sirens. Their chorus, in a bright major key, is delightfully harmonious and seductive. No wonder Ulysses, bound to the mast, and hearing, pleads with all his might to the deaf ears of his sailors, to rest their oars and tarry. The alternating chorus of the men makes strong effect of contrast. The instrumentation abounds in happy figures and rich harmonies, far from commonplace. To this short scene succeeds—

IV. The Tempest at Sea. And here we have a powerful chorus descriptive of the storm, with terrible chromatic howling of the winds, surging of waves, and grand upheaval of the orchestral deep. All are engulfed except Odysseus, who is saved by gracious interposition of the Oceanides, and in a series of tuneful chorus strains is wafted to the shore, and with soft lullaby if sung to sleep.

V. Part Second transports us to Penelope. Her lament and prayer, for the safe return of husband and of son, constitute the whole scene, which is not long, albeit slightly monotonous. As for melody, this scene, as it may be called, shows the influence of the new German school. What of it is not recitative is something nearer to recitativo cantabile than to any clear, well-rounded, tuneful melody. It is not a melody which one carries away with him,—or which carries one away. Its interest lies in pathetic, noble declamation; a strong, intense expression of faithful love and yearning for the absent, and of high-souled patience. It gave good opportunity to the pure and sympathetic soprano voice, beautiful in its higher tones, to the cultivated method, the intelligent conception, and the native dramatic instinct of Miss Louise Homer.

—But here the hurry and confusion of the week compel us to stop for the present, and reserve the completion of the story until the next number.

[—Here the inexorable bars shut down on us, and we must omit numerous other concert reports, letters from New York and elsewhere, local intelligence, notices of new publications, etc., etc. Our readers will readily excuse, in consideration of the fire. Things will return to their normal order, we trust, before another issue.]

DRESDEN. — A new comic opera, in three acts, Bianca, by Ignaz Brüll, was performed, Nov. 26, with entire success. Mmes. Schuch and Rähler, and Messrs. Goetze, Degele, and Decarli assumed the principal rôles.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., DEC. 15, 1879. — The "Cecilia" opened its second season with its fifth concert on Tuesday evening, December 9, at the hall of the Amateur Dramatic Club. The artists were the New York Philharmonic Club and Miss Henrietta Beebe, of New York, soprano. The following excellent programme was presented to a select and appreciative audience:—

String Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1 Schumann.
Songs (a), "The Dream" (b), "The Lark" Rubinstein.
Aria, "Tell me, my Heart," Bishop.
Solo, Violoncello. Three pieces Widor.
1. Andante. 2. Moderato. 3. Vivace.
Song, "Where the Bee sucks" Sullivan.
Quartet in G minor, Op. 27 Grieg.

This programme was a great improvement upon those of previous concerts of this Society in point of length. The arrangement of the several parts was also, to our mind, a model one,—placing the two important works at the beginning and end, and relieving the mind by the lighter character of the intermediate selections.

The Schumann quartet, the first of the three only which he wrote, and all dedicated to his friend Mendelssohn, made a splendid opening to the feast. Its fine, brief introduction in A minor leads immediately to the Allegro, the theme of which is very bright and beautiful, thoroughly characteristic of its author, and exceedingly well worked up. After a development in which the themes pass through quite a variety of keys, the author recurs to the first theme in the second violin, while the first violin ascends to high F in a charming pianissimo, and the movement closes. The Scherzo reminds one somewhat of Mendelssohn, though this impression is perhaps stronger in the four-hand arrangement (excellently done by Mr. Otto Dreel) than in the original. The Intermezzo, which interrupts this movement near the middle, is in Schumann's best style, and its harmonies seem peculiarly his own. The Adagio is a genuine Lied of exceptional beauty, first sung by the first violin, afterwards by the cello, and finally returning to the first violin again. Schumann seems to have written it in one of his most inspired moments, and it is to us one of the most delightful movements that ever came from his pen. The Presto is strong, fiery, and brilliant. A strange but beautiful episode, slightly suggestive, perhaps, of the "Music of the Future," occurs near the close of this movement, the reason of which is not entirely clear. The passage is, however, effective, and the brief return to the original tempo brings the quartet to a splendid close. We can express a general satisfaction with the rendering. The quartet is not easy to play well. The only blemishes noticeable were a slight lack of tune and a little indistinctness in some of the running passages on the part of the cello. With these exceptions the performance was well-nigh perfect.

The songs were very finely rendered; those by Rubinstein especially so. The technical management of the voice, the phrasing and the general conception, were exceptionally good. Sullivan's "Where the Bee sucks" pleased us more than Bishop's "Tell me, my Heart;" but both were fine specimens of English song, a field which has been especially and deservedly cultivated by Miss Beebe. The artist showed a rare appreciation of unity in musical impressions by responding to an encore of the Rubinstein songs with Schubert's "Lark." The response to the encore of Sullivan's song was rather trifling in comparison. Mr. Bonner accompanied with his customary good taste and skill.

The cello solo was enjoyable, the pieces of Widor being of a quiet lyrical character. They were nicely rendered.

The Grieg quartet, which closed the concert, is a strange work. To speak of it with any degree of confidence or interest, one should have had the privilege of a long acquaintance with and study of it. It certainly cannot be understood or fairly judged on a first hearing, and this is true of any great work. That this is an exceptionally great work we do not claim; but that it is, a work of real importance, the zeal and energy of the artists who rendered it so finely bear abundant testimony. We were told that the club had rehearsed it twice a week ever since last April. This fact will give any one at all familiar with music of this character an idea of the value and the immense difficulty of the work. The impressions left by it are various. It seems on a first hearing to be very fragmentary and incoherent, with now and then a touch of the grotesque. It is full of ideas. So rapidly do they come forward, and so revolutionary is their character, that you are confused and almost overwhelmed. In many places the ideas of the composer seem to have run away with him; he seems to have lost all control of himself; then, again, there are passages of exquisite melody, of surpassing beauty, and these are as suddenly and unexpectedly interrupted by passages full of wild and unrestrained energy and force, and seemingly beyond the power of four instruments to express. It is the restless, unsatisfied spirit, seeking for expression of its thoughts and longings, of its struggles and aspirations.

Whatever may be said of it, time will test its worth; it certainly cannot and should not be judged from the classical standard. It belongs essentially to the modern school, and is itself sui generis. Of all the movements, the Romanza and Finale were perhaps the most beautiful and clear.

The playing was simply a marvel, both in the apparent ease with which the immense difficulties of the work were conquered, and in its conception and rendering as a whole.

The club show the results of their year's practice and richly deserve the success so carefully and patiently earned. The "Cecilia" of Providence, as well as the "Enterprise" of Boston, is doing a good work, and it is to be hoped that the labor expended will result in an increased study and a more frequent hearing of the many masterpieces of this class of music. Chamber music as a distinct branch stands almost by itself, and affords culture of a peculiar kind. A more generally diffused knowledge of its treasures is desirable, many of these ranking among the finest compositions of their respective composers. We hope that the work these societies are doing will commend itself to all musical people in other cities and towns, leading them to form similar organizations with similar aims, thus creating a greater demand for chamber music, and offering sufficient inducement to artists to give more extended study to this class of music. Nothing can be more profitable and enjoyable to the artists themselves, and no higher musical culture can elsewhere be found.

CHICAGO, DEC. 24. — On Tuesday evening, December 16, the Beethoven Society gave "The Lay of the Bell," by Max Bruch, before a very large audience in our new Music Hall. Miss Dutton, Mrs. O. K. Johnson, Mr. Knorr, and Mr. Morowaki, were the soloists. There was a chorus of a hundred voices, and an orchestra of thirty men, the whole being under the direction of Herf Carl Wolfsohn, the conductor of the society. As this was the first performance of the work in this country, a little sketch of it may be of some interest. The work is written for chorus, solo voices, orchestra, and organ. It belongs to the advanced school of German music, and may be said to bear the direct influence of the Wagner idea of treatment. The melodic form is made subordinate to larger effects, in which an intricate instrumentation is a marked feature. The orchestral score indicates that its plan and development has been marked out by a master hand. There is a gradual unfolding of the musical idea, which reaches the full climax in the last number. The dramatic portions of the poem give the composer full scope for working out numbers that show intensity, and there are many parts that manifest a heroic mood of that extended character which calls to its aid varied instrumentalities to express its intent. Thus the orchestra, chorus, quartet of principals, and organ, are often called upon for their fullest powers. Of the twenty-seven numbers, ten introduce the chorus. The most important numbers are the "Fire Chorus," the "Terzett," "Hallowed Order" chorus, "The Duty of the Bell" for ensemble, and the grand finale. Perhaps there are too many recitatives in the work to hold the attention of an audience, unless they are intrusted to the most talented singers. It requires a large chorus, a very full orchestra, and solo talent of a high order, with large and telling voices, to insure its success. The solos are not strictly melodious, but the accompaniments are generally worked out in a manner that shows a consistent plan.

The first idea of the work seems to be its unity, and there is no undue prominence given to the solo parts, for all the numbers are made to serve as links in one large plan. As a composer, Max Bruch seems to look to large and characteristic effects, and in all his works he seems to attempt to picture the majestic in music. The plaintive tenderness that one finds in the music of a Mozart, or the refinement that Mendelssohn so delightfully expresses, are qualities foreign to any of the works that have been given here, from the composer of "The Lay of the Bell." He seems rather to aim at new possibilities, than to make the old forms bear again rich blossoms of melodic beauty. Modern composition seems to aim at reaching great heights of grandeur; but oftentimes there is a roughness about these gigantic effects and forms, almost as barbaric as the vast monuments of the Orient. The utterances of music should all be symbolical of the beautiful, in order for it to keep its honored place among the romantic arts; and, in this age, have a reason for its very forms of manifestation. There are too many slow movements in the work to make it interesting to a general audience, while the large number of recitatives seem to add a sombre effect that even a varied instrumentation cannot destroy. Thus there are portions of the composition that seem to drag, and the close attention of the listener is necessary in order to understand the unfolding of the musical idea.

To hold the attention of an audience, music must contain contrasts in movement as well as in idea; and it is a mistaken notion to write for the musician alone. In the enjoyment of music the senses, save that of hearing, are at rest, and as the mind is drawn into close communication with the inner reflection that the music awakens, it is evident that only a work filled with rich and correctly conceived contrasts, can give the listener great enjoyment. We all rebel if the sombre presses us into clouds of gloom, and long for the brightness to at least tint them with the rose-colors of change. Thus I felt as I listened to the performance of "The Lay of the Bell."

The society and the soloists did their work well, however, and did their best to bring the audience into sympathy with the work. Mrs. O. K. Johnson deserves particular mention for the fine delivery of her aria, and the expressive recitative, "Burnt and bare stands the homestead."

Miss Dutton has improved in her method since last season, and did some very effective work. The singing of Mr.

Knorr, too, was quite dramatic in its idea, and he lent the best powers of his voice to his trying part. The rôle of the master workman is very long and difficult, and while Mr. Morowski was not in his best voice, he endeavored to do his work faithfully. I have never heard the chorus so prompt, or so able to sustain the difficult parts as they are this season, and Mr. Wolfsohn deserves much praise for his effort in teaching them to sing understandingly. There are a number of other musical matters and entertainments that claim attention, but I must ask for indulgence, and pass them over to my next communication, for the pleasures of Christmas-tide induce me to make my note a short one. Yet I cannot close before wishing the Journal success for the New Year upon which it is about to enter, for it richly merits the confidence and support of every sincere friend to music. In the past it has been faithful to what is best in art, and ever eager to promote, with honest and thoughtful words, all true efforts made for the advancement of culture. It looked at art as too noble an instrumentality in progressive civilization, to be made to pander to what was only commonplace, but endeavored to advance public taste so that a love for the best music might be more general. It saw the beautiful in its highest forms, and tried to lift up general appreciation so that it might meet it. For its worthy endeavor it has the right to expect the support of all honest lovers of music. As a new year's greeting may it have many indications of the result of its earnest efforts, in numbers of subscriptions that signify that the musical public appreciates its labors for the advancement of the true in art.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LONDON.—At her Majesty's Theatre, Weber's Oberon was revived with Mad. Pappenheim as Rezia. The Musical World says that Oberon is welcome alike in its normal English shape, in its German amended shape, and in its Italian abnormal shape, which Sir Julius Benedict, Weber's most distinguished pupil, has done so much to make acceptable, drawing materials from other works by the composer for the indispensable recitatives and occasional orchestral interludes, intruding nothing absolutely his own, for the sake of mere self-glorification, but accomplishing his task throughout in a style at once delicate, reserved, and masterly. Oberon, by the way, is only one among several works that by their lengthened vitality go far to upset the Utopian theory of Richard Wagner, who, in his usual emphatic manner, sends forth an edict that no opera must hope for permanent life except by reason of the drama to which the music is wedded,—insisting that the two are inseparable. Happily music, when really music, is in a less destitute condition; and where opera is concerned, instead of being the drama's mistress, is the drama's master, instead of the "Weib" to the "Mann," the Mann to the Weib—which makes all the difference. One hundred Wagners, in one hundred volumes, will never be able to persuade sane people that music is not an independent art, that measured rhythm is not one of the chief secrets of the charm it exercises, that what is called the "infinite melody" is not, in nine cases out of ten, an infinite bore, and that the absence of symmetrical form and the defiance of all relations of keys to each other are anything better than outrages against art, under no matter what manifestation. The music of Oberon has lived, lives, and will continue to live, being intrinsically beautiful, and no one can deny that in its connection with the libretto it is everywhere dramatically true. Weber can hardly with fairness be reproached because, in so far as construction and purely dramatic interest are concerned, he had a somewhat weak, and to those unacquainted with Wieland's poem, or the romance narrating the adventures of Huon de Bordeaux, one of the twelve "Paladins" of Charlemagne, from which Wieland derived his subject, in a great degree unintelligible libretto to deal with. Enough that his music has immortalized the drama, which without it would have been lifeless, notwithstanding the literary merit seldom absent from the writings of Mr. Lanché.

Oberon was followed by Il Flauto Magico and Carmen, the title rôle of which was assumed by Mme. Marie Rose, and the extra season was announced to close with Oberon "for the benefit of Mme. Pappenheim," apropos to which the World says, "It is surely time that this comedy of 'benefits' was abandoned, inasmuch as no one now attaches any importance to them. In the olden time a benefit given under the name of any individual artist really meant a benefit to the account of that artist; but this custom has long passed away, and the expression has become no better than an empty phrase."

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—The concert room on Saturday in last week was fairly well filled despite the attractions of the frost-bound lake in the grounds of the Palace, although the healthy recreation of skating drew a great many more visitors than we are accustomed to see on half-crown Saturdays. The anticipation of seeing and hearing the great French composer, the representative of the modern French school, in the double character of conductor and pianist, had doubtless much to do with the good attendance on the occasion. Although the habitués of St. James's Hall have seen him and heard his performances, he was personally a stranger to the Crystal Palace audience, and hence the interest which attached to their first introduction to Mons. Camille Saint-

Saëns, who has established his name in the very front rank of composers, albeit of the modern school. The concert on Saturday was made the occasion of the first performance in England of M. Saint-Saëns's Concerto in E-flat for piano-forte and orchestra, the composer officiating at the solo instrument; and of the production of his pôème-symphonique entitled "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the performance of which he conducted. Of the latter composition we may say at once that there is nothing in it especially requiring the composer's bâton. . . . The Concerto is more ambitious, and as a vehicle for display of mastery over quomous difficulties has few parallels. From the commencement of the introductory moderate, in which the piano maintains a series of rapid arpeggios in ornamentation of the opening phrase by the horns, to the last note, the solo instrument has little else than work which taxes the executant to the utmost. A long and brilliant cadenza is one of the features of this Concerto which requires a second hearing to enable one to pronounce a fair judgment on it. That there is a good deal of "sound and fury signifying nothing" in the work, we feel bound to say; and we question very much whether, had it been the composition of plain John Smith, the reception would have been so genuinely warm. It was, however, received with every demonstration of approval, and the composer was twice recalled.

THE LATE MR. BARKER.—Charles Spackman Barker, the well-known inventor of the pneumatic lever for lightening the touch of large organs, died on Wednesday the 26th ult., at Maidstone,—where he had been lately residing,—after a short illness, in his seventy-fourth year, and was buried at Snodland on the following Saturday.

Mr. Barker was born at Bath on the 10th October, 1806, and originally brought up to the medical profession, but, being present on the occasion of the erection of an organ by a London organ builder, he determined on following that occupation, and carried on business for some time in his native city. About the year 1833 he heard of the large organ building in London for York Minster, and, seeing the immense labor it would be to play on such a gigantic instrument if constructed in the ordinary way, turned his attention to the means of overcoming it. This he proposed to do by a pneumatic lever,—a small bellows inflated by air of a high pressure applied to every key,—thus reducing the resistance to a minimum; but, unfortunately, he did not succeed in getting it in this instance adopted. In 1841 he went to Paris, where a large organ for the Abbey of St. Denis was then building by Cavallé-Coll, who at once saw the importance of Mr. Barker's invention, secured his services, and immediately applied it to that instrument, and it has since been introduced in all the largest organs built both in this country and abroad. Mr. Barker, after his engagement with Cavallé-Coll terminated, took the direction of the business of Daublaine and Collinet, afterwards Ducroquet (now Merklin and Schütz), and exhibited an organ here at the International Exhibition of 1851. He carried on business for some time in Paris on his own account, and amongst other instruments built that in St. Augustine's Church, in which he introduced the electric action. When the Franco-Prussian war threatened the destruction of Paris, Mr. Barker returned to this country, where he has since resided. He married Mdlle. Schmeltz of Paris, who survives him. About three years ago a committee of the principal organists and organ builders was formed for the purpose of raising a fund to provide an annuity for Mr. Barker in his declining years, and a considerable sum was subscribed, bearing testimony to the value of his invention and the respect in which he was held.

PARIS. The first part of "Les Troyens," by Hector Berlioz, called "The Taking of Troy," was brought out simultaneously at both the Colonne Concerts and the Paeleloup Concerts. The first part of this work, only, was known in Paris, having been produced at the old Théâtre Lyrique of M. Carvalho. The Ménestrel says that it cannot be called an opera in the true acceptance of the word, but rather it should be classed among the oratorios de genre. It seems to have been very favorably received in both concerts, even by enthusiastic acclamations, to which "M. le Président de la République," who was present, "politely contributed several braves," from which it is inferred that the success of the Damnation de Faust is to be renewed, and that the music of Berlioz is now à la mode.

M. MAUREL, the well known baritone of Covent Garden, made his début here at the Opéra to-night, as Hamlet, before a large and attentive audience. A native of Marseilles, he first appeared in Paris ten years ago in the Africaine. He has since sung in Italy, and recently in London. He comes back here with a good reputation as regards voice and training, which reputation he has justified by successfully undertaking a part in which M. Faure has left such abiding recollections. M. Maurel was warmly applauded. — Paris Correspondence of the Times, Nov. 29.

A BRILLIANT audience assembled to night to welcome M. Maurel back to the Opéra. It was feared that jealousy of the successes this popular baritone had achieved in foreign countries would militate against the warmth of his reception here. In Hamlet, moreover, he had to struggle against the recollections of Faure, but his fine voice and excellent method obtained the sympathy of his audience in the very first scene. M. Maurel's performance was as remarkable from a histrionic as from a musical point of view. His artistic style, for instance, gave all possible effect to the drinking song of the second act; his picturesque acting in the play scene, where it is reintroduced, was worthy of all praise. In fact, M. Maurel's success was unequivocal, and he will prove a valuable addition to the company of the Grand Opéra. — Paris Correspondence of the Daily Telegraph, Nov. 29.

A man has recently died in Paris who had his day of celebrity as the inventor of the orgue expressif, Louis Pierre Alexander Martin. The son of a common tinker of Soudron (Seine et Marne), young Martin received his first ideas of music from the curé of his village, by which he profited, to study the mechanism of the organ. Becoming a musician, he devoted his few hours of leisure to constructing a first instrument, of which he made alone all the parts with fragments of wood, scraps of tin, using even pieces of bone for the keys; but, such as it was, this organ obtained for its maker a bronze medal at the Exposition of 1841. Some years later, he invented the percussion organ, which won him a silver medal in 1844, and the cross of the Legion of Honor at the Exposition Universelle, in 1851. The invention has long since made its way in the world, while, as is often the case, the inventor alone has not profited by his ideas. Martin, towards the close of his life, suffered reverses which he bore worthily, and died esteemed by all who knew him.

DR EDUARD HANSLICK'S lectures or readings in the great hall of the Friends of Music at Pesth attracted large audiences and afforded the utmost satisfaction. The subject of the first lecture was "The Rise of Opera in Italy," that of the second, "The Beginnings of Opera in Germany and France." The literary part of the lecture was supplemented and completed by musical illustrative examples. In the second lecture Dr. Hanslick commenced with Lullu, on whose Kndmos, the first bond fide tragic opera, he spoke at considerable length. Having then played a prelude in D minor from Alceste, he touched shortly on Rameau and Gluck and proceeded at once to treat of Germany. He referred to the fact of Biblical subjects being preferred for librettos; to the first permanent opera in Hamburg; to Reinhard Kayser and Matheeson; to opera in Berlin under Friedrich II.; to the North Germans, Hame, Quantz, Graun, and lastly to Hiller, the founder of the German "Singspiel," or piece interspersed with songs. Herr David Nay, from the National Theatre, who had undertaken to act as vocal illustrator, sang twice the "Vulcan-Aria" from the opera, Pompeii, 1707—which, strange to say, begins in D minor and ends in C-sharp, and one in F major from Hiller's Lustiger Schuster.

ROME.—A new theatre is now building between the Via Forense and Via Torino which will occupy a space of 4257 square metres. The architect is Domenico Costanzi. It will have several peculiar features. A vast subterranean hall will serve as restaurant and café; the dome crowning the auditorium will be so arranged as to make it possible to use the sunlight for illuminating the theatre for day representations. The parterre will accommodate 1600 spectators, and, by an ingenious device, the floor can be instantly raised to the level of the stage floor. The boxes are to seat 700 and other galleries 1200, so that the whole theatre will comfortably seat an audience of 3000 persons. The stage will contain a space of 1,000 square metres, making it possible to give to pieces a splendid mise en scène. In short, the Teatro Nazionale will be in all respects worthy of the capital of Italy.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—German papers, in noticing the construction of the new theatre in this city, speak of a very remarkable feature in its construction, viz., a lofty ventilation shaft. This was very conspicuously absent from the old theatre, as from most German theatres, which for bad ventilation, or rather none at all, will carry away the palm from all theatres in the world. The Frankforters are to be congratulated on the hope held out to them of a breath of fresh air, and we trust that this architectural "ornament," as it is called, may be added to every theatre in Germany. This new theatre is near the Bockenheimer Gate.

AMSTERDAM.—A new Dictionary of Music in Dutch, edited by H. Viotta, has been recently published by Bümmann & Hoothaus, of which nine numbers have already appeared.

HANOVER.—The proposition made to Eduard Losen to succeed Hans v. Bülow as conductor of the orchestra and of the Symphony Concerts has been declined by him.

LEIPZIG.—At the seventh Gewandhaus Concert (Nov. 27) Emilie Gaurel executed the Concerto Romantique, for violin, by Benjamin Goddard, and a ballade by Moszkowsky, with a scherzino of his own composition. He was warmly applauded.

VIENNA.—Boieldieu's Jour de Paris was given after an interval of twelve years. The music was found charming as ever, and the work was as successful as formerly, in spite of a somewhat defective rendering.

WANTED—A COMPOSER FOR THE ORGAN.

BY H. H. STATHAM.

THERE is no intention to imply, by the above heading, that there are not many contemporary writers for the grandest of instruments whose productions are well worth the serious study of the player and the serious attention of the listener. One of the most gifted among our native writers for the organ we have unhappily recently lost, — one who never wrote carelessly or indifferently, and never forgot the high character of the instrument or descended to sensational or popular composition for its key-board. But it would not be difficult to name a good many living musicians, English, French, and German, who have supplied and will, it is to be hoped, continue to supply the organ-player with much food that is convenient for him and his hearers, in a considerable variety of styles or manners, all calculated to bring out and illustrate qualities special to the organ as distinguished from other instruments. As to a different class of writers who turn out, currente calamo, showy and flimsy marches, offertories, and other pieces calculated to produce much noisy effect with little real effort on the part of either composer or performer, and in which the true character of the instrument is entirely ignored for a style of handling which may be called prancing on it rather than playing on it, these need not be taken into account here at all. The organ is above all others the instrument for intellectual music, and productions into which no intellect goes are beside its mark altogether.

But admitting all the value and interest of a good deal that is written for the organ at present, it remains a fact, and a vexatious one for lovers of the instrument, that none of the few composers of the highest class, and who have the widest aims, seem disposed to pay any attention to the organ. There have been, in fact, only two classical composers for the instrument, — Bach and (after a long interval) Mendelssohn. Handel may be named, perhaps, in virtue of his concertos, but he can only be named doubtfully. The organs on which he played, and for which he composed his few extant concertos, were so limited in their size and scope — wanting, above all, the great glory and power of the organ, the pedal-board — that it was impossible that he could realize or work out the special capabilities of the instrument. As rearranged for a large organ by the greatest of modern organ-players, two or three of these concertos can always be depended upon to "tell" with a general audience; and they are in this way very valuable to a player as furnishing music of a robust, masculine type, such as no musician need be ashamed of carrying for, and at the same time sufficiently simple and straightforward to appeal to the sympathies of a less cultured audience. It may be said that this praise, which may be applied in the same terms to a great deal of Handel's choral writing, is in reality almost the highest that could be given to a composer; and so it is in one sense. But while Handel's choral works not only represent the perfection of style in vocal writing, but rise at their best to the very loftiest musical feeling, his organ works never do rise to this point, and (which is more to the present purpose) they hardly ever represent the special powers of the instrument. With the exception of such short, slow movements as that which opens the Fifth Concerto, there are hardly any movements among the organ concertos which may not be played with equal, sometimes with better, effect on the piano-forte; and, moreover, the "solos" introduced, and originally intended as display passages for the player, are mostly so hackneyed in form, and resemble each other so much in manner, that a listener entering in the middle of one of these passages would find it difficult to say at the moment which out of two or three of the concertos was being played. What Handel may have made of these works when he played them himself, filling in the bare outlines and introducing, very likely, contrapuntal design extemporized at the moment, we can hardly judge; but, as they stand, these concertos can only in a modified sense claim to be regarded as classical organ music.

Of Bach it is unnecessary to say anything, of course; he is the acknowledged king of the organ. One observation may be made in regard to a point which amateur lovers of Bach, at least, hardly seem to recognize; that is, the decided way in which his organ preludes and fugues, as contrasted with those for the harpsichord or clavier, are put together in such a manner as to suit the special power of definition of the instrument. This is, indeed, obvious enough in the preludes, which are mostly of a style and design quite distinct from those written for the clavier. But a strict fugue is a strict fugue, for whatever instrument it be written; and accordingly some people have rashly supposed that the organ and harpsichord or clavier fugues of Bach may be interchanged from one instrument to another without loss of effect. But except in a very few instances this is an illusion. The organ fugues do not tell as duets on the piano, and the fugues from "The Forty-eight" do not as a rule tell on the organ; they are arranged so that the entry of the inner subjects can be brought out by means of finger-pressure, while in the fugues for the organ, on which finger-pressure has no effect in modifying tone, the subject is made to stand out by the mode of disposing the parts in extended harmony, which it would be impossible to play without the assistance of the pedal. The distinction is one difficult to define exactly or to illustrate by special passages, but it must make itself felt, to all who endeavor to play the organ and the clavier fugues respectively in such a manner as to mark the entries of the subject clearly; and it is obvious that Bach, a great executant as well as a great player, felt instinctively the difference between the capabilities of the two instruments, and wrote accordingly, even in the strictest fugal composition.

After Bach, as before remarked, Mendelssohn is the one great name in organ composition. Mozart appears, judging from his recorded remarks, to have thoroughly understood the genius of the instrument, and to have extemporized on it in the pure organ style, to the equal delight of himself and of listeners who remembered Bach; but he wrote nothing specially for it. His two noble fantasias, composed for a mechanical organ, make splendid organ pieces as re-arranged by Mr. Best, but they are not entirely in the organ style, and are in every respect exceptional among his works. Beethoven professed great enjoyment in playing the organ in his younger days, but wrote nothing for it. Schumann is the only other composer of great name who has touched organ-music, and his six fugues on the name of Bach are in the most serious and elevated style, and contain much to interest the player and hearer, but they impress one as labored and only partially successful; and his little pieces called "Lieder ohne Worte for the Organ" have nothing organic about them, and might as well have been written for the piano. But Mendelssohn's organ works stand on quite different ground. They form the only modern examples of organ composition, by a composer of the first class, at once entirely suited to the instrument and representing the best capabilities of the composer. In this respect they have been very much underrated. Among the enthusiastic admirers whom Mendelssohn has had in this country, many (so separate an interest is organ music in general society) hardly know anything of them; and by others we have heard them rated as among his weakest productions. To our thinking the very reverse is the case. Mendelssohn, who in a general way (as most people understand now) was a decided mannerist, and rather a sentimentalist among composers, is in six organ sonatas less mannered and less sentimental than in most, if not any, of his other classes of work. They stand much higher as organ-music than his piano-forte music does as piano-forte music, and they are each completely distinct and individual in design and feeling, almost as much so as if they were the work of so many different hands; and of what other collection of compositions by Mendelssohn can this be said? The same may be said of his only other organ work, the three preludes and fugues. In the sonatas the fugues that are introduced are the weakest parts (except, perhaps, that in the Second Sonata, which has very fine points); fugue was not Mendelssohn's forte as a rule, and there is in his organ fugues occasionally a confusion as to the conduct of the part-writing, and even as to the method of writing it down, which is felt by the player, perhaps, more than by the listener. But, apart from this, these sonatas are noble examples of the application of new treatment to the organ, — perfectly new at the time, — which is entirely in accordance with the genius and the mechanism of the instrument. The step made in the First Sonata beyond all that had previously been written can hardly be overrated in its importance in regard to the modern development of the instrument; the recitative movement which precedes the finale opened quite a new set of resources in the expressive power of the organ, while the finale showed how effects previously regarded as special to the piano-forte could be translated into the language and adapted to the mechanism of the organ.¹ Each of the sonatas embodies some other suggestion for the treatment of the instrument, originated by the composer, in every case effective and successful, and most of which have since received the compliment of repeated imitation by composers of inferior calibre.

Now it is especially in regard to this suggestiveness and individuality of style in Mendelssohn's organ compositions that we are struck with the contrast when we consider the best of the organ-music which has been written since. Almost all the organ-music we have had since Mendelssohn (and, with his exception, since Bach) is that of composers who are specially organists, who play the instrument and write for it mainly. And players who write for their instrument almost always fall into a mannerism of style, and rarely achieve the highest that the art, or even the instrument, is capable of. If Beethoven, the greatest writer incomparably for the piano-forte, had confined himself to playing and composing for that instrument, there is every reason to suppose that, so far from his piano-forte works having been any finer or more perfect than they are, they would have been less so. The greatest compositions for any given instrument are produced by a composer of the highest calibre, whose genius demands many outlets, and can assimilate itself to the genius of each instrument he selects as the medium for expressing his ideas. It is only genius of the second or third order which is content to write merely for one instrument (Chopin being a rare, perhaps the only, exception). And the misfortune is that most of our modern organ music is furnished simply by organ composers who never get to the heights of musical expression, and many of whom are hopelessly uninteresting. It would hardly be possible to find a more dead-level of mediocrity than in the voluminous pages of Rink's "Orgau School," and the ponderous dullness of Hesse is only relieved by one or two pieces possessed of some brightness and character. We have had much better works produced by other writers for the organ since; but somehow the interest of their writing seems to concentrate in one or two successful and effective pieces which exhaust their capabilities. We get a sonata, perhaps, with the name of Van Eyken, or Ritter, or Merkel, which is so effective that we look out for other works by the same composer, only to find that they are echoes, as one may say, of the one successful work which has given the composer his name. Herr Merkel is a little more "all round" in this way than some others of his brethren; but it must be confessed that he draws upon Mendelssohn and Beethoven, unintentionally perhaps, but very obviously, to an extent which very much weakens his claim to originality. Herr Rheinberger's works present more variety and individuality than those of most of his contemporaries, and it is worth remark that he is one of the few modern organ composers whose works in other branches of composition have attained a recognized and deserved repute. This is the case, too, with our own late composer, Henry Smart; but even in his case the most friendly critic (and none could be more so than the present writer) must be conscious that there is a remarkable similarity in the style and even the phrases of a good many of his organ movements. Dr. Wesley, an organ-player of real genius, expended his strength, as far as the organ is concerned, mainly in extemporizing, and his few published compositions serve rather to indicate what he might have done if he had given his mind more systematically to such composition, than to furnish any large or important addition to the organist's library. We are indebted to Mr. Silas for compositions, few but admirable, and possessing more variety, color, and piquancy of style than are found in the works of some organ composers more popularly known and reputed. Of the number of writers who have brought out "Three Andantes for the Organ" (and who has not?), all that can be said is that they have increased the stock of "in-voluntaries" (for "middle voluntaries" seem to have gone out), to be forgotten as soon as they have served that purpose.

But of the best and most respected of the contemporary writers, some of whom have been named above, it cannot surely be said that any one has contributed works to the organist's library which can be regarded as among the great classics of music. They themselves would be the very first to disclaim the idea. They have done what they could, and done it well, and we owe them the more thanks for their efforts to contribute to a branch of the art unaccountably neglected by the highest rank of composers. But what we want is to see the organ receive due attention at the hands of the foremost composers of the day. We have had a new violin concerto by Brahms, and a great excitement its production caused; but why cannot a composer of his calibre, so lofty in his style, so serious in his aims, turn some of his genius towards the organ, and give us a new sonata or set of sonatas which might form another epoch in the treatment of the instrument, and be as much a matter of general interest as a new violin concerto? Why can we not have something of the kind from Gounod, whose genius certainly has an affinity with the instrument, and who ought to be able to give us something which would take as high a position in organ music as his "Messe Solennelle" occupies in Catholic church music? It would be of great interest, too, to hear what Wagner would do with a work for a great modern organ; something new and unprecedented ought to come out of that, unquestionably. The contribution of important works for the organ by such composers would not only be a matter of the highest interest to the organ-player, but it would do something to bring the great instrument out of its comparative neglect by the modern musical world, and place it on a level in general estimation with the piano-forte. At present there are numbers of amateurs, well acquainted with other modern instruments and the music written for them, to whom organ music is a terra incognita, and who have the most shadowy notions as to the instrument and its capabilities. And when the great composers entirely neglect it, we can hardly blame the general public for knowing no better. — London Musical Times.

"JOHN OF PARIS" AT VIENNA.²

At the Imperial Opera House, Boieldieu's comic opera, Jean de Paris, has been brought forth from long oblivion. We acknowledge gratefully the respect which has lately been manifested for classical operas, and cannot do otherwise than support Herr Jauner in the noble feeling which caused him not long since to resuscitate Idomeneo. But it was no particularly lucky star which led him to Jean de Paris of all operas in the world. We fail to appreciate neither the historical significance nor the absolute æsthetic value of the work, though it is certainly very much faded at the present day. But the very thing which constitutes its charming peculiarity cannot have justice done it in a large theatre, and consequently not at the Imperial Opera House. We know what an immense success Jean de Paris proved when first produced in Paris (1812) and afterwards in Germany. Boieldieu had just returned from a disagreeable residence of many years in Russia to the French capital, thanks to his Jean de Paris, the favorite of his countrymen. What he had previously produced in Paris was not of much importance, and continued to live almost exclusively by this or that romance. Romances, the pet musical form with the French, play a prominent part in all Boieldieu's operas; the whole of Jean de Paris is a sort of romance among operas. The tones which La Dame Blanche struck at a later period (1825): with such charming volume and richness, are already very decidedly audible in Jean de Paris; but all the forms in the latter are more restricted; the invention and combinations are much more simple; the expression is more superficial, and the effects are more timid. From a musical point of view, Jean is merely a prelude, though, it is true, a charming one, to La Dame Blanche. Boieldieu's weak point, and that of French music generally, namely, the want of intensity and depth of feeling, is much more strikingly apparent in Jean than in La Dame Blanche, whose graceful smile is inspired and glows with the breath of sentiment. Jean de Paris was written by the librettist with an eye to joyous, gallant, conversational music alone; where the composer might desire the expression of feeling, the librettist offers only descriptions of external objects or witty discussions. Even M. A. Pougin, Boieldieu's latest French biographer, admits this. The Princess's very first air — originally an air for Calypso in the composer's earlier opera of Télémaque! — contains merely a calm description of the pleasures of traveling. Jean's duet with the Page is a short treatise on the duties of knight-hood; the Page's air, an exact description of his master's traveling outfit; and Jean's, a dissertation on the delights of the table. Gracefully, but like the other pieces, does the duet between the Page and the Landlord's Daughter treat a theme since worn threadbare: the contrast between town and country life in dance and song. The first and only situation, when, after nothing but masquerading and intriguing, the heart comes into its rights, — not until the very end of the opera, though, — is Jean's confession with the love duet appended to it. But even here the music is totally deficient in tenderness and warmth. We ourselves consider the best number in the entire score to be the first finale, which, with its varied and yet elegant confusion and the burlen ("Cette auberge est à mon gré, m'y voici, j'y resterai") employed so effectively, is a masterly example of the comedy-treatment of broad musical form. Boieldieu here reveals what, with all his independence, he learned from Mozart, and what he was to unfold, with still greater florid beauty and richness, in the licitation scene of La Dame Blanche.

Who can fail to perceive that the graceful Jean de Paris has nowadays lost much of its original charm? The music sounds, here and there, exceedingly dry and insipid, quite apart from the extreme simplicity of the instrumental treatment. These defects seem to increase with the size of the stage on which the opera is performed, while, on the other hand, the good qualities most especially its own are thrown into the background and grow obscure. The proper soil on which alone conversational operas like Jean de Paris flourish is at all times a small stage such as that of the Opéra Comique, where audience and performers are on a more intimate footing; where no turn in the dialogue, no delicacy of the accompaniment, and no portion of the play of features are lost. Jean de Paris is not effective in a large theatre like the Opera House. We know only one valid reason which could cause and justify its being produced there: the fact of the manager's happening to be in a position to cast the opera exceptionally well. We do not mean by this, with simply distinguished artists, but with artists distinguished in this particular branch of art; specialists, or, at any rate, artists possessing decided talent for French acting opera. Such artists our Opera House cannot at the present moment show, and the management could consequently hope for no more than a very small measure of success. For a work which by its very style is unsuited to the Opera House, and is, in addition, growing rapidly out of date, a "respectable" performance is not sufficient. It must be re-animated by artists of brilliant talent, or not given at all. An example of such brilliant talent, such a complete incarnation, or such a spiritualization, of opéra comique, was Roger — Gustave Roger, whose place will never be filled, and whom we shall never forget. In the year 1866, he sang for the last time the part of Jean de Paris in the little Harmonie-Theatre, the unfortunate precursor of our not much more fortunate Komische Oper. He was already advanced in years, and had only one arm; he sang with the remains of his voice, and in a foreign language. Yet every scene played by him conveyed more to the audience and afforded them incomparably higher enjoyment than yesterday's entire performance at the Imperial Opera House. Roger's entrancing style invested the wretched mise-en-scène at the Harmonie-Theatre with more golden brilliancy than the magnificent costumes at the Imperial Opera House could impart to the efforts of the singers there. A Roger, it is true, is not to be met with every day, not even in France, where they now do not possess, either at the Grand Opera or at the Opéra Comique, any tenor who, in talent or art, so much as approximates to Roger. Far, therefore, are we from wishing to compare any German tenor in a specifically French creation like Jean de Paris with Roger. A man may be a very excellent Elvino, Ernani, or Raoul, and yet not possess a special natural qualification for the light tattle of comic opera. Our admirable artist, Müller, took most conscientiously the greatest pains with his part, but the pains were the most prominent portion of his impersonation. The extremely jerky, quick sentences of the German version, which Jean has to sing, with a word to each note, give any German singer enough to do; a Frenchman lets them glide, as it were, off his lips. Herr Müller tears his larynx to tatters. As a performance in an unusual field of action, Herr Müller's Jean deserved sincere respect; looked at from a purely vocal point of view, it may be said to have towered over everything done by any one else. Herr Scaria was more at home; in the part of the Seneschal he brought to bear the advantage of an exceedingly clear utterance and naturally phlegmatic gravity. He did not produce with his air the great effect which renders the latter so dear to famous vocalists (Stockhausen, for instance); he was frequently under the necessity of having recourse to those carefully deadened high notes, which form so flat a contrast to the vigorous notes of his middle and lower register.

Mme. Kupfer, as the Princess of Navarre, looked magnificent. She was, indeed, a princess who could afford to be gazed at! But this was all. Even in the non-florid, simple pieces, such as the Troubadour's romance, her singing was pure naturalism. Mlle. Braga exhibited, as the Page, much versatility, and, as a vocalist, got over the difficulties of her entrance-air pretty well. We must, however, regret the restless and unpleasing eagerness with which she is always striving to put her undeniable dramatic talent in a favorable light, and thereby succeeds only in exhibiting it in a distorting glass. She is exaggerated in her dramatic accentuation; in the vivacity of her movements; and, above all, in her facial expression. She is fond of accompanying every bar with a fresh look. Let her display a little more natural truth and simplicity, and she will certainly produce more genuine effects. With the above named leading artists, called on several times after the fall of the curtain, were associated Mlle. Kraus (Lorenza) and Herr Lay (Pedrigo), who did very meritoriously what they had to do. The opera is placed on the stage as effectively as possible; the new costumes especially, by their magnificence and historical accuracy, are well worth seeing.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

BERLIOZ'S "PRISE DE TROIE."

(From Correspondence of the New York Musical Review.)

So long as a musical work exists only on paper, it is about the same as if it existed only in the mind of its author. The only way to test a piece of music is to perform it. . . . All those who love Berlioz (and their number is now very great) owe a debt of gratitude to our two popular conductors of orchestra, Pasdeloup and Colonne, for their idea of taking the Prise de Troie from the shelves of the book stores and of presenting it to the public in a manner which, though incomplete on account of its lacking the essential element of action, nevertheless enables the public to judge of the work from a musical point of view, whilst they wait for some intelligent manager of a theatre to gain assured success by putting on the stage the Priise de Troie and representing anew the Troyens à Carthage.

It has often been said that Berlioz is not a dramatic genius; but after the twenty performances of the Troyens à Carthage, given at Paris in 1868, that assertion seems rather strong. He certainly does not understand the stage as did Scribe and Meyerbeer; he has not, as a poet the commonplace facility of the former, or, as a musician, the accommodating eclecticism of the latter. His inspiration is often labored, but it is very rarely that he can be accused of committing a scenic absurdity, and never is he guilty of any of those repugnant theatrical vulgarities which Scribe so much affected and which Meyerbeer unhappily accepted with too much complaisance. Knowing that he was capable of great achievements, and avoiding the beaten paths, Berlioz could scarcely help producing something powerful and original; that passionate admirer of Virgil, of Shakespeare, of Gluck, and of Spontini could not be lacking in poetic and dramatic feeling. The powerful scenes of Benvenuto Cellini, the ravishing tableaux of Beatrice et Benedict, and the grand and charming episodes of the Troyens are proofs of this.

Berlioz's inspiration is labored, as I have already said. This truth often makes itself felt in his works, and what is known of his mode of working only confirms this impression. He, moreover, did not receive any musical education in his early youth. He could play only a little, a very little, on the guitar and flute and none at all on any other instrument. With the music of the classic masters he did not become familiar until much later. This accounts for the want of ease observable in some of his music. But this fault, which in one less strongly organized would manifest itself in harsh and awkward phrases, in trifling and unequal numbers, in a word, in weakness, is in him very much attenuated by the immediate contact with vigorous thoughts, full of beauties, which invade and penetrate the hearer and prevent him from spending much thought on those gaps in the "musicality."

The system of composition followed by Berlioz in his operas proceeds from two different sources. There is, first, the influence of the style of his favorite authors — an influence very easily recognized in many a passage; and then that which is peculiarly his own, which he has created under the incubation of the romantic period, and which Richard Wagner certainly took for the point of departure of his creations, but, as is well known, after the first efflorescence of the genius of Berlioz.

In briefly analyzing the Priise de Troie, we shall try to distinguish, among the principal movements, those which may be arranged under one or other of the above two heads.

The entire lyric poem, taken by Berlioz from the second and fourth books of the Æneid, formed at first in the mind of the author only one composition. But the dimensions which the work assumed soon obliged him to cut it in two, in order to adapt it to the stage. Of these two parts that to which he gave the preference, and which deserved it, and which, after years of waiting, he finally had the happiness of seeing put upon the stage, was the second, the Troyens à Carthage. In regard to the Priise de Troie, he had no hope that it would be represented before the arrival of better times, and these have been very long in coming. It appears that, in proportion as Berlioz advanced in his work, his style became more assured and fixed; for in the first part there are some evidently tentative passages, some compromises with the old lyric doctrines, which are not found in the second. The Priise de Troie is merely a beautiful and grand prologue. The musician tunes his lyre, and it gives forth most glorious accents, but also among them more than one discord.

The first act opens with a chorus of the Trojan populace, which is dispersed over the plain after the apparent departure of the Greeks. The chorus is of an awkward and strained measure; its scholastic forms indicate very poorly the abandon, the disorder, which ought to reign under such circumstances. Berlioz introduced here the onomatopoeias which he so much affected, those ha! ha! vocalized, which are ridiculous, and nothing else. Cassandra, the prophetess, enters upon the scene after the departure of the chorus; her recitative, "Les Grecs ont disparu," is in grand style, and the admirable air that follows, "Malheureux roi!" might, aside from some harmonies that modernize it, have been written by Gluck. In the duo between Cassandra and her affianced, Corœbus, three parts are to be distinguished: the dialogues in recitative, which are of a beautiful and noble declaration; the two cantabiles of Corœbus, "Reviens à toi," in the style of Spontini, and "Mais le ciel et la terre," recall Méhul and his correct frigidity; finally, the union of the two voices, where some series of thirds and sixths spoil a fine situation. Berlioz was not himself in that feeble personation of the first act, the shortest and the least good of the three.

A hymn in the form of a march, in which the Trojans return thanks to the gods who protected their city, begins the second act. It is of a texture sufficiently heavy; the composer sought to write popular music, but the effort made is very perceptible, and it came to nothing. What is the sense, for example, of the somewhat puerile oppositions of forte and piano in "Dieu de l'Olympe," and "Dieu de mers," for which there is absolutely no reason whatever? Nevertheless, thanks to the powerful instrumentation, there are some fine-sounding passages in the movement, and it is not without effect on the public, since at the Châtelet, where, however, the encores are very frequent, it had to be repeated last Sunday. A pleasant and short diversion, "A combat with the cestus, passage at arms," in which occurs an episode in 5-4 measure, precedes a grand scene of singing and pantomime, mixed, in which figure Andromache, her son Astyanax, King Priam and Queen Hecuba, and which has sense and is interesting only on a stage. Æneas comes running, to tell, in a rapid melopœia, the terrible spectacle of which he has just been a witness: the Trojan priest and his two sons choked to death by two enormous serpents that arose from the sea. Then begins a grand movement d'ensemble (ottetto and chorus): "Châtiment effroyable," which is one of the rare, but very great, mistakes of Berlioz. A gradation of effect, ably obtained, and fine vocal and orchestral passages are not sufficient to justify the excessive length of this movement, its fastidious repetitions of words, and the false manner in which the situation is treated. It is an inexplicable concession to the ancient operatic routine, which Berlioz so often covered with his sarcasm. Happily there comes soon after a very dramatic air by Cassandra, deploring that her counsels have not been followed, and that the fatal present of the Greeks has been introduced into the city; then, at the end, a splendid movement, full of refulgence, life, and interest, uniting in the highest degree all that which constitutes the value of a lyric musical movement. It is the Trojan march, "Du roi des dieux, ô fille aimée," and it is twenty times better than that which, in a very similar situation, closes the second act. If Berlioz had not written this before Wagner, we should say that this march is like an echo from Tannhäuser. But the French musician had in him, long before, the aspirations which were to be realized in so personal and so new a manner in his symphonic poems. His style was altogether his own for a long time, and if sometimes it was not equal to that of a more ancient art, it was so only temporarily, and when the inspiration had left him. He for a long time, and with reason, thought much of that march, for he intercalated it also in the recitative prologue of the Trojens à Carthage, which prologue was added in the representations of the opera, in order to resume in a few lines the portion not then represented, that is, the Prise de Troie.

In the third act we find, first, a scene which would have a most powerful effect in a theatre; for even performed at a concert, with only symphonic resources, it produced a very lively impression. It is the appearance of the shade of Hector, who comes to show Æneas the way of safety after the destruction of Troy, and commands him to flee to Italy with his gods, the treasure of Priam, and the defenders of the city, who are no longer of any use to it. In Hector's recital no other notes are employed except the chromatic series descending in the interval of an octave, from B-flat to B-flat: these phrases unfolding themselves recto tono as a psalmody, in the space of twenty-eight measures, and accompanied only by the long chords of the string instruments and the muted notes of the horn, are of a terrible effect. The use of the horn, in particular, with its lugubrious sounds is one of those novelties interdicted to ordinary minds. The entire scene bears the stamp of genius. The ruin of Troy is almost accomplished; the Greeks are in the city, pillaging, burning, and killing; but Æneas, his companions, their gods, and the treasure of Priam have escaped them. Then the Trojan women implore the help of Cybele; their chorus, in three parts, opens with a plaintive exclamation, leaving, between the voice and the instruments, the interval of a diminished fifth, to D-flat, which there produces a heart-rending effect. Berlioz was certainly a great colorist. The chorus itself, "Puissante Cybèle," has much sweetness in its melancholic tint. Cassandra enters with disheveled hair and in tears. She makes to Vesta a sacrifice of her life, and exhorts her companions to imitate her example rather than permit themselves to fall into the hands of the Greeks. Some heroically accept the alternative, the others hesitate, and are reviled by the former. The voluntary victims with Cassandra at their head immolate themselves just when the vanquishers come to lay hands on them. . . . This whole final scene, on which Berlioz has left his vigorous and altogether personal imprint, is admirably conducted, and in the highest degree dramatic. The recitative of Cassandra, the choruses of the women, everything in the three parts is of the most intense interest, which does not for a moment diminish. If this opera were well performed in a theatre with an intelligent mise-en-scène, this termination ought to produce a deep impression.

The melodic style of Berlioz in the Prise de Troie is, above all, expressive. Gluck's precepts guided him. In regard to the manner of writing, there is little to be found fault with, except in some of the slight details, as, for instance, the first notes sung by Æneas in the second act, to the words: "Du peuple et des soldats," and which oblige the singer to sound, without preparation, a G sharp and an A sharp, and this without any plausible reason. The harmony and the instrumentation are, in the entire work, full of relief and interest; and it is evident that, in it all, the technical part of the composition was that which most preoccupied Berlioz, and in which he most constantly drew upon his inventive genius. As Wagner, so Berlioz was his own proper poet. His verses are often very beautiful, but there are not wanting weak places in them. He had, besides, no pretension to deserving poetic laurels, and he wrote his own libretto only in order to be certain that the entire work should be modeled according to his ideas.

"Sig. Basso scored a complete success."—Set it to music? or won a bass bawl match?

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN IN VICTORIA STREET.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN is the "Celebrity at Home" in the World recently. The writer of the article says that Mr. Sullivan may owe his cheerful temperament rather to his race than to his musical destiny. Of Irish parentage on one side and of Italian descent on the other, he perhaps retains the vivacity of the Irish with the more solid intellectual qualities of the Italian. Lively as his manner is, now that he is again thoroughly restored to health, it is, however, no difficult matter to bring him to a serious level. To him all beautiful things suggest an equivalent in his own art, to which he strives, above all things, to impart positive character. A remarkable instance of his faculty in this peculiar direction is afforded by the exquisite part-song, "We will wash him, mend him, tend him," in the second act of the Sorcerer, which at once brings before the mind's eye chintz gowns, flowered waistcoats, and a dance upon the village green. This beautiful specimen of what may be called light-handed work was once sung with immense applause at one of Mr. Leslie's concerts by Madame Patey and other artists in the front rank of their profession, by whom every delicate nuance was charmingly and sympathetically rendered. Here at the purists took fright, and difficult as it is to believe, actually protested with solemn dullness against the introduction of music written for a light theatrical piece into a concert otherwise composed of "serious" work. Dull people always do this kind of thing, and quite overlook the well-worn truth, that to play with a subject the author must know it thoroughly. These are the men who call Frenchmen superficial because they are clear, and Germans profound because they are ponderous. As Mr. W. S. Gilbert deserves honor for the ability with which he defends authorship against the outrages of managers, publishers, hoc genus omne, so does Mr. Sullivan merit glory for the thoroughly artistic hopefulness and manly self-denial which enables him to resist the temptation of tuition—the rock on which so many musicians of fair promise have struck. Happily for the public and himself, he preferred long years of hard work, sweetened now and then by that praise which is so remote from solid pudding, to the very handsome income which teaching would have given him at once. With the audacity which sometimes accompanies genius, he spurned the pot-au-feu of the instructor, and determined to live by genuine work. None but those acquainted with the musical profession can do full justice to the young composer, who, instead of spending his day in picking up seven or eight guineas from inharmonious skulls, devotes the whole of it to original work, and trusts for his bread to its success. He has, of course, one immense advantage over the giver of lessons. Be the latter never so skilled, he comes to his original work wearied and jaded, and under these depressing circumstances the fire of genius must require a world of stirring before it will burn brightly. This life of alternate drudgery and inspiration Arthur Sullivan determined should never be his. Like a musical Cortez he burned his ships, and trusted to the unexplored possibilities of art to justify his resolves. Just at this moment there is some little danger that the reputation of Arthur Sullivan as a solid musician of the higher class will be overshadowed by the enormous popularity attained by the light and pretty music which, wedded to Mr. W. S. Gilbert's exquisitely humorous "words," has driven America as well as England mad over H. M. S. Pinafore. This purely national and original vein of production was hit upon in the oddest way. Thirteen years ago Charles Burnett, a writer on Punch, died, and his family being left in sore distress, a benefit was arranged, and Mr. F. C. Burnand promised to collaborate with Mr. Sullivan in a musical piece. Time passed, till within a week of the benefit it occurred to the collaborators as they were going to church that they had collaborated nothing. Mr. Burnand was equal to the occasion. "Let us," said he, "set Cox and Box to music." Sullivan, struck with the happy thought, said "Book it;" and in seven days the work was written, learned, rehearsed and rendered by Messrs. Du Maurier, Harold Power, and Arthur Cecil. Transferred to the German Reed entertainments, Cox and Box ran for five hundred nights, and Mr. Arthur Cecil achieved a genuine triumph. Few will forget his singing the delightful "Lullaby Bacon." The success of Cox and Box opened up a prospect of lucrative work to Arthur Sullivan, whose first work produced in conjunction with W. S. Gilbert was Thespis, written for Mr. Toole, and adapted for the peculiarities of his individual organ. Thespis ran a hundred nights, but is now obscured by the brighter light of Trial by Jury, The Sorcerer, and Pinafore, the latter of which was worked out by the composer during intense physical pain which preceded his serious illness last summer. In Mr. Gilbert Mr. Sullivan has found a collaborator after his own heart. His lines are always smooth and perfect in rhythm, and what is more important, as Mr. Sullivan avers, are eminently suggestive. The composer lays great stress upon this point, inasmuch as he holds that the "words" of a musical piece should suggest the music. In producing their work the authors of Pinafore proceed after a method of their own. Instead of the "book" being after due consultation written and then set to music, the work goes on simultaneously by a gradual process of piling up number on number. Above all things it is kept in mind that the opening chorus and air must be lively and characteristic, and that the finale to the first act shall put the audience in good humor. Another serious matter is to decide when the music is to be made of the first importance and when subordinated to the words. When a dramatic situation can be perfectly illustrated by the music, the composer allows his power full scope; but when explanation is needed, cuts down his music to mere intoning, as in the immortal "I'm monarch of the sea," in which the repetition of "his sisters, his cousins, and his aunts," has tenfold the force and fun it would have if sung to an air. Bit by bit book and music are produced, and the work is done; and what the over-serious call an amusing trifle is produced — no trifle to the laborers before the mast of H. M. S. Pinafore. — Yorkshire Post.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XIX.

(To one beginning to paint) Learn to paint the whole thing in at once. Do, visibly and positively, certain things that you have not been in the habit of doing. Study to arrange certain things for a result later. When the result arrives, that's the end of it. You want to pack certain things in your trunk before you start.

See what the vital things are! Give up all idea of "finish!" Nobody ever finished. Keep the canvas as a slate to do your sums on. Don't expect to finish it, sign your name, and present it to your grandmother. She won't care anything about it. Use your canvas like a tablet to do your lessons on. When you learn what values are, you'll find that a picture exists.

Get the general look of things. Look at the light on the top of that head. (A plaster bas-relief.) It is simple and clear, but you, in your anxiety to draw whatever you think you see, cover it with lines and disturb it with shadows.

What is the effect? A brilliant white cast against a gray back ground. Don't look for lines. Don't borrow any dark lines. There are enough of them, we all know. You think you see lines in that hair, and you put them in until they look like the teeth of a coarse comb.

"Masses" are great spaces where the light strikes and where the shadows fall. Close your eyes and see how the lines disappear compared with the great mass of shadow!

"I can see one!"

Of course you can; and you can see things which are not there. Your business is no scrutiny; it is impression, perception. When you look at that cast you see a beautiful image. You don't see a collection of lines. You don't want to do any more than there is to do. You do too much work; or what you call work. You won't believe how little work there is in a fine thing! Look at "Clytie," yonder! How many "lines" do you see? You can do it all without a line. Do it like an apparition at first. The shoulders and chest are one mass of light. Little tints, to be sure, there are; but with two or three you can model the whole thing. I say you. I mean myself. I mean all of us. You may draw lines to the end of time, and you won't have a picture. You can't do things simply without studying. You don't want a lot of lines, like a rain-storm, to give an impression. You need one solid, flat tint. Look at this background. I'm not doing it for finish, but for fact. You get your outlines too much before getting your masses; and then you leave a light edge, like a halo, all around the head, for fear of losing the outline.

Better be frankly wrong, than doubtfully right. In drawing the little girl's frock, put in decided shadows wherever you see them. Then you will know where you are. Now you have the general tint and the shadows of the drapery, see how the hands and wrists come out luminous.

Having made the hair dark, you can take out the little lights that fall on the braid. Don't do it as you think it is! You don't know how a braid looks. You can't draw details until you get the masses. Count the lights on the braid, and put them all in as you think they are, and where are you? You are working like a wig-maker, and have added a great deal which you really did not see.

Simplify certain things, and add what is necessary. If you see a robin in the grass, don't draw in every blade of the grass. Don't put in stuff that does not mean anything. Look at that shadow in the corner of the room! Full, rich, dark, and undisturbed by lines and details.

Ordinary outlines represent nothing. They are a map of what the drawing might have been — if there had been any.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. — The New Year opened musically. The second Symphony Concert, in spite of business and gifts and calls, drew a large audience to the Music Hall, who were regaled and edified with a choice artistic programme of both old and new, the former represented by Bach and Mozart, the latter by Bargiel, Bruch, and Rubinstein, while Mendelssohn, the young Felix, full of filial piety, loyal to the past, yet pressing forward, stood for the transition and connecting link, though Schumann might have stood there more significantly. These were the selections: —

Overture to "Möden" Bargiel.
Aria: "My heart ever faithful," with Piano and 'Cello. Bach.
Mrs. J. W. Weston.

Symphony, in D (No. 1, Breitkopf and Härtel) Mozart.
Adagio and Allegro — Andante — Presto.
Chaconne, in D minor, originally for Violin Solo, adapted for Orchestra by Raff Bach.
Overture to "Die Heimkehr aus der Fremde," Mendelssohn.
Aria: "Ingeborg's Lament," from "Scenes from the Frithjof Saga," Op. 23 (new) Max Bruch.
Mrs. J. W. Weston.
First Movement (Allegro maestoso) from the "Ocean" Symphony, in C, Op. 42 Rubinstein.

Bargiel's Medea Overture was given for the fourth time during the past ten years of these concerts, and it wears well, — one of the best of the Overtures since Schumann. It is sombre and tragical, to be sure, from the nature of the subject, but this is relieved by an exquisitely tender and melodious episode; and, as a whole, the work is grand, impressive, and original. It was finely played. The Mozart Symphony, one of several in D, and "without Minuet," is a lovely composition, spontaneous, melodious, unmistakably clear in its intentions. You do not have to ask yourself whether you understand it, or whether you really like it, as you do after almost every recent work. There it stands, positive and perfect, which is only saying that it is by Mozart; with him it is no painful climbing to a would-be heaven of invention; in that heaven of harmony he lives and breathes at home, and what he composes is beyond criticism; only sympathy, appreciation, are in place while he is on the stage, and nothing can be less appreciative than to consign such a symphony as this to the background because, forsooth, it has no part for the clarinet, no trombones, tubas, and the like, as modern orchestral productions have. With simpler means Mozart could express more than the moderns with their monster orchestras, and from fewer instruments evoke, not seldom, a more satisfying sonority; and so could Haydn. Of this Symphony the first movement is the most important, with its noble Adagio introduction, and its genial Allegro, of which the principal motive is almost identical with that of the Zauberflöte Overture, which is charmingly worked up with secondary motives and with beautiful tone coloring. The Andante is graceful, sweet, and tender, but was made a little cloying by unnecessary observance of the conventional repetition marks. The Presto is like happy lovers' melody; many will remember an old English love duet, once often heard in parlors, which was palpably cut out from one of its tuneful passages. The Symphony was delicately rendered, and we do not envy the spoiled musical appetite which found no zest in it.

Of a grander, broader, deeper order, yet in harmonious succession, came the Bach Chaconne. Raff made an important addition to our orchestral repertoire when he transcribed that wonderful violin solo — perhaps the greatest thing ever written for a single violin — for orchestra. He finds his justification for so doing (so he says in a short preface to the score) in the polyphonic character of Bach's violin solos, which, he thinks, shows that they were intended for development into full orchestral proportions. But the wonder is that the violin part contains all this and seems so perfect in itself. Nevertheless, the fact that the original work admitted of such a marvelous expansion, such an inexhaustible wealth and variety of form and color, as one variation after another develops out of the pregnant, still ever present, sober theme, each a fresh surprise and keen delight, helps us to realize what an intrinsic power and inspiration reside in that solo for the violin. Raff has executed the task in a masterly way, showing a consummate knowledge of the resources of the orchestra and of the art of instrumentation. Such fascination is there in the piece, such unflinching certainty of a fresh revelation, yet a home-like feeling of identity, in each successive variation, that one could almost pray to have the theme keep on renewing and transfiguring itself in that way all day long.

In pleasant contrast came the fresh, youthful, spring-like little Overture of Mendelssohn. It was a mistake, however, to leave off the four measures from the introduction which recur so expressively at the end. The Allegro from the "Ocean" Symphony made a strong, exhilarating, bright conclusion to the concert. There is a great deal of the poetry of Ocean in it; it is imaginative, romantic, graphic, and exciting music, but probably requires several hearings for its full appreciation. Though it was played with spirit, yet in some parts, in certain instruments, its outlines and its felicities of detail were somewhat blurred by carelessness of phrasing and of rhythmical division.

Mrs. Weston has a rich and musical mezzo-soprano voice, and sings with unaffected feeling and expression, though hardly with enough abandon in the rapturous song of Bach, which would have been more effective in that great hall with an orchestral accompaniment (the Franz parts could not be found); but the piano and 'cello obligato were nicely played by Mr. Foote and Mr. Wulf Fries. The "Lament," from Bruch's Frithjof, a sort of Thekla's song, is very beautiful, both in its simple, touching melody, which has a true Norse flavor, and in its delicate romantic orchestration (without trumpets or trombones), in which the violas have a very active part. It proved to be admirably suited to Mrs. Weston's voice and manner, and made a deep impression; the calls for a repetition were enthusiastic and persistent, but were modestly declined.

EUTERPE. — The second concert, Wednesday evening, Jan. 7, was a very enjoyable occasion, — all the more so through the return to the pleasant old arrangement of placing the performers in the middle of the listeners. The programme gave us old and new, the classical and the romantic, in singular contrast, thus: —

Quartet W. A. Mozart.
No. 466, Koechel's Catalogue. Composed January 14, 1785, at Vienna. No. 6 of the set of six quartets dedicated to Joseph Haydn.

Adagio	C major, 3-4
Allegretto	C major, 4-4
Andante cantabile	F major, 3-4
Menuetto; allegretto	C major, 3-4
Trio	C minor, 3-4
Allegro molto	C major, 2-4

Quartet, No. 7, Opus 192, No. 2 Joachim Raff.
The Miller's Pretty Daughter. A Cycle of Tone-poems.
The Youth — Allegretto D major, 9-8
The Mill — Allegro G minor, 2-4
The Miller's Daughter — Andante, quasi adagietto B flat major, 6-8
Unrest — Allegro D minor, 4-4
Explanation — Andantino, quasi allegretto G major, 3-4
For the Nuptial Eve — Vivace D major, 4-4

The Quartet in C is one of the old favorites, one of the perfect things of Mozart. It was beautifully rendered by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, especially the Andante with that interesting figure in the 'cello part. Raff's "programme" piece is no Quartet at all in point of form or spirit, but it is very interesting in all but the last of its six scenes or tone-pictures, being melodious, rich, and euphonious in the blending of the instruments, and full of poetic suggestion. The first number seems to express the vague longing for love in the youth's soul, the aimless aspiration, and the music is a little prolix as well as vague, yet enjoyable. "The Mill" is the most natural and charming number; this gave general delight, and had to be repeated. The fifth number, "Explanation," or declaration, confession (Erklärung), also pleased exceedingly. Mr. Giese's manly 'cello tone was certainly very eloquent and tender in its pleading, and the silvery soft voice of the maiden was supposed to be heard in the first violin. All very pretty, but whether such a love duet between two instruments would keep much hold upon one's sympathies after several hearings may well be a question. Probably the Mozart and Beethoven style of Quartet will long outlast it. The last piece, "Zum Polter-Abend," which means, we suppose, the noisy mock serenade of the "Nuptial Eve," seemed a rushing, scrambling, head-over-heels sort of movement, and we fear would have seemed so even if it had not been scrambled through with by the hard-taxed instruments.

THE SECOND UNIVERSITY CONCERT, with its first performance in this country of the Goetz Symphony, with two beautiful movements of a Divertimento (for string orchestra and two horns) by Mozart, two great Overtures, and Miss Ita Welsh's singing, was altogether enjoyable. Mr. Listemann's Philharmonic Orchestra playing very finely; but we must reserve fuller notice.

MAX BRUCH'S "ODYSSEUS" (CONCLUDED). — We left the hero rescued from the waves by the Oceanides, and deposited, asleep, hungry, and naked, on the shore of the green and happy island of the Phæacians, a race favored of the Immortals, dwelling in fabulous peace, and leading a life all innocent gayety and sunshine. And now follow two of the finest scenes of the work.

VI. Nausicaa. She is the king's daughter, who is dancing and singing and "tossing the light ball" with her lighter-hearted maidens. Their strain, in 9-8 measure, alternating with a simpler one in 6-8, is exceedingly graceful, light, and buoyant. They sing of careless trust and joy: "Seize the fleeting, blissful hour," etc., with an exquisitely accompanying figure in the orchestra. His awakening and surprise at seeing, as it were, Diana and her nymphs, and his supplication for aid, are admirably managed; and the cordial hymn-like chorus of welcome: "Beggars and strangers always come from Zeus," concludes a number rich in musical invention and felicitous transitions. The part of Nausicaa was tastefully sung by Mrs. G. A. Adams. Now follows music of a grander strain.

VII. The Banquet with the Phaiakes, or Phæacians. This is the most exciting, and, by all odds, the greatest number in the work. A marrowy and vigorous fugue theme is introduced by the bass voices, answered by the tenor, alto, and soprano, and is worked up into a magnificent whole, with a most enthusiastic and effective accompaniment. To this grand outburst of welcome succeeds the yet grander song of the Rhapsodes, for which all the strings of the orchestra resolve themselves into a gigantic, all-pervading "harp of a thousand strings," resounding with full chords pizzicato, in bold, broad, and unflagging rhythm. Tenors and basses, in powerful unison, recite the tale of the fall of Troy, the fate of Agamemnon, and the ten years' wandering of Ulysses. Of course this leads to his discovery, and the short, startling chorus, one voice after another, "'T is he," "'tis he," soon all uniting in full, strong chords: "'T is the chieftain of might," which is worthy of what has gone before. And then, in grateful contrast and completion to all this glorious excitement comes the softer, sweeter, but rich, full, satisfying quartet and chorus in praise of home; then, Allegro con brio, with a most exhilarating accompaniment, with cheering chorus of the people, the shining sails are spread, the oars groan again, and away the hero is borne upon the homeward voyage. This whole scene is full of genius and consummate art; the music tells the story wonderfully well.

VIII. We come back to poor Penelope, weaving the garment, unraveling by night what she has woven by day, to baffle the importunity of the suitors. She sings a very simple, yearning minor melody, to which the accompaniment supplies the agitato of her anxious heart; the low, sad song is only varied by one mild burst of indignation as she thinks of the presumptuous carousers. It is a song of simple beauty and true feeling, but almost lost amid the more brilliant and exciting scenes, although Miss Homer sang it touchingly and truly.

IX. The Return. Tenderly singing in soft unison, the Phaiakes carry the sleeping Odysseus on shore, then steal away, and their smooth four-part song is heard, softer and softer, as they recede. He wakes, does not recognize his native land, denounces the traitors who have abandoned him, wonders where he is, until Athena appears and informs him. When she tells him of the suitors and the danger of Penelope, he breaks out in a strain of rage and indignation, which reminds one somewhat of the revengeful aria of Pizarro in Fidelio, and affords a grand opportunity for impassioned declamation, such as Mr. Adams was quite sure to improve. The scene has dramatic intensity.

X. Feast in Ithaca. This last is a stirring scene, full of fine musical matter, to much of which, however, the audience, sat with so much before, was probably but half alive. There is first a vigorous chorus of the people: "Have ye heard the tidings?" ending with shouts of triumph; then, by way of tender episode before the final chorus, a beautiful duet between the reunited wife and husband, which is of a very noble character, — nothing of morbid sentimentality or common-place about it; only the very richness of the full chord progressions in the orchestra make it perhaps a little cloying; and then a most enthusiastic, rapturous chorus of praise to all the gods, and triumph, beginning in long solid chords, and contrapuntally developed as it gains momentum and excitement; it has immense sonority and breath and splendor; but it is not a fugued chorus, and partly for that reason perhaps, though it is more tumultuous and overwhelming, it has less intrinsic power than the chorus of the Phæacians.

This is a very meagre description of "Odysseus," and it will require more than one hearing to do it justice. On the whole, the impression left by it on our mind is of a work of rare musicianship and of imaginative genius. Of melodies, distinct and positive, one carries away few, and those not remarkable; but of melody, melodic passages, and phrases, it is full, — more in the choruses than in the solos, far more in the orchestra than in the voices. All flows gracefully and smoothly throughout. The part writing for voices is clear and masterly. The harmony and instrumentation are remarkably rich and graphic and original. It takes a composer of a high order to set such texts to music so successfully as Max Bruch has here done.

It is well that the Cecilia have decided to give another performance of "Odysseus" later in the season, for a curious variety of opinions have been expressed about it. For instance, in the Sunday Courier, after the musical editor has offered a favorable opinion, a "Growler" is introduced with "Something on the other side." He says: —

After listening attentively for two hours and a half to the combined efforts of soloists, chorus, and orchestra, I went home thoroughly worn out mentally and musically. I had looked for bread, and they had given what to me was a stone: so I naturally expected to find some confirmation of my feelings in the reports of the daily press. Judge then of my surprise at finding a review of the work in the Advertiser which started out with the assertion that the chief characteristic of the work was its expressive melodiousness! Here I had been a whole long evening following the work with all my eyes and ears, and had failed to discover anything whatever at all worthy the name of melody, and then to be told that melody was its greatest charm! I thought possibly I might be wrong, so I took the score and sought, as one seeks for hidden treasures, for the melody I was assured was there. I found, indeed, what I might call the front ends of what, if properly developed, might have formed respectable melodies, but nothing more. These fragments were from two to four bars in length, and often I said to myself, while listening, that the long hoped-for melody had at length arrived. No such good luck: the poor things seemed so lonesome, that after a very brief struggle for existence they retired into the orchestral tumult that surged around them, as if weary of contending with such uncongenial surroundings. I thought possibly that Penelope's lament might, though mournful, be musically expressive of her grief. I found it insufferably stupid, nothing more. In short, where I might reasonably have expected melody, I found nothing but musical commonplaces: even the choruses, with possibly two or three exceptions, were simply orchestral figures adapted to words. I found plenty of form, an excess of orchestral coloring, more or less declamation, some good choral effects, everything, in fact, that a thorough knowledge of the science of music could give, except the divine spark that pervades such works as Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Gade have given us: of that I found not a trace. And yet we are told that the work is one of the finest of modern productions. Heaven save the mark! If this is a masterpiece, in what category are we to place the "Walpurgis Night," "The Crusaders," "Paradise and the Peri," or numerous other works I could name? Is the gift of melody utterly lost, and must we for the future be satisfied with the Wagnerian "Endless Melody," with symphonic works with choral attachments presented under the guise of Vocal Works? This seems to me to be the present drift of music. But enough for the present. While waiting for the matter to settle and take definite form, will you kindly point out to me one straight tune in the entire "Olyseus." I want to see what your idea of a melody is.

Quite the opposite opinion is expressed in the Gazette:—

It is a strong work, exceedingly beautiful at times in its melodies, and always striking in the happy unity of feeling between the words and the music. Its harmonies are rich, fluent, and graceful, and the instrumentation is refined, masterly, and expressive. This cantata abounds in merits of every kind, and is characterized throughout by poetic and artistic sentiment of great elevation and purity. As a piece of writing for voices it is a masterpiece, and in every essential is a delightful work to listen to. It does not baffle the understanding or perplex the interest at a single hearing, and, though partaking of many of the qualities of the modern school, is wholly clear and broad, producing none of that monotony in effect which the mannerisms of the composers of the future have imposed upon their style. Some of the quieter portions of the work are exquisitely tender, and the chorus of the Sirens, in particular, is charming in its grace and delicacy. The performance scarcely did justice to the work. There was much untunefulness on the part of both chorus and orchestra, and appropriate warmth of expression was often lacking. In fact, there was a coldness and a rigidity in the interpretation generally, and often an absence of brilliancy where it was most needed. These shortcomings were doubtless due to the inevitable nervousness attending a first performance, and we trust that the work may be heard again, when the deep coloring it demands may be given. The soloists, who acquitted themselves very well, were Mrs. Rockwood, Mrs. Adams, Miss Morse, Miss Homer, Mr. C. R. Adams, Mr. Kingsbury, and Mr. Cornell. The work made a strong impression upon all refined and cultivated tastes.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, DEC. 22.—On Tuesday evening, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society gave its second concert with the appended programme:—

Overture, "Consecration of the House" . . . Beethoven.
Prelude, Minuet and Fugue (strings) . . . Reinkhold.
First Symphony, E-flat, Op. 38 . . . Schumann.
Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger" . . . Wagner.

These were the orchestral numbers. Mlle. Valleria and Sig. Galassi were the soloists. The Brooklyn Academy looked lovely, as it always does when these concerts take place. Beds of flowers were to be seen everywhere, and the space occupied ordinarily by the orchestra—immediately below the level of the stage—was filled with magnificent growing callas and various other plants. The board of directors evidently aimed to please the eye as well as the ear, and the success was very great in either direction. Among other courtesies extended to those who attend the B. P. S.'s entertainments is the gift of an extended analysis of the symphony upon the evening's programme: each person is presented with a copy, and it is certainly a most considerate and thoughtful act. The performance was an excellent one, and it would be difficult to imagine anything finer than the precision and unity of purpose exhibited by this trained body of skillful and intelligent musicians; nothing was left undone, nor was anything done which should not have been done. In the face of these facts the critic is disarmed and compelled to become a eulogist.

Sig. Galassi added to his already enviable reputation by a most careful and artistic performance of the "Abendstern" from Tannhäuser, and received a most hearty and deserved recall. His repetition of the lovely Romance was even more successful than the original effort. In the next concert Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony" is to be the pièce de résistance.

Joseffy has returned to our city and was to have made his appearance at Chickering Hall on Monday evening last (Dec. 15); but a severe illness made it impossible for him to fulfill his engagement, and therefore the concert failed to take place. On Wednesday afternoon, however, he managed (against his physician's advice) to get to Chickering Hall and to perform in a matinée previously announced for that date. His programme included many well-known piano-forte works, among which were the Sonata, Op. 53, by Beethoven; a Nocturne by Chopin (Op. 32, No. 1); three Etudes by the same composer; and a Fugue and Gavotte by Bach. It was quite evident that the renowned pianist was hardly in his best condition; yet his performance was in every way a most admirable one. It is very difficult to believe that greater perfection of execution can be attained; the delicacy of his touch is simply marvelous; in the latter regard he reminds one forcibly of Gottschalk.

On Friday evening he gave another concert, and on Saturday a second matinée. The programmes for these two entertainments were almost identical, and included the following well-known and exacting works:—

Variations Sérieuses Mendelssohn.
Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue Bach.
Water-Song Schubert-Liszt.
Nocturne, F minor Chopin.
Polonaise, Op. 23 Chopin.

In each and every selection his technique was almost absolutely faultless; but his greatest success was in the Chopin Polonaise, which he played with a verve and dash that carried the audience by storm. To me, personally, his most delicious performance was that of Schubert's lovely song transcribed by Liszt; all sorts of technical impossibilities were crowded upon and into each other with reckless prodigality, and they all rolled from his deft fingers without the slightest apparent effort.

I regret to say that on Wednesday, Joseffy was guilty of the musical crime of introducing certain embellishments of his own into a Chopin Nocturne; this was most unwise, and it is to be hoped that this lapse from artistic rectitude was only sporadic and not chronic.

On Saturday evening (Dec. 22) the N. Y. Philharmonic Society gave its second concert, with substantially the same programme as that so ably interpreted on Tuesday evening in Brooklyn. Despite the inclemency of the weather the house was an excellent one, and it is exceedingly gratifying to see and to believe that this old, faithful, and valued organization is regaining its hold upon the public confidence and favor.

ARGUS.

JAN. 5.—I omitted my usual letter last week, as nothing of special interest had occurred since the date of my previous communication, unless we except the performance of the Messiah, which took place on Saturday evening, December 27.

Mapleson's season is now over and it seems impossible to ascertain whether money was made or lost in the enterprise; however, it seems perfectly safe to assume that no colossal fortunes have been made. New Yorkers "perfectly doat" on the opera, but have always entertained serious objections to paying out much money for the gratification of their taste. My individual opinion is that operatic artists almost invariably receive exorbitant pay; it follows, then, that when a manager expends so much upon his stars, he has little left for his chorus, which is always made a scape-goat; the result is that top-sided and poorly-balanced representations are the rule.

And now for the wonderful Hungarian—Joseffy. He has played in some five concerts and three matinées since his return, and (with one exception) he has never used but two different programmes; these he has played over and over again, and people are beginning to ask what it all means. It probably would not be far from the truth if I were to say that the gist of the matter is precisely as follows: Joseffy made a contract to play through the entire musical season for a stated sum; he can, if necessary, be compelled to play six times each week; since his arrival in America he has made the discovery that he is a sure card to draw large houses, and he is therefore dissatisfied to know that he has sold his services at a moderate rate: of course he can be forced to play (unless physically unable to do so), but he is under no obligation to alter his programmes: consequently he is endeavoring to "freeze out" his managers by tiring out the public with the same selections repeated over and over. For instance, if he received an encore he would invariably respond with something from the other list: so he never forgot himself for a moment.

By some process, the details of which are shrouded in mystery, a compromise was effected last week, and on Saturday evening we had a Chopin night with the following programme:—

Overture, "Euryanthe" Weber.
(Orchestra)
Concerto, E minor Chopin.
Concerto, F minor Chopin.
Polonaise, E-flat Chopin.

It has never been my fortune to hear so exquisite a rendering of the lovely E minor: it was poetry embodied, and the imagination fails to grasp the idea that a more perfect performance (in every sense) could be even possible. As an interpreter of the subtle shades of meaning with which Chopin's works are so filled, Joseffy is simply peerless.

I ought to mention that my commendation ceases at a point some twenty or thirty bars before the close of the third movement. The pianist essayed to substitute octaves for the running passage in single notes, which constitutes the climacteric point of the Rondo. In the first place he was utterly without excuse in daring to do anything of the sort, and in the second place the octaves were so bunglingly done, and so many false notes were struck that the thing was a wretched failure. However, Joseffy is young and will repent such follies in time.

At the close of the first Concerto he received a most enthusiastic recall, which he finally acknowledged by giving the prelude in D-flat (from Op. 28) and the Valse in F major (from Op. 34). The same enthusiasm prevailed on the conclusion of the Polonaise, and the artist felt compelled to return to the piano; he gave a most charming performance of the Etude in C-sharp minor (from Op. 25) and a dainty Mazurka in A minor (from the posthumous Op. 68).

And so ended one of the most delightful concerts which has ever been given in our city. Chickering Hall was full to overflowing, and the demonstrations of enthusiasm and delight with which the artist was received must have been most gratifying to him.

JAN. 12. The Philharmonic Club gave its third concert on Tuesday evening, January 6, with the following programme:—

P. F. Trio, Op. 97 Beethoven.
{ Adagio Biet.
{ Scherzo (Quartet, E-flat) Cherubini.
Duo, Flute and Piano Schubert.
(Miss Bock and Mr. Werner.)

String Quartet, D minor Mozart.

The evening was a most stormy and unfavorable one, yet a very good audience assembled in Chickering Hall to hear the above selections. Miss Anna Bock, a young pianist, took the piano part in the Beethoven Trio, and the result was a somewhat tame and colorless performance of that lovely composition. The young lady plays with some technical skill, but does not seem to possess a thoroughly musical organization; she is far from comprehending the real musical significance of such a work as the Trio. She appeared to better advantage in the Schubert Duo, which afforded her the opportunity to display some very creditable finger-work. The club played the Mozart Quartet very charmingly, and one could well afford to forget the preceding numbers on the programme.

On Saturday evening, January 10, the same club gave the third concert of its Brooklyn series in the Assembly rooms of the Academy of Music. I give you the instrumental selections:—

Str. Quartet, Op. 74, E-flat Beethoven.
Adagio Biet.
Scherzo Cherubini.
Sonata, D major, Op. 18 Rubenstein.
(Miss Ida Mollerhauer and Mr. Henry Mollerhauer.)

Miss Ansonia Henne was the soloist of the evening, and she contributed greatly to the success of the entertainment by her artistic singing of some old Italian songs, together with one by Curschmann and one by Robert Franz. The Beethoven Quartet was very carefully played, but failed to make any strong impression upon the audience, for the reason that it requires a very thorough musical education to comprehend the author's intention. The Biet Adagio, as well as the Cherubini Scherzo, were delightfully done, and well merited an encore, which, however, they did not receive.

Rubinstein's noble Sonata was the piece of the evening, and was well played by Mr. Mollerhauer ('cello), and Miss Ida Mollerhauer (piano); this young lady entered into the spirit of the composition with real musical intelligence and evident feeling, and so scored a very excellent success in spite of a few blemishes and crudities. The entertainment as a whole was a very enjoyable one, and seemed to be appreciated by a very attentive audience of some two hundred and fifty persons.

Strakosch's Italian Opera Company will open at Booth's Theatre on Monday evening, January 19, with "Aida;" Mlle. Singer, Mlle. Belocca (who was here three years ago) Signor Stoeti, and Monsieur Castelmory will be the bright particular stars, and everything is to be done in the best manner, "utterly regardless of expense."

BALTIMORE, JAN. 12.—The old year was closed in a very agreeable manner by the opening of the Wednesday Club, in its newly erected hall, December 30. The chorus, of which I have spoken in a former letter, produced Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" and a short chorus by Mendelssohn. The society have since commenced practicing Handel's "Alexander's Feast."

The ninth and tenth students' concerts at the Peabody Conservatory presented the following programmes:—

Ninth Concert, January 3.
String Quartet, B-flat. Work 71. No. 1. . . . Haydn.
(Messrs. Allen, Schaefer, Gilson, and Jungnickel.)
Songs, with piano: "To Cloe," "The Violet," "Lullaby" Mozart.
(Miss Sallie Murdoch, ex-student of the Conservatory.)
a. Improvise C minor. Work 90. For piano Schubert.
(Miss Esther Murdoch, ex-student of the Conservatory, second year.)
b. Song, with piano, words from Shakespeare's "Cymbeline" Schubert.
(Miss Sallie Murdoch, ex-student of the Conservatory.)
Piano-trio, B-flat. No. 6. Work 97. For piano, violin, and violoncello Beethoven.
(Mrs. Isabel Dobbin, ex-student and member of the Conservatory, Messrs. Fineke and Jungnickel.)

Tenth Concert, January 10.
Quartet, Andante and Scherzo Cherubini.
(Played by the Peabody Quartette.)

Variations Sérieuses Mendelssohn.
(Miss Lizzie Beltzhoover.)

"Let me dream again," and "The Lost Chord," sung by Miss Lizzie Krueger Sullivan.

Dr. Sullivan, who has been in Baltimore for several days, was present at the latter concert, and the songs were given as a compliment to the popular "Pinafore" composer. The "Welcome Concert" to the doctor, given on Thursday, the 8th inst., was attended by a fairly sized audience, who evinced more or less enthusiasm over the following programme:—

Music to Shakespeare's play, "The Tempest": Introduction; the storm; prelude to third act; banquet dance; overture to the fourth act. Songs, with piano: "The Sailor's Grave," by Mr. W. C. Tower; "St. Agnes' Eve," with piano, and organ accompaniment, by Miss Edith Abell Arthur Sullivan.
Chorus, "Alleluia," from "The Mount of Olives"

Beethoven.
Music to Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice": Introduction; senerade; bourrée; graceful dance; valse; finale. Songs, with piano: "The Snow Lies White," Mr. W. C. Tower; "The Lost Chord," Miss Edith Abell. Overture di Ballo Arthur Sullivan.
Chorus, "Hail, Bright Abode," from the opera Tannhäuser Richard Wagner.

The orchestra consisted of about forty-five performers, composed for the most part of the Peabody orchestra, and the chorus contained about two hundred and fifty voices. Both had been rehearsed under Mr. Hamerik for several weeks previous to the concert, so that Dr. Sullivan found everything out and dried.

The most satisfactory of Sullivan's selections performed at this concert, in the humble opinion of your correspondent, is the music to Shakespeare's Tempest, which must be wonderfully effective when produced in connection with the play. The Merchant of Venice music, with the exception of the Bourrée, which is quite interesting, sounds too much like Offenbach and Strauss to suggest Shakespeare. Neither does the "Overture di Ballo" present any special features of interest. In short, the selections made for this concert seem to show that Dr. Sullivan is a leader well acquainted with the orchestral requirements of the stage and the taste of the general theatre-going public.

Regarding the Symphony Concerts, the public is more in the dark than ever. The question is evidently one of dollars and cents.

"Wo du nicht bist, Herr Organist, Da schweigen alle Flöten," says the German.

Musical interest will be absorbed next week by the opera, which promises six evening performances and one matinee. The operas announced are Norma, Carmina, Huguenots, Lucresia Borgia, Mignon, Lucia, and Puritani. C. F.

CHICAGO, JAN. 10.—Since my last communication to the JOURNAL there has been a little calm in musical entertainments. There was, however, a performance of the Messiah directly after Christmas, by the Apollo Club, when they presented the famous old oratorio, with the following assistance: Miss Mary E. Turner, soprano; Mrs. O. K. Johnson, contralto; Dr. C. T. Barnes, tenor, and Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen bass. Unfortunately we have no large choral organization in Chicago. There are a number of societies that contain a hundred or a hundred and fifty voices each, and they give very interesting entertainments. But for a severe work, like this master creation of Handel, a very large and well-drilled chorus seems necessary. If musical jealousy could only give way to a real love for art, all the societies might be induced to unite and give a performance of the Messiah, worthy of the music. Some time in the near future we trust that this may be brought about. The Apollo Club sang fluently and gave the oratorio as well as we could expect, considering the small number of voices. The orchestra was hardly adequate, but we have much progress to make in this regard before we may expect finished performances. Of the soloists Mr. Rudolphsen was the most at home in oratorio music, although Mrs. Johnson and Miss Turner sang with much feeling.

On the evening of January 2, Mr. Henry G. Hanchett, of Boston, gave a piano-forte recital at Hershey Hall. His programme was devoted to modern music, and hardly artistic in arrangement, if a progressive order toward a climax was the thought of the arranger. There were many points in his playing that were quite enjoyable, and he was sincere in his work. There was a sameness about his interpretations that seemed to indicate that he has yet to become free from the influence of his teachers and mark out a distinct path for himself. He has the technique and the talent for this, and will doubtless reach a higher position when he arrives at that point at which he can view his performances from the reflective side, apart from any external influences.

At Central Music Hall we have had two concerts by Miss Emma Thursby and Company, under the management of Mr. Geo. B. Carpenter. The programmes were an improvement upon those offered by the Patti organization, and contained some truly good music. Miss Thursby met with a warm recognition, every number that she sang being greeted with applause, and her fine singing pleased her large audience greatly. Her voice retains its bird-like tones, and her execution is very artistic. There is a lack of warmth in her expression, but, doubtless, that is owing to the quality of her vocal organ, which is flute-like in tone. The playing of Mr. Rummel, the pianist, was disappointing to many of our musicians. His numbers were brilliant selections from Chopin, Liszt, and Tausig, and perhaps only calculated to show the virtuosic side of playing; and that alone is a poor criterion for a comprehensive judgment.

Herr Adamowski, the violinist, has a good but small tone. He played very pleasantly, and above all, good music.

Mr. Fischer, the 'celloist, won recognition from the audience, and may be termed a good, although not great, player. Sig. Ferranti sang his musical nonsense with the same spirit and humor as of old, and seems able to win the enthusiastic applause of an audience with his time-worn songs, just as well as in his more youthful days.

Next week comes the Mapleson Opera Company. Before closing my letter I would desire to call the attention of the readers of the JOURNAL to a remarkable book that has just made its appearance in its English dress, "Hegel's Philosophy of Art," translated by W. M. Bryant. The general development of art, as thus unfolded by Hegel, presents a unity of idea that is remarkable, when we reflect on it. Mr. Bryant has done a good work, for which the lovers of art should be thankful. In his introductory essay he treats of music, and his statements regarding its contents and aim are the most comprehensive I have ever read. The unfolding of the idea in music has been a subject which the logical mind has been slow to consider, and it is most encouraging to observe that philosophers are at last realizing that in the unity of the Beautiful this art fills an honored place. For, as Mr. Bryant observes, "Music appeals to the organ of hearing, a sense more intellectual, more spiritual, than vision itself." C. H. B.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

SALEM, MASS.—Gade's Cruisers, with some choice songs and glees, was performed by the Salem Schubert Club, W. J. Winch, Director, at Plummer Hall, December 30. The soloists were: Miss Clara L. Emilio, soprano, Dr. S. W. Langmaid, tenor, and Mr. Clarence E. Hay, baritone.

NEW YORK.—Mr. Julius Eichberg's violin pupils gave a concert in Chickering Hall, a few weeks since, which delighted a select and critical audience, largely composed of violin teachers and amateurs. The Tribune speaks of their performance and their training in the highest terms; and another paper acknowledges: "Boston has given us in this something that New York cannot match." We believe this is the only violin school in America, and it will soon furnish fresh and well-trained musicians for our orchestras and quartet parties. It was only yesterday that some of Mr. Eichberg's pupil's (young ladies) came to us to borrow the string parts of some of Haydn's Symphonies, which they propose to practice with several on a part.

PHILADELPHIA.—The rooms of the School of Vocal Art, 1106 Walnut Street, were crowded to overflowing last evening by an audience assembled to witness the second performance by the pupils of Auber's Mason and Locksmith. The opera was admirably sung throughout, both the solos and choruses showing a marked general improvement on the part of the pupils. Much allowance is necessarily due for the amateur character of the performers and the limited stage space and appliances for scenic and dramatic effect. But there was much real excellence in the style and precision with which the whole work was done, both ladies and gentlemen entering into the spirit of the fine composition with intelligent appreciation and correct execution. These operatic performances of the School of Vocal Art are designed purely as an educational feature of Madame Seiler's system, and their improving effects are plainly perceptible in many of the pupils, in their increased confidence and dramatic treatment of operatic music. The Mason and Locksmith was the best of the series of operas that have been given, and reflected much credit upon all concerned.—Bulletin, Jan. 6.

MR. WM. H. SHERWOOD, who had been announced to play the G-major Concerto of Beethoven, and the Fantasia by Schumann in the Harvard Symphony Concert, this week, was prevented by a severe sprain of his right foot. Mr. Sherwood will play in one of the later concerts, making his first public appearance here this winter.

In the fourth concert, January 23, Mr. Chadwick's "Rip van Winkle" Overture will be repeated; Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and an Entr'acte from Cherubini's Medea will be played; Miss Emily Winant will sing; and there will be a Concerto, either for the violin or the piano, yet to be determined.

FOREIGN.

VIENNA.—Thus writes Dr. Hanlick in the Neue Freie Presse, in December: "Des Teufels Lustschloss, a natural magic opera in three acts, by Kotzebue. The music is by Franz Schubert, M. P., pupil of Herr Salieri, Imperial and Royal Court Chapelmaster in Vienna." Such is the title-page of Schubert's autographic opera score, now in the possession of the Countess Anna von Amadei, one of our first lady musical amateurs. The celebrated old Court Chapelmaster, under whom Beethoven, also, transiently studied, without learning anything, was for a short time Schubert's master for composition. Ignorance and calumny have greatly wronged him ("Is it true that you poisoned Mozart?" Rossini asked him very naively); but he at least deserves the credit of zealously and unselfishly interesting himself in young talent. He was, it is true, far advanced in years when Schubert went to him for instruction, and, moreover, as a genuine Italian, not at all fitted to understand, far less to direct, Schubert's talent. The description: "Pupil of Herr Salieri," on the title-page, is an evidence of pleasing modesty. The opera was composed in 1814, that is, in Schubert's seventeenth year. The management of the Komsche Oper in the Schottenring at one time contemplated bringing it out, as it had never been performed. But the plan appears to have been wrecked on Kotzebue's absurd libretto, which works up what is certainly the most disagreeable of all kinds of comicality, namely, that which is inseparable from dread and horror. The knight, Oswald, his bride, and his servant go through the most fearful adventures with spirits in the enchanted castle; they are dragged by persons dressed up in various disguises through every conceivable kind of suffering and danger, being finally conducted even to the scaffold! When, at the command of the executioner, they have already laid their heads upon the block and bid each other forever farewell, the owner of the castle appears and informs the poor wretches, who have been almost frightened to death during two acts and a half, that it was all a joke, which he has carried out by the aid of machinery and servants in disguise. Instead of giving the playful personage a good cudgeling, those who are thus enlightened are much moved, and thank him. The theatrical public of the present day would scarcely consider it amusing to see for the whole evening ghosts, executioners, and so on, and then be informed at the very end that their anxiety was a piece of stupidity. Now, we cannot strip the book off a complete operatic score, as we take off a coat and have a new one made. Our witty friend, Grandjean, has, we hear, undertaken to alter Kotzebue's libretto, substituting for the capricious mystification by machinery, and so on, a dream, which is, at any rate, a more natural and more poetic motive. Whether much is gained by this for stage purposes we cannot say. Side by side with a great deal that is antiquated and unimportant in Schubert's score, we have come across so much that is delightful, so much that is truly Schubertian for its melodic freshness and marked character, that the idea of a stage performance does not really strike us as so very hazardous. With Des Teufels Lustschloss, our managers would, at all events, not sow more trouble and earn more disappointment than with many of their other novelties. Only a few words about the overture, which Herr Krenser, the director, introduced to us at the last Society Concert. A well-nigh violent dramatic vein runs through it. We ask ourselves whence the young composer obtained such romantic strains, which make our blood curdle, at a time when there was no Faust by Spohr, and no Der Freischütz. The incisive dissonances with which the overture begins so jauntily, the repeated and luridly flashing infernal lights and the demoniacal grimaces, the low-sounding intermediate movement with sordini (almost a presentiment of the Euryanthe overture), and then the surprising employment of the three trombones,—all this may be exceeded by the devilry of our most modern operatic music, but is something wonderful in the seventeen-year old "pupil of Herr Salieri, Imperial and Royal Court Chapelmaster."—The next piece was a rather long cyclical composition by Herbeck, Lied und Krigen, the last he ever conducted himself. A master of sonorous choral writing and effective scoring, he has decked out this series of musical pictures with pleasing, interesting touches. As a whole, however, the work is deficient in convincing power. As a series it wants the homogeneity which would cause us to feel that the separate pieces naturally belong to each other, and are organically developed. Most of the contrasts and effects ranged in succession strike us as far-fetched and springing from a palpable striving after the "poetical." Premeditation is very apparent in the "Traurige Kermes," an attempt to reproduce Sterne's sentimental humor, or the humor of Shakespeare's clowns. Let any one compare with this piece Schumann's "Armer Peter," which renders with such truth and simplicity a similar mixed feeling. The serious ending, too, of the whole, the slow dying away of the two strophes given by the watchman, whom Herbeck posts first in the middle and then at the back of the concert-room, is conceived theatrically rather than musically. But the intended effect of this new device is not attained in the concert-room: the piece sounds flat and unsatisfactory, almost like a disappointed expectation. The difficult choruses in the work had been very carefully studied, and were executed by the Vocal Association with delicate nicety of light and shade. Herr Walter sang in an especially beautiful manner Pylades' air from Gluck's Iphigenia. But, had he been the Greek Pylades himself, with Orestes, in flesh and blood, by his side, the air ought not, on any account, to have been repeated, considering the formidable length of the concert. Some of the benches were already empty, with Brahms' Piano-forte Concerto and the whole of Mendelssohn's Christus fragment still to be performed! We have heard Mme. Toni Raab, who was set down for it, play the Piano-forte Concerto far better on previous occasions.

LEIPZIGER STRASSE, No. 3.

A CHAPTER FROM "DIE FAMILIE MENDELSSOHN," BY S. HENSEL.

AFTER their return (the Mendelssohn family from their Swiss tour) every one went back to his accustomed occupations, and industry resumed its course. In the next years Felix's musical talent developed itself with rapid strides, and, with his own, that of my mother (his sister, Fauny Hensel). The sincere, unenvying friendship of the brother and sister remained untroubled to the end of their lives. "They are actually vain and proud for one another," said their mother, once. "Up to the present moment," writes my mother, in 1822, "I possess his unbounded confidence. I have seen his talent develop step by step, and have even in a certain degree contributed to its education. He has no musical adviser except me; nor does he ever put a musical thought down on paper without first submitting it to my examination. Thus, for example, I knew his operas by heart, before a note was written down." Felix's activity was — and remained all through his life — most restless; for, besides scientific culture, he spent much time and labor upon drawing. If his endowment herein naturally fell far short of his musical, yet he carried it a great way for a dilettante, and perfected himself very much in it in the later years of his life. From his last Swiss journey, in the year 1847, he brought home Aquarelles of which no artist need have felt ashamed.

But what was most extraordinary in those early years of boyhood was his musical activity, as appears from a little biography of Felix by his mother, which I possess, and to which is appended a list of the pieces he composed each year. Thus, for example, the list for the year 1822, in which the great journey of the family occurred, and which certainly left but little time for labor, reads as follows: (1) The Sixty-sixth Psalm, for three female voices; (2) Concerto in A minor for the piano-forte; (3) Two Songs for male voices; (4) Three Songs; (5) Three Fugues for the piano; (6) Quartet for piano, violin, viola, and bass (in C minor, composed in Geneva, his first printed work); (7) Two Symphonies for two violins, viola, and bass; (8) one act of the Opera "The Two Nephews;" (9) Jube Domine, in C major, for the Cäcilienverein of Schelble, in Frankfurt-on-the-Main; (10) a Violin Concerto (for Rietz); (11) Magnificat, with instruments; (12) Gloria, with instruments. In the same year he appeared publicly for the first time in Berlin, in a concert of Mme. Milder. This period also includes the foundation of the "Sunday Musicals," which were destined afterwards to gain so great an expansion in the house of my parents. For the time being, in the limited room which then stood at the disposal of my grandparents (on the new Promenade), only the narrower circle of friends used to assemble; here Felix's compositions were performed; here the children became accustomed to play before people, and had an opportunity to hear the opinion of others. Already, too, at these "musicals," were found whatever musicians of importance from other places came to Berlin. Thus, in the year 1823, Kalkbrenner, of whom the mother writes: "He has heard many of Felix's things, has praised with taste, and has found fault with candor and with amiability. We hear him often, and we seek to learn from him. He unites the most different excellences in his playing: precision, clearness, expression, the greatest facility, the most inexhaustible strength and endurance. He is a sound musician, and possesses an astonishing power of taking much in at a glance. Apart from his talent, he is a fine, amiable, and very cultivated man, and one cannot praise and blame more agreeably."

In August of the same year my grandfather made a journey to Silesia with the two young people. Felix writes: —

... "Early in the morning we all went to Berner to the church. He came. At first he pulled off his coat and drew on a light waistcoat in the place of it; then I had to write down a theme for him, and then he began. He took the deep C in the pedal, and then he flung himself with all his might upon the manual; and after several runs he began a theme on the manual. I had no idea that one could play it on the pedal, for so it was:

But presently he fell in with the feet, and now worked it through with manual and pedal. After kneading that theme through sufficiently, he took up my theme in the pedal, carried it through awhile, took it in longer notes on the pedal, set a beautiful counter-subject against it, and worked the two themes through superbly. He has an immense facility upon the pedal. When he had finished, he drank several glasses of wine, which he had brought with him, and then seated himself again upon the organ bench. Now he played Variations after Vogel's manner, which, though they were very beautiful, did not please me like his former playing.

"The church gradually filled, and the people were very much astonished to hear Berner, for he had made it known to all Breslau that he had set out on a journey to the baths; but here he was playing the organ in St. Elizabeth; these two things they could not rhyme together. After he had drunk another glass, he produced some Variations of his own on the Choral "Vom Himmel hoch," which are very beautiful. The last variation is a fugue, of which the shortened choral is the theme; he played it on the middle key-board. Now he made it seem as if he was about to close, brought back the theme alla Stretta, struck the dominant chord, and then suddenly began the simple choral on the lower manual, which was coupled, with the whole power of the organ, modulated splendidly upon the melody, and so closed. It made a heavenly effect, when the choral struck in with full power, and the tones streamed forth from the organ on all sides. But that exhausted him a good deal, so that he had to drink two or three glasses of wine. Yet soon he set to it again, and played variations on "God save the King," in which he treated this theme in the Phrygian and then in the Æolian mode, and towards the end he played it also with full organ, which had just as fine an effect as the one before. With this the organ concert was closed, and Berner very much fatigued. The people left the church, and he allowed the bottle of wine to rest. Then he showed me the interior of the organ itself; bombshells and grenades have lodged in very many pipes, so that they are useless.

"We talked together for a while farther, he and I. Berner told us of some droll pranks which he had executed, and then we went to dine, Berner with us. While he plays, a choir boy stands near him, who draws out or pushes in the registers, which Berner tips with his fingers in the midst of his playing.

"But now enough of Phrygian, Æolian, dominants, registers, pipes, manual, pedal, valves, thirty-two feet, mixture, concert, wine bottle, glasses, fugues, and prolongations."

In Reinerz, Felix was invited to take part in a concert for the poor. The rehearsal began three hours before the concert, and they placed before Felix a Concerto of Mozart. After they had repeated the first solo for an hour long, Felix saw that it would never go in that way. The contrabassist, who at the same time represented the place of the 'cellos, was not in tune, most of the instruments were utterly at fault, and the rest, worthy dilettanti of the little town, understood neither how to play nor when to pause; it was frantic cat's music. So he proposed that he should improvise, had the reason of the change explained by the schoolmaster, chose some themes from Mozart and Weber, and played with universal applause. Directly after the concert he started on the journey, and on getting into the carriage received a nosegay from a pretty maiden. "A prince's (so writes grandmother to my father in Rome), whose husband is fanatico per la musica, gave them a pressing invitation to pass several days on their estate, and, in case this were not possible, to send her something of Felix's composition, which she would copy with her own high hands. You know the illiberality of my young liberal too well not to guess that such a court party was naught for his free spirit."

On the 3d of February, 1824, on which day Felix became fifteen years old, was the first orchestral rehearsal of his Opera, "The Two Nephews," for which the afterwards well-known physician, Caspar, had written the text. Zelter improved this opportunity for a little festival, which was characteristic of him. At the supper after the rehearsal, when one of the amateur singers proposed the health of Felix, Zelter took him by the hand and presented him before the company with these words: "My dear son, from this day thou art no longer an apprentice (Junge); from this day thou art a comrade (Geselle). I make thee a comrade in the name of Mozart, in the name of Haydn, and in the name of the old Bach." Then he took the boy in his arms, and hugged and kissed him heartily. Then the pronouncing of Mendelssohn's Geselle was joyfully celebrated with Zelter's songs and Tafellieder. The opera was performed in the paternal house with applause; yet it remained only a work in the nature of an exercise, was put aside as such, and Felix at once set about the composition of a second, "Camacho's Wedding," which, laid out on a broader plan, treats of the well-known episode in Don Quixote, and the fate of which we shall learn later.

In the year 1825 occurred an event destined to have a most determining influence on the development of the children, and to shape the whole life of the family for generations, and which for this reason has been chosen for the title of this chapter: grandfather's purchase of the beautiful estate No. 3 Leipziger Strasse. In this wonderful house and garden our grandparents spent the rest of their life; here my mother married and lived to the last. But to all the members of the family this house was no ordinary possession, no dead heap of stones, but a living individuality, a member, partaking in the fortune of the family, of which it was to them, and to those who stood nearest to them, in a certain sense its representative. In this sense Felix often used the expression "Leipziger Strasse 3," and in this sense we all loved the estate and mourned its loss, when it was sold after the death of my mother and of Felix, and — the Herrenhaus (House of Lords) was transferred into it.

The street front of the house is still the same that it was then. The rooms in it were stately, large and high, built with that pleasant prodigality of space which, in the times of the high prices of estates, the architects were compelled almost entirely to abandon, and for the worth of which the understanding — or the means — seems no longer to exist. One room especially, looking out upon the court, connecting by three great arches with an adjoining cabinet, was wonderfully beautiful and seemed as if made for theatrical representations. Here through many, many years, on Christmas, birthday, or other festivals, the most charming performances, sparkling with wit and humor, were arranged. Ordinarily this was grandmother's sitting-room. From its windows one had an outlook upon the very large court, surrounded by lower side buildings, and terminated by the one-story garden-dwelling, over which projected the crowns of the tall trees stretching away in the distance. This garden domicile was occupied by my parents from the time of their marriage. It is now torn down, and has given place to the hall of sessions of the Herrenhaus. In winter it had great discomforts: it was cold, damp, every chamber was a thoroughfare, and not one of them had any counter-heat, since the garden-house was only one room deep. Double windows were at that time a great rarity in Berlin; our dwelling possessed none, and daily there streamed from the frosty window panes great pools of water, which had continually to be wiped up. We seldom got it above 13° (Réaumur) in winter.

But in summer the habitation was enchanting. All the windows looked out on the garden, upon blooming lilac bushes, upon alleys of fine old trees, with grape foliage growing up round the windows; and for all seasons of the year it had other great advantages: especially that of perfect repose and stillness; through the great court and the high front building every sound from the noisy street was cut off; we lived as in the deepest solitude of the woods, and yet we were only one hundred steps from the street. No vis-à-vis but the stately trees of the garden, with its merrily twittering birds, and no lodger over, under, or near us; toward the street noise the deepest, almost rural, stillness and seclusion, and before the windows the green of the trees.

The most beautiful part of the garden-house was the great hall in the middle. This held several hundred people, and consisted, on the garden side, entirely of glass walls which would slide back, with pillars between, so that it might be transformed into a wholly open hall of pillars. Walls and ceiling, the latter forming a flat cupola, were decorated in a somewhat baroque but fantastic style with fresco pictures. Here was the peculiar locality where the "Sunday Musicals" were destined to attain their full expansion. From it one enjoyed the outlook over the great park-like garden of seven acres which reached to the garden of Prince Albrecht; and a remnant of the Thiergarten, which, from Frederick the Great's time, had stretched all the way here, possessed a great wealth of the finest old trees. Of the intended purchase of this estate my grandmother wrote to my father in Rome (Feb. 1, 1825); "Has it not surprised you that my husband seriously thinks of buying and settling down here? The estate, of which something very beautiful can be made, certainly tempted him. The house to be sure is as much neglected and dilapidated as is always the case with many occupants, who are never of one mind and have no common spirit, and much must be expended to bring it into habitable condition. But the garden is a real park, with majestic trees, a piece of field, grass-plots, and an extremely pleasant summer dwelling, and all this tempts my husband as it does me." But the friends of the family grieved and complained at first, that the grandparents should move so far out of the world into such a remote, dead region, where the grass grows on the streets — for the Potsdam gate was then the "Ultima Thule," where the geography of Berlin ceased.

LETTERS FROM AN ISLAND.

BY FANNY RAYMOND BITTER.

III.

THE IMPERIAL SILVER-WEDDING IN VIENNA.

— FRIEDRICH VON BODENSTEDT'S FIRST LECTURE IN AMERICA. — MIRZA-SCHAFFY. — HAFIS.

DEAR PŪNĀMU!¹ — If you do not certainly know, you at least surmise, that the discoverer of the island is a cosmopolitan in opinions, tastes, habits; and therefore you may feel assured that she thoroughly enjoyed the cosmopolitan spirit of your letters of last summer. A vivacious account of the Imperial silver-wedding in Vienna, written by an Anglo-Maori, reaching the island by way of New Zealand, and not very long after the ordinary newspaper reports either, would necessarily be read with great interest; but to me your letters were especially interesting, since, if cosmopolitan humanitarianism enters largely into the system of the island's government, art and poetry are the very breath of life there; and your letters treated almost exclusively of those events, artistic or poetic, of the fêtes, which alone claimed my attention. These were the enchanting performance at the Vienna Opera House of national songs and dances, — Bohemian, Carinthian, Styrian, Tyrolese, by peasants dressed in their picturesque national costumes, and selected, for musical or choregraphic talent, beauty, grace, or fine voices, from every part of polyglot Austria, — of which you gave so graphic a description; then the processions, with the arrangement of which Makart had so much to do that people more than half expected to meet, in the street of Vienna, the beautiful, if too often characterless, faces, the nymph-like or noble forms, the splendid costumes and decorations that dazzle us in Makart's pictures, surrounded, perhaps, by mists of carnation and gold, green and amethyst, which this painter, like a modern Pygmalion, but a necromant rather in color than in form, would certainly be able to evoke from his own compositions, vitalized and embodied by some magical, cabalistic power! Nor did you forget the dedication of the new Austrian Westminster Abbey, the splendid church, destined to become the resting-place of famous Austrians — an idea that originated with Maximilian of Mexico, and which the architect Forstel has so successfully carried out; or a kaleidoscopic description of the varied types, European and Asiatic, among the masses of people who crowded to the city on the occasion of these festivities.

What return shall I make to-day for the pleasure which the perusal of all this afforded me? Shall I now respond to the desire for further information respecting national melody and poetry (the folk-song) which you lately expressed while in Berlin and Vienna; complaining, at the same time, of the difficulty of obtaining good collections of this class of poetry and music — even of merely German folk-songs, when you were residing at their very fountain heads? The subject is too extensive for the present occasion. Let me now confine myself to one, not very widely removed from it, and tell you how we took flight from the island one day, for the purpose of meeting, seeing, and hearing the poet Friedrich von Bodenstedt, who lately arrived in America, and who has long been attractive to me, as creator of "The Songs of Mirza-Schaffy," the supposititious Oriental poet. Unexpected circumstances prevented our attendance at the Goethe club reception; but we at least heard Bodenstedt in the first public lecture (in German) which he gave in America; and we were glad to find, in his graceful, scholarly manner, pleasant, expressive face and gestures, and sympathetic voice, that he still retains, at the age of sixty, so much of that attractive personality which the mere title of "poet" leads one to expect.

Bodenstedt, long deterred and discouraged by parental opposition from the adoption of literature as a profession, gained the fullest liberty in this, at rather a later period of life than usual with poets, when, during his sojourn in Russia, Tartary, and Persia, he revealed, as student, translator, and creator, in Slavonian folk-song and art-poetry, and rifled the rich treasure-houses of Oriental lyricism. The results of his long residence in the East were his translations from Kosland, Puschkin, and Lermontow; his work "The Poetical Ukrain," his "Thousand and One Days in the Orient," and his "Songs of Mirza-Schaffy." In the "Thousand and One Days" he introduced, amplified, and idealized the character of Mirza-Schaffy, his instructor, at Tiflis, in the Tartar and Persian languages. The actual Mirza-Schaffy merely served Bodenstedt as a foundation upon which to elaborate his ideal character, a type of the Oriental poetico-philosophical sage; the real man, though a good instructor and a fair versifier, could not, and did not, aspire to be regarded as a creator, a genuine poet. "The Songs of Mirza-Schaffy" originated altogether in the mind of Bodenstedt, with the exception of one, which was an elaboration of a little song really written by Schaffy; but they were received by the public, and criticised by the German press, as translations. In his lecture of November 11 last, Bodenstedt told us that they were the expression of the feelings excited in him by the novel influences of life in the Orient, amid the splendor of richly glowing natural scenery, while he saw himself surrounded by handsome and courteous men, and black-eyed, rose-cheeked, beautifully attired women, with long, flowing tresses; and lived under a system of civilization over-ripe to the verge of decadence and ruin.

This wave of warmth and color was an inspiring one to Bodenstedt; it entirely dispersed from his mind those clouds of Heine-Byronic gloom and melancholy which had formerly oppressed him, in common with most of his European contemporaries of poetico-intellectual tendencies. In presenting to his audience those traits of that actual personality of Mirza-Schaffy, his teacher, which had suggested to him the ideal character of Mirza-Schaffy, the poet, Bodenstedt said he was a tall and slender man, with a light, elastic step, large, dark, expressive eyes, and a rich beard of golden chestnut, which finely contrasted with the blue caftan he habitually wore; and his delicately embroidered slip pers were always a wonder to Bodenstedt, since their wearer wore them through all the mud of Tiflis streets without receiving the slightest stain. He found fault with European handwriting, as "too mechanical and tradesman-like, regular enough for printing;" and told his pupil that artistic, expressive handwriting ought to vary according to the subject of which it treated; to become wavy and delicate when speaking of women, who are small, elegant, and refined; firm and stiff in sentences of wisdom; bold and rough when treating of war; while joy, love, piety, should all be expressed in different outlines. Not a bad idea for our writers and decorators of mottoes and proverbs to work out.

Long familiar with the "Songs of Mirza-Schaffy," and with Danmer's translation of Hafiz, with the sympathetic familiarity that leads one beyond the mere form of a poem into its very heart, and its merely suggested meaning; knowing many among them, of those that most delight me, by heart; having translated several, and singing some that have been set to music by Brahms, Ehlert, Ritter, Volkmann, and others, I think I have learned to understand them well; and I have always wondered how any one could ever have mistaken "The Songs of Mirza-Schaffy" for translations. One trait that seems peculiarly to mark them as the work of a European is their reference to dress, manners, home-surroundings, etc.; foreign outside forms that would at once impress a European not long a resident of the East; Hafiz scarcely mentions the dress of Suléikka, or the scenes amid which he meets her; he, overflowing with song and love, set on thinks of painting for his listeners such matters of course, — to him and to Orientals in general. The Mirza-Schaffy songs are divided, in German poetic fashion, into groups with distinctive titles, such as "Songs of Complaint," "Tiflis," "Hafisa," "Suléikka," and so on. The most original, and, at the same time, the richest in Oriental coloring and pictures of manners, are those contained in "Hafisa" and "Tiflis," such as "Whence comes the Fame of Schiraz?" "Fair Sultana Fatima," "Throw back thy Veil," and others. Let me give you a few translations of my own as specimens of these songs: —

I.
The lovely ladies of Tiflis
Wear beautiful array!
The folds of a snow-white Tschadra
Across their features play;
And under diadems
Enriched with precious gems,
Shine robe and trouser light,
And silk and satin bright,
And ribbons richly blent,
And slippers gold-besrent.
Oh, do not therefore blame them,
Or vain and foolish name them!

The lovely ladies of Tiflis
Well please a poet's taste!
Unfettered by robe or Tschadra,
With beauty's aureole grazed,
Undimmed by useless shade,
More fair appears each maid,
Unless enrobed in dress,
Fit frame for loveliness!
A-maid in base attire,
No poet heart will fire,
Though perfect in her mould, she,
And countless sons old, he!

II.
With rapture heavy-laden,
My heart beats wild and high,
When she, light-footed maiden,
With airy step floats by!
A veil of dazzling whiteness
About her form is flowing,
Two stars of midnight brightness
Beneath its folds are glowing,
Her dark and rippling tresses
Drop o'er her bosom's sweetness;
A rose's moss, the dress is,
That shades her rich completeness;
And all is lovely motion,
And all is grace enchanting, —
I gaze, — and warm emotion
My soul, my senses haunting,
With rapture heavy-laden,
My heart beats wild and high,
When she, light-footed maiden,
With airy step floats by!
Narcissus buds, and roses,
Across her robe are twining;
Its azure hem discloses
Her foot, in scarlet shining; —
Oh, arched instep slender!
Oh, flexible white fingers!
Oh, lip, thou ruby splendor,
Where love, charm-fettered, lingers!
With rapture heavy-laden,
My heart beats wild and high,
When she, light-footed maiden,
With airy step floats by!

III.
In the public bazaar I sang
A song of thy foam-flesh beauty;
All, spell-bound, listened, while rang
My praise of thy soft-eyed beauty.
Turk, Persian, Tartar, and Khurd,
Haik's sons, who of mind astute be,
And Christians, my song allured
To muse on thy rose-checked beauty.
The singers, in silence, there
Marked word and tone as a duty;
Now over the world they bear
My song in praise of thy beauty.
Away the torn veil is flung
That shaded thy flower-sweet beauty;
Familiar to old and young
Has grown the fame of thy beauty;
Yet, fairest one, pardon give!
The bloom that becomes Time's booty,
For ages undimmed will live
In songs that echo its beauty!

In these songs, Bodenstedt's muse appears to me as a genuine individuality, but not as an Oriental one; German sentiment looks through the veil of rich tissue that is folded over her face, with a milder glance than Eastern eyes are wont to wear; here is a transformation, not a translation; a muse, who, of her own free will, has chosen to masquerade as a houri; and charmingly she does so, too, and wonderfully "in character"; yet not so perfectly as wholly to deceive feminine eyes, versed in the mysteries of feminine versatility! In Danmer's splendid version of Hafiz there are signs of translation all through; in spite of its vigor, glow, lyrical swing, all that makes other European translations of Eastern songs appear dry, cold, didactic in comparison, it is unequal, as works of strong genius and talent usually are; overflowing ecstatic here, uncouth there, as though the translator had wrung, rather than gently persuaded, the profound or beautiful idea from one language into another; yet this is a brilliant, unmistakably Oriental personality, though robed in northern, foreign attire less pliable, less flowing, less glowing, than the Persian poet's own beautiful, national costume. But it is a noble, a strong, rich translation, justifying Danmer's own assertion that it was a work of love, of voluntary self-sacrifice, to which he devoted many of the finest hours of his life, for a number of years. And if Mirza-Schaffy be an inferior singer, he yet is a true disciple; does not Bodenstedt make him say, "Hafiz is my master!" Wit and epigrammatic point, uncommon qualities with German poets, sparkle here and there in the Mirza-Schaffy "Songs of Wisdom;" take this as an example: —

"A gray eye, —
A sly eye!
An eye of blue, —
An eye that's true!
With roguish thought
Brown eyes are fraught;
But oh, a black eye's dazzling ray
Is deep and dark as God's own way!

On his return to Europe, Bodenstedt intends to reproduce his translation of the poems of Omar Chajiam, the great representative of Persian free thought, a poet comparatively little known to European students, though his fame in the Orient is perhaps only second to that of his predecessor, Firdusi, or Saadi of the gardens of roses and delight.

Since you are not yet familiar with Hafiz, I should like to give you many specimens of the exulting, healthy, lyrical joyousness of that Persian Moore or Anacreon; but two or three brief lyrics must suffice to-day; remember, in judging them, that before reaching you through Danmer's German translation, and then my own English one, much of the original music, bloom, aroma, — call it what you will, must necessarily be lost.

I.
Wild zephyr wakes in Eden,
His message breaks night's soft repose;
"T is not thy spirit, Hafiz,
From whence that fount of music flows;
Ere time and space were measured,
Ere earth from Nothing's night arose,
Thy magic verse was written
On leaf and flower of Eden's rose!"

II.
Oh smile not with so sweet a smile!
From second fall, I pray thee, spare
The angels, that in realms of air
Roam on from starry isle to isle!
Oh, smile not with that perfect smile!
For should they see that smile, all, all,
From heights untold would spring, would fall,
And see no heaven save in that smile!

III.
I'll bear Love's rosy standard above the blue deeps, star-haunted;

Though angel hosts should oppose me, on Eden's walls I'll plant it!
 There, to the wondering planets, I'll sound my exalted story:
 My silvery cymbals striking, I'll sing Love's power and glory!
 The Pleiades and Orion will dance to the rapturous measure,
 The seraphs forget their songs to find in mine a diviner pleasure;
 The sandy desert below me, that barren and waste reposes,
 Will burst into leaf and blossom, a radiant grove of roses.
 "And why, Hafiz?" — Thy question with envy and folly is blended!
 Where shine the smiles of Suléikha, joy reigns, and sorrow's rule's ended!

IV.

A star, from chill and glittering splendor,
 Fell in the grass, warm, fragrant, green, tender.
 He saw around him the flowering meadow;
 Oh, how he loved its sunshine and shadow!
 Herds played near him, their little bells swinging;
 Pleased was he with that silvery ringing;
 He saw the steed o'er desert heaths flying,
 The leafy woodland beyond him lying,
 The hamlet, breathing content unspoken,
 Himself on the earth, lost, clouded, broken;
 All filled him with joy, starry joys excelling;
 No more cared he for his heavenly dwelling,
 Glad to have fallen from desolate splendor,
 He lay at peace in the spring-grass tender!

But you, dear Pōūnāmou, now in the native land of Danmer and Bodenstedt, can study them and their creations or translations at your "own sweet will;" another day I will converse with you on a kindred subject, — Russian and Oriental folk-poetry and music. Yours faithfully,
 F. R. R.

LISZT.

[From Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians.]

FRANZ LISZT was born Oct. 22, 1811, at Raiding, in Hungary, the son of Adam Liszt, an official in the imperial service, and a musical amateur of sufficient attainment to instruct his son in the rudiments of piano-forte-playing. At the age of nine young Liszt made his first appearance in public at Oedenburg with such success that several Hungarian noblemen guaranteed him sufficient means to continue his studies for six years. For that purpose he went to Vienna, and took lessons from Czerny on the piano-forte, and from Salieri and Randhartinger in composition. The latter introduced the lad to his friend Franz Schubert. His first appearance in print was probably in a variation (the 24th) on a waltz of Diabelli's, one of fifty contributed by the most eminent artists of the day, for which Beethoven, when asked for a single variation, wrote thirty-three (op. 120). The collection, entitled Vaterländische Künstler-Verein, was published in June, 1823. In the same year he proceeded to Paris, where it was hoped that his rapidly growing reputation would gain him admission at the Conservatoire in spite of his foreign origin. But Cherubini refused to make an exception in his favor, and he continued his studies under Reicha and Paër. Shortly afterwards he also made his first serious attempt at composition, and an operetta in one act, called Don Sanche, was produced at the Académie Royale, Oct. 17, 1825, and well received. Artistic tours to Switzerland and England, accompanied by brilliant success, occupy the period till the year 1827, when Liszt lost his father, and was thrown on his own resources to provide for himself and his mother. During his stay in Paris, where he settled for some years, he became acquainted with the leaders of French literature, Victor Hugo, Lamartine, and George Sand, the influence of whose works may be discovered in his compositions. For a time also he became an adherent of Saint-Simon, but soon reverted to the Catholic religion, to which, as an artist and as a man, he has since adhered devoutly. In 1834 he became acquainted with the Countess D'Agoult, better known by her literary name of Daniel Stern, who for a long time remained attached to him and by whom he had three children. Two of these, a son and a daughter, the wife of M. Ollivier, the French statesman, are dead. The third, Cosima, is the wife of Richard Wagner. The public concerts which Liszt gave during the latter part of his stay in Paris placed his claim to the first rank amongst pianists on a firm basis, and at last he was induced, much against his will, to adopt the career of a virtuoso proper. The interval from 1839 to 1847 Liszt spent in traveling almost incessantly from one country to another, being everywhere received with an enthusiasm unequaled in the annals of art. In England he played at the Philharmonic Concerts of May 21, 1827 (Concerto, Hummel), May 11, 1840 (Concertstuck, Weber), and June 8, 1840 (Kreutzer-sonata). Here alone his reception seems to have been less warm than was expected, and Liszt, with his usual generosity, at once undertook to bear the loss that might have fallen on his agent. Of this generosity numerous instances might be cited. The charitable purposes to which Liszt's genius has been made subservient are legion, and in this respect as well as in that of technical perfection he is unrivaled amongst virtuosos. The disaster caused at Pesth by the inundation of the Danube (1837) was considerably alleviated by the princely sum — the result of several concerts — contributed by this artist; and when two years later a considerable sum had been collected for a statue to be erected to him at Pesth, he insisted upon the money being given to a struggling young sculptor, whom he moreover assisted from his private means. The poor of Raiding also had cause to remember the visit paid by Liszt to his native village about the same time. It is well known that Beethoven's monument at Bonn owed its existence, or at least its speedy completion, to Liszt's liberality. When the subscriptions for the purpose began to fail, Liszt offered to pay the balance required from his own pocket, provided only that the choice of the sculptor should be left to him. From the beginning of the forties dates Liszt's more intimate connection with Weimar, where in 1849 he settled for the space of twelve years. This stay was to be fruitful in more than one sense. When he closed his career as a virtuoso, and accepted a permanent engagement as conductor of the Court Theatre at Weimar, he did so with the distinct purpose of becoming the advocate of the rising musical generation, by the performance of such works as were written regardless of immediate success, and therefore had little chance of seeing the light of the stage. At short intervals eleven operas of living composers were either performed for the first time or revived on the Weimar stage. Amongst these may be counted such works as Lohengrin, Tannhäuser, and The Flying Dutchman of Wagner, Benvenuto Cellini by Berlioz, Schumann's Genoesea, and music to Byron's "Manfred." Schubert's Alfonso and Estrella was also rescued from oblivion by Liszt's exertions. For a time it seemed as if this small provincial city were once more to be the artistic centre of Germany, as it had been in the days of Goethe, Schiller, and Herder. From all sides musicians and amateurs flocked to Weimar, to witness the astonishing feats to which a small but excellent community of singers and instrumentalists were inspired by the genius of their leader. In this way was formed the nucleus of a group of young and enthusiastic musicians, who, whatever may be thought of their aims and achievements, were and are at any rate inspired by perfect devotion to music and its poetical aims. It was, indeed, at these Weimar gatherings that the musicians who now form the so-called School of the Future, till then unknown to each other and divided locally and mentally, came first to a clear understanding of their powers and aspirations. How much the personal fascination of Liszt contributed to this desired effect need not be said. Amongst the numerous pupils on the piano-forte, to whom he at the same period opened the invaluable treasure of his technical experience, may be mentioned Hans von Bulow, the worthy disciple of such a master.

But, in a still higher sense, the soil of Weimar, with its great traditions, was to prove a field of richest harvest. When, as early as 1842, Liszt undertook the direction of a certain number of concerts every year at Weimar, his friend Duverger wrote "Cette place, qui oblige Liszt à séjourner trois mois de l'année à Weimar, doit marquer peut-être pour lui la transition de sa carrière de virtuose à celle de compositeur." This presage has been verified by a number of compositions which, whatever may be the final verdict on their merits, have at any rate done much to elucidate some of the most important questions in art. From these works of his mature years his early compositions, mostly for the piano-forte, ought to be distinguished. In the latter Liszt the virtuoso predominates over Liszt the composer. Not, for instance, that his "transcriptions" of operatic music are without superior merits. Every one of them shows the refined musician, and for the development of piano-forte technique, especially in rendering orchestral effects, they are of the greatest importance. They also tend to prove Liszt's catholicity of taste: for all schools are equally represented in the list, and a selection from Wagner's Lohengrin is found side by side with the Dead March from Donizetti's Don Sebastian. To point out even the most important among these selections and arrangements would far exceed the limits of this notice. More important are the original pieces for the piano-forte also belonging to this earlier epoch, and collected under such names as "Consolations" and "Années de pèlerinage," but even in these, charming and interesting in many respects as they are, it would be difficult to discover the germs of Liszt's later productiveness. The stage of preparation and imitation through which all young composers have to go, Liszt passed at the piano and not at the desk. This is well pointed out in Wagner's pamphlet on the Symphonic Poems: —

"He who has had frequent opportunities," writes Wagner, "particularly in a friendly circle, of hearing Liszt play — for instance, Beethoven — must have understood that this was not mere reproduction, but real production. The actual point of division between these two things is not so easily determined as most people believe; but so much I have ascertained beyond a doubt, that, in order to reproduce Beethoven, one must be able to produce with him. It would be impossible to make this understood by those who have, in all their life, heard nothing but the ordinary performances and renderings by virtuosos of Beethoven's works. Into the growth and essence of such renderings I have, in the course of time, gained so sad an insight, that I prefer not to offend anybody by expressing myself more clearly. I ask, on the other hand, all who have heard, for instance, Beethoven's op. 106 or op. 111 (the two great sonatas in B-flat and C) played by Liszt in a friendly circle, what they previously knew of those creations, and what they learned of them on those occasions? If this was reproduction, then surely it was worth a great deal more than all the sonatas reproducing Beethoven which are 'produced' by our piano-forte composers in imitation of those imperfectly comprehended works. It was simply the peculiar mode of Liszt's development to do at the piano what others achieve with pen and ink; and who can deny that even the greatest and most original master, in his first period, does nothing but reproduce? It ought to be added that during this reproductive epoch, the work even of the greatest genius never has the value and importance of the master works which it reproduces, its own value and importance being attained only by the manifestation of distinct originality. It follows that Liszt's activity during his first and reproductive period surpasses everything done by others under parallel circumstances. For he placed the value and importance of the works of his predecessors in the fullest light, and thus raised himself almost to the same height with the composers he reproduced."

These remarks at the same time will to a large extent account for the unique place which Liszt holds amongst modern representatives of his instrument, and it will be unnecessary to say anything of the phenomenal technique which enabled him to concentrate his whole mind on the intentions of the composer.

(Conclusion in next number.)

SCHUMANN ON THE "SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE" BY BERLIOZ.

In anticipation of the performance of this remarkable work in the next Harvard Symphony Concert (Feb. 12), we borrow, from Mme. Ritter's excellent translation, the concluding paragraphs of Robert Schumann's appreciative article, which bears date 1835. We have not room for the first and longest portion of his criticism, which enters into a close technical analysis of the form, the harmony, the thematic treatment of the five parts, or movements of the work, and which would not be intelligible to the common reader, at least without frequent reference to the score itself. He closes with "a few remarks on the idea and spirit of the work," as follows:—

Berlioz has written down, in a programme, that which he wishes us to think of while listening to his symphony. We will give an abbreviation of this.

The composer intended to sketch, in music, a few moments in the life of an artist. It seemed necessary that the plan of this instrumental drama should be explained in words beforehand. The programme should be regarded in the light of the text that accompanies an opera. First part.—Reveries, passions. The composer imagines a young musician, consumed by that moral sickness which a famous author has characterized as "the vague of passion;" he then sees, for the first time, a woman who seems to realize all that ideal perfection which he has already preconceived. By a remarkable freak of accident, the beloved form never appears to him unaccompanied by a musical thought, in which he imagines he traces the character of the maiden, somewhat passionate yet timid and noble; this form and this melody haunt him continually like a double fixed idea. Dreamy melancholy, only broken by a few soft tones of joy, until it arises to the heights of a lover's frenzy,—pain, jealousy, inward fervor,—the grief of first love, in short, forms the contents of the first movement. Second part.—A ball. Amid the joy of a festival the artist stands and gazes in an exalted mood on the beauties of nature; but everywhere, in the city, in the country, the beloved form follows him, and troubles his every mood. Third part.—A scene in the country. At evening he hears the chant of two shepherds answering each other from afar. This duet, the spot, the soft rustling of the leaves, a gleam of hope that he is loved in return, all unite to shed an unaccustomed repose over his spirit, and to give his thoughts a more happy direction. He reflects that perhaps he will not stand alone much longer. But if he is deceived! This interchange of hope and fear, light and darkness, is expressed in the adagio. At the close, one of the shepherds repeats his chant, the other does not reply. Thunder in the distance. Loneliness. Deep silence. Fourth part.—The journey to execution ("Marche du Supplice"). The artist is now aware that his love is not returned, and poisons himself with opium. The narcotic, too weak to kill him, steepes him in a sleep filled with frightful visions. He dreams that he has murdered her, and that he, condemned to death, is yet the witness of his own execution. The cortège begins to move; a march, now wild and gloomy, then joyous and brilliant, accompanies it; there is a dull sound of footsteps, a murmurous noise of the crowd. At the end of the march, the fixed idea appears, like a last thought of the beloved one; but broken in half by the axe of the block. Fifth part.—A dream in a witches' sabbath night. He stands among imps, witches, misformed creatures of all sorts, who have gathered together to his interment. Howls, laughs, cries of pain, complaints. The beloved melody is again heard, but as a common, vulgar dance theme now; it is she who comes. Loud rejoicings at her arrival. Demoniac orgies. Death bells. The "Dies Iræ" again, but travestied.

Such is the programme. All Germany greeted it with the declaration that such signboards have an unworthy and empirical air. In any case, the five principal titles would have sufficed; the further suppositions in regard to the composer's personality, and the possibly interesting fact that he had lived his own symphony through, might have been confided to tradition. The German, averse to personalities, does not care to be accompanied in his reflections; he was already sufficiently offended that Beethoven in the Pastoral Symphony did not trust its character to his divinatory comprehension. It seems as if men stand somewhat in awe of the workshop of genius! they do not care to know of the causes, tools, and mysteries of creation. Does not Nature herself tenderly cover her roots with earth? Then let the artist also shut himself up with his griefs. We should go through dreadful experiences could we see all works to the very foundation of their origin.

But Berlioz wrote for his own nation, on whom ethereal modesty imposes but little. I can understand how a Frenchman, reading the programme as he listens, would applaud the countryman who so intelligently treated the whole; music alone, in itself, is secondary with him. Whether a listener, unaware of the composer's intention, would see similar pictures in his mind's eye to those which Berlioz has designated, I cannot decide, as I read the programme before I heard the work. If the eye is once directed to a certain point, the ear can no longer judge independently. And if one asks whether music is capable of accomplishing that which Berlioz has demanded of it in his symphony, one should endeavor to attach different, opposite ideas to it. I confess that the programme at first spoiled my enjoyment, my freedom; but as this faded into the background, and my own fancy began to work, I found more than was set down, and almost everywhere in the music a warm, vital tone. Many look too seriously at the difficult question as to how far instrumental music dare venture in the attempted realization of thoughts and events. People err when they suppose that composers prepare pens and paper with the deliberate predetermination of sketching, painting, expressing this or that. Yet we must not estimate outward influences and impressions too lightly. Involuntarily an idea sometimes develops itself simultaneously with the musical fancy; the eye is awake as well as the ear, and this ever-busy organ sometimes holds fast to certain outlines amid all the sounds and tones, which, keeping pace with the music, form and condense into clear shapes. The more elements congenially related to music which the thought or picture created in tones contains within it, the more poetic and plastic will be the expression of the composition; and in proportion to the imaginativeness and keenness of the musician in receiving these impressions will be the elevating and touching power of his work. Why is it not possible that the idea of immortality occurred to Beethoven while extemporizing? Why should not the memory of a great fallen hero excite him to composition? Why could not the remembrance of past and happy days inspire another? Shall we be ungrateful to Shakespeare, who has called from the heart of a young tone-poet a work not unworthy of himself,—ungrateful to Nature, denying that we borrow of her beauty and nobility wherewith to deck our own creations? Italy, the Alps, the ocean, spring, twilight—has music told us nothing yet of these? Music bestows so charmingly firm a character on even small, special pictures, that one is often astonished at her power of fixing such traits. Thus a composer once told me how, while writing, he had been continually haunted by the image of a butterfly floating down a brook on a leaf; the idea had given to the composition just such a tenderness and simplicity as the actual object possessed. In this fine kind of genre painting Franz Schubert was a master. Apropos, I cannot refrain from relating an anecdote of my own experience while playing a Schubert march with a friend. I asked him whether he saw any fixed picture before his mind's eye, and he answered: "Yes! I was in Seville more than a hundred years ago, among Dons and Donnas, with their trains, pointed shoes, and daggers, &c." Strange to say, our visions were the same, even to the name of the city.

We will leave it undecided as to whether there are many poetic movements in the programme of Berlioz's symphony. The principal question is, does unexplained and unaccompanied music contain any meaning in itself, and, above all, does a spirit of its own inhabit it? As to the first, I think I have already said something; the second no one can deny, even where Berlioz openly fails. And if we would combat the spirit of the day, which tolerates a burlesque "Dies Iræ," we should only repeat what has been said and written for years against Crabbe, Heine, Byron, Hugo, and others. For a few moments in an eternity, Poesy has put on the mask of irony to cover her grief-worn face. Perhaps the friendly hand of Genius may also loosen it.

There is yet much of good and ill to say; but here, for to-day, I must break off. Could I hope that these lines would have the effect of inducing Berlioz to restrain his inclination towards eccentricity,—should they aid in obtaining complete recognition for his symphony, not as the masterpiece of a master, but as a work distinguished by its originality from all that stands beside it,—should they inspire German artists (to whom Berlioz stretches out the hand of brotherhood—a strong hand, ready to fight with them against dull, pedantic mediocrity) to new production, then the aim of their publication will have been fully attained.

LEIPZIG.—The eleventh Gewandhaus concert (Dec. 11) had for programme two Symphonies (the "Jupiter" of Mozart, and Schumann, in D minor); several choruses from Handel's Israel in Egypt, and a choral work by Jadassohn, called "Die Verheissung" (the divine promise).

—The Municipal Council have made a grant to the direction of the Gewandhaus Concerts, of four thousand square metres of land, in a faubourg on the southwest, for the construction of the new Concert Hall which was long since projected.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XX.

PAINT gayly, cheerfully. We are too dreadfully serious. Do nothing that you cannot do cheerfully, easily. Don't get the start of yourselves by doing more than you know.

Have faith that the simple masses will produce the effect. Add no detail that will destroy that effect. Try to get the simple mass of things, no matter how smudgy it looks. Try to make the picture as if you saw it vaguely. Get the requisite amount of light and dark. Get the gradations. Finish later.

You can draw just as well on dark paper as on light.

Is n't the dark of that chair just as evident as her eyes? Has n't it just as much to do with the picture? Nobody knows how to finish! If a thing is begun right it is a picture from the first. If you are drawing a fish you don't first make a scale. Make the great masses, and the picture comes along of itself.

Begin with the background. Where is your subject? Here. What is it? A little girl sitting in a chair. Don't look to see what kind of an eye-lash she has! You might spend three hours drawing an eye, and another drawing an eye-lash, and then the eye would be a great deal nearer to you than to the rest of the picture. Put in your vigors — bang! Half shut your eyes. Look at the whole thing. Get the local color or value of this and that, here and there. Then your outlines will come in and mean something. They are only visible because certain things are evident and certain things are not. I see a skirt, and I put that in; not stopping to draw the head even, until I get a sitting figure dark against the gray background. Don't make the arms the subject of the lower part of the picture. Make them only fractional. Don't amuse yourselves making eyes until you get far enough to do it. Most people think that an eye is a fascinator. It has no more to do with fascination than a soap-bubble. It's where the eye is, and what's around it.

"There is n't anything to my sketch."

Well, there is n't to anything you see when you first begin. You must n't scrutinize. Don't worry and bother! Amuse yourself!

There must be firmness somewhere, because you know that form is there. Convince by making the statement.

Some try to paint like Corot, and make sloppy pictures. They misunderstand him. He paints firmly.

A man is nothing except in his relation to the other members of the human family. You keep young as long as you keep giving out. After you've received a thing it does you no good. It's the getting, the receiving, that does us good; not the keeping, the having. "Lend me a guinea," said a reckless spendthrift to Ben Franklin. "Here it is. Don't return it, but give it to some one else. Then pass it on until it meets a knave."

Take at once a comprehensive view of your subject, and grasp it as a whole. Clap the values at once all over your picture, leaving the planes loose at the edges until all the leading tones are reached. Paint brutally! barbaric! Paint values as spots of light and color; rather than strive for the "sense" of the thing. Get brilliancy, sparkle, light.

Everything is interesting if only you make a study of it, aiming to do it simply. Fifteen minutes' work done at white heat, as it were, is better than all day's working at anything.

Camphor for moths! Why, when I took my fur coat out of the camphor, the moths held on and actually cried at losing the camphor on which they were growing fat. Moths love tobacco. And that's what Queen Elizabeth had against Sir Walter Raleigh. She kept all the dresses that she had ever had, and he must needs bring tobacco from Virginia to feed the little pests!

Oh, this is a funny old world; and how we dawdle and fool at nine o'clock in the morning when we think we have time enough. At five P. M. we desire nothing so much as to paint.

Make that sky bright and luminous. I've just seen a collection of pictures where the skies were dead and wall-like. You can paint the sky just as it is, but I defy you to make your foreground strong enough to make the sky stay back where it belongs.

Gray is not the negation of color, but the presence of it.

(Corot's "French Village," owned by Mr. Quincy Shaw.) When they put such things into their prayer-books, I will go to church.

(Spring of 1873, on starting for Florida.) Illness makes me long to work. If I should not live long, I can look back upon my life as one of nearly fifty years of a great deal of enjoyment.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. — The second of the University Course at Sanders Theatre (Jan. 8), and the third of the Harvard Musical Association (Jan. 15), were so nearly identical in programme, that they may be treated of together. The central feature in both was the posthumous Symphony of Goetz, who died so young and full of genius. This had been promised in the Harvard Musical prospectus from the early summer, but the Cambridge organization succeeded in bringing it out first. There was also the almost identity of orchestra, that at Cambridge (Mr. Listemann's Philharmonic) forming the nucleus of the larger orchestra under Carl Zerrahn. Then there was the Egmont Overture in common, and the two Arias sung by Miss Welsh. In only two numbers do the two programmes differ. We may as well give them both in full: —

Sanders Theatre.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," in F minor, Op. 84. Beethoven.
Concert Aria, "The Captive," Reverie by Victor Hugo, Op. 13. Berlioz.
Miss Ita Welsh.

Symphony, in F major, Op. 9. Hermann Goetz.

Motto: Into the holy, tranquil realms of feeling Must thou escape from out the press of life!
— Schiller.

Allegro moderato — Intermezzo, Allegretto — Adagio ma non troppo lento — Allegro con fuoco.

[First time in America.]

Andante with Variations and Minuet from the Divertimento in D. (string orchestra and two Horns) Mozart.
Aria: "Voi, che sapete," from "Figaro" Mozart.

Overture to "Euryanthe," in E-flat. Von Weber.
Miss Ita Welsh.

Boston Music Hall.

Overture to "Fierabras" Schubert.
Song: "The Captive," with Orchestra Berlioz.
Miss Ita Welsh.

Symphony, in F (posthumous), Op. 9. Hermann Goetz.
[First time.]

Motto: "In des Herzens heilig stille Räume Musst du fliehen aus des Lebens Drang."
— Schiller.

(Movements as above.)

Aria: "Voi che sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" Mozart.
Miss Ita Welsh.

Nocturne and Scherzo, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn.
Overture to "Egmont" Beethoven.

The second appearance of Miss Ita Welsh, and in the same two pieces, is explained by the accident which occurred to Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood, which prevented his playing the Beethoven G major piano Concerto and Schumann Fantaisie, as had been announced. Miss Welsh, at the last moment, kindly came in to the rescue. But every one was charmed to hear her, even for the third time, sing that marvelously beautiful, touching and original song, or Aria, by Berlioz, which she has made peculiarly her own, for it is remarkably well adapted to her. And "Voi, che sapete," though it has been heard so often, is seldom sung so tastefully and charmingly as it was sung by her both in Cambridge and in Boston. The Overture which opened the Cambridge Concert, closed the one in Boston. — and, we think, with better reason; for the Egmont Overture is just the thing to close a noble concert; it is short, concentrated, full of fire, and ending in a blaze of glory, the hero's dream of triumph. Whereas Weber's Euryanthe Overture, much longer, is a piece to rouse an audience at the outset, and bring them over the threshold out of the bustling everyday world into the heavenlier realm of harmony.

Schubert's Overture to his most important Opera, Fierabras, is also his finest work in that form. It is full of fresh musical ideas, and of fine effects of contrast, and it is splendidly instrumented. Indeed every time we hear it with new interest. The mysterious tremolo crescendo with which it opens; the superbly rich blast of horns, — a solid shining mass of golden tone; the plaintive, pleading, principal motive, a very short reiterated phrase, now from a horn, and now from other instruments; the spirited heroic answering subject; the exquisitely tender episode; and the return of all these themes with enhanced interest, and worked up to a brilliant conclusion, make it one of the few best Concert Overtures. We have often wondered why it is that these Symphony concerts have for so many years been allowed to have almost a monopoly of this Overture, — at least we cannot remember it's being played here in any other concerts.

The Mozart Andante and Minuet was a delightful feature of the Cambridge programme. Originally a Sextet for strings and two horns, — like his "Musikalischer Spass" — this Divertimento, or these movements from it, gained by the employment of all the strings of the orchestra. It was very finely played, and had all the perfection and the charm of Mozart. For this the Boston concert offered the two Midsummer Night's Dream pieces, which it is but fair to say were very beautifully and delicately played, particularly the Scherzo, in which the soft hum and flutter of the sustained flute-passage at the end won admiration for the taste and skill of Mr. Heindl.

It remains to record impressions of the Symphony by Goetz. It is in the key of F, — the key of many Pastorals, what some one calls the key of nature. And the first thing that strikes you in the opening of the Allegro moderato is its fresh, wholesome May or June feeling, "far from the maddening crowd." It waxes earnest, however, very soon revealing a deep poetic nature in the man, a haunting thought, and a reflective intelligence. The principal themes are very short, continually reproduced with subtle skill in thematic development, at great length; nothing that can be called a melody, only melodic phrases, hints, and motives. This portion of the work, therefore, was naturally the least interesting to the less musical many, in spite of its fresh spontaneity, its originality, and its rich blending and contrasting of the orchestral colors. But musicians found it extremely interesting.

The Intermezzo captivated every listener, and no one could withhold one whit of most absorbed attention. It is a little thing, but bright and airy and poetic enough for Mendelssohn in his most fairy vein. It is like a crystal fountain sparkling, iridescent, in the sunshine, all innocent happiness and freedom; something of that keen love of life, that full belief in joy, which we always feel in Beethoven, in spite of his darker moods. The salient melody, first given by the flutes in answer to the signal of the horns, and which pervades the movement, is most fascinating; and it continually clothes itself with new beauty. What a luscious commingling of the tone-colors as it proceeds! Especially where the blithe, smooth trumpet tones fall in with a new, still brighter sheaf of sunbeams. If this does not justify the "Herzens heilig stille Räume" (the heart's holy, still recesses) of the motto, it is at least typical of a spontaneous, pure joy, of a "content so absolute," as to be utterly aloof from all the vulgar Sturm und Drang of life.

It is commonly supposed, however, that the Schiller motto applies only to the Adagio, which has a deep, religious, thoughtful sentiment, and forms upon the whole the most important movement of the Symphony. Yet this, although it begins with a calm, soul-fraught melody, and takes you into the deeper chambers of the heart, is by no means always still and full of peace. It grows intense and almost feverish, as the self-communion deepens; the tragic human quality is not wanting,—the struggle of the conscious finite with the haunting glimpses of the infinite, the heaven beyond, the torture of the Ideal ever in contrast with the real! So this Adagio, which is musically a masterpiece, is a true type of life in this, that, while it begins and ends with peace, it has its Passion in the middle.

The Finale, Allegro con fuoco, full of fire, and very swift, is remarkable for the impatient rushing movement of the violins, extremely difficult, and long kept up, with which, as by relentless force of destiny, it "sweeps to a conclusion." We are of those who enjoyed every movement of the Symphony,—more and more as we have heard it in rehearsal and two concerts,—and we feel that we owe much of the enjoyment to the admirable manner in which both the smaller and the larger Orchestra performed it.

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC.—As a branch of this institution, Mr. Julius Eichberg's Violin Classes have given two extremely interesting matinees this season. The last was at Union Hall on Friday, Jan. 16. The concert consisted of string quartet performances and solos on the violin. A regularly organized quartet of young ladies, kept in constant practice upon quartets of Haydn, Beethoven, etc., zealous and happy in their work (Misses Lillian Shattuck, Lettie Laundier, Lillian Chandler, and Abbie Shepardson), had already given several public specimens of much more than respectable quartet playing. This time they opened the concert with the Andante from Mendelssohn's fourth Quartet, followed by the charming Canzonetta from his first. They gain in firmness, breadth, and good ensemble all the time. The great achievement of the day, however, was reserved to the closing piece, Bach's wonderful Chaconne in D minor, played in perfect unison, through all its variations, by the same four young ladies. Such practice must be invaluable, not only in forming competent violinists, but in educating musical taste and feeling for what is best in art.

The various solo performances were all so good that we are at a loss where to praise especially. Perhaps the greatest interest centred in two: the Fantasia Caprice of Viouxtemps, played by that delicate, poetic-looking maiden, Miss Edith Christie; and the two formidable pieces, Elegie by Ernst and Wieniawski's Polonaise, with great certainty and freedom, and con amore, by a talented young Italian, Mr. Placido Finmura. But the other efforts were each in its way (and they are all trained to a good way) excellent, namely: the Reverie of Viouxtemps, by Miss Shepardson; Theme and Variations, Wieniawski, by Miss Laundier; first movement from De Beriot's third Concerto, by Mr. Joseph B. Proctor; and Paganini's first Concerto, by Mr. Willis Nowell.

THE BOYLSTON CLUB, having postponed its contemplated performance, with orchestra, of Goetz's Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon," for maturer preparation, gave, meanwhile (Wednesday evening, Jan. 21), a concert simply of part songs and other smaller pieces. The selections were choice; exquisitely well sung, particularly those by the female chorus; and the concert had the refreshing merit of reasonable length. Marchetti's Ave Maria, in rather a secular modern Italian style, proved a fresh and very pleasing novelty. The Franz "May Song" was as delightful as ever; only taken, as we felt, a trifle too fast. Festa's Madrigal sounded fresh and wholesome as before. The Swedish "Little Bird," with Mr. Osgood's solo, gave great delight. But for fine poetic quality the "Lovely Night," by Chwatal, so perfectly sung, and the two pieces by Rheinberger, which have a more marked originality, deserve especial mention. Here is the programme in full:—

1. Choral Hymn Brahms.
Mixed Chorus.
2. Ave Maria Marchetti
Female Chorus.
3. Go, Speed thy Flight Otto.
Male Chorus.
4. Down in a Flowery Vale Festa.
Mixed Chorus.
5. Lovely Night Chwatal.
Male Chorus.
6. The Little Bird Swedish.
Female Chorus.
7. May Song Franz.
Mixed Chorus.
8. a Welcome } Rheinberger.
b Night }
Mixed Chorus.
9. My Wish Folksong.
Male Chorus.
10. Down in a Dewy Dell Smart.
Female Chorus.
11. On Upper Langbathes Engelsberg.
Male Chorus.
12. A Winter Carol Raff.
Mixed Chorus.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, JAN. 26. — On Tuesday evening, Jan. 18, Miss Anna Bock gave a concert at Steinway Hall. She was assisted by several resident artists, and the programme was certainly quite a pretentious one. The young lady played solos by Beethoven, Rubinstein, Schumann, Chopin, in a purely mechanical way, which demonstrated, beyond any peradventure, that she does not possess, in any real sense, a musical organization; perhaps she will subside to her proper level in time, for she is not especially needed here. Mr. W. Mueller played an andante (on the violoncello) from a concerto by Viouxtemps, and Schubert's "Ave Maria," in a very admirable manner. His tone is broad and clear, and his execution is most excellent. It should be mentioned that among Miss Bock's solos was a Barcarolle by Rubinstein in A minor; it is a very lovely composition, and in the right hands ought to make a very strong impression upon any one's musical intelligence. It was simply slaughtered by this ruthless young person who, nevertheless, seemed to think that she had done something of a particularly meritorious sort.

On Thursday evening, Jan. 15, we had, at Chickering Hall, a concert of English Glees. Miss Beebe, Mr. Aiken, and Mr. Woodruff have labored faithfully and conscientiously to develop a taste for this kind of musical entertainment, and their artistic efforts have contributed very largely to the success of their undertaking. They have lost their former contralto (Miss Finch), and this season's substitute can scarcely be regarded as a marked success; she seems to have a fair voice, but her musical intelligence is not conspicuous. These concerts are attended by some of our very best people, and are most heartily enjoyed by those who prefer a whole evening of vocal music to one in which instrumental ability is allowed a share.

On Saturday evening, Jan. 17, the Symphony Society gave its third concert in Steinway Hall; I give you the programme:—

- Suite—D minor. Op. 43 Tchaikowsky.
Violoncello Concerto (new) Saint-Saëns.
(M. Adolphe Fischer.)
Sixth Symphony Beethoven.

Solos for Violoncello —

- Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 2 Chopin.
Tarantella Fischer.
Selections from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner.

The Suite is in five sections or subdivisions, and is certainly as noble a work as has been produced within the last quarter of a century. The first movement (in D minor) is a very serious Introduction and Fugue, which is admirably worked up and charmingly orchestrated. The second division is a Divertimento, which is opened by several solo bars for the clarinets; this is again and again introduced, in one instance accompanied by the most delicious rocking accompaniment by the flutes; there is also an auxiliary Theme in E-flat by the oboes, with pizzicato accompaniment by the entire string orchestra. The three remaining divisions were an Andante, a Scherzo, and a Gavotte; space will not suffice for a detailed analysis of these, but it is enough to say that the melodies are pure and definite, the harmonic combinations strong and full of charming surprises, and the instrumentation most masterly.

The violoncello concerto is a very interesting illustration of the wonderful talent—perhaps genius—which Saint-Saëns displays in almost everything that comes from his fertile pen. More interesting than the concerto was its performance by Monsieur Fischer; no such solo playing upon that instrument has ever been heard in this city. While this amazing artist has not the breadth of tone possessed by some of his compeers, he has a most exquisite staccato, a charming pianissimo, and an absolute accuracy of intonation (even in the higher notes in the A string), that are little else than marvelous. His musical intelligence is of the highest order and he is certainly a king of his instrument; he might well be termed a Joseffy upon the violoncello; ah, if one could only hear those two play Mendelssohn's Sonata in B-flat!

M. Fischer achieved an instantaneous and merited success, both by his rendering of the concerto and by his tender singing of the lovely Chopin nocturne (set in the key of D for the 'cello); and his phenomenal technique, as shown in his own dainty Tarantella. I object, of course, to the use of Chopin's pianoforte works in adapted guises for other instruments; but must candidly confess that this vandalism was less objectionable in this especial instance than in every other which has come under my observation; such things ought not to be tolerated for a moment, but—the nocturne certainly was charming.

The concert was in every way an unequivocal success, and too much praise cannot be accorded to Dr. Damrosch for his admirable manner of accompanying M. Fischer; in this regard the improvement in his leadership (which is noticeable this year) was conspicuously evident.

The fourth concert will occur on Feb. 14, upon which occasion will be produced Berlioz's Damnation de Faust.

On Tuesday evening occurred the third concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society; this was the musical menu: Overture—"Anacreon" Cherubini.
Suite—E Bach.
Violoncello Concerto Saint-Saëns.
(M. Fischer.)

Dramatic Symphony Rubinstein.

The orchestra appeared to the best advantage in the Cherubini Overture, which was played with a precision of attack and a unity of purpose that reminded one forcibly of Mr. Thomas's palmy days. The Bach Suite was somewhat marred by the unaccountable flutings of the violas. This Suite, it may be mentioned, is made up from two of the great master's violin sonatas. It is instrumented by Bachrich, and is really quite effective. M. Fischer was successful in his artistic interpretation of the concerto, but did not play with the marvelous finish of execution and accuracy of intonation which distinguished him on the previous Saturday evening. In response to an encore he gave us a Chopin nocturne (Op. 9, No. 2), which he rendered with the utmost feeling and delicacy. The orchestral accompaniment was villainously played, and reflected no credit either upon the performers or upon the conductor, who appeared to regard the whole thing as a bore.

The Rubinstein Symphony was produced at a former concert by the Brooklyn Society, and has also been played in New York. The orchestration—it need scarcely be said—is superb; but I have faithfully tried to comprehend the design and purpose of the work, and have never yet been able to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion; it is the very embodiment of disjointedness and jerkiness.

On Saturday evening, Jan. 24, the N. Y. Philharmonic Society gave its third concert with substantially the same programme as the one which has just been mentioned. The orchestral numbers were just the same and, in addition, Beethoven's fourth piano Concerto was played by Mr. Hermann Rietzel (son of the Society's veteran first flutist). This young artist displayed a very excellent technique and very notable musical intelligence, and gave us a pleasing reading of the opus, although the interpretation can scarcely be termed a broad one. Joseffy had been engaged for this concert, and was to have played Beethoven's Fifth Concerto: he has, however, had very serious difficulty with one of his fingers and was, therefore, unable to appear.

On February 28, Mr. G. Carlberg will give an orchestral concert at Chickering Hall; his programme will include a Symphonic Triumphant, by Ulrich; Mozart's P. F. Concerto, No. 8, in D minor, played by Mme. Rachan, and the entire "Struensee" music, by Meyerbeer. Angus.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., JAN. 17. — The "Cecilia" gave its sixth concert, the second of this season, Tuesday evening, Jan. 13, with the following programme: —

Quintet, E-flat, Op. 4 Beethoven.
Songs: (a.) Serenade Eisenhofer.
(b.) "Calm on the Midnight Air" Zöllner.

Songs: (a.) Recordare Beethoven.
(b.) "Arise! Shine" Beethoven.
Solo, Violin: (a.) Cavatina, Op. 85 Raff.
(b.) Kujawiak (Mazourka) Wieniawski.
Mr. Charles N. Allen.

Song: "Lead, Kindly Light" Buck.
Quintet, Op. 8 Gade.

The instrumental numbers were given by the Beethoven Club of Boston, consisting of Messrs. C. N. Allen and Carl Meisel, violins, H. Heindl and W. Rietzel, violas, and Wulf Fries, 'cello. The vocal part of the programme was rendered by the Temple Quartette of Boston, who were engaged at short notice in the place of Mr. Wm. J. Winch, who was announced for this concert, but prevented from singing by illness.

The somewhat familiar early work of Beethoven is interesting for more than one reason. It is beautiful in itself as a composition, being well constructed, and having fine themes whose elaboration is worthy of them. It is quite easily apprehended, and is capable of being understood with little effort as compared with some of the author's later works, — the quintet for strings in C, Op. 29, for example, — not to mention others. While written in the master's earlier style, before he had passed beyond the influence of Haydn and Mozart, it presents here and there indications, hints, suggestions of the future Beethoven in all his marked individuality and power. The Andante, possibly somewhat Italian in style, yet very beautiful, contains passages strongly characteristic of the genius of the composer, and such as you feel he only could have written. You cannot help recognizing here his energy and his reserved power. The later development of the master is but the natural outgrowth of germs like those seen in this movement. Of all the movements the first is, perhaps, the least interesting to a general audience, while no one can fail to enjoy the Andante and Finale. The Minuetto, with its two trios, is not far behind these in matter and form. The Finale is exceedingly rapid and brilliant. The playing was throughout excellent. The marks of expression so numerous in Beethoven were carefully observed, and the whole work was given con amore.

The quintet by Gade is evidently also an early work. It reminds you considerably of Mendelssohn, especially in the first movement, Allegro espressivo; and it has the characteristics which appear in nearly all the works of the northern composers. Should we offer anything respecting it in the way of criticism, we must say that though it is a fine work, and would doubtless prove more interesting on further acquaintance, it does not impress us so favorably as some of the other works of its author, for example, his Trio for piano and strings, Op. 42, in F_♯. There is too much of mere figure work, and too little real melody in the composition. This, at least, is the impression produced on the writer and one or two friends. Yet there are fine passages in the work. The Allegretto was the most enjoyable movement.

The playing of the Club here also was of a very high order. The individual work was excellent, and the ensemble equally so. It was such playing as one wishes to hear often.

Mr. Allen's solo was admirably rendered, and was one of the most enjoyable things of the evening.

The songs, while nicely rendered in the main, did not please us. They hardly seemed in place in such a programme. This remark must apply even to the selections from Beethoven. We were not particularly impressed with them, and if this is hereby on our part, we can only defend ourselves by saying with Horace: "bonus dormitat Homerus" (Ars. Poet. 359), "good Homer nods." Last, however, we should seem to be unjust to the gentlemen who rendered the vocal selections, it is perhaps fair to say that they seemed to please the audience generally.

As a whole, however, the concert was not so interesting as the previous one. This was partially owing to the more heterogeneous composition of the programme, especially the vocal portion, and partially, perhaps, to our not being in so musical a mood as is usual on such occasions. Be it as it may, the concert was a good one, and calculated to develop a taste for a high and intrinsically valuable class of music.

BALTIMORE, JAN. 25. — The Strakosch Italian Opera Company left on Monday last after seven performances, which, on the whole, were only fair from an artistic, as well as pecuniary, standpoint. The operas produced were: Norma, Carmen, Huguenots, Puritani, Mignon, Lucia, and Favorita. Of these the only ones deserving special mention were Carmen and Favorita. The Huguenots was a most unsatisfactory performance, if we except the Urbano of Mlle de Belocca, and Mons. Castelmarty's Marcel. The last act was entirely left out, and the choruses were tortured in the most execrable manner. Belocca and Castelmarty are the mainstays of Mr. Strakosch's troupe. Miss Singer does not improve on acquaintance. Her high notes are harsh and screechy, and her voice is effective only in pianissimo passages. Of the remainder of the cast (excepting Herr Gottschalk, who was ill the entire week, and unable to appear) the only ones deserving attention are Sig. Baldanza and Sig. Horti, — the former for his telling tenor voice, and the latter for his dramatic figure and histrionic talents. The most successful representation of the week was that of Carmen, in which Mlle. de Belocca acted and sang most charmingly.

At the twelfth Peabody students' concert, given at the Conservatory, on Saturday last, the following programme was performed: —

Beethoven. String-trio, C major, Op. 87. For two violins and viola.

Allegro. — Adagio cantabile. — Minuetto: allegro molto scherzo. — Finale: presto.

(Messrs. Allen, Fincke, and Schaefer.)

Asger Hamerik. Love-Song from the fourth Norse Suite.

Op. 25. Transcription for the piano by the composer.

(Miss Mabel Latham, student of the Conservatory, seventh year.)

Mendelssohn, (a.) Songs for two sopranos and piano.

I would that my Love. — The Passage-Bird's Farewell. — Greeting. — Autumn Song. — Folk-Song. — The May-Bells and the Flowers. — My Bark is bounding to the Gale. — Home, far away. — The Sabbath Morn. — The Harvest-Field. — Evening Song. — Song from "Ruy Blas."

(Miss Kate Dickey, student of the Conservatory, sixth year and Miss Ida Crow, ex-student and member of the Conservatory.)

(b.) Variations Seriesues, D minor, Op. 54. For piano. (Mr. Karl F. Bühner, member of the Conservatory.)

The choice of so many Mendelssohn songs for one evening seems somewhat peculiar; but they were all gone through with quite fairly by the two young ladies, and without any evidence of fatigue either on their part or that of the audience.

It will doubtless interest your readers to know that we are at last to have the usual eight Peabody Symphony Concerts. After the money question has been discussed from any number of standpoints, and many remedies and expedients suggested — after much crimination and recrimination, — the sensible conclusion has finally been reached, that the only way to start the concerts is to appropriate the requisite lure; and to the credit of the Institution, be it said, the want has been more handsomely supplied this time than during the last two years, although at a rather late day. The lovers of good symphony music will, however, be happy to have the concerts even though they do not begin until the last day of January. Better late, than never! The orchestra will consist of about forty-eight pieces, — about ten stronger than last season, — and the first concert, for which rehearsals have already begun, will produce the "Ocean" symphony of Rubinstein, something entirely novel to Baltimore audiences.

CHICAGO, JAN. 24. — The Mapleson Opera Company has been the attraction for the past two weeks. The operas given have been Marta, La Sonnambula (twice), Linda, La Figlia del Reggimento, Aida (three times), Faust, Lucia di Lammermoor (twice), Rigoletto, Dinorah, and Mignon. Besides these, there was a very unfortunate performance of Rossini's Sabat Mater. On this occasion it pleased the members of "Her Majesty's Opera" to show the negative side of good singing, for more wretched work can hardly be imagined. True, there were a number of the best solo artists sick, and substitutions had to be made; but still there was little excuse for such an ordinary performance, even from the singers engaged in it. From the art side of the question, but very little benefit has been derived from this visit of the Mapleson company to our city. In the first place we have had only the time-worn operas, and nothing has been given that could advance musical interest to any extent whatever. Many of the performances have been good, and others, like Faust, and the Sabat Mater, very bad; but at no time during their visit has there been any work given that would call out the enthusiastic commendations of really musical people. From a financial point of view, their visit has brought them in a good return, but there was not the same enthusiasm upon the part of opera-goers as during past seasons; nor have the houses been as large upon the star-nights. I have been quite constant in my attendance, and have given the performances my close attention. The chorus has been very good, and the orchestra better than any other company has given us. Signori Campanini, Galassi, Del Puente, and Herr Behrens have been uniform in their excellence, and all their work has reflected credit upon their talent and ability. In Mlle. Valleria I found a careful singer, with a pretty voice of a sweet quality, but light in power. Her execution was generally tasteful, and she seemed conscientious in all her work. At no time did she come up to the point at which an artist can claim greatness, nor did her performances sink into the circle of the common-place. She was always pleasing, and in some numbers quite brilliant. Mlle. Ambre, who made her first appearance as Aida, has not the power of voice, if she has the dramatic talent, to give a great performance of that rôle. As Mignon, and as Gilda, in Rigoletto, she had rôles better fitted to her powers. Miss Cary, although unable, on account of illness during the past week, to do all her work, has given us some very fine performances. The most notable being that of Amneris in Aida. She holds her rank as a noble and great contralto. The performances of Mlle. Maria Marimon have stamped her as an artist. She has not the melting quality of voice that is found in Mme. Gerster, nor did she find the same enthusiastic recognition. Her execution is very brilliant, and much of her work was very finely done, while she is able to command her powers so as to impress her listeners with the feeling that they are hearing a very accomplished singer. I regard the upper part of her voice as very pure and beautiful, while the lower octave is not at all strong and seems worn. As an actress she seems to possess a full knowledge of stage business, and is never at loss to make the most of a telling situation. At the same time she sings to astonish, more than to touch the heart, and in this respect cannot approach the delicate art of Gerster. One seems to me to be a born genius, who sings out her thoughts in sweet notes of wondrous beauty, and takes you, by force of her power, into the charmed circle of perfect sympathy. The other is a brilliant singer, who may attract and dazzle for a time, and even call out the high praises of good critics for the perfection of her vocal technique, but never so colors her voice with those delicate shades that make a reality of a rôle and draw you into a perfect sympathy with it by its naturalness. There is a marked difference in the company that Mr. Mapleson has given us this season, from that of a year ago. While the tenors, baritones, and basses are remarkably strong, and the list of contraltos improved greatly by the addition of Miss Cary, the sopranos are not as good, perhaps, as last year. I find that there is lacking a dramatic prima donna, if large operas, like the Aida, are to be given, although the force is strong enough for the light works of the strictly Italian school. Since the company came to our city, Signor Brignoli has arrived, and appeared twice in Lucia. I must accord him full praise for the manner in which he used his voice, while the wonderful power that he still has over an audience is remarkable. He sings well, and his voice, although not what it was in other years, still retains much of its sweetness, and in many notes he can command plenty of power. It was a surprise to me when I heard him do so well, and there are many lessons in his fine method that our younger tenors may note with advantage to themselves. As I close my note I can but regret that our own country cannot support a home opera company. In the large cities we have the chorus and orchestra, and it would not be difficult to secure solo singers of good ability, so that we might be able to have fine performances without depending upon visits from foreign companies. Then it might be possible to have new operas brought out, and some of the old works of merit, that are seldom heard; then art might be advanced, and our home talent encouraged. We have the means at command, if proper organization would mould it into form.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

MR. ERNST PERABO gave the first of three Matinées at Wesleyan Hall yesterday afternoon, — the first appearance of this admired pianist since his return from Germany. The second comes on Tuesday, Feb. 3, when he will be assisted by Mr. E. B. Perry (the blind pianist), who will play Chopin's Sonata, Op. 35 (containing the Marcia Funèbre), and several of Perabo's compositions. Mr. Perabo himself will play a Partita of Bach (No. 6, in E minor); and will accompany Mr. Wulf Fries in several Violoncello pieces by Widor and Kiel, and in a Sonata Duo, by Kiel. Third concert Friday, Feb. 6.

— Mme. Cappiani's second concert with her pupils will take place at Mechanics Hall on Wednesday evening, February 4. Eminent artists also will assist. Mme. Cappiani gave last week a very successful concert in New York, producing several of her best pupils whom she has been teaching in that city, between which and Boston she divides her time.

— The third of the University Concerts, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, under the direction of Professor Paine, will take place next Thursday evening, Feb. 5. The Philharmonic Orchestra will play the Bach Suite in D; Wagner's "Eine Faust Ouverture;" a Poème Symphonique: "The Youth of Hercules," by Saint-Saëns; and the first Symphony, in B-flat, by Schumann. Mr. George L. Osgood will sing three airs from Handel's L'Allegro, and The Erl King of Schubert, with orchestral accompaniment.

— The three concerts by Joseffy, with the Philharmonic Orchestra, arranged by Mr. Peck, have been postponed four weeks, owing to a painful inflammation of one of the great pianist's thumbs. They will take place on the evenings of Feb. 12 and 13, and on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 14. In the first, Herr Joseffy will play the E-flat Concertos of Beethoven and Liszt, with smaller piano pieces. The Orchestra will play Overture to Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn, two Character Pieces by H. Hoffman, and Schumann's "Evening Song." The second programme contains: the Egmont Overture; Chopin's Concerto in E minor; Introduction to Lohengrin; Piano Solos; "Dance Macabre," by Saint-Saëns; Hungarian Fantasia of Liszt, by Joseffy and Orchestra.

— In the fifth Harvard Symphony Concert (Feb. 13) Miss Jessie Cochran, a gifted pupil of Von Bülow and of Mr. Lang, will play a Piano Concerto, Op. 23, by Louis Brassin, never yet heard in this country. Miss Louise Homer will sing the Romanza from William Tell, and songs by Grieg. The orchestral numbers will be: Overture to Fidelio, in E-flat, Beethoven; and, for the first time in Boston, the famous Symphonie Fantastique ("Episode in the life of an Artist"), by Berlioz.

A CHAPTER FROM "DIE FAMILIE MENDELSSOHN," BY S. HENSEL.

In this house and garden now an extremely individual, poetic life developed itself. Here was formed that circle of friends which, with few exceptions held together in personal or epistolary intercourse, until death called one after another away. The Hannoverian, Klingemann, diplomatist, a very fine poetic nature, the poet of the Operetta Die Heimkehr (the Return from Abroad), was one of the most important and most faithful of this circle. Through the later frequent visits of Felix and my father in London, where Klingemann was attached to the embassy, and through continued, lively correspondence, this friendship became firmly knit and lasting. Louis Heidemann, the jurist, and his brother, Wilhelm Horn, son of the celebrated physician, and himself a physician, the violinist Rietz, and for a long time, above all, Marx, then the editor of the Musikalische Zeitung in Berlin, were the intimate friends of Felix. Marx, extremely genial, was the champion of the new school in music; he unfurled the banner of Beethoven, and has contributed much to his appreciation. He conceived a deep attachment to Felix; and both with youthful fire sought, in the interchange of their at first widely divergent opinions, to come nearer together.

Moscheles also lived in Berlin in the autumn of 1824, and Felix willingly acknowledged his superiority in technique, the grace, elegance, and coquetry of his piano playing, and learned of him in this regard, though he never conceded an undue authority to such virtuoso arts. But Moscheles in turn appreciated Felix's talent, and an enduring friendship knit itself between them. Spohr's presence also had a very important influence on him. Spohr had come to Berlin to conduct the rehearsals of his Jessonda, and in spite of, or perhaps on account of, the greatest hindrances, which Spontini placed in his way, the public received him and his work with all the more applause. Spohr came much into the Mendelssohn house, and the acquaintance begun in Cassel in 1822 was delightfully continued.

Added to all these musical incitements came, in March, 1825, a journey with his father to Paris, undertaken for the purpose of bringing Henrietta (his aunt) back to Germany. In Paris there was just then a great concourse of important musicians: Hummel, Moscheles, Kalkbrenner, Pixis, Rode, Bailot, Kreutzer, Cherubini, Rossini, Pär, Meyerbeer, Plantade, Lafont, and many others, often met in one saloon, or in one box. But the littleness, the maliciousness, and envy of so many of these men made a repulsive impression on the wholly differently constituted Felix, so that he afterwards never took kindly to Paris and the musical life there.

In its good, as well as in its bad sides, it was antipathetic to his nature. The striving after the brilliant and the piquant, after effect, left him cold; the spirit of intrigue, the want of acquaintance with the great masters of the Germans, the superficiality of the work there, was repugnant to him; he did not let himself be flattered by the very cordial manner of the musicians toward him personally. Only with Cherubini does he seem to have entered into a somewhat nearer relationship.

In a letter of the 6th of April he expressed himself with great sharpness and violence, commonly by no means characteristic of him, about persons and the state of things in Paris. Naturally there was no lack of reproach in the answers of his mother and sisters. Some extracts from his letters may illustrate his way of looking at things:—

FELIX TO THE FAMILY.

PARIS, March 23, 1825.

"How shall I begin, on the first morning of my stay in Paris, to write a set, regular, and reasonable letter? I am too full of wonder, curiosity, bewilderment for that.— But since I have promised to send a journal to Berlin, I fall at once with the door into the house and announce that yesterday, March 22, at eight o'clock in the evening, we arrived in Paris. When we had passed the Barrière de Pantin, we drove for a good quarter of an hour at the sharpest trot of good horses through a new quarter of Paris, which father had never seen. That is the Faubourg St. Lazare. It still looks in many places very dreary and confused, but for the most part houses stand there. We soon came into the old city, and finally upon the Boulevard. There's life and bustle for you! a rattling and snarling, a screaming and a merriment among the people; all the shops are completely lighted with gas, diffusing such a brightness on the streets that one can see to read conveniently. It is as loud and as light there as in some sort of an illumination in Berlin. . . . Leo and Meyer came to see us very early, and seemed quite astonished that I did not sit down in their laps any more, or upset any chairs, or raise any shouts, etc. Then we went to see Aunt Jette, and met her already on the street upon the way to us. Her mild, serious, lively, and thoroughly kind nature made no small impression on me. And how cleverly she talks! How I rejoice to bring her back to you!" . . .

April 1, 1825.

. . . "On Monday morning I called on Hummel and found with him Onslow and Boucher; he did not recognize me at first, but when he heard my name, he acted like mad, embraced me a hundred times, ran round in the room, bellowed and wept, pronounced an extravagant and senseless eulogy on me for Onslow's benefit, and ran away with me to see father; but as he was not in the house, he made such a rumpus in the hotel that people ran together, took his leave, and then ran up the stairs after me, embraced me, etc. Yesterday morning he came rumbling in with four carriers bringing his wife's piano, and took away our wretched instrument in place of it." . . .

PARIS, April 20.

. . . "That you may not be angry any longer, I will tell you at once, that we were last evening in the Feydeau and saw the last act of an opera by Catel, L'Aubergiste, and Léocadie by Auber. The theatre is spacious, friendly, and pretty. The orchestra is right good. If the violins are not so excellent as those of the Opera Buffa, the basses and wind instruments, as well as the ensemble, are better than there. The directing is in the middle. The singers, male and female, sing out of tune, but not badly, act with vivacity and promptness, and so the whole goes well together. But now the main thing, the composition! Of the first opera I will not speak, for I heard only half of it, and that indeed was tame and powerless, but not without light and pleasing melody. But the famous Léocadie of the famous Auber! Anything so pitiful you cannot conceive of. The subject is from a poor story of Cervantes, poorly transformed into an opera, and I would not have believed that such a common and unseemly piece could not only have held its place, but even pleased upon the theatre of the French, who yet have very fine feeling and correct taste. To this novel of Cervantes' rough, wild period Auber has put a music so tame, as to make one grieve. I don't speak of the fact that there is no fire, no weight, no life, no originality to be found in the opera; that it is pasted together out of reminiscences alternately from Cherubini and Rossini; I don't speak of there being not the slightest earnestness, not a spark of passion in it; nor that in the decisive moments the singers have to make gurglings and little trills and passages; but instrumentation, which has now become so easy, since the scores of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven are so widely diffused, instrumentation should at least be at the command of the favorite of the public, the pupil of Cherubini, a man with gray hairs. But it is not. Fancy to yourself that in the whole opera, rich in musical numbers, there are perhaps three in which the octave flute does not play the principal part! The Overture begins with a tremulando of the string instruments, and instantly comes the piccolo upon the roof, and the fagotto in the cellar, and doodle a melody to it; in the Allegro theme the strings make the Spanish accompaniment and the little flute tootles another melody; Leocadie's first melancholy Aria: pauvre Leocadie, il vaudrait mieux mourir, is appropriately accompanied by a little flute. The little flute paints the brother's rage, the lover's woe, the peasant girl's joy; in short, the whole might be capitally arranged for two flutes and jewsharp ad libitum. O woe! . . .

"You write me that I ought to set myself up for a missionary and convert Onslow and Reicha to the love of Beethoven and Sebastian Bach. This I do already, so far as it goes. But consider, dear child, that the people here know not one note of Fidelio! that they hold Sebastian Bach to be a regular periwig stuffed full of learning! I played over the Fidelio Overture to Onslow on a very bad piano, and he was quite beside himself; he scratched his head, instrumented it in his thoughts, sang with it in his enthusiasm, in short, acted like a mad man. Lately I played, at Kalkbrenner's request, the Preludes in E and A minor for the organ. The people found both 'wondrous nice,' and one remarked, that the beginning of the A minor Prelude bore a striking resemblance to a favorite duet from an opera by Monsigny. It grew green and blue before my eyes.

"Rode remains firm in his refusal to take a violin into his hands. But with Baillot, Mial, and Norblin, I have lately played my Quartet in B minor at Mme. Kiéné's. The first began absently, even negligently; but at a passage in the first part of the first movement he fired up, and played the rest of the first and the whole of the Adagio very powerfully and well. But then came the Scherzo. The beginning must have pleased him, for now he began to play and to run; the others after him. I tried to hold them in, but who can hold three Frenchmen when they get going! And so they took me on with them, madder and madder, and faster and stronger; especially at one place near the end, where the theme of the Trio comes in above against the beat, Baillot went into it most fearfully, and as he had before made one mistake several times, he raved against himself in the worst way. As soon as it was over he said not a word to me except: Encore une fois ce morceau. Now it went smoothly, but even wilder than the first time. But in the last piece the devil was let loose. In the passage at the very end, where the theme in B minor comes in once more fortissimo, Baillot actually raged upon the strings most frightfully; I was in terror at my own Quartet. And when it was done, he came up to me, again without saying a word, and embraced me twice, as if he would squeeze the life out of me. Rode, too, was very much pleased, and said to me again long afterwards, 'Brav, mein Schatz!' in German."

But the Berliners were not satisfied, and never ceased, in their letters, to break lances for Paris (in their opinion) so unjustly treated. Felix was not disconcerted. On the 9th of May he writes to his sister:—

.... "I was rather angry about your former letter and resolved to send you some scoldings, which I cannot do just yet; but time, the beneficent god, will perhaps mitigate them and pour balm into the wounds which my flaming wrath inflicts on you. You write me of prejudice and prepossession, of owliness and grumbling, of the land flowing with milk and honey, as you call this Paris! But bethink yourself, I pray you! Are you in Paris, or am I? Surely I should know it better than you! Is it my way to pass prejudiced judgments upon music? But even if it were, is Rode partial when he says to me: C'est ici une dégringolade musicale! Is Neukomm partial, who says to me: 'This is not the land of orchestras'? Is Herz partial when he says: 'Here the public understands and relishes only variations'? And are 10,000 others, who mock at Paris, partial? You, you are so partial that you believe less in my extremely impartial reports than in a lovely conception of Paris as an Eldorado, which you have imagined to yourself. Take up the Constitutionnel: what do they give in the Italian Opera but Rossini? Take up the list of musical publications: what comes out, what goes off, but romances and potpourris? But just come here and hear Alceste, hear Robin des Bois (the French name for Der Freyschütz), hear the Soirées (which you confound with Salons, for Soirées are concerts for money, and Salons are social); hear the music in the royal chapel, and then judge, then scold me, but not now, while you are possessed with prejudices and utterly beguiled!!!"

In May they returned with Henrietta to Berlin, visiting Goethe by the way again.

Let us now give a glance at the literary events which inspired the youth of that time with fresh enthusiasm and devotion. That the descendants of Moses Mendelssohn should be familiar with Lessing's writings, that to the young friend and guest of Goethe Faust and Werther should be, as the mother expresses herself, "shining lights," was a matter of course. How Schiller's masterworks remained ever present to them is shown by my mother's and Felix's letters from Switzerland. But above all it was two writers who exercised a powerful influence on the Mendelssohn children and their circle: Jean Paul and Shakespeare. Of Jean Paul Börne has said the finest things, and Heine the witliest, in the romantic school. Rebecca wrote me once about him: "You wish me when I am melancholy to read Hesperus. No, that I let alone. Jean Paul does not help the weary and heavy-laden to bear their cross, he talks away at them and makes their burden heavier, while he exhausts their strength to bear it. But it is of no use for me to say that to you; you are just now at the age, or rather in the youth time, when there is nobody but Jean Paul; when his way of writing, his irony, is imitated; when young men and maidens don't wish to grow stout, so that they may be more like Victor and Clotilde or Liaue; if possible, would like to die rather early, but only for a little while. If I wanted to read away my sadness, I would read Lessing, or Mendelssohn, or history, and refresh myself with men who have fought their way through hard fortunes and reverses, and have wrung from them no ironical spirit, but a virtuous cheerfulness, devotedness, and strength for further struggles. But there is this little difference between us, that I am as near on to forty as you are to twenty. And if I did not know very well how Jean Paul acts upon young people, I should surprise you in your rural solitude and make an auto-da-fé of the whole Hesperus."

"Apropos of the resemblance you suggest between Jean Paul's Clotilde and X., I should like to tell you an anecdote, if I were not sure that you would take it wrong. Nevertheless I will tell you: A deaf and dumb scholar of Professor Wach once painted a Madonna, which was a speaking likeness of the Professor himself. In justification of himself he declared that Wach was his highest ideal, and so was the Madonna, therefore the Madonna ought to look like Wach!—The application is understood, of course. But do not be offended." . . .

Those children did not need Jean Paul for consolation; and yet there is a time in youth, when every one, even the happiest, would rather like to feel unhappy and, as Rebecca writes, to die a little early, only not for a long time. Be that as it may, and whatever side of the poet may have appealed to each of them, it is a fact, that they were all very much infatuated with him, and that this infatuation held out to the last: Felix gives warm expression to this predilection even in his later letters.

Now as to Shakespeare. The Schlegel-Tieck translation had appeared, and in this Shakespeare was presented for the first time in an enjoyable form. The brother and sister were not so well at home in English at that time, that they could read Shakespeare in the original. The impression was prodigious; the tragedies, but above all the comedies, and among these particularly the Midsummer Night's Dream, were the delight of the Mendelssohn children. It was their peculiar fortune that just in this year, 1826, they themselves were leading a dream-like and fantastic life in that wonderfully beautiful garden, in most splendid weather. In the garden house there lived together with them an old lady with her beautiful and amiable nieces and granddaughters. Of these young ladies Fanny and Rebecca had grown very fond; Felix with his young people joined their circle, and the summer months became an uninterrupted festival full of poetry, music, ingenious plays, railleries, masquerades, and performances. In a garden pavilion lay constantly a sheet of paper with writing material, upon which every one jotted down whatever wild or beautiful suggestions flashed into his head. This "Garden Journal" was continued in the winter under the title "Tea and Snow Journal," and contained many charming things, both serious and playful. Even the older persons, the father Abraham, Zelter, Humboldt, were not above offering contributions, or at least enjoying this tasteful and peculiar activity. This whole life had unmistakably a higher, more aerial mood, an idyllic color, a poetic fervor, such as one seldom finds in common life. Art and nature, soul, wit, and heart, the aspiring geniality of Felix, all contributed to lend color to the occupation, while on the other hand it all tended to the unfolding of the buds in Felix's creative faculty. A rapid, thorough change took place in him; important works followed in quick succession, works far different from the childlike compositions that preceded: and in the first place, the Octet, intended as a birthday present for Rietz. Thoroughly new in this is the airy, spiritual, and ghost-like Scherzo. He tried to compose the passage out of Faust:—

Wolkenfing und Nebelflor
Erheben sich von oben,
Luft im Laub und Wind im Rohr,
Und alles ist Zerstoben.

"And he has actually succeeded," remarks my mother, in what she says of the Octet in Felix's biography. "To me alone he told what floated before his mind. The whole piece is given staccato and pianissimo; the single tremulando shudders, the light up-flashing shakes, all is new and strange, and yet so interesting, so friendly, one feels himself so near the spirit-world, so lightly borne up in the air; nay, one might even take a broomstick in his hand, to follow the airy troop more easily. At the close the first violin goes fluttering lightly upward like a feather, and — all flies away like dust."

But the Scherzo of the Octet was only the forerunner of a more important similar creation; out of that singularly poetic mood proceeded as the sum and focus the Overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream. It may be designated, in a certain sense, as something out of his own life-experience, for it was called forth quite as much through the events of the summer of 1826 in the Mendelssohn house, as through the suggestion of the Shakespearean play; and I must very much deceive myself, or it is just this sort of origin that lends to the Overture the extraordinary fascination that resides in it. And it is just this, the fact that it welled up out of the inmost nature of Mendelssohn, that explains the fact, never occurring twice, so far as I know, in the history of music, that nearly twenty years afterwards the composer, taking up again that youthful labor, was able to write the rest of the music to the Midsummer Night's Dream, with no need of any alteration in the Overture. It was thoroughly Shakespearean and thoroughly Mendelssohnian, and so the rest of the music could go on in the same spirit.

This was perhaps the happiest period in grandfather's life: existence secured and fixed in one of the most beautiful estates of the Berlin of that day; at his side a dearly loved, prudent, and intellectually gifted wife, faithfully bound to him through long years of wedded life; all the children growing up with fine gifts and dispositions; Felix, past the wavering period, on the sure road to the highest that man can strive for and accomplish, a well deserved artistic fame; Fanny, his peer in talent and endowment, and yet covering nothing more than to remain modestly within the bounds which nature has set for women; Rebecca, developing into a handsome, discreet maiden, also full of talent, and only put in the shade through the conspicuous endowment of the older brother and sister; Paul, clever and industrious, and also very musical; all the four sound in body and in mind, and remarkably attached to one another; added to this a circle of friends, embracing all the approved older men of importance in many spheres of life, all the hopeful and aspiring youth then living in Berlin; a house, known, sought, and loved by so many in the whole world of culture, — such were the circumstances of Abraham Mendelssohn in the year 1826.

[From Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians.]

THE works of Liszt's mature period may be most conveniently classed under four headings. First: works for the pianoforte with and without orchestral accompaniments. The two Concertos in E flat and A, and the fifteen Hungarian Rhapsodies, are the most important works of this group, the latter especially illustrating the strongly pronounced national element in Liszt. The representative work of the second or orchestral section of Liszt's works are the Faust Symphony, in three tableaux, the Dante Symphony, and the twelve "Symphonic Poems." It is in these Symphonic Poems that Liszt's mastery over the orchestra as well as his claims to originality are chiefly shown. It is true that the idea of "Programme-Music," such as we find it illustrated here, had been anticipated by Berlioz. Another important feature, the so-called "leading-motive" (i. e., a theme representative of a character or idea, and therefore recurring whenever that character or that idea comes into prominent action), Liszt has adopted from Wagner. At the same time these ideas appear in his music in a considerably modified form. Speaking, for instance, of Programme-Music, it is at once apparent that the significance of that term is understood in a very different sense by Berlioz and by Liszt. Berlioz, like a true Frenchman, is thinking of a distinct story or dramatic situation, of which he takes care to inform the reader by means of a commentary; Liszt, on the contrary, emphasizes chiefly the pictorial and symbolic bearings of his theme, and in the first-named respect especially is perhaps unsurpassed by modern symphonists. Even where an event has become the motive of his symphonic poem, it is always from a single feature of a more or less musically realizable nature that he takes his suggestion, and from this he proceeds to the deeper significance of his subject, without much regard for the incidents of the story. It is for this reason that, for example, in his Mazeppa he has chosen Victor Hugo's somewhat pompous production as the groundwork of his music, in preference to Byron's more celebrated and more beautiful poem. Byron simply tells the story of Mazeppa's danger and rescue. In Victor Hugo the Polish youth, tied to

"A Tartar of the Ukraine breed
Who looked as though the speed of thought Was in his limbs," has become the representative of "lié vivant sur la croupe fatale, Génie, ardent courrier." This symbolic meaning, far-fetched though it may appear in the poem, is of incalculable advantage to the musician. It gives æsthetic dignity to the wild, rattling triplets which imitate the horse's gallop, and imparts a higher significance to the triumphal march which closes the piece. For as Mazeppa became Hetman of the Cossacks, even so is man gifted with genius destined for ultimate triumph: —

"Chaque pas que tu fais semble creuser sa tombe.
Enfin le temps arrive . . . il court, il tombe,
Et se relève roi."

A more elevated subject than the struggle and final victory of genius an artist cannot well desire, and no fault can be found with Liszt, provided always that the introduction of pictorial and poetic elements into music is thought to be permissible. Neither can the melodic means employed by him in rendering this subject be objected to. In the opening allegro agitato descriptive of Mazeppa's ride, strong accents and rapid rhythms naturally prevail; but, together with this merely external matter, there occurs an impressive theme (first announced by the basses and trombones), evidently representative of the hero himself, and for that reason repeated again and again throughout the piece. The second section, andante, which brings welcome rest after the breathless hurry of the allegro, is in its turn relieved by a brilliant march, with an original Cossack tune by way of trio, the abstract idea of triumphant genius being thus ingeniously identified with Mazeppa's success among "les tribus de l'Ukraine." From these remarks Liszt's method, applied with slight modification in all his symphonic poems, is sufficiently clear; but the difficult problem remains to be solved: How can these philosophic and pictorial ideas become the nucleus of a new musical form to supply the place of the old symphonic movement? Wagner asks the question "whether it is not more noble and more liberating for music to adopt its form from the conception of the Orpheus or Prometheus motive than from the dance or march?" but he forgets that dance and march have a distinct and tangible relation to musical form, which neither Prometheus and Orpheus, nor indeed any other character or abstract idea, possess. The solution of this problem must be left to a future time, when it will also be possible to determine the permanent position of Liszt's symphonic works in the history of art.

The Legend of St. Elizabeth, a kind of oratorio, full of great beauty, but sadly weighed down by a tedious libretto, leads the way to the third section — the sacred compositions. Here the Gran Mass, the Missa Choralis, the Mass for small voices, and the oratorio Christus are the chief works. The 13th Psalm, for tenor, chorus, and orchestra, may also be mentioned. The accentuation of the subjective or personal element, combined as far as possible with a deep reverence for the old forms of church music, is the keynote of Liszt's sacred compositions.

We finally come to a fourth division not hitherto sufficiently appreciated by Liszt's critics — his Songs. It is here, perhaps, that his intensity of feeling, embodied in melody pure and simple, finds its most perfect expression. Such settings as those of Heine's "Du bist wie eine Blume," or Redwitz's "Es muss ein wunderbares sein" are conceived in the true spirit of the Volkslied. At other times a greater liberty in the rhythmical phrasing of the music is warranted by the metre of the poem itself, as, for instance, in Goethe's wonderful night song, "Ueber allen Gipfeln ist Ruh," the heavenly calm of which Liszt has rendered by his wonderful harmonies in a manner which alone would secure him a place amongst the great masters of German song. Particularly, the modulation from G major back into the original E major at the close of the piece is of surprising beauty. Less happy is the dramatic way in which such ballads as Heine's "Loreley" and Goethe's "König in Thule" are treated. Here the melody is sacrificed to the declamatory element, and that declamation, especially in the last-named song, is not always faultless. Victor Hugo's "Comment disaient-ils" is one of the most graceful songs amongst Liszt's works, and in musical literature generally.

The remaining facts of Liszt's life may be summed up in a few words. In 1859 he left his official position at the Opera in Weimar owing to the capacious opposition made to the production of Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad," at the Weimar theatre. Since that time he has been living at intervals at Rome, Pesth, and Weimar, always surrounded by a circle of pupils and admirers, and always working for music and musicians in the unselfish and truly catholic spirit characteristic of his whole life. How much Liszt can be to a man and an artist is shown by what, perhaps, is the most important episode even in his interesting career — his friendship with Wagner. The latter's eloquent words will give a better idea of Liszt's personal character than any less intimate friend could attempt to do.

"I met Liszt," writes Wagner, "for the first time during my earliest stay in Paris, at a period when I had renounced the hope, nay, even the wish, of a Paris reputation, and, indeed, was in a state of internal revolt against the artistic life which I found there. At our meeting he struck me as the most perfect contrast to my own being and situation. In this world, into which it had been my desire to fly from my narrow circumstances, Liszt had grown up, from his earliest age, so as to be the object of general love and admiration, at a time when I was repulsed by general coldness and want of sympathy. . . . In consequence I looked upon him with suspicion. I had no opportunity of disclosing my being and working to him, and, therefore, the reception I met with on his part was altogether of a superficial kind, as was indeed natural in a man to whom every day the most divergent impressions claimed access. But I was not in a mood to look with unprejudiced eyes for the natural cause of his behavior, which, though friendly and obliging in itself, could not but wound me in the then state of my mind. I never repeated my first call on Liszt, and without knowing or even wishing to know him, I was prone to look upon him as strange and adverse to my nature. My repeated expression of this feeling was afterwards told to him, just at the time when my 'Rienzi' at Dresden attracted general attention. He was surprised to find himself misunderstood with such violence by a man whom he had scarcely known, and whose acquaintance now seemed not without value to him. I am still moved when I remember the repeated and eager attempts he made to change my opinion of him, even before he knew any of my works. He acted not from any artistic sympathy, but led by the purely human wish of discontinuing a casual disharmony between himself and another being; perhaps he also felt an infinitely tender misgiving of having really hurt me unconsciously. He who knows the selfishness and terrible insensibility of our social life, and especially of the relations of modern artists to each other, cannot but be struck with wonder, nay, delight, by the treatment I experienced from this extraordinary man. . . . At Weimar I saw him for the last time, when I was resting for a few days in Thuringia, uncertain whether the threatening prosecution would compel me to continue my flight from Germany. The very day when my personal danger became a certainty, I saw Liszt conducting a rehearsal of my 'Tannhäuser,' and was astonished at recognizing my second self in his achievement. What I had felt in inventing this music he felt in performing it: what I wanted to express in writing it down, he expressed in making it sound. Strange to say, through the love of this rarest friend, I gained, at the moment of becoming homeless, a real home for my art, which I had hitherto longed for and sought for always in the wrong place. . . . At the end of my last stay at Paris, when ill, miserable, and despairing, I sat brooding over my fate, my eye fell on the score of my 'Lohengrin,' which I had totally forgotten. Suddenly I felt something like compassion that this music should never sound from off the death-pale paper. Two words I wrote to Liszt: his answer was the news that preparations for the performance were being made on the largest scale that the limited means of Weimar would permit. Everything that men and circumstances could do was done, in order to make the work understood. . . . Errors and misconceptions impeded the desired success. What was to be done to supply what was wanted, so as to further the true understanding on all sides, and with it the ultimate success of the work? Liszt saw it at once, and did it. He gave to the public his own impression of the work in a manner the convincing eloquence and overpowering efficacy of which remain unequalled. Success was his reward, and with this success he now approaches me, saying: 'Behold we have come so far, now create us a new work, that we may go still further.'

In addition to the commentaries on Wagner's works just referred to, Liszt has also written numerous detached articles and pamphlets, those on Robert Franz, Chopin, and the music of the Gipsies, being the most important. It ought to be added that the appreciation of Liszt's music in this country is almost entirely due to the unceasing efforts of his pupil, Mr. Walter Bache, at whose annual concerts many of his most important works have been produced. Others, such as "Mazeppa" and the 'Battle of the Huns,' were first heard in England at the Crystal Palace.

AWARD OF THE THOUSAND DOLLAR PRIZE.

THE Cincinnati Gazette gives some interesting information regarding the award of the $1,000 prize made by the Musical Festival Association of that city to Mr. Dudley Buck for the best musical composition presented to the committee by a native-born citizen of the United States. Twenty-four compositions were presented to the committee, covering a wide range, and were as follows: "The Bells," adapted to Poe's poem; "Homage to Beethoven;" "Mass in G minor;" "God our Deliverer," sacred cantata; "The Inca's Downfall," cantata; "King Volmer and Elsie," cantata; "Worshippers at Different Shrines," cantata; "The Dream," for chorus and orchestra; "The Golden Legend," cantata, Longfellow; "Christmas," cantata; "Deukalion," cantata; "The Tale of the Viking," dramatic cantata; "Credo," C major; "Eastern Idyl," cantata; "Exultant Voices;" "Gloria," 145th Psalm; "Mezuea," historical cantata; "Nativity Hymns;" "Tribute to Music." Of these, New York city presented three, Brooklyn, two; Baltimore, two; Cincinnati, three, and Biddeford, Me., Winona, Minn., Kent, O., Terre Haute, Ind., Cleveland, O., Savannah, Ga., Elmira N. Y., Beloit, Wis., and Boston one each. In all this list only two compositions were found to be of excellence enough to demand careful examination, and singularly enough, both these were illustrative of works by Longfellow. — "The Golden Legend" and "The Tale of the Viking," which is only another title for "The Skeleton in Armor." Over these two the works respectively of Mr. Dudley Buck (formerly of Boston, and Mr. George E. Whiting of the Cincinnati College of Music and late of Boston, the judges were evenly divided, Dr. Damrosch and Mr. Hamerik sustaining Mr. Whiting, and Mr. Zerrahn and Mr. Singer supporting Mr. Buck. When it came to the casting vote, which was held by Mr. Thomas, he supported the opinion of the latter faction. The discussion of the merits of these rival works lasted several months, and turned largely upon the comparative weight to be given to the merits of originality in thought and thoroughness of treatment, Mr. Whiting's composition being conceded as best worked out, while Mr. Buck's had a greater number of evidences of progress. During this discussion, it must be understood, none of the judges knew the names of the authors whose work they were considering. There were many amusing incidents in the work of the judges. Some of the contestants displayed a lamentable ignorance of musical affairs; one production came only in parts, in separate sheets for voices and instruments, with the explanation that the composer did not have time to make the score, and another was only in piano score, and was accompanied by the modest request that Mr. Thomas arrange the orchestra parts. The most curious work sent to the committee was a manuscript volume of hymn metres from the hand of an old man, in which he had copied a great number of the tunes common years ago. The whole of the remarkable little volume was written with a quill pen, and in neatness and beauty it is as clear as copper-plate. The words, in a tiny script, are an exact imitation of print. The successful work is one that has been in Mr. Buck's mind for some time. It opens with the prologue which Liszt set as a dramatic cantata a few years ago, called "The Bells of Strasburg Cathedral," and dedicated to the poet.

MUSIC ABROAD.

THE London Figaro (Jan. 24) says: "For some time past rumors have been current that a Scottish peer was about to organize a series of orchestral smoking concerts in London, and various members of aristocratic clubs have been importuned to take tickets in order to guarantee the success of the enterprise. The chief attraction held out was that the Prince of Wales would probably be present at every concert, and the gentlemen of the aristocracy, as in duty bound, willingly paid their money, less for the benefit of the Scottish nobleman in question than in order to see the heir to the throne smoke a cigar. However, the concerts have been organized, an average band has been retained, and last week the first of a series of twenty concerts was given at the Grosvenor Hall under the somewhat timid conductorship of the Earl of Dunmore. Of course his lordship contributed pieces attributed to his pen, and on this head a scherzo and an overture figured in the programme. Besides this, the C minor symphony of Beethoven was performed, the violin concerto of Mendelssohn was played by M. Sainton, and M. Las-serre also appeared.

— Of the novelty of Carl Rosa's opera season at Her Majesty's Theatre, The Taming of the Shrew, by Goetz, the same journal says: "It may best be described as a symphonic opera. The work of Herr Goetz was, indeed, a compromise between the music of the past and of the future. Herr Goetz, unlike the apostles of the Zukunft, did not disdain simple melody, while at the same time he more or less fully agreed with the ideas of "infinite melody" advanced on paper by Herr Wagner. All the rapid expediences of the Italian composers have been dispensed with by Goetz, the various scenes follow on without break, shop-songs are dispensed with, and the orchestration throughout fulfills an entirely independent part. Nor can The Taming of the Shrew be considered in any sense of the term a "comic opera." It is essentially German in design and treatment, and it makes great demands upon the intelligence and the thoughts of its auditors. Its plot, for the most part, follows Shakespeare's play, with notable alterations necessary to opera. Of its music, while the concerted pieces and the instrumentation throughout are highly to be praised, it must be considered at its best in the second and third acts. Various writers have attempted to fix upon it an imitation of various composers, but these ideas can hardly be accepted. It must be considered the fact that Herr Goetz had his own thoughts, and worked them out in his own manner. The general opinion of the house on Tuesday was that, if the opera is to succeed at all in its present shape, the chief credit will be due to the admirable delineation of the chief part by Miss Minnie Hauck. Not excepting Carmen, whose fortunes the gifted American prima donna has made in both hemispheres, there is probably no opera which is better adapted to her special capabilities than The Taming of the Shrew. Whether she was biting the hand of the man who strove to tame her, or slapping the face of the male who tried to kiss her, Miss Hauck was always en scène, while her delineation of the change from the shrew of former days to the tamed and loving wife of the last act was inimitable. The acting, indeed, was throughout good, though the vocalism was on the whole, so far as the principal artists were concerned, indifferent.

— DR. VON BULOW made his first appearance this season in London at the Popular Concert of Saturday last, being in the best of "form," and contributing, with Madame Norman Néruda and Signor Piacenti, to one of the finest performances of Beethoven's grand trio in B flat which the music-loving public has heard for many years in this country. The doctor also took part with Madame Néruda in Schubert's rondo in B-flat for piano and violin, and played on his own account Bach's English suite in B minor and for an encore a Passépied in E minor, from the fifth suite. The posthumous string quartet of Mendelssohn, recently produced at these concerts, was also repeated. — Ibid, Jan. 24.

— ALL the nine Beethoven symphonies and many new works are to be performed in the second season of the Hans Richter Concerts, organized by a music-loving member of the Grosvenor family. The nine concerts will be given at St. James's Hall in the months of May and June.

—HERR JOSEF JOACHIM will arrive in London with his wife, the accomplished vocalist, Frau Joachim, on the morning of Monday, Feb. 16, and will play the same evening at the Monday Popular Concerts. On March 4 and 18 he will play the violin concertos of Mendelssohn and Brahms respectively at the Old Philharmonic Concerts, and he will leave England after the Popular Concert of March 22. It is still considered within the bounds of possibility, though it is not now very probable, that Herr Brahms will accompany Herr Joachim to London.

PARIS. At the Grand Opera, for the week ending Jan. 18, the pieces given were Faust, Don Juan, (twice) La Favorita and Coppélia. At the Opera Comique: Les Diamants de la Couronne, Le Déserteur, La Dame Blanche, L'Étoile du Nord, Le Pré-aux-Clercs, Roméo et Juliette, Les Rendez-vous Bourgeois, Les Noces de Jeannette. Rossini's sparkling Le Comte Ory was in preparation. At the Opéra-Populaire: Lucia, Paul et Virginie, Rita, Le Farfadet, Sintillia la Bohémienne.

—The programme of the Conservatoire Concert Jan. 18, directed by M. Altès was as follows: Overture and choruses from Mendelssohn's Athalie; Concerto for the oboe, Handel; O fili (Leisring) double chorus without accompaniment; seventh symphony of Beethoven.

—At the Concert Populaire, January 11, the principal attraction was the cantata La Lyre et la Harpe, by Saint-Saëns, which was followed by the first part of Haydn's Creation. —In his second series M. Padeloup promises: Schumann's Faust music; Diane, by B. Godard; selection from Sigurd, by Ernest Beyer; and Lohengrin.

—At the Chatelaine Berlioz's Damnation de Faust continued to be applauded for the twenty-fourth time.

—The annual concert of the Société de Chant Classique took place at the Salle Herz, January 24. Among the pieces offered were: Fragments from Handel's Jephtha, and from the opera Phaëton, by Lulli; cantata, Le Jugement Dernier, by Gluck and Salleri; an unpublished eight-part chorus by Mendelssohn; and Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, the piano part by Mme. Montigny.

BERLIN. —Rubinstein's "sacred opera," The Tower of Babel, under his personal direction, was performed at the second concert of Stern's Vocal Association. It was preceded by Cherubini's overture to Anacreon, Adolar's aria from Euryanthe, and Beethoven's G major Concerto, played by Rubinstein himself.

—At the Imperial Opera-House, in the week January 4-10, were given: Aida, Goldmark's Queen of Sheba, Meyerbeer's Africaine, Lortzing's Czar und Zimmermann, Gounod's Roméo et Juliette, and Meyerbeer's Prophète, —all of course in the German language. One evening was devoted to the ballet, "The Pretty Girl of Ghent."

—The new symphony by Raff, entitled "Summer," a continuation of his "Spring" symphony was performed for the first time by the Bilsé Orchestra, with considerable success.

DRESDEN. —The operas given at the Court theatre in December were the following: Rigoletto, Verdi; Don Juan, Mozart; Bianca (twice), Brüll; Lohengrin (twice), Wagner; Faust, Gounod; Die beiden Schützen, Lortzing; Fliegender Holländer, Wagner; Die Entführung, Mozart; Fidelio, Beethoven; Domino Noir, Auber; Zauberflöte, Mozart; Stradella, Flotow; Freischütz, Weber; Le Postillon, Adam; Sonnambula, Bellini.

VIENNA. —During the third week in January there were given at the Court Opera theatre: Paul et Virginie, by Massé; Faust, Gounod; Der häusliche Krieg (Domestic Strife), Schubert; Der Wasserträger, Cherubini; and Mozart's Idomeneus and Die Entführung aus dem Serail. —Compared with these lists, what meagre operatic fare we pay high prices for in our American cities!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1880.

"DIE FAMILIE MENDELSSOHN." —The book from which we have begun to translate a chapter entitled "Leipziger Strasse, No. 3," is by far the most interesting of the many interesting ones that have appeared concerning the composer of the Midsummer Night's Dream music and Elijah, St. Paul, and so many noble works. It is by Sebastian Hensel, son of Mendelssohn's sister Fanny, who married the painter Wilhelm Hensel, and was published in three volumes, less than a year ago, in Berlin. Rich and delightful as were the two collections of Mendelssohn's letters which first gave us all such a sense of personal acquaintance with their genial writer, there is even greater charm and freshness in the letters now first made public by his nephew. Those which the enthusiastic boy wrote home during his first visit to Goethe, in which he gives a vivid picture of the personal appearance of the great old poet, seeming to be greatly impressed by "his thunder voice," which has "a prodigious resonance," so that "he can shout like 10,000 warriors;" those written to his sisters from Paris, of which we give a specimen or two to-day; those describing his visit with his friend Klingemann to Scotland, like those soon afterwards written from London, where for many weeks he was confined by lameness, —all are fresh and full of humor and enthusiastic interest in all he meets and sees.

Certain portions of his earlier life, of course, could not be related more satisfactorily than they have been in Edouard Devrient's reminiscences of his friend. But Hensel's three rich volumes present him as he was and as he lived in the midst of that whole gifted family of Mendelssohns. And we are convinced by it that the only true way to write a life of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy is to treat him in connection with his family, to present a pretty full sketch of his grandfather, his uncles, "his sisters and his cousins and his aunts," all in the same broad and comprehensive picture. Accordingly the book opens with a charming account of that remarkable and noble Jewish philosopher, Moses Mendelssohn, the friend of Lessing; then passes to his uncles, his two aunts, Dorothea and Henrietta, women of rare culture and intelligence, who wrote admirable letters, lived in Paris, and became Catholics; then to the father Abraham, who resolved to be Christian, but Protestant of the Protestants, one of the wisest, noblest, and most generous of men, who thoroughly appreciated his son's genius; then the mother and the daughters, and the circle of intimate friends, all intellectually gifted, forming a social sphere of culture, taste, high-toned character, and genial, happy life.

All this now was brought to a focus, as it were, when Abraham Mendelssohn, able to live like a prince, purchased the fine estate on one of the principal streets of Berlin, called the Leipziger Strasse, with its stately rooms, its large court and gardens, its conveniences for music and for private theatricals, and for the nursery and home of such a genius as Felix rapidly developed. There he produced his little operettas, or Singspiele, his Heimkehr aus der Fremde for his parents' silver wedding; there he composed the Octet, soon followed by his Shakespearean fairy Overture; there they were all busy as fairies, weaving and inventing witty, fantastic, and ideal things. And into that house, that life, we are now permitted to look and in fancy to participate. That too forms the centre of correspondence when the family are scattered; so that "Leipziger Strasse, Numero Drei," seems to sum up in itself all that we want to know of Mendelssohn and his surroundings. When we first read Hensel's description of that fine old house and garden, it recalled (and with a pang of disappointment) a picture from our own experience. In the year 1861 it was one day our fortune to be in that house, and yet without dreaming that it had been the Mendelssohn house. It was then, and is now, occupied by the Herrenhaus, or Prussian House of Lords; and our good friend, a liberal member of that body, who had spent some years in America, introduced us there, but strangely never breathed a word to us about the Mendelssohn family! Nor did any person whom we met in Berlin during that whole winter ever intimate to us that the Mendelssohns lived there. What an opportunity to be informed of only now! Yet not so very strange; for at that time the Mendelssohn letters had not been published, and to us Americans at least the personal Mendelssohn had scarcely begun to be a theme of interest. No musical American could go to Berlin now and not pay more than an accidental visit, even a devout pilgrimage, to the house (of course not a little changed) where sits the Herrenhaus in grave council and debate.

THAYER'S "BEETHOVEN."

THE London Times, of Jan. 6, brings us an article on Thayer's "Beethoven," four columns in length, a large portion of which is made up of censure and ridicule of the manner in which he has done his work, closing with the ex cathedra statement that the (first) volume "has become totally unfit, at least for the English reader."

Perhaps so; but if so, it must be because no English reader has any curiosity to know the constitution and general regulations of those ecclesiastical and princely musical establishments which were, down to our own days, the great conservatories of music, and by means of which Germany became the leading musical country of the world. Mr. Thayer's history of music, and the Electoral "Kapelle" during the last century was, when published, and for aught we know still is, the only source of information for this subject.

We know not how it may be with the English reader, but we do know that the American (able to read German) is pleased to find a history, which, mutatis mutandis, applies to the musical establishments at Salzburg, dear to us for the Mozarts, at Esterhaz, the scene of Haydn's labors, and at Hanover, where Handel began his career as Kapellmeister, not to mention a score of others, which gave the world so many stars of the second magnitude.

We freely admit that much of the first volume is tedious reading; but all the first Book (as the translator, not Mr. Thayer, saw fit to call the historic introduction) can be passed over, and the reader need only begin with the biography.

In one instance only do we find the writer criticising Mr. Thayer's conclusions; and this, to our surprise and amusement, is upon the old, hackneyed question; whether Beethoven wrote his famous love letter to Giulietta Guicciardi, as Schindler stated, or to some other person not yet discovered. Mr. Thayer, as all our readers know, decided against Schindler, and his argument was printed in this journal two or three years since. The German critics have now (without exception we believe) accepted that argument as conclusive. But now comes this writer and assures us: "there is indeed, by Mr. Thayer's own showing, no absolutely cogent reason, why the letter should not have been written in 1802, before Giulietta Guicciardi had become Countess Gallenberg and had left Vienna."

Now the letter itself states that at four o'clock on some morning before the 6th of July, Beethoven had arrived at a watering place, after a terribly severe journey with four horses. Mr. Thayer shows that in the first days of July, 1801, 1802, 1803, 1804, 1805, 1807, etc., Beethoven was either in Vienna itself, or in some one of the villages in its immediate neighborhood. Only in 1806, he was not there. In that year he was visiting Brunswick and his sister Theresa early in the summer, and later Prince Lichnowsky. Between these two visits—in fact on the journey from Pesth to Silesia, he may well have written the love letter—and if so, to whom so likely as to his intimate friend Theresa Brunswick?

It strikes us, the fact that Beethoven was in Heiligenstadt, hard by Vienna, in June and July 1802, and did not make any distant journey, with four post horses, is a sufficiently "cogent" reason to convince even the writer in the London Times,—should his attention ever be called to it—that he, busy with his compositions, with lessons to Ferdinand Ries, and with his physician, Dr. Schmidt, just outside Vienna, could not at the same moment be writing love letters, from a watering-place two or three hundred miles away.

MUSICAL COMMENTATORS.

Most of us remember the delicious scene in Gulliver's Travels, in which the hero asks the Governor of Glubdubdrib to summon before him the ghosts of Homer and Aristotle, together with those of all their commentators, and how Gulliver says: "I soon discovered that both of them were perfect strangers to the rest of the company, and had never seen or heard of them before."

One wonders whether Beethoven and Bach, when they take their afternoon walks in the Elysian Fields, acknowledge even a bowing acquaintance with the ghosts of those who have discovered "hidden meanings" and "evident intentions" in their compositions. It seems a little hard that the poor little men who have done great men the inestimable service of finding out what their works mean, should not be recognized as friends and supporters by the great men themselves. We can all work miracles, if we only have the due amount of faith; and no doubt we all should do so if the chance were a little greater of the person, for whose especial benefit our miracle is worked, noticing and applauding it.

It is a great mistake to think that artists and composers (not to speak of saints) are the only miracle-workers. A grand composition, a symphony, sonata, quartet, or what not, a whole ideal world made out of twelve miserable semi-tones, is a very respectable miracle, if you will; but what is it in comparison with the wonders which commentators know how to work?

A symphony is, after all, only a symphony and nothing else; it has its own definite functions to perform, and can perform them only—good luck if it even can do that. But the work of the noble commentator can do almost anything. Evolve a symphony out of the twelve notes of the chromatic scale! Pooh! Sheer child's play! One wonders how composers can win glory by such simple tricks. Just put any symphony you please into the hands of a commentator who is decently up to his work, and he will evolve the whole Mosaic cosmogony, or anything else, from the destruction of Jerusalem to the boiling of purple cabbages, out of it. Nor is this all; a commentator will discover that a certain composition plainly means the evolution of the horse from its five-hoofed prototype; but just as he is about to publish his world-thrilling commentary he may find (nothing is more likely) that a rival commentator has sent in his MS. to the printer, describing exactly the same process as indicated by the very same composition. Think you that commentator No. 1 is fool enough to burn his work because somebody else has anticipated his discovery? Not a bit of it! All he does is to go home, scratch out the name of the composition and its composer, and substitute for it some other composition by some other composer. His commentary applies to the new composition just as well as it did to the other one, and he can have his MS. published without fear of being charged with plagiarism or lack of originality. The little circumstance is even a lucky one; it brings grist to the commentating mill. For any one can predict to a certainty that so soon as the two pamphlets are published, commentator No. 3 will set to work on a third pamphlet, exhaustively explaining the extraordinary influence the evolution of the horse has had upon the minds of composers, and it will go hard with him if he is not rewarded by being elected an honorary member of six or seven æsthetic societies at the very least.

No, don't talk about miraculous compositions any more; for a good, solid miracle that is really worth being astonished at, give me a twenty-four page musical commentary in all its protean magnificence. It will fit any composition you please, from the Seventh Symphony to "Buy a Broom." It is even more wonderful than the picture painted by the painter in "La Cigale," which was divided fesse-ways through the middle, one half being blue and the other half gray. Look at it one way, and it represented the "clear tropical sky over the burning sands of the Sahara;" turn it upside down, and, presto! change! it showed the delighted spectator "the gray polar heavens over the deep azure of the Arctic Ocean."

We can easily see why commentators look slightly upon programme-music. It encroaches upon their domain. What glory can a commentator get by finding out the meaning of a composition when the composer has given him the clue beforehand? Such a thing is not worth any man's while. Why, we even laugh at the foolish individual who laid claim to possessing some musical acumen because he discovered that a certain passage in the ball-scene in Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony was descriptive of "Romeo driving up to the door in his cabriolet." Pooh, nonsense! Any fool could have found that out; the cunning fellow knew from the title that the music was about Romeo. No, commentators of true mettle confine their remarks to music that has no descriptive title, and their commentaries are hence not paltry little juggler's tricks, but full-grown miracles.

The only danger in their path is that they are sometimes liable to find different meanings in the same composition, and so get to be at swords' points with one another. For it stands to reason that, if one man declares that a certain symphony means Moses and the Israelites passing through the Red Sea, and another announces his discovery that this same symphony means Emperor William and Prince Bismarck entering Paris, both of them cannot be right. The omniscience of one or the other is open to suspicion, and unless a commentator is omniscient, what on earth is he good for? Yet the world can console itself by thinking of the vast number of compositions now extant, and what a small chance there is of two commentators pitching upon the same symphony or sonata. But if they do, let them beware. A commentator is always more sure of his own omniscience than of his reputation for originality. If he finds somebody else saying the same thing about the same piece of music as himself, he can easily preserve his commentary, merely changing the theme, and his reputation as an original thinker is safe. But if he finds somebody else differing from him, the old Adam of pugnacity within him will prompt him to publish his pamphlet unaltered; and as surely as he does so, just so surely is his infallibility endangered.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

THE APOLLO CLUB, in its concert of Jan. 27, contributed an important and most enjoyable event to the musical season, by its admirable performance of Mendelssohn's music to the Edipus at Colonus of Sophocles, with its noble chorus of male voices, an effective orchestra, and with Mr. Howard M. Ticknor's readings of the connecting portions of the text,—the whole under the able conductorship of Mr. B. J. Lang. It was the worthy completion of the Club's noble work of last year, when the companion piece, Antigone, was given in like manner. It is good proof of the intrinsic power and charm of the music and the old Greek tragedy, and of the excellence of the interpretation, that the whole audience, crowding the Music Hall, listened with unflagging interest, and with frequent tokens of delight, to a work so far removed from all our modern tastes and ways of thinking, and so uniformly grave and tragical, in so monotonous a key of color and of feeling, albeit relieved by certain choruses, which charm by their beauty and cheerful picturesqueness, like the well-known remarkable one in praise of Athens: "Thou comest here to the land, O friend," and stirring ones like: "Ah, were I on yonder plain!" The moralizing, fatalistic choruses, also, so true to a vein pervading all Greek tragedy, have a peculiar sweetness and a homelike fascination. It is needless to say that Mendelssohn's music is all worthy of the noble theme and, so far as we of the nineteenth century can imagine, conceived in the spirit of the old Greek drama. It is happily, scored for men's voices, and the instrumentation, while it is chaste and always thoughtful and appropriate, is rich and brilliant enough for our new school orchestra composers.

The Apollo Club never sang anything better, and that is high praise indeed; the orchestra had been carefully trained, and there was a finish and a smoothness in the whole performance, on which all the participants may well congratulate themselves. The few sentences of recitative were intelligently and effectively given by Mr. Clarence Hay. Mr. Ticknor read with excellent taste and judgment, with good voice and accent, and with becoming simplicity and dignity of style.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The fourth Symphony Concert, Jan. 29, offered a varied and attractive programme and drew an uncommonly full house. The selections were—

- Overture to "Genoveva" Schumann.
- Recitative and Air, from "Semele" Handel.
- Miss Emily Winant.
- Prelude to the third act of Medea Cherubini.
- Intermezzo, from the Symphony in E, Hermann Goetz.
- [Second time.]
- Overture to Rip van Winkle (MS.), G. W. Chadwick.
- [Second time.]
- Songs with piano-forte:—
- (a.) "Ah! del mio dolce ardor" Stradella.
- (b.) "Kennst du das Land" Schumann.
- (c.) To Silvia Schubert.
- Miss Emily Winant.
- Symphony ("Scotch") in A minor, Op. 56, Mendelssohn.

Schumann's poetic, genial, and impassioned overture has become a standing favorite in these concerts, and its power and beauty were brought out remarkably well. We do not at all wonder at the different, the almost opposite, impressions produced on different hearers by the entr'acte, or prelude to the third act of Cherubini's Medea, the noblest of his dramatic works. Some found it dull, monotonous, and tedious, full of empty repetition, for the obvious reason that it is all in the same low tone of color, mostly for the lower strings, the basses being very prominent, and all in a slow tempo. Others felt it to be the most tragical music they had ever heard, and were profoundly stirred by the largeness, the simplicity, the depth and grandeur, and, indeed, sublimity of this dark prelude to the scene in which Medea is to murder her own children. We have even heard one truly musical and highly cultivated amateur, not lacking in appreciation of the new composer either, say that, compared with this, all the Mendelssohnian Greek drama music seemed to him like child's play! We, for our part, are of those who felt it to be simply grand, and grandly given; the basses were singularly majestic and effective, speaking in thunder tones; and the whole mass of strings still vibrates strongly in our feeling when we think of it.

The charming intermezzo from the Goetz Symphony, and Mr. Chadwick's Overture were highly welcome repetitions, and both improved upon acquaintance.

We cannot recall at any time within our memory so smooth and satisfactory, so inspiring and delightful a performance of the "Scotch" Symphony, as this one was throughout; it held the audience spellbound.

Miss Winant's wonderfully musical, rich, sympathetic contralto voice told to great advantage in her strong delivery of the jealous Juno's recitative: "Awake, Saturnia" and Aria: "Hence, Iris, hence." It was sung with judgment and considerable dramatic fire. By an unfortunate misunderstanding, however, the orchestral parts could not be found when wanted, and the piece had to be sung with mere piano-forte accompaniment (well played, of course, by Mr. Arthur Foote), so that the singer could not throw herself into it with all the freedom and abandon of which she is capable. The group of smaller songs was very choice, and partly new, although, owing to their uniformly serious character, they did not win their way, as they might have done singly, to every listener. The first, erroneously set down to Stradella—it is by Gluck—was finely suited to Miss Winant's voice and quiet, serious style. The Mignon song by Schumann is a rare gem, worthy of many hearings and hardly to be appreciated without. And Schubert's Shakespeare song: "Who is Silvia? what is she, That all our swains commend her?" is surely one of his most genial and charming.

UNIVERSITY CONCERTS.—The third concert of the Sanders Theatre series, Feb. 5, was a remarkably interesting one, beginning as it did with three movements (Overture, Aria, and Gavotte) of Bach's Orchestral Suite in D, and ending with a capital performance of Schumann's first symphony (in B-flat) which has become a sure card with all true music-lovers.

The intermediate orchestral selections were to us less edifying. Wagner's "Faust Symphony," an early work, never did achieve the mission of the "art divine" upon our spirit; it seems to dwell exclusively and with a morbid appetite upon the night side, the discontent, the groans, the helpless agonies and yearnings of its hero; there is in it not one spark of heavenly fire, not one thrill of hope and final joy and triumph, as there is in all Beethoven's dark and brooding moods and heroic struggles; nothing of that light from above, which in all true art gilds the edges of the cloud, and relieves, inspires, transfigures the darkest tragedies, like Macbeth and Othello. There are skillful and very striking orchestral effects, but these are often ugly and oppressive, like a vampire on the breast. We must admit, however, that the work was so well played, with such discretion in the use of ponderous instruments, as to seem less coarse, less exaggerated, than when we have heard it done before. The other middle piece, The Youth of Hercules, a work of considerable length, impressed us as the least successful of the always more or less fantastical Poèmes Symphoniques of Saint-Saëns. The opening, where the strong hero and demi-god finds himself at the parting of the ways, has beauty and considerable nobility, but the dance music, which represents the seductions of the senses, sounds rather cheap and common-place. Charms of instrumental coloring it has, of course. In all these pieces the execution on the part of Mr. Listemann's orchestra was characterized by precision, spirit, and good taste.

Mr. George L. Osgood was in his best voice and sang several tenor airs from Handel's L'Allegro in a most artistic style, with true feeling and expression. The Siciliana, especially, could not be dismissed without a repetition, which both song and singer thoroughly deserved. The orchestra, too (with the Robert Franz parts), afforded him a delicate and sympathetic accompaniment. Perhaps the ideal singer of Schubert's wonderful Er-King—a song written in an hour—has never yet been found; but Mr. Osgood's interpretation, with List's orchestral expansion of the accompaniment, gave a fresh charm to the almost too familiar work. Being encored with enthusiasm, he sang Schubert's Serenade very sweetly, also with orchestral accompaniment, but not so happily constructed; too much flute warbling lent a sentimental sweetness to its chaste and simple harmony.

MR. ERNST PERABO, during the past fortnight, has made his réentrée to the concert room, after spending a good part of a year among his beloved masters in his dear old Leipzig, and keeping quiet during the few months since his return on account of feeble health. Feeling himself strong again he has given three Matinées in Wesleyan Hall, showing all his old feeling and enthusiasm, and even more of finish and refinement in the large part he took in the execution of the following programmes:—

I. JAN. 30.

Partita I. in B-flat major Bach.
a. Prelude. b. Allemande. c. Corrente. d. Sarabande. e. Menuet I. et II. f. Gigue.
Concerto for the Violin, op. 141, G. minor . C. Reinecke.

d. Etude in A major, op. 9, No. 3 E. Perabo.
First time.
Sonata for Piano and Cello, op. 69, A major . Beethoven.
a. Allegro, ma non tanto. b. Scherzo, Allegro molto. c. Adagio cantabile. d. Allegro vivace.

Mr. Perabo shows a certain heroism, even martyrdom, in his selections; that is, he thinks less of what may prove popular than of what commends itself to his own taste as good. Else he would hardly have chosen that long and colorless Bach Partita in B-flat for a beginning. That such things reward the study of an earnest musician, there can be little doubt; but outside of the closet they seldom make their mark. We do not mean to say that it is so with all the Partitas. The artist's rendering was singularly smooth, refined, and delicate; he played as if it were all poetry to him, at any rate. We find it rather hard to become much interested in a Violin Concerto, especially a new one, without the orchestral accompaniment which makes it a Concerto. Reinecke's work contains good ideas, cleverly worked out in the approved style, though it did not strike us as particularly original. Mr. Listemann, of course, played it finely, and Mr. Perabo's piano accompaniment was all that that could be. The group of smaller piano-forte pieces was well chosen; they were all interesting gems, in fact, and charmingly interpreted, especially the Schubert things. It was a rare treat to listen once more to that bright and genial Sonata Duo of Beethoven.

To our great regret we lost the second Matinée, first on account of the storm, and again through other engagements when it was repeated. Truly it was a loss not to hear that excellent pianist, Mr. Perry, play the Chopin Sonata; as well as Mr. Perabo's own compositions, of which we have heard good things said, and the violoncello pieces played by Mr. Wulf Fries.

In the third concert we were much interested in the graceful prelude and toccata by Vincenz Lachner, not his more celebrated brother Franz, the Munich Lachner. Mr. Listemann was hardly at his best in the movements from Max Bruch's concerto; plenty of execution, but tone not altogether smooth. The Trio by Scharwenka is a work which we must hear again in order to appreciate it; the atmosphere of the room (which seems to combine many obstacles to hearing music), or some fault in the subjective conditions, rendered it ein Bißchen langweilig to us. It was of course well played by Perabo, Listemann, and Wulf Fries. The two smaller solos by the same composer we found charming; and they were placed in a congenial group. Mr. Perabo's A major Etude was most favorably received. That the Beethoven Sonata with 'cello was keenly relished may pass without saying.

The audiences have been large, and many will be glad to know that Mr. Perabo will soon give two more Matinées (16th and 14th of this month), besides an evening concert (March 8).

MME. LUISA CAPPIANI's second concert with a number of her advanced vocal pupils, drew a large and interested audience to Mechanics' Hall on Wednesday evening, Feb. 4. The concert was opened by the blind pianist, Mr. E. B. Perry, with three Schumann pieces ("Aufschwung," "Nachtsück" and "Traumswirren"), very nicely and poetically rendered. He also, later, played the difficult Fantasie Impromptu of Chopin in a very satisfactory manner, and two compositions by Perabo. Mme. Cappiani herself sang a rather sentimental Scena e Canto di "Lolores," by Manzocchi, in good voice and artistic style. The first pupil who appeared, Mrs. T. B. Buxton, of St. John, N. B., showed excellent results of training, in her facile, fluent, graceful execution of a recitative and aria from Verdi's Attila. Miss Ida Kleber, of Pittsburg, Pa., who has a light and pleasing high soprano voice, revealed at ease in all the florid passages of a "Jewel Aria" by Pacini. Miss Emma Dearborn, of Worcester, though hardly so much at ease before an audience, showed sterling qualities of voice, style, and expression in the Aria from I Puritani. Up to this point we endured the wintry, breezy temperature of the hall, but deemed it safer to withdraw, so that we can only give the programme of Part II.

Aria "Parto." Titus Mozart.
(Mrs. T. B. Buxton.)
Song. The Angel at the Window B. Towns.
(Dr. Albion M. Dudley.)
(a.) O happy, happy little Birds. Robert Franz.
(b.) Widmung.
(c.) Expectation.
(Mme. Luisa Cappiani.)
(a.) Pensée Fugitive. Perabo.
(b.) Etude de Concert.
(Mr. Edward B. Perry.)

Tortorella Valse Arditi.
(Miss Ida Kleber.)
Quartet. Ecco quel fiero istante Costa.
(Mrs. Burton, Mme. Cappiani, Mr. J. M. Neal, and Mr. Charles Ross).

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, FEB. 9. — Since my last letter quietness — comparatively speaking — has reigned in musical matters: that is to say, none of the larger and more important concerts have taken place. On Tuesday, Jan. 27, the N. Y. Quintet Club gave a soirée in Steinway Hall, with a programme entirely composed of Beethoven's works. A very excellent and attentive audience enjoyed this programme, and the performance was, in most respects, a satisfactory one.

On Saturday evening, Jan. 31, an audience of perhaps 2000 persons assembled in Steinway Hall for the purpose of hearing a so-called "Sullivan Ballad Concert." The programme was made up of selections from Mr. S.'s ballads, which were sung with more or less effect by different vocalists. It is unnecessary to mention any one especially except Miss Winant, who sang, as one of her solos, "The Lost Chord;" her noble voice was never heard to better advantage than upon this occasion, although her efforts were sadly marred by the dense ignorance and want of taste on the part of her accompanist, who indeed distinguished himself — during the entire evening — as utterly incompetent, and as a hopeless stumbler and blunderer. Miss W. received an encore in each part of the programme, and, in response to the second, sang a new setting of "My love is like a red, red rose," by Mr. C. F. Daniels of this city. Miss W. did justice to the author's purpose and intention, but the fullness and extent of the latter will never be known because of the manner in which the accompaniment was slaughtered.

There were two piano solos played in a nervous and jerky manner, and an unaccompanied vocal quartet, over which it is well to draw the charitable (and sadly needed) veil of oblivion; what can be expected if the soprano will insist upon singing nearly a semi-tone sharp, and the basso is as firmly resolved to take the opposite extreme?

I have dwelt at some length upon this concert for the reason that it was certainly a most curious affair; it must have been a great pecuniary success, and from the frequency and heartiness of the applause (everybody received a recall) I should say that the manager, or managers, had exactly succeeded in hitting the taste of our so-called musical public.

On Tuesday evening, Feb. 3, the N. Y. Philharmonic Club gave the fourth concert of its series at Chickering Hall. Here is the programme: —

a. Evening Rest Kretschmer.
b. Allegretto con moto Krug.
c. Turkish March Beethoven.
F. F. Quintet, A. minor, Op. 14 Saint-Saëns.
Mr. Mills and N. Y. P. Club.

A stormy night was the order of things, as it has so frequently been on Tuesday evenings since December 1, and on that account a small audience of faithful ones assembled in Chickering Hall to hear as admirable a performance as the club has furnished us with during the entire season. The three shorter selections were given with a delicacy and finish that merited and received the hearty and spontaneous recognition of the auditors. The Quintet is a very interesting work, if not a beautiful one, and might have been quite effective if Mr. S. B. Mills could have diverted himself of his unfortunate habit of spreading all his octaves and full chords in utter defiance of the composer's intentions. He is also addicted to the glaring error of playing fortissimo when the score is marked double piano. It is difficult to understand how Mr. Mills reconciles such incongruities.

On Thursday evening we had another evening of English Glee, which was, perhaps, less satisfactory than were its predecessors; at least two of the vocalists were entirely out of trim, and were therefore not so excellent as they almost invariably are. Miss Bebe gave us a "Cradle Song to a Sick Child," both the words and music of which were composed by one of our resident organists and composers. The composition is really a very beautiful one, although there is in one sense a certain absurdity in a careful mother singing to a sick infant with her own voice pitched on high A or B flat; still this is a blemish merely, and the song is really a charming one.

On Saturday evening Dr. Damrosch's Oratorio Society gave the Creation with but moderate artistic success. The only one of the soloists who was really excellent was, indisputably, your Boston basso, Mr. Whitney; he is always admirable.

Our well known American pianiste, Mme. Rivé-King, has been meeting with great artistic success. She played at the Peabody Concerts in Baltimore, Jan. 30 and 31; at the Concerts of the Mendelssohn Society in Montreal, Feb. 5 and 6, and is to play in Washington Feb. 17, to say nothing of her engagement for the Harvard Symphony Concerts in your city at a later date.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., JAN. 24, 1880. — The following was the programme of the 268th concert of the Musical Society given Jan. 20: — (1.) Overture, "Fingal's Cave" Felix Mendelssohn.

(2.) Two songs for Baritone R. Schumann.
(Mr. Eugene Luening.)
(3.) Romance: "To Spring" G. A. Schanz.
(Horn Solo by G. A. Schanz.)
(4.) German Dances Frans Schubert.
For Maennerchor and Orchestra, arranged by R. Heuberger.
(5.) Symphony No. 7. (A major) Beethoven.

The orchestra, owing to a disagreement between Conductor Bieh and the management of the Society, was made up entirely of men outside of Bieh's orchestra; it included the Heine family, Professor Troll, Conductor Clauser and some of his men, with nine picked players from Chicago, — thirty-six in all. Their playing showed the lack of finish and refinement inseparable from the bringing together of so many players unaccustomed to playing together; but they played with great fire and spirit, and gave evidence of vigorous rehearsals. Mr. Luening took the allegretto of the symphony too fast, as it seemed to me, and so injured the contrast intended between this movement and what precedes and follows it.

The male chorus sang admirably in all parts, the tenors having improved in quality of tone since the last concert. Mr. Luening played a piano accompaniment, omitting the orchestra because the chorus and orchestra went badly together in rehearsal. He also played the accompaniments for his own singing, or rather declamations, for that more nearly describes his rendering of the Schumann songs. Considered as such it was admirable; he has a full, quite strong voice, and an excellent delivery of the words, but his voice lacks singing quality.

Mr. Schanz is a very excellent horn-player, but his solo was hardly in place on this programme. In fact, the same may be said of the Schumann songs, as admirable as they are for recitals or for private performances.

But the blemishes, both of the programme and of its performance, were slight as compared with its merits, and the old society may be proud of another successful concert.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

HERR JOSEFF, the pianist, twice announced by Mr. Peck for three concerts in the Music Hall, with the Philharmonic Orchestra (the second time for this week) has again been compelled to cancel the engagement for the present, the injury to his thumb being not yet sufficiently healed. This is a great disappointment to the many hundreds who had secured tickets for the series; but it is presumed that it will only amount to another postponement for a short time of the promised pleasure. The Advertiser of Wednesday states: His injured finger is well to all appearances; but it causes him pain, and he is unable to touch the key-board. His physician consulted with two others, and it was not thought that the sensitiveness would last so long. Herr Joseff was to have had a rehearsal in Boston yesterday, and even went on the piano-forte he was to play. Suddenly all further preparations were suspended in consequence of a telegraphic despatch to the above import. The dates of the postponed concerts will not now be announced until Herr Joseff is actually able to play. The recent announcement was in accordance with the physician's certificate that the artist would unquestionably be able to appear on the days named.

Herr Rummel, the distinguished pianist, met with a serious accident in Providence last Tuesday night. On his way to the railroad station he fell and broke his leg. It was his purpose soon to leave for Europe. There seems an epidemic among pianists: Joseff with his bad thumb, Sherwood with his sprained ankle, Petersen's lately recently recovered from inflammatory rheumatism, Pease's lam. thumb. Who will have the courage to be a pianist if it goes on in this way?

Mr. Edward Dannreuther, one of our best violinists, for three years past a member of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, writes us that he has resigned his membership (being weary of continual traveling) and intends to settle down in Boston, devoting himself to his studies and to teaching. Mr. Carl Meisel takes his place as second violinist in the Club. The Mendelssohns were to start on Tuesday last on a long concert tour westward, even visiting California.

The fifth Harvard Symphony Concert, of last Thursday, offered two important works, never before heard in America, namely, the Symphonic Fantastique ("Episode de la Vie d'un Artiste") by Berlioz, a piano-forte concerto by Louis Brassin, played by Miss Jessie Cochran. Besides these the programme included the romance "Sombre forêt," from William Tell, and songs by Grieg, sung by Miss Louise Homer; also the overture to Fidelio, — too late for review this week. The programmes for the remainder of the series have been partially announced as follows:

Sixth Concert, February 23. Fourth Symphony (B-flat) Beethoven; Overt (by all the strings), Mendelssohn. Mme. Julia Rivé-King will play the Piano Concerto in G minor, by Saint-Saëns. Miss May Bryant will sing a Scene from Max Bruch's "Olympus," and Songs.

Seventh Concert, March 11. Professor J. K. Paine's new ("Spring") Symphony. Mr. William H. Sherwood will play the G-major Concerto, Beethoven; and Grand Fantasia, Schumann. Overtures, etc.

Eighth (last) Concert, March 25. The great Schubert Symphony, in C. Mr. B. J. Lang will play (first time in America) a Concerto by Bronsart. Concertstück, for four horns, with orchestra, op. 81 (first time), Schumann. Overtures, etc.

The next University Concert, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place on Wednesday evening, February 27, instead of the 21st, as before announced. Mme. Rivé-King will play the same Concerto, by Saint-Saëns, in this and in the Harvard Concert of the following afternoon.

The Herald says: "It has been decided to postpone the season of English opera at the Globe Theatre by the Boston English Opera Society, under the direction of Mr. Charles R. Adams, until May, the labor of preparing for such a season making it necessary to take further time. The chorus has been hard at work, and may possibly appear in a sacred concert programme during the coming month."

Mr. Ansgara, the director of the Perkins Institution for the Blind, has recently received the following testimony in favor of the employment of blind tuners: —

NEW YORK, Jan. 9, 1880.

"Dear Sir: In answer to your letter of the 27th ult., we desire to inform you that one of our principal tuners is a blind man, named Armin Schotte."

"This gentleman tunes the concert grand pianos for the concert at Steinway Hall, etc., etc., which work is considered the highest achievement in the art of tuning. Mr. Schotte's tuning is simply perfect, not only for its purity, but in his skill of so setting the tuning-pins that the piano can endure the largest amount of heavy playing, without being put out of tune. Very respectfully yours,

"STEINWAY & SONS."

The seventieth birthday of Ole Bull was celebrated on the evening of Feb. 5 at his residence in Cambridge (Professor Lowell's house) in a most interesting and delightful manner, which gave great satisfaction to all the friends who assembled to offer their greetings. The party arranged by Mrs. Bull was a complete surprise to him. Among the guests were nearly all his warm personal friends. H. W. Longfellow and family, Mr. and Mrs. James T. Fields, Professor Horsford and family, Madame Hegerman Lindenkrona, wife of the Danish minister, Dr. Doremus and family, E. W. Stoughton, ex-minister to Russia, Mrs. G. M. Ticknor and daughter, Mr. Thomas Appleton, Miss Susan Hale, Mrs. Fay, Mrs. Maria S. Porter, Mrs. Bates, Mr. E. F. Waters of the Advertiser, and many others. The floral gifts were very beautiful, consisting of a violin formed of white flowers, the strings being of violets, and the screws of red roses. Two bottles of Tokay of the vintage of 1810 were sent by Professor Horsford. Mr. Longfellow, with an appropriate speech, poured this wine, in which the health of Ole Bull was drunk by all present with wishes for many returns of happy birthdays. A birthday cake was brought in at the close of the evening, which Ole Bull cut, stating that a gold violin was embedded there, and amid a good deal of fun Mrs. Professor Horsford was so fortunate as to find it in her slice. At different times during the evening Mr. Bull treated his guests to some of the very best gems of his repertoire. Madame Hegerman Lindenkrona sang in a most charming manner German, Norwegian, and Spanish songs. Miss Doremus gave some lively selections on the banjo, and in hilarity and best wishes to all a most delightful evening closed. — Transcript.

Utopia is the title of a musical club formed in Philadelphia. A central location has already been secured, on Girard Street above Eleventh, and about thirty active members enrolled; among these such well-known artists as Thomas A. Becket, Henry Bishop, Michael Cross, Harry Barnhurst, Wm. W. Gilchrist, A. G. Enerick, Henry G. Thunder, etc., and such educated amateurs and patrons of music as S. Decatur Smith, Wm. Foley, etc. The object is social intercourse between all music-loving people, artists, and amateurs, and to provide a sort of musical exchange in a central location.

HEGEL ON THE "CONTENT" (INHALT) OF MUSIC.

THE recent publication of Mr. Bryant's translation of the second part of Hegel's Aesthetik ("The Philosophy of Art") calls new attention to his treatment of art, and especially of music. The part of the work now translated does not touch the separate arts, except, incidentally, architecture, sculpture, and painting; it has to do merely with the division of art progress into three epochs: the Symbolical (wherein man seizes the ideal imperfectly, and seeks to give it expression by means of a symbol, a form having a natural relation to the principal part of the conception, thus giving rise to Oriental art and such half-way productions as the Sphinx, Memnon, etc.); the Classical (wherein the beautiful is conceived of as spiritual, though scarcely as living, but rather in eternal and unchangeable form, of which classical sculpture forms the principal example; the distinguishing traits of the classic being the more perfect conception of the beautiful, and the exact expression of it in the form); and the Romantic (in which spirit has recognized itself as spiritual and separate from form, and labors constantly to express in art the beauty of spirit; that is, the deeper and more internal qualities which come to outward realization only by means of collisions between opposing principles).

The nature of beauty, and the content (Inhalt) and scope of art in general, come in the first part of the Aesthetik. In defining the beautiful, Hegel seems to me not fortunate. He says that "beauty is only a particular utterance and representation of the True." The three chapters of this part of Hegel's work seem to be worth sifting by some competent person. They are on "The Conception [Begriff] of the Beautiful in General," "The Beautiful in Nature," and "The Art Beautiful, or the Ideal."

On the scope of art, Hegel is sufficiently broad and deep. He says, e. g., "It is the task and scope of art to bring to our conception and spiritual realization all that in our thought has a place in the human spirit; to awaken and to animate the slumbering feelings, desires, and passions of all kinds; to fill the heart, and awaken to consciousness every thing, developed and undeveloped, which human feelings [Gemüth] can carry, experience, and bring forth in their innermost and most secret hearts; whatever the human breast, in its manifold possibilities and sides, desires to move and excite; and especially whatever the spirit has in its thought and in the idea of the most essential and high, the glory of the honored, the eternal, and true,—through all these to reach the feelings and intuitions for the sake of enjoyment. Likewise unhappiness and misery, thus to make conceivable wickedness and criminality; to permit the human heart to share everything horrible and dreadful, as well as all joy and happiness; and fancy at last to indulge itself in vain sports of the imagination, as well as to run riot in the ensnaring magic of the sensuously entrancing contemplations and sensations." All this can be done with effect, he says, because the outer world becomes known to us only through sense-perception; so that whether our attention is taken by the outer reality itself, or only by a representation of it (as a picture, a drawing, or poetry), "by means of which a scene, or relation, or life content of any kind is brought to us," it produces the same effect upon our feelings, arousing within us the corresponding sensation and passion. But I must not linger on this part of the work.

In the third part of the Aesthetik Hegel speaks of the content and meaning of the different arts. He traces a suggestive progress in the relation of the material in each art to the content. Thus, architecture deals with matter in great masses, seized and controlled by spirit, which leaves on it the impress of its idea. But spirit does not dwell in the mass. In sculpture the mass of material is very much reduced, and the form chosen is the only one in which spirit, as yet, recognizes itself as dwelling. Yet the soul does not dwell within the statue; the marble figure in space is lifeless, dead; out of its sightless eyes no soul looks forth; but it represents the spiritual idea in its permanent or eternal phase,—the repose of the immortal gods. In painting the material is still further reduced, namely, to a mere appearance of substance. There is, to be sure, the oil, the paint, the canvas. But these we do not see or think of, only the landscapes, persons, and scenes here represented. As Bérnard phrases it,¹ "The true principle, the essential content, the centre of this art, is always the innermost life of the soul." "In the representations of nature, what constitutes the vital interest, the real sense, is the sentiment which beams through it, the reflex of the spirit, the soul of the artist which appears in his work, the image of his inmost thought, or a general echo of our impressions."

These three arts have this in common: that they deal with subjects conceived in terms of space, which endure permanently, or seem to do so, as objects distinct from and outside of ourselves. But "in tone [says Hegel] music forsakes the element of outward shape and its immediate visibility, and addresses itself to another subjective organ, the ear, which, like sight, belongs not to the practical, but to the theoretic, senses; and is indeed yet more ideal." Hence, "what is represented through music is the last subjective inwardness as such; it is the art of the soul [Gemüth], which addresses itself immediately to the soul. Painting, e. g., as we saw, may likewise give expression in physiognomy and shape to the inner life and energy, the determinations and passions of the heart, the situations, conflicts, and fate of the soul; but what we have always before us in painting are objective appearances, from which the observing I, as inner self, remains entirely separate. One may ever so completely absorb and sink himself in the subject, the situation, the character, the form, of a statue or painting; may admire the art work and come out of himself towards it; nay, may completely fill himself therewith,—it matters not! These works of art are and remain independent objects, in review of which we come not beyond the position of an observer. But in music this difference (between the observer and the work) vanishes. Its content is an independent subjectivity, and the utterance brings it not to a permanent objectivity in space, but through its ephemeral vibrations denotes that it is a communicator, which, instead of having a duration of its own, is drawn from the inner and subjective, and exists outwardly only for the expression of the subjective inner. The tone is indeed a form of utterance and an externality; but an utterance which, directly that the externality is, makes itself disappear again. Scarcely has the ear seized it than it is gone; the impression which takes its place immediately inwardizes itself; the tone sounds only in the depths of the soul, which is seized in its ideal subjectivity and set in motion."

The general content of music is emotionality as such. "It extends itself in every direction for the expression of all distinct sensations and shades of joyousness, serenity, jokes, humor, shoutings, and rejoicings of soul, as well as the gradations of anguish, sorrow, grief, lamentation, distress, pain, regret, etc.; and, finally, aspiration, worship, love, etc., belong to the proper sphere of musical expression." "Music builds up no permanently enduring structure in space; it has, indeed, no permanent existence, but whenever it would speak to us must, as it were, be recreated anew. Yet in its very nature as tone, and through the power of its motion in time, it pierces immediately into the inner of all motion, the soul." "Even if music lacks for us a deeper content, or a more soulful expression, even then we delight ourselves simply in the sensuous klang and the well sounding; or with an examination of the melodic and harmonic contents as such. Yet, on the other hand, if we refrain from this kind of technical examination of it, and abandon ourselves to the musical art work, it absorbs us completely in itself, and carries us forth with itself, quite otherwise than with the might which art, as art in general, exercises over us. The peculiar power of music is an elementary force; i. e., it lies in the element of tones, in which here the art moves. Consequently, in conspicuously easily-moving rhythm, we delight to strike with the measure, to sing with the melody, and in dance music it comes into the very bones."

This results, he says, from "the connection of the subjective inner with time as such. The I is in the time, and the time is the being of the subjective inner itself. Because, now, time and not space furnishes the essential element, in respect to which tone acquires its musical value, and the time of the tone is likewise that of the subject, so penetrates the tone immediately, by right of its very foundation, into the self; fastens there its simple design, sets the I in motion through the time motion and rhythm, while the other kinds of figuration (melody, harmony, etc.) serve as a determinate filling up of the subject."

There is much more in this great work equally well worthy of citation, and equally noticeable for depth of insight and picturesque and graphic expression. I have not been able to find elsewhere so clear an idea of the place and function of music; and this is the more to be wondered at because Hegel wrote rather in a spirit of prophecy than in view of actual achievement. He was born in 1770, the same year as Beethoven, and I suppose the Aesthetik was written somewhere about 1812, that is, about the time when Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was only four years old, having been played two or three times in Vienna, and the sixth, seventh and eighth quite new. Nothing of Schubert's work was known at that time. Bach was a sealed book, except the "Clavier" and a few of the organ fugues. Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Schumann were children in pinafores.

That Hegel should have perceived the vital importance of the time element in music lends confirmation to my suspicion that the artistic value of rhythm was better understood then than since, especially in its relation to sustained musical discourse.

On other points he is not so complete. The romantic nature of music, its inherent suitability as the voice of love, hope, joy, and worship, he seems to have felt in himself, as well as by means of his logic. But in the detailed discussion of its means of expression, he betrays the hand of the tyro, as well as the fact that he wrote before the real force of music was understood. Vischer's Aesthetik I have never seen. If now some benevolent student would inform us wherein, if at all, he advances beyond Hegel, I have no doubt it would be a favor to many, as well as to

RUSSIAN FOLK-SONGS.

DEAR PŪNĀMU!²—When the poet Bodenstein spoke of Russian art and folk poetry, in the lecture to which I alluded in my former letter, he did not give any of his own translations of these; and many persons, unacquainted, like myself, with his famous renderings of them into German, regretted it. He made a passing reference to Russian folk-songs, however, and observed that their general character was "sad and feminine."

It is impossible for us to ascertain with certainty how many of these anonymous poems and melodies were actually composed or written by women; yet there can be no doubt that the influence of woman—inspiring or depressing acknowledged or occult—is the strongest influence that impresses itself on works of art, even on folk-songs, which I may term irresponsible or unconscious works of art. Looked at in the mirror of Russian prose, down to the latest Nihilistic news, Russian women, at least of the middle class, appear to suffer more than Russian men from the present unsettled state of that empire; and the lower class of women must have suffered more, physically and morally, than men, from the degradation of serfdom in the past. Yet every Russian peasant, with mind and heart enough to create a folk-song, must have endured double slavery in his mother's, wife's, daughter's sadness and servitude.

It is also rather admired by the European settlers. Te Pŭnāmu is the journalistic nom de plume of an Anglo-Maori gentleman, to whom the above letter is addressed.

"The woman's cause is man's; they rise or sink
Together, dwarfed or god-like, bond or free;
If she be small, slight-natured, miserable,
How shall man grow?"

Russian folk-poetry is more continuously and monotonously melancholy than that of most folk-songs. Seldom does it rise above earthly care on the wings of supernatural aspiration, or ring with the glowing trumpet-tones of patriotic ardor. Seldom does the Russian sing with careless simplicity of joy or love, or for pure delight in beauty. The serenades are nearly all sad; the lover does not sing to waken his love, but to lull her to sleep, and "to dream of a sweeter future, after the cares of the bitter day." Some of the marriage-songs, and those of callings and occupations, too often remind me of Gogol's satirically sombre sketches, or of the mercilessly, morally realistic scenes in some of Turgenev's novels. The songs of monks and nuns are among the finest; yet these are filled with longings for death, regrets for shipwrecked hopes and lost illusions, echoes of the storms of nature in the repressed cries of the heart. The monk, seeing a bridal train, murmurs, "Alas, again I must pray!" and re-enters the cloister; the nun, praying for the recovery of another woman's spouse, at her request, sighs to think that he was once her own false lover. Here is the complaint of one who has mistaken her vocation:—

"What will end the bitter sorrow,
Wounded heart, that tortures thee?
Courage, hope, whence can I borrow?
Death, despair, alone I see!
Here I wither, here I perish,
Like a flower in polar night,
Where I thought to warm and cherish
Heart and soul in love and light.
From the world I fled, believing
Duty's call my life had crowned;
Longing, praying, hoping, grieving,
Heaven I sought, but hell I found!
Found but falsehood, fraud, and folly,
Envy, hatred, base deceit;
And the bridge has vanished, wholly,
That once heavenward wooed my feet!"

Some of the most deeply despairing of these cloister-songs were written by the monk Innokentij. Perhaps the key to that despair may be found in this song of his,—

"The ice breaks up, the rivers rise,
Along the shore free Moskos flies,
In foaming rage wild gushing,
Swift rushing!
Heaven, in this mad, tumultuous hour,
Curb Moskos's dread, destructive power!
Restrain the flood, strong swirling,
Wide whirling!
Let not the pitiless waters gnaw,
And down to hungry darkness draw
Yon churchyard by the river,
Forever!
There, long, long years ago, they laid
The best, the sweetest village maid.
Heart, when will cease thy aching,
Slow breaking?"

One of the so-called "heroic" songs tells us of the seven sons and seven daughters, each of whom becomes an idiot "through the Almighty will, through love and marriage," as it is—seriously or ironically?—said. Another sings of the hero, that his deeds "filled the heart of his mother with anguish;" another hero asks no one, not even Maria herself, whether he may woo her, but he carries her off "the moment he saw he loved her." In the two following songs we find pathetic suggestions of peasant-girl life:—

I.

"Spake the bogar: 'Fairnest maiden,
Small reward is thine for spinning!'
Thought he: 'Once within my dwelling,
Easy task would be thy winning!'
Spake the bogar: 'Best beloved one,
Let me press thy fingers lightly!'
Thought he: 'When the hand is granted,
Then the heart will follow, rightly.'
Spake the bogar: 'Ah, thou knowest not
How one kins a lover bleases!'
Thought he: 'If she grants me kisses,
She will next permit caresses.'
Spake the bogar: 'Here I pledge thee
Love and truth, eternal duty!'
Thought he: 'None the less, to-morrow,
'Will I woo another beauty!'"

II.

"From his couch the bogar brave at morn arises,
Buckles guns and bags and spears about him lightly;
Goes a-hunting; boar and deer must be his prizes.
On his way he whistles; loud the tune, and sprightly.
From her couch the peasant girl outglides at morning,
Takes her distaff, broken flax about it clinging;
Slowly, softly, towards the little cottage turning,
Low she hums a song, and softly weeps while singing."

Here is a short love-song, with something almost of a morbid "modern society" tone about it; yet it was written by a peasant whose name has been preserved:—

"Alas, my heart, my wounded heart,
How near art thou to breaking?
I feign a part, a jester's part,
Therein no pleasure taking.
Alas to bliss that is not bliss,
My life is wholly given;
Against each kiss, yea, every kiss
I yield, my will has striven.
Why seek from me sweet love? From me
So wild, so melancholy?
Your aim I see, smile when I see,
Then weep, and mock my folly!"

Russians are said to be generally very light-hearted in manner, while the position of their women is said to be now legally superior to that of the women of other nations. Then why the sadness of their national poetry, the gloomy pictures of their greatest living novelist, the discontent of their present politico-social position? It is true that in a collection of national melodies, recently published in St. Petersburg, I find only about two fifths absolutely sad in character; the rest are of cheerful tone, many of them dance-songs. Hummel, sixty years ago or more, discovered a sufficient number of gay wedding-songs to make a very cheerful epithalamium, which he did in his "Polymelos," an arrangement, for voices and orchestra, of Russian folk-songs, dedicated to the queen-mother, Maria Fedorowna. This publication is so rare, and so little known, that I copy for you, as a curiosity, the first, and the only, melancholy air among those he adopted. It closes oddly on the dominant.

Here is one of the prettiest spring-songs I can find in an old and scarce collection. And yet the minor mode prevails in it:—

And take this song of happy love; yet even its character is also "sad and feminine!"

But if the greater number of Russian folk-melodies are of a resigned and cheerful, rather than of a melancholy, character, — though possessing the gravity of the old Greek modes, while the words set to them are so very often sad, — this apparent contradiction may be explained by the supposition, that in his poem the maker of the folk-song relates the realities of feeling, or experience, while with his melody he strives to console, to lull, or to cheer his own sense of these sad realities. This may be the reason, also, why so many of these major airs close suddenly in minor, as though hope and courage failed at once in spite of an effort to bear grief with a gay spirit. Let me also translate for you a few extracts from some communications on this subject, written by a traveler in Russia, nearly eighty years ago: —

"The Russian people are, above all things, musical.¹ The peasant, the artisan, lightens his labor by singing a folk-song. If the hardship or the monotony of toil they are forced to undertake is distasteful to them, they sing away their dislike of it. Observe the postilion, for instance. In rain or snow, as in sunshine, he travels thousands of wersts towards the borders of India, or in the direction of the North Pole: like a cloak, his songs enable him to defy the weather. At night he keeps himself awake with singing, but first politely asks the traveler: 'Little father, shall I sing you something pretty?' And if his request is not refused, he continues his traveling songs until he reaches the station. If the traveler cannot sleep while this singing continues, he begs the postilion to be silent, and the concert is at an end; but after having traveled much in Russia, one becomes so accustomed to singing, that one can scarcely sleep without it; and, besides, one is comforted by the reflection that singing postilions do not sleep.

"During the change of horses, or after he has received his douceur, he hastes to some singing society 'to practice his voice a little;' there I have often found a large company of men, a great-grandfather humming through his long, silver-white beard, and grandfathers, fathers, and sons singing together, the boys imitating the tones, expressions, and gestures of their elders, in folk-songs and romances, whose adventurous subjects, and their melodies, betray their age, or else chanting love-songs not less antique. . . . The wedding-songs sung by women are unique of their kind; melodies on three or four high tones spoken rather than sung. What do you say to their odd custom of singing to the bride for twenty-four hours before the ceremony about the cares and duties of a wife? More necessary, generally, you will reply, in the bridegroom's case than in the bride's; but his attendants sing to him a similar lengthy sermon. Charmant, n'est-ce pas? . . .

"When, for the first time, I heard and saw a widow declaiming her woe beside her husband's coffin, as is the custom here, I was deeply moved and surprised. Touched, — for what heart could withstand the influence of such a scene? Astonished, — for who could have expected such thrilling powers of expression in an uncultivated Russian peasant woman? How far behind this fell the most truthfully simulated theatrical sorrow, sung or recited by prima donna or first tragédienne? I doubt whether stage art could ever reach the height of tragic despair, the shuddering, stormy passion, the tender complaint of this Russian peasant's song. What a pity that the custom has not been adopted in European society! Fancy the effect on her masculine listeners, of such a lament, intoned by a handsome modern widow, especially if she heightened her singing by her own guitar accompaniment, and adopted some of Lady Hamilton's elegant and picturesque attitudes! . . . During my residence in Moscow, I took a walk through the city, and happened to pass the government house while recruiting from among the young tradesmen and peasants was going on. A crowd of persons stood at the door, whence I heard a lament intoned. A well-formed peasant girl stood in the midst of the crowd; she had just heard that her bridegroom had been selected as a recruit, and she declaimed her grief with streaming eyes, often striking her head against the wall. As he was led past to swear his affidavit in the cathedral, she looked towards him, and fell to the ground in a swoon."

I believe that we can better understand the character of a people from their folk-songs, than from their laws, customs, dress, or their merely spoken language. The folk-song is a more intimate and certain guide, and the historian who has not studied this, only half understands the people he writes about, even if he be thoroughly familiar with their language. There are few English-speaking people who, when the word "Cossack" is mentioned, do not at once associate it with the idea of a cruel, half-savage northern bandit; yet the inhabitants of the Ukraine are the most musical in the Russian empire, and few folk-songs breathe softer and more tender feeling than some of those of the Ukraine; while through some others free airs from the immense and sonorous steppe, laden with the perfume of wild flowers and aromatic herbs, seem wafted. I will give you a prose translation of one: "Alas! the young shepherd is slain! He prays that they will bury him in his pasture, behind the fold, where in his sleep he may perhaps still hear the voices of his faithful dogs. Then he begs his soft little flute of beech-wood, his sad little flute of bone, his fiery little flute of elder-wood, not to tell the sheep that their master has been murdered, lest they should die, mourning for him with tears of blood. But let them say that he is now wedded to a proud queen, the adored mistress of all noble men, Liberty! At the wedding, the sun and moon carried the crown; the oaks and pines were witnesses; the high mountains were the priests; the birds, by thousands, the musicians; and the stars bore the torches."

Here is another, which, not so much, perhaps, for its superior beauty, as because it appeals more to womanly fancies, I long ago took the trouble of translating. Yet I will confess that this is a free translation, and that two or three of the verses did not entirely originate in the Ukraine!

Ah, why, my silken hair,
So richly flow thy tresses fine and fair,
If not, in their waves, flower-wreaths and gems to wear?
Ah, why, my slender feet,
So proudly arched, so strong and light and fleet,
If not in the dance a bounding rhythm to beat?
Ah, why, my lips, your bloom,
Smiles, kisses, sighs, and jests, and health's perfume,
If not with your spells to banish evil gloom?
Ah, why, my sparkling eye,
With morning sun and midnight shadow vie,
If not on another, magnet power to try?
Ah, why, my busy hand,
So pink thy palm, thy touch so light and bland,
If not in some life to weave joy's gay garland?
Ah, why, my rounded arm,
So satin smooth, so lithe, so rosy warm,
If not in some fate to wind Fate's chiefest charm?
Ah, why, my thrilling voice,
So passionate or tender, at thy choice,
If not with thy songs to bid some soul rejoice?
Ah, why, my happy spirit,
So fountain-freshly flow thy fancies bright,
If not his delight to wake with thy delight?
Ah, why, my heart, thy glow
Of Etna-fire beneath a veil of snow,
If not for one heart to burn through bliss and woe?

I have now before me a singular representation, — a reproduction, from a picture by Josef Brandt, in the Königsberg Museum, of the figure of a Cossack of the Ukraine in the seventeenth century, armed and mounted, and apparently on the point of combat. Rough and unkempt are steed and rider; arms and accoutrements primitive and worn; the contour of the man's head is essentially combative, his hands and arms are enlarged by labor, yet wasted by privation. But in his formless cap he wears a flowering spray; and, as he rides, he carelessly plays a tasseled bandura, — an instrument somewhat similar to the antique lute, and used in the Ukraine; — he seems to sing through his wind-blown beard, while tenderness and regret speak from his dreaming eyes, that gaze beyond a limitless horizon, seeing nothing save some happy or unhappy past; not the battle before, not the birds of prey that slowly follow him! And the eye of the large-jointed animal that carries him also expresses patience and fidelity. This rough soldier is surely, at this moment, recalling an old folk-song, or inventing a new one; and certainly its character is, or will be, that of most Russian folk-poetry and music, "sad and feminine," yet stamped with a brave, or, at least, a melancholy resignation to the decrees of Providence. Yours faithfully,

F. R. R.

[From Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians.]

THE following is a catalogue of Liszt's works, as complete as it has been possible to make it. It is compiled from the recent edition of the thematic catalogue (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 14,373); published lists, and other available sources.

I. ORCHESTRAL WORKS.

1. ORIGINAL.

1. Symphonie zu Dante's Divina Commedia, orch. and female chorus; ded. to Wagner. 1. Inferno; 2. Purgatorio; 3. Magnificat. Score and parts. B. & H.² Arr. for 2 P. Fs.
2. Eine Faust-Symphonie in drei Charakterbildern (nach Goethe), orch. and male chorus; ded. to Berlioz. 1. Faust; 2. Gretchen (also for P. F. 2 hands); 3. Mephistopheles. Score and parts; also for 2 P. Fs. Schuberth.
3. Zwei Episoden aus Lenau's Faust. 1. Der nächtliche Zug. 2. Der Tanz in Der Dorfchenke (Mephisto-Walzer). Score and parts; also for P. F. 2 and 4 hands. Schuberth.
4. Symphonische Dichtungen. 1. Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne; 2. Tasso. Lamento e Trionfo; 3. Les Préludes; 4. Orpheus (also for organ); 5. Prometheus; 6. Mazeppa; 7. Festklänge; 8. Héroïde funèbre; 9. Hungaria; 10. Hamlet; 11. Hunenschlacht; 12. Die Ideale. Score and parts; also for 2 P. Fs. and P. F. 4 hands. B. & H.

² B. & H. — Breitkopf & Härtel.

5. Fest-Vorspiel, for Schiller and Goethe Festival, Weimar, 1857. Score, Hallweger.
6. Fest-Marsch, for Goethe's birthday. Score and parts, also for P. F. 2 and 4 hands. Schubert.
7. Huldigungs-Marsch, for accession of Duke Carl of Saxe-Weimar, 1853. Score; and for P. F. 2 hands. B. & H.
8. "Vom-Fels zum Meer": Patriotic march. Score and parts; also for P. F. 2 hands. Schlesinger.
9. Künstler Fest-Zug; for Schiller Festival, 1856. Score; and for P. F. 2 and 4 hands. Kahnt.
10. "Gaudeamus Igitur": Humoreske for orch. soli and chorus. Score and parts; also for P. F. 2 and 4 hands. Schubert.

2. ARRANGEMENTS.

11. Schubert's Marches. 1. Op. 40 No. 3; 2. Traser; 3. Reiter; 4. Ungarischer-Marsch; Scores and parts. Fürstner.
12. Schubert's Songs for voice and small orch. 1. Die junge Nonne; 2. Gretchen am Spinnrade; 3. Lied der Mignon; 4. Erlkönig. Score and parts. Forberg.

18. Rakoczy-Marsch; symphonisch bearbeitet. Score and parts; also for P. F. 2, 4, and 8 hands. Schubert.
19. Ungarischer Sturm-Marsch. New arr. 1876. Score and parts; also for P. F. 2 and 4 hands. Schlesinger.
20. "Sócsat" und "Hymnus" by Béni and Erkel. Score and parts; also for P. F. Rómavölgyi, Pesth.

II. FOR PIANOFORTE AND ORCHESTRA.

1. ORIGINAL.

21. Concerto No. 1, E-flat score and parts; also for 2 P. Fs. Schlesinger.
22. Concerto No. 2, in A. Score and parts; also for 2 P. Fs. Schott.
23. "Todten-Tanz." Paraphrase on "Dies Ira." Score; also for 1 and 2 P. Fs. Siegel.

2. ARRANGEMENTS, P. F. PRINCIPALE.

24. Fantasia on themes from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens." Score; also for P. F. 2 and 4 hands, and 2 P. Fs. Siegel.
25. Fantasia über ungarische Volks-melodien. Score and parts. Heins.
26. Schubert's Fantasia in C (Op. 15), symphonisch bearbeitet. Score and parts; also for 2 P. Fs. Schreiber.
27. Weber's Polonaise (Op. 73). Score and parts. Schlesinger.

(Conclusion in next number.)

BERLIOZ'S "THE DAMNATION OF FAUST."

(From the New York Tribune, Feb. 15.)

DR. DAMROSCH accomplished last night an undertaking of extraordinary distinction. He produced for the first time in America "The Damnation of Faust," one of the most characteristic, if not the most colossal, of the greater works of Hector Berlioz; and the performance was witnessed, with the liveliest interest and with many manifestations of delight, by an audience which filled Steinway Hall to overflowing. . . .

Berlioz had very little comprehension of Goethe, and when he undertook to make a libretto for his "dramatic legend" out of fragments of "Faust," he showed his lack of sympathy with the original, not only by his deviations from the poem but by his selections from it. This, however, is not a grave fault. He did not try to follow Goethe; he pleads, with perfect justice, that he was not obliged to; and "The Damnation of Faust" ought to be judged by its intrinsic qualities, without reference to the poet's ideal. We must take it as a series of splendid scenes, chosen for their picturesque effects and strong contrasts, rather than with any consistent dramatic purpose. They are joined together with such extraordinary art that every number seems to flow naturally and easily into the next, and yet the separate movements, — the reveries and aspirations of Faust, the rustic song and dance, the gorgeous march, the Easter Hymn, the bacchanalian revels, with the burlesque fugue, the wonderful slumber song, the ballad and plaint of Margaret, the fairy music, the superb love duet, the ride to hell, the chorus of angels, are wholly independent. Indeed, so far was the composer from aiming at the development of a clear poetic idea that he boldly carried Faust into Hungary for the sake of introducing his arrangement of the Hungarian Rakoczy March, because it had proved very "effective" in the concert-room; and not content with using it once he employed the same theme again, somewhat disguised, in an incantation scene where it has no dramatic reason. In this passage, where Mephistopheles calls up the will-o'-the-wisps to "charm the maid with baneful lights," Berlioz caused the devil to sing in Hungarian — a direction which was not observed last night. Little as the Rakoczy theme has to do with Faust the effect, both of the March and of the infernal Minuet, is unquestionably good in this glowing series of tone-pictures. We cannot say the same of the Song of the Rat and the Song of the Flea, with their grotesque imitations by the orchestra; nor for the horrors of the final pandemonium. These numbers illustrate the besetting sin of Berlioz, which was bad taste. Like certain passages of the "Fantastic Symphony," they recall that dreadful chapter of his autobiography, which describes the burial of the second wife. He was miserable and unfaithful in both his marriages; and when he tells of the removal of the body of the first unhappy woman to the side of the second, he takes us into the charnel-house with him, and tears open the coffin, and compels us to look on while the fair Ophelia is carried away in pieces, — not forgetting meanwhile to observe the agony of M. Berlioz, who is truly a person of sensibility.

But whatever may be the faults of his method of dramatic composition, — the tempestuous passion which left him only broken moments of repose, the tendency to exaggeration which hurried him far beyond the proper boundaries of romance, — nobody can deny to Berlioz an immense force and grandeur, of which the "The Damnation of Faust" furnishes an impressive example. Heine compared Berlioz to "a colossal nightingale." His music reminded the poet of gigantic forms of extinct antediluvian animals, fabulous empires filled with fabulous sins, the hanging gardens of Babylon, the stupendous temples of Nineveh. Mystery, magnificence, and awful magnitude are here; and we recognize all the characteristics which Berlioz himself called the dominant qualities of his music, — passionate expression, internal fire, rhythmic animation, and unexpected changes. His melodies are not fluent and spontaneous, but they are full of intense meaning; his rhythms are startling and irresistible; his skill in the indication of fine shades of expression is exquisite. His surprising and delicious combinations of instruments of different qualities show a keen sense for the color of tones analogous to the delicate ear which certain poets possess for fascinating rhymes and the musical collocation of words. This gift distinguishes his treatment of the voice as well as of the orchestra; and some of the happiest effects in the choruses of "Faust" are attributable far less to the melodic design than to the composer's rare knowledge of what he calls "vocal instrumentation." In the technical management of the orchestra he surpasses all other composers except Wagner. His instinct in selecting for each phrase the exact instrument that best suits it is infallible. Witness the beautiful picture of the waking morning in the introduction, painted in delicate neutral tints; witness the brutal "Amen" fugue of the half-drunken students, where the composer avoids every instrument that gives a clear tone, and uses the heavy utterances of the viola, bassoon, tuba, and double bass; witness the dainty devices of the Dance of Sylphs, dying away until the pianissimo ends with the softest of notes on the kettledrum — a delicious little touch which nobody else perhaps would have thought of, yet now nothing else seems possible in that place; witness, above all, the wonderful instrumentation of the whole of Margaret's second song, in which the English horn takes the leading part, and the orchestra seems to be the echo of sorrowful voices.

Berlioz divides and groups instruments in the most ingenious ways; he multiplies the parts which separate and interlace in harmonies of ravishing beauty; he combines different rhythms — harmonizes them, so to speak — with astonishing boldness. In a word, his melody, rhythm, harmony, instrumentation, all are rich, varied, ingenious, poetical. Alas! that a musician so highly gifted should not have known how to avoid excess, and in the pursuit of an imaginary freedom and picturesqueness should so often, as Wagner complained, have allowed the sense of beauty to escape.

With regard to the performance last night — the fullness and force of the chorus, the animation of the orchestra, and the merits of the four solo singers — we have only to repeat the praise which we gave after the rehearsals. Mr. Jordan, who took the very trying rôle of Faust, has just left a sick-bed, and his voice was not so clear as at the private rehearsal on Wednesday, but he deserves a warm acknowledgment for the intelligence and spirit of his interpretation. He was especially good in the duo and trio of Part Third; and here, too, Miss Sherwin's pure and sympathetic voice was heard to particular advantage. The lady was also fortunate in her best song, "My Heart is Heavy," into which she threw a great deal of true feeling, and her singing was always in excellent taste. Mr. Remmert was in the best of voice and spirits; and Mr. Bourne gave his Rat Song and his short solo in the epilogue to the entire satisfaction of listeners. The audience went away in a state of exultation, with loud cheers for the conductor.

THE ARCHIVES OF FRENCH OPERA.

A WRITER in the Nation says: High up in the top of one of the side semicircular pavilions of the magnificent Opéra of Paris, six or seven stories above the level of the surrounding streets, are the ample apartments set aside for the archives and the library. After the daring visitor has entered the stage door and mounted the seemingly interminable steps, he comes out into long corridors lined with presses in which are stored the many precious musical manuscripts of the Opéra, acquired during its two hundred years of existence; in glazed cases on the top of these presses are exposed certain of the more curious autographs. The musical manuscripts, and all the music in fact, printed or engraved, are under the care of M. Théodore de Lajarte, and he it is who has prepared the "Catalogue de la Bibliothèque Musicale du Théâtre de l'Opéra," now at last completed by the recent publication of the seventh and eighth parts. It forms two stout volumes of over seven hundred pages in all, made doubly useful by an index of forty pages to all works brought out at the Opéra. The seventh part, covering the time from the first performance of the Prophète, in 1849, to the middle of 1876, is in many respects the most interesting. In it we are reminded that M. Emile Augier once wrote an opera-libretto, Sapho, for which M. Gounod composed the music, and it was a failure; we note that M. Offenbach, in 1860, wrote the music of a ballet, Le Papillon, for which the celebrated dancer, Marie Taglioni, composed the dancing, and it, too, was a failure. Apropos of ballets, it is with some surprise that the name of Théophile Gautier is seen so often as the author of ballet librettos; his beautiful Giselle, for which Adolphe Adam composed the music, is an excellent example of the skill with which, catching at a suggestion of Hoffmann's, he could put a fanciful and fantastic subject on the stage. Among the opera-librettists the name of M. Got, the great comedian of the Comédie-Française, is twice to be found. M. Lajarte's mention of Wagner's Tannhäuser, which had three noisy performances in 1861, shows that the French are beginning to get over their extreme dislike for the German composer's work. "We ought to confess that his score contains beauties of the first rank in the midst of ridiculous insanities. The summary justice inflicted on it by the Parisian public is, consequently, a fault we shall not try to excuse." To the seven parts before the last are prefixed portraits, etched by M. de Rat, and at times a little thin and hard, of the seven typical musicians of the two centuries of French opera — Lully, Campra, Rameau, Gluck, Spontini, Rossini, and Meyerbeer. The eighth part has an etching, also by M. de Rat, of the ample oval room, at the top of the pavilion, in which is now ranged the dramatic, operatic, terpsichorean, and generally theatrical library of the Opéra, under the care of M. Nutter, the archivist. This collection is perhaps the best theatrical library in Paris, and it is rapidly growing. Both English and German drama and dramatic biography are well represented in it, and it is generally more cosmopolitan than French collections usually are. M. Nutter himself is our authority for saying that, as soon as he has filled a few more vacancies, he proposes issuing a catalogue, which will certainly be one of the most important in its class. We are informed that he is desirous of receiving all American publications in his line, and we happen to know by experience that both M. Nutter and M. Lajarte are cordial in their welcome to Americans.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LONDON. The chief theme of interest during the present musical season, thus far, has been the Shakespearean Comic Opera, The Taming of the Shrew, by Goetz, as given by Carl Rosa's troupe. Out of many glowing accounts of it, we select, as one of the shortest, the following from the Examiner of Jan. 17 (before the performance): —

"Notwithstanding the utterly incomplete rendering of Goetz's opera when first produced at Drury Lane, eighteen months ago, there can be no question that in affording a preliminary study it placed at a great advantage all who will hear the music for the second time next Tuesday, at Her Majesty's Theatre. Like all true inspirations of genius, and as such we cannot hesitate to recognize it, the Taming of the Shrew grows upon the listener with further acquaintance, and every advance towards familiarity with its music reveals fresh beauties. It can hardly be said to fascinate at the outset. Rather is one struck by the thorough earnestness and power with which the composer has grasped his subject, his individuality of style, and the rich flow of melody running alike through voice parts and orchestra. When all is known and understood it is simply delightful to note the extraordinary skill with which Goetz has worked out and elaborated the various divisions of his score; to listen to the charming phrases that constitute the 'Leit-motives,' as they appear and reappear with ever-changing effect; to marvel at the splendid grouping of the choral and concerted pieces; and, above all, to revel in the masterly orchestration — tuneful and piquant as it is full of scholarly device — with which the composer has enriched his score. All who heard his symphony in F will have been prepared for the 'polyphonic' style, which is this musician's chief characteristic; but, clever as the score may be, no one can say that aught in the Taming of the Shrew smells of the lamp. Here, in fact, is an opera which may well form a model for composers of the future. They will find originality, without any outrage of orthodox forms. They will find every character possessing appropriate means of expression — each, as it were, with distinctive music of its own; and they will find, too, that it is quite possible to write a comic opera in four acts that need never for a moment become tedious to a fairly attentive and appreciative audience.

"The German libretto of Der Widerspänstigen Zähmung is by J. Viktor Widmann, who very properly describes it as 'freely arranged' from Shakespeare's comedy. The order of the scenes is changed, many are left out, and others are compressed, with considerable gain of effect for operatic purposes. No fault can be found with this; but the English translation of the Rev. J. Troutbeck is not a thing to be accepted without protest. This gentleman appears to have made up his mind to have as little as possible to do with Shakespeare, and to rely almost exclusively on his own powers of adaptation, which are very poor indeed. The task may not have been an easy one, but something better than a mere literal translation of German sentences, with occasional incongruous mixtures of prepositions, adverbs, and conjunctions, might surely have been managed. Fortunately, however, Shakespeare's comedy will be at home here, and still more fortunately the success of Goetz's chef-d'œuvre will not depend on a comprehension of Mr. Troutbeck's version of the libretto. Whether the public take quickly to the music remains to be seen; but that cultivated opera-goers will at once recognize its claims we feel convinced. Apart from the general features of excellence already mentioned there are numbers in the work that require no second hearing to confirm as gems of the purest melody. Among these we may point out, in the first act, the duet between Lucentio and Bianca, and the soliloquy in which Petruchio determines to undertake the taming of Katharine; in the second, Katharine's song, 'Ich will mich Keinem geben,' her subsequent duet with Petruchio, and the quintet that concludes the scene; in the third, conspicuously, the opening quartet, Baptista's welcome to his guests, and the succeeding chorus — all charming pieces of writing, while the scene between Lucentio, Hortensio, and Bianca is worthy of Rossini in his best mood. Equally fine, in their way, are the remaining parts of this third act, which further includes the wedding and arrival of the newly-married pair at Petruchio's house. The famous scene with the tailor and servants in the last act is treated in masterly fashion; and from this point to the end of the opera, as if Goetz had now thoroughly warmed to his task, every phrase is instinct with genius and true musical feeling. A glorious duet between Petruchio and Katharine — shrew no longer, but loving and obedient — is followed by a septet full of rich harmony, and this leads up to the final chorus of joy and triumph, a fitting climax to a really noble work."

The opera seems to have been an unqualified success, and it was repeated during the week. The Musical World says: —

"A more attentive and intelligent audience has rarely assembled within the walls of Her Majesty's Theatre. The performance, under Signor Randegger's direction was admirable from first to last. The cast of the dramatis personæ was, in all instances, highly efficient, while the orchestra and chorus left little or nothing to desire. Miss Minnie Hauk, as Katharine, has added another Carmen to her repertory — more than which, her inimitable performance of Bize's gypsy-heroin borne in mind, it would be impossible to say. Miss Georgina Burns is a charming representative of Bianca, Katharine's less impetuous sister. Mr. Walter Bolton is an excellent Petruchio, and all the subordinate parts are adequately filled."

The career of the composer, his struggles and his premature decease, are already familiar to many musical-lovers. Figaro tells us: —

It is curious, too, that there are two other opera-writers named Götz still living in Germany. Carl Götz is a chorister at Breslau, and he has written a five-act romantic opera, entitled "Gustavus Wasa," which has not succeeded either at Weimar or Breslau. Frederick Götz, a violinist, a native of Neustadt, and a pupil of Spohr, has also written an opera, "The Corsairs," which fourteen years ago failed at Weimar. Hermann Götz, the composer of "The Taming of the Shrew," was a native of Königsberg, where he was born in 1840. He studied in his native town under Ludwig Köhler, afterwards at the Berlin Conservatoire under Stern, and subsequently under Herr Ulrich and Dr. Hans von Bülow. At the age of twenty-three he accepted the post of organist, recently vacated by Kirchner, at Winterthur, near Zurich in Switzerland, and it was here that "Der Widerspänstigen Zähmung" was first sketched. For a dozen years, however, Götz was compelled to bear his disappointment as best he could. No manager would accept his work, and although his piano trio, his three duets for piano and violin, and his piano quartet had been brought out, no publisher would risk the heavy expense of printing his opera. At last his opportunity arrived, and "The Taming of the Shrew" was brought out at Mannheim on October 11, 1874. Then did the despised composer suddenly awake to find himself famous. The managers who had snubbed him were at his feet, the publishers begged for scraps from his pen. The success of "The Taming of the Shrew" was pronounced and decisive, and the work speedily ran through the leading theatres of Germany, being added to the general repertory at Vienna, Berlin, Leipzig, and other places. But the hard work, the troubles, the sorrows, and disappointments of former years soon told on the health of Herr Götz. Two years after his first and only success he passed away in a little village near Zurich, leaving the third and last act of his second opera, "Francesca da Rimini," to be finished by Herr Franck, conductor of the opera-house at Mannheim.

ALTHOUGH the list of artists engaged for the Royal Italian Opera season is not yet definitively settled, it is at least likely that Madame Pauline Lucca will return to play the part of Carmen, at Covent Garden. At present, Mlle. Bloch, who made so great a success last year, does not seem to be engaged; but it is settled that Madame Albani will positively return to the opera. The list of names also includes Mesdames Patti, Scalchi, Mantilla, and Corsi; Mlle. Valleria, Turolla, Pyk, Schoen, Sonnino, Ghiotti, Pasqua, and Peppina de Malvezzi (a débutante); MM. Engel and St. Athos (débutants), Nicolini, Marini, Cordi, Sabatier, Manfredi, Gayarre, Graziani, Cotogni, Maurel, Lassalle, Ughetti, Gaillard, Silvestri, Ciampi, Capponi, Caracciolo, Raguer, Vidal, and Scolara. The novelties are not yet settled, but it is not unlikely that Norma will be revived for Madame Albani, while there is a talk of producing one of the Nibelungen Ring series. Two entirely new operas will, at any rate, be given. The season will begin on or about Tuesday, April 13, and will last, at any rate, till July 10, and perhaps to the 17th.

— To show what composers are popular in Great Britain, a statistician has compiled, for the list of the chief performances of the last year, the following figures: —

In choral works Handel heads the list with one hundred and ten performances, sixty-two of which are of the Messiah. Mendelssohn is next, with seventy-four performances, twenty-eight being of the Elijah. Sterndale Bennett comes next with forty performances (thirty of the May Queen and ten of the Woman of Samaria). Haydn next, with twenty-seven, fifteen being of the Creation. Rossini follows with sixteen, thirteen being of the Stabat Mater. Macfarren fourteen, ten of the May Queen. Then come Beethoven, Barnett, and Sullivan, with twelve performances each; Mozart with ten; Cowan with nine; and Spohr, Romberg, Weber, Schubert, and Henry Smart with five each; Cherubini, Schumann, Benedict, Gounod, Barnby, and Roots are credited with three performances each, and several others with one each. It must, however, be stated that difficulties exist against the performance of works by such writers as Weber, Schubert, Cherubini, Schumann, and others in country towns, and besides the list is probably incomplete.

At the Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts, however, no such difficulties stand in the way. The performers are the best of their sort, and the audiences are drawn from the pick of the flower of amateurs of chamber-music in this country. It is therefore by no means astonishing to find Beethoven heading the list during the past year with forty-one performances, followed, afar off, by Mozart, fourteen; Schumann, thirteen; Haydn, eleven; Schubert, eleven; Mendelssohn, ten; Chopin, nine; Bach and Brahms, five each; Spohr and Rubinstein, four each; Handel, Cherubini, Götz and Saint-Saëns, two each; and eleven other writers with one each. — Correspondent of Musical Review.

— The Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace were resumed January 31, when the directors wisely took advantage of the anniversary of Schubert's birth to form their programme entirely of the works of that master. The scheme, indeed, very appropriately began with the first, and ended with the last, symphony of Schubert, concerning each of which a romantic tale may be told. Schubert's first symphony, a single movement of which was performed for the first time in England on Saturday, is an item of the "far richer booty" of which Robert Schumann so eloquently spoke. A note at the end of the score tells us it was written in 1813, when Schubert was sixteen, and not as Mr. Grove, by an obvious error of calculation, avers, when the composer was "far on towards eighteen." Schubert at that time could but a few months before have quitted the Konvictscheule attached to the Emperor's chapel at Vienna, and there he had the great advantage of hearing the works of Haydn, Mozart, and others of the older masters performed at the daily practices by the school orchestra. That he was miserably impecunious is known by a letter quoted by Mr. Grove, in which poor Franz begs his brother for a few pence to buy bread, and also by the notorious fact that many of his inspirations of that period were lost, owing to the inability of the lad to buy music paper to put them down. However, there is little doubt but that this was Schubert's first symphony, and the fragment which Mr. Grove vouchsafed us on Saturday raised sufficient interest to cause Schubert lovers to wish for the entire work. Scored for a small orchestra, and cast in the recognized form, the most charming point of this section of the symphony is the evidence it displays of the budding Schubert, in the beautiful treatment of the wood wind. Further than this it would hardly be wise to go until the entire symphony — which is still in manuscript — is placed before amateurs. The selection from the "Rosamunde" music, comprising the entr'actes in B minor and B-flat, the Shepherd Melody, and the ballet air in G, were admirably played by the orchestra under Mr. August Manns, which also gave a reading of the great C major symphony which even the Crystal Palace band would hardly wish to surpass. Miss Lilian Bailey sang the romance in F minor in the "Rosamunde" music, and other songs; Herr Henschel singing also the "Erl King." — Figaro.

DR. VON BUNZOW introduced at last Monday's Popular Concert a genuine novelty: the first sonata for piano and violin, and one of the latest works written by Johannes Brahms. Although it is somewhat dangerous to judge a work of Brahms at its first performance, a single hearing is sufficient to perceive that the sonata for piano and violin has about it more of the elements of general popularity than many others of Brahms's more exacting compositions. Not only is the sonata of comparative brevity, but its structure is for the most part simple, and it obviously seeks rather to please by its beauty than to astonish by its intricacy. Further than this it would be unwise to go until a second performance is vouchsafed to the public by Mr. Arthur Chappell. If such a performance be given this year, it will, however, be without the assistance of Dr. von Bülow and Madame Néruda, the pianist making his last appearance, and the violinist her last appearance but two, this season, last Monday. — Ibid.

HAMBURG. — A "Mozart Celebration" was held at the Stadt Theater, from the 17th to the 27th of January, the composer's birthday. It was a continuous performance of his operas, — a healthy antidote to the Wagner mania! They were given in the following order: Idomeneus; Die Entführung (followed by Mozart und Schikaneder, by Louis Schneider); Figaro's Hochzeit; Don Juan; Così fan Tutte; Die Zauberflöte; and Titus; supplemented by a grand scenic Festspiel, devised for the occasion by Herr Hock.

— A similar historical week dedicated to Mozart's operas was to be held simultaneously in Vienna and in Leipzig.

LEIPZIG. — The twelfth Gewandhaus Concert, January 8, again presented two symphonies: Spohr in C minor, and Haydn in C major (No. 7 of the Breitkopf and Härtel ed.). Mme. Joachim sang the aria from Titus, with clarinet obligato, the Spanish song by Brahms, "Das Sträuschen," by Dvorak, and "Wilkommen und Abschied" by Schubert. Miss Agnes Zimmermann, from London, was the pianist, and played the Rondo brillant of Mendelssohn, Prelude and Fugue in E minor of Bach, Nocturne in E, Schumann, Etude in B minor, Mendelssohn. The orchestra also played an Air de Ballet and Gavotte from Gluck's Iphigenia.

The novelty at the thirteenth Gewandhaus Concert was a Symphony in C by Herr August Reissmann, who conducted in person. It was performed with great care, but received with comparative indifference. Mlle. Agnes Zimmermann played Sterndale Bennett's Piano-forte Concerto in C minor, a charming Gavotte of her own composition, and other pieces, Herr Carl Schröder, a member of the orchestra, giving Eckert's violoncello Concerto. Both lady and gentleman (lady especially) were warmly applauded. The concert ended with Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn." — Herren Reinecke and Schradieck have given two concerts, at which they played Beethoven's ten Sonatas for Piano-forte and Violin, five at each concert. The proceeds were devoted to the sufferers by a recent accident in the Zwickau mines.

VIENNA. — At a recent Concert of the Philharmonic Society the first performance of an overture to an opera by Franz Schubert, entitled "Des Teufels Lustschloss," created much interest. The work was composed, to a libretto by Kotzebue, between the years 1813-14, when the composer was still almost a boy, and has never been printed. The first and third acts are said to be still in existence, the manuscript of the second having served to light the fire at the house of a friend of the composer. The overture is described as being sprightly and of sound workmanship.

— Herr Josef Joachim is just now engaged upon a most successful concert-tour extending over Austria and some parts of Italy, in conjunction with the Viennese pianist, Herr Bonawitz. At Milan, where the two artists appeared on the 6th of last month and on subsequent dates, their reception has been of the most enthusiastic kind, the eminent violinist creating a furor with his Hungarian Concerto and the Hungarian dances.

BRUSSELS. — A festival in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Belgian independence will be held this year at Brussels, preparations on a grand scale having already been made. A hall capable of holding some 6000 persons is being erected, where musical performances will take place during three successive days, the first being devoted to old Belgian masters, the third to solo performances and modern Belgian composers, while on the second the choral societies of Antwerp will unite in concert.

LA DAMNATION DE FAUST.

THERE seems to be just now, among us as well as the Parisians, what the politicians call a "boom" for Hector Berlioz. To the old impression of unmitigated noise and fury with which a few, doubtless imperfect, renderings of some of his overtures, etc., had prepossessed most of us against his music as that of almost a madman, there have recently succeeded sweeter experiences on hearing his pastoral Flight into Egypt, and his song of The Captive. And now, while we in Boston have been listening for the first time to his Symphonie Fantastique (which is gentle and poetic in the first three parts, at least, though morbid, wild, and like a pandemonium in the last two), New York, through the enterprise and skill of Dr. Damrosch, has been waxing more and more enthusiastic over several performances of one of his greatest works, three hours in length, for chorus, orchestra, and solo voices. We would gladly have been of the Boston party who went on to hear it; but since that was impossible we have copied a large portion of the Tribune's excellent review of the performance, and will here add the analysis to which our New York correspondent refers elsewhere.

The legend commences with an Andante placido in D major, $\frac{3}{4}$ time, without any overture. The motive is first given by the violas with no harmony, and then taken up by the wind instruments with Faust (who is meditating in the fields over the new-born spring) and further strengthened by the violins; at last it is interpreted by the full orchestra, in which the piccolo and horns suggest the Ruckoczy March and the Rondo of the peasants, and prepare the listener for the subsequent development. The introduction closes with a pp symphony of the violins, and leads into the chorus and Rondo of the peasants, which is of a rather gay nature and once interrupted by a G major Presto in $\frac{3}{4}$ time. At this point Faust appears again with his sad theme (this time in B minor); but he cannot compete with the gayness of the peasants. At last trumpets announce the approach of the army, which passes by to the sounds of the Marche Hongroise, in A minor, splendidly instrumented.

A double bass solo in fugue style (large $\frac{3}{4}$ time, F sharp minor) initiates the second part, which finds Faust in his study. He sings: "Nothing takes away my sorrow." The accompaniment becomes more lively, the double basses play syncopes, and are followed by the violins. A recitative comes next; the syncopes rise from C major to A major, and fall suddenly with the commencement of the Easter Hymn (Religioso moderato assai, $\frac{3}{4}$ time) upon F major. The Easter Hymn is an exceedingly beautiful chorus, in which Faust takes part with the words: "Memory of happy days." Mephisto, briefly and characteristically introduced, appears and mockingly interrupts Faust's happy mood. Then follows a dialogue, in which Mephisto succeeds in persuading Faust to go with him. This episode offers little musical novelty. Next is heard the chorus of the drinkers (C minor, $\frac{3}{4}$), a piece most interesting and beautiful as regards rhythm, full of vigor and life; and then follows the very original song of Brander: "There was a rat" (D major, $\frac{3}{4}$). The short refrain of the chorus, "As if he had love in his bosom," is of magnificent effect. Then follows an "Amen" fugue, which had better be left uncriticised, since the composer meant it for a joke. It is to be pitied that composers of Berlioz's standing make such jokes; one feels inclined to think of "sour grapes." Mephisto asks the drinkers' permission to sing a ditty, which is granted, and he sings the song of the "Royal Flea" (allegretto con moto, $\frac{3}{4}$, F major), initiated by a powerful crash in the orchestra. Berlioz goes, perhaps, a little too far in this song as regards painting music, since he puts the task upon the violins to imitate musically the hopping of the much disliked insect.

The most interesting piece of the entire legend is the finale of the second part. It commences with a short orchestral prelude, which imitates the ride of Faust and Mephisto through the air. At the end of this passage, which is mostly executed by wind instruments with high notes, and violins, on the high part of the strings, the violins slowly go down into the lower notes, and Mephisto describes in a quiet and in no way demoniacally written Aria in D ($\frac{3}{4}$ time) the friendly banks of the Elbe, and then calls upon his serving ghosts to sing Faust to sleep. The next chorus of the Elves is broad and excellently planned. For its basis it has nothing at all of a ghostly nature; but this latter is given by a middle passage in F sharp minor (the chorus is in D), and several features in the accompaniment. After a masterly continued organ-point on the lower dominant (G) the chorus closes softly. But the conclusive deep D is carried through pp by the double basses and violoncellos during the whole now following passage, and represents the sleeping Faust. At the same time the muted violins play a pretty dance movement, which is a shortening of the theme of the preceding chorus, and this again is occasionally implicated by chords of high wind instruments and solitary harp tones, together producing a great effect. One imagines the sleeping Faust in reality surrounded by graceful fairies. This orchestral number caused great enthusiasm with calls for repetition; this and the Hungarian Ruckoczy March pleased the most of all the scenes. The conclusion of this part is formed by two male choruses in B-flat major, the one sung by soldiers, quite martial and energetic, and the other by students, very characteristic and wild. Both choruses united create a very exciting finale.

In the third part we find Faust in Margaret's room. After a sweet prelude, Mephisto announces her approach. Faust hides behind the curtain, while Margaret sings the "King of Thule" (F major). In this the composer succeeds less than in the humorous passages, but at the same time the obligato accompaniment of the viola (well played by Mr. Frisch) is very effective. After this song the scene changes and we find Mephisto conjuring ghosts before Margaret's house. Here again Berlioz has done some bizarre work. The involved ballet in D contains passages of the wildest effects. Now follows perhaps the most original song of the whole work, Mephisto's serenade in B major, with guitar-imitations, consisting of pizzicato arpeggios of the string quartet. A new finale brings the third part to a close. This commences with a Duo between Faust and Margaret, somewhat in the style of "music of the future," which leads to a trio by the entrée of Mephisto, and is heightened to a good effect by a chorus of citizens and workmen.

The fourth and last part commences with Margaret's song: "My heart is heavy," which falls from the simple and natural poem into a somewhat theatrical tone. The translation consists of nine verses, for which the composer did not repeat the melody, but composed the whole song. After this song the soldiers' and students' chorus is repeated, and is then followed by a recitative of Margaret in which she deplores the absence of the friend. Afterwards Faust is found in a forest, singing of the grandeur of nature, when Mephisto joins him and speaks of Margaret's misery. Faust demands of the devil to save her, which the latter promises after Faust has signed a contract. Both now mount black steeds to rescue the sinner. Here the orchestra splendidly describes the different scenes and incidents. How they pass a way cross before which peasants are praying, how a monster persecutes them, how skeletons dance, etc.

[Here the MS. suddenly comes to an end. Perhaps the missing leaf will follow.]

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. — The fifth Symphony Concert, Thursday afternoon, February 12, drew the fullest audience of the season, partly owing, no doubt, to the novel features of the following programme: —

1. Overture to "Fidelio," in E Beethoven.
2. Recitative and Romance: "Selva oscura"
(Sombre forêt), from "Guillaume Tell" Rossini.
Miss Louise Homer.
3. Piano-forte Concerto, in F, Op. 22 (First time in America) Louis Brassin.
Allegro con fuoco. — Andante. — Allegro con fuoco.
Miss Jessie Cochran.
4. Songs with Piano-forte Grieg.
a. Ich liebe dich.
b. Waldwanderung.
c. Erstes Begegnen.
Miss Louise Homer.
5. Symphonie Fantastique: "L'Épisode de la Vie d'un Artiste," Op. 14a (First time in Boston) Hector Berlioz.

Beethoven's bright overture, the fourth and last of the Leonore series, was played with spirit and precision, making a wholesome, lively opening, in contrast to the morbidly elaborate work of Berlioz, which formed the last and larger half of the concert. The intervening solo performances were highly interesting. Miss Homer, who sang the part of Penelope so well in the recent performance of Odysseus by the Cecilia, appeared now for the second time only in a large concert-hall. Her face and figure, somewhat suggestive of the young Jenny Lind when she grew radiant in the light of her own singing, seemed full of music and a native instinct of lyrical expression, winning sympathy at once. Yet the struggle to conceal her nervousness was but imperfectly concealed. Her voice is of a beautiful quality in the higher tones, sweet, rich, and powerful; but the lower tones seemed to lack substance and were often indistinctly heard; this may have been timidity. We heard the "color" of her voice throughout its principal range compared to that of her golden hair. Her delivery of the recitative from William Tell was well conceived, dramatic, and refined; and she sang the noble melody of the Rossini aria sweetly, chastely, and with taste and feeling. The good impression was more than confirmed by her delicate, fine rendering of the poetic little songs by Grieg, to which the rather difficult and by no means commonplace accompaniments were very nicely played by Mr. Preston.

The Concerto by Louis Brassin, a teacher of the piano at the Brussels Conservatory, is a graceful composition of a gentle, pastoral character, musician-like in form and treatment, but of no great strength or intensity in its ideas. It flows on very evenly, and is unique (so far as we know) among concertos by its clinging to the same theme through all three movements. The Andante, indeed, is but a continuation, without pause, of the first Allegro, only in a slower rhythm, so that when it began most listeners fancied it to be but a momentary slackening of the tempo. This is the most charming portion of the work. The finale, to be sure, starts off with a new and brilliant motive, which, however, proves to be only episodic, for it soon relapses into the original theme, and that rules to the end. The Concerto, as far as the piano was concerned, was well suited to the neat, sure, delicate, and finished execution of Miss Cochran. Had the great hall been equally well suited to her, and had the full orchestral accompaniment been less unrelenting, she would have been heard to better advantage. Her interpretation of the work showed taste, intelligence, good culture, and aplomb; the only want was of physical strength sufficient to prevail in that great space. But the young lady was playing for the first time with orchestra; she has talent, and her day, no doubt, will come. Great interest was shown in her appearance.

The programme Symphony of Berlioz, of course, was the marked feature of the concert. The programme, or its substance, in Schumann's words, we have already given. It undertakes to describe the dream of a love-sick artist, who has taken opium, and is in five parts, — the first sentimental, the second gay and festive, the third pastoral, the fourth and fifth grim, funereal, ending in the wildest, seemingly chaotic, but by no means formless, Witches' Sabbath. We were agreeably disappointed in the freedom from extravagance, the absence of all noise and fury in the three gentler movements; through them all the noisier brass instruments are held in as abstemiously as in the first two thirds of Don Giovanni. In all these movements there are many delicate poetic beauties, charming melodic passages, and many original and lovely combinations and contrasts of instruments, especially the wood wind.

Part I. ("Reveries, Passions") begins Largo, in a vague, uneasy, melancholy strain, well answering to the composer's idea of restless love without an object. Then comes in the melody, which typifies the loved one, and which becomes the connecting thread throughout the Symphony. This melody is well pronounced and clear, and of considerable length; we must say it seems to us a little studied, artificial, and of a sickly hue. But it answers the end of convenient dismemberment and working up through many ingenious contrapuntal devices. The Allegro is impassioned, tender, delirious, peaceful, and serious by turns. Merely as music it is very interesting.

Part II. (The Ball) starts with a fresh and charming Waltz tempo, which grows a little vague as it goes on; but the movement is a happy relief to the dreamy sentiment of the first part. It has two harp-parts, which were here cleverly represented on piano-fortes by Messrs. Preston and Fenollosa. The melody, the loved one, reappears amid the gay festivity. There is a certain luscious, sensuous tone-coloring throughout.

Part III. Adagio, is pastoral, a scene in the fields, opening with a ranz-des-vaches, answered in the distance on two English horns. A warm, fresh, charming tone-picture of Nature follows; the dreamer is happy; till she, the melody, appears again, when doubts and fears cross the sunny picture like shadows of dark clouds. Much of this music bears resemblance to passages in the brook-side scene and the finale of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony (Berlioz was full of Beethoven enthusiasm at that time). Then the shepherd melody is resumed but not replied to; for there are sounds of distant thunder, marvellously well rolled up by four tympani and other drums, for which Berlioz, who had studied all such means of effect more carefully than any other man, gives most minute directions in the score. Day dies out in silence. The whole scene was wonderfully graphic, and the hush of the whole audience complete.

Part IV. He dreams he has killed the Beloved and is led to execution. This Marche du Supplice brings in brass enough, with all the low and murky reed tones, and combines all sounds that are grim, coarse, ruthless, terrible, and startling. You hear the heavy footsteps, and the confused crowding in of the multitude as the procession nears the fatal spot. A portion of the March, however, is in a brilliant and triumphant strain, which sounds like Meyerbeer, but Berlioz was before him. The love melody begins, but is cut short halfway by the fall of the fatal axe! There is a certain terrible fascination in all this; it is done with consummate skill of instrumentation, and great originality of invention; but "Music, heavenly Maid," has fled away when we must listen to such things, and it is not wholesome to hear much of the sort.

Part V. The "Witches' Sabbath Night" is worse, — all pandemonium let loose, in fact. But the worst thing about it is that the melody, the ideal object of the dreamer's love, appears in the midst of it sophisticated, tortured, and degraded into a meretricious vulgar dance-tune, full of frills and trills, enough to shock a sensitive imagination; who but a Frenchman could have committed such a profanation even in a dream, or published it in music even if he had dreamed it?

The burlesque parody of the Dies Ira, at first given out by the brass in grave plain chorale, with the appalling accompaniment of the glas funèbre, or funeral bell (here represented on a grand piano), then put through all sorts of grotesque variations, and finally worked up together with the reckless Rondo of the Sabbath, shows wonderful power as a mere sensational extravaganza. Nor is it wholly without form and void; there is a long fugato passage, almost a regular fugue, in the course of it, which again suggests Beethoven, that is to say, a similar orchestral passage which occurs during the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony. — The final rout is beyond all power of verbal description.

The conductor (Zerrahn) and orchestra deserve great praise for the really excellent performances of this strange and extremely difficult work after only three rehearsals. All the composer's minute directions in the score were scrupulously observed, so far as it was possible without a much larger orchestra.

EUTERPE. For the third chamber concert, Wednesday evening, Feb. 11, the New York Philharmonic Club (Messrs. Arnold, Gansbach, Gramm, and Werner), were the interpreters of two extremely interesting and well contrasted quartets for first and second violin, viola, and 'cello. The first, Beethoven, No. 10, in E-flat, is exquisitely beautiful and full of subtle and original ideas, especially the Adagio with its spiritual variations and development of theme. Those who were somewhat prepared, and who followed the movements closely, were profoundly impressed and delighted; but it is not a thing for superficial, careless hearing. The interpretation was appreciative and well nigh faultless. And so was that of the A major quartet, No. 3 of the three composing Op. 41, by Schumann, which was more readily appreciated by a large portion of the audience.

The fourth concert, Wednesday evening, March 10, offers one of the last quartets by Beethoven, in A minor, Op. 132, and one by Mendelssohn in D major, Op. 44, No. 1, with the same interpreters.

MR. PERABO has given two more matinées or recitals, of pianoforte music during the past week, being himself the sole interpreter. Of these hereafter. He furthermore announces an evening concert for March 8, when he will be assisted by several of the orchestral musicians in the production of an Octet by Bargiel.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, FEB. 23. — Probably the most notable event of the present musical season has been the production of Berlioz's Damnation de Faust by the Symphony Society. Much money and labor have been expended upon it, and its success, both artistically and pecuniarily, has been most gratifying to the promoters of the best interests of the society. On Wednesday evening, Feb. 11, a full rehearsal was attended by some eighteen hundred people. At the public rehearsal on the next day (Thursday, Feb. 12), the hall was full, and on Saturday evening, Feb. 14, the concert-room was crammed to suffocation. By universal desire the Damnation was repeated on Wednesday evening, Feb. 18, and is again to be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 25. With regard to the work itself I prefer to give no opinion, and I send you herewith a carefully written critique by an accomplished musician, whose acumen is musical, and who is perfectly fearless in expressing his genuine sentiments.

On Thursday evening, Feb. 17, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society gave its fourth concert with the appended programme: —

- Andante and Fugue, C minor Mozart.
(String Orchestra.)
Aria: "Il mio Tesoro" Mozart.
(Sig. Baldanza.)
Fourth Symphony, B flat. Op. 60 Beethoven.
Overture: "Penthesilea," Op. 31 Goldmark.
Aria: "Nun es al bosco" Handel.
Introduction and Finale to "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner.

The performance of the symphony showed the most careful preparation of any of the orchestral numbers. It was played with great finish and unity of purpose; albeit, Mr. Thomas has some singular whims with regard to tempos. Still, such things are matters of individual conception, and I do not intend to be hypercritical. In the Goldmark overture and in the Wagner selection there were many crudities of execution, and it is to be regretted that they could not have been overcome by more rehearsals than Mr. Thomas can possibly, under the circumstances, give to his programmes. The vocalists were successful in securing encores, and it is to be supposed that this was a gratifying fact to them, even if their efforts were less satisfactory to critical ears.

The stage was adorned, as usual, with exquisite flowers and growing plants, and there was that air of refinement and culture in all the details that at once makes it evident that genuine taste and enthusiasm is the animating spirit in the getting up of these very attractive and pleasurable entertainments. In the fifth concert we shall have Schubert's C major Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and a Slavonic Rhapsody (Op. 45, No. 3) by Dvorak: these for orchestra; the soloists are not yet announced.

On Wednesday evening was the extra performance of Berlin's Damnation, and on Saturday evening the New York Philharmonic Society's concert with this programme: Adagio and Fugue, C minor Mozart.

(String Orchestra.)
Fourth Symphony, B flat. Op. 60 Beethoven.
Piano Concerto, F minor. Op. 21 Chopin.
(R. Joseffy.)

Introduction and Finale: "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner.

The feature of the evening was Joseffy's delightful interpretation of Chopin's wonderful tone and power. The artist was still suffering from his unfortunate difficulty with the forefinger of his right hand, and he wore upon it a leathern cover to protect it from any sudden knock against the keys. Handicapped as he was, he gave us the most delicious rendering of the concerto to which I have ever listened. As I have often said, he never forces the tone of an instrument, but yet every note is perfectly clear and distinct, while his shading is perfection, and his use of the pedal more than perfect. Nothing like his piano playing has ever been heard in the concerts of this society, and the large and attentive audience gave evidence of its appreciation of this fact by demanding in the most enthusiastic manner the pianist's reappearance; twice he simply bowed and retired in the modest way that is one of his most attractive characteristics, but the applause continuing with unabated fervor and persistency he played Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia (with orchestral accompaniments) in a most superb way. Loud and chaotic as the fantasia is, it really became, under his deft fingers, a marvellously effective and even beautiful work. The inextinguishable audience applauded this with even more warmth than they had shown in the first instance (principally because the fantasia was newer to their comprehension); but Joseffy, probably wearied with his efforts, declined to play again, although compelled thrice to bow his acknowledgments.

Joseffy is announced for a series of four chamber music concerts to begin on Wednesday, March 3, and to terminate on Wednesday, March 31 (March 24 being omitted); he is also to give a "Chopin night" on Monday evening, March 1. All of these concerts will, of course, take place at Chickering Hall, and will afford a rare musical treat to those who are wise enough to attend them.

I find that I have omitted to mention that on Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 18, Mr. T. W. Morgan (organist) and Miss Maud Morgan (harpsichord) began (at Chickering Hall) a series of five organ and harp matinées to be given on successive Wednesdays and to terminate March 17. At the first matinee the programme included an arrangement of a portion of Beethoven's so-called "Moonlight Sonata," and many other good things. It was not my fortune to be present, but I shall doubtless hear the remaining four matinees, and then can give your readers a better idea of these entertainments, which open up a new field of musical enjoyment.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 9.—The first Peabody Symphony Concert on the 31st ult. gave the following programme:—
Ocean Symphony, C major. No. 2. Work

43. Anton Rubinstein.
Allegro maestoso. — Adagio non tanto. — Allegro.
— Adagio. — Allegro con fuoco.

Andante and Rondo from the violin-concerto.
Work 64. Mendelssohn.

Transcribed for the piano by Madame Rivé-King.
a. Hungarian Rhapsody, C sharp minor.
No. 3. Frans Liszt.

b. Songs with piano.
"Die Vätergruft."
"Angiolin dal biondo erin."
"Da bist wie eine Blume."
Mr. Frans Remmerts.

Raid of the Vikings. Overture to a Norse drama. Work 25. Emil Hartmann.
Composed 1878.

The orchestra, as stated in a former letter, has been increased to about forty-five pieces, and, under the direction of Mr. Hamerik, interpreted the orchestral selections as well as might have been expected for an opening night. Our musicians have so little good orchestral music to play the year round, that it always requires one or two concerts to produce the necessary spirit and put them into proper accord.

Madame Rivé-King played her transcription of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, and the Liszt Rhapsody with wonderful precision and spirit. Her technical ability is great, and she plays with an amount of power quite astonishing for a woman.

Mr. Frans Remmerts did not meet with his usual success in the Liszt songs. They were evidently not for him nor for them.

At the thirteenth Students' Concert on last Saturday evening, the following programme was given:— String-trio, C major. Work 37. Beethoven.

For two violins and viola.
Messrs. Allen, Flucke, and Schaefer.

Theme with variations. "The Harmonious Blacksmith." Handel.

For piano.
Mr. Adam Itzel, student of the Conservatory, third year.
a. Cavatina from "Figaro's Wedding" W. A. Mozart.
Miss Rose Barrett, student of the Conservatory, first year.

b. Recitative and Air from "Figaro's Wedding."
Miss Mary Kelly, student of the Conservatory, first year.
c. Piano-trio, E-flat major. No. 7.
For piano, violin, and viola.
Mr. Ross Jungnickel, student of the Conservatory, fourth year, Messrs. Flucke and Schaefer.

CHICAGO, Feb. 21.—Since my last note to the JOURNAL quite a number of small musical entertainments have taken place, and others have been announced as being of uncommon interest. Mr. Emil Liebling gave a piano-forte recital in the early part of the month, at which he performed, besides a number of smaller pieces, the F minor concerto of Chopin, and with Messrs. Lewis and Eichheim, a Trio by Haydn. He was accompanied in the Concerto by a string quartet and a second piano-forte, which was played by Miss Ingersoll. The audience was an interested one, and gave evidence of a full appreciation. I have a number of times spoken of the impression that Mr. Liebling's playing left with me, and I still retain my opinion that he must be classed with the brilliant rather than the sentimental players. His technique is adequate for very difficult work, and there is a certain brilliancy about his playing that pleases an audience. In the more delicate phases of art, where the deep meanings of sentiment are to be interpreted, there seems to be much that is lacking in his playing. Gradations of tone are there, and many passages are given with a graceful intent; but it seems like meeting the music from the outside and adding to it an outside polish, instead of making the inner meaning seem a living reality. In a simple word, it is music as movement that I hear rather than a soulful utterance that breathes out tone-pictures which touch the emotional nature and quicken it into sympathetic life. Yet I am glad that Mr. Liebling, amid his many duties as teacher, finds time to prepare these recitals for the public, for we have far too little of this kind of music in our city.

The last Chamber Concert given by Miss Ingersoll, Messrs. Lewis and Eichheim, offered the following programme:—

Quartet, Drei Tanne, Op. 24. Bargiel.
Ländler. — Menuet. — Springtanz.
(Misses Ingersoll and Lewis. Messrs. Lewis and Eichheim.)

Sonata, in G minor. Hauptmann.
(Miss Ingersoll and Mr. Lewis.)

Quartet, for Strings, Op. 192, No. 2. Raf.
(First time in Chicago.)
Die Müllerin. — Die Mühle.

(Messrs. Lewis, Muhlberg, Meyer, Eichheim.)
Quintet, Op. 114. Rheinberger.
(First time in Chicago.)
Adagio. — Scherzo.

(Miss Ingersoll, Messrs. Lewis, Muhlberg, Meyer, and Eichheim.)

It will be seen at a glance that the modern school of music was given a hearing on this occasion. Yet the performance proved to be very interesting, for it gave us the opportunity of hearing what some of the composers of to-day are doing for art. The performers played con amore, and the hour was very enjoyable.

At the present time we are having what are termed popular concerts from Miss Emma Thursby and troupe. On Friday Evening the first performance in Chicago of Gilmore's "heaven-inspired National Hymn," called "Columbia" was said to be the attraction. For over a week all our street-cars and other public places have been filled with bombastic circulars, ornamented with wood cuts of Miss Thursby and the composer of the above mentioned "heaven-inspired hymn." At last, with the assistance of a chorus, mostly composed of our dignified Apollo Club, under the direction of Mr. Tomlins, with Miss Thursby to sing a solo and a dramatic reader to make the words understood, the "heaven inspired" production has been given a hearing. As I looked over the doggerel, called by courtesy an ode, I could but wonder what our fair land had done that she should be forced to submit to being sung about in such a manner. Are there no poets left to sing, or have the Muses hushed their sweet voices forever, and are these inharmonious measures the last echoes of a lost art? And the music! If it is thus that the heavenly angels sing to Mr. Gilmore in that silent hour when inspiration lifts the soul beyond the busy rush of worldly toil into the sphere of beauty's enchantment, then I am thankful to be a common mortal, and commune with the spirit of art as I find it upon the earth. When we view this "heavenly inspired hymn" from the rational standpoint, and observe that a very common-place and badly written musical theme is repeated three times in a single verse, and that we are expected to sing a number of stanzas before the patriotic lines are finished, we feel something akin to madness filling the mind. And yet there is a thought of eternity in it after all, for the one little theme goes on forever and forever. It was rather an amusing sight to see a chorus of a hundred or more of our best singers, Miss Thursby, and Mr. Tomlins, with a dramatic reader striving to find the meaning of the text, all engaged in trying to interpret Mr. Gilmore's "Columbia" to a very large audience. The sensational might win a few dollars for the enthusiastic young manager of our New Music Hall for one evening, but the good sense of our community will be slow in admitting that music or America was honored by such an exhibition. It seems to me that the time is not far distant when our people will realize that the bombastic announcements made by concert managers are not to be depended upon, and that they will use their own judgment in such matters. That the performance of this so-called hymn fell perfectly flat, was in itself a lesson to the management, and also to our chorus singers. A dignified society like the Apollo Club, which has always given itself to what is best in art, should refuse to allow its members to take part in such sensational exhibitions. Miss Thursby sang a number of selections that have been upon her concert programmes for years, but with such brilliancy as to win the applause of her audience. Miss Amy Fay played some selections from Bach, Chopin, Schuman, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and Liszt, and helped to give a little suggestion of real music to the very miscellaneous programmes.

At one of the recent chamber concerts at Hershey Music Hall we had this little programme:—

Pastoral-Sonata (Manuscript). Henry Schoenfeld.
I. Allegro giusto. (In the Green.) II. Andante con moto. (Serenade.) III. Scherzo. (Country Dance.) IV. Rondo. (Allegro moderato).
(Festival.)

(Piano-forte and Violin.)
Messrs. Schoenfeld and Lewis.
Song: "There is a green hill far away" Gounod.
Miss May Phoenix.

First Trio in D minor, Op. 49. Mendelssohn.
Messrs. Eddy, Lewis, and Eichheim.

The occasion was particularly interesting, inasmuch as a composition by Mr. Schoenfeld was to be performed for the first time in this city. This young gentleman has been home from his studies in Germany but a short time, and from what I have seen of his compositions I must frankly acknowledge that he is a musician of much talent. He wrote the work called "Eastern Idyll," for the prize competition at Cincinnati, and although it did not reach the first rank, yet it received an honorable mention, and was classed with the four works that the judges regarded as worthy of commendation. A letter from Mr. Thomas, as chairman of the committee, announced the fact. The Sonata that is on the above programme is a very melodious work, being well constructed, and interesting all through. The Andante is particularly beautiful, and contains a theme that is very melodious, and yet tender in its sweetness. Whatever this young gentleman writes seems to be musical in character, and there is no striving for vain effects, after the manner of many of the imitators of the so-called "music of the future." If he remains loyal to the forms of pure art he will make a name for himself as a composer of more than ordinary merit.

LOCAL NOTES.

THE programme of the Harvard Symphony Concert for last Thursday included: the Overture "Weibe des Hauses," Beethoven; Rec. and Prayer of Penelope, from "Odyssey," Max Bruch, sung by Miss May Bryant; Piano Concerto, No. 2, Saint-Saëns, played by Mme. Rivé-King; Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, Beethoven; Songs; Octet, Mendelssohn, by all the strings. — The next programme, for March 11, will be found in our advertising columns.

— Herr Joseffy has recovered the use of his fingers, so that the concerts, which Mr. Peck has twice been obliged to postpone, will take place, with the programmes originally announced, on the evenings of March 11 and 12, and the afternoon of Saturday, March 13, with the Philharmonic Orchestra, in the Boston Music Hall.

— Miss Henrietta Maurer, the talented young pianist, who studied for several years in Moscow, announces two Matinees for Mondays, March 1 and 8, at Mechanics Hall. She will be assisted by Mrs. Marchington, Soprano, Mrs. Richardson, Soprano, Miss Lillian Shattuck, Violin, Sig. V. Cirillo, Baritone, Mr. B. Listemann, violin, and Mr. T. P. Currier, accompanist. The programmes are full of interesting matter.

— We have no hesitation in commending to the attention of all good music lovers the complimentary concert to be given next Saturday evening, March 6, at Union Hall, to Miss Teresa Carreno Campbell, a young and highly gifted violinist, who has already acquired much skill upon her instrument, and won the sympathy of many friends. She can play that heavenly Aria from Bach's Suite in D with a style and feeling which any one can enjoy after hearing it by Wieniawski and Wilhelmj, and she is equal to the difficulties of Wieniawski's brilliant Polonaise. Her sister, Miss Mary Campbell, an excellent pianist, will take part in the concert; and she will also be assisted by Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Mr. B. J. Lang, who will play one of the Chopin Scherzos; Mr. Edward Bowditch in songs by Frantz; and Messrs. Allen, Fries, and Heindl in a Quartet by Haydn; also Mr. C. L. Capen as accompanist. One object of the concert is to enable this young girl to procure a violin worthy of her talent.

— Prof. J. K. Paine, of Harvard College, contemplates a series of chamber concerts in Boylston Hall, on the college grounds, before the close of the present season. The students are becoming more and more interested in good music, and the Professor's classes in harmony, counterpoint, musical history, etc., are much fuller than they have ever been before.

MUSIC.—A SOMEWHAT PRACTICAL VIEW.

BY N. LINCOLN, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

It has been urged that music is a branch of study more ornamental than useful; which can be dispensed with altogether, or the expenditure in its behalf be greatly reduced. Yet, as a matter of fact, no such claim is made among prominent educators, or by those best informed on matters pertaining to public instruction. On the contrary, here in Massachusetts, music never stood higher on the list of studies than now; was never so thoroughly taught as now, never so justly appreciated as now. Our University has its professor of music, within the year has found it necessary to employ in addition a tutor in singing, and is granting diplomas to such as successfully complete the course prescribed.

The Empire of Japan has just concluded a contract with Mr. L. W. Mason, late superintendent of music in the schools of Boston, to introduce our system of musical instruction into that country. Arrangements are making at Tokio, on the most liberal scale, to furnish the means and appliances needed in the line of his profession, to promote his personal comfort, and to add dignity to the office he assumes.

Music has become, may we not say, the chief amusement of the people. As such it is innocent, it leaves no sting behind; and it is not every amusement of which this can be predicated. The love for it, moreover, in the household is limited only by the amount of talent in that direction possessed by the members of the family, or by their ability to procure for themselves the means of its gratification.

But it would be taking a partial view of the matter, were we to regard it merely in the light of a recreation. As a branch of study its value is beyond question. It cultivates the ear, informs the taste, trains the faculties of the mind, develops and invigorates the powers of the body. Of what other study can this be affirmed in an equal degree? Viewed simply as a resource for earning one's living, it is safe to say that a knowledge of music gives direct support to a vastly greater number of men and women than does an acquaintance with any one of the so-called higher studies pursued in our schools.

Consider the interests of music in their financial aspect. See the amount of capital invested in the manufacture of pianos, organs, band and orchestral instruments; the printing and engraving of sheet music and music-books; the various newspapers or journals devoted exclusively to musical matters; the fabulous sums lavished upon distinguished singers or players, who fill our largest halls at their concerts with eager listeners.

There has been heard here, this season, an artist who received for singing a couple of songs more than $300; while orchestral players have been paid for an hour's work $25 each. Members of church choirs obtain for their services from two dollars up to thirty dollars a Sunday. Boys from our grammar schools, even as low as the fourth class, are engaged in the choirs of Boston and vicinity, where, in addition to the instruction given them, they receive salaries corresponding to the degree of talent they manifest. Five dollars, for a couple of hours spent in church at the organ, is not uncommon.

A professional man, whose fees amount to one hundred dollars a day is looked upon as quite successful; a merchant, who clears the like sum of money, may well congratulate himself as being in prospering circumstances. But there are singers able to command twice as much for every appearance they make before the public. It is within the memory of some of us that Jenny Lind contracted with Mr. Barnum to sing one hundred nights in America for one hundred thousand dollars, and he never complained of the bargain.

A single song, the production of Dr. Arthur Sullivan, which may have cost him only a few hours' labor, has yielded its proprietor an annual income of $2,500. A second song of his, "The Lost Chord," well known in our concert-rooms and parlors, has proved a fortune in itself. "H. M. S. Pinafore," a work of the same composer, which has gone the length and breadth of the land both here and abroad, — a clean, charming, wholesome composition, admired alike by artist and amateur, has been a mine of wealth to many a manager and publisher, besides affording delight to thousands of hearers.

Music-selling and music-publishing houses in this country, if we consider the magnitude of their business, and the variety of their publications, stand second to none [?] the world over.

Pianos and parlor-organs are almost as common as tables and bureaus; or, at least it may be said with truth that a house without a musical instrument of some sort is a rarity. A family in which there is no music, and no love for it, must certainly be accounted unfortunate in that respect.

See how largely dependent we are upon the Germans in filling our band and orchestras; because, music having been so many years a regular study in their common schools, enjoying all the time the highest consideration in the community at large, they have become superior to us in the art, and are, for the present, beyond our competition.

Look at our conservatories and colleges of music, which already surpass those of Europe in the number of their students, and bid fair in due time to rival them also in the excellence of the instruction furnished, as well as in the talent and proficiency of their graduates.

The complaint is sometimes made against our schools that children are not taught what will be of practical use in after-life. What is learned of some subjects, it is said, needs to be so modified before it can be available in practice, that, aside from the mental discipline thereby secured, it may be a question whether time so spent could not be better employed in other ways. Such is not the case with music. Whatever is gained in that direction, though it be only the power of singing the scale, is immediately useful, and will form one of the inevitable steps to be taken sooner or later if one desires to become a musician.

Given the requisite amount of talent, with corresponding application under competent instruction, and the pupil finds himself in the possession of an accomplishment more or less adequate to his support in life, while leaving him opportunity to attend to other business. But whether he turn this acquirement to account pecuniarily or not, his knowledge and skill in the art will continue an unfailing source of delight to himself and friends as long as life and health remain.

Is there one of us who, when his son leaves school to take his place in society, would not be glad to know that he had gained a taste for music, and some knowledge of it? Should we not consider it, in some sense, as a safeguard to restrain him from the pursuit of other and less salutary modes of enjoyment? Where there is music at home and an appreciation of it, the various forms of dissipations to which, for want of something better to occupy their leisure hours, the young are so prone, will lose their charms, and fail to make felt their pernicious attractions.

All this goes to show how deep a root music has taken among us, how rapidly it is growing, how widely extending, and how it demands, — and reasonably too, — a fostering hand and liberal support from those who are charged with the administration of the interests of public education. — N. E. Journal of Education.

BERLIOZ ON BEETHOVEN'S FOURTH SYMPHONY.

Of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony we allow Berlioz to speak, not only because he wrote his tribute at a time when to most Frenchmen Beethoven was still a mad German ideologist, but also because this portion of Berlioz's writings has not yet been translated into English. He says: "In this symphony Beethoven leaves the epic and the elegy, to return to the lowlier and brighter, but by no means less difficult style of the Second Symphony. The character of the score is, speaking generally, lively and cheerful, yet of heavenly tenderness. The first movement might have been dedicated to Joy, if we except the thoughtful Adagio by which it is introduced. The first motive of the Allegro, which is played staccato, is only a thematic foundation on which, with masterly hand, Beethoven bases other ideas with fully developed melodies. So that, as the movement progresses, we gradually lose sight of the opening theme.

"This peculiarly happy device has been tried with good results by Mozart and Haydn.

But we find in the second part of the Allegro a new thought, which at once commands the hearer's attention, and, after it has captivated him during its mysterious progress, surprises him by an unexpected termination. The effect is produced as follows: After a powerful tutti, the first violins dismember the theme, throw it over to the second violins and catch it again on the rebound. This dialogue ends on rests interrupted twice by the tympani, which sound a soft tremolo on B flat. Then the strings hum fragments of the theme, until the tympani find opportunity to take up the B flat again, which they roll during the succeeding twenty-five bars without interruption—growing louder with every bar. In the meantime fragments of the theme are heard with increasing strength on the other instruments, until the passage closes with a general fortissimo, ending with the B flat major chord in a majestic outburst of the full orchestra.

"This wonderful crescendo is one of the finest musical effects within my knowledge. It can be compared only to the crescendo which occurs at the end of the Scherzo of the symphony in C minor. Yet the latter is the weaker. It reaches the finale by a steady increase in the volume of sound, yet without once leaving the fundamental note. But in the Fourth Symphony the crescendo begins on a mezzo forte; weakens for a moment under harmonies of uncertain coloring, to pianissimo; then appears again in chords of more decided character, and shines in all its power only after the cloud of harmonies has dispersed. It might be compared to a river, whose peaceful current disappears awhile beneath the ground, to reappear a roaring torrent.

"It would be sacrilegious to analyze the Adagio. Its form is so pure, so clear, the melody so full of expression and of such amorous power, that the artistic design lies in the shadow of æsthetical beauty. The first few bars awaken the hearer's sympathy, and the movement plays upon his emotions until he almost succumbs to them. Only a hero among poets can approach this musical Titan. Only the pathetic episode which in the Divina Comedia Francesca di Rimini relates to Dante, who, when he heard the story, 'fell as one faint with a mighty sorrow,' can be compared with this Adagio.

"The Scherzo is full of thoughts which strongly incline toward the 2-4 rhythm, and enter into the 3-4 rhythm of the movement like mighty wedges. This method, which Beethoven frequently employs, makes the style unusually muscular; the melodic outlines are piquant and occasion surprise. In fact, rhythms which conflict with the tempo have a fascination not easy to explain. It gives pleasure to watch the dismembered form reunited at the end of every period, and to find the current of thought, which at times is interrupted, flow smoothly in the end. A delicious freshness pervades the Trio, whose melody is taken by wind instruments. The tempo is slower than that of the body of the Scherzo and its tasteful simplicity is more conspicuous by reason of contrast with the little phrases for the violins which tease the melody in a most charming manner.

"The lively and cheerful finale moves in the usual rhythmic form. It is an unbroken chain of sparkling tones, a continuous, bright conversation, which only occasionally is interrupted by rough, angry chords. The moody tone-poet indulged in these outbursts of passion quite frequently, as we shall point out in discussing other symphonies."—N. Y. Musical Review.

THE MOZART WEEK AT THE IMPERIAL HOUSE, OPERA VIENNA.¹

III.

We are called on to witness a peculiar Mozart celebration; the performance in uninterrupted succession of the composer's seven operas from Idomeneo to Titus. "But why do we have this commemorative festival especially now?" we repeatedly hear persons ask. The present time has nothing in common with either Mozart's birth, (1756), the centenary of which was kept twenty-four years ago, nor with the date of his passing away (1791). Yet we have to do with a remarkable centenary: that of Mozart's operas. We have reached the commencement of a decennium in which the beautiful seven-headed family attain the age of a hundred.² A century ago Mozart moved permanently to Vienna, and created here in the short space of ten years (1781-1791) his indescribably rich treasures of composition. From all the fields of music he conjured up the most magnificent blossoms and fruit: his finest symphonies, quartets, sonatas, and sacred productions. But the Vienna decennium, the last of his earthly pilgrimage, was more important for his operas than for aught else. It, therefore, devolves on our Imperial Opera house to celebrate his incomparable dramatic labors in a comprehensive manner. It matters not that other cities have been the first to set a good example; it is sufficient that Vienna, in festive attire, now follows it. Such a Mozart Week impoese, both on the management and the singers, a most unusual task. Rehearsals and performances press each other closely: three operas (Idomeneo, Così fan Tutte, and Titus) have to be studied entirely afresh, while the others must be partially recast and provided with new scenery. Added to the strain put on every available resource is the worrying dread lest some malicious chance may interrupt or throw into complete disarray the entire stately operatic procession. There can be no question that the Imperial Opera house is entitled to our grateful acknowledgments for its extraordinary efforts.

How vivid are at present all our reminiscences relating to the early portion of Mozart's sojourn in Vienna! We stop before the German House in the Singerstrasse. There Mozart lived with the haughty Colloredo, Archbishop of Salzburg, to whose household he belonged, and who had commanded his attendance. Young Mozart was revelling in the triumph of his Idomeneo at Munich, when he received the summons to repair to Vienna. On the 16th of March, 1781, he arrived "quite alone in a post-chaise from St. Pölten." The continuously unbecoming treatment he experienced from his Archbishop at length exhausted his patience and ended the servitude he had borne so long. He resolved to live independently on his art, and he never regretted having done so. Despite an uncertain and modest income he felt in Vienna at home and happy. But how little his position here corresponded with his high artistic worth, is unfortunately only too well known. Let any one compare Mozart's position in Vienna with that of Beethoven ten years later! It was as a stranger, without an appointment or reputation, that the young fellow from the Rhine came to the capital; he did not possess Mozart's early fame, winning manners, or social talents, yet he at once put himself on an equal footing with the leading members of the Austrian aristocracy. It was exclusively in his artistic eminence that he perceived his title to perfect equality, and he enforced his right, which was at once acknowledged, on every one. Borne unnoticed on the stormy wind of revolutionary ideas which was already blowing violently from France, Beethoven won for musicians a social position of which Haydn and Mozart in their modesty never dreamed. It was under the patronage of the Emperor Joseph, the founder, properly speaking, of German opera in Vienna, that Mozart wrote his first German Singspiel,³ Die Entführung aus dem Serail. The work was produced, in July, 1782, with unexampled success, and a month later the composer's marriage with his beloved Constance, whom it had cost him such efforts to win, was solemnized in St. Stephen's Church. Thus, with every one of his operas are connected familiar reminiscences especially dear to us Viennese. It is in these reminiscences and in the biographical connection of the operas that we perceive the real idea which, after the lapse of a hundred years, lies at the bottom of a continuous representation of the seven operas in question. They are united by no inward necessity; the æsthetic thread on which the seven gems are strung in a row is so slender as to be invisible. As to any coherence like that of Dingseldt's Shakespeare Cycles at the Burgtheater, nobody thinks of such a thing. In this series of operas there is not even a constant growth, a sevenfold rise, as in the diatonic scale; far less the continuous development and gradual perfection of some musically dramatic principle which Mozart had in his eye from the outset. What strikes us most in the series is not so much their continuity as the absence of that quality. The Italian Idomeneo moves in the conventional forms of the old "opera seria," and immediately afterwards Die Entführung aus dem Serail opens a new era in operatic history. Yet, despite the extraordinary and lasting success of this national German Singspiel, which, to use Goethe's expression, "struck down everything else," we behold Mozart forthwith abandoning this field also, and writing three Italian operas (Figaro, Don Giovanni and Così fan Tutte) one after another. Then, in the last year of his life, he gives us another German opera, Die Zauberflöte, and after this, his greatest popular triumph, another conventional Italian "Court Festival" opera, La Clemenza di Tito. These are riddles to be solved only by impartial examination of the history of Mozart's life. His sympathies were, properly speaking, divided between Italian and German opera. His national feeling impelled him to German, but his sense of art and music to Italian opera. Italian opera possessed a fully developed form of art reposing on sure traditions; German Singspiel resembled an undeveloped, helpless child, who had yet to be educated. How richly was Italian opera then mounted, how admirably was it executed by the best singers, how was it honored and loved at all German Courts—how poverty-stricken and neglected was, on the other hand, German Singspiel! I believe that, as a man, Mozart sympathized more with German, but as an artist more with Italian, opera. Thus, partial to both kinds, he followed in every case the changing circumstances, if not external pressure. He was no doctrinaire, no partisan of a certain fixed principle. He, therefore, eagerly seized on everything, either when commissioned to do so or urged thereto by his own feelings, which promised to advance him artistically. He felt probably in his heart that whatever he wrote, either to a German or an Italian text, would ultimately profit his country. He was a child of his time: the true expression of his time, then "becoming" new. The full reflection of Italian, and the modest morning-red of German opera, were visible side by side on the horizon. Mozart aided German opera to conquer, not merely by his writing German operas, but by his filling them with German feeling.

² When we speak generally of Mozart's operas, we refer, of course, to the last seven, written in the time of his full artistic maturity. If we include his youthful works, such as Mitridate, Lucio Silla, &c., written in Italy, the total number composed by him is nineteen.

Mozart's operas, as they follow one another, not merely fail to illustrate the continuous development of a fixed theoretical thought or of a principle or style, but do not even testify to a constant increase of his creative power. After Idomeneo and Die Entführung, he soars up in an extraordinary degree to Figaro and Don Juan, those culminating points of his creations; then he sinks somewhat, as though with fatigued pinion, to Così fan Tutte; raises himself again marvellously in Die Zauberflöte, but finally, in Titus, is able to recover only partially his exhausted strength. The remarkable contrast between his first two operas—after Idomeneo comes Die Entführung—is repeated still more strangely in the last two; after Die Zauberflöte comes Titus. In vain will those æstheticians and puny historians of civilization, who hear the grass of necessity growing, attempt to prove here a necessary internal connection. Even Mephisto's all-powerful logic with "One, two, three," would have to renounce the task of demonstrating that the way in which Mozart's operas follow each other is an organic development of an "idea." The series, considered in relation to the energy of creative power, does not exhibit a rising step by step, a sinking step by step, or lastly, an unbroken stay on the same level. This inequality strikes us more forcibly, perhaps, in Mozart than in any one else, because his name suggests the highest possible excellence, but the case is by no means an isolated one. On the contrary, the great composers whose operas maintain an equal elevation, unless when they rise above it, form the rare exception. There are several insignificant operas, such as Paris und Helena, La Cythère assiégée, &c., embedded at a far greater depth below Gluck's masterpieces than Così fan Tutte for instance, is below Don Juan and Die Zauberflöte. Beethoven stopped at Fidelio, in every sense his unique opera. And Carl Maria Weber? Any one considering Euryanthe an advance on Der Freischütz (the advance in my opinion, is rather one of desire than ability; an advance against one's own nature) must see a falling-off in Oberon. The stars of the second magnitude, Marschner, Spohr, and Lortzing, repeatedly fell off before, between, and after their best creations, not merely so many steps, more or less, but so many terraces. Meyerbeer—without experiencing any precipitous falls, (that is: thorough operatic failures) never reached a second time the height of Robert and Les Huguenots. Strictly speaking, Richard Wagner is the only operatic composer whose works show constant progress, a genuine evolution of style out of Rienzi to Tannhäuser and Lohengrin: then onward to Die Nibelungen, and probably still further to Parcifal. Whether his later operas exhibit a rise in his power of musical creation is a matter of opinion. We ourselves believe they do not, but they are unquestionably consistent realizations, constantly developed, more sharply marked, and further extended, of his peculiar art theory. He cannot be charged with sudden and abrupt changes; the atmosphere, as far as its component elements are concerned, is the same in Lohengrin as in Tristan or Rheingold, but it becomes with each succeeding work more rarified, sharper and colder, so that at length we cannot possibly breathe. All true lovers of music will probably welcome the solemn Mozart Week as a set-off for only once, against the Nibelungen-Cycluses, at present so popular. Now-a-days, a new and careful performance of Mozart's operas can, of a certainty, be followed only by the beneficial result of making people learn to feel more simply, to listen with greater pleasure, and to sing better.—London Musical World.

LETTERS FROM AN ISLAND.¹

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

V.

RUSSIAN, GREEK, ORIENTAL, MAORI FOLK-POETRY AND MUSIC; CANTERBURY IN ENGLAND, AMERICA, OCEANICA.

DEAR PŪNĀMU!²—In one species of national song, however, the Russian is not "sad and feminine," but actively tragic and masculine,—in the so-called "robber songs." Here we no longer find resignation, or the vicious excess of that virtue, gloomy, morose stagnation; here we leave the plain and the steppe, for heights and chasms; no more servitude; here is freedom, though perhaps only freedom to do evil. If woman is still sometimes half a slave, even among robbers and gypsies, the accomplice of the criminal, the booty of the victor, she sometimes appears, in these songs, free to take her own chances of life and death, and to have acquired at least the power to revenge herself when she will, though revenge may entail life-long remorse upon herself. Only the vampire songs of the Servians exceed these in darkly fascinating attraction. Among Russian songs of this class, there is one, powerfully impressive in its expression of the secret, concentrated revenge and hatred of a girl, who, having been deceived by her robber lover, slays him, and laughs in her sleeve, "with shuddering joy," at the grief of the returning robber horde, and their guesses at the possible manner of their chief's death. Some of these songs are brief dramas of recklessness and horror; some recount magnanimous deeds, of the Robin Hood kind, like that of the robber who empties his rubles into the sack of the poor traveler whom he had intended to plunder, when he finds that the object of his journey is the attempted release of his father from captivity. Here is a gentler song, but it is difficult to divine, from its tone, whether the abducted girl is likely to be regarded by her companions as a victim, or as a fortunate Cinderella, carried off by a fairy prince in the disguise of a bandit:—

Four maidens bathed in the azure waters,
 Four shining planets, four rosy daughters;
 Round them the soft wind sighed with emotion,
 Round them caressingly fawned the wild ocean.
 Lurking, the robber watched, in the rushes;
 Saw their glad frolics, saw their red blushes.
 Thought the dark robber, "Which shall be my maid,
 Which my sweet booty, gay maids or shy maid?
 One of the fair ones three, standing whitely
 Over the waters, laughing so lightly,
 Or yon shy beauty, so timid, so tender,

² Te Pūnāmu (the Pūnāmu), is the Maori name for the Greenstone, which is a product of the Island of New Zealand, and which has always been held in high estimation by the natives, for hatchets, short hand-clubs (for war), as well as for ornaments. It is also rather admired by the European settlers. Te Pūnāmu is the journalistic nom de plume of an Anglo-Maori gentleman, to whom the above letter is addressed.

Rose-bud red, dew-fresh, raven-haired, slender,
 Under the water veil sideways soft gliding,
 Deep in the wave, like a lily-bud hiding?"
 Silent the robber watched; happy laughter
 Rang, and the rocky cliffs echoed after.
 Three merry maidens, tossing from hollowed
 Palms the sea-water, one maiden followed;
 Mocked her, pursued her through the tall rushes,
 With spray bedewed her eyes and her blushes.
 "Mcdest Parascha, so tender, so tearful,
 When the wind touches thee, tremulous, fearful,
 Ne'er will a valiant lover pursue thee!
 Who will have patience, proud one, to woo thee,
 If that some robber czar from the rushes
 Sees not, desires not thee and thy blushes?
 Then he may grasp thee, far away bear thee,
 Heart-close enclasp thee, win thee, and wear thee."
 Scarce was their mischievous mockery over,
 Ere sprang the robber czar from his cover,
 Caught the shy fair one, far away bore her,
 Loved, soothed, consoled her, won her, and wore her.

Let me also mention en passant that while Russian folk-melody is not devoid of Grecian affinities, among the folk-poems of the modern Greeks, many robbers—or klept—songs are to be found, similar in character to those of the Russians. I will give you an English re-production of one, the horror of which is almost dispersed by the breath of an unfettered, tempestuous mountain freedom:—

On high Olympus,—summit dread!
 His heavy pinions folding,
 An eagle rests, a human head
 Within his talons holding;
 He gazes on the wrinkled brow,
 The neck, glaive-hewn and gory,
 And screams, "When with thy body thou Wert one, what was thy story?"—
 "Feed, eagle, on my brain's sharp strength,
 My man hood crushed, consume then!
 Thy wings, thy claws, in breadth and length
 Will double growth assume then!
 Well knew Xeromeros my name,
 Armatole, and Luros;
 Twelve years a klept of dreadful fame,
 Mine eyrie great Olympus.
 I slaughtered sixty Agas old,
 Their hamlets burned and plundered;
 Turks, Albanese, in scores untold,
 I soul from body sundered;—
 Let this much of my tale suffice.
 Thy hunger now unchaining,
 Eat! not unworthy is thy prize,
 Winged klept, unconquered reigning!"

The melodies of modern Greek folk-songs have less variety, and move within a narrower range than those of the natives of so large an empire as Russia; and we can only yield a conditional assent to the alleged high antiquity of this music, since doubt exists even regarding those few fragments now extant of antique Greek hymns, though these have been generally accepted as genuine. The modern Greeks, themselves, however, insist on claiming an extraordinary antiquity for their national dance of the Romaika; the annual festival upon which it is performed was instituted in the time of, and by Theseus, 1235 B. C., and the music which is now used to accompany it was, they say, expressly composed at the same date.

Songs of such wild strength as these robber-songs, alive with action, and not the flickering flame, but the blazing torch of passion, may or may not have been written by heroes and heroines inspired by the recollection of the adventures through which they passed; but if not, then by vigorous, imaginative minds, weary of dreams and disappointments, of servitude and stagnation, longing to feel, to see, to hear, to hate, to love, to act, unmistakably and in earnest! The same yearning desire for a life contrasting with the depressing reality of their own, has led men of a higher intellectual reach than the lyrists of folk-poetry and melody, into the Orient; like Bodensiedt, Heine, Freiligrath and other German poets; like Hamerling in his "Hero;" like Wagner amid his legendary characters; like Makart, Burne,

Jones, Alma Tadema among the painters, with their subjects and types; like Robert Schumann in many of his compositions, they fly from the prosaic realities of the present to the past or the distant; nothing is too novel, too foreign, for them, nothing too dazzling, too pronounced; give us, they cry, the gold-dust of the East, amethystine haze, mirage, drums, trumpets, a labyrinthine chorus of voices! Displace the fogs of the North by a myriad-tinted glow, entangle the machine-like routine of a calculated existence in the mysteries of harmony forever unresolved! And what can better serve such a desire than the folk-song? He or she who is so fortunate as to possess a rare collection of these, to be familiar with half-a-dozen or more languages, and to be a good practical musician, can, while preserving the most exclusive isolation, travel round the world at will, and enter into the very core of the heart of opposite nationalities, living, for a moment, with all the life that vitalizes them. In singing a Scottish air, one glows with the obstinate patriotism, one laments with the mist-fed melancholy of the Scot; through the enchanting pulsations of a gypsy dance song, we see not alone the wild wood, illumined by red camp-fires, not alone the vast Hungarian puzzler, but we enter into that passionate love of freedom, that untamable individuality, which is, for us, the chiefest charm of the Nomadic races. Follow me, then, for a few brief moments, with the folk-song as our guide, into the land of the "Thousand and one Nights," Arabia; I promised you a few Oriental folk-songs in my first letter. Naturally, I have preferred, in taking the trouble to translate them, those that most appeal to my own—to womanly—feeling; and, tell me, do not the following songs breathe a spirit of chivalrous delicacy and devotion, such as we—arrogant Western barbarians that we are!—are astonished to find among the tribes of the desert? The fourth is Turkish, and very nobly expresses a deep sentiment of constancy, above which plays the fleeting spirit of inconstancy. The fifth, by Ithi, possesses a strong contemporary local color and feeling.

I roam through sandy, blazing wildernesses;
 She rests beneath the Talha's leafy tresses.
 Sharp thistles wound my feet, that wearied, dally;
 She wanders down the violet-scented valley.
 I hear the jackal's scream, the djinn's shrill hooting;
 She lists the nightingale's melodious fluting.
 Oh, would her tent dog, barking, run to meet me!
 Oh, would her pleasant tent's sweet welcome greet me!
 I sigh for thee, Sulfikka, Kanab's daughter,
 As pants the wounded hart for running water!

Vain are anguish and rapture, vain are labor and rest;
 Soon in the tent of death man lies, a never departing guest.

Where, where is she whom once I deemed of houri's immortal race,
 Reya, black-haired and sapphire-eyed, young Reya,
 with rose-bright face,
 Fair as the morn, dark as the night? All women beloved before

Shrank in her presence like worthless dust, that drops from the golden ore.

Voice that rang, a crystal bell, to the beat of a heart of gold!

Smile, whose spell could swell one moment to aeons of joy untold!

Lips, the shrine of the roses' blush, where slept the breath of the rose!

Eyes, beside whose light all eyes paled, phantoms of buried woes!

Woe! I knew her, adored her! I basked in that vital ray!

Say not she died long years ago! She dies to my heart each day.

What now is left of the sun that once transfigured this world's wide gloom?

A lock of hair in my bosom; a handful of dust in her tomb.

Vain are anguish and rapture; vain are labor and rest;
 Soon in the tent of death man lies, a never departing guest!

I spake ;— in the hushed encampment
Men, camels, and steeds, sleep still ;
Morn slips the bolt of the midnight ;
Sweet Ama, love's goblet fill !
She spake ;— The spirits of evil
Close, close, o'er the desert fly ;
I hear them mutter and whisper ;
Pale genii are hovering nigh !
I spake ;— From thy sweet embraces
I win the magical might
That rolls earth under my footstep,
Or stays the wheels of the night.
Fear not the rush of the sand-storm,
Fear not the leopard's breath ;
The kisses of happy lovers
Disarm the angel of death.

Because I strive in vain that heart to warm,
Shall this heart float adrift in passion's storm ?
No, no ! Though Fate may bend not to my will,
Thy staff, Philosophy, consoles me still.
Away with dreams ! I'll seek Stamboul's delight,
Where vain chimeras all are put to flight.
There Manritanian figs in strong wine warm ;
There floats the Almé's alabaster form.
Yes, though thou scornest me, Aïssa, loved too well,
Eyes dark as thine still burn, oh, wild gazelle !
Capricious, toss this aching heart away :
Rose-cheeks like thine still mock the rising day.
And yet, why shun thee ? days o'erbrimmed with care,
And sleepless nights were mine, wert thou not there.
Who will, may drain long draughts of dawning fire ;
Love's bitter chalice be my sole desire !
Who will, may woo the Almé's soulless wiles ;
Lead me still captive to thy chary smiles !
Let frowns o'ergloom those eyes, let smiles illumine,
Their rays alone shall light me to the tomb.
Though now thou scornest me, Aïssa, patience ! key
Some day shall ope the door of victory !

Bright sultana of all hearts,
Laughing, lovely Frank, Louisa !
Source of soulfelt cares and smarts,
Captivating young Louisa !
Fiery spears the heart impale
Of each fated youth who sees her,
Yet may never cruel veil
Hide the face of sweet Louisa !
Joy in Islam I have lost,
I can think but how to please her,
By a heretic passion tost
For the peerless Frank, Louisa !
Though my soul, this love should bear
Thee where tortures burn and freeze—ah,
Would'st thou count that price unfair,
Could'st thou thereby gain Louisa ?

But I will strike a wilder string ; listen to the eager pulsations of this war song :—

Too pale the glow Love's blisses bestow !
A wilder transport these pulses know ;
When to songs of war my heartstrings vibrate,
A burning sand-storm, I rush on the foe !
They drone no moan of pitiful woe ;
Frenzy, flame, from those clangors flow ;
Through riot and rapture of slaughter, elate,
A hungry leopard, I spring on the foe !
Sand stings, thirst tortures, angry wounds glow ;
To joust with the lightning a thousand go ;
Through war's red roar rings the trumpet of Fate,
The right hand of Fate, I shatter the foe !

It does not always happen that a good-folk poem is wedded to a good melody. Sometimes the air is good of its kind, the accompanying poem insignificant ; sometimes the verse is good, the melody weak. But as a folk-song is not an art-song, we cannot expect it to be complete, a work of art in music, words, structure, expression ; if it prove so occasionally, it is only from an accidental, momentary concentration and heightening of comparatively inferior creative genius.

You must not expect from me a technical dissertation on the peculiarities of Oriental music ;
this is one of the especial provinces of historians and antiquarians, though composers also seek, and often find in such a study, and similar ones, many suggestions in regard to novel effects of melody, harmony, and rhythm. But the chief characteristics of all Oriental music may be summed up in two ; syncopated or broken rhythm or measure, and inharmonic coloring, abounding in half, and even quarter tones. It is doubtful whether we ever obtain a just idea of Oriental music, by means of our system of notation, since it differs so greatly from the Oriental, and does not contain symbols of a nature to convey, through the eye, an adequate outline of that. However,

I will give you two rare specimens ; the first is the melody of an Arabian popular song, the second a Turkish march brought to Europe by the Marquis of Lothian.

You, an Anglo-Maori, are perhaps aware that the Maories are said to be gifted with a peculiar facility in intoning and distinguishing quarter tones ; and that an essay has been written to prove that the Maori system of intervals closely resembles the inharmonic genus of the Greeks.
A gentleman not unknown to you, Sir George Grey, has something to say about this in his book on Polynesian mythology. He (as well as Shortland and Davies), has given more than one specimen of Maori folk-songs ; one, a girl's complaint, and in as "sad and feminine" a manner as any Russian song : "Ah, how fine was the clothing of the fair foreign sea-god ! But I, alas, must return to my rags, to my nothing-at-all !"

After your return to Canterbury in Maori-land, you may some day, in one of your country excusions gaze from Looker-on-Mountain through cloud diadems to the Kaikoura and the Amuri bluff ;
you will see the magnificent reach of the coast line, with the fringe of algae that imparts to the edge of the water its Rembrandtesque brown, and beyond the snowy surf, the aqua-marine tint of the dashing rollers, the more distant greenish hue that imperceptibly melts into the deep, dark blue of the fathomless ocean ; think then, of those imperceptibly melting chromatic quarter tones of Oriental and Maori melodies, and search for some aboriginal airs, composed by some unappreciated, "inglorious" (though not "mute") semi-demi-countryman of your own, and send them to me, "for sweet remembrance sake !"

My first letter to you began with an observation on the international and artistic nature of life and feeling on the island ; the idea that originated that, and the two succeeding ones, was quite in character with the spirit of such a life, though, superficially, far removed from Russian,
Oriental, or Maori folk-songs, Bodenstedt, Hafiz or Pōūnāmu ; yet enchaind with them all as all human ideas, persons, things, must be with each other, no matter how distant apparently. It was in the lovely county of Kent, "the garden of England," not a thousand miles from Canterbury, that I first met one of my dearest friends, and the nearest of yours, now a Crown commissioner in the Canterbury of New Zealand. You know, that in the vicinity of the island there stands a college in which a certain gentle doctor in Apollo is practically interested. Thither I wended my way, a few weeks ago, in response to an invitation to attend a lecture on the architecture of the Cathedral of Canterbury, delivered by Professor Cady Eaton, an American gentleman of European culture, and travelled experience, fond of art, and formerly professor at Yale College. The lecture was accompanied by illustrations, collected in England, and giving a very fair idea to those who never saw it, of the most interesting of English churches after Westminster Abbey. But ah ! to me they brought back far more than the antique and storied walls that enclose the shrine of Becket ! They peopled the simple lecture hall with tones and visions,— of an ancient church, its square tower, ivy-en-clashed ; its deep portal, its carved marble screens, the quiet services in which birds were not infrequent choristers ; of a secluded rectory, embos-omed in soft and flowery fields and gardens, climbing roses nodding by scores, through the lattices, a scent of rose and lavender floating through all the house,—the coo of doves from the grove beside the stream, the swell and fall of chimes from the distant churches of three parishes,—the common, with its gorse and glowworms, the mill pond, the rookery, the hop gardens, and the wide, rich stretch of the Weald of Kent,—all enhanced by the "light that never was on sea or land," the light of memory and love ! And thence, by a natural transition, from that rectory and its surroundings, which are so dear to you and to me, to Canterbury in New Zealand, to you, to your request in regard to folk-songs, to the recent arrival of von Bodenstedt in America, to Russian and Oriental folk-songs ;—and hence these letters !
Yours faithfully, F. R. R.

ERRATA.—In Mrs. Ritter's letter of Jan. 1, the names of the poets Koslow and Daumer, were incorrectly printed as Kosland and Danmer. In the second Oriental song, line 10, for "drop" read droop ; in the third, for "foam-flesh," read foam/fresh. In the letter of Feb. 28, five Russian folk-songs were inadvertently enclosed with quotation marks ; these translations, however, are all Mrs. Ritter's own. In the two peasant songs in same letter, for "bogar" read boyar ;
in the note, for "Awoff," read Lwoff.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LONDON.—Herr Joachim, the great violinist, is on his annual visit here, and played in the Monday Popular Concert of February 16th, a Bach Prelude and Fugue for violin solo, besides leading in a Quartet of Beethoven, and of Haydn. The correspondent of our New York neighbor writes : "His tone is fuller, broader, and more majestic than that of any other violinist now before the English public ;
his repertory is confined to the noblest and the best music ; while as a master of technique he has no superior and but one rival, Herr Wilhelmj."—Carl Rosa, with his English Opera Troupe, has brought out Lohengrin in a new version by Mr. J. P. Jackson, with the German tenor, Schott, in the part of the Knight of the holy Graal, Miss Gaylord (American) as Elsa, and Miss Josephine Yorke as Ortrud. Aida, too, is promised. Mr. Rosa is convalescent, and expected soon from Nice.—The performances of Beethoven's Symphonies, in successive chronological order, commenced February 21st, at the Crystal Palace, under Mr. Manns. They are to be continued weekly, closing April 17th, with the Choral, No. 9.—The most recent number of Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians contains a very interesting and exhaustive article, from the Editors's own pen which is doubtless a worthy companion piece to his admirable article on Beethoven. The issue of the quarterly number (January 1), was delayed by Mr. Grove's personal researches about Mendelssohn in Berlin and Leipzig; it has not yet reached us here in Boston.—The dates for the Grand Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace, have been fixed for Friday, June 18, (rehearsal), Monday, June 21, Wednesday, 23, and Friday, 25.—Mr. Sims Reeves, the great English tenor, will retire from public life, after a concert tour extending probably over two years. He was born in 1821, and has been singing in public over forty years.

—ONE of London's most successful musical organizations is about to put out the lights and take in its sign; Figaro, (February 18) tells us:—

THE farewell season of the Henry Leslie Choir began at St. James' Hall on Thursday. In a sort of preface to the book of words a brief account was given of the rise and progress of the famous choir, and of the reasons which have induced Mr. Henry Leslie to disband it at the close of this year. The scheme originated in the autumn of 1855, when thirty or forty ladies and gentlemen met Mr. Henry Leslie in one of the small rehearsal rooms of the defunct Hanover Square Rooms, for the purpose of practicing unaccompanied music of the English glee and madrigal school. The idea originated with Mr. Joseph Heming, an enthusiast in the cause, the voices having been most carefully selected by him, and with such forces Mr. Leslie resolved to attempt to do for English music what had been so ably done by the Berlin Dom Choir and the Cologne students for German choral art. The first performances of Mr. Henry Leslie's choir gave it at once the position it has ever since held. Some years ago the number of the Henry Leslie choir was restricted to 240, and at that figure it has since remained. Altogether apart from its work in popularising some of the finest unaccompanied music of all schools, many of the greatest artists of the day have come from the ranks of the Henry Leslie choir. Chief, perhaps, among the "old choristers" are Mme. Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Joseph Barnby, while Miss Orridge, Mme. Mudie Bolinbroke, and many others have been members of the choir. The reason of the disbanding on the choir is plainly stated in the preface, to which allusion has been made. It is stated: "The time has, however, come within the heart and soul of this great choral body must have less arduous work than is necessitated by the elaborate and exhausting rehearsals essential to a continuance of the high standard of excellence aimed at throughout the existence of the choir, and though Mr. Leslie does not pledge himself to make a last appearance in 1880, but may from time to time appear as a conductor, yet, at the termination of the present season, the dissolution of the choir will take place, and its work of a quarter of a century be brought to a close." The date of the final, or "Festival," concert is not yet fixed, but in addition to the four concerts already announced, an afternoon performance will be given on June 10, and the "Festival" concert towards the end of the same month will, so far as England is concerned, conclude the choir's career.

The programme of the concert of Thursday was, as is Mr. Henry Leslie's custom during Lent, restricted to sacred music, and contained for the most part pieces selected from the choir's ordinary repertory. Among the chief works were Bach's motet for double choir, "Sing ye to the Lord," a singularly complex work, which has been for some time past identified, at least in England, with the Leslie choir; Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," and the beautiful setting of the 23d Psalm by Schubert, sung by the ladies of the choir. A "Kyrie" from a Mass by Leonardo Leo, Dr. William Pole's setting for double choir of the 100th Psalm, and Mr. Alfred Gaul's "The Better Land," were also given; while an exceedingly graceful part-song, entitled "Homeward," by Mr. Leslie himself, was sung and repeated. Mr. Maas and Madame Patey were the vocalists, the gentleman singing "Comfort ye," in a manner worthy the traditions of our school of oratorio; while the lady was heard in Gounod's "There is a green hill," and in Mr. Leslie's own song, "I saw a golden sunbeam fall."

CRYSTAL PALACE.—From the same paper (February 14), we learn that Mendelssohn's Octet has been played there too by all the strings of the orchestra, as well as here in Boston. "Cherubino" writes:

Once before, if I recollect rightly, in October, 1869, the same experiment was attempted with a result, that for nearly ten years it has not been repeated. Then, as now, if I remember correctly, Mr. George Grove offered manifold excuses, quoted the opinions of Schumann, and pointed out that the symphonic form of the octet rendered it peculiarly liable to the term of a "symphony in disguise." The best proof that the octet is not likely to suffer by its distribution among the strings of Mr. Mann's orchestra, lies, however, first, in the fact that Mendelssohn by implication and, it is understood, by words (though I believe their authenticity has been questioned) sanctioned the affair; and, secondly, that the effect gained by the body of instruments is undoubtedly new. As we all know, Mendelssohn himself orchestrated the celebrated scherzo for the symphony in C minor, dedicated to the Philharmonic Society, and generally known as No. 1, although it is numbered 13 in the Philharmonic catalogue. All these matters, therefore, afford sufficient justification to the Crystal Palace authorities to play the octet in E flat in symphony fashion, and if Mr. Grove were to seek for any further excuse, its magnificent performance by the Crystal Palace orchestra would supply it. In the programme itself there were no novelties. The "Dance of Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy" march, from Berlioz' "Damnation de Faust," have already frequently been heard in the concert room, to say nothing of the performance of the complete work a year or two ago on the stage of Her Majesty's Theatre. Mlle. Janotha played the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, and Mme. Sinico sang.

LEIPZIG.—On the anniversary of Mozart's birth, the fifteenth Gewandhaus Concert had a Mozartian Programme. The fourteenth Concert offered: Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; two Choral songs ("Das Dürfchen" and "Das Schifflein") by Schumann; Bacchanal from the ballet, Achille à Scyros, Cherubini (first time); Overture to Calderon's Dame Kobold, Reinecke; "Schicksalslied," for chorus and orchestra, Brahms; Variations on Haydn's "God save the Emperor," by the whole stringed Orchestra; Chorus of Dervishes, Turkish March, and Solenn March and Chorus, from Beethoven's Ruins of Athens.

PARIS.—The sixteenth Concert Populaire (Pas deloup) opened with the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz, which delighted the Parisians as usual. Two novelties were: the second Violin Concerto by Saint-Saëns, and the lyric poem, Atala, by Mme. de Grandval. The seventeenth programme included: Symphony in D (No. 45), Haydn; Offertoire, Gounod; Beethoven's Violin Concerto, played by M. Marsick; Kermesse (first time) by B. Godard; Romance from Mozart's Così fan Tutte, sung by M. Naudin; and Overture to Freyschütz.

The ninth and tenth Concerts of the Conservatoire commenced with the Dramatic Symphony, Roméo et Juliette, by Berlioz, and finished with "the ravishing Symphony in G, of Haydn, the creator of the Symphony." There was also given a fragment of the Prometheus music by Beethoven, and a chorus from Mendelssohn's St. Paul.

—For the eleventh Concert (Sunday, Feb. 22), the programme offered: Symphony in F, Beethoven; Pater Noster, unaccompanied chorus, Meyerbeer; Overture to Le Giaour, Th. Gouvy; Chorus from Armide, Lulli; Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn.

—At the Concert of the Châtelet, Mme. Essipoff achieved a brilliant success in the G minor Concerto of Saint-Saëns; and M. Camille Lelong, likewise, in the Violin Concerto of Mendelssohn. The other selections were: Overture to Le Vénitien, by M. Albert Cohen; Symphony in D minor, Schumann, and a fragment from the Roméo et Juliette of Berlioz.

—At the Opera, in the same week, the pieces given were: Der Freyschütz, Yedda, Hamlet and the Muette de Portici. At the Opéra Comique, La Fille du Regiment, Fra Diavolo, Les Dragons de Villars, Le Pré-aux-Clercs, La Dame Blanche, Lalla Roukh, Le Maçon, Les Diamants de la Couronne, L'Etoile du Nord, Les Rendezvous Bourgeois, Le Chalet, and Le Pain bis. At the Gaité, Paul et Virginie, Pétrarque, La Traviata. Verdi is in Paris and has commenced rehearsals of Attila at the Opera.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

A full week's festival of harmony, all brought about by chance, concludes to-night. Concerts always thicken as the season draws to an end; but rarely are so many concerts of importance crowded into a single week, as we have now been having. Here is the calendar: Monday afternoon, Miss Maurer; evening, Mr. Perabo, with a remarkable quantity of new music, including an Octet for strings by Bargiel; Tuesday evening, the Apollo Club; Wednesday evening, the last University Concert, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, with Prof. Paine's new Symphony, and the Euterpe Concert in Boston; Thursday afternoon, the Seventh Harvard Symphony Concert, with Paine's new Symphony and Mr. Sherwood in Beethoven's G major Concerto; Thursday evening, Friday evening, and Saturday afternoon, the three twice-postponed Joseffy Concerts; Saturday evening, Concert by Mr. Arthur Foote. To attend and appreciate them all, together with rehearsals, and such preparation as would ensure a fit state of mind for listening, would require a general suspension of business and a whole week's holiday. Even a poor musical editor, who is presumed to carry several extra pairs of ears about him, must lose some of it. For any extended review of it in this Journal, which goes to press on Thursday, a later number must serve. We turn now to things of a week or two past.

Mendelssohn's Octet, composed just before his Shakespearian fairy Overture, as a birth-day present to Rietz, full of artistic, plastic faculty, and full of spirit, and of verve, would no doubt, even with all the strings, have sounded better in a smaller hall,—say in the Sanders Theatre—and considering the lack of color contrasts through reeds, flutes and brass, may have been found somewhat monotonous at the end of so long a programme. But it was finely rendered, and heard with close attention by all who remained to the end. The work, in fact, is laid out on the broad scale of a Symphony and there is marked contrast of character between its several movements, especially between the airy, fairy, mystical and almost ghostlike Scherzo and the grand sweep and rush, like a freshet, of the Presto finale. The Overture to "Les Abencerrages" is a genial, spirited, enjoyable composition, ranking perhaps next in importance to Cherubini's Wasserträger and Medea preludes.

Mme. Rivé-King displayed rare strength, firmness and certainty of grasp, neatness, finish, fluency and grace in her execution of the brilliant and difficult Concerto of Saint-Saëns. She played with freedom and enthusiasm, making a brilliant mark for herself, especially in the much admired Scherzando movement, with its exhilarating hunter's rhythm.

Miss May Bryant, who seemed in a great measure to have overcome the nervousness which has partially defeated her few public efforts here before, has a simple, noble, large, artistic style of singing, which confirms the promise of her face and outward bearing. Her voice, a rich mezzo soprano, is very evenly developed; the tones are given out frankly and clearly; her phrasing is excellent; and she sings with soul and pure expression. She gave the Prayer of Penelope with chaste dramatic fervor; and she entered into the spirit of the three German Songs (her German pronunciation being remarkably pure), which were nicely accompanied by Mr. Foote.

We add the programme for this week's Concert (the last but one):

Overture to "Coriolan," Beethoven.
Piano Concerto in G. Beethoven.
William H. Sherwood.
New Symphony, "Spring" in A, . . . John K. Paine.
Piano Solo: Grand Fantaisie, Op. 17, middle movement. Schumann.
William H. Sherwood.
Overture: "Becalmed at Sea, and Perilous Voyage," Mendelssohn.

The Concertstück of Schumann for four horns, promised for the last Concert, has been found impracticable for any horns now commonly in use. The programme, therefore, of the Eighth and Last Concert, for March 25, stands thus:

Overture: "Weihe des Hauses," Beethoven.
Piano Concerto in F sharp minor (first time in America), Hans von Bronsart.

B. J. Lang.
Three short Marches, from "Figaro,"
"Magic Flute," and "Fidelio," Mozart, Beethoven.
Symphony, No. 9 in C, Schubert.

UNIVERSITY CONCERTS.—The fourth and last but one, which we were disabled from attending, took place on Wednesday evening, February 25, when an enthusiastic audience listened to the two movements of Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor and to the charming E flat Symphony of Mozart; also to a quaint "Rigadon de Dardanus," by Rameau; and to a brilliant performance by Mme. Rivé-King of the second Concerto (G minor) of Saint-Saëns. The Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Bernhard Listemann, is said to have acquitted itself admirably.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The Sixth Symphony Concert (fifteenth season) which came right upon the heels of the Cambridge Concert, Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, had a large audience to enjoy the following programme, whose only fault was its rather too great length:—

Overture to "Les Abencerrages" Cherubini.
Recitative and prayer: Penelope Mourning.
Scene from "Odysseus" Max Bruch.
Miss May Bryant.
Piano-forte Concerto, No. 2, in G minor,
Op. 22. Saint Saëns.
Andante sostenuto.—Allegro Scherzando.
—Presto.

Madame Julia Rivé-King.
Symphony No. 4, in B flat, Op. 60 Beethoven.
Song with Piano-forte
a. Rastlose Liebe (Restless Love). Schubert.
b. Ern Stüdelein wohl vor Tag" Franz.
c. Romanze Brahms.
Miss May Bryant.
Octet, in E flat, Op. 20. (By all the Strings) Mendelssohn.
Allegro moderato ma con fuoco.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Presto.

The fourth Symphony, standing as it does between the two giants, the Eroica and the sublime one in C Minor, doubtless seems to some comparatively light for Beethoven; and indeed it has affinities, as Berlioz has well pointed out in the description which we copy in another column, with the fresh, elastic, joyous Number Two, in D. And joy, too, is a characteristic, is the whole tendency and last result of all Beethoven's Symphonies, and indeed of all his music; when you have heard that "Hymn to Joy" in the Ninth Symphony, you feel that his creative aspiration tended still to that. Beethoven, in his music, in his life, with all that he experienced, all that he expressed of struggle and of pain, all his Promethean agonies, all that there is dark and deep and mystically brooding in his thoughts and his imaginings, is still the greatest optimist. "Freude, schöner Götterfunken!" is his creed, for to him Joy means love and brotherhood and the embrace of all the myriads of Humanity. But we think that Berlioz, in emphasizing the light-hearted, joyous and elastic character of this Symphony, does not quite recognize its tender, sentimental quality. He wrote grander Symphonies, but none more lovely, none more tender, delicate, and passion-fraught than this. It is warm music; a whole rhythmic history of deep, consuming love, with its hopes and its despairs, its fitful moods, its infinite longings, its Platonic meditations, reveries, exquisite caprices, depths "most musical, most melancholy," and heights of rapture uncontainable and heaven-storming. In sentiment, spirit, age, (speaking as of the heart's lifetime), it has always seemed to us to class with the song "Adelaide," and such Sonatas as the Pathétique the "Moonlight," and that entitled Les Adieux, l'Absence et la Retour. At any rate, one feels this in the wonderful Adagio, with the throbbing figure that pervades its stately rhythm, and which beats beneath its exquisite, fond, long-drawn melody; and in the slow introduction to the joyous Allegro vivace. The Symphony was delicately, brightly and appreciatively rendered; it is one to which Mr. Zerrahn, we understand, is partial; well he may be.

CECILIA.—The second concert of the season (Feb. 27) had the usual eager audience, filling the Music Hall. It opened with one of the shorter ones of Bach's 250 or more sacred Cantatas: "Bleib bei uns" ("Bide with us, for eve is drawing onward"). The opening chorus, and the setting of the two chorals, in the middle and at the end, are, in rich, massive, noble harmony for mixed voices, and were sung in broad, even style, with good ensemble, but seemed hardly to excite the general audience, although the few, who had made themselves more at home in the Bach music, enjoyed them sincerely. We do not know whether this music would have proved much more effective, had it been given with orchestra as Bach intended, instead of organ only. The Airs, for Alto (Miss Clara J. Poole) and Tenor (Dr. Langmaid) were finely sung, especially the latter, which was warmly received; and the Recitative, for Bass, was well delivered by Mr. Frank L. Young.—We wonder that the 43d Psalm by Mendelssohn, a very short, and a very vigorous and stirring one: "Judge me, O God," has not been heard here before. It made a decided impression, being finely sung and with a will.—This was followed by a Latin sacred song, "O quam suavis," which sounded very Italian for Mendelssohn, and which we know not where to look for among his works. It was very beautifully sung by Dr. Langmaid, who was in his best voice. Mendelssohn was still further represented by selections from Athalia, namely, the Trio and Chorus: "Promised joys! Menaced woes!" and the grand chorus of praise, "Heaven and earth proclaim." The Trio was very satisfactorily presented by Mrs. G. K. Hooper, Miss Ella M. Abbott, and Mrs. C. C. Noyes.

The Second Part was secular and composed of choice part-songs and glees. First, the beautiful "Spring Night," by Robert Franz; then a lovely "Spring Song" for female voices, by Cade; then a funny ding-dong glee by Stewart: "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower," which was encored. Three German songs, by Grieg, Ries, and Sucher, were sung with a hearty fervor and abandon (Mr. Lang accompanying), and with pleasing, sympathetic voice, by Miss Abbott; and the concert closed with a nicely wrought modern Madrigal, in old centrapuntal style: "Charm me asleep," by Leslie and the "Hunting Song" by Mendelssohn. All these pieces were sung to a charm.

The main feature of the next concert, April 12, will be Schumann's Manfred music, with orchestra, and a reading of portions of Byron's text.

MISS HENRIETTA MAURER.—The first of the two Matinées, by this young pianist who studied several years at the Conservatory in Moscow, took place on Monday, March 1, at Mechanic's Hall, exciting not a little interest, which was rewarded by the artistic rendering of the following programme:

SONATA FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN. Niels Gade.
Miss Maurer and Mr. Listemann
ARIA. "L'Eremita." Coletti.
Signor Cirillo.
ARIA CON VARIATIONE. Handel.
Miss Maurer.
CONCERT-ARIA. Mendelssohn.
Mrs. Marchington.
SERENADE. Schubert.
Signor Cirillo.
{ a. NOCTURNE, F sharp. Chopin.
{ b. MENUETTO. Schubert.
Miss Maurer.
"LA ZINGARELLA." Canzone. Paesello.
Mrs. Marchington.

VALE DE CONCERT. Wieniawski.
Miss Maurer.
DUET. Corticelli's celebrated melody. Cirillo.
Mrs. Marchington and Signor Cirillo.

Miss Maurer's interpretations bore the marks of intelligent and earnest study, and of musical feeling; her touch is clear and vital; her execution facile, neat and often brilliant. The "Harmonious Blacksmith" Variations, and the Concert Waltz by Wieniawski, were particularly well played. Mrs. Marchington, a pupil of Signor Cirillo, sang the exacting "Infelice" of Mendelssohn in a clear, bright, even voice, and with good style and phrasing. The master himself has seldom used his rich baritone voice to better advantage; he sang the Schubert Serenade delightfully.

We were unable to attend the second Matinée (March 8), which we hear was found still more enjoyable. We can only give the programme:

RONDO BRILLANT FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN. Schubert.
Miss Maurer and Miss Shattuck.
CANZONE AFRICANA. Hackensallner.
Signor Cirillo.
VARIATIONEN, C minor. Beethoven.
Miss Maurer.
ARIA FROM "LA JUIVE." Halévy.
Mrs. Richardson.
FINALE FROM VIOLIN CONCERTO. Mendelssohn.
Miss Shattuck.
"IL SOGNO." Mercadante.
Signor Cirillo.
{ a. PRELUDE AND FUGUE, F sharp. Bach.
{ b. VALSE ALLEMANDE. Rubinstein.
{ a. LIED DER MIGNON. Schubert.
{ b. AUF DEM WASSER ZU SINGEN. }
Mrs. Richardson.
TARANTELLA. Liszt.
Miss Maurer.
DUET. Handel's "Lascia ch'lo pianga." Cirillo.
Mrs. Richardson and Signor.

MISS TERESA CARRENO CAMPBELL'S Complimentary Concert last Saturday evening was in all respects a great success. Union Hall was completely filled with an audience in the best sense of the word "select,"—people whose presence was in itself flattering to the fair young violinist of sixteen. The programme was well selected and arranged:

QUARTET IN D, Haydn.
Allegro Moderato. Adagio Cantabile.
Miss Campbell, Messrs. Allen, Fries, and Heindl.
PIANO SOLO—Polonaise in E flat, Chopin.
Miss Mary M. Campbell.
SONGS. { a. "Barcarolle." Robert Franz.
{ b. "The Evening Hour." }
Mr. Edward Bowditch.
VIOLIN SOLO—Polonaise in A, Wieniawski.
Miss Teresa Carreno Campbell.
ARIA—"Pur dicesti," Lotti.
Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen.
PIANO SOLO—Scherzo No. 2, in B flat minor, op. 31, Chopin.
Mr. B. J. Lang.
SONGS, Jensen.
Mr. Edward Bowditch.
VIOLIN SOLO—Air on the 4th String, Bach-Wilhelmj.
Miss Teresa Carreno Campbell.
SONG—Kerry Dance, Molloy.
Mrs. Humphrey-Allen.
SYMPHONY CONCERTANTE—(Two Violins), Dancila.
Miss Campbell and Mr. Allen.

The talent and fine promise of the maiden violinist was very evident in all her performances, from her leading of the Haydn Quartet, to her sure and brilliant execution of the Polonaise, and her interpretation, with so much artistic feeling, of the Aria by Bach. For an encore she played the Album Piece by Wagner. The Duet, by Dancila, too, was very bright and full of life. Miss Mary Campbell proved herself an accomplished Pianist; and it need not be said that Mr. Lang's rendering of the Chopin Scherzo was masterly. The singing was excellent. Mrs. Allen was in remarkably good voice and won the warmest recognition. Mr. Bowditch, a Boston amateur, though living for some years past in Albany, gave unqualified delight by his sweet, manly voice, and the chaste, refined, unaffected style and feeling of his songs; his kindness was largely drawn upon for more and he responded with good grace.

The young lady has every reason to feel encouraged by her first Concert.

Due notice of a long list of concerts is unavoidably deferred.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, MARCH 1. — On Tuesday evening, February 24, occurred the fourth and last concert of the N. Y. Quintet Club, with this programme:—
String Quartet, Op. 41, No. 3. in A, Schumann.
Piano Trio. G major, Haydn.
Reisebilder, (Piano and 'Cello), Kiel.
(Messrs Mills and Müller).
Piano Quintet. Op. 114, Schubert.

Schumann's lovely Quintet was played very well indeed, and Mr. Arnold's excellent technique showed to especial advantage. This gentleman has an excellent tone, a firm bow, and an admirable conception. He is a most capable leader in chamber music, and it is largely due to his ability that the soirées of the N. Y. Philharmonic Club have been of such artistic merit.

The Haydn Trio, — a melodious and unassuming work, was played by Mr. Müller ('cello), Miss Marie Lobeck (violin), and Miss Martha Lobeck (piano). Its performance introduced the element of variety, for it was a happy compound of professional ability ('cello and school-girlish capacity.) The violinist has a good tone, and fair execution; but the pianist had as much (or as little) idea of the proper use of the pedal as have most of the fair sex, and her execution was slim.

Messrs. Mills and Müller gave an effective performance of the next number, and somewhat raised our drooping spirits. Their "Travel-pictures" are beautiful little musical sketches, which have not before been given here; they are thoughtfully written, and some of the enharmonic transitions are very pleasing. They seem more dependent for their attractive qualities upon their "musicality," than upon any display of technique.

Schubert's charming "Trout" Quintet hardly received fair treatment: for the contra-basso artist insisted upon being a quarter of a tone below pitch, and there was much rudeness in the ensemble playing. Furthermore, Mr. Mills would persist in endeavoring to drown the other artists whenever he found a good fair and square opportunity. The performance could scarcely be regarded as an excellent one.

On Wednesday evening the Damnation de Faust was repeated for the second time, and again to a full house: there is a rumor to the effect that it is to be given again, but this is not authenticated.

On Wednesday afternoon the second of Mr. G. W. Morgan's organ and harp recitals took place at Chickering Hall: the programme was an excellent one, and the performance was enjoyed by a large and appreciative audience. Miss Emily Winant contributed undeniably to the success of the entertainment by her serious and dignified interpretation of Mendelssohn's "Reet in the Lord;" in response to a hearty encore she sang Sullivan's "Lost Chord." Miss Maud Morgan's harp playing is really admirable, and when to this fact is added the incidental circumstance that she is a young lady of very charming presence and modest demeanor, enough has been said, I am sure, to give a faint idea of the attractiveness of these interesting matinees.

MARCH 8. — On Monday evening, March 1, we had a Joseffy concert with the following programme:

Overture: "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn.
(Orchestra.)
1st Concerto, E minor, Chopin.
2d Concerto, F minor, Chopin.
Andante Splanato, and Polonaise, Op. 22, Chopin.

Nothing can be added to the praise which has already been accorded to the wonderful Hungarian pianist. He is probably the best interpreter of Chopin who has ever visited us, if indeed he be not the best living. His delicacy of touch and his perfect use of the pedal (an art in itself) are peculiar qualifications for the satisfactory performance of the exacting compositions of the greatest writer for the piano-forte (as such) who has ever lived. The audience was very large, appreciative and enthusiastic; and Joseffy must feel an artist's pardonable and natural delight in the knowledge that he has gained a footing here which he will never lose. The modesty and quiet of his demeanour have conducted gently to his success; for we have been accustomed to the slam-bang order of piano thumpers, and many had begun to entertain the idea that no refined and gentlemanly pianist could succeed in securing the good will of an American audience. Joseffy, therefore, may be regarded as a reformer as well as a marvellous pianist. Of course, the audience on Monday evening were clamorous for more than the programme promised, and Joseffy gave the lovely Prelude in D flat, and a posthumous mazurka in A minor.

On Tuesday evening Mr. E. C. Phelps, of Brooklyn, brought out his new historic choral "Emancipation" Symphony at the Academy of Music in that city. It is in five parts, as follows:—

1st. Movement, Adagio non troppo.
The long night of bondage. The cries of the oppressed.
2d. Plantation Dances, Allegro Moderato.
(Lights and Shadows of Slave Life).

Nothing expresses more distinctly the emotions and characteristics of the African race than these mournful and grotesque rhythms in dance forms.

3d. "The Slave Girl's Dream," Allegretto.
In this Rhapsody I have attempted to depict the unrest and aspirations of a young woman longing for liberty.

4th. The Conflict, Allegro Agitato.
This movement portrays the final arbitration of arms. The conflict of the opposing principles of freedom and slavery. In the Finale the death of Lincoln is indicated by a wild episode of universal grief, leading to the 5th. The Funeral March, Adagio con dolore.
6th. "Laus Deo." Whittier's Hymn.
For Contralto Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.

In my opinion the author's ability to orchestrate is greater than his capacity to originate. His treatment of the different instruments is really excellent; but he has a tendency to be diffuse and monotonous. I find the 1st and 6th movements much superior to the intervening ones. Candor compels me to say that the "Funeral March" is weak and commonplace, but we all—we Americans—have reason to be thoroughly glad that we have among us men of pluck, energy, and devotion to art, who are surely laying the foundations for the musical eminence which is at some future day to be ours. All honor, then, to Mr. Phelps, Mr. Boise, and others who have given orchestral form and shape to their musical thoughts and aspirations.

The second part of Mr. Phelps' programme was taken up by Mendelssohn's Athalia, and a very good performance it certainly was. The chorus work was excellent, Miss Beebe (who took the 1st soprano) sang very finely; and everything went reasonably well and smoothly, albeit the conductor (not Mr. Phelps) was hardly equal to the task.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 23. — At the second Peabody Concert, on the 14th, the following programme was produced:—

Symphony, C minor, No. 5, Beethoven.
Songs with Piano.
The dream, Work 8. No. 1.—The lark
Work 33. No. 3.—The dew it shines.
Work 72. No. 1.—When I see thee draw near, Work 27. No. 8.—Thou'rt like unto a flower. Work 32. No. 5.
—Fly away, nightingale. Work 27.
No. 1.—Miss Henrietta Beebe, Rubinstein.

a. Fragments from the "Condemnation of Faust." Hungarian March.—
Dance of the Sylphs.

b. The Roman Carnival. Concert-Overture. Work 9. Hector Berlioz.

and at the third concert, last Saturday, the following:

Symphony, C minor. No. 2. Work 55. Saint Saëns.
Italian Songs of the seventeenth century.
I return to my arms.—My sweet one, open thine eyes.—Eyes of beauty.—
Miss Antoula Henne.
Sonata Appassionata, F minor. Work 57.
Mme. Nannette Falk-Auerbach, Beethoven.
Songs, with Piano.
Lov'st thou for beauty.—The red, red rose. Work 27.—Dedication. Work
25.—Miss Antoula Henne. Schumann.
Salavonic Rhapsody, D major. No. 1.
Work 46. Anton Dvorák.

With the increased orchestral facilities it seems the intention of M. Hamerik to wander from the beaten path of the older classics to a greater extent than usual and to devote more time to works of the newer schools. The attendance of the Peabody Concerts has thus far been very satisfactory, and the interest in orchestral music appears unusually strong.

On the 16th inst., the six leading German singing societies combined to give a concert for the benefit of the Silesian sufferers. What object really prompted this unusual combination of rival singing societies, and to what extent the destitute Silesians are to be benefitted thereby, is of no consequence musically.

It is sufficient to know that after a great amount of wrangling as to the momentous question: Who shall direct the combined chorus? the concert finally took place, and the two selections, Ossian, by Beechnitt, and "Siegesgesang der Deutschen nach der Hermannschlacht," by Abt, were decidedly interesting, if only for the fact that the opportunity is not often afforded us of hearing 150 male voices all in a bunch. The remainder of the programme contained nothing of special interest.

MARCH 6. — Among the musical attractions of last week was the Mapleson (Her Majesty's!) Opera Troupe with the usual stale and hackneyed repertoire. The company was, however, taken altogether, very satisfactory, and what they did was done with more general evenness and attention to detail than has been the case for some time in this city. The Aida performance was a striking exception to the general run of opera production in scenic and choral effects, so necessary to a proper representation of this really interesting work of the composer of Trovatore; the orchestra was the best your correspondent has ever heard at any opera in Baltimore. Faust also was given in a most enjoyable manner, despite the fact that both the leading characters were far from satisfactory. The Faust was the usual little dapper Italian gentleman, with a diminutive black moustache, and as far removed from the German ideal of the German student, Faust, as could be supposed; and the Marguerite was anything but the picture of unconscious innocence and natural grace which enchants us in Goethe's Gretchen.

The fourteenth Student's Concert at the Conservatory last Saturday, presented the following programme:
String-trio, G major. Work 9. No. 1. Beethoven.
For violin, viola, violincello.
Messrs. Fincke, Schaeffer and Jungnickel.

a. Scene and Air from Oberon. Weber.
Miss Rose Soldner, student of the Conservatory, first year.
b. Recitative and Air from Freischütz.
Miss Rose Barrott, student of the Conservatory, first year.
"Trout" Quintet, A major. Work 114. Schubert.
For piano, violin, etc.

Miss Agnes Hoen, student of the Conservatory, fifth year.
Messrs. Fincke, Schaeffer, Jungnickel and Leutbecker.

Mme. Nannette Falk-Auerbach, who has won an enviable reputation as an interpreter of Beethoven's piano music, is giving three Beethoven recitals, of which two have taken place thus far. The sonatas selected are Op. 37; Op. 27, Nos. 1 and 2; Op. 81; Op. 32, No. 2; 110; 53; 106; and Op. 102, Nos. 1 and 2, for 'cello and piano, Mr. Jungnickel taking the 'cello part. At the closing recital on the 12th inst. Mme. Auerbach will also play Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, Op. 13.

Last evening the Wednesday Club Chorus gave its second entertainment with the first part of Handel's Alexander's Feast, using the original score. The chorus consisted of very nearly one hundred voices, and the solo parts were distributed among different members, an admirable plan for encouraging a particular interest in the work among the singers, and far preferable to the usual plan of assigning all the solo of any part to one particular voice. The orchestra was very small, as the whole performance was rather an experiment, it being the intention to produce the entire work at an early date with the assistance of all the instruments as laid down in the original score.

The committee and director deserve great credit for their earnest endeavors to school the singers in the grand choral productions of Handel, which are the foundation of all solid chorus training, and for presenting such works in a community where the name of Handel is rarely seen on a concert programme, although our city is profusely supplied with choral societies. The manner in which the piece was received would seem to indicate that the production of a Handel Chorus here is by no means a thankless undertaking.

(From a private letter).

LEIPZIG, Feb. — Just home from a Gewandhaus Recital. Yesterday was Mendelssohn's Birthday, and of course it was remembered in to-day's concert. It does seem as if people had more birthdays in Germany than elsewhere; there is always a "Fest" of somebody. We had to-day, the Overture to Midsommer Night's Dream, and a Symphony (A minor) of Mendelssohn. Then we had a violinist from Rotterdam, who gave us a Concerto of Vieuxtemps, and a Sonata of Tartini; and a Herr Hauser from Karlsruhe, with a magnificent baritone voice, who sang a good Aria out of the Opera Johann de Paris, and then the lovely Liederkreis: "An die ferne Geliebte" from Beethoven. As we were coming out of the concert room, a lady said to me, "how little we realize whom we hear in this Gewandhaus! Celebrities come and go like common mortals." And so it is. Rubinstein, Von Bülow, Prof. and Frau Joachim, Clara Schumann, Saint-Saëns, Sarasate, and hosts of secondary stars, follow each other, week after week, with no sounding of trumpets.

The resident operatic talent is not of so high an order at present, as one would expect here. The present Director has been trying to make money, and low salaries can't hold the best talent. So Pescka-Leutner, and Malknecht and other stars went elsewhere, where they could be better paid, and their places have not been worthily filled. They have no really fine prima donna now, but still some operas are well given. They have just been giving a Mozart Cycle of 7 operas, planning it so that Don Giovanni came on Mozart's birthday. We heard only two of them, the "Entführung aus dem Serail," and Titus. The latter was beautifully given, and has some delicious music in it. I had never heard anything of it, until Frau Joachim sang an Aria from it at one of the Gewandhaus Concerts. Titus closed the Cycle. It is quite short, so at the close a Fest-Spiel in honor of Mozart was given. The curtain rose upon a sibyl (?) who recited a prologue in which something of the "seven stars" was said. (I didn't understand it all), and then with a few words characterizing each, she summoned the different processions, each representing the marked "motif" of one of the operas, who passed across the stage while the orchestra played something from the corresponding music. Six (Idomeneo, Figaro's Hochzeit, Così fan Tutte, Entführung, Titus, and Magic Flute), having been represented, the curtain at the back of the stage rose on Don Giovanni and the Apotheosis. The group representing Don Giovanni in the centre; behind and above was an artistic cumulation of ballet girls with wreaths, etc., etc. In the centre, half way up a marble bust of Mozart, and behind and above the "Commandatore" on his horse. On the right and left of the Don Juan groups, filling up the sides of the stage, all the other groups. As the curtain rose, the sibyl, in her white trailing robes, slowly ascended, winding her way among the brilliant groups till she reached the middle point, and placed a wreath on the marble head. Now this is a very clumsy description, for it was really very pretty, and very well done. Beethoven's birthday, a short time ago, was marked by the 7th Symphony and Coriolanus overture at the Gewandhaus, and quite a good representation of Fidelio in the Theatre.

BERLIOZ'S FAUST AT MANCHESTER.

(From the "Manchester Guardian.")

The interest excited by the production of this work was evinced by the unusually crowded state of the hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 5. It is long since we have noticed such unmistakable enthusiasm as was displayed during the whole evening. The rapidly changing and broadly contrasted scenes of the Faust legend afford a singularly favorable medium for the display of a genius of the somewhat erratic, and certainly unconventional, type of Berlioz. We might doubt his capacity for sustained and continued effort, but we need only one specimen of his work to discover a wonderful power of fantastic expression. Every subject is presented in its broadest lines, heightened by strongly contrasted colors, and set off by lurid lights. And of all men that have lived, Berlioz, perhaps, possessed the greatest mastery over the orchestra as a medium for descriptive power. Others have written what has been called "programme music" occasionally, and with a sort of apology for so far forgetting themselves, but the whole course of this composer's mind seemed to run in this direction and to unfit him for anything else. All his orchestral music has the same character. "Pure music"—music, that is, which need not necessarily be associated with any literary idea—he has scarcely attempted at all. His Harold in Italy, and the Episode in the Life of an Artist, not less than the Faust music, show how essentially his was a descriptive musical genius. And certainly he gave full play to the natural bent of his powers. Probably no instance is on record of one who, taking so late to the profession of music, achieved such a mastery over his art and so world-wide a fame. The orchestra in his hands developed capacities never before suspected. Not a movement that he has left but bears evidence to the truth of this, Berlioz's highest claim to the notice of posterity. Here in England, we have been accustomed to hear more of Wagner and Liszt than of Berlioz, and we have often, probably, thought that original in the compositions of the two first named, for which they were, in truth, indebted to Berlioz. Mozart in this way made the world forget Gluck, and, in a smaller way, Weber and Chopin obliterated the claims of John Field to consideration. But the world is just in the main, and sooner or later all who assist the progress of art obtain the recognition which is their due.

It will be gathered from what we have said above that the music to Faust is distinctly pictorial and descriptive. The soliloquies of Faust exhibit the deep, earnest longing of a strong human soul for capacities higher than life affords in a manner that must have struck all, while many to whom Goethe's story is a household word expressed their intense delight in the musical setting. Not the least competent person to give an opinion declared to us that nothing in the range of his acquaintance expressed so fully the unsatisfied longings of the Faust as the opening movement of Part II. We might cite other similar passages of almost equal force, but we turn to another phase of the composer's genius. "The Peasant's Chorus" early prepared the audience for what might be expected from Berlioz's descriptive powers. The gay refrain and the rustic freedom of the theme proved that he could be light and playful as well as meditative and gloomy. And the warlike strains that succeed prepare us so admirably for the "Rakoczy" march, that for its sake we feel that the composer had, as he claims, the right to take his hero into Hungary, or, indeed, wherever he pleased. The effect of the march was electric. An audience usually somewhat cold and receptive, were aroused to such unwonted enthusiasm that nothing short of an encore would pacify them. Following our catalogue of the descriptive music, we next notice the beautiful solemnity of the "Easter Hymn," and the startling musical phrase—short, sudden and incisive as a lightning flash—which announces the presence of Mephistopheles. The whole scene in Auerbach's cellar is descriptive. The drunken roystering of Brander and his companions is most cleverly brought to a climax in the fugue which they improvise. Some of the stricter of the Germans, who formed so large a portion of the audience, objected to the truth of the picture. "After all, it is but a Frenchman's conception of the subject." This may be perfectly correct, but it does not prevent the enjoyment of those who are less literal in their expectations or demands. And what could be more grotesquely humorous than the setting of the "Flea" song? One almost felt uncomfortable as the music suggested the too numerous gathering of the relatives of the glorified insect. But all this folly soon passes away, and we have a wonderfully conceived movement entitled "Faust's Dream," in which the fiend and his imps present Margaret's image to Faust. This is one of the most difficult numbers in the work, full of cross tempi, and needing the most perfect rehearsal and watchful attention of the conductor for its success. We need not do more than refer to the "Ballet des Sylphes," further than to say that it is more effective in its proper place than we had ever before thought it, while to the Chorus of Soldiers and Students, which closes Part II., our former remarks apply. It may not have absolutely correct "local coloring," but what matter? It pleases, and "local coloring" sometimes offends a stranger in the locality. Who that has not seen the blue of the Mediterranean can believe in the truth of the azure abominations sometimes exhibited in the picture galleries? Part III introduces us to the dwelling of Margaret, and, up to a certain point, fully sustains the interest of the work. The simple girl's song, "The lay of the good old King of Thule," is a most original setting of a favorite theme. The viola obbligato, played by Mr. Otto Bernhardt, has a wonderfully original effect, as its tones take up the subject of the melody in response, as it were, to the voice. No more striking number can be found than that which follows, in which Mephistopheles calls around the spirits that attend his bidding to assist him in his assault on the souls of his victims. The Spirits of Fire and Evil, Will-o'-the-Wisp and Gnome, assemble and dance to sensuous strains around the dwelling where the lovers meet. The Fiend himself sings a serenade so mocking and devilish in its repudiation of all ordinary rhythm, but withal so attractive, that its theme is one that lingers longer, perhaps, than any other heard during the evening. The actual meeting of the lovers is, perhaps, the weakest scene in Faust, but the trio and chorus at the close of Part III. is worthy of comparison with any other portion of the work. The whole of Part IV. is marvellous. It is utterly impossible for us, within our limits, to attempt to do justice to the dramatic intensity of the "Ride to the Abyss." Its horror is unparalleled in the range of musical expression, culminating in a crash so awful that the precipitation into the gulf becomes visible to the mental eye; while the demoniac welcome Mephistopheles and his victim receive is a fitting conclusion to such a scene. The pure beauty of the melody of Margaret's "Apotheosis" comes like sunshine and the sweetness of the "upper air" after the lurid blackness of such a pandemonium.

The work was magnificently given. Immense pains had been taken with its rehearsal, which were amply justified by the result. One word as to the English translation, which was admirable, and which, we believe, we are violating no confidence in saying, is the work of one of Mr. Hallé's daughters. The principal singers were Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Henschel, and Mr. Hilton.

MENDELSSOHN'S MANY PURSUITS.

[Mr. GEORGE GROVE, in his Dictionary of Music and Musicians (No. IX. just published), has prepared a very exhaustive and altogether admirable article on Mendelssohn, from which we take the following extracts].

No musician—unless perhaps it were Leonardo da Vinci, and he was only a musician in a limited sense—certainly no great composer, ever had so many pursuits as Mendelssohn. Mozart drew, and wrote capital letters, Berlioz and Weber also both wrote good letters, Beethoven was a great walker and intense lover of nature, Cherubini was a botanist and a passionate card-player, but none of them approach Mendelssohn in the number and variety of his occupations. Both billiards and chess he played with ardor to the end of his life, and in both he excelled. When a lad he was devoted to gymnastics; later on he rode much, swam more, and danced whenever he had the opportunity. Cards and skating were almost the only diversions he did not care for. But then these were diversions. There were two pursuits which almost deserve to rank as work — drawing and letter-writing. Drawing with him was more like a professional avocation than an amusement. The quantity of his sketches and drawings preserved is very large. They begin with the Swiss journey in 1822, on which he took 27 large ones, all very carefully finished, and all dated, sometimes two in one day. The Scotch and Italian tours are both fully illustrated, and so they go on year by year till his last journey into Switzerland in 1847, of which, as already said, 14 large highly finished water-color drawings remain, besides slighter sketches. At first they are rude and childish, though with each successive set the improvement is perceptible. But even with the earliest ones there is no mistaking that the drawing was a serious business. The subjects are not what are called "bits," but are usually large, comprehensive views, and it is impossible to doubt that the child threw his whole mind into it, did his very best, and shirked nothing. He already felt the force of the motto which fronted his conductor's chair in the Gewandhaus — "Res severa est verum gaudium." Every little cottage or gate is put in with as much care as the main features. Every tree has its character. Everything stands well on its legs, and the whole has that architectonic style which is so characteristic of his music.

Next to his drawing should be placed his correspondence, and this is even more remarkable. During the last years of his life there can have been but few eminent men in Europe who wrote more letters than he did. Many even who take no interest in music are familiar with the nature of his letters — the happy mixture of seriousness, fun and affection, the life-like descriptions, the happy hits, the naïveté which no baldness of translation can extinguish, the wise counsels, the practical views, the delight in the successes of his friends, the self-abnegation, the bursts of wrath at anything mean or nasty. We all remember, too, the length to which they run. Taking the printed volumes and comparing the letters with those of Scott or Arnold, they are on the average very considerably longer than either. But the published letters bear only a small proportion to those still in MS. In fact, the abundance of material for the biographer of Mendelssohn is quite bewildering. That however is not the point. The remarkable fact is that so many letters, of such length and such intrinsic excellence, should have been written by a man who was all the time engaged in an engrossing occupation, producing great quantities of music, conducting, arranging, and otherwise occupied in a profession which more than any demands the surrender of the entire man. For these letters are no hurried productions, but are distinguished, like the drawings, for the neatness and finish which pervade them. An autograph letter of Mendelssohn's is a work of art; the lines are all straight and close, the letters perfectly and elegantly formed, with a peculiar luxuriance of tails, and an illegible word can hardly be found. To the folding and the sealing everything is perfect. It seems impossible that this can have been done quickly. It must have absorbed an enormous deal of time. While speaking of his correspondence, we may mention the neatness and order with which he registered and kept everything. The 44 volumes of MS. music, in which he did for himself what Mozart's father so carefully did for his son, have been mentioned. But it is not generally known that he preserved all letters that he received, and stuck them with his own hands into books. 27 large thick green volumes exist, containing apparently all the letters and memorandums, business and private, which he received from Oct. 29, 1821, to Oct. 29, 1847, together with the drafts of his Oratorio books, and of the long official communications which, during his latter life, cost him so many unprofitable hours. He seems to have found time for everything. Hiller tells us how during a very busy season he revised and copied out the libretto of his oratorio for him. One of his dearest Leipzig friends has a complete copy of the whole score of "Antigone," including the whole of the words of the melodrama, written for her with his own hand; a perfect piece of calligraphy without spot or erasure! and the family archives contain a long minute list of the contents of all the cupboards in the house, filling several pages of foolscap, in his usual neat writing, and made about the year 1842. We read of Mr. Dickens that no matter was considered too trivial to claim his care and attention. He would take as much pains about the hanging of a picture, the choosing of furniture, the superintending of any little improvement in the house, as he would about the more serious business of his life, thus carrying out to the very letter his favorite motto that, "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well." No words could better describe the side of Mendelssohn's character to which we are alluding, nor could any motto more emphatically express the principle on which he acted throughout life in all his work.

His taste and efficiency in such minor matters are well shown in the albums which he made for his wife, beautiful specimens of arrangement, the most charming things in which are the drawings and pieces of music from his own hands. His private account-books and diaries are kept with the same quaint neatness. If he had a word to alter in a letter, it was done with a grace which turned the blemish into a beauty. The same care came out in everything — in making out the programmes for the Gewandhaus concerts, where he would arrange and re-arrange the pieces to suit some inner idea of symmetry or order; or in settling his sets of songs for publication as to the succession of keys, connection or contrast of words, etc. In fact he had a passion for neatness, and a repugnance to anything clumsy. Possibly this may have been one reason why he appears so rarely to have sketched his music. He made it in his head, and had settled the minutest points there before he put it on paper, thus avoiding the litter and disorder of a sketch. Connected with this neatness is a certain quaintness in his proceedings, which perhaps strikes an Englishman more forcibly than it would a German. He used the old-fashioned C clef for the treble voices in his scores to the last; the long flourish with which he ornaments the double bar at the end of a piece never varied. A score of Haydn's Military Symphony which he wrote for his wife bears the words, "Possessor Cécile." In writing to Mrs. Moscheles of her little girls, whose singing had pleased him, he begs to be remembered to the "drei kleine Diskantisten." A note to David, sent by a child, is inscribed, "Kinderpost," and so on. Certain French words occur over and over again, and are evidently favorites. Such are plaisir and trouble, à propos, en gros, and others. The word hübsch, answering to our "nice," was a special favorite, and nett was one of his highest commendations.

THE MOZART WEEK IN VIENNA.

II.

The joyous feelings of the audiences that witnessed the performances of the Mozart-week naturally reacted upon the performers. These all did their best; and, even where the best fell short of what it ought to have been, the public manifested itself kindly disposed and indulgent, it appearing almost as if this were done at the silent request of the ever benevolent Mozart. It was evident that the public considered the master's creations as the principal thing, and these covered over with their pure gold a few dark spots seen in the performances, especially in the field of the technique of song. "La musique de Mozart est bien difficile pour le chant," wrote Emperor Joseph on the 16 of May, 1788, to Count Rosenberg, as Herr Alfred von Arneth has kindly informed me. It is possible that the emperor's criticism had reference to the difficulties of intonation, modulation, and all the new demands of the dramatic expression so highly exalted by Mozart. The vocalists of that time encountered far fewer difficulties in colorature singing, for this they studied and incessantly practiced. At the present time the opposite rule holds good, and our vocalists pay less attention to real song than to exalted declamation and the most glaring accents of passion. For this reason they doubtless agree with the criticism of the Emperor Joseph. The zeal manifested by all the members of the Hofopertheatre during this trying week, and which it is impossible to praise too highly, makes criticism far and sharp-sighted for everything in which they succeeded, and permits it to put on at least the appearance of blindness in regard to all that wherein they failed.

The first opera performed during the Mozart week was Idomeneo, whose beauties its repeated performances caused one to see more clearly. The Entführung aus dem Serail, which immediately followed, called attention to many correspondences between these two works, otherwise not noticeable. However great may be the fundamental difference in their form and expression between Idomeneo and the Entführung, the latter nevertheless adheres to the manner of the former by means of some of its rootlets. Not only does the exceedingly great adornment of the passages in the arias of Constanz belong entirely to the former opera seria, but also the very character of the themes of these arias points to it.

The next two evenings Figaro's Hochzeit and Don Juan were given amidst the greatest enthusiasm. There are lovers and composers of music who place these two operas side by side. But, although I admire very much the beauties of Figaro's Hochzeit, its music, in comparison with that of Don Juan, appears to me to be only a glorious work of man beside a divine revelation. I can better understand the opinion which places the Zauberflöte and Don Juan on the same level, although it is an opinion which I do not share. What can be said of the music to the Zauberflöte is that it stands in the same relation to that of Don Juan as Goethe's Iphigenie stands to Faust. In the inconceivable wealth of its musical inventions Don Juan is not approached by any other even of Mozart's works; and none of them is equal to it in its uninterruptedly flowing dramatic life, in its musical characteristics, and, above all, in its demoniac, spirit-compelling power.

It is better not to begin to talk of Mozart's Don Juan; for, after one begins, it is hard to stop. But also of its mise en scène one does not dare to speak, because so much has been said of it and such opposite views have been taken of it in articles without number. The Hofopertheater has rightly given it with the same scenery with which Dingelstedt gave it and also the Zauberflöte in the new Opernhaus. Only to one wish would I here desire again to give expression: it is to leave out the comic rather than terrible looking red-headed imps which fight around Don Juan at the close. The decoration speaks here intelligibly enough. If Don Juan were engulfed or fell down dead in the storm of fire, whilst the chorus of the demons, according to da Ponte's directions, were sung behind the scene, the tragic impression were a more worthy one. In such matters, however, the taste changes often in a wonderful manner with the changes of the times; and not only the people in the galleries, but even such æsthetic epicures as Ludwig Tieck formerly lauded as a "most glorious climax of the closing tableau the monstrous, grotesque head, whose eyes move from right to left, and whose moveable jaws show terrible teeth." This wide open devil's gullet, into which the imps throw Don Juan, has long since been laid aside as a childish folly. The examination of Don Juan by the awkward Gerichtsdienner in the first act, and which has again been inserted, revived a youthful memory and amused me very much. This arbitrary insertion can be excused as a reminiscence of the first performances of Don Juan in German, which were ornamented with such comical additions; but yet it were better to leave them out in the regular performances.

The happy disposition which animated all, caused Così fan Tutte to please the hearers better than in former years. The artists helped to produce this result by bold accentuation of the comic and parodic element in this opera. The attempt would be altogether in vain to try to exalt, by means of an imposing æsthetic appearance, this foolish libretto, which makes such enormous demands on our credulity. Nor is it necessary to deny that Mozart's creative fancy was debilitated and beguiled into a weak formalism by this dull libretto, whose characters are so uninteresting. There are many musical beauties in the score; but unhappily they are nearly all of the same style and are wanting in the contrasting shades.

On the sixth evening the Zauberflöte was performed and produced among the audience a delight that increased from scene to scene. Its music lays itself like a dear, soft hand on the spirit tired or saddened by our every day-life. In Berthold Auerbach's romance "Auf der Höhe," it is a delicate stroke of genius which makes the unhappy Irma hear the Zauberflöte when, about to die on her last short visit to the city, she desires to hear some music before her end. This is true music, the best that man can produce. In regard to it Auerbach finally says: "Mozart's Zauberflöte is one of those eternal creations which stand outside of all passion and all human strife. I have often heard that the text is childish, but on this height all action, all that occurs, all human phenomena, all surroundings can be only allegorical. Gravitation and bounds are laid aside; man becomes a bird, becomes love, becomes wisdom, and his life a life of nature."

The performance was unexceptionable; in regard to the scenes I wished in all seriousness for one addition, viz.: the lions, bears and monkeys attracted by Tamino's flute. If the farcical scene of the Gerichtsdienner was put into Don Juan, although it has nothing to do with the action and is not in Mozart's opera, there was no reason for omitting that pleasant scene in the Zauberflöte, in which the author directed particularly that it should be introduced. And, besides, the words which Tamino directs to his flute: "Dear flute, thy sounds give pleasure even to wild animals," become nonsense when no such animals are seen.

Titus is an unhappy selection for closing a series of performances of all of Mozart's operas. Its text and music being entirely strange to us, it chills and almost depresses one to hear this solemn work immediately after the glorious Zauberflöte. And besides, it is not chronologically necessary to close the series with this performance. Titus is generally regarded as the last of Mozart's operas; and it certainly was composed only after the Zauberflöte was almost done. But Titus was performed before the other, namely on the 6th of Sept. of 1791, while the Zauberflöte was not performed until the 30th of that month. If, therefore, the rule is to be adhered to that the age of an opera dates from the day when it was first performed, then the Zauberflöte and not Titus is Mozart's last opera, and its performance would have been a worthy close to the Mozart-week. Titus returns to the conventional and obsolete style of Idomeneo, and for this reason a superficial judgment often puts the two on the same plane. But in reality Titus is much inferior to Idomeneo; in form they are much alike, but not in the musical spirit which animates them. In Idomeneo there is a mighty and youthful aspiration; Mozart, when he wrote it, being still young and taking delight in his work, felt in himself the power and the courage necessary to oppose the conventional form he was obliged to adopt; but when he composed Titus, this power and confidence had forsaken him, and, tired out and resigned, he submitted to the stiff and antiquated form which, after the creation of Don Juan and Figaro, must have appeared senseless and even despicable to him. The single, glorious scene of the high priest with the chorus in the third act of Idomeneo is, in my opinion, worth more than the whole of Titus. Even the brightest jewel of this opera, the first Finale, at the burning of the Capitol, is not a finished finale such as some which Mozart had previously created, but a single, though powerful scene. For the arias in Titus, even for the two most celebrated, those of Vitellia and of Sextus, I can feel no admiration, but simply a pious respect. Titus is a Sarastro dipped in milk, who is always talking, not only of his virtue and wisdom, but also of his skill in coloring. Much of that which sounds sweet and lovely in Titus is, on account of this very sweetness and loveliness, at variance with the seriousness of the matter and the passion displayed in the situations. A painful feeling of sadness and compassion seizes him who sees the great man, worn out, troubled with the premonitory symptoms of death already making their presence felt in his breast, called to go to Prague before he had quite finished the Zauberflöte, in order to write and rehearse, in eighteen days, and on a libretto prepared beforehand, a new opera for the coronation of Leopold II. This opera was La Clemenza di Tito, and at the same time it was a last clemenza of Mozart, ever ready to help others by word or deed and ever manifesting the most obliging disposition.

In order to counteract the impression which Titus would produce and also because this opera, with the necessary curtailments, would not fill up an entire evening, Director Jauner had it followed with the effective play of Joseph Weilen's Salzburg's grösster Sohn (Salzburg's greatest son). The poem, composed for the occasion, is rich in thoughtful allusions and was used as a frame for a series of picturesque tableaux from Mozart's life, to which Franz Doppler skilfully adapted a fine accompaniment of music, arranged from Mozartian themes. These tableaux, in which all the members of the Hofopertheater willingly performed the parts of statues, were highly applauded and again raised the feelings of the audience, which had been somewhat depressed, so that all carried away the most pleasing impressions, and as a consequence this Mozart-week will no doubt be held by all in grateful remembrance. —N. EDUARD HANSLICK.

HERMANN GOETZ.

Of the life of this composer, the biographers have little more to tell us than that he was born in Königsberg, Dec. 17, 1840; that, in youth, he gave evidence of musical ability, but not of precocious talent, and that it was not until he had reached his seventeenth year that he decided to make music his life-work. Of the rest of his life, we only know that he lived and labored in obscurity, struggling with poverty and a hopeless disease, yet following his art with patient and fervent devotion. Happily the clouds which had shadowed his life parted just as his earthly career was drawing to a close, and a sort of sunset glory illumined his declining days; for his opera, based on Shakespeare's comedy, "The Taming of the Shrew," had at last been performed, and had made an undeniable success. For the rest, he was not permitted, save in his own consciousness, to know how well he had wrought; for on the 3d of Dec. 1876, his life's brief span of less than thirty-six years came to an end at Hottingen, Zurich.

If Goetz, influenced by a presentiment of his early death, directed his attention, in turn, to each of the forms of composition, that examples might remain to bear witness to his power, he certainly displayed admirable judgment in selecting the 137th Psalm, as the text of his only cantata founded on a scriptural subject. The interest and pathos of the scene portrayed by this Psalm, and the beauty of the diction, have engaged the attention, and taxed the resources of many composers. The text gives expression to feelings which embrace the whole round of human experiences; and in the strongly contrasted and rapidly changing emotions which this text records, Goetz found a brilliant opportunity to illustrate his rare and splendid genius.

The cantata opens with a short orchestral prelude in B minor, in which the theme of the first chorus is announced. This chorus is a beautiful and affecting utterance of the grief and desolation of the children of Israel, as they sat weeping by the waters of Babylon: its pathos and tenderness are something wonderful. Once only is the prevailing gloom broken by a ray of light as the captives remembered Zion, and the brighter emotion is set in delightful contrast; but the feeling is evanescent, and quickly relapses into the sombre minor mode, and, with the final cadence strangely impressive with its weight of grief and despair, the chorus closes. A passage for the orchestra leads, without a break, to a simple recitative in D major, in which a single soprano voice carries on the story, "And our harps we hanged on the willows." Suddenly a few agitated phrases in G minor, by the orchestra, announce that sadness has given place to a new and bitterer feeling, and the voice gives the reason for the change, "They who vexed and spoiled us have demanded a song;" "Sing us a song of Zion;" and, as if the shame and pain at this humiliation of their beloved Jerusalem were too deep for audible utterance, Goetz, with consummate skill, makes the solo voice repeat, as if aside, in a tone of wondering and questioning anguish, "A song of Zion?" The chorus catches at once the burden and spirit of the demand, and, at first quietly and as if under the breath, repeat the question, "How shall we sing the Lord's song in a land of strangers?" Resentment at the affront rapidly succeeds their amazement, and the basses mark the change of feeling by thundering out, "How shall we sing, etc.?" Voice after voice takes up the theme with constantly increasing vehemence; the storm of indignation grows fiercer and fiercer, until, in the splendid climax, it bursts through all restraints, and culminates in a cry of angry despair. The length to which the author has carried this number is happily related to the situation; such bursts of passionate excitement cannot long be protracted, and so this short section is brought to a close in D major, leading directly to a melody, remarkable for its severe simplicity, its beauty and its unaffected expression of the deepest tenderness, as the solo voice, as if lingering over the memory of the city she loved, sings, "If I think not on thee, Jerusalem, may my right hand forget her cunning." But the remembrance of the lost Jerusalem, and of its wrongs again proves too much for her self-control; again the key changes to G minor, the accompaniment becomes strongly agitated, and the voice breaks out into the imprecation, "May my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth!" The chorus here enters, emphasizing the passion of the speaker by repeating both the words and music of the imprecation, and passes suddenly, by a magnificent change to D flat, into an exquisite and pathetic mood of tenderness and affection, "If thou, Jerusalem, art not more to me than all my joy."

The concluding number of the work will give satisfying evidence of the dramatic power and boundless resources of the composer. A peculiar and vigorous introduction of the orchestral basses in unison, in E minor, gives the key to the feeling of the first section of this chorus, which is a wild cry for vengeance, as the voices shout, "Lord, remember the children of Edom." The angry and tumultuous movement of the basses of the orchestra, thundering beneath the voices, prepares the way to a splendid and striking passage of tremendous power and effect, in which the composer has given to the male chorus the words of the Edomites at the sacking of Jerusalem, "Destroy it, destroy it! yea, down to the ground!" while over and above all are heard the sopranos and altos excitedly crying, "Remember!" A short passage of great solidity and vigor, expressive of confidence and warning, for a bass voice, adjures the "daughter of Babylon, set for destruction;" this, repeated by the chorus, gives utterance to the assurance of their faith that their cry for vengeance will not be unanswered; and, as if inspired by this confidence, the tenors announce the vigorous and almost joyous fugue in B minor, "Happy he who thee repays what on us thou hast wrought," with which the action of the number really closes. But the wretchedness of their captivity was still too real to be forgotten in the expectation of future restoration and revenge, and after a repetition of the passage "Daughter of Babylon, set for destruction," which comes to a splendid and effective close on the dominant of B minor, to prepare the way for the return of the first theme and movement of the work, the excitement and passion abate, and the chorus sinks again into the same sad and despairing mood with which the work opened.

"The beautiful must perish! See how the Gods are lamenting that the Beautiful decays and the Perfect departs," is the burden of this composer's lovely cantata, "Noenia;" but he is himself a conspicuous proof that it is only the beautiful and the perfect which abide eternally. "The mean and the base pass to the grave unsung." The beautiful will not perish, nor the perfect depart from among men, so long as there shall be raised up among them prophets and apostles in art like Hermann Goetz. W. N. E.

A VIOLIN STORY IN V ACTS.

The following little story, illustrating our human weakness, was told in my presence by Mr. Reményi, the Hungarian violinist. It seems that Mr. Wilhelmj had seen some of the violins, made by Mr. George Gemünder of New York, and was very much pleased with them,—(for indeed they are really fine instruments, added Reményi in parenthesis),—and became greatly interested in the maker. So much so that he proposed taking him to Europe, and when there to introduce him to public notice, and aid him to make his violins known. Reményi on being informed of the project expressed his faith in its success with the following play;—which he related while in conversation with the violin maker and Wilhelmj.

ACT I.

Wilhelmj and Gemünder arrive in Europe. Every one is delighted to see them. Their greeting is warm and enthusiastic. The violin maker is received with open arms, as a German returning to his Fatherland.

ACT II.

The violin maker, aided by Wilhelmj, attempts to sell some of the instruments he has brought over with him. What a change! All the manufacturers of the violin begin to talk against him. Gemünder is no longer an acknowledged German, but is called a Yankee Charlatan, and condemned even before his violins are heard.

ACT III.

Through the friendly influence of Wilhelmj, some few of the violins are sold for two hundred dollars each.

The European makers, upon hearing of the introduction of the American violins, cry "a cheat," "that they are bad instruments, and the buyers have been taken in by a Yankee."

Invectives ad libitum from the European makers.

ACT IV.

The purchasers of the violins, fearing that the American's instruments may be explosive machines disguised, become alarmed, and try to sell them.

They offer them for one hundred dollars; half their cost.

No buyers.

For fifty dollars?

Still no one.

For twenty-five?

Yet no one will buy.

They offer to give them away, and no one will even take them as a gift.

ACT V.

APOTHEOSIS.

Time passes. At last some one is induced by curiosity to try them. "What a lovely tone," exclaims a delighted listener.

"How beautifully it rings!" says another.

"Fine!" remarks a third.

"So true! with a grand carrying power," adds another.

"A magnificent instrument of great value," exclaims the owner; "there are but a few in the world, and I would not sell mine at any price."

Alas! the poor violin maker had been dead a hundred years.

"Ah! 'tis a beautiful, and short-sighted humanity," said Reményi, as he finished the little play, in which his imagination had pictured a reality from the sad experiences of life.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1880.

MR. J. K. PAINE'S NEW SYMPHONY.

The first productions of the second ("Spring") Symphony, by Harvard's Musical Professor, at Cambridge, Wednesday Evening, March 10, and at Boston, on the following afternoon, formed an event of unusual significance in our musical world. The very long, elaborate and thoughtful work was heard with the deepest interest on both occasions, the composer being called out at the end of each performance to receive the hearty plaudits of an enthusiastic audience. At Cambridge, it formed the principal feature of the closing concert of the Sanders Theatre series, and was played quite well, all things considered, for the first time, by the Philharmonic Orchestra, somewhat enlarged, under Mr. Listemann. The Orchestra was larger, and the interpretation yet more satisfactory in the Harvard Symphony Concert, when Mr. Zerrahn conducted, with Mr. Listemann at the head of the violins. The new Symphony was a success in every way, and left in the great majority of listeners a beautiful and deep impression, and a desire to hear it more, — a desire which we trust will be gratified, not only for their own sakes, but also for the benefit of those who could not appreciate it fully on first hearing. It demands a more intimate acquaintance with this noble work than we possess to give anything like a complete analytical description and appreciation of its contents. What we offer is of course quite inadequate, but it may help to convey some vague and faint conception of its wealth of contents, breadth of plan and mastery of form.

The first movement is laid out on a very broad scale, and swarms with musical ideas, all springing naturally from a few leading motives, and worked up together into a complex whole, which is thoroughly consistent, while it is richly varied, and always fascinating, though it is exceedingly elaborate and very long. With such wealth of pregnant matter (Inhalt) claiming development, it could not well be shorter. The slow introduction (Adagio sostenuto), in A minor, 4-4, opens with a wintry motive in the tenors and 'cellos, to which the contrabasso and fourth horn presently supply a monotonous background, with continuous murmur, pianissimo, of the keynote in syncopated rhythm; higher parts swell the harmony, or rather polyphony, which grows more frigid and more wild and restless; then gathers itself into a little ganglion (three bars), of tranquil subtly woven string quartet, and subsides to a low protracted tremolo of the middle strings, while the clarinet, in a warm melodic passage, sings the hope and prophecy of Spring. By degrees all the instruments are roused to bear part in the rushing tempestuous crescendos, which alternate with softer moments; the promise of the milder season, (whether of Nature literally, or of the soul within) being all the while kept alive by the soft throbbing tremolo of strings, the warm clarinet and horn phrases, and little bird-like hints for flutes and oboes.

Now the key changes to the major, and the Allegro ma non troppo starts (in 2-4 measure) with the first violins alone, still humming the tilting figure of their old tremolo, first in deliberate half notes, then in eighths, then in sixteenths — an interval of fluttering suspense and sweet expectancy (one of the ways of Beethoven!) — and the joyful leading theme leaps up in the altos and 'cellos, and is joined at its height by violins, clarinets, etc., lending a rich, bright harmony, and carrying out the melody to a goodly and well rounded length, when the violins resume their tremolo in a higher octave, accompanied only by low clarinet tones in thirds, while flute and oboe pianissimo hold out the high E (dominant) like a pure blue sky above. It were in vain to try to tell in words how all this goes on. Side thoughts develop continually. There comes in presently a strong new motive in galloping triplets, which figures largely in the ensuing harmonic complication; then, the key having changed to F, enters a second theme, a musing cantabile; the first theme, however, is ever for scarcely a moment out of mind. And now all these elements — the main theme, the second theme, the tremolos, the galloping triplets — and many more besides, are worked up together, with rare and easy contrapuntal faculty, and great wealth and subtlety of instrumental color, into a beautiful and noble whole. When the original key comes back, the breadth and energy and massiveness of the large exposition of the subject-matter is increased; and there are many passing ideas which one would fain recall; for instance, one place where the bass slides slowly down by semitones, in syncopation, through a couple of octaves, while the other voices are about their business. And near the end comes in for a moment, episodically, a sweeter melody than all (dolce), which the violins keep all to themselves; it is but a passing reverie, a moment's all-forgetting ecstasy. The Allegro ends, as it began, with the same violin tremolo figure, beginning ff, and dying away to silence. — If you found this movement "long," hear it until you know it, and you will forget all about the length, just as you never think of age when a soul that has kept its youth converses with you. The fact is, it is just long enough, — that is to say, complete. Mozart, when the emperor complained of too many notes in one of his works, replied: "Sire, it has precisely the right number."

The Scherzo in D minor has been fitly enough characterized as a "May Fantasy." It is a light, airy, sketchy movement, with a bright, captivating theme, quite genial and original, and dainty little answering hints and phrases from the various instruments, full of birds and all blithe sounds of animated nature, with warm flowing passages of reeds and flutes in thirds, etc. Once, for some time, we hear echoing, plaintive cries of birds, etc. so characteristic of spring nights. The Trio, in D major, has an expressive cantabile melody, in good contrast with the tricky character of the rest. The Scherzo is felicitous, the spontaneous product of a delicate and self-pleased fancy, and we are sure all who heard it must have enjoyed it.

Next to the first movement in weight of matter and in breadth of plan, and first in depth of feeling, is the Adagio in F, 4-4. It opens with a very tender, pensive, serious melody for its leading theme; and indeed the whole movement is of a most serious, meditative, brooding character — "most musical, most melancholy." To souls of any depth, Spring is indeed a serious, reflective, introspective season. We see and hear all these signs of a newly awakening life about us, but how is it with ourselves within? Do we, too, like the year, begin anew? And then all the soft desires, vague restless aspirations! What poet or musician can express Spring truly, who has not a serious Adagio for all this? This leading melody is presently intensified by repeating it in octaves; and as it goes on, pervading the whole movement, it draws to itself accompanying sympathetic voices, and delicate suggestive motives and phrases from all the instruments, clothing itself in trailing robes of beauty. We can only speak of the Adagio as full of beauty, of deep poetic feeling, earnest import, unmistakable, sincere expression, thoroughly artistic form and structure, and absorbing interest. It is all sweet as well as sad, and warm in atmosphere and color, save where brief reminis-cences of the cold winter theme come back. (Our own New England Spring perhaps!)

In splendid contrast follows the exhilarating theme of the Allegro gioioso, 4-4, a spontaneous, buoyant melody of goodly length, which is developed with a happy freedom, and finally is made to alternate with a majestic swelling psalm of gratitude and praise, in 2-3 measure. This finale is inspiring and impressive, and seems to be the portion of the Symphony that was composed with the most spontaneous impulse, and the greatest ease.

We cannot but regard this "Spring" Symphony as a remarkable, a noble work, by far the happiest and ripest product, thus far, of Prof. Paine's great learning and inventive faculty, and marking the highest point yet reached in these early stages of American creative art in music. It is worthy to hold a place among the works of masters, and will reward many hearings wherever the symphonic art can find appreciative audience.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

UNIVERSITY CONCERTS.—The programme of the fifth and last concert of the third season, at Sanders Theatre, March 10, was as follows:

Overture: "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn.
Soprano Aria: "Ach nur einmal noch im Leben," from "Titus," Mozart.
Miss May Bryant.
"Spring" Symphony in A major, No. 2 (first time) J. K. Paine.
Introduction: Adagio Sostenuto (A minor), Allegro ma non troppo (A major); Scherzo,—Allegro (D minor), Adagio ma poco moto (F major); Allegro gioioso (A major).
Concerto for Piano, in E flat, Op. 73. Beethoven.
(Two movements), Adagio un poco moto.—Rondo Allegro.
Mr. William H. Sherwood.
Siegfried's Death and Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung," Wagner.
Songs with Piano-forte.
a. Rastlose Liebe (Restless Love) Schubert.
b. "Ein Stündlein wohl vor Tag" Franz.
c. Romanze Brahms.
Miss May Bryant.
Overture to "Der Freischütz" Von Weber.

The Philharmonic Orchestra, with Mr. Listemann as Conductor, gave excellent renderings of the two sterling Overtures, but were less fortunate (owing to the many engagements, journeys and fatigue of the musicians about that time) in the Siegfried selection, which is questionable enough, however well done, in the concert room. Of course the central feature and event of the evening was the new Symphony, of which we have spoken above.—Mr. Sherwood gave a highly refined, finished, vigorous rendering of the Adagio and Rondo of the great "Emperor" Concerto. And yet the omitted movement, the first and greatest, is essential to the full impression of the two others, placing them in true relief. Being recalled, he played the middle and most spirited and bold movement from Schumann's great Fantasia, Op. 17, dedicated to Liszt.—Miss May Bryant was so afflicted by her chronic concert nervousness, that her fine large voice, and true artistic style, did not serve her to the best advantage in the Aria, from La Clemenza di Tito. But she won warm favor in the three German songs.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The Seventh Symphony Concert offered these selections:—

Overture to Collin's "Coriolan," Op. 62 Beethoven.
Fourth Piano-forte Concerto, in G, Op. 58 Beethoven.
Allegro moderato (G).—Andante con moto, (E minor), Rondo vivace (G).
William H. Sherwood.
"Spring" Symphony, (as above,) J. K. Paine.
Piano-forte solo: Middle movement of Fantasia in C. Op. 17 Schumann.
Moderato, sempre energico.
William H. Sherwood.
Overture: "Beckham at Sea, and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27 Mendelssohn.

Of the Symphony we have spoken above, Mr. Zerrahn's large and well-trained Orchestra brought out the distinctive character and spirit of the opening and closing Overtures remarkably well. They also accompanied with discretion and with sympathy Mr. Sherwood's beautiful rendering of that most poetic and delicate of the Beethoven Concertos.

JOSEFFY.—In this connection, also, we may make note (too briefly) of the three twice postponed concerts given in the Music Hall by Mr. Peck, in which this remarkably gifted young pianist had a fair field for the display of his consummate skill in some of the great Concertos, with the accompaniment of Mr. Listemann's Philharmonic Orchestra, as well as in a great variety of solos. The first programme, Thursday evening, March 11, was as follows:—

Overture, "Ruy Blas" Mendelssohn.
Concerto in E flat Beethoven.
Two Character Pieces, Op. 15. H. Hoffman.
a. Ruhe im Schatten einer Ruine (Vision).
b. Im Sonnenschein.
Philharmonic Orchestra.
Piano Solo. a. Allegro and Passacaille Handel.
b. Variations Haydn.
c. Aria Pergolesi.
d. Auf dem Wasser zu singen.
(To sing on the Water) Schubert—Liszt.
Evening Song R. Schumann.
[Adapted for Orchestra by Saint Saën.]
Concerto in E Flat Liszt.

The whole vocabulary of praise, of wonder and delight, has been exhausted in the attempt to do justice to Joseffy's magical touch, the faultless perfection of his technique, the exquisite grace and finish of his every phrase and passage, and to the fine poetic feeling—at all events the poetry of motion—which pervades his whole interpretation of whatever subject. There is no denying that his playing is refined, in passages of strength and delicacy alike; that he is in the large and complete sense a pianist, and not merely, as some Viennese wag called him, a pianissimist; that he plays all con amore, and possesses easy, absolute mastery of all the means of giving expression to his feelings and intentions. It is always a delight to listen to him, even if you question here and there a tempo, or miss the wonted verve and force, the electric thrill, in certain passages of a strong work, at once subtle, tender and heroic, nay gigantic, like the E-flat Concerto of Beethoven, in the way in which he refines it all down to the most exquisite appreciation of detail. We must confess that we have felt that Concerto more, felt more of the great soul of Beethoven in it, felt more drawn to him and clasped and lifted in his strong arms, listening in times past to far less daintily finished and more rugged renderings, although Joseffy's rendering is in many respects so singularly perfect. The test would be to know Beethoven for the first time through him; should we after this performance have the same deep and great impression of the work, the master, that we had acquired already years ago, through our own Dresel, Leonhard, Perabo, Anna Mehlig, and others, none of them pretending to this marvellous perfection of technique,—not to speak of Rubinstein and Von Bülow? In some respects, no doubt, this young Hungarian's interpretation has surpassed them all; yet we are no converts to this or any other "new reading," if so it can be called, of a Concerto so great that it would seem to dictate its own one and only reading, simply possessing the interpreter. While he played we could but listen with delight and admiration; it was only when it was over that it occurred to many minds to ask themselves: But where, then, after all, is our Beethoven?

The Liszt Concerto is another matter, and although we never liked it very much, it did reveal new brilliancy and glory in this wonderful performance, which made the very most of it. In the group of piano Solos, he exhibited the utmost grace and ideal beauty of form and detail, and the fine poetic charm of feeling and expression. His arrangement and performance of the song by Pergolesi: "Trè giorni son che Nina," were simply exquisite, bewitchingly beautiful and tender. If in the Liszt transcription of the Schubert Barcarole he took the movement so extremely fast that you could hardly catch the outline of Schubert's unique and beautiful accompaniment, any more than you see the faces in the windows of a swiftly passing railroad train, yet so charming was the whole thing, so full of grace and fine aroma, as to beguile one for the time being into unquestioning and childlike acceptance both of the strange tempo and of everything about it. The enthusiasm of the great audience was unbounded, and the artist was repeatedly recalled, responding always in the most amiable manner. For an encore he astonished all by a couple of left-hand pieces:

a Minuet by Rheinberger (?) and a Gavotte by Bach (his own transcription)—things with which he had amused himself while his right hand was slowly healing.

The second programme was the following:

Overture, "Egmont" Beethoven.
Concerto in E Minor, Op. 11 Chopin.
Introduction, "Lohengrin" Wagner.
Philharmonic Orchestra.
Piano Solos.
a. Fugue, (A minor) Bach.
b. Gavotte Padre Martini.
c. Warum? (Why?) Schumann.
d. Valse Caprice Schubert-Liszt.
e. Spinnerriedl. (Flying Dutchman). Wagner-Liszt.
Danse Macabre Saint Saën.
Hungarian Fantasia Liszt.
Herr Joseffy and Orchestra.

The general enthusiasm about Joseffy's playing seemed steadily on the increase. He is naturally very much at home in Chopin, and we found nothing in his rendering of the E-minor Concerto, to qualify our admiration when he played it here (without orchestra) in October. We have heard some charge it with want of poetry and feeling, and call it now glittering, now daintily and softly elegant, but mechanical and cold, while others found in it the very quintessence of poesy, and were thrilled and transported by the Concerto as they never were before. Each for himself; we can only say we listened with delight and wonder. No one has shown us so complete a mastery of Liszt's wild Hungarian Fantasia in all its moods and kaleidoscopic changes; yet there is a great sameness in all these rhapsodical Hungarian things by Liszt. All the little pieces were played to a charm, particularly the Schubert Waltz and Wagner's Spinning Song, in Liszt's florid arabesque transcription; in things of this kind we never heard Joseffy's equal. His encore was a most generous addition to the programme,—a great piece with orchestra, namely Liszt's remarkable Fantasia, with extensive prelude, on the Dervish Chorus, and the Turkish March from Beethoven's Ruins of Athens, this was a remarkable display of imaginative conception, intellectual grasp and power.

Here is the last programme (Saturday afternoon, March 13):—

Overture, "Jessonda" Spohr.
Concerto in E Flat Beethoven.
Andante for String Orchestra Tchaikowski.
Concerto in E Minor, Op. 22. (First time.) Chopin.
Two Hungarian Dances Brahms.
Philharmonic Orchestra.
Andante Spianato and Polonaise, Op. 22 Chopin.
Herr Joseffy and Orchestra.

We think it was a mistake to reverse the order of the two Concertos as at first announced. Chopin could but suffer after Beethoven; his delicate conceptions pale in presence of the "Emperor," just as one great picture puts out the light of another quite as fine, but not so great. Yet both were very admirably played, and so was the Andante and Polonaise of Chopin. After each the audience, crowding the great hall, seemed to go into raptures. As there were no smaller pieces on the programme, he was most generous and even lavish of bonnes bonches in answer to encores as if, inexhaustible in strength and patience, as well as in ever fresh resources. After Beethoven, he gave again the left-hand pieces; after the Chopin Concerto, the "Nina" aria of Pergolesi, and the Viennese dances of Schubert-Liszt; and when the end of the concert found the public still insatiable, he came back again, smiling most amiably, and threw in a Nocturne of Chopin. And each thing seemed better than the last.—If in such playing as Joseffy's, all thought of ivory and wood and iron vanishes entirely, so that there seems to be no gross material medium between the musical conception, and the tones themselves, let us not forget that the Chickering instrument, which served him so admirably, was one of the best ever heard in this city, facile princeps among those of other makers which have figured lately in our concert rooms. This old firm is bringing out its very best in just these happy days.

We have allowed ourselves no room to say all the good things that could be said of the creditable work done in these concerts by Mr. Listemann's Orchestra, both in accompaniment, and in the various well selected Overtures and other less familiar pieces.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 25. — The seventh concert of the "Cecilia," the third of this season, took place on Tuesday evening, Feb. 10, at the hall of the Amateur Dramatic Club. The artists were the New York Philharmonic Club, Mr. F. Rummel, Pianist, and Mr. F. Remmert, Bass. The following programme was presented:—

Quartet, in F, No. 9. Mozart.
Songs: a. Frühlingslied, Mendelssohn.
b. Frühlingslied, Rubinstein.
Intermission.

Song: Aria in "Ezio"; "Nasce al bosco," Handel.
Solos, Piano: a. Nocturne, in D flat, Chopin.
Op. 27, No. 2. Chopin.
b. Polonaise Heroique, Op. 53, Chopin.
Song: "The Storm," Hullah.
Quintet, Op. 114, ("The Trout"), Schubert.

Finer quartet playing than that of Mozart's work we scarcely remember to have heard. The composition itself is delightful, and was made doubly so by the rendering. Each instrument seemed to have a thorough knowledge of its part, and to perform it with due regard to all the others. This made the general effect well-nigh perfect. This quartet carried us back to the days when we first began to be acquainted with string chamber-music, when the faces of Schultze, Meisel, Ryan and Fries used frequently to greet us as they played so finely this and many another work of similar character.

The Schubert "Trout" Quintet is, if not a very great work, one well-worth hearing. It has the characteristic traits of its author, and, considering its many beauties, it is rather remarkable that it is so seldom performed. In the present instance, so much of the work as was given was excellently done by all the artists. With regard to the omission of one of the most interesting and important movements,—the Adagio—we must be allowed a word. Concerts of this character are confessedly undertaken, or should be, from an educational point of view, and their purpose is, as we understand it, to present complete works of the masters as the principal part of their programmes. Especially should this be the case when, as in the present instance, only two works are given. We do not mean to say that anyone has not the right to give parts,—complete parts—of a work, but we do deprecate strongly such a course in concerts of this character and aim. It was hardly fair to composer or audience to state on the programme: "Quintet, Op. 114, (The Trout) Schubert," and then omit one of the chief movements of the work. The programme should have read, "Selections from the Trout Quintet." We should not perhaps mention this, but for the fact that a similar instance presented itself in the concerts of this Society last season; if anything a worse mutilation of another work of the same composer, the cutting out bodily of about one third of the Finale of the D-minor Quartet, a procedure at that time heartily condemned by us. Certainly the Adagio of this Quintet is worth hearing. To our mind, it is equal to any other part of the work. The Quintet, as we have remarked, is very seldom heard. Why not, then, give it to us in its entirety? The plea of length will not suffice for two reasons. First, the extra time required for the omitted movement was too short to be taken into the account, under the circumstances; and second, if there is insufficient time to give any specified work in its entirety, let one be chosen of such dimensions as there is time for. This is the only true course for such a Society to adopt.

Mr. Rummel's piano solos were on the whole very well given. If we take any exception to his interpretations it would be the misplacement of the climax in the Nocturne, making the decrescendo too soon, thus departing from Chopin's own marking of the piece; and a too loud rendering of the octave passages for the left hand in the E-major portion of the Polonaise. Otherwise his playing was very fine and enjoyable. To a hearty encore he responded with Handel's Air Varié in E.

The singing was superb. We have rarely if ever, heard German songs so well rendered. The artist seemed to catch thoroughly their spirit and to enter heartily upon his work. He showed his fine taste and sense of unity in musical impressions, by responding to the encore of his first two songs, with Schumann's "Frühlingslied." Of the three Spring-Songs it is hard to say which is the best. Each has its own peculiar excellence. Mendelssohn's was to us the least interesting of all. Between the other two we do not care to choose. Rubinstein's is one of the finest, if not the finest, of his songs known to us. It closes similarly to the "Gold rolls here beneath me," a touch of real genius. Handel's Aria, in his broad grand style, was very enjoyable. We are glad to make its acquaintance and to notice how many fine selections our bass singers are bringing us from his works.

The concert was equal to any that the society have given, and they have every encouragement to go on with their work,—a work which is well worthy of all the labor and attention they can give to it. A. G. L.

NEW YORK, March 15.—On Monday evening we had a Joseffy-Liszt night, with an interesting programme, which included the E flat Concerto and the Hungarian Fantasia. The wonderful Hungarian outdid himself on this occasion, and the concert is to be repeated this (Monday) evening. The Joseffy Chamber music Soirée, which had been announced for Wednesday evening, was omitted, and two of the series will be given this week.

On Wednesday afternoon the fourth of Mr. Morgan's enjoyable series of organ and harp recitals occurred in Chickering Hall, and was attended by a large and interested audience. The fifth and last recital will be given on Wednesday of this week.

The fifth of Dr. Damrooch's Symphony Concerts was given on Saturday evening, with the annexed programme:—

Overture: Penthesilea. Coldmark.
2d Slavonic Rhapsody Dvorak.
3d Symphony. Beethoven.
Symphonic Poem: "Tasso." Liszt.

The orchestral forces were handled by Dr. Damrooch with rare skill and discrimination, and the result was a very admirable performance. The only novelties were the Goldmark Overture and Dvorak's Rhapsody. The former does not wear well, somehow; and I was less pleased with it than upon the occasion of its production at one of the concerts of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, albeit it was conducted in a far more scholarly and masterly manner upon the later occasion. The Rhapsody has many fine bits of orchestration, and possesses a certain wild freedom, and even lawlessness that make it very attractive. There was probably a satisfaction (for many) in feeling that, after all Dvorak's wild and fantastic harmonic progressions, one could sober down by the aid of Beethoven, who can scarcely be deemed wild. The great advantage about this author is that you always feel so absolutely certain of what you are going to get. I have noticed the critics frequently find this fact a most serviceable one.

The Journal is of course already aware that Theodore Thomas has broken his contracts with the Cincinnati people, and is now on the wing, as it were. It is said that Chicago wants him, but the general impression here is that he will return to this city and take possession of us once more. It need scarcely be said that with Dr. Damrooch at the helm of the Symphony Society, and with Theodore in charge of both Philharmonic Societies, the opportunities for American composers, or for American piano-makers, will not be overwhelmingly frequent.

March 22. Unquestionably the notable event of the week was the concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, which occurred on Tuesday evening, March 16, with the following attractive programme:—

9th Symphony C. Schubert.
Concerts, Op. 10, F Major. Brull.
Mr. Richard Hoffman.
"Midsummer Night Dream" music. Mendelssohn.
Slavonic Rhapsody. Dvorak.

Schubert's glorious work is always satisfying, although it is greatly to be regretted that the length of programme made it necessary for the chorus to omit all repeats, a proceeding which deprived the audience of almost seven hundred bars of this delicious Symphony. It was played measurably well, although the horas, which have so much to do, would "noble."

Mr. Hoffman has never played the Brull Concerto (or any other), in a more thoroughly artistic way than he did upon this occasion. His phrasing was admirable, his technique clear and accurate, and his grace and ease of manner simply charming. His performance elicited the warmest applause and he was thrice compelled to appear and bow his acknowledgments.

The Mendelssohn music was interpreted well, so far as the orchestral work is concerned; but simple charity demands that the critic touch but lightly upon the efforts of the soprano, alto and female chorus whose valuable assistance had been secured for the occasion; they did succeed in keeping time, but they persisted in being flat.

Although the evening was wet, sloppy and intensely disagreeable, the audience was a very large one, and the orchestra and stage were one mass of bloom and foliage, as it always is in these charming entertainments. It must be remembered that the Brooklyn Society is in the hands of cultivated and refined Americans, and that explains the matter.

Mr. and Miss Morgan's very attractive series of Organ and Harp Matinees (or Recitals) terminated with the fifth and last on Wednesday, March 17.

The programme was an interesting one; a large audience evinced appreciation of the artists' efforts by every indication of approval. During the afternoon

Mr. Morgan made a little speech, and in the course of his well chosen remarks he held out the hope that next season the Recitals would be resumed. It is to be wished that such may be the case, for it is rarely that a more delightful series of musical entertainments has been given in our city.

Joseffy's series of chamber music Concerts seem to have come to an untimely end, by reason of the pianist's indisposition. They were advertised for Wednesday evenings, March 3, 10, 17, 31; but only one has ever been given and so many dates have been at different times substituted for the original one that no one now seems able to understand the matter at all! whether this confusion means illness (as alleged,) or a second difficulty between Mr. Joseffy and his managers is a problem which time will doubtless solve.

ARGUS.

BALTIMORE, March 21.—The following were the programmes of concerts given since my last, at the Peabody Institute.

Fifteenth Students' Concert, March 6:

Piano Trio.
B flat Major. Work 10. For piano, violin and violoncello. Miss Mabel Latham, (student of the Conservatory, seventh year) Messrs. Finske, and Jungnickel. Emil Hartmann.

Songs, with Piano.
O, Sunny Beam.—Drinking Song—Mr. H. Glass, (student of the Conservatory, first year.) Schumann.

Air from Elijah.
Mr. Wm. Byrn, (student of the Conservatory, third year.) Mendelssohn.

Novelets, A Minor. Work 29. For piano, violin, and violoncello.—Miss Sarah Schoenberg, (student of the Conservatory, sixth year), Messrs. Finske and Jungnickel. Gade.

Fourth Symphony Concert, March 13:

Symphony, C minor, No. 5. Beethoven.

Compositions for Piano.
Nocturne G Minor. Work 37. No. 1.—Cradle Song D flat Major, Work 57.—Rondo E flat Major. Work 16.—Mme. Julia Rivé-King. Chopin.

Songs with Piano.
I Love Thee.—In the Woods.—Good Morning. Edvard Greig.

Slumber Song.
Miss Fannie Kellogg. R. Wagner.

The Roman Carnival. Concert Overture.
Work 9. Hector Berlioz.

March 17, at Washington, under the auspices of the Athenæum Club, of that city:
Fourth Norse Suite.

D Major. Work 25. Composed in Baltimore, 1876-1877. On the Ocean.—In the Style of a Folk-song.—Mermaids' Dance.—Love Song.—Toward the Shore
Asger Hamerik.

Andante and Rondo from the Violin Concerto. Transcribed for the piano by Mme. Rivé-King.—Mme. Julia Rivé-King. Mendelssohn.

Raid of the Vikings.
Overture to a Norse drama. Work 25. Composed 1878. Emil Hartmann.

Hungarian Rhapsody.
C sharp Minor. No. 2.
Mme. Julia Rivé-King. Liszt.

Leonora Overture. C Major. No. 3. Beethoven.

March 20, at the Peabody Institute (Fifth Symphony Concert) Mr. Hamerik's Fourth Norse Suite was repeated and was received with much enthusiasm. It was quite natural for the director to take particular pains in rehearsing his own composition, which was superbly played by the orchestra. The work is characterized by luxurious melody, as in the Love Song, and by rich and powerful instrumentation and telling effects throughout.

Appropriate and very pleasing use is occasionally made of two harps in the second, third and fourth movements.

Beside the Suite, Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3 was performed, and Mr. Franz Remmert sang the seven enchanting Schöne Müllerin songs: "Wohn," "Am Feierabend," "Der Neugierige," "Ungeduld," "Der Müller und der Bach," "Die böse Farbe," "Trockne Blumen."

It cannot but be said that in several of the songs, Mr. Remmert with his rich voice was highly effective, but for the most part the proper spirit was wanting. What success he achieved was due almost entirely to the splendid telling calibre of his magnificent voice, but is there not something more required in songs like these? Mr. Remmert's forte is evidently Oratorio music, for which his heavy voice and style are best suited.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., March 20. — The Musical Society, Eugene Luening, Director, gave its 269th concert last evening. The following was the programme :

1. Wintersong. W. Tschirch.
Male Chorus.
2. Piano Solo—Ballad, A flat. C. Reincke.
Miss Bertha Burge.
3. Pagan Aria from the "Huguenots" Meyerbeer.
Miss Jennie Jerzykiewicz.
4. Aria from Orpheus Gluck.
Miss Bella Fink.
5. a. Lerchenbaum. M. Hauptmann.
b. The Fisher. Arno Klefel.
Mixed Chorus.
6. The Bird. H. Luttemann.
Piano Solo and Male Chorus.
7. Piano Solo.
a. Study. Scarlatti.
b. Vogel als Prophet Schumann.
c. Valse, E Minor Chopin.
Miss Bertha Burge.
8. a. Passing by. C. Loewe.
b. Beware. B. Ramann.
Mixed Chorus.
9. a. Cradle-song. J. Brahms.
b. In the Forest. M. Hartmann.
Miss Jennie Jerzykiewicz.
10. a. Home. C. F. Fischer.
b. Soldiers Song. F. Liszt.
Male Chorus.

The chorus work was good, on the whole, though there were occasional slips in time. The shading and intonation were good. Miss Burge is a well schooled and musicianly pianist, and gave much satisfaction. Miss Jerzykiewicz's selections were well adapted to her voice, so that her fine training showed for all it was worth. Miss Fink is a young girl with a plume-nal contralto voice. Her singing shows marked improvement under Mr. Luening's tuition. Mr. L. is doing admirable work both as teacher and conductor J. C. F.

Our space is exhausted, and there yet remain for notice numerous important Concerts of this memorable and crowded period. The very interesting one by Mr. Arthur Foote; the still lengthening series of Mr. Perabo's recitals, rich in good things and in their bewildering array of new piano quartets, trios, etc.; the Concerts of the vocal Clubs, the Apollo and the Boyston,—of all these, and more, our notice is reluctantly postponed.

LOCAL NOTES.

The Harvard Symphony Concerts season, the fifteenth, was concluded this week, with the great Schubert Symphony, Beethoven's Overture in C, Op. 124, a new and brilliant Piano Concerto by Von Bronsart, played by Mr. Lang, and vocal solos by Miss Fannie Louise Barnes.

—Next in order comes the Handel and Haydn Society Easter Oratorio, Israel in Egypt, to-morrow evening. The soloists are Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mrs. F. P. Whitney, Mrs. Frank Kinsley, Messrs. W. C. Tower, J. F. Winch and M. W. Whitney.

The fifth triennial festival of the Society will be held at the Music Hall in May. Seven concerts will be given, at which the following works will be performed : —May 4, evening, St. Paul, Mendelssohn; May 5, evening, The Last Judgment, Spohr; Stabat Mater, Rossini; May 6, afternoon, Ninth [choral] Symphony, Beethoven, 43d Psalm, Judge me, O God! Mendelssohn; May 6, evening, Manzoni Requiem, Verdi; May 7, evening, Spring and Summer, from The Seasons, Haydn; The Deluge, Saint Saëns; May 8, afternoon, a miscellaneous concert, including Utrecht Jubilate, by Handel; May 9, evening, Solomon, Handel. The following vocalists will appear, Miss Emma C. Thurbay, Miss Annie Cary, Miss Emily Winant; Italo Campanini, C. R. Adams, W. H. Fessenden, W. Courtney, M. W. Whitney, J. F. Winch, G. W. Dudley. Orchestra of seventy, including the best Boston players, under Listemann. B. J. Lang will be the organist, and Carl Zerrahn, conductor. Season tickets at $12. each, will be for sale on Monday, March 29, at Music Hall. Holders of Season tickets for the winter's course of oratorios may secure their present seats before that date. Orders for season tickets may be addressed to Mr. Peck, at Music Hall, or to A. P. Browne, secretary, Postoffice box 2594.

—It is rumored that Mr. J. K. Paine's brilliant and masterly "Spring" Symphony is to be performed at one of the concerts of the Handel and Haydn May Festival. We trust that this may be so. The Society will show good taste, judgment, and appreciation by affording the musical public another opportunity of hearing this beautiful work.—Gazette.

—The Sanders Theatre Concerts have resulted in some pecuniary loss. To make this good, a concert of a somewhat miscellaneous, yet artistic character, will be given there next Tuesday evening, for which Messrs. Ole Bull, Listemann, Geo. L. Osgood, Arthur Foote, Warren A. Locke and others, have volunteered their aid.

—That conscientious and accomplished artist, Mrs. L. S. Frohock, will give a Matinée at Wesleyan Hall, at 3 P. M., next Tuesday, with the assistance of Messrs. Listemann and Fries. Selections from Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Saint Saëns.

—On the 15th of April, Berlioz's La Damnation de Faust will be brought out for the first time in Boston, at the Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. B. J. Lang. The chorus rehearsals are making satisfactory progress. There is a carefully selected chorus of 200 voices, all pledged to punctual attendance at every rehearsal; the orchestra will be the best and most complete that Boston can supply; and the solos are distributed as follows:—Marguerite, Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen; Faust, Mr. W. J. Winch; Mephistopheles, Mr. Clarence E. Hay; Brander, Mr. Sebastian B. Schlesinger. No musical event of the season is more eagerly looked forward to.

—The Cecelia, at its next concert, April 12, will give Schumann's music to Byron's Manfred, with readings of a portion of the tragedy by Mr. Howard M. Ticknor.

—A concert will be given in Mechanic's Hall on the afternoon of April 12, by Mr. John Orth, assisted by Mr. George L. Osgood and Mr. Gustav Dannreuther.

—Besides the Faust of Berlioz, Mr. B. J. Lang will give two concerts, on the 1st and 22d of April, at Mechanic's Hall. In the first, a Bach Concerto for four pianos will be played for the first time in public here.

—The fifth Euterpe concert, originally announced for April 14, has been postponed. The date has not yet been settled upon. The Beethoven Quintet Club will play. A concert will also be given in May, of which further particulars will be duly made known.

—Mr. Peck's benefit concert, to be given in Music Hall, April 14, will be an attractive entertainment. For vocalists there will be Miss Gertrude Franklyn and Miss Emily Winant. There will also be piano solos by Mr. Joeeffy, and a large orchestra will take part under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas.

EUTERPE. — We had to forego the temptation of the fourth concert (March 10), the more reluctantly that it offered the fine contrast of two such Quartets as the Op. 132 in A minor, of Beethoven, and the more clear and readily appreciable Op. 44, No. 1, in D, by Mendelssohn. The former had been played here three times (in 1865 and 1873) by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and so far as we remember, with pretty general acceptance. Yet now we read such criticisms as these upon it:—

"Probably it would not have been thought worthy the attention of the Euterpe had not the name of Beethoven been associated with it. As the great composer was in all probability afflicted with total deafness at the time it was written, he never could have heard it performed. The opening movements are rendered fairly tedious by the extravagant attention that has been paid to thematic development, and throughout the musical ideas advanced are vague and mysterious, the most beautiful of the melodies being obscured by a strictly polyphonic and for the most part uninteresting treatment."

Beethoven's work, which is rarely heard, is an abstruse, elaborate, diffuse, and vague composition. Like nearly all of Beethoven's later writings, repeated hearings and close study of the quartet are necessary before one can even acquire a knowledge of the construction of the work, and admiration is then excited more for the ingenuity displayed in the treatment of the themes, than for the beauty of those themes."

We are tempted, if only for the sake of showing how different an impression the work has produced upon some minds, to reproduce here a part of what we wrote about it in Nov. 1873. If it gets no justice now, let it appear that it was once in some humble degree appreciated:—

"We hardly dare to say more of it now than we did in 1865, and that is all expressed in two words: wonder and delight. We had never known so great a work on first hearing so to take hold of a whole audience. It was followed with breathless interest, every movement heartily applauded, reaching a fine climax of excitement at the end of the very impassioned Finale. It should have been heard since, season after season; indeed it is one of those works which, to be fully understood, and more and more enjoyed and inwardly possessed, might well be listened to as often as once a week throughout a season. Its beauty and its sentiment are inexhaustible. Beethoven composed it after a severe and painful illness, and in its successive movements gave expression to the various alternating moods of fever, convalescence, gratitude and joy. The first movement is a fitful, restless and imaginative Allegro, springing from a slow, deep musing introduction of a few bars of rich, strange harmony, in which the instruments appear to yearn and strain to reach above their sphere, the tenor and the bass soaring above the violins at times. The whole is strangely beautiful, the sickness of a great mind; clear, consistent, musical throughout; hope and faith and courage never lost. The second movement (Allegro ma non tanto) in the 3-4 Scherzo measure, is not a Scherzo in spirit, but does express the awakening of a new hope; the heavy palsy-ing hand is lifted, and we seem to move once more and with a measured content. Then comes the Adagio—molto Adagio it begins—over which he has inscribed the title: Canzona di ringraziamento, in modo Lidico offerta alla divinità da un guarito, that is: "Song of thanksgiving, in the Lydian mode, offered to the Deity by one recovering from sickness." The Lydian is that one of the old Church modes which makes our diatonic major scale of C begin with F; in other words it is our key of F major with a B natural always in the place of B flat. This gives a peculiar church-like flavor to the harmony, and as Beethoven here handles it the expression is religious and sublime. But presently this broad 4-4 measure gives place to and alternates with an Andante, 3-8 in D major, as the convalescent feels within him a new force ("Sentendo nuova forza"). This is marvellously beautiful and full of delicate and subtle fancies: genius feels "the vision and the faculty divine" returning. And there is the deepest tenderness and loveliness in the lingering, fond variation of the Adagio where it comes back to close the movement ("con intimissimo sentimento"). A most spirited and reassuring march (Allegro Marcia assai vivace) in A major, heralds the Finale, — a wonderful piece of eloquent impassioned recitative forming the transition to the still more impassioned and exciting last Allegro. Yet in all this there is nothing morbid; it is the conquering spirit looking down over its ascent of suffering and trial and celebrating the divine secret learned in infirmity and pain. If ever for a moment the strain sickens, it is but the text and foil to instant glorious recovery. Wonderfully clear, too, is all this complex, subtle, ever varied musical discourse, or rather self-communion.

NEW YORK. — What promised to be a most important event of the season, the performance under Dr. Damrosch, of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music, seems to have fallen rather short of expectation. It needs our Boston Music Hall to display the forces for so great a work to good advantage. But little more than half of the work was given. Here the whole required two concerts on one day (Good Friday).

The separation of the orchestra into two distinct divisions, being necessary by the conveniences of St. George's Church, where the performance took place, seriously marred its success. The solos were taken by Mrs. Granger Dow (soprano), Miss Mathilde Philipps, (alto), Mr. William J. Winch (tenor), Mr. John F. Winch and Mr. George E. Aiken (basses).

CINCINNATI. — The serious division between Theodore Thomas, and Mr. George Ward Nichols and his associates of the Board of Directors of the College of Music, resulting in the resignation of Mr. Thomas, and his return to New York, has been pretty thoroughly ventilated in all the newspapers throughout the land. We have no desire to enter into the merits of the controversy, but can easily presume that each party, from its own point of view, is in the right, and that it has all resulted for the best. At all events we can congratulate the founders and directors of the College, that they feel so strong in means and confidence for going on as well as ever, if not better, in spite of the secession of the great orchestral leader, whom New York of course is only too glad to be able to call her own again. The Directors of the College have issued a very cheerful, reassuring circular, by which it appears that the entire Faculty of thirty-one professors and teachers retain their places, and that the institution is to be divided into two departments—an Academic Department, and a General Music School. We hope to find room for the full statement in another number.

MENDELSSOHN'S MANY PURSUITS.

BY GEORGE GROVE.

Add to those just mentioned, the many concerts, to be arranged, rehearsed, conducted; the frequent negotiations attending on Berlin; the long official protocols; the hospitality and genial intercourse, where he was equally excellent as host or as guest; the claims of his family; the long holidays, real holidays, spent in travelling, and not, like Beethoven's, devoted to composition—and we may almost be pardoned for wondering how he can have found time to write any music at all. But on the contrary, with him all this business does not appear to have militated against composition in the slightest degree. It often drove him almost to distraction; it probably shortened his life; but it never seems to have prevented his doing whatever music came before him, either spontaneously or at the call of his two posts at Berlin and Dresden. He composed Antigone in a fortnight, he resisted writing the music to Ruy Blas, he grumbled over the long chorale for the thousandth anniversary of the German Empire, and over the overture to Athalie, in the midst of his London pleasures; but still he did them, and in the cases of Antigone and the two overtures it is difficult to see how he could have done them better. He was never driven into a corner.

The power by which he got through all this labor, so much of it self-imposed, was the power of order and concentration, the practical business habit of doing one thing at a time, and doing it well. This no doubt was the talent which his father recognized in him so strongly as to make him doubt whether business was not his real vocation. It was this which made him sympathize with Schiller in his power of "supplying" great tragedies as they were wanted. In one way, his will was weak, for he always found it hard to say No; but having accepted the task it became a duty, and towards duty his will was the iron will of a man of business. Such a gift is vouchsafed to very few artists. Handel possessed it in some degree; but with that one exception Mendelssohn seems to stand alone.

Of his method of composing, little or nothing is known. He appears to have made few sketches, and to have arranged his music in his head at first, much as Mozart did. Probably this arose from his early training under Zelter, for the volumes for 1821-2-3, of the

MS. series now in the Berlin Library appear to contain his first drafts, and rarely show any corrections, and what there are, are not so much sketches, as erasures, and substitutions. Devrient and Schubring tell of their having seen him composing a score bar by bar from top to bottom; but this was probably only an experiment or tour de force.

Alterations in a work after it was completed are quite another thing, and in these he was lavish. He complains of his not discovering the necessity for them till post festum. We have seen instances of this in the Walpurgisnight, St. Paul, the Lobgesang, Elijah, and some of the Concert-overtures. Another instance is the Italian Symphony, which he retained in MS. for fourteen years, till his death, with the intention of altering and improving the Finale. Another, equally to the point, is the D minor Trio, of which there are two editions in actual circulation, containing several important and extensive differences. This is carrying fastidiousness even further than Beethoven, whose alterations were endless, but ceased with publication. The autographs of many of Mendelssohn's pieces are dated years before they were printed, and in most, if not all, cases, they received material alterations before being issued.

Of his pianoforte playing in his earlier days we have already spoken. What it was in his great time, at such displays as his performances in London at the Philharmonic in 1842, '44, and '47; at Ernst's Concert in 1844, in the Bach Concerto with Moscheles and Thalberg; at the British Musicians' matinée in 1844; and the British Quartet Society in 1847; at the Leipzig Concerts on the occasion already mentioned in 1836; at Miss Lind's Concert, Dec. 5, 1845, or at many a private reunion at V. Novello's or the Horsleys', or the Moscheles' in London, or the houses of his favorite friends in Leipzig, Berlin, or Frankfort—there are still many remaining well able to judge, and in whose minds the impression survives as clear as ever. Of the various recollections with which I have been favored, I cannot do better than give entire those of Madame Schumann, and Dr. Hiller. In reading them it should be remembered that Mendelssohn was fond of speaking of himself as a player en gros, who did not claim (however great his right) to be a virtuoso, and that there are instances of his having refused to play to great virtuosi.

1. "My recollections of Mendelssohn's playing," says Madame Schumann, "are among the most delightful things in my artistic life. It was to me a shining ideal, full of genius and life, united with technical perfection. He would sometimes take the tempi very quick, but never to the prejudice of the music. It never occurred to me to compare him with virtuosi. Of mere effects of performance he knew nothing—he was always the great musician, and in hearing him one forgot the player, and only revelled in the full enjoyment of the music. He could carry one with him in the most incredible manner, and his playing was always stamped with beauty and nobility. In his early days he had acquired perfection of technique; but latterly, as he often told me, he hardly ever practised, and yet he surpassed every one. I have heard him in Bach, and Beethoven, and in his own compositions, and shall never forget the impression he made upon me."

2. "Mendelssohn's playing," says Dr. Hiller, "was to him what flying is to a bird. No one wonders why a lark flies, it is inconceivable without that power. In the same way Mendelssohn played the piano because it was his nature. He possessed great skill, certainty, power, and rapidity of execution, a lovely full tone—all in fact that a virtuoso could desire; but these qualities were forgotten while he was playing, and one almost overlooked even those more spiritual gifts which we call fire, invention, soul, apprehension, etc. When he sat down to the instrument music streamed from him with all the fullness of his inborn genius,—he was a centaur, and his horse was the piano. What he played, how he played it, and that he was the player—all were equally rivetting, and it was impossible to separate the execution, the music, and the executant. This was absolutely the case in his improvisations, so poetical, artistic, and finished; and almost as much so in his execution of the music of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, or himself. Into those three masters he had grown, and they had become his spiritual property. The music of other composers he knew, but could not produce it as he did theirs. I do not think, for instance, that his execution of Chopin was at all to be compared to his execution of the masters just mentioned; he did not care particularly for it, though when alone he played everything good with interest. In playing at sight his skill and rapidity of comprehension were astonishing, and that not with P. F. music only, but with the most complicated compositions. He never practised, though he once told me that in his Leipzig time he had played a shake (I think with the second and third fingers) several minutes every day for some months, till he was perfect in it."

"His staccato," says Mr. Joachim, "was the most extraordinary thing possible for life and crispness. In the Frühlingslied (Songs without Words, Bk. v, No. 6) for instance, it was quite electric, and though I have heard that song played by many of the greatest players, I never experienced the same effect. His playing was extraordinarily full of fire, which could hardly be controlled, and yet was controlled, and combined with the greatest delicacy." "Though lightness of touch, and a delicious liquid pearliness of tone," says another of his pupils, "were prominent characteristics, yet his power in fortes was immense. In the passage in his G-minor Concerto where the whole orchestra makes a crescendo the climax of which is a 6-4 chord on D, played by the P. F. alone, it seemed as if the band had quite enough to do to work up to the chord he played." As an instance of the fullness of his tone, the same gentleman mentions the 5 bars of piano which begin Beethoven's G-major Concerto, and which, though he played them perfectly softly, filled the whole room.

"His mechanism," says another of his

Leipzig pupils, "was extremely subtle, and developed with the lightest of wrists (never from the arm); he therefore never strained the instrument or hammered. His chord-playing was beautiful, and based on a special theory of his own. His use of the pedal was very sparing, clearly defined, and therefore effective; his prasing beautifully clear. The performances in which I derived the most lasting impressions from him were the 32 Variations and last Sonata (op. 111) of Beethoven, in which latter the Variations of the final movement came out more clearly in their structure and beauty than I have ever heard before or since." Of his playing of the 32 Variations, Professor Macfarren remarks that "to each one, or each pair, where they go in pairs, he gave a character different from all the others. In playing at sight from a MS. score he characterized every incident by the peculiar tone by which he represented the instrument for which it was written." In describing his playing of the 9th Symphony, Mr. Schleinitz testified to the same singular power of representing the different instruments. A still stronger testimony is that of Berlioz, who, speaking of the color of the Hebrides Overture, says that Mendelssohn "succeeded in giving him an accurate idea of it, such is his extraordinary power of rendering the most complicated scores on the Piano."

His adherence to his author's meaning, and to the indications given in the music, was absolute. Strict time was one of his hobbies. He alludes to it, with an eye to the sins of Hiller and Chopin, in a letter of May 23, 1834, and somewhere else speaks of "nice strict tempo," as something peculiarly pleasant. After introducing some ritardandos in conducting the introduction to Beethoven's second symphony, he excused himself by saying that "one could not always be good," and that he had felt the inclination too strongly to resist it. In playing, however, he never himself interpolated a ritardando, or suffered it in any one else. It especially enraged him when done at the end of a song or other piece. "Es steht nicht da!" he would say; "if it were intended it would be written in—they think it expression, but it is sheer affectation." But though in playing he never varied the tempo when once taken, he did not always take a movement at the same pace, but changed it as his mood was at the time. We have seen in the case of Bach's A-minor Fugue, that he could on occasion introduce an individual reading; and his treatment of the arpeggios in the Chromatic Fantasia shows that, there at least, he allowed himself great latitude. Still, in imitating this it should be remembered how thoroughly he knew these great masters, and how perfect his sympathy with them was. In conducting, as we have just seen, he was more elastic, though even there his variations would now be condemned as moderate by some conductors. Before he conducted at the Philharmonic it had been the tradition in the Coda of the Overture to Egmont to return to a piano after the crescendo; but this he would not suffer, and maintained the fortissimo to the end—a practice now always followed.

(Conclusion in next number.)

"LA DAMNATION DE FAUST."

(From The Musical Review, Jan. 29.)

When Berlioz was induced by Liszt (to whom he dedicated La Damnation) to read for the first time the French translation of Goethe's Faust, by Gérard de Nerval, he was profoundly impressed. "The marvellous work fascinated me. I could not put it down. I read it everywhere, at table, at the theatre, in the streets." Under its influence Berlioz wrote, and had printed at his own expense, his work, Eight scenes from Faust, the principal ideas of which were developed and retouched in La Damnation. Dissatisfied with this first work, he caused the plates and copies to be destroyed. It was during a journey in Austria, Hungary, Bohemia and Russia, that he began the composition of his Legend of Faust. He had long been considering it, and found that he must decide upon writing most of the libretto himself. The few fragments of a French translation of Goethe's Faust which he had put to music twenty years before, and which he wished to introduce into the new score, would not form a sixth part of the whole work. It is most interesting to gather from his "Mémoires" something concerning the rise and growth of this great conception and the circumstances under which it took form. He says:—

"As I rolled along in the old post-chaise, I tried to make the verses, without translating or even imitating the great masterpiece, but endeavoring so to inspire myself with it as to extract its musical substance. I began by Faust's Invocation to Nature and, once started, I made the verse accordingly, as the musical ideas presented themselves. I composed the score with unusual facility and wrote it when and where I could. In the carriage, on the trains and boats, and even in the cities, in spite of my labors in giving concerts. In a little inn on the borders of Bavaria, I wrote the Introduction, Old Winter yields to Spring. At Vienna, I wrote the Scenes on the banks of the Elbe; the air of Mephistopheles, 'Voici des Roses,' and the Ballet of the Sylphs. The March on the Hungarian Rakoczy theme, written in one night at Vienna, produced so extraordinary a sensation at Pesth, that I introduced it into my Faust score, taking the liberty of putting my hero in Hungary at the beginning of the action and making him witness the passage of a Hungarian troop across the plain where he is wandering in reverie. In Pesth, I lost my way and wrote, by the gaslight in a shop window, the chorus refrain of the Peasant's Rondo. In Prague, I arose at midnight, trembling lest I should forget the song, and wrote the Chorus of Angels in the apotheosis of Marguerite. At Breslau, I wrote the words and music of the Latin song of the students. On my return to France, being at a country seat near Rouen, I composed the trio, Ange adoré. The rest was written in Paris, at home, at the café, in the garden of the Tuileries, and even on a bench of the Boulevard du Temple. The ideas came to me in most unforeseen order. The score sketched out, I worked over the whole, polished and united the parts with all the patience and intensity of which I am capable, and finished the instrumentation which I had only indicated here and there. I consider this work one of my best, and the public, so far, agree with me." Berlioz here refers, not to the French, but to the German public. Later on he exclaims: "It was nothing to have composed La Damnation de Faust; the labor consisted in having it performed."

At last, after many efforts, he succeeded in gathering together sufficient material to produce a work which he hoped would contribute greatly to his celebrity. Accordingly, on Sunday, December 6, 1846, at a day concert at the Opéra Comique, in Paris, Berlioz conducted the first performance of his Dramatic Legend, La Damnation de Faust. The weather was snowy and stormy; and the room half filled. This work, from the hand of a young composer who fearlessly courted opposition, was the realization of ardent musical theories. It was a brilliant stroke, but far from being a success. The public, accustomed to ridiculing this artist with his "pretended" music, was only too happy to pronounce upon so important a work, without a candid hearing,—turning a deaf ear to its great beauties and listening only to its "eccentricities," the better to cry: "Heresy!" Berlioz had expended much money upon this performance and was profoundly wounded by the indifference his work encountered. "The discovery," he says, "was cruel, but useful. Never since has it happened to me to venture twenty francs on the chance of the Parisian public's caring for my music." Soon afterwards, in Berlin, whither Berlioz had been summoned by the King of Prussia, he again produced the Faust and received from the King distinguishing marks of favor and appreciation. This admirable work awakened, indeed, the enthusiasm of all Germany. After a splendid concert in Dresden, for instance, at which his legend, La Damnation de Faust, had been given, Lipinski introduced him to a musician, who, he said, wished to compliment him, but who did not speak French. So, as Berlioz did not speak German, Lipinski offered to act as interpreter. When the artist stepped forward, he took Berlioz by the hand, stammered out a few words and burst into sobs which he could no longer control.

The Faust of Berlioz can not be taken as an exact paraphrase of the poem of Goethe. But, if the author makes undesirable omission of some important scenes, such as in the prison and in the church, and if he deprives himself of the character of Valentine with its admirable episodes, he treats certain situations neglected by earlier (and by later) composers, and has known how to compose a poem with two essential qualities, color and life. Berlioz carefully justifies his free use of the original poem in these words: "The title of my work sufficiently indicates that it is not based upon the principal idea of Goethe's Faust, for in the illustrious poem Faust is saved." Berlioz has borrowed from Goethe only a certain number of scenes which entered into his plan and which seem to have attracted him irresistibly. The very fact that he should have substituted Faust's descent to hell for that portion of the German work in which the hero is saved, shows a characteristic phase of his genius. Berlioz, not unlike Edgar Allen Poe, took a peculiar delight in the horrible; and he could not, possibly resist so favorable an opportunity to send a man to the devil, with all the accompanying terrors.

The score of La Damnation de Faust is divided into four parts, containing nineteen scenes and an epilogue. The scene opens without an overture. Faust is wandering amid the plains of Hungary, singing a monologue to the awakening spring, accompanied by a soft murmur in the orchestra. Then follows a lovely symphonic picture. A thousand pastoral sounds mingle, until the fresh, joyous Rondo de Paysan bursts forth. It is important to note in these passages the fragments of the march, introduced later, for horn and piccolo in condensed rhythm and suggesting the approach of the Hungarian soldiers. The Rondo is cleverly orchestrated, so as to preserve the pastoral tone throughout. Flutes and oboes in unison have the melody, which is accompanied almost entirely by the clarinet, bassoons and horns, and only occasionally by the reluctant strings.

This gayety calls from the unhappy Faust a regretful sigh, breathed forth in a musical phrase of deep melancholy. Then passes a troop, with its martial sounds. This is the popular Rakoczy March. Berlioz here developed the theme of the Hungarian National Hymn wonderfully, and then arranged it for orchestra, and it is to his brilliant scoring that the march owes its universal popularity. While he himself considers its introduction here a caprice, it is of deeper poetic import. For it enables Berlioz to present in the first part two powerful contrasts: Faust's melancholy and the peasants' mirth; Faust's renewed gloom and the boisterous joy of the Hungarian soldiers.

The second part begins—Faust is in his laboratory eager for knowledge, weary of life. As he raises the poisoned death-cup to his lips, comes the sound of Easter music. This scene, taken textually from Goethe's poem, is of great beauty. The désillusion and the ardor of Faust are painted with a masterhand. The Easter hymn, after a short introduction for sopranos and altos accompanied by double basses, is sung by male voices only, with a sparsely scored accompaniment. The apparition of the demon is treated in a few highly colored measures, and the concise motive with which Mephistopheles is introduced, and which occurs several times later on, is the earliest example of a leading motive in an operatorio. The demon transports his lord and master to the tavern of Auerbach. Here Berlioz has given a literal rendering of the original scene and words. The drinking chorus has an irresistible "entrain." Then Brander, heavy and vinous, as suits his listeners, sings the stanzas of the Song of the Rat. Hardly has the crowd pronounced its lamentable Requiescat, when begins a "dishevelled" fugue on the word Amen. This is a musical jest on the part of the composer, who was glad thus to turn the tables upon his detractors, the ardent defenders and compilers of pseudo-classical fugues. For Berlioz himself by no means underrated the power of the artistic fugue, and has introduced several fugatos into La Damnation de Faust. The fugue ended, the devil flings at the gaping crowd his bizarre Song of the Flea. This is one of the most interesting parts of the work. For Berlioz has described, by means of clever forms in the accompaniment, the skipping of the flea in various directions. Further on occurs what might be described as a skipping climax; and that part of the song which mentions the stinging flea is accompanied by a quick thrust on the kettle-drum. It is interesting to note the fact that even Beethoven, not disdaining programme-music, has composed music to the same text with an equally descriptive accompaniment, ending with a rapid passage whose notes are all, with Beethoven's characteristic humor, marked to be run down with the thumb. To accomplish this, the tip of the thumb closes on the third finger tip—an exceedingly suggestive position under the circumstances.

Under the title, Bosquets et Prairies au bord de l'Elbe, Berlioz has transcribed the end of the third scene and composed a marvel of graceful, fairy-like inspiration. The demon murmurs into the ear of Faust a softly penetrating melody. The Chorus of the Gnomes and the Ballet of the Sylphs defy all word-description. The slumber-chorus in this scene is perhaps the most difficult number of the work. The rhythm of the soft melody taken by the soprani is exceedingly catching. It begins with a part for chorus and orchestra in 3-4 time (Andante) then the chorus sings it 6-8 time (Allegro), while the strings continue in the old tempo, so that three of the bars of the chorus correspond to one bar of the strings.¹ In the following ballet of the sylphs the melody is that of the slumber song, built on the organ-point, D, which the basses sound throughout the entire movement. Afterwards it is combined with the students' and soldiers' chorus. The close connection between these parts and, indeed, the intimate poetic relation existing between all the numbers of this work, show how necessary to its unity a complete performance is, and how ill advised it is to present only fragments of it to the public. Faust perceives, amid his dreams, the fair image of Marguerite and the demon hurries him away through the groups of soldiers and students, who are singing of war and of love.

The night falls; drums and clarions sound the "retreat." Faust penetrates into the young girl's chamber. Marguerite enters, disturbed and troubled. She sings, to distract her thoughts, an ancient ballad of archaic form, of which the last words die like a soft kiss upon her lips.

Here reappears the poem of Berlioz. All the end of this part, excepting the serenade and the dialogue of the lovers, is his invention. At a sign of the demon, the Follets (will o' the wisp) come flying to Marguerite's door—(this charming minuet is a worthy pendant of the ballet of the sylphs) and Mephistopheles warbles, with his scoffing voice, an enchanting serenade. At the end of the Evocation des Follets, which is superbly orchestrated, occurs a Presto, whose melody is new and which eventually develops into the serenade of Mephistopheles—as though he had imbued the follets with his spirit. In the accompaniment of the serenade, Berlioz has reproduced the peculiar effect of the mandolin by pizzicato crescendos for violas and second violins. Faust and Marguerite are alone, intoxicated with the song, and Faust breathes forth his love in a phrase of deepest passion. Their voices unite; they soar together. The demon enters—"Fly!" he cries, "The mother—the friends are at hand!" And the final trio and chorus close in a superb sweep of passion and Satanic joy. The danger presses, the tumult increases, and the demon drags Faust away, leaving the defenceless, unhappy Marguerite. In this end of the third part, the composer's inspiration, untrammelled by an impossible theatrical representation, has produced a picture above praise, taking rank with the noblest examples of dramatic music.

At the opening of the fourth part, Marguerite is in her chamber, weeping, despairing, hoping. She seats herself at her spinning-wheel and murmurs a melody full of anguish. As Marguerite's passion awakens at the thought of her lordly love, a plaintive echo of this first love passes over the orchestra, and she flies to the window. In the distance is heard the song of the students, the last echo of the "retreat." Night falls. Everything recalls to the unhappy child the remembrance of the one evening without a morrow. "He comes not!" she cries, and falls, half dead, with remorse and anguish. In the following number, Forests and Caverns, the musician has been inspired by the fine Invocation to Nature, which is in the corresponding scene of Goethe's poem.

The orchestral and vocal composition translates marvellously this burning cry, this ardent aspiration after infinite happiness. But the demon appears, recounting in darkly colored harmonies the remorse of the loved one, her crime, her imprisonment, her approaching death. It will be remembered that nothing has been said as yet of a compact between Faust and Mephistopheles. With delicate poetic feeling Berlioz has allowed Mephistopheles to appear only as the jolly companion, not as the tempting demon. But now, after playing upon Faust's sympathies for the unhappy girl until he is seized with terrible anguish and remorse, he throws off the mask; and Faust willing to sacrifice all, even eternal happiness, for his love, seals the compact. It is then Mephistopheles calls for the black steeds of hell. "To me, Vortex, Giaour!" he cries, and, mounted on them, the devil and Faust rush into space. It is a flight to the abyss. Here Berlioz gives free rein to the boldest imaginings. The unbridled race of the coursers of hell, the incantations of witches, wild exclamations of Faust, the sneers of the devil—all are depicted in a frightful unloosing of orchestral masses.

Berlioz ends the legend with two strange compositions of rare energy, and sharply contrasted:—Pandemonium: it is hell with a sinister gnashing, with its devouring joys; it is the triumph of the demon, clutching his prey in his talons. Heaven: it is pure, ineffable bliss; it is the apparition of the unhappy sinner; it is the divine, angelic concert, calling to the abode of the blessed, the repentant, purified Marguerite.

Special mention should be made of the skilful treatment of the bass voices in the Apotheosis. They are reserved until the very last, when they are introduced to swell the climax with wonderful effect.

La Damnation de Faust is a work of great worth. Berlioz has been helped in his perilous attempt by the richest imagination, fired by the grandeur and the ideal beauty of his model. Even when he departs from the original text and, by combining several episodes, produces an entirely different situation, such as the love-scene interrupted by the arrival of the demon, the musician is still sustained by the poet, and his inspirations pour richly, grandly forth. It is a work worthy to be placed forever side by side with the original drama.

THE VIOLIN FAIRY.

[Under this title Dr. Hans von Bülow sends the following characteristic and eccentric letter to the Leipzig Signale. The translation is from the London Musical World.]

The country of optical is not that of acoustic fogs. The subjects of the house of Hanover on the other side of the Channel invariably enjoy during the bad season—if indeed we can speak of such a season as anything exceptional—a musically-blue sky such as the inhabitants of the art-loving Semitic metropolises of the continent can scarcely boast of possessing. True, this paradise is not so full of joys as it is of pianos. Nowhere does the "Pianoforte-Witch," from the green Miss of the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor to the mature party of Brahms' in D minor, hold more locust-like and fearful sway than in London. Thanks, however, to the great number of concerts, it is not impossible to get out of her way, without directing one's steps to those resorts which Hector Berlioz characterized so appropriately as "les mauvais lieux de la musique," namely: the operatic theatres. As a rule, the Pianoforte-Witch is unfortunately hard to avoid in that Sanctissimum Sanctæ Cecilie, Arthur Chappell's famous Popular Concerts in St. James's Hall, where on Saturday afternoons and Monday evenings the most precious treasures of classical and likewise of post-classical chamber-music are, as most persons know, revealed to a reverently attentive and enthusiastically grateful gathering of 2,000 listeners (of whom the half, in the gallery and on the platform, pay only a shilling each) and interpreted in a manner far above all praise. With the king of violoncellists, Alfredo Piatti, and the Grand-Dukes of the second violin and tenor, Messrs. Ries and Zerbini, there is regularly associated during the last two months before Easter, the Prince Consort of the Queen of Instruments, on whom, even without any suitable Versailles preparatory ceremonies, we may (as a sequel to the recent lavish distribution of honors) bestow the title of Emperor. Before, however, the illustrious Director of the High School makes his appearance, the first violin is played by some one else, namely his—rival.

"Good Heavens! Has Joachim, then, a rival—can he possibly have one?" is the interrogation which I suddenly hear addressed to me through you, my respected editor.

Well—in Germany, during a quarter of a century I, like others, have never come across anybody who could be violently suspected of rivalry with him. There is scarcely a single one of his "colleagues" who can possibly dream of wearing the crown which the illustrious ami de Brahms has won. The great Naussauer, at present in the New World, plating his laurels with dollars, is, apart from his immeasurable artistic inferiority compared with Joachim, among the popular celebrities of the violin a personage endowed with far less individuality than, for instance, the fiery Pole or the fascinating Spaniard, who have found out, and still know, how to win by their "play" the ears and the hearts of the educated and the uneducated mass. In the younger generation, and more especially among his own pupils, in connection with whom nothing in the remotest degree like the good luck of his old master, Ferd. David, has down to the present date smiled on him, there is no one growing up to compete with Joachim for his pedestal. After a little Rode, Viotti, Spohr—or Bruch—Beethoven's two Romances, and, perhaps, Bruch's as well, Tartini's good-natured "Devil's Shake," and possibly half a Chaconne by Bach, have been filtered over rather than into them, the said scholars are as we know, dismissed at a most defective stage of general musical education with a certificate of maturity. The more they need recommendation, that is, the less they possess to recommend themselves, the warmer are the recommendations, apportioned with true Meyerbeerian generosity, which are stuffed into their coat-pockets. Intendants and chapel-directors, either from an easy way of doing business, or from indifference in matters in art, and not considering it an act of robbery sometimes to buy a pig in a poke, appoint violinists of this kind, who, as regards Beethoven's or Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, might go and learn of little Dengremont, as Concertmeister for life. This is a curse for chapel-master and orchestra. The former finds an insurmountable drag, where he expected an intelligent adjutant; the latter obtain a more or less welcome, but at any rate a most reliable demoralizer.

As I have hinted, however, where Joachim's rival is to be found, it is not necessary for me to add where we must at present seek that personage. The only rival of the Unrivalled One lives in England; that rival is a lady; and the name of that lady is

WILMA NORMAN-NERUDA.

I have christened her the Violin Fairy, and I should have thus characterized her, even though her anti-type, the Pianoforte-Witch, had not floated before my mind.

A man may be highly respected and a great favorite with the Shah of Persia, and yet King Cetewayo (speaking figuratively: where, by the way, does that sovereign not possess cousins?) may not have heard of the great pet of Teheran. I am prepared, when giving the earthly name of the Violin Fairy, to encounter numerous looks of astonishment. Persons thoroughly up in the chronicles of music will recollect the sensation created some twenty years ago by a travelling child-wonder, called Neruda, whom they subsequently forgot in company with others that have vanished, doing so, probably, in the belief, so often corroborated by facts, that wonderful children tread themselves down—as they do the shoes they wore at the wonderful period of their life. It is quite possible that Dengremont, the wonderful boy, may not turn out a wonderful youth, nor the wonderful youth, Sarasate, a wonderful man; there is, however, one thing which I can assert with unqualified certainty: the wonderful girl, Wilma Neruda, has become a wonderful woman, reigning in England as Sovereign of the Violin, by the grace of Apollo, and with approbation of all who understand and all who love music.

To the writer of these lines, who had the honor and the happiness of playing with her four times last month, the Violin Fairy has done so much mental good, that he must be on his guard not to fall into too suspiciously enthusiastic a tone. As you are aware, respected Sir and Editor, he had for some time been knocking about in not very musically-aristocratic society, in the "mauvais lieux de la musique," to quote Hector Berlioz once again. Not so much tired of, as disgusted with, music—because I had been compelled to gulp down so much that was un-music—I went to London, partly to play back into English coin my lost salary as a Prussian Chapel-master, and partly in the hope of seeing disagreeable impressions washed out by others more joyful and more pleasant. Thanks to the fair enchantress, this hope was fulfilled far more speedily and far more amply than I had ever dreamt it would be. During previous visits of mine to England the lady had filled me with the warmest sympathy and admiration—if I recollect aright, one of my ill-famed Letters of Travel in last year's series of the Signale bears witness to this—but never had her playing overpowered me with such electric force. "If I am not wrong," I said inquiringly of my highly respected colleague, Mr. Charles Hallé, "she really plays more finely than she did?" "No, you are not wrong," was the reply; "she really plays more finely not only every year, but every time she appears." Where is this to end?

To praise Mad. Neruda's technical skill would be as absurd as materialistic. Who talks about Joachim's mechanism? The mind, the soul, the life, the warmth, the nobleness, the style, the exquisite bloom of ideal individuality developed out of the closest identification with the work of art, and the most affectionate blending of self with the latter, the glorious resurrection of the subject as reward for devotion to the object—these are the things in which the secret of the enchantress's power over the hearts of those who hear her is to be sought. In these she is great and pure like Joachim; in these she is, like him, unique. This is the reason why we must allow her to possess what is more than "talent hors ligne," namely: genius, that is: talent raised to the highest power. And what variety, too! With regard to this particular, however, we will postpone the comparison with Joachim till the time, not, let us hope, too far distant, when Mad. Neruda, ceasing to be for us merely a legendary personage, will no longer disdain to reveal in Germany her "name and quality."

I have just now employed the word "genius," and ought to justify myself in the eyes of those who reserve it for creative efforts, properly so termed. But the feminine of the notion strikes me as admissible; it strikes me that we may speak of receptive genius, whenever the latter rises and develops into reproduction. Let us give unto the ladies the things that are the ladies'; this is, it is true, sometimes less than they demand, but, thank Heaven, the reasonable and not the outrageous ones still constitute the majority among the "potenzierte Kinder" (as Goethe calls them). We may allow that the fair sex possesses reproductive genius, just as we unconditionally deny they possess productive genius. The rare exceptions in French and English literature, Georges Sand and Elliot, cannot constitute a precedent in music, such a precedent having hitherto not had absolutely a single pretext for its justification. There will never be a compositress, there can be only, at most, a copyist spoilt. My excellent fellow-pianist, Herr Alfred Jaell, must not be offended if, in conclusion, I describe, as bearing on this theme, my meeting him (some years since), because my account of the event has, like many other utterances of mine, which have undeservedly become winged, suffered all kinds of oral distortions.

Herr Jaell honored me one day with a visit. As active in his fingers as, on account of a corpulent habit, he is heavy on the pedals, he was so out of breath when he came in that I laid the blame of his distressed condition on the heavy parcel of music (manuscripts of his wife's) with which he was loaded, rather than upon the third floor, where I lived. He entreated me most touchingly to devote my eyes and mind to the said compositions. This was my answer:

"The tidings I hear, but faith is wanting. I do not believe in the feminine of the notion: Creator. Furthermore, everything with a flavor of woman's emancipation about it is utterly hateful to me. I consider ladies who compose far more objectionable than those who would like to be elected deputies. The last is, to a certain degree, already a usual thing, since, for instance, Herr Lasker, and others like him, can be classed only as old women fond of wrangling. Let me remain, therefore, for a time, unblest with the hallucinations of your better half. In return, I promise most solemnly that, on the lendemain of the day that you announce your (own) happy accouchment of a healthy baby, I will make the first serious attempt at converting myself to a belief in the vocation of the female sex for musical productivity. Till then, farewell!"

HANS VON BULOW.

BAYREUTH, 15 Feb., 1880,

A LADY FLAUTIST.

VIENNA, Feb. 24.—At length we have a variety in the grand concert market; Signora Bianchini, a virtuosa on the flute! "Sie ist die Erste nicht" ("She is not the first"), says Mephisto. In the year 1827, a Mme. Rousseau, and between 1830 and 1840, a Mdle. Lorenzino Meyer, played the flute in public here. Since then the strange phenomenon was not repeated; nay, even male flute-players have become very scarce. How and when an instrument achieves popularity in the concert-room, becomes fashionable, and then goes out of fashion, is one of the most interesting things in musical history. "Travelling virtuosos" upon a wind instrument are now extremely uncommon; at the close of the last, and at the commencement of the present century, they held their own equally with other concert-givers. Today the piano has seized not only on the supremacy, but nearly on exclusive sway, and driven the other instruments, save the violin and also the violoncello, out of the concert-room into the orchestra. Formerly the flute was such a favorite with amateurs and concert-givers, that composers could not write enough for it, and we read in Werden's Musikalisches Taschenbuch for 1803: "For all instruments capable of beautiful expression there are concertos in large numbers, but more for the flute than for any other." Beethoven wrote spontaneously, in 1801, to the Leipsic publisher, Hoffmeister, that he should like to arrange his Septet for the flute: "This would be rendering a service to lovers of that instrument, who would swarm around and feed upon the work." How quickly have the tables been turned! Between 1840-50, we had in Vienna only two non-local virtuosos on the flute who performed with anything like success: Briccialdi and Heindl. Since then, that is for more than thirty years, concertos upon wind instruments have been dying out. In the ten years from 1855 to 1865, there were no non-local and only two local flautists, the brothers Doppler, as concert-givers here in Vienna. The above incomparable pair succeeded by their splendid concerted play in curing many a person of his antipathy for their instrument, and in permanently fascinating the public. They triumphantly put to shame the old joke: "What is a greater bore than a flute?—Answer: Two flutes," and awoke, on the contrary, a conviction that two were more entertaining than one. At first people could only feel pleased that an end was put to their being flooded with concertos for the flute, the oboe, the bassoon, and the clarinet, because the place for these instruments, which require to be supplemented, as they themselves supplement others, is the orchestra, and because they possessed no literature of their own. The fearful manner in which the piano—an independent instrument, it is true, but more obtrusive than any other concert instrument—has taken the upper hand, causes us now to entertain far more friendly feelings towards the dethroned wind-instrumentalists, and would, for example, find us perfectly willing to hear one of the best of C. M. von Weber's clarinet concertos performed by a first-rate virtuoso. With regard to our fair Venetian flautist, Maria Bianchini, her performance on her difficult instrument was well worthy commendation. Her embouchure is good; she has a long breath, and as powerful a tone as can justly be expected in a lady. The superior qualities of the "Böhm flute," which is easier to play and less fatiguing to the lungs, rendered her in these particulars good service. In her execution of the cantilena, she displayed much good taste, while in run-work she was rapid, certain, and elegant. She was especially successful in a Fantasia by Franz Doppler, the pleasing effect of which is enhanced by the exotic charm of national Walachian melodies. The unusual sight of a lady playing such an instrument did not strike people as so strange as we thought it would; Signora Bianchini, who has a tall figure and whose demeanor is characterized by sympathetic, unaffected simplicity, avoids the ugly contortions of the lips and short-breathed blowing which may so easily jeopardize the æsthetic effect of flute-playing. Managed as it was on the occasion in question, the flute is decidedly not an unfeminine instrument. Signora Bianchini was liberally applauded and her concert well attended. Mdlle. Marie Keil, a clever vocalist, and Mdlle. Josephine Ziffer, an interesting young pianist, received some very friendly encouragement. But much more boisterous was the applause bestowed on the singing of a barytone of elegant appearance, with a strong and agreeable voice. We feel indescribably comforted at not being compelled to say anything unfavorable of him, because, as we are informed, he is not a professional singer, but an assistant at one of the first chemists in Vienna. The mere fact that, in the exercise of his calling, he might be irritated and disturbed by an adverse newspaper criticism, makes us shudder.—Neue Freie Presse. EDUARD HANSLICK.

GLASGOW.—The Orchestral Subscription Concerts have presented the following works this winter:

"First concert—Weber's Overture to Oberton: Schubert's (unfinished) Symphony in B minor; Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and orchestra (Signor Sarasate); Berlioz' Overture to Benvenuto Cellini; and selections from Wagner's Die Meistersinger. Second concert—Bach's Concerto in G for strings; Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica"; Bennett's Overture, to Paradise and Peri; and Gounod's ballet airs from Polyete. Third concert—Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, with concert-coda by Wagner; Haydn's Symphony in G, "Oxford"; Schumann's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra (Miss Helen Hopekirk, a hopeful aspirant); and Beethoven's Overture, Leonore, No. 3. Fourth concert—Mendelssohn's Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream (exquisitely played); Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll"; A. C. Mackenzie's "Rhapsodie Ecossaise" (a marvellously fine work, and in it for the first time our national airs have been treated in classic fashion); and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 5, in C minor. Fifth concert—Handel's Oboe Concerto, No. 2, in B flat; Mendelssohn's Scherzo from the Octet (adapted for the full orchestra by the composer); Goetz' Symphony in F; Sullivan's Incidental Music to Henry VIII.; and Wagner's Overture to Tannhäuser. Sixth concert—Allegro from Beethoven's unfinished Violin Concerto (Herr Franke); Beethoven's Symphony, No. 7, in A; and Verdi's Prelude to Aida.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

EASTER ORATORIO.—The Handel and Haydn Society gave Handel's colossal chorus Oratorio, Israel in Egypt, as the third and last of the subscription series, on Sunday evening, March 28. The Music Hall was crowded. The great work was produced on a grand scale, with the chorus ranks full; an excellent orchestra of sixty musicians (Mr. Listemann at their head), fine organ accompaniment by Mr. B. J. Lang, and on the whole a very satisfactory array of solo singers. Most of the choral work was admirably done, but there were instances of uncertainty, unsteadiness, and lack of perfect tune; it was not zeal in the singers that was wanting, nor skill and tact on the part of the conductor, Mr. Carl Zerrahn; it was simply that the overcrowded season did not allow of so many rehearsals as so difficult and great a work must have in order to go perfectly. In was impossible, however, not to feel the grandeur, and the now graphic, now triumphal power of this whole series of choral illustrations of stupendous scenes in history.

The solos are comparatively few, and by no means the most interesting portion of the work. Those contained in the "Appendix," (the Bass airs: "He layeth the beams," and "Wave from wave," sung by Mr. J. F. Winch and Mr. M. W. Whitney, respectively, with some recitatives) were introduced from other works of Handel by Sir George Smart. They are among the most interesting that were sung; but being taken evidently from Handel's Italian operas, they seemed hardly of the same cloth with the rest of the garment, and one needed but to hear to know that it was patched; excellent music these; but Handel did not treat all occasions and all themes alike. These airs were nobly sung, and so was the great duet of basses: "The Lord is a man of war," by the same two gentlemen, creating such enthusiasm that they had to sing it a second time. It is an artistic mistake, however, ever to repeat that very long, exhaustive, difficult duet. It repeats itself full enough when once sung through; its peculiar charm, too, is one that loses freshness on an immediate second hearing; invariably our mind wanders away from it during the repetition, for it was never made to be a "twice told tale;" and it never goes so well a second time. A conductor ought to be a despot with his audiences (who in Art are children), no less than with his choir and orchestra. The tenor solos could hardly have been given to a more effective singer than Mr. W. C. Power, who has a resonant, robust voice, and has made great improvement in the use of it, we understand, within a year. His style is manly, and full of fervor, and he was obliged to repeat the air: "The enemy said, I will pursue." Miss Fanny Kellogg, called upon at a day's notice, on account of the sudden hoarseness of Mrs. H. M. Smith, and so soon after her own severe bereavement (of both parents,) kindly undertook a considerable portion of the soprano solos, having never seen or heard the Israel before, and sang it in a manner that won warm approval. Mrs. F. P. Whitney sang very satisfactorily the soprano solos of the first part, and with Miss Kellogg the duet: "The Lord is my strength." The alto solos, and the alto part in the duet with tenor: "Thou in thy mercy," were sung by Mrs. Frank Kinsley, of New York. She has a light, pleasing voice, and sang with intelligence and care; but her efforts were somewhat marred by a habit of forcing her lower tones into a somewhat boy-like quality.

Now it is all busy hnm of preparation for the fifth Triennial Festival next month. The programme, so far as yet announced, is as follows:

May 4. Evening, "St. Paul." Mendelssohn.
May 5. Evening, "The Last Judgment." Spohr.
(First time in 66 years.)
"Stabat Mater." Rossini.
May 6. Afternoon, Ninth (Choral) Symphony. Beethoven.
(First time in 6 years.)
43 Psalm, "Judge me, O God!" Mendelssohn.
May 6. Evening, Manzoni Requiem. Verdi.
May 7. Evening, "Spring" and "Summer" from The "Seasons." Haydn.
The "Deluge." Saint-Saëns.
(First time.)
May 8. Afternoon, — A miscellaneous Concert by the Solo Singers, Orchestra and Chorus, including "Utrecht Jubilate" (first time) by Handel, and a chorus by
J. S. Bach.
May 9. Evening, "Solomon." Handel.
(First time in 25 years.)

The following distinguished Vocalists will appear during the Festival:—

Sopranos, Miss Emma C. Thursby, and others to be engaged.
Contraltos, Miss Annie Cary, Miss Emily Winant.
Tenors, Italo Campanini, Charles R. Adams, William H. Fessenden, William Courtney.
Basses, Myron W. Whitney, John F. Winch, Geo. W. Dudley.
Orchestra of seventy performers, including the best Boston orchestral players, under Bernhard Listemann. Chorus of five hundred voices.
B. J. Lang, Organist.
Carl Zerrahn, Conductor of the Festival.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The fifteenth season of Symphony Concerts ended gloriously with the great Schubert Symphony in C—the Symphony of the "heavenly length," as Schumann called it—on Thursday afternoon, March 25. This was the eighth Concert, and notwithstanding that it was "Holy Thursday," and the March east wind of the harshest and most discouraging, the largest audience of the season came to listen and seek inspiration, which in such harmony they surely found. The programme was as follows:—

Overture: "Weihe des Hauses," in C, Op. 124 Beethoven.
Cavatina: "Bel raggio lusinghiero," from "Semiramide," Miss Fannie Louise Barnes. Rossini.
Piano-Forte Concerto, in F-sharp minor (first time in America) Hans von Bronsart.
Allegro maestoso.—Adagio ma non troppo.—Allegro con fuoco. B. J. Lang.
Aria: "O del mio dolce ardor" Gluck.
Miss Fannie Louise Barnes.
Symphony, No. 9, in C Schubert.
Andante; Allegro ma non troppo (C).—Andante con moto
(A minor).—
Scherzo, Allegro vivace (C, Trio in A).—Allegro vivace (C).

Beethoven's Dedication, or Inauguration, Overture (for the opening of a theatre, and the restoration of high Art, in Pesth), with its broad, majestic introduction, with trumpet proclamation, and curious rhapsodical running bassoon accompaniment, and the vigorous Handelian fugue of its brilliant Allegro, was well played, and awakened expectation of good things to come. The Concert by Von Bronsart is full of life and verve in the first movement, which is laid out on a large plan, teeming with intentions which seem rather unattainable and vague, and somewhat overgrown with the too full and crowded orchestration. Of the pianist it demands any amount of execution, fire and indomitable energy; it has also its sweet and gracious passages; and to all Mr. Lang proved himself quite equal. There is more repose in the short, subdued Adagio, which is modeled somewhat upon those to Beethoven's G-major, and Chopin's Concertos. The Finale is a swift and fiery Tarantella, in which you feel whirled away with irresistible force. It was altogether a splendid interpretation of a work more rewarding than most of the recent ambitious compositions in this form.

Miss Fannie Louise Barnes, the daughter of the well-known ex-President of our Handel and Haydn Society, has been for some time a pupil of Signor Errani, the distinguished vocal teacher in New York. This was her first public effort in a large concert hall with orchestra; and naturally in the Rossini Cavatina she sang a little too over-carefully and conscientiously, to allow full, free sweep to the florid melody; giving the same kind of phrase always in precisely the same way, like a faithful pupil. Nevertheless she made an excellent impression by the interesting tone-color of her fresh, pure, evenly developed voice, by her honest, finished execution, and by her freedom from all affectations and all the common faults of tremolo, of nasal singing, and what not. Her modesty was not a small part of the charm. The Aria by Gluck was beautifully sung, with simple, true expression. Certainly here is a voice and talent of much promise.

Of the great Symphony—an inspired work, if there ever was one—we need only say, since all true music-lovers know and love it well, that the performance by Mr. Zerrahn's orchestra was altogether worthy of the work. Perhaps never before in Boston has a great audience listened to it, from beginning to end, with such enthusiastic interest, such thorough and renewed conviction of the intrinsic and immortal beauty of this greatest work of Schubert. On account of its great length most of the repeats were wisely omitted.

APOLLO CLUB.—The last concert dates so far back (March 9), that our impressions of it in detail have lost their freshness. The programme was miscellaneous, containing things of a high artistic order, and nothing commonplace. The singing seemed to us extremely good,—almost too good, that is to say, too daintily refined for certain things, say "drinking songs," which owe much of their charm to a certain off-hand freedom. Here is the programme in full:—

The Stars in Heaven Rheinberger.
King Witleaf's Drinking Horn Hallon.
Songs:—

a. Thou Hast Left Me Ever, Jamie R. Franz.
b. Spring Song Mendelssohn.
[Sung by Miss Ida W. Hubbell.]

The Tears Witt.
The Three Fishers R. Goldbeck.
[Sung by Mr. Parker, Mr. Want, Mr. Chubbuck and Mr. Babcock.]

The Nun of Nidaros, op. 83 Dudley Buck.
The tenor solo sung by Mr. Want, organ accompaniment played by Mr. J. A. Preston, Jun., piano accompaniment by Mr. Arthur Foote.

Night Greeting Max von Weinzierl, op. 17.
[The tenor solo sung by Mr. Want, the barytone by Dr. Bullard.]

Which is the properest day to drink Dr. Arne, 176.
[Sung by the tenors principally.]

Songs:—
The Lily and the Violet S. P. Warren.
I Love my Love S. P. Warren.
[Sung by Miss Hubbell.]

Thou'rt not the first (Austrian Waltz), Storch.
The Sea King B. T. Lang.
[Sung by Dr. Bullard and Mr. J. F. Winch.]
O World, thou art Wondrous Fair F. Hülles.
[The soprano solo sung by Miss Hubbell.]

Miss Hubbell, the soprano of Grace Church, New York, has a good voice and style, and sang with intelligence; to better advantage, however, in Mendelssohn's bright "Spring Song," than in the Burns song set by Franz. Mr. Lang's "Sea King" duet is in the rollicking old English bravura style, with plenty of "go" in it, and made a lively effect as sung by the two basses. Dr. Arne's Shakespearean round is charming in its way. The first and last were perhaps the noblest numbers of the programme, and were admirably sung.

BOYLSTON CLUB.—The third concert (March 17), was distinguished by the employment, for the first time, of an orchestra, and by the production therewith of two of the posthumous choral works of the lamented Goetz, namely his 137th Psalm: "By the Waters of Babylon," (op. 14), and the romantic barcarole, it might be called, were it not so elaborate,—"The Lake is Hushed at Evenglow," for tenor solo and double male chorus (op. 11). These suggested the necessity of an orchestra, having which, the Club made use of it in all the remainder of the programme. As so many of the pieces were of the modern German misty, sentimental, moonlight part-song character, lengthy and elaborate, there seemed to be a need of some relief, such as the Club could easily have furnished by the singing of one or two short things without an orchestra,—say a couple of unaccompanied choruses by female voices only, which would have added a refreshing divertissement, and made the larger pieces more appreciated.

The psalm by Goetz needs no description after the excellent one by Mr. Eayrs, which we copied from the programme in our last number. We can only say that the work fulfilled to ear and soul, all that was promised there. It made the impression of a noble, a profound religious work of genius, alike admirable in its vocal construction, and in the rich and graphic orchestration. It was very finely sung, with spirit and understanding; but it should be heard more than once to make its power completely felt.

"The Lake is Hushed" failed to interest us to the same degree. It also has great merits; but, being wedded to one of these vague, misty, moonlight German poems, now-a-days so common, it seemed to us as if the music were vainly clutching at a shadow. Some of the orchestral effects are fine, and not without originality; and the singing was excellent, saving some short-comings in the tenor solos. Part 2 was as follows:—

Sunset Mixed chorus and orchestra. Gade.
Recitative and Aria, "O Didst Thou Know," from Acis and Galatea Handel.
Miss Gertrude Franklin,
Night Song in the Wood Schubert.
(Accompanied by horns.)
Boylston Club,
Morning Song Raff.
Mixed Chorus and Orchestra.

Gade's "Sunset" is a sweet, and lovely piece of harmony and color, but too much of the misty moonlight character to come right after the preceding piece. Miss Franklin has good voice and training, and sang Handel's "As When the Dove" quite well, although neither this nor the solo in the Goetz psalm seemed to be of kind of music in which she is most herself. Her forte, as we have since learned, is in the florid kind, like "Rejoice Greatly," or the Jewel Aria in Faust.

Schubert's "Night Song," with the four horns, was the triumph of the evening; it is a thoroughly imaginative woodland poem, in many moods, and both voices and accompaniment expressed it to a charm; the encore was irresistible. Raff's "Morning Song" is a rich and splendid composition, but it came too late, in such a programme, to fairly hit the apprehensive sense. It was, on the whole, a noble programme, and the style in which it was executed was most creditable to the Club, and its thoughtful, indefatigable conductor, Mr. George L. Osgood.

PIANO-FORTE MATINEES, &c.—Their name is legion, and the chief contributor in this line has been, and will yet be, Mr. ERNEST PERABO. We have already spoken of his first three matinees, given in that hot, close, gloomy, noisy little hall in Bromfield Street, always full of the faithful ones, who count it joy to listen to his music, even at such sacrifice of physical comfort, and perhaps of health. Since these, he has given four more matinees and one soirée, besides an extra matinée yesterday, for the benefit of the artistic violinist, Mr. Gustav Dannreuther, who took part in it.

It is impossible to keep in mind distinct impressions of so many programmes crowded with new works. It is a laudable ambition in Mr. Perabo, which prompts him to try to make his friends acquainted with so many new works and new composers admired and honored by himself, but hitherto sealed books to nearly all of us. But in the execution, or rather say the administration of this pious work, we think his judgment hardly equal to his zeal, his love, and his unquestionable ability as an interpreter. New and important works in music have to be introduced somewhat sparingly, one at a time, and the way to each prepared, if it is to secure the full, intelligent attention and appreciation of an audience. When new Sonatas, Trios, Quartets, and Concertos without orchestra are heaped upon us pell-mell, two or three of them in one programme, besides all the smaller novelties, the total impression is so miscellaneous that one wonders whether he has actually been listening, or only wool-gathering. It is true Mr. Perabo has also played, and played admirably, many familiar standard masterpieces, but unity is wanting. Take, for instance, that Soirée of March 8. It opened with the Beethoven Sonata in A flat, op. 26 (the one with the Andante and variations, Marcia Funebre, &c.), which surely Mr. Perabo can play as well as anybody, but which, owing no doubt to the nervous strain and exhaustion of getting up the novelties that followed, he did not play well. These were, first the Scherzo and Finale of a Piano Quintet in B flat, op. 30, by Goldmark (second time in Boston); then a String Quartet, No. 1, in E minor, op. 25, by Richter; then the Romanze and Finale alla Zingara of Joachim's Hungarian Concerto, played by B. Listemann; finally, an Octet for strings, in C minor, op. 16, by Bargiel,—a clear, well-written early work, with some very interesting movements, but not making its due impression at the end of such a programme, for there had also been three of Perabo's transcriptions from a Ballad: "Melek am Quell," by Löwe, and two charming songs by Richter. It is true, the concert-giver did not play himself in all of these things, but the inward wear and tear with him must have been all the same as if he did; he played with his nerves, if not with his fingers.

In the sixth Matinée we had these selections, all virtually novelties:—

a. Prelude and Fugue in D, op. 35, No. 2. Mendelssohn.
b. Prelude in B minor, op. 35, No. 3 "
c. Fugue, from "Drei Stücke," op. 78. F sharp minor Jos. Rheinberger.
[New.]

Trio No. 1, for Piano, Violin and 'cello, op. 65. A major Fr. Kiel.
a. Allegro con passione, b. Intermezzo, Allegro scherzando. c. Largo con espressione, d. Vivace.

First time in this country,
a. Moment Musical, op. 94, No. 1. C major Schubert.
b. Menuetto, from Octet, op. 168. F major "
Arranged for two hands by Ernst Perabo,

Second Grand Trio, for Piano, Violin, and 'Cello S. Jadassohn.
a. Allegro appassionato, b. Romanze, Andante.
c. Scherzo, d. Finale, Allegro con brío.

First time in this country.

Mr. Perabo's solos were all interesting, fresh, and charmingly interpreted. The Trio by Jadassohn, we can heartily say, was to us positively refreshing by its clearness, its conciseness, its spontaneous geniality of musical feeling and conception. That by Kiel we found rather dry. And here is the seventh programme, March 19:—

a. Prelude in E flat minor, op. 27, No. 4. X. Schwarzenka.
[First time in Boston.]
b. Prelude in A flat major, op. 24, No. 21 Rubinstein.
[Second time.]

Trio No. 2, for Piano, Violin, and 'Cello, in G minor, op. 65 Fr. Kiel.
a. Allegro moderato, ma con passione. b. Adagio con molto espressione. c. Romanza. d. Andante: Allegro con moto.

[First time in this country.]

Trios Moments Musicaux, op. 7 M. Moszkowski.
No. 1. Allegretto, B Major
No. 3. Tranquillo e semplice. F sharp major.
[New.]

Quartet for Piano and Strings, op. 38, E flat major,
Jos. Rheinberger,
 a. Allegro non troppo. b. Adagio. c. Menuetto, Adantino. d. Finale, Allegro,
 [Second time in Boston.]

Other programmes have contained, for novelties: a fascinating Prelude and Toccata, in D minor, by V. Lachner; a Quartet for piano and strings, in F, op. 37, by Scharwenka, and more new things in smaller form than we have room to enumerate, by Rubinstein, Rheinberger, Kiel, Mozowski, Jadasohn, and Gernsheim; also of older masters: a Suite in D minor, by Handel; a Sonata in B flat, op. 147, by Schubert; and Beethoven's early Trio (op. 1, No. 3) in C minor, which was a conclusion most delightful, besides many smaller solos. In all the concerto pieces, Mr. Perabo had the valuable assistance of such artists as Messrs. B. and F. Listemann, Allen, H. Suck, H. Heindl, Dannreuther, Fries, and A. Heindl.

Two more Matinées are announced, for April 23 and 30, with Scharwenka's Second Trio, his new Sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 46, and works by Bargiel.

—MR. ARTHUR FOOTE'S very interesting concert, at Mechanics' Hall, March 13, must not be forgotten. He was assisted by Messrs. Gustav Dannreuther, Violin; Henry Heindl, Viola; and Wulf Fries, 'Cello. The programme was a choice one:—

Pianoforte Quartet in G minor. (Op. 7) Johannes Brahms
Allegro—Intermezzo—Andante con moto—Rondo alla Zingara?
 Praeludium and Romanze from Suite in F (Op. 27) for violin and Piano-forte Frans Ries.
 Piano-forte Solos:
 Prelude and Fugue in E major Rubinstein
 Etude on the Duet from "Der Freischütz." Stephen Heller.
 Rondo in E flat Field.
 Piano-forte Quartet in E flat Mozart.
Allegro—Larghetto—Allegretto.

The two Quartets, new and old, made good contrast. That by Brahms is a vigorous work; its themes worked out with his usual skill and fervor, and each movement has its individual charm, especially the Intermezzo and Andante. It was admirably interpreted, and so was the more spontaneous, melodious, and familiar sounding one by Mozart. Mr. Foote's group of solos was selected with fine taste, and we were surprised at the great progress shown both in the finished technique and the clear, decided, and intelligent expression of every one of his performances. In the duet by Ries, a fine selection, Mr. Dannreuther proved himself a sterling violinist, of a sound artistic quality, and with a large tone, and straightforward, unaffected style that recalled to us Joachim. The concert was keenly relished by a large and musically appreciative audience.

Mrs. L. S. FRODOCK, better known as one of the best organists of this city, but who has recently been studying the piano-forte in Germany, gave a Matinée at Wesleyan Hall on Tuesday, March 30. She has always been noted for her devotion to the best kind of music, playing a great deal of Bach upon the organ. The same earnestness enters into her piano-forte readings, only a certain nervousness before an audience seems somewhat to benumb her fingers, and render the performance sometimes lifeless and even clumsy. This was most apparent in the Beethoven Sonata at the beginning of the following programme:

Sonata in G. Op. 31. Beethoven.
Allegro vivace—Adagio grazioso—Allegretto Carnival, Op. 9 Schumann
 Preambule—Pierrot—Harlequin—Valse Noble—
 Eusebius—Florestan—Coquette—Papillons—
 Lettres Dantes—Charline—Chopin—
 Estrella—Reconnaissance—Pantalon et Colombine—
 Valse Allemande—Paganini—Promenade—Fausse—
 Marche des Davidbündler contre les Philistins.
 Andante Spianato Op. 22. Chopin.
 Etude in F. Op. 25. "
 Nocturne C minor. Op. 48. "
 Prelude in B. Op. 28. "
 Rondo. Bach.
 Ricordanza. Liszt.
 Trio in F. Op. 18. Saint-Saens.
Allegro vivace—Andante—Scherzo—Allegro.

But in the following pieces the nervousness wore off, and her rendering of the little Carnival fancies of Schumann, the Chopin selections, and the sentimental Ricordanza by Liszt, was much more satisfactory; in these she had not so much the air of a victim set up for the sacrifice. In the Trio by Saint-Saens, a characteristic work, she was ably accompanied by Messrs. B. Listemann and Wulf Fries.

It yet remains to speak of Mr. Lang's extremely interesting concert at Mechanics' Hall, April 1; but as we have not room to say all that should be said of it, and as he will give another on the 22d, we may include them both in one review.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, April 5.—The concert season has been dull during the two weeks since my last letter. The Mapleson Opera Troupe has been winning golden opinions since the opening of the spring season. It is true that the same old operas have been produced, and no attempt has been made to give the public any novelties. Still, perhaps the public wouldn't understand the novelties if it had them, and so it is probably just as well to go on having Lucia, Travatore, and all the rest of those time-worn (and mouldy) affairs.

On Tuesday evening, March 30, Messrs. Fischer ('cello) and Max Pinner (piano), gave a most interesting Solrée at Steinway Hall, assisted by Mr. Richard Arnold (violin), by a lady vocalist, and by an accompanist who was simply perfect. I have been attending concerts of all sorts for the last seventeen years, and I have never heard a pianist who accompanied with such exquisite taste, grace, and delicacy: let us thank God for him and let us trust that he may again appear in our concert halls. To return to the Solrée; the programme included the following selections:—
 Sonata (P. F. and 'cello) Op. 18. Rubinstein
 3 Etudes. Chopin
 Trio, G major. Raff

Mr. Fischer renewed the very favorable impression made by him at one of Dr. Damrosch's Symphony concerts and at a Brooklyn Philharmonic concert. His execution is perfection itself, and his delicacy of touch and purity of intonation are marvellous. Mr. Pinner's success was less marked, for his rendering of the Chopin Etudes was very weak and purposeless. He did better with an Air and variations by Tschalkowsky, although it is a hopelessly tedious and entirely uninteresting composition. The Raff Trio—a most charming work—was capably played, Mr. Arnold giving his valuable assistance and most excellent execution.

Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" was again given to a patient public on Saturday evening, April 3. The house was crowded, the orchestra performance admirable, the chorus work very efficient and creditable, and Dr. Damrosch has every reason to be satisfied with the success which has crowned his efforts. It must have been a most colossal task to drill the large chorus so that the unsingable music could be sung at all. Of the work itself one can say truly that the orchestration is superb; as for the musical ideas they are (to my mind) chaotic, turgid, utterly unpleasant.

ABOVS.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 5.—The course of music for the past season in this city, like that of true love, has not run smoothly. Firstly, Max Strakosch disappointed the public by his grandiloquent announcements, which had more froth than beer in them, put his weakest artists forward at first, disgusted the people, who consequently, but very universally, absented themselves from after performances that were well worthy of generous support. Suffice it to say the season was a most disastrous one, and Mr. Strakosch has not returned to us yet.

Next Maurice Grau came along in a vent-vidi-vici humor with his French company. The stunning beauty of Angèle, the piquant manner of the petite Marie, the grace of the handsome tenor Capoul, the dramatic talent of other members of the company, all sank into nothingness in the eyes of the public. Opera Bouffe had seen its day, and it could not be resurrected by Mr. Grau with his augmented prices of seats. This has been a stumbling-block to other managers. Strakosch succumbed to it, so did Mapleson, of whom I come to speak now. The latter gentleman's failure was, if anything, yet more ruinous than his predecessor's. The good orchestra, the large chorus, the excellent consequent ensemble, failed to arouse the public which wanted to hear great artists, and they were not present. There is a great deal to be thought and said on this subject, but it will take a big book to hold it; for it comprehends the question as to the position future opera is to maintain in the great republic. — Per contra, the local concerts, I mean those of resident musicians, have been supported with more than usual liberality, which they fully merited by their improved character.

Carl Gaertner's series of three soirées in the Foyer of the Academy of Music, were the best we have had for many long years, and it is pleasant to be able to record the public appreciation and support. The performance of Beethoven's Grand Septet was so admirable that the subscribers and the press insisted on its repetition. Charles H. Jarvis has just completed his series of six soirées, which have been better attended than in any former year. Some of the best piano-forte-music, ancient and modern, has been heard from the concert-giver in his masterly style, and quartets and quintets, notably the Mozart Clarinet Quintet, have been rendered with superior skill and taste. Messrs. Stoll and Kauffman, have also given a series, not closed yet, of vocal and instrumental classical music, much to the delight of a large number of music-friends. These concerts, as well as Mr. Jarvis's, are given in the lecture-room of the Academy of Fine Arts.

A few of the theatres have done opera—so called, in a various manner so to speak, and almost always with indifferent success. Some of these performances have been beneath criticism, and not entitled to support from the public. In oratorio, the Cecilian Society has done itself credit by the production of Handel's Samson, and Haydn's Creation, both of which were sung by the chorus of the society; but the solo vocalists were freely criticized, more among accomplished amateurs than by the press, which was amiable to a fault. The Mendelssohn Club under Mr. W. L. Gilchrist, has done some good work this season, and they have a large public at their back, for St. George's Hall is always crowded when they sing their delightful programme of choruses, motets, cantatas, etc.

BALTIMORE, APRIL 5.—The sixth Peabody Symphony Concert was given on Saturday evening with the following programme:—

a. Ocean Sympony, C Major. Anton Rubinstein.
 b. Songs, with piano:
 The dew-drop. Work 33. No. 2.
 Spring-song. Work 32. No. 1.
 When I see thee draw near. Work 27.
 Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.
 Piano Compositions: Fr. Chopin.
 Prelude, D flat major. Work 28. No. 15.
 Nocturne, D flat major. Work 27. No. 2.
 Polonaise, A flat major. No. 6. Work 53.
 Madame Teresa Carreno.
 Norwegian Rhapsody, B Minor, No. 1.
 Work 17. Johan S. Svendsen.

Mr. Theodore Toedt, who comes from Washington, and who is new here, sings with much taste and sentiment, and although the possessor of comparatively little voice, created great enthusiasm by the admirable manner in which he used it.

In response to a recall, he gave Rubinstein's "Du bist wie eine Blume," with a better understanding, and with greater effect than any other singer your correspondent has yet heard here in this much sung selection.

Teresa Carreno showed herself a Chopin performer, par excellence by her thoroughly poetic rendering of the Prelude, Nocturne and Polonaise, and exhibited her magnificent technical ability in the difficult Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, of Liszt, which she played with astonishing ease of execution, and with a spirited and powerful conception that could not but carry her listeners with her. CHICAGO, March 20.—The quiet season of Lent has had its effect upon our musical entertainments, for there have been very few concerts of late in this city. True, we have had one or two so-called "popular concerts," in which the sensational element has been the actuating influence. Among these one may class the Remenyi Concerts, which have recently taken place at Central Music Hall. Music as an art commands much more respect and support in the West, than may be supposed by the cultured people of the older Eastern cities; and yet, musical progress is not a little hindered by a sensationalism kept alive by managers, who view all there is in art from its commercial side. Thus we have, what may be termed, with much justice, the musical speculator, who endeavors to bring out for public performance whatever he thinks will attract the lovers of the sensational, and thereby bring him in that harvest of dollars, for which he plans and works. Every announcement made in the behalf of any "popular concert," or musical entertainment, is filled with bombastic statements which deal alone with the superlatives of the language. Thus every singer of any rank whatever, and all performers of even moderate talents, are classed as being the "greatest upon the earth," until our honest English is perverted beyond recognition, and does not contain even a shadow of the truth. It is in these sensational announcements, made by speculating managers, that real art is burlesqued, and receives for the time being a hindrance; for the people become dissatisfied with promises, which from their very superlative nature can have no fulfillment, and at last, they grow distrustful of even honest efforts made for music by sincere and honest workers. Our musical journals should use their influence against this growing sensationalism, and thus endeavor to keep art upon the foundation of truth, where it alone can flourish. I am led to make these remarks by seeing some of the announcements made in our city of recent concerts. Not long since, Mr. Gilmore's so-called "National Hymn" was the subject matter of a sensational circular, and in a recent programme of a Remenyi concert, the violinist was termed a "Modern Paganini," and "the universally acknowledged greatest violinist of the world." Mr. Gilmore's Hymn sank into a well-earned oblivion after its one performance, and Mr. Remenyi will have his title as "greatest in all the world," until the next violinist of any note is engaged to play in a "popular concert" in our city. That Mr. Remenyi is a good violinist, and a gentleman of talent, I well know, and that he is able to delight an audience his last appearance in this city made plainly manifest. But he should also be so much of an artist as to make modesty one of the elements of his very talent, and suppress the enthusiastic manager who wishes to advertise him in terms that offend both the truth and good taste. I append a programme of one of the concerts:—

- Solo: a. The Enquirer, Schubert.
 b. If, Marti.
 Mr. Decelle.
 Quintet, Schumann.
 The Liesegang String Quartet, and Mme. Teresa Carreno.
 Song, Loreley: Liszt.
 Mrs. Thurston.
 Concerto for Violin, Mendelssohn.
 Adagio. Rondo.
 Liesegang String Quartet and E. Remenyi.
 Piano Solo Polonaise in E minor, Liszt.
 Mme. Teresa Carreno.
 Violin Solos.
 a. Nocturne G minor, Chopin.
 b. Barcarole, Schubert.
 c. Valse Noble, Remenyi.
 Edouard Remenyi.
 Andante and Canzonetta, Mendelssohn.
 Liesegang String Quartet,
 Song "Devotion," Schumann.
 Mrs. Thurston.
 Violin Solo: The celebrated Hungarian March
 Rakoczy, Composer unknown.
 With martial introduction for violin, by Remenyi.
 Edouard Remenyi.
 Duet: Una Notte in Venezia, Lucanloni.
 Mrs. Thurston and Mr. Decelle.

There has been an "Amateur Musical Club," started in our city. It consists of a number of talented amateur lady pianists and singers. They have a reunion every two weeks, and give very enjoyable programmes. At the last meeting a very interesting translation from Jean Paul, upon the "Muse of Song," was read before the society. The translation was made by Mr. Edward Freilperger of the Chicago Inter-Ocean. I append the last programme given by this little society, for it is from knowing what our amateurs are doing for music that we realize the condition of art in our city.

- Three Preludes, Nos. 1, 2, 18, Bach.
 Miss Jessie Root.
 L'Addio. Duet, Cirillo,
 Mrs. Knickerbocker and Mr. Gill.
 a. Novelette, Schumann.
 b. Minuet. (Boccherini), Joseffy.
 Miss Allport.
 To Earth May Winds are Bringing, Schumann.
 Violin Obligato by Mr. Lewis.
 Mrs. Clarke, Miss Ward, Miss Harmon.
 Aria from "Carmen," Bizet.
 Mrs. Robert Clarke.
 Rondo, Op. 16, Chopin.
 Miss Van de Venter.
 a. Flower Greeting, Curackman.
 b. "Thou Heaven Blue and Bright," Abt.
 Mrs. Clarke, Miss Ward, Miss Harmon.
 Fantaisie, Op. 27. Two Pianos, Raff.
 Mrs. Barbour, Mrs. Haines.

APRIL 3.—We have had one or two more musical entertainments of importance. The first was the Beethoven Society's concert, which took place March 23. The programme consisted of "Paradise Lost," by Rubinstein; Redemption Hymn, J. C. D. Parker; Aria, "Ah Perfido," Beethoven, Festival Chorus, from "Queen of Sheba," Goldmark. The society had the assistance of Mrs. Stacy, Mrs. Hall, Mr. Knorr, and Mr. Gill, as soloists, and a full orchestra, under the direction of Carl Wolfsohn. A very large and fashionable audience greeted the Society, and in one point of view the concert was a success, for the financial gain was enough to enable them to more than meet their large expenses. As a composition, Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost" did not interest me as much as I expected. Many of the choruses are rich in effects, and colored by a descriptive orchestration. One number was particularly striking. It was descriptive of the awakening of creative life, the lines running thus:

"All around
 Rose the sound
 Of the strife
 Of life;
 How it rushed
 And roared,
 How it gushed
 And poured,
 All creation with life overflowing."

There are a large number of recitatives for tenor, which at times become a little trying for the listener, as well as exacting upon the singer. They require a tenor with a powerful voice, and good dramatic powers. Mr. Knorr is a gentleman with a sweet but light voice, and although he sang the part with much taste, and expression, there was at times a lack of power, which indicated, not that the singer was at fault, but that his voice was not suited to the music. A dramatic tenor is rather hard to obtain at the present time. Parker's Redemption Hymn was well received by the audience, and the alto solo, which the work contains, was finely sung by Mrs. Hall. The grand scena and aria of Beethoven suffered somewhat. Mrs. Stacy has not the voice for such dramatic music. It requires the method and voice of a Faenza to do it justice. To attempt the great things in song is to awaken contrasts; to do them requires powers of a high order. For a voice of a dramatic mould, they are fitting, but when a vocalist allows ambition to carry her beyond her powers, the result must be any thing but satisfying. Yet I must do this lady the justice to say, that she was honored by a recall, and that the critics of our daily press extended to her the compliment of highest praises.

Last Monday evening our old friends, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of Boston, gave a concert in this city. The following was the programme:—

- Introduction and Allegro, from the Septet, — op. 20, arranged by the author for Quintet Beethoven.
 Solo for Flute "On a melody by Abt." Popp.
 William Schade.
 Quartet in A, op. 41 R. Schumann.
 Grand Scene and Aria, "Ah fors è lui," from La Traviata Verdi.
 Abbie Carrington.
 a. Canzonetta Heilmendahl.
 b. Bagatelle Mozart.
 Larghetto, from the Clarinet Quintet Mozart.
 Fantasie for Violoncello on "Le Desir" Servais.
 Frederick Glese.
 English Ballad, "The Flower Girl" Beignani.
 Abbie Carrington.
 Finale from the Septet, op. 20 Beethoven.
 Adagio and Allegro.

The club has changed its membership since its last visit to Chicago, but the familiar faces of Mr. Ryan and Mr. Meisel recalled the old days when this organization was introducing chamber music to Western audiences. Miss Carrington was well received by our concert-goers, and although she did not give us any very trying, or classical selections, proved herself to be a very pleasing singer. The club will return next week, and favor us with two more concerts.

Friday evening the Apollo Club, assisted by the Arion Society of Milwaukee, gave a performance of Max Bruch's "Frithjof." They were assisted by Mr. Remmertz, of New York, and Mrs. Elliot. The performance was a fine one. As I gave a full description of the work last year in my letter to the JOURNAL, I will not do more than make a record of the concert at this time.

FLORENCE, ITALY, March 17.—The munificent humanity of the late Prince Demidoff won for his memory a noble monument on the banks of the Arno, wherein expressive statues in white marble commemorate his worth.

This quality of mercy is strained through a sieve of fantastic art into the heart of his kinsman, the actual Prince, who offers for sale at public auction the Palazzo San Donato, with all its contained treasures, one-half the proceeds to go to the relief of the poor of Florence.

The palace is within a short drive from the Cascine; is planted in the midst of a vast pleasure-garden with pine and other evergreens, and is filled with costly china, carved furniture, tapestries, vases, and supplemented by extensive galleries of painting and sculpture. I found it rather an exponent of wealth than a palace of art. It was a collection of bric-a-brac,—a magnificent caprice, bizarre, indiscreet, heterogeneous, expensive,—showing neither the outgrowth of a refined personal taste, as a human dwelling should do, nor any touch of that winnowed preciousness which marks the great public galleries of Europe. It is a sop or sponge of a part of the enormous income the Prince receives from his mineral resources in the Ural Mountains.

The story goes that Peter the Great, on his return from Holland, and, filled with a wholesome respect for the mechanic arts, found himself, one day, remote from his capital, and the pistol that he carried not in working order. The Demidoff of that epoch took the weapon, repaired it on the spot, and returned it to the Tsar, who subsequently recognized the service by the grant of a barren tract in the Ural. The ingenious Prince, finding the land unproductive, sought below the surface, and the result was the development of quarries of malachite, and mines of coal and iron that were practically inexhaustible. Let the yield of these mines, on its transit from the Asian frontier to Paris (the residence of the Prince), suffer what it may from pickings and stealings, still the residuary income is sufficient to answer the call of the costliest and most unexpected whim.

Good God! How it stirs the imagination of one tried by experience of poverty to think what a power for benefit lies sleeping in those Russian mines, if only the owner had faculty and soul enough (benefactor to some extent as he confessedly is), to organize relief, say, for the poor of one European city in the construction, ventilation and warming of houses, the discontinuance of beggary, and stimulus to the lagging industries of the people.

Let us go back to the palace. Among all the art objects I saw but one that I should care to own,—a painting by Terburg, representing a Dutch burgher in a suit of black, with pointed hat. The father of the present Prince married a grand-niece of Napoleon; and perhaps the most interesting group of objects was a series of portrait busts in marble of the Bonaparte family. There was the old lioness, Letitia, and all her whelps, male and female, with their handsome, unscrupulous faces,—Lucien, Joseph, Jerome, Pauline, Caroline, Napoleon, Louis. The best as well as the plainest, was that of Louis, King of Holland. I lingered about this head and found it a study of peculiar interest; there were the small protrusive eyes, the large, loosely-modelled nose, and other features of Louis Napoleon, but blended into a kindlier look than sat upon the stolid face of the last usurper of the throne of France. So striking was the resemblance as to afford a physiological and artistic proof of the legitimacy of the "nephew of his uncle," cleansing from stain the name of his mother, and blowing a certain Dutch admiral of ill-repute clean out of water. Let "Napoleon the Little," then, be accorded the small praise of consanguinity with Napoleon the Great, or, in the scornful phrase of Victor Hugo, "Toi, son singe, marche derrière, Petit, petit." There is Josephine with her quaint creole features, small arched lips at the shoulder, and voluptuous bust. And there the bourgeoise head of Maria Louise beside the bust of her son, with his thin face, abundant hair, and speculative, ineffectual forehead.

But if the architecture of this extensive pile is incongruous, and the art within as a whole at once costly and meretricious, the conservatory of plants wins unqualified admiration,—enormous palms, cacti in magnificent flower, and every variety of native and exotic growth flourished within the glazed domes,—the long labyrinths and fountain-freshened recesses of the vast pavilion, a zone of perpetual summer filled with wafts of fragrance, and penetrated with fiery balm, while the keen winds of March were blowing outside.

Everything is offered for sale, while a report is also current that the palace itself may be reserved as an asylum for the Tsar, should he escape explosion and be forced to flee from the scenes of his familiar despotism.

The musical event of the season is the production, for the first time in Florence, of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the grand choral hymn. The credit of this achievement is entirely due to Sig. Jette Sbolci, director of the Florentine Orchestral Society, a gentleman who unites an Italian virtuosity with a quiet, masterful personal magnetism that is more frequently found in the people of the North. He has endeavored in former years to introduce Beethoven to an Italian audience, but with only partial success. At one concert, last year, I saw with mingled delight and disgust, that the Andante movement of the Fifth was included in the list of pieces. There it stood in the programme torn from its relation to the remainder of the Symphony, preceded by something from Spontini, and followed by an aria by some thin soprano.

Was it owing to a maturer and more intimate feeling of the grandeur of the work that I enjoyed the hymn even more than in the old Odeon days in Boston, of sacred and rapturous memory. The suspended intervals of the hymn were filled with "ravishing division" by the orchestra, until the chorus, strengthened by repression, resumed the theme, and rolled upwards a thrilling and victorious tide of song.

The orchestration of the Symphony began and proceeded with commendable precision, under the sentient and commanding baton of the director, "The music yearning like a god in pain" until it burst into that triumphant Hymn to Joy, which is yet so deep as to search out and draw from the very source of tears.

I should judge one half of the audience to be Italians. It was curious to watch the effect of this music on their susceptible organization. They seemed to be listening to moving eloquence in a foreign tongue only half understood, but growing clearer to their apprehension every moment. There sat near me a lady with light-olive skin, lustrous eyes, and aquiline nose, an Italian of the Italians. She wore huge claw-hammer earrings that swung in cyclopean curves as her head bent and swayed to the music. The charm of this grand music was cumulative, and included all the house. At the close the audience rose en masse and greeted the performers with wild plaudits. Sbolci bowed his acknowledgments gravely. The columns of the newspapers on the following day kindled and corroborated with superlative appreciation, and Beethoven was domesticated in Florence. Omo.

SPOHR'S "THE LAST JUDGMENT."

From the Programme of the Handel and Haydn Society's Triennial Festival, May 4th to 9th, (1880).

Let not the title appall; it is a very mild Last Judgment, compared with Verdi's realistic and terrific picture of the awful scene in his Manzoni Requiem. Spohr, in this his second oratorio upon this subject, dwells more on the goodness and mercy of God, and on the reward of the righteous, than on any attempt to harrow up the imagination with literal and musically intensified description of the everlasting torture of the wicked. Most of the music is distinguished by that gentle, flowing melody, that daintily refined, sometimes cloying sweetness of harmony, that restless, creeping, chromatic modulation and frequency of enharmonic changes, which is characteristic of all his compositions. He preferred to treat the gentler texts, from which he could create tone-poems steeped in sentiment and beauty. His aim was to charm, rather than to astonish and to strike with awe. His weakness is sentimentalism rather than sensationalism.

But Spohr, too, had written an earlier oratorio on the same theme, which seems to have been sufficiently sensational, and more in the vein of his opera of Faust. Thirteen years before the present work, he brought out Das Jüngste Gericht (of which the present English title is the literal translation), once in Erfurt and once in Vienna (1813), since which time it was never heard again. Probably few now living ever heard of it. A Viennese criticism of that day speaks of a chorus of devils at the end of the first part as being better fitted for a ballet; and another writer thinks him successful in the choruses, and particularly in the part of Satan, while the rest is not of much account. The German title of the work now to be performed is Die Letzten Dinge, another term for the Last Judgment. For this a noble text was prepared, mainly from the Book of Revelations, by the distinguished musical scholar and critic, Rochlitz, and here Spohr's genius found worthier material to work upon. Hauptmann, in his letters to Hauser, alludes to a "ludicrously superficial" biography of Spohr by Malibran, who, in his unbounded enthusiasm for his hero, calls his Letzten Dinge a musical copy of Michel Angelo's Last Judgment (!), evidently confounding the latter with the earlier oratorio.

The Last Judgment, as we now have it, is one of the chief masterworks of Spohr, and ranks, after those of Handel and of Haydn, as perhaps the noblest specimen of oratorio, until it was eclipsed by Mendelssohn. Its general characteristics, as a musical production, we have already briefly mentioned. The texts of the first part are all of praise and glory, comfort and immortal hope; the terrors of the awful day are briefly but powerfully suggested, not portrayed, in the first half of the second part, and the oratorio concludes with visions of a new heaven, praise, and hallelujahs.

1. The overture is very long, opening with a grave and dignified Andante in D minor, from which soon springs the Allegro in D major, in which a theme in whole notes, constantly accompanied by one in quarters, is developed in a most interesting and exhaustive manner.

2. The first chorus, "Praise his awful name," in F, is one of the best in the work, — wholesome, strong, and noble music, full of striking points; and the solos for treble and bass, which occur in it, with their exquisite accompaniment, are full of beauty.

3, 4. Fine bits of melodic recitative for bass and tenor lead up to the short "Holy, holy" of the chorus, unaccompanied except by horns.

5-8. Three short recitatives, "Behold the Lamb," etc., treated with great seriousness and with all Spohr's fine-felt modulation in the accompaniment, lead to the somewhat familiar solo and chorus, "All glory to the Lamb," in 6-8 measure; one of the loveliest numbers.

9, 10. A more important, broadly laid-out solo and chorus is that on "Blessing, honor," etc. The tenor solo is very short; and here we may remark that Spohr seems to have avoided putting the personal singer persistently forward, making his short bits of solo mostly subordinate to the general plan and treatment of the whole. The chorus opens with a very tranquil, subdued, flowing piece of harmony, not without canon and imitation, and then sets in a strong and concise fugue. Tenor solo and chorus conclude in a sort of lengthened Coda, in the same tranquil vein with the beginning.

11. Tenor, followed by treble, recitative, "And lo! a mighty host." This is melodramatically treated, being mainly instrumental, the voice but supplying brief interpretation to the agitated and graphic movement of the orchestra, which begins pianissimo and waxes to a climax, subsiding to a gentler accompaniment as the treble voice comes in. All this, being in F, very gradually modulates towards the key of G flat major, in which the first part ends with

12. Chorus and quartet, "Lord God of Heaven," full of rich, warm, sunset color, and gentle as the benediction at the end of a religious service.

13. Part II. opens with another long orchestral symphony, the prelude to the Day of Doom. We shall not attempt to describe it, nor the long bass recitative (No 14), announcing that "The end is near," most of which is delivered in detached fragments during the graphic melodramatic accompaniment.

15-18. This is followed by the pleading and pathetic duet: "Forsake me not," to which gravely responds the chorus, "If with your whole heart ye humbly seek me," all in unison, except at the words, "Thus saith the Lord." And then a short tenor recitative heralds in the most exciting and appalling number of the work, the chorus, "Destroyed is Babylon," which summons all the powers of the orchestra to its aid. The instruments continue at some length after the voices have ceased, only pausing once for the tenor to announce, "It is ended."

19-21. Soothing, beatific strains succeed: a sweet and gentle quartet and chorus, "Blest are the departed;" a soprano recitative, "I saw a new heaven," with a few bars of lovely instrumental prelude; a short tenor recitative, "Behold, he soon shall come," with quartet response, "Then come Lord Jesus." This leads to the finale:

22. The chorus, "Great and wonderful," which is lengthy and elaborate, including several distinct movements, beginning with a vigorous fugue in C, followed by a middle portion not so clear and simple as one commonly expects at the end of an oratorio; then soft hallelujahs echo one another as from a distance, and a new fugue, "Thine is the kingdom," sets in, losing rather than gaining force as it goes on, through Spohr's besetting mannerism of chromatic modulation, but ending grandly with loud Hallelujahs and Amen.

MENDELSSOHN'S MANY PURSUITS.

BY GEORGE GROVE.

He very rarely played from book, and his prodigious memory was often shown in his sudden recollection of out of the way pieces. Hiller has given two instances (pp. 28, 29). His power of retaining things casually heard was also shown in his extempore playing, where he would recollect the themes of compositions which he heard then and there for the first time, and would combine them in his happiest manner. An instance of this is mentioned by his father, in which, after Malibran had sung five songs of different nations, he was dragged to the piano, and improvised upon them all. He himself describes another occasion, a "field day" at Baillot's, when he took three themes from the Bach sonatas and worked them up to the delight and astonishment of an audience worth delighting. At the matinée of the Society of British Musicians in 1844, he took his themes from two compositions by C. E. Horsley and Macfarren, which he had just heard, probably for the first time — and other instances could be given.

His extemporizing was, however, marked by other traits than that of memory. "It was," says Professor Macfarren, "as fluent and as well planned as a written work," and the themes, whether borrowed or invented, were not merely brought together but contrapuntally worked. Instances of this have been mentioned at Birmingham and elsewhere. His tact in these things was prodigious. At the concert given by Jenny Lind and himself on Dec. 5, 1845, he played two songs without words — Bk. vi, No. 1, in E♭, and Bk. v, No. 5, in A major, and he modulated from the one key to the other by means of a regularly constructed intermezzo, in which the semiquavers of the first song merged into the arpeggios of the second with the most consummate art, and with magical effect. But great as were his public displays, it would seem that, like Mozart, it was in the small circle of intimate friends that his improvisation was most splendid and happy. Those only who had the good fortune to find themselves (as rarely happened) alone with him at one of his Sunday afternoons are perhaps aware of what he could really do in this direction, and he "never improvised better" or pleased himself more than when tête-à-tête with the Queen and Prince Albert. A singular fact is mentioned by Hiller, which is confirmed by another friend of his:—that in playing his own music he did it with a certain reticence, as if not desiring that the work would derive any advantage from his execution. The explanation is very much in consonance with his modesty, but whether correct or not there is no reason to doubt the fact.

His immense early practice in counterpoint under Zelter—like Mozart's under his father—had given him so complete a command over all the resources of counterpoint, and such a habit of looking at themes contrapuntally, that the combinations just spoken of came more or less naturally to him. In some of his youthful compositions he brings his science into prominence, as in the Fugue in A (op. 7, No. 5); the Finale of the Eb stringed Quartet (1823); the original Minuet and Trio of the stringed Quintet in A (op. 18), a double canon of great ingenuity; the Chorus in St. Paul, "But our God," constructed on the chorale "Wir glauben all"; but with his maturity he mostly drops such displays, and Elijah, as is well known, "contain no fugues." In extemporizing, however, it was at his fingers' ends to the last. He was also fond of throwing off ingenious canons.

Of his organ-playing we have already spoken. It should be added that he settled his combinations of stops before starting, and did not change them in the course of the piece. He likewise steadily adhered to the plan on which he set out; if he started in three parts he continued in three, and the same with four or five. He took extraordinary delight in the organ; some describe him as even more at home there than on the P. F., though this must be taken with caution. But it is certain that he loved it, and was always greatly excited when playing it.

He was fond of playing the Viola, and on more than one occasion took the first Viola part of his own Octet in public. The Violin he learned when young, but neglected it in later life. He however played occasionally, and it was amusing to see him bending over the desk, and struggling with his part just as if he were a boy. His practical knowledge of the instrument is evident from his violin music, in which there are few difficulties which an ordinary good player cannot surmount. But this is characteristic of the care and thoughtfulness of the man. As a rule, in his scores he gives each instrument the passages which suit it. A few instances of the reverse are quoted under CLARINET (vol. i. p. 363b), but they are quite the exception. He appears to have felt somewhat of the same natural dislike to brass instruments that Mozart did. At any rate in his early scores he uses them with great moderation, and somewhere makes the just remark that the trombone is "too sacred an instrument" to be used freely.

MUSICAL NOTATION.

IN a recent number of the Journal, we became interested in an article on Lowell Mason, from the pen of the noted biographer of Beethoven, Mr. Thayer, in which we find the following paragraph: "The first step was so to explain the elementary rules of writing and reading music, that every one might be made easily to understand them. His success in this was such that no quack method of 'making music easy' has ever been able to obtain any lasting footing in New England; nor does any pupil of a New England public school desire any other notation than such as was good enough for Handel and Beethoven."

The italicized sentence is what has prompted the few remarks we wish to make.

As the sentence reads, it may be true enough for many reasons, but we have our doubts about even that; but when we read that which lies between the lines, that no one ought to desire any other notation; that the notation good enough for Handel and Beethoven is good enough for everybody, it becomes quite another matter. To us it seems as absurd, as it would be to say that a notation good enough for the preservation of the works of a David or Homer, is good enough for everybody now. A notation good enough for a Beethoven and a Handel, may be, and as we think we can show, is in this case altogether too good for people in general. It goes far beyond their powers of readily understanding it, hence they cannot easily translate it into sound.

Besides, if that logic is to rule, why not go back to the Handelian notation, when every voice had its own peculiar clef? That was good enough for Handel and Bach also, but it has been relegated in the main to the category of studies for the professional student, who must understand it, just as a professional linguist must go back and dig up the dead bones of a forgotten form of the language he wishes to master. But we doubt whether any one would advocate the resuscitation of those old clefs for the purposes of popular musical culture. The discarding of so many clefs simply shows that there has been a change in the notation since Handel's time, which has had for its purpose the simplifying of the means of representation.

Undoubtedly a Bach or Handel would have used the current notation, had it been ten times as difficult, for it was not their mission to improve notations. Men of their creative power would have been in small business had they given themselves up to that work. On the other hand, had there not existed a notation sufficiently perfect for their purposes, and which, for the representation of instrumental music to musicians, is undoubtedly the best that can be devised, so far as we now see, these men would not have been ushered into the world when they were. The grand mission they were to fulfill, demanded that the proper material with which to represent their works to the world and preserve them for posterity should be ready to their hands. While the means for interpreting their works, the orchestral instruments, piano and organ, were sufficiently developed for their purposes at the time, it is no less true that the hidden depth and power of their works demanded and resulted in a development of these means to a degree of perfection equal to all demands; and because Bach preferred his clavichord to the pianoforte is it logical to say that what was good enough for Bach is good enough for to-day; or in the case of Beethoven's Sonatas, for example, to say that the Hammerclavier of his time is good enough for the interpretation of his Sonatas today? I must say, if I may be allowed a side remark, that I am frank to admit that a tendency in that direction would be quite beneficial. The question therefore here involved is not what is good enough for a Handel or a Beethoven.

It is not a question as to what is the best method of representation for the few who spend a lifetime in the special study of the art, nor which would appeal perhaps more quickly to those who, in the reproduction upon instruments of fixed tones, can gain to a certain degree more dexterity in execution (we will not say interpretation) through the eye. Further, it is not a question of making music easy, but rather of making music more difficult in one sense, because it is a question of how we can best help the masses of the people to think musically; and that is a thing which cannot be made easy; but the medium for representing the thing to be thought may be open to improvements, which would make it much easier of mastery. Music is not for the cultured few, else it fails of its mission, and our Heavenly Father made a great mistake in providing so many of the sons of men with the most perfect tone-receiving and producing apparatus. So that the point made above is of vital importance to the dissemination of musical thought.

Now improvement in the means for assisting in the development of musical thought among the masses, is exactly the glorious work that Lowell Mason did; and all honor be to him for what he did, but it does not necessarily follow that he made all the improvements necessary, that he was the ne plus ultra. We must remember that the most of his work was done when the helps to the analysis of musical thought, which science and philosophy have given us, were in the bud, but just being developed. And secondly, we want to remember in what that improvement consisted. Setting aside the beneficent effects of his introduction of the Pestalozzian method of teaching, this improvement is seen when we contrast the old Italian method of syllabic teaching, which is held on to, to this day, with a tenacity inexplicable, by many of our best educated musicians, and the movable Do system. The former system consisted in representing an absolute or arbitrarily named tone, C, by the same syllable, no matter what its position. The latter was based upon the idea that relationship is the thing to be learned; that C, in one position or surrounded by certain tones, has an effect which was termed Do, but when it is surrounded by another set of tones, it presents a totally different effect, and to call it by the same mnemonic would result in confusion, especially as in its new surroundings another tone has usurped its throne, and conveys the same relative meaning which the former occupant C did. Mason was clear-sighted enough to see the immense advantage of the latter method, because it was in accordance with the nature of most people. Now it is not strange, nor does it show the want of intelligence or a desire to promote quackery, or make music easier, that when the proper time came, people felt the necessity of departing from the beaten paths, made by the fathers; felt the necessity for improvement. We say that it is not strange that this change was needed, because the methods of thought had changed. These two systems are based upon two totally different methods of tone thought. The immovable Do system sprang out of the necessities of the case; for with the old system of Ecclesiastical keys, tones were essentially absolute, and relationship arbitrary and artificial. C was the same tone essentially, because its effect was essentially the same, whether found in the Dorian, Phrygian or any other — ian mode, and hence, in accordance with that fact, they gave it always the same mnemonic, for the syllables were only used for mnemonic purposes. But with the growth of harmony and the establishment of our modern tonalities, the method of thought has been revolutionized, and tones are no more absolute, nor artificially related, but are found to have each its special mental effect, according to its key relationship, and hence the mnemonic methods for helping the thought of the people needed to be revolutionized. The change was simply a better adaptation of means to ends. Now this undoubtedly produced favorable results, but these results have been solely in assisting the mind to grasp the relationship, when that relationship has been pointed out, that is, when the student has found out, for example, that two tones represented stand in the relation of tonic and dominant, the mnemonics assist the mind to a conception of the relationship itself; but it has not been of any assistance to the determination of what relationship is expressed in the representation. On the contrary in some cases, it has the effect of muddling matters considerably, and we think it is a question open to serious debate: If the change from a mnemonic means for assisting the mind in right tone thought, based upon the old system of tonalities, to one based upon the new, has wrought such good results, is it not reasonable to expect like good results, if a system of representation like our staff notation, which grew out of the same old root, the old system of tonalities, should be replaced by a notation based upon the principles of the modern system and methods of thought, especially if this system of notation contained within itself the mnemonic power which has proved so effective. In discussing this question we must consider what the staff notation does and does not represent, and what it ought to represent. Historically the staff grew out of the attempt to represent the rise and fall of tones the numæ indicating the pitch name at first, but eventually transferring their original function to the lines themselves, and changing their forms, assumed the power of rhythmic representation. The idea of relationship as we understand it, was far from being a factor, since the idea of scale key-note was a very vague one, and at one time was virtually lost, because purely artificial means like the tropes were invented to indicate the beginning and ending tone. And the idea of a tonic was not once thought of. The signatures are the result of a growth of modern tonalities, and the only thing about the notation which at all assists the mind to a ready comprehension of the true relationship of tones. Now if we examine into what the staff notation does not represent, we find a marked deficiency, considering how remarkably it has lent itself to the needs of harmony, when once its inferential mysteries have been mastered.

The staff notation does not represent key or mode relationship except indirectly. This is evidenced by the fact that it oftentimes causes the skilled harmony analyst considerable thought to determine the true relationship hidden in the notes; and it is but comparatively lately that prominent musicians were in the habit of putting a sharp for a flat, and vice versa, in the most indiscriminate way; and it is not an uncommon thing now even to see diminished chords, or the augmented chords, put together in a way as misleading as ludicrous.

For example, we lately came across the following representation of the augmented six-five chord in D minor.

Another notable instance of misrepresentation may be found in Novello's edition of the Messiah, in the chorus, "And with his stripes," which is represented as belonging in C minor, whereas it is a fugue in F minor, with answers in the minor dominant. Now this could not be done with a notation which represented true tonic relationship. But let us go a little further, and take, for example, the following from Beethoven's Mass in C.

Now what assistance does the staff give in determining the relationship of the tones to the key tone? What assistance does even the signature render?

What is there to indicate that there is a modulation from C to Eb, Db and back to C?

The only representation here is that of a purely interval relationship, that is, that from C to D is a major second, and D to Eb a minor second and so on. But even that is not truly represented, because the true character of the interval is determined by the key, or mode. That is, since we have two kinds of major seconds, which are determined by their key position, the true character of any major second, represented on the staff, will therefore depend upon a knowledge of its key relationship. The first D in the above example, in its purely interval relation to C, will be larger or smaller according to whether it belongs to the dominant of C or the dominant of Eb. Hence it is obvious that the only possible way for a singer to understand this passage is by determining the key; and that he can only do by analyzing the harmonic progression, which is determined by an examination of the whole score. Now how many can gain a sufficient knowledge of harmonic analysis to enable them to determine the key relation of any tone by a glance at the score, and how many can gain such a knowledge of absolute pitch (if there be such a thing in reality) as to determine it in any other way?

We leave the thousands of stumbling guess-work readers throughout the country to answer that question. According to present methods the majority have all they can do to determine even the absolute names of the tones of a single part, translating the character into sound, mainly by a guess-work method.

But we gain another and perhaps clearer view of the real difficulty, if we examine into the mental processes every individual has to go through with, consciously or unconsciously, slowly, tediously or quickly, almost intuitively according to the amount of time one has had for study, together with a genius for the thing.

These mental processes are first, determining what the tone is, namely, c, d, or e, etc.; second, what the key is; third what relation the tone represented sustains to the key. We can cut out the second, and attempt to determine the new tone's character by the tone just preceding. But that is a precarious method. If anything like certainty is desired, or true intonation, these three steps must be taken whenever the staff notation is used; and, given but one part, the singer is absolutely at sea, or given the score, even, he is in a similar condition, unless he has had special training in harmonic and melodic analysis.

The question resolves itself, therefore, into the simple one, whether a notation is possible which would eliminate any of these steps; certainly, a notation which eliminated the second only, would be an advantage, as it would remove the most difficult. If, for example, in connection with our staff notation, any simple method could be devised of indicating the key tone, in every modulation, it would be a great help. But a notation that would eliminate the first and second, and directly express the third, which really contains the others, would be, other things being equal, of the greatest benefit to singers in general. By other things being equal, we mean, as simple in its method of representing all the rhythms used by singers, and as cheaply printed.

Now such a notation is not only possible, but is already at hand, — a notation which does just exactly what was needed, represents the tonic relationship directly, and also in a simple manner all the rhythms used by singers, and can be printed much more cheaply than the staff notation. A notation which is backed up by the best results during more than a quarter of a century's trial; that has the sanction of such men as a Sedley Taylor, Sir Alexander Ellis, and Helmholtz, and the enthusiastic support of a constituency numbering its hundreds of thousands. A notation which sprang up, not out of theories, but practical experience, and around which has grown up a method of choral development that, while it adapts itself to the masses, goes to the tap roots of all musical thought, and produces in its students genuine musical thinkers.

This notation and system of musical development is known as the Tonic-Sol-Fa system, which has done, and is doing more for the production of singers in England than all others combined; and to any one who thinks that a notation which was good enough for a Handel or a Beethoven is good enough for everybody, we would recommend the careful study of the Tonic Sol-Fa notation and method.

DETROIT, Feb. 17, 1880.

LISZT'S FAUST SYMPHONY.

From the London Times, March 12.

The 16th of Mr. Walter Bache's annual concerts was given on Thursday night at St. James's Hall, before a numerous audience. Mr. Bache, our readers are aware, is a faithful disciple of Liszt, and to the propagation of that master's fame, much more than to the display of his own skill as a pianist, his concerts are usually devoted. It is, indeed, very doubtful whether, without Mr. Bache's unselfish and energetic endeavors, much of Liszt's music would have been heard in this country, and to him London amateurs mainly owe their acquaintance with one of the most extraordinary artistic individualities of modern times. The chief piece of Thursday night's concert was Liszt's Faust Symphony, the other components of the programme being Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Chopin's pianoforte concerto in F minor, the orchestral accompaniments of which have been ably re-written by Herr Klindworth. The solo part was played in his best style by Mr. Bache, who earned the unanimous applause of the audience. To speak adequately of so complicated and original a work as Liszt's Faust Symphony, is for the present impossible. Liszt, according to the verdict of enemies as well as friends, has here reached the climax of his power, and the subject, indeed, is well adapted to draw forth all the mental resources of an artist. It is curious to note how the irresistible fascination of Goethe's Faust has stimulated the most differently gifted composers to efforts commensurately various. No greater contrast can be imagined than that existing between the unsophisticated incidental music supplied by Prince Radziwill and the mystic strains with which Schumann has accompanied Goethe's words, or between the thoroughly human and thoroughly dramatic treatment to be found in Gounod's opera and the curious mixture of romantic and classic elements which Arrigo Boito has drawn from the two parts of Goethe's tragedy. Wagner's Faust Overture is avowedly but a fragment, and Beethoven's long cherished wish to wed Goethe's words to music has, alas! remained a wish.

Liszt's Faust Symphony differs in toto from all previous and subsequent treatments of the same subject. It has, indeed, little in common with his own musical illustrations of other poetic subjects, technically known as "symphonic poems." Take, for instance, "Mazeppa," the symphonic poem most familiar to English audiences. Here an external incident—the mad career of the horse—has given the chief suggestion to the musician, who throughout attempts to illustrate the course of the story in a more or less symbolic manner. All this is different in the present work. Here Liszt has almost entirely avoided any allusion to the dramatic situations of the tragedy. All he gives us is a delineation of the three principal characters—Faust, Marguerite, Mephistopheles—in their various psychological developments, a kind of dénoûment being suggested only at the end by the introduction of Goethe's chorus mysticus, which indicates Faust's final salvation and reunion with the sublimated form of his earthly love. The intention of Liszt, such as we have ventured to interpret it, is sufficiently indicated by the names of the dramatis personæ already mentioned attached to the three movements of which the symphony consists.

A further explanation or programme the composer himself has not vouchsafed. But something of that nature is supplied in a recent able article in one of the German musical papers, the anonymous author of which is evidently one of Liszt's most intimate friends, and therefore may at least claim what politicians call "semi-official" authority. According to this source the Faust Symphony, and more especially the first movement, is designed to depict man himself in all his longings, aspirations, and sufferings. With that explanation the structure of the opening movement is in perfect accord. If Liszt had wished to render the individual Faust of the tragedy, the words of Goethe, "Zwei Seelen wohnen, ach! in meiner Brust," would have supplied him almost naturally with a first and second theme, the melodic materials at the same time of an orthodox symphonic movement. But orthodoxy in musical matters is not the mental attitude of Liszt. The changes of key and of tempo follow each other with bewildering frequency. We have in rapid succession, lento assai, allegro agitato, and so forth; the only distinct impression which after the first movement remains being the grand and impressive themes identified throughout the work with Faust. The second movement, surnamed "Marguerite," is of a tender, melodious character; and the chief theme first given to the oboe is more especially of great loveliness. In the further course of movement a rhythmical phrase is evidently designed to indicate Marguerite's tender question, "Er liebt mich—liebt mich nicht?" thus in a manner suggesting the garden scene in the play, a suggestion further emphasized by the appearance of the Faust motive, which in combination with the materials already referred to leads to developments of passionate beauty. But a very ideal tone is throughout sustained, and the allusion to an individual pair of lovers is very slight.

The third movement supplies the place of the orthodox scherzo, and the ironical laughter of Mephistopheles, who has given it his name, is heard from the beginning. The nature of the fiend is indicated by Liszt in a very ingenious manner. He is the "Spirit who denies," the sarcastic critic of the universe. He accordingly has no melodic embodiment of his own; all he can do is to laugh at and pervert the motives of his intended victim, Faust. The themes characteristic of the latter in the opening movement here accordingly re-appear in the most curious distortions, showing the ascendancy gained over Faust's higher aspirations by the evil principle. The pure womanhood of Marguerite alone is proof against the fiend's power, and her melody is heard again in its pristine sweetness.

By a sudden transition we are at last transferred from the weird atmosphere of the Mephistophelian movement to the purer heights, where the mystic chorus intones Goethe's "All that passes away is but a semblance" to a grave melody suggestive of the canto fermo of the Catholic service. To the words, "The eternal-womanly draws us onwards," the tenor solo enters with the Marguerite motive, and soon the movement, and with it the symphony, comes to a triumphant close. The impression of the work on the audience was evidently of a most powerful kind, the beautiful melodies of the second movement especially being received with marked favor. Even the most hostile critic must admit that here more than ordinary genius has been brought to bear on a theme of more than ordinary sublimity.

(From the Athenæum.)

The title "Symphony" in the ordinary acceptation of the term, is a misnomer here; the name given by Liszt to other compositions similar in form though smaller in scale—that of "symphonic poem"—would be more appropriate. Some critics have found fault with the work as having no "form." Nothing can be more erroneous. Those who from its name looked for the plan of Beethoven's or Mendelssohn's symphonies would doubtless be disappointed. We have here a combination of the orthodox form with that of the variation; and the design of the work is so novel that it is hardly surprising that those who heard it without previous acquaintance with the score should be unable to follow its structure. In order to understand the music, it is needful to bear in mind that Liszt entitles it a symphony "in drei Charakterbildern"—in three character-pictures; and that he presents us not with scenes from Goethe's drama, but with a musical portrayal of the characters of Faust, Gretchen, and Mephistopheles. The first movement is occupied with Faust—his doubts, his despair, his noble aspirations. All these are depicted in the various themes, and the form is in its general outline (exposition, development, repetition) precisely that of a Beethoven symphony, though the details are considerably modified, particularly as regards the sequence of keys. The slow movement, which represents Gretchen, is on a first hearing the most readily appreciable part of the work; the melodies are remarkable for purity and beauty. In the course of the developments the Faust themes appear in an entirely changed though easily recognizable form, the idea of the composer being evidently to show how the character of Faust was modified by the influence of Gretchen. The third movement, "Mephistopheles," is in some respects the most striking portion of the symphony. Mephistopheles is the spirit of negation, "der Geist der stets verneint;" he mocks at Faust's doubts and despair, he scoffs at his high aspirations. Accordingly we find here no theme characterizing the fiend himself, but, instead of this, Liszt, with rare poetic insight, has given us a parody, a distortion, a "blackguardizing" (if the word may be excused) of the whole of the Faust themes. A bitter, ironical, sardonic tone is the chief characteristic of this finale, which is almost throughout a paraphrase of the first movement, with all the pathos and all the nobility taken out of it. A point worthy of notice, as showing how thoroughly the composer has entered into the spirit of the work, occurs in the course of this movement where the Gretchen theme is introduced. "An die," says Mephistopheles, "hab'ich keine Gewalt;" and while everything else is caricatured and burlesqued, the lovely melody associated with Gretchen appears in all its original purity. The Mephistopheles movement leads without a pause to a final chorus for male voices—Goethe's "Chorus Mysticus," "Alles vergänglich ist nur ein Gleichniss," in which, at the words "Das Ewig-Weibliche zieht uns hinan," the Gretchen theme is once more appropriately introduced. From this brief outline it will be seen that the "Faust" Symphony is highly intellectual. Those who regard music as a merely sensuous enjoyment would find little in this work to suit their taste. There are, it is true, passages of extreme beauty, and there is much gorgeous orchestral coloring; but without the clue to its meaning it is impossible to understand it, and it is probable that a large majority of the audience left St. James's Hall with merely the impression that they had been listening for more than an hour to some of the most extraordinary noises that ever entered their ears. On the other hand, many will doubtless be ready to endorse our decided conviction that the symphony is one of the most remarkable and interesting works of modern times.

JOACHIM RAFF.

Translated from "Ueber Land und Meer,"

BY WM. ARMSTRONG.

Joachim Raff was born on the 27th of May, 1822, in Lachen, Canton Schwyz, his parents having removed to that place from the Württembergian village of Wiesenstetten, district of Horb, in the Black Forest, shortly before his birth.

He obtained his literary education at institutions in Württemberg, and the Jesuit Lyceum in Schwyz (a school that he still has in the warmest remembrance), remaining in the latter institution until his eighteenth year. He left the Lyceum with the most brilliant testimonials, but was unhappily unable to pursue his studies further at a university. Finding himself prepared, however, he accepted a position as teacher in an institution of learning.

At this early period his study of music exhibited itself by industrious application to several instruments. The result was different attempts at composition. Raff was not of a disposition to decide the most important questions of life in a light manner. He knew that only too often the love for a particular calling is mistaken for the qualification. Wrestling with a feeling of disbelief in his own talent for composition, he turned to Mendelssohn for advice, sending him several of his productions for examination. The warm recommendation of these compositions, on the part of Mendelssohn, to one of the first publishing houses (Breitkopf & Härtel), followed soon after by the publication of his first works, in the year 1843, encouraged the young tone-poet to such an extent that, notwithstanding the opposition of his parents, he decided to dedicate his powers entirely to music.

Like a Deus ex machina, Liszt appeared in Switzerland in 1845. Perceiving the great talent of Raff, he made him a generous offer to accompany him on a projected tour through Germany. Raff gladly accepted the proffered honor, accompanying the master on his travels through entire Germany. They separated in the border town of Cologne, Liszt going thence to Paris, Raff remaining for some time a resident of the former city.

During his stay there he made the personal acquaintance of Mendelssohn, who interested himself for him to a great degree, making him the proposition to remove to Leipzig, and, under his direction, to continue his musical studies. As Raff was about to accept this kindly invitation, Mendeleßohn died, in the autumn of 1847, having hardly completed his thirty-eighth year.

Raff had, in the meantime, worked very assiduously, applying himself, also, to musical literature. From Cologne, he contributed to the Cüçilia (a work edited by the celebrated theorist, S. W. Dehn, in Berlin) some very valuable and widely comprehensible articles.

Meanwhile the desire grew very strong in Raff to establish his home in one of the larger cities of Germany. Liszt again took him by the hand. With a recommendation from the master to a Viennese publisher by the name of Karl Mechetti, Raff undertook the journey to the Austrian metropolis; but while on the way hither he learned of the death of Mechetti, and immediately decided to return to his fatherland, Würtemberg. During the ensuing period he remained in Stuttgart, where he composed his first great works, among others the four-act opera "König Alfred."

Bülow, who at that time made a protracted stay in Stuttgart, learned to know and value Raff, and in one of his concerts before the Stuttgart public, introduced several of his compositions, one of which Raff had just completed and given to the pianist two days before; he playing it without notes; both player and composer were rewarded with a storm of applause.

For the further pursuit of his studies Stuttgart failed to offer enough opportunities; and, besides this, it was the revolutionary year of 1848-49,—that period which so seriously affected art and music. On this account, Raff journeyed to Hamburg, where he again met Liszt; shortly after, he accompanied him to Weimar. There, in an atmosphere laden with the highest love of art, Raff found at last the deepest appreciation for his ripened talent, associating, as he did, with the local and many visiting art notabilities. In Weimar he wrote his first chamber music; different compositions for piano; songs; overtures; the orchestral suite in E minor; the 121st Psalm for soli, chorus and orchestra; the Ballade: "Traum König," and "Die Liebesfee;" a concert number for violin and orchestra; the music to the drama "Bernhard von Weimar," by Wilhelm Genast; and revised his opera "König Alfred," which was given at that time at the court theatre in Weimar. From this last composition, Liszt arranged two numbers for the piano.

Not only as an artist, but in social circles also, Raff understood how to make friends. When Berlioz (who did not understand the German language) was in Weimar, at a banquet given in his honor, it was Raff who made his speech at table in Latin—an attention which astonished and delighted that gifted Frenchman.

While in Weimar, Raff engaged himself to the talented actress, Doris Genast, a grand-daughter of the well-known character delineator, for whom Goethe had such preference. As this lady soon afterwards accepted an engagement at the court theatre in Wiesbaden, he followed her in the year 1856.

Raff was very soon the most noted music teacher in Wiesbaden. All of the time devoted to his muse was occupied in sketching new works. Meanwhile followed his marriage in 1859, from which union a promising daughter is the issue.

After Raff had won for himself fame, both at home and abroad, through his symphony "An das Vaterland," which was crowned with a prize in Vienna, and numerous other larger works, he gave up private teaching entirely, in the year 1870, determining to live only for his family and his art. To this period of ideal retirement, only broken in upon for a few hours at a time by the visits of artist friends, is the musical world indebted for his most important works, including: the "Wald Symphonie," the "Leonore" symphony, the heroic opera of "Samson" (the text of which he had written himself several years before), the comic opera of "Dame Kobold," which was given in the year 1870, in Weimar—a number of two and four-hand compositions for the piano, choruses, an octet, a sextet, eight string quartets, trios, piano quartet and quintet, concertos for the violin, violoncello, and piano; besides the three aforementioned symphonies, five others, arrangements of different compositions by Bach, etc., etc. All of these first saw the light in Wiesbaden.

After twenty-one years of such extraordinarily fruitful labor, Raff left Wiesbaden, in the autumn of 1877, to accept a position which had been offered him, as director of the newly-founded "Hoch's Conservatory" for music, in Frankfurt-on-the-Main. In a short time he had procured for this institution several very celebrated artists as instructors: Clara Schumann, Cosman, Böhme, Stockhausen, Urspruch, Gleichauf, Heermann.

The Conservatory was opened for instruction in the spring of 1878, with sixty pupils, the number being increased to one hundred and thirty-nine before the close of the year.

Although Raff never exerted himself to obtain outward distinction, high honors have been conferred upon him by princes, and both home and foreign musical societies, that would require too much space to mention here. Notwithstanding all this, Raff has preserved a very great degree of modesty. A mark thereof is that works of all the old and new classical masters are played at "Hoch's Conservatory," with the exception of one, and that one, Raff. This trait of his character is also well illustrated in the following: so long as Frau Raff (who was known as an excellent actress played at the theatre in Wiesbaden, he never attended the representations.

In his intercourse, amiable and communicative, he understands, as few others, how to stimulate and instruct young and striving artists, so that they are very fond of seeking him out (fonder than can sometimes prove agreeable to him), to listen to his conversation, which is full of droll and spicy sallies of wit.

A detailed catalogue of Raff's works, of which over two hundred have already appeared, is contained in that excellent work, "Mendel's Musikalisches Conversations-Lexicon."

Of course his latest work, which has just been completed, is not mentioned. It is his ninth symphony, entitled "In Summer," being the second number of a cyclus; the eighth, "Spring," being intended for the first. The tenth and eleventh symphonies, according to this, will be descriptive of autumn and winter. The musical world will await the appearance of this work with great interest.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LEIPZIG.—Holy week was the occasion of some fine musical performances at the St. Thomas Church; especially that of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music, under the direction of Reinecke. The Viennese pianist, Robert Fischhof, of established reputation in Austria, gave a concert on the 24th ult., at the theatre, with the aid of the Gewandhaus orchestra. He obtained a great and a legitimate success in the F-minor concerto of Chopin and the fourth Rhapsodie of Liszt. The directors of the Gewandhaus concerts have put in competition (confined to German and Austrian architects,) plans for the construction of the proposed new music hall. Two prizes, one of 3,000 marks, the other of 2,000, will be awarded to the two best plans.

Weissheimer's opera, Meister Martin und seine Gesellen, was performed for the first time at the Stadt theatre, on the 6th March, and, though not of equal merit throughout, well received by the public. The story has already furnished a libretto for Herr Kruk, now chorus-master at the Carlsruhe Theatre, and another for F. W. Tschirch, conductor at the Theatre in Gera.—The proceeds of the nineteenth Gewandhaus Concert were devoted to charitable purposes. The programme comprised only two compositions; Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht and Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

The programme of the twentieth Gewandhaus Concert comprised an air by Beethoven and Swedish Songs, sung by Mlle. Louise Pyk, of Stockholm; Chopin's Piano-Forte Concerto in E minor; and Piano-Forte Solos (Prelude and Fugue in A minor, J. S. Bach; "Des Abends," R. Schumann; "Elfenpiel," Heymann), played by Herr Heymann, of Frankfurt-on-the-Main. Both lady and gentleman were liberally applauded. The orchestral pieces were Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Gade's Symphony in A minor, No. 8.

—COLOGNE.—An International Singing Match will be held here in August. The Emperor Wilhelm has given a gold medal, the Empress Augusta an object of art, and the Prince von Hohenzollern two gold medals, to be distributed as prizes. The Minister of Public Instruction contributes for the same purpose 1,500 marks; the Administrative Council of the Province, 3,000; the City of Cologne, 2,000; the Cologne Men's Vocal Association an object of art, worth 1,000, and the Kölnische Zeitung, 500, while innumerable other contributions are promised on all sides.

BERLIN.—Sternscher-Gesangverein (Feb. 20), Oratorio, "Samson" (Handel). Wagner society (Feb. 27): Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and first act from "Walküre" (Wagner). Singakademie (March 19): St. Matthew Passion-music (Bach), and (March 26) Oratorio "Der Tod Jesu" (Graun).

The series of Subscription Concerts at the Singakademie was brought to a close by a fine performance of Handel's Saul.—Among the pianists who have lately given concerts here are Herren Bülow, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Moszkowski, and Heymann.

Adolphe Adam's one-act comic opera, La Poupée de Nuremberg, has been produced (under the title of Die Nürnberger Puppe) at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theatre, but not, as the bills erroneously announce, for the first time in Berlin. It was performed at the same theatre between 1850 and 1860. M^{me}. Küchenmeister-Rudersdorf, since well-known in London, assuming the principal female part.—There have been plenty of concerts lately. Foremost among them may be mentioned the concert given in the Singakademie by M^{lle}. Jlonka von Rawasz, a young Magyar lady, a pupil of Franz Liszt's. She was assisted by M^{lle}. Marianne Stresow and Herr Moritz Moszkowski.—By the permission of Herr von Hülsen, Robert le Diable, Un Ballo in Maschera, and Gounod's Faust, will be included this season in the repertory at Kroll's.—M. Camille Saint-Saëns has just composed and dedicated to the Countess von Schlenitz a four-hand pianoforte piece founded on Heine's poem, and entitled "König Harfagar." It is published by Bote and Bock.

BONN.—The monument to Schumann will be inaugurated on the second of May. A grand concert will be given in the evening under the direction of Joachim and of Wasielewski (Schumann's biographer). The E flat ("Cologne") Symphony, the Requiem für Mignon, and the Manfred music of Schumann will be performed; and the violin concerto of Brahms will be played by Joachim. There will also be a musical matinée devoted to Schumann on the third.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The London Figaro, of April 3, says:

Correspondence from St. Petersburg speaks with enthusiasm of the production a fortnight ago, under the direction of the composer, of M. Rubinstein's new opera, "Kalaschnikoff." The libretto is in the national Russian language, and is the work of a native, M. Nayravnik. The scene is laid at Moscow, in the reign of the Czar Ivan IV., surnamed the Terrible. This monarch, hated by his people, and fearful of his life, confided his safety to the hands of his private guards, the celebrated Oprichniki, whose duty it was to secure the safety of their sovereign against real or imaginary enemies. These Oprichniki, brave as they were, had social powers which were almost unlimited, and the populace were given up to the unbridled license of the soldiers. One of the body, the favorite of the Czar, has, we find, dishonored the wife of Kalaschnikoff, a rich merchant, who, swearing vengeance against the villain, challenges him in one of the tournaments which were among the amusements of the court, and kills him. For this offence the merchant is condemned to death by the Czar Ivan, who, however, in accordance with the dictates of rough and Russian justice, promises to guard his wife and children against further harm, and to transfer the privileges of commerce to his brother. M. Rubinstein's music is described by competent critics as purely symphonic. To the choral and instrumental masses the chief portions of the opera are assigned, the solos being very few, and the chief personages of the drama bearing their portion of the music chiefly in declamatory recitative. M. Rubinstein, it is stated, makes free use of the leitmotif, but although his work is not a little tedious, it is by no means devoid of melody. Written in grandiose style, the religious choruses made a special impression; while the baritone Korsoff, in the part of the merchant who gives his name to the opera, and the tenor Stravinsky, in the rôle of Ivan the Terrible were, it is said, admirable. At present the opera is in the Russian language, but it will probably soon be translated into German, and probably also into French.

Moscow.—Henri Wieniawski, the great violinist, died here in the beginning of this month. He was born at Lublin, Poland, July 10, 1835. He entered the Conservatory of Paris as a pupil in 1843, and received instruction on the violin from Clavel and Massart, and took lessons in harmony from Colet. He gave his first concert in Europe in 1852, and subsequently visited most of the great cities of Europe. He came to New York in the fall of 1872, with Rubinstein, and made his first appearance at Steinway Hall, on September 23. After concluding his engagement with Rubinstein, he gave a series of concerts in New York and Brooklyn during the following season. While he was thus engaged, in December, 1873, he was offered the position of professor of the classe de perfectionnement in the violin section of the Brussels Conservatory of Music, succeeding M. Vieuxtemps, who was compelled to retire by ill health from the position. He accepted the office and entered upon his duties in 1876. During the month of January, 1874, he gave a series of concerts with M. Victor Maurel, the baritone, at that time, of the Strakosch Opera Troupe, and in the following spring he returned to Europe. Wieniawski was a man of large stature and commanding presence. His hair and moustache were jet black, and he weighed fully two hundred and fifty pounds. His manner of playing was at once the wonder and admiration of all violinists. His bowing was magnificent, the delicacy of his staccato playing being a special feature of his performance, every note in a run of four octaves in one bow being given with an easy grace and perfect tone that could not be surpassed. He never appeared to exert himself, and in the most intricate passages played with a calm repose of manner which was an assurance to his hearers of his consummate ability. Those persons who heard him in such works as the "Kreutzer Sonata," with Rubinstein and other notable compositions, will not forget the profound impression he made on his audiences. His technique was remarkable. Wieniawski was also distinguished as a composer. His "Legende" may be said to be a classic which every violinist of high aspirations has in his repertoire, and which one may often hear, though it has never been rendered with such exquisite perfection as at the hands of its composer. His fantasia on airs from "Faust" was another notable composition. Rubinstein wrote one of his great works, a violin concerto, expressly for Wieniawski. He was the owner of several instruments of great value, a Guarnerius of powerful and rich tone, and a Stradivarius being among his collection. His rank among violinists was universally recognized, and but two other artists in the world, Joachim and Wilhelmj, could claim professional equality with him.

THE FESTIVAL.

OUR great Triennial Feast of Harmony,—the fifth which the old Handel and Haydn Society have prepared for us,—is near at hand. In ten days it will begin, namely, on Tuesday evening, May 4, and will close its series of seven Oratorios and Concerts on Sunday evening, May 9. The zeal, the completeness, and the wealth of programme with which these festivals have always been prepared, and the deep impression they have made, each more inspiring than the one preceding, give sufficient assurance that this one will be a great success. The sale of season tickets has been larger than ever before, and no pains have been spared to make the festival as perfect as the improved means of to-day will enable.

The great chorus of five hundred singers was never better in the quality of voices and the balance of the parts, never in better training, nor animated by a more true enthusiasm. The conductor, Carl Zerrahn, the hero of so many festivals, has lost no whit of his inspiring energy, and wields all the forces at his command with the same sure aim and efficacy that he has always shown on such occasions.

At the great organ he will have, as so often before, the able and judicious aid of Mr. B. J. Lang (now happily recovered from his threatening illness); and, at the head of the violins of the very efficient orchestra of seventy instruments, he will have Mr. Bernard Listemann. This orchestra is made up very nearly, if not altogether, of our own resident musicians, who, in the Symphony and other concerts of the past six months, have proved themselves entirely competent to any orchestral work which the best musical taste of Boston can require.

The list of solo singers also is inviting. The standard of this Society in this regard is high; indeed, never more exacting; and if no famous artists from abroad are imported for the occasion, it is because none really are needed. It is one sign of the musical progress in this country that all the principal vocal parts in the exacting programme of this Festival can be with confidence intrusted to our own native, with, we believe, only two adopted singers. The list includes: Sopranos, Miss Emma C. Thursby, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Fanny Kellogg, and Miss Ida W. Hubbell; Contraltos, Miss Annie Cary, and Miss Emily Winant; Tenors, Sig. Italo Campanini, Mr. Charles R. Adams, and Mr. Wm. Courtney; Basses, Messrs. M. W. Whitney, John F. Winch, and G. W. Dudley.

Here are the programmes:—

1. Tuesday evening, May 4, Mendelssohn's Oratorio, Saint Paul, with Miss Thursby, Miss Winant, Mr. Adams and Mr. Whitney in the principal solos.

2. Wednesday evening, Spohr's Oratorio, The Last Judgment, which has not been heard here by this generation, although the Society performed it several times nearly forty years ago,—notably when the daughter of the composer, Mme. Spohr-Zahn, was here to sing the contralto part. We have given a brief sketch of this mild Last Judgment (so it must seem now that we have heard Verdi's Dies Iræ), on another page. The soloists will be: Miss Kellogg, Miss Cary, Sig. Campanini and Mr. Winch.

3. Thursday afternoon, at 2:30. An admirable miscellaneous programme, the lighter numbers of which are placed first, namely: Mr. Chadwick's Rip Van Winkle overture, which so pleased in two of the Harvard Symphony Concerts; Schubert's Erl-König, sung by Mr. Adams; a scene from Hamlet, by Ambrose Thomas, sung by Miss Thursby; and an aria from Handel's Semele, sung by Miss Annie Cary. Then comes the noble short Psalm (unaccompanied) for double chorus,—"Judge me, O God,"—by Mendelssohn; and then, as one of the grandest features of the festival, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with chorus,—the quartet of solos to be sung by Miss Thursby, Miss Cary, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Dudley.

4. Thursday evening, Symphonic Overture, "Marmion" (in Sir Walter Scott's poem) by Dudley Buck (new), followed by Verdi's Manzoni Requiem Mass. Principal vocalists: Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Annie Cary, Sig. Campanini, and Mr. Whitney.

5. Friday evening, two parts ("Spring" and "Summer") from Haydn's Oratorio, The Seasons,—the solos by Miss Thursby, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Whitney. Also (first time in this country) Saint-Saëns's Cantata, The Deluge, with Miss Hubbell, Miss Winant, Mr. Adams and Mr. Dudley for the solos.

6. Saturday afternoon, May 6, a miscellaneous concert, of which the most important features will be the Utrecht Jubilate, a very noble early work of Handel; solos by Miss Cary, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Whitney; and the sublime concluding chorus to Bach's Cantata,—Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss. Other selections are: Weber's Overture, The Ruler of the Spirits; Aria from Verdi's La Forza del Destino (Sig. Campanini); "La Calendrina," by Jomelli (Miss Thursby); Aria from "Il Duca d'Ebri," by Da Villa (Mr. Courtney); the Cobbler's Air from Wagner's Meistersingers (Mr. Whitney); Aria from Handel's Julius Cæsar (Miss Winant); Scherzo from the Symphony by Goetz (Orchestra); "Voi che sapete," from Mozart's Figaro (Miss Cary); "Miriam's Song of Victory," by Reinecke (Miss Hubbell); Love Song from Wagner's Walkyrie, (Campanini); Duet from Rossini's William Tell (Messrs. Campanini and Whitney).

7. The Festival will close on Sunday evening, May 9, with Handel's Oratorio Solomon, which has not been given here for twenty-five years. Miss Thursby and Miss Kellogg will sing the parts of the two queens and the two mothers; Miss Annie Cary, the contralto part of Solomon; Mr. Courtney, Zadoc, the high priest (tenor), and Mr. Whitney, the Levite.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

A WEEK OF DISAPPOINTMENTS.—The illness of Mr. Lang, which threatened to be somewhat serious, but happily has not proved so, caused the postponement of two concerts which had been eagerly looked forward to as among the most important musical events of the season. These were the concert of the Cecilia, which was to have taken place on Monday, the 12th inst., with Schumann's Manfred music and Gade's "Fair Ellen;" and on the 15th, Mr. Lang's production (for the first time in Boston), of La Damnation de Faust, by Berlioz. Also on the 14th, many were disappointed at not hearing Joseffy at Mr. Peck's annual benefit. Had these concerts taken place, we should have been tempted to remark upon the singular fortuitous conjunction in the same week of two great compositions on so kindred themes as Faust and Manfred. Goethe who was a great admirer of Lord Byron, speaking of Manfred, writes: "This singularly clever poet has absorbed my Faust into himself, and, hypochondriacally, has sucked the strangest nourishment out of it." It would have been interesting to compare the musical treatment of these texts, and see whether Berlioz could assimilate and reproduce in tones the poetry of Goethe's Faust with anything like the wonderful truth and beauty of Schumann's musical illustration of the Manfred.

But now the close conjunction of the two is broken; the Triennial Festival will part them. Mr. Lang is happily himself again, and the Cecilia concert will take place this evening, while the Faust is postponed to May 14, allowing time for more complete rehearsal, with an undivided mind on the part of the conductor.

Another singular conjunction during our present season, of musical treatments of one sombre and appalling topic, may be found in the large repertoire of compositions having Hell and Judgment for their poetic subject-matter. First, we have had the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz, which takes us to the nether world, among the demons. Now comes Verdi's Requiem, with the Dies Iræ painted out in all its imaginable terrors. Then we have the gentler side of the Last Judgment in Spohr, and a watery judgment in the Deluge, by Saint-Saëns; and the Stabat Mater of Rossini, with its Inflammatum and in die judicii; and finally (if so it may be)

Faust's Damnation and the "Ride to Hell." We may add to the list the Lenore Symphony by Raff, and the Danse Macabre by Saint-Saëns. What does it all mean? Are all the sweet and heavenly subjects so exhausted that our modern composers find themselves driven for new themes to the guilty imagination's world of endless retribution? Or do they so distrust their own inventive genius, so feel their own inferiority to the great, wholesome masters of the past as to see no chance of being thought original except by turning away from earth and heaven, and drawing lurid and appalling pictures from the world below? Perhaps the next great composer is to be a musical Jonathan Edwards!

ORGAN RECITALS.—Mr. Henry M. Dunham has already given three of a series of four recitals in Boston Music Hall, on successive Tuesday afternoons. They are remarkably well worthy of the attention of lovers of good organ music. In them, Mr. Dunham, who is the successor of Mr. Whiting in the N. E. Conservatory, has proved himself one of the best organists we have. He is equally at home in the works of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, and of the modern organ writers, like Thiele, Merkel, Batiste, etc. He plays with great clearness, so that you trace all the polyphonic parts; his time is firm and even, and he combines and contrasts the registers with judgment and facility.

He has commonly a singer to relieve the programme. In the first concert (which we were unable to attend) it was Mrs. Jennie M. Noyes; and the principal organ pieces were the Sonata in F minor by Mendelssohn, and the Concert Satz in E-flat minor by Thiele. The second programme (April 13) was as follows:—

Sonata in G minor Merkel.
Maestoso, Più moto—Adagio—Introduction and Fugue.
 Andante in A flat Dunham.
 { a. Ren-di-l sereno al ciglio (Sosarme) Handel.
 { b. Immer bei dir Raff.
 Mr. Alfred Wilkie.
 Passacaglia in C minor Bach.
 Elsa's Wedding March to the Münster Wagner.
 Grand chorus in A major Salomé.
 Serenade, "The Star of Love" Wallace.
 Mr. Alfred Wilkie.

Concerto in A minor Whiting.

The singing was omitted, Mr. Wilkie having a sore throat. The organ compositions of Gustav Merkel (born in 1827 and pupil of the old Johann Schneider of Dresden) are unsurpassed by any living composer for that instrument. He seems to be thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Bach, and masterly in counterpoint and fugue, as well as rich in musical ideas and a poetic sentiment. This Mr. Dunham made apparent in his fine rendering of the Sonata in G minor. Bach's great Passacaglia is something that we would fain miss no opportunity of hearing, at least when so well interpreted. Mr. Dunham's own Andante proved a pleasing composition.

In his third recital, Tuesday last, Mr. Dunham offered the following selections:—

Toccata in F major Bach.
 Adagio Volkmar.
 March, from "Ruins of Athens" Beethoven.
 { a. Die blauen Frühlingsaugen Ries.
 { b. Liebesfrühling Sucher.
 Miss Ella Abbott.
 Grand Sonata for four hands and double pedal Merkel.
Allegro Moderato—Adagio—Introduction and Fugue.
 Messrs. Arthur W. Foote and H. M. Dunham.
 Si t'amo, o cara Handel.
 Miss Ella Abbott.
 Fantasia, "The Storm" Lemmens.
 Grand march and chorus from "Tannhäuser" Wagner.

Here were at least two very noble numbers: the brilliant and majestic Bach Toccata, and the four-hand Sonata by Merkel. The latter was played con amore and with inspiring effect by the two young artists. The Allegro is a superb movement, large and full of life and power; the Adagio tender and subdued; and the Fugue, with a very long and fascinating theme, with charming sequences, is developed in a masterly manner. The Adagio by Volkmar doubtless pleased many of the audience—at all events the sentimental portion—better than Bach himself, but we prefer small doses of such sugary sweetness; it displayed, however, the vox humana and other reed and flute stops to advantage. Organ "storms" are rather played out; this one by Lemmens opens with a pleasant serenade, or concert, and the interruption by the whistling chromatic wind is very graphic; a return to the first part is very natural and proper, but it is spun out to tedious length. The noble march (not the Turkish March) from the Ruins of Athens made a fine effect. The song selections, and their interpretation by Miss Ella Abbott, were excellent. She has a clear, frank, charming voice, and seems to sing out from a full heart, like the birds.

In his last Recital, at 4 P. M. next Tuesday, which we trust will have the large audience that he deserves, Mr. Dunham will be assisted by the Athene Quartette (vocal) of young ladies.

Mr. JOHN ORTH, the pianist, gave an interesting concert at Mechanics' Hall on Monday afternoon, April 12. The assisting artists were Mr. George L. Osgood, vocalist, and Mr. Gustav Dannreuther, violinist. The hall was well filled with an attentive and pleased audience. The programme was unique and included:

Sonata, piano and violin, op. 28 (new) Brahms.
 Adagio and Allegro, from Phantasia for Piano and Violin, op. 17 (new) Hans Huber.
 Songs, a. Nachtgesang, op. 31, No. 2 Haupt.
 b. Spring Flowers, op. 26 No. 2 Reinecke.
 With violin obligato.
 Romance, for piano, op. 26, No. 2 J. K. Paine.
 Polish Dances, op. 3, No. 1 Scharwenka.
 Etude: "Penses un peu" Henselt.
 Polonaise, No. 1, C minor (new) Liszt.
 Mazurka, op. 50, No. 2 Chopin.
 2d. Sonata, violin and piano, op. 121 Schumann.

An accident deprived us of the pleasure of hearing all but Mr. Orth's last pianoforte solos and the great Sonata Duo by Schumann. The last is full of life, originality and charm, and was most satisfactorily interpreted by the two artists. Mr. Orth's piano playing shows very marked improvement. His renderings were refined and tasteful, showing sympathy with the composer, while his execution is clear, finished, brilliant and effective, or delicate, as the case may require. Mr. Dannreuther is certainly showing himself to be one of our best violinists. His style is honest, broad and manly, free from all affectation.

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC.—Another interesting concert of Mr. Julius Eichberg's Violin Classes took place at Union Hall, on Saturday afternoon, April 17. The following programme will show what tasks these young aspirants are equal to:

Gavotte Eichberg.
 Master R. Stearns.
 "Voi che sapete," (Transcribed for Violin.) Mozart.
 Master Waldo Cushing.
 Theme Varié Eichberg.
 Master Albert Lithgoe.
 Largo, from Concerto for two Violins, D minor Bach.
 Misses Lillian Shattuck and Lettie Launder.
 Hungarian Airs Ernst.
 Mr. Willis Newell.
 Adagio, from 2d Concerto De Beriot.
 Miss Georgiana Pray.
 Fantasia,—"Faust" Wieniawski.
 Mr. Placido Fiumara.
 Duett Dancla.
 Misses Edith Christie and Georgiana Pray.
 Romanza, E major Wilhelmj.
 Miss Lettie Launder.
 Allegro, from 3d Concerto De Beriot.
 Miss Edith Christie.
 Finale, from Violin Concerto Mendelssohn.
 Miss Lillian Shattuck.
 Fantasia—"Othello" Ernst.
 Miss Lillian Chandler.

These, of course, were among the foremost of Mr. Eichberg's scores of pupils. After hearing the concert through, one goes away wondering at the skill, the good style and method displayed by every one, from such really accomplished artists as Miss Lillian Chandler and her fair quartet associates—from Mr. Newell and Mr. Fiumara, down to the small, bright boys by whom the concert was opened. It all shows true and thorough training; all are making progress in the right way. The Concerto Duo movement from Bach was beautifully rendered. So were all the more important numbers.

IN PROSPECT.—This evening Schumann's Manfred music, with Mr. Ticknor's reading, and Gude's "Fair Ellen" cantata, by the Cecilia.

—Mr. B. J. Lang's second concert, at Mechanics' Hall, is postponed to the afternoon of Thursday, April 20. His programme includes that string quartet by Raff ("Die schöne Müllerin") which was heard at one of the Euterpe concerts; eleven songs, to be sung by Mr. W. J. Winch; and a new quintet for piano and strings by Goldmark. The brothers Listemann, Mr. J. C. Mullaly and Mr. A. Heindl take part in the two concerted pieces.

—Mr. Ernst Perabo's last two matinées, at Wesleyan Hall, fall on the 26th and 30th of this month.

—Mr. S. Liebling, the pianist, will give a concert on Friday evening, April 30, at Union Hall, assisted by well known local talent.

—Mr. Liebling and Mr. Ben Wood Davis, a young lawyer of this city, are engaged upon a comic opera, which will be brought out in the fall. The subject is an American one, and those who have heard fragments of the libretto and music predict for it a great success.

—On April 26, the "Ideal" Opera Company will return to the Boston Theatre and present Gilbert and Sullivan's modern comic opera, The Sorcerer, with a completeness which will merit the favor of all lovers of melody and fun.

—Mr. Charles R. Adams is preparing to bring out Halevy's opera, The Jewess, at the Boston Theatre, some time in May. It will be given in English, and his company includes Miss Laura Schirmer and other artists who sang in the Crown Diamonds, at the Globe, some months ago.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., March 25. —The Cecilia gave its eighth concert, the fourth and last of the present season, on Tuesday evening, March 9. The artists who united in the presentation of the following excellent programme, were the New York Philharmonic Club, the Beethoven Club, of Boston, and Miss Emily Winant, of New York, contralto.

Second Serenade, in C, Op. 14 Fuchs.
 Songs: a. An Sylvia (Shakespeare) Schubert.
 b. Ungeduld Schubert.
 Song: "L'Addio" Mozart.
 Selections: a. Hungarian Melody Hofmann.
 b. Hungarian Dances Brahms.
 Book 1, Nos. 2 and 3; Book 2, No. 6.
 Song: Sunset (Sidney Lanier) D. Buck.
 Octet, Op. 20 Mendelssohn.

The Fuchs Serenade, three of the four movements of which were given, is a pleasing work, and made an enjoyable opening to the entertainment. It is carefully written, each of the movements possessing merit in itself while they are well contrasted. We enjoyed most the Larghetto. We understand the work belongs to a series of similar compositions. If the others are equal to the one here presented, it would be pleasant to hear them. The Serenade was finely rendered.

Hofmann's Hungarian Melody pleased very much. It is simple, beautiful, and not marked by that apparent straining after effect which meets us in so many of the modern works, excellent as very many of them are.

The Hungarian Dances were given with splendid effect. They must be extremely difficult to render, so sudden and unexpected are the changes of tempo and sentiment. They showed the skill of the two clubs, and the ease with which they can unite their somewhat different styles and methods. We were privileged to hear one or two of these dances as given by the Boston Philharmonic orchestra at one of the Joseffy concerts during the same week, and can say that the arrangement for nine strings appeared to us to be excellent, and to represent very successfully the original, which, of course, is richer in tone-color, and, so far, more impressive. The compositions are interesting, and well worth hearing in either form.

The splendid Octet of Mendelssohn is so well known that little need be said respecting it. It was finely given and made a brilliant ending to the Cecilia's second season. We heard the work a few days before as given by all the strings at the Harvard Symphony Concert, and while it was there rendered in fine style and with the combined power and richness of the whole body of strings, we think, on the whole, we prefer it in its original form. The double-bass was added here, as at the symphony concert, to strengthen the second cello part, — a custom followed, we are told, in Europe, whenever the work is given. If one may venture to criticize so great a master as Mendelssohn, it seems to us that the accompaniment parts in the first movement are rather heavily written: so much so, indeed, that they almost cover up the first violin which carries the melody. It seems as if for once Mendelssohn had miscalculated the power of a single violin, in marking as he has, all the parts f. Would it not be as legitimate to add an extra violin to the upper part, and so attain a better balance of tone, as it is to add the double-bass to strengthen the second 'cello? We understood from one of the artists that they themselves felt the want of another violin on the part in question. If this is impracticable, why not modify the marking slightly in the accompaniment, at least, say f, instead of ff. We think Mendelssohn's intentions would be more successfully attained by such treatment, and his work rendered more effective.

The songs were carefully selected and well rendered. The first two pleased us most. Miss Winant's voice is full, rich, and sympathetic. We have heard her several times this season, and each time with growing interest.

Mr. Bonner supplied as usual the accompaniments.

The Society has had a very successful season in every way. Financially, its wants are all provided for by the subscriptions. Only through subscribers is it possible to get tickets to the concerts. We hope it will enlarge its list of members—now limited to one hundred—and we think it can profitably do so, as there has been quite a demand for tickets. It could thus increase its means, and so the excellence of its work. It is doing a good service for Providence, and we wish it the highest success in its future efforts. This can only be attained by a strict adherence to its present high standard, and by a constant endeavor to carry it up still higher. A. G. L.

NEW YORK, April 19.—The N. Y. Philharmonic Club gave the last of its series of six chamber music concerts on Tuesday evening, April 6, with this programme:—

Serenade, Op. 25. Beethoven.
(Flute, violin, viola).
Hungarian Song. Hofmann.
Menuette. Schubert.
Turkish March. Mozart.
(Philharmonic Club).
Quintet, C. Op. 5. Svendsen.
(2 Violins, 2 violas, violoncello).

This efficient club never played to better advantage than upon this evening; the little gems (bracketed together) were rendered with a delicacy, a precision, and finish that were indeed remarkable. The Turkish March is taken from the well known Harpsichord Sonata in A, which has been played at by almost every aspiring young miss between Maine and California; in its present shape, however, it proved much more effective than in its original guise, and deserved the encore it received.

The Svendsen Quintet proved to be a most interesting and attractive composition. The rhythms are of a strange, wild sort, and there are many harmonic progressions which startle by their boldness; but the treatment of the instruments is masterly, and there are many melodic phrases of exceeding beauty.

The audience was not a very large one, but its quality was excellent. I do not intend to intimate that the attendance was painfully small, but only that it is a shame that the house was not filled to overflowing. Messrs. Arnold, Weiner, and their colleagues, are honestly endeavoring to establish a series of chamber music concerts which shall be a permanent thing; they can do this if the public is even half grateful; but they must fail, like so many of their predecessors, if the public remain apathetic and indifferent.

On Saturday evening, April 10, Mr. Richard Arnold gave a concert at Chickering Hall. The principal numbers upon the programme were the Piano Quintet (E flat) by Schumann, and a new String Sextet by Dvorak. In the former selection the artists were Mr. Arnold (violin), Mr. Gramer (viola), Mr. Weiner ('cello), and Mrs. Arnold (piano). So much depends upon the interpretation of the piano portions of this lovely work, that I experienced some disappointment upon this occasion. Mrs. Arnold plays with much earnestness, and is evidently imbued with a thoroughly artistic comprehension of the composer's intention; but her touch lacks force and elasticity. The pedal is her bête noire, and she frequently came to grief.

Dvorak's Sextet is a charming work, which abounds in fine progressions, and seemingly bristles with difficulties. The concerted work is exceedingly able, and the interest is sustained from the beginning of the first movement to the final note of the last one.

Mr. Arnold played Wieniaswsky's "Legende," and "Rondo Brillant," in a style that fairly electrified the house. I have long known this gentleman's ability as an orchestral performer, and as a leader of quartets, quintets, etc., but I frankly confess that I had not the faintest idea of his capacity as a soloist. His execution is remarkably brilliant, his bowing neat, his intonation almost unerringly accurate, and his phrasing admirable. His staccato (pianissimo) is simply wonderful. Mr. Arnold has scored the great success of the season. He received the most enthusiastic recall, to which he responded with a selection which displayed to the best advantage his remarkable technique.

Mr. Weiner contributed a long and most elaborate fantasia on the flute, and did it wonderfully well; but I cannot say that I yearn and pine for that charming instrument. The audience was not large, although appreciative and enthusiastic.

On Saturday evening, April 17, the Symphony Society gave its sixth and last concert with this programme:—
5th Symphony. Beethoven.
3d act, "Siegfried." Wagner.
Soloists.

Mrs. Swift, Soprano. Sig. Campanini, Tenor.
Mrs. Norman, Alto. Mr. Remmert, Bass.

The house was packed with an enthusiastic audience, which sat and seemed to enjoy the programme, although the performance extended from 8 to 10.45. Of the soloists there is nothing to say, for they are well known artists of tried ability; but one of them, Mr. Remmert, must endeavor to correct the error, into which he seems of late to be falling; he cannot afford to sing false, and this he repeatedly did that evening.

As for the chorus work (in the Symphony), it was well done, when we consider that the music was written for cast-iron lungs and throats, and that no human effort can make anything of those upper notes other than a series of ear-piercing howls; either the instruments and voices should all be lowered, or the whole work should be transposed, or it should never be performed! ARGUS.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., April 14.—The Arion Club did nothing at its third concert of this season, beyond furnishing about half the numbers in the shape of male choruses, not extraordinarily well done, according to the Arion standard. The staple of the concert was supplied by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club and Mrs. Carrington, a singer, who, in purity and power of tone and perfection of technique has not been surpassed by any singer who has appeared here within the last two years. The Club gave us only portions of three noble works of chamber music, but gave them most admirably in every respect. The solos were all very brilliant and effective, and the rich, mellow and refined tones of Mr. Ryan's clarinet were something wonderful after what we ordinarily hear in the orchestra.

The Heine Quartet is giving a second series of chamber music recitals, with excellent programmes. It is a very good sign that Milwaukee should support a course of six such recitals by local players. I wish I could think this represented any very deep or permanent interest in the best music; but I fear it is largely a matter of fashion, and will pass away, as the interest in the work of the Arion seems to be passing; but we shall see.

Both the Arion and the Musical Society will produce great choral works at the next concert. J. C. F.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

DETROIT.—William H. Sherwood, of Boston, one of the most accomplished pianists America has produced, gave a recital at Merrill Hall last evening in presence of an audience composed almost exclusively of professional musicians (local teachers) and their advanced pupils. The programme was well chosen, both as to quality and variety of compositions, and the artist victoriously demonstrated his mastery of the instrument. It is an extremely rare occurrence that one hears such tones as Mr. Sherwood produced last night, and still more rare that a piano is heard to sing as it did under his consummate touch. Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, Field, Schumann, Liszt, and that young and growing composer, Moritz Moszkowski, were all nobly interpreted, both musically and intellectually. Mr. Sherwood is a fine type of the American virtuoso—unpretentious, earnest, enthusiastic, absorbed in his art, and endowed with qualities that entitle him to rank among the undisputedly great pianists. He has power, delicacy, fire, poetic instinct, remarkable technical skill, and a "school" that enables him to take advantage of every possibility resident in the instrument. He can stand before the musical world upon his merits, without dependence on imitations of any artists.—Free Press, April 16.

CINCINNATI.—The following is the circular to the public issued by the Board of Directors of the College of Music, March 15.

"In connection with the retirement of Theodore Thomas from the Musical-directorship of the College of Music of Cincinnati, declarations of a general character have been made, which, unanswered, do the College serious injustice, and may impair its usefulness.

"The Faculty of the College remains altogether unchanged. They are the actual instructors of the pupils, are artists of high standing, many of them graduates of celebrated Conservatories, and with long experience as teachers. At a Faculty meeting, after careful consultation, the following plan for the organization of the school was recommended and adopted:

"I. There shall be two departments—an Academic Department, and a General Music School.

"II. The Academic Department, for those who desire to become professionals, or amateurs who enter for graduations, all of whom will be required to pursue a definite course of studies for a period of time.

"III. The General Music School, for general or special instruction, where any one may enter for a number of terms, receiving the valuable instruction which is afforded by the presence of a large number of excellent teachers (with the advantage of "Chorus," "Orchestral," "Ensemble," and other classes, either free, or at nominal charges), with the best methods, exercises, text books, and the discipline of a well-appointed school.

"The Academic Department affords the opportunity for a complete musical education.

"The General Music School gives to many thousands of persons, who have neither the means nor time for graduation, a certain amount of the best kind of musical instruction. At the present moment there are in the College over five hundred students; some hoping to graduate, others gaining musical knowledge and taste, which they will carry to their homes in distant parts of the country, where each will be the nucleus of refinement and healthy sentiment. It is the resolve of the founders, directors, and faculty of the College of Music that no effort of theirs shall be wanting to provide for that great necessity for better musical instruction which the success of this school has proved to exist.

"The College will go on in its appointed work. It invites, with the strongest assurances that it is equal to every requirement of musical instruction, the attendance of students and support of the public." To this is appended a list of the Faculty of over thirty teachers and professors.

NEW YORK.—The Oratorio Society, under the direction of Dr. Damrosch, has during the seven years of its existence performed the following works:

BACH, J. S.—Chorals; Actus Tragicus, (first time in America); St. Matthew Passion, (first time in New York).

BERLIOZ, H.—Flight into Egypt, (first time in America); La Damnation de Faust, (first time in America).

BEETHOVEN, L. VAN.—Ninth Symphony, (four times); The Ruins of Athens; Choral Fantasia, (twice).

BRAMHSE, J.—Requiem, (first time in America).

DAMROSCH, L.—Ruth and Naomi, (first time in America).

GLUCK, J. C.—Orpheus. Act II.

HANDEL, G. F.—Coronation Anthem, No. 2; Zadoc the Priest; Messiah, (seven times); Samson, (twice); Judas Maccabæus; Alexander's Feast.

HAYDN, J.—Creation, (twice); Seasons; The Storm.

HAYDN, M.—Tenebræ factæ sunt, (motet).

KIEL, F.—Christus. Parts I and IV., (first time in America).

LISSO, ORLANDO DI.—And the Angel, (motet).

LISZT, F.—Christus.—Part I., (first time in America).

MENDELSSOHN, F.—Elijah, (three times); St. Paul, (twice); Psalm 114th; Walpurgis Night; Midsummer Night's Dream; Laudati Pueri (motet); Glees.

MOZART, W. A.—Ave Verum Corpus, (motet).

PALESTRINA, G. P.—Adoramus Te.

ROSSINI, G.—Stabat Mater.

SCHUBERT, F.—Mass in E flat: (Kyrie, Agnus Dei and Sanctus).

SCHUMANN, R.—Paradise and the Peri.

WAGNER, R.—Choral from Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg; March from Tannhäuser.

WELLESLEY COLLEGE.—The sixty-seventh concert, March 1, offered the following interesting "Song Recital." Mr. Wm. J. Winch was the vocalist, Mr. Arthur B. Whiting, pianist, and Mr. C. H. Morse, the Wellesley musical professor, the director:

Sonata: Appassionata, Op. 57. Beethoven.
(First Movement.)
Songs: "Si t'amo, o cara" Handel.
"Unter blühenden Mandel-Bäumen" Weber.
"Die Wasserrose" Franz.
"Ach, wenn ich doch ein Immenchen wär" Franz.
"Klinge! Klinge! mein Panderu" Jensen.
"Murmeldes Lüftchen Blütenwind" Jensen.
"The Post" Schubert.
"Du bist die Ruh" Schubert.
"Erl King" Schubert.
Piano Solos: a. Fantasia, C. minor Bach.
b. "Erotilkon" (Kassandra), Op. 44-1, Jensen.
c. "Erotilkon" (Die Zauberin), Op. 44-2, Jensen.
Songs: "Cara sposa" Handel.
"Reiselled" Mendelssohn.
"The Aura" Rubinstein.
"Adelaide" Beethoven.
"Im Abendroth" Schubert.
"Ständchen" Franz.
"Be not so coy, beloved child" Rubinstein.
"Would it were ever abiding" Rubinstein.

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO LORD BYRON'S "MANFRED."

BY PAUL GRAF WALTERSEE.

[We translate a portion of the Essay contained in the valuable series of "Musikalischer Vorträge," published by Breitkopf and Härtel, Leipzig.]

That Schumann should have felt powerfully attracted by this gloomy, but highly poetical text, can be a matter of no wonder. Wasielewski tells us, that once in Düsseldorf, while he was reading the poem tête-à-tête aloud, his voice suddenly failed him, tears started from his eyes, and he was so overcome that he could read no further. This would seem to show that Schumann became all too deeply absorbed in this appalling subject, until it had become at least a fixed idea with him.

. . . . The composer has shortened the dialogue considerably. The seven Spirits, which the poet has introduced in the first part, are reduced to four, perhaps to obviate fatigue through too long solo singing. The Incantation, to be spoken by one voice, is here given to four voices. In the concluding scene Schumann has added to the text the

Requiem eternam dona eis,
Et lux perpetua luceat eis!

The score, which consists of fifteen numbers besides the overture, contains six pieces of music complete in themselves; the rest are treated melodramatically. . . .

For long years the theatres maintained a passive attitude towards this drama, owing possibly to the difficulties involved in a suitable mise-en scène for such a work. The performances were confined to the concert-room. Richard Pohl, abridging the original, composed a connecting text for concert performances; but declamation hardly supplies the place of action on the stage, and a great part of the dramatic effect is lost. In the year 1852, Liszt first brought out the work upon the stage in Weimar; several other theatres followed the example, and adopted it into their repertoire; so far as I know, the theatres in Munich, Vienna, Berlin and Hamburg.

Byron always protested that the poem was not intended for the stage; if it is capable of stage performance, it has become so through the addition of the music. And truly Schumann, in his Manfred, has bequeathed one of his ripest and most genial compositions to the world. He wished to achieve something unique, and he has succeeded. "Never before have I devoted myself with such love and such outlay of force to any composition, as to that of Manfred," he remarked in conversation.

The Overture to the Zauberflöte is regarded as unique. No one has ever had the boldness to attempt to imitate it; only the genius of a Mozart could succeed in such a thing. Equally unique in its way, although radically different from that, stands the Manfred Overture, a deeply earnest picture of the soul, which describes in the most affecting manner the torture and the conflict of the human heart, gradually dying out, in allusion to the liberation wrought through death. It is always a dangerous thing to approach such a creation with the intellectual dissecting knife, and seek to read from it the definite ideas of the composer. In this special case one can hardly err, if he assumes that the master wished to indicate two fundamental moods of feeling: on the one hand that of the anguish, which is the consequence of sin,—the unrest that is coupled with resistance to divine and human laws; on the other, that of patience, of forgiveness—in a word, of love—so that to the soul's life of Manfred he might offset that of Astarte. The rhythmic precipitancy in the first measure of the Overture transports us at once into a state of excited expectation. After a short slow movement, the introduction of the following development (Durchführung) begins, in passionate tempo, the portrayal of the restless and tormented mood. It is the syncope, employed continually in the motive, that indicates the conflict of the soul. This storms itself out, and then appears the expression of a melancholy, milder mood. Mysteriously, in the pianissimo, three trumpets are introduced in isolated chords: a warning from another world. But the evil spirits cannot be reduced to silence; with increased intensity of passion the struggle begins anew. The battle rages hotly, but in the pauses of the fight resound voices of reconciliation. At last the strength is exhausted, the pulse beats slower, the unrest is assuaged, the music gradually dies away. A slow movement, nearly related to the introduction, leads to the conclusion. With this Overture Schumann has created one of his most important instrumental works.

To the monologue of Manfred succeed the songs of the four spirits. Each one of these songs requires a special characterization. This Schumann reaches by choosing different vocal registers; soprano, alto, tenor and bass, thus enabling himself to employ also four-part harmony, while at the same time he uses different keys, and carries out the orchestral accompaniment in various ways. The Spirit of the Air begins. A muted solo violin supports the alto voice in the higher octave; while a triplet figure, apparently formed after the words, is given to the violas. No such embellishment falls to the share of the Spirit of the Water (Soprano), while in the song of the Spirit of Earth (Bass), certain allusions, which stand in connection with the text, are expressed through imitations of the violin and of the flute strengthened by a piccolo. The Fire spirit (Tenor), is despatched with a few notes. And now the four voices are united and bring the movement to a close with the following splendid organ cadence, though it may be doubted whether it be here in place.

We turn now to the first piece of melodramatic treatment. Manfred, in ecstasy at the magical apparition of "a beautiful female figure," speaks:

"Oh God! if it be thus, and thou
Art not a madness and a mockery,
I yet might be most happy,—I will clasp thee,
And we again will be—"

[The figure vanishes].

The movement (No. 2) is formed by a melody as follows:

This melody does not disappear, but reproduces itself continuously; always modified a little in the second half, it requires and it receives a varied harmonic groundwork. It shows the greatest variety in unity. It is tenderly instrumented, only the wood-wind and the string quartet finding employment; even the double bass is excluded; it would be too rude for this aerial picture. Divided violas take upon themselves the filling out of the harmony, the wind instruments entering now and then. After the first violin has twice sung the theme, the wind instruments take it up; then it is intoned anew by the violin imitated by the violoncello. The mood is that of longing expectation; a romantic breath pervades it all; while a diminished seventh chord resounds, the magic figure vanishes, and Manfred, exclaiming: "Woe, woe, my heart is crushed!" falls senseless to the ground.

3. With weightier steps the Incantation (Geisterbannfluch) announces itself. The song consists of four bass voices, which appear now in unison, now singly, once in three-part harmony. The full orchestra accompanies, but the deeper instruments have the preference. That Schumann in this movement seeks to produce peculiar effects of sound is seen by a glance into the score; but whether these abnormal sounds exceed the limits of the lines of beauty, I will not undertake to say. The chords are massed in so deep a stratum at the cost of clearness. Take for an example the following measures:

The text will bear a gloomy shading; but whether the tints which are laid on needed to be so intensely black, I almost doubt; a few gleams of light would have made the shadows stand out all the more. When four sonorous bass voices unite in unison, tone-waves are begotten, which not only affect the sense of hearing in a peculiar manner, but also set the other parts of the body in vibration, which extends throughout the whole nervous system. Add to this the deep wind instruments, bassoons, trombones, violas and string basses, and there arises a tone-color, than which nothing duskier can be imagined. As we have said before, Schumann departs here from the poet, who has this Incantation spoken by one voice; he pleases himself with his own individual conception, and with a still more awe-inspiring illustration of a text already gloomy in itself:

"When the moon is on the wave,
And the glow-worm in the grass," etc.

The next section loses something of its duskiness from the fact that it is delivered by only one bass voice, while the instrumentation is more simple. The following Terzet is only accompanied by violas and string basses. The concluding words, "Now wither!" unite the singers, as at the beginning. The composer reflects his own mood in his works; does this shine through this Incantation?

4. Manfred awakes from his swoon. The morning dawns and lights the highest mountain peaks. During the dialogue between Manfred and the chamois hunter an English horn resounds in the distance. This instrument, so often used for a purely theatrical effect, is here introduced most naturally, and produces an agreeable impression. We find ourselves in the midst of an Alpine landscape. Sheep-bells are heard tinkling in the valley; the shepherd's song resounds from the Alpine horn. The measures which Schumann brings before us will awaken involuntary recollections in one who has ever heard the sound of the shalm in the high Alps of Switzerland. The shepherd's tune begins in a melancholy strain; the echo is not wanting. But the player has his roguish humor; he knows also how to play up a little dance, and he skillfully interpolates a merry measure. But his calling is a dangerous one. Earnestness is the fundamental trait of his character, and so he soon gravitates back to his first melancholy song.

5. We have now reached the point where Manfred is rescued by the chamois hunter; this ends the first division of the drama. A new division begins; to mental strain and excitement succeeds relaxation. As the following dialogue between Manfred and the chamois hunter contrasts in clearness with the rest of the poem (the simple hunter would have no understanding for Manfred's wild, fantastic imagery) so, too, in the same sense does the composer express himself in the Entr'acte music. In contrast to the overture, which depicted the conflict of the passions, this piece bears the stamp of mild repose. The melodic passage through the tones of the chord forms the motive of the first part; violoncello, horn and violins alternate with one another; reeds and flutes answer in the most graceful manner. The second part begins with a theme of almost pastoral suggestion; but the leading thought of the first part is soon taken up again, and passes before us once more in a varied and expanded form. Manfred leaves the chamois hunter, climbs the crag by the waterfall, and invokes the Witch of the Alps. Monologue with melo-dramatic treatment (No. 6). It seems almost as if Schumann, in the composition of this piece of music, had Mendelssohnian reminiscences floating before him. Single features speak for it; yet it is possible that the two masters, in the representation of the supernatural, met in one point. Be that as it may, we have here before us one of the most delicate pieces of the work. Though different in text, the situation is the same as that at the magical appearance of "a beautiful female figure;" in both cases it is the invocation of a spirit, whether it be a magical image or the Witch of the Alps. The musical problem was to form a contrast to what had been before. The muted first violins, in an almost continuous figure of sixteenths, hover, as it were, over the spoken word, leaving the harmonic filling up to the rest of the string instruments. The reeds and flutes partly attach themselves to these, partly support, in the most discreet manner, the voice that bears the melody; the harmonica tone of a harp mingles itself with it, producing a mysterious timbre. A comparative analysis of the compositions of these two spirit conjurations would be useless considering how different their whole conception. Let us thank the genius who created them for us.

The vanishing of the Witch of the Alps is followed by a monologue of Manfred. It is to be regretted that Schumann suffered it to pass unregarded. Goethe speaks of this. The following verses may have moved him especially:

"If I had never lived, that which I love had still been living;
Had I never loved, that which I loved would still be beautiful—Happy, and giving happiness. What is she? What is she now?—
A sufferer for my sins."

(Conclusion in next number.)

FERDINAND HILLER AND ZELTER IN VIENNA.

Our readers will remember that, a short time since, Ferdinand Hiller delivered here a lecture on "Vienna fifty-two years ago." Many friends of music and literature will probably be pleased to hear that the lecture is published in the last number of Paul Lindau's Nord und Sud. We have read it with double pleasure from the fact of our comparing it with the letters written to Goethe by Zelter; the composer and musical director, concerning his own visit to Vienna in the summer of 1819—that is, only seven years earlier than Hiller's. The Goethe-Zelter Correspondence is far from being as familiar to the general public as might be supposed; this is demonstrated by the astounding fact that, though the Correspondence appeared in six parts in 1834, it has not up to the present (that is, six-and-forty years afterwards!) reached a second edition. With the reader's permission, we will, therefore, here give—as marginal notes, so to speak, on Hiller's lecture—a few reminiscences from the work on the musical Vienna of Zelter's day.

The beginning amuses and flatters us, both in Hiller and Zelter, for we are always fond of hearing how slowly people travelled only fifty years ago. It took Hiller quite eight-and-twenty hours to go from Weimar to Leipzig, and nearly as many from Leipzig to Dresden; Zelter informs us that his voyage on the Danube from Regensburg to Vienna lasted six days. Immediately after his arrival, Zelter hurried off to the Karntnerthor-Theatre, to hear Rossini's Otello. For a strict musician of the epoch, his opinion is remarkably tolerant: "Rossini is, beyond doubt, a man of genius; he plays with tones, and so tones play with him." Zelter is of the opinion that he had heard Mozart's Titus performed better in Weimar than in Vienna. "All female singers (four in number) who might have been grandmothers, but all well-trained." The singers and musicians at the Karntnerthor-Theatre were, we are informed, too hard-worked, and the members of the orchestra badly treated beyond conception. Despite of this, "all children of the muses are," in Vienna, "as plump and merry as weasels."

Of the joyous goings-on in the Prater Zelter writes in high glee, but adds sadly even then (1819) the melancholy statement: "I am told things are no longer what they were." "For such views," he wisely goes on to observe, "a stranger has no taste, and I feel glad when I can throw off the Berliner.* We also find that, manifesting as he does a passionate love of fireworks, he remarks sympathetically of Stüwer, that the good pyrotechnist is, as a rule, so unfortunate as to have bad weather, a fact for which the public evince the greatest commiseration. Himself a man of the people, Zelter retained all his life a frank liking for everything of a folk-like nature, and direct from the heart comes the assertion: "In Vienna you may find everything except wearisomeness. Any one who chooses meets here with genuine humanity."

There are two striking observations of his on theatrical orchestras. He says first: "The double bass is laid here in a slanting position when it is played, so that the performer is seated." This strange fashion, which appears to have soon gone out, pleased Zelter, and he would like to have seen it adopted everywhere, "for the confounded goose's-necks with their spikes" offended his eye. Quite as striking is his second remark that at the Burgtheater he found that they had carried out his old idea "of placing the orchestra so low down that people do not see the shock-heads of the musicians, while the music issues forth clear and plain." He cannot "imagine anything more unbecoming to a stage, than that any one has to see for hours together the fine shapes of the characters in magnificent dresses and everything which goes to make up a good scene, flitting here and there between the infamous bushes of hair of people in front of them." That Richard Wagner's idea of sinking the orchestra should have existed as a wish of Zelter's is very intelligible, and we look upon such an arrangement as a simple postulate of scenic illusion; but that Zelter should have seen his wish fulfilled in the Burgtheater, Vienna, astonishes us. His demands in this line were probably very moderate, for it is only a few years since the orchestra of the Burgtheater was lowered to a really useful and practical depth. Of the musical notabilities of Vienna, Salieri appears to have interested Zelter most. "The old fellow," writes Zelter, "is still so full of music and melody, that he speaks in melodies, and is, as it were, only thus understood. It is the greatest pleasure for me to creep after this example of genuine nature and find him invariably as true as he is cheerful." The company, too, of Joseph Weigl was exceptionally agreeable to him. "Weigl is a handsome, stately man of the world. His productions are correct, reasonable, natural, and possessed of character; he is most successful in middling subjects, and whatever effect he makes he will make in his lifetime." It is a remarkably long time before Zelter comes to speak about Beethoven, though Goethe took far more interest in that master than in Salieri and Weigl. Zelter understood music far too well and was, generally speaking, far too artistically organized, not to appreciate Beethoven's mighty genius, but he did not like Beethoven, whose music went decidedly beyond the measure of the notions to which he was accustomed. "I admire Beethoven with affright," Zelter once wrote to Goethe. So, too, the wish to make Beethoven's personal acquaintance appears to have been mixed up in Zelter with a kind of dread. Two months did he tarry in Vienna without seeing Beethoven. It is true that he informs Goethe, from time to time, that he intends visiting Beethoven, but he is always easily consoled when the project comes to nothing. "Beethoven lives in the country, but no one can tell me whereabouts. I thought of writing to him, but am informed he is well nigh inaccessible because his hearing is nearly gone. Perhaps it is better for us to remain as we were, since it might put me in a bad temper to find him in one." At length, he set out to visit Beethoven in Mödlingen. "He wanted to come to Vienna, so we met on the high road, got out of our conveyances, and embraced each other most cordially." Beethoven then went on to Vienna, while Zelter proceeded to Mödling, and to that "indescribably beautiful spot," Brühl. The following "joke" is related to Goethe with especial satisfaction: "On this trip, I had Steiner, the music-publisher, with me, and, as there cannot be much intercourse with a deaf man on the highway, a regular meeting was arranged for 4 o'clock in the afternoon at Steiner's music-shop. After dinner, we drove back directly to Vienna. As full as a badger and as tired as a dog, I lay down and so over-slept myself that everything escaped my memory. So I went to the theatre, and there, on perceiving Beethoven at a distance, I felt as though I had been crushed by a thunder-bolt. The same thing happened to him on catching sight of me, but the theatre was not the place for coming to an understanding with a man who had lost his hearing. The point now follows; Despite the large amount of blame, deserved or not, which is bestowed on Beethoven, he enjoys a degree of consideration paid only to pre-eminent men. Steiner had forthwith made known that Beethoven would personally appear for the first time, at 4 o'clock, in his (Steiner's) narrow shop, which holds only some six or eight persons, and thus he issued, as it were, invitations, so that half a hundred clever people, who filled the shop and spread over the space before it, waited altogether in vain. I learned the rights of the case the next day, when I received a letter from Beethoven, in which he apologized very earnestly (and for me very fortunately), because, like myself, he had indulged in a pleasant sleep and missed the appointment." For us, this Comedy of Errors possesses, independently of the joke, the higher recommendation of bearing testimony to the general and high esteem in which Beethoven was held in Vienna.

Of the musical nature of the Viennese Zelter formed a very favorable opinion; he was not deceived by hearing scarcely aught but Italian sung in society. "Rossini rules, whether he will or no; that is freedom. And the Italians are right. The voice wants to sing for its own sake, and whoever lets it have its way is its man." He judges the musical public of Vienna thus: "They know something here about music, and that when compared with Italy, which fancies itself the sanctifying church. But they are really profoundly learned here. They are pleased with anything, but the best alone retains a permanent hold on them. They will listen to a mediocre opera, if well cast; but a good work, even when not confided to the best hands, affords them lasting delight. Beethoven is lauded by them to the sky, because he really works hard, and because he is alive; but the man who causes to flow past them the national humor like a pure spring unmixed and mingling with no other stream is Haydn, who lives in, because he comes from, them. They seem to forget him every day, and yet every day he is born afresh for them." And with these significant words we will close our short anthology.—EDUARD HANSLICK, Neue Freie Presse.

Less uniformly sublime in subject and in treatment than the Messiah or Israel, this oratorio has all the noble Handelian characteristics: choruses ranging through a great variety of expression, from the most grand and solemn or triumphant to the most graceful, pleasing, and descriptive; songs, duets, and recitatives, which, though they must be somewhat tedious if given entire and by any but the best of solo singers, are yet full of character and beauty; instrumental accompaniments, limited to the orchestral resources of those days and somewhat homely in their lack of richer modern coloring, yet always apt and strong by the pure force of musical ideas. In England and Germany it has been customary for some competent musician to fill in new orchestral parts, whenever Solomon has been performed.

The following brief sketch of the contents of the work is gathered from a somewhat hasty perusal of the original score, with its spare instrumentation; consisting only, in addition to the string quartet, of a pair of oboes (mostly in unison with the violins), a pair of bassoons (mostly in unison with the bass), flutes for nightingales, and occasionally, in the grand triumphal double choruses, a pair of trumpets and of horns, with tympani. We make no reference to passages necessarily omitted on account of the extreme length of the oratorio.

First we have an overture in the manner of the day, most meagrely instrumented,—only strings and oboes, running with the violins,—vigorous and quaint, as Handel always is, forming a homogeneous prelude to the whole, and not an abstract of it, like our modern overtures. A simple Largo movement leads into a fugued Allegro (4-4 measure), which winds up with a few Adagio chords, and is followed by a moderate movement in 3-4, suggestive of coming pomp and majesty. This is all in B flat.

No. 2 (same key) is a double chorus of priests, a spirited movement, commenced by the basses of both choirs in stately unison, "Your harps and cymbals sound to great Jehovah's praise." The voices pause, there are ten or twelve bars of lively instrumental symphony, and then the phrases, "Your harps," etc., and "Sound, sound," are passed from chorus to chorus in light and joyous harmony; then, while the tenors on both sides give out the syllables, "To great Jehovah's name," in long, majestic notes, the sopranos of one choir introduce a new theme, with florid accompaniment by the altos, "Unto the Lord of hosts your willing voices raise"; the different phrases alternate from part to part, and the whole is worked up with great brilliancy and majesty, with all a Handel's learning, all the eight voices coming together upon long notes of plain harmony at the end. It is truly a sublime chorus, and the echoes take some time to spend themselves in the instrumental symphony, after the voices have ceased.

No. 5 introduces us to Solomon, a part for the alto voice. (In the performance here in 1855, by what strange precedent we never knew, the part of Solomon was given to the baritone!) It is a recitative, with beautiful, slowly flowing, pensive introductory symphony, in which he invokes God's presence in the "finished temple."

No. 6. Zadoc, the priest (tenor), recites, "Imperial Solomon, thy prayers are heard"; fire from heaven lights the altar; and then he sings an animated, florid air, "Sacred raptures," etc., which has all the mannerism of Handel, the roudades, etc., but is full of expression, especially the second strain, in the minor, "Warm enthusiastic fires," etc.

No. 8. Four-part chorus, "Throughout the land Jehovah's praise record," in uniform, quick-stepping Alla Breve time; a model of simple, noble fugue. As the emulous voices become heated, they finally divide into double chorus. The whole is grand and solemn.

Nos. 9 and 10. Recitative of thanksgiving and air by Solomon, "What though I trace," etc.; an exquisitely sweet, chaste, tender melody.

Nos. 11 and 12. Now comes what may be called the idyllic portion, of which the key-note is the bliss of wedded love. Solomon recites, "And see, my Queen." To this the queen replies in a 6-8 Allegro, in A, quite fantastical in its rhythmical divisions; a sort of quaint and florid pastoral, blessing

The day when first my eyes
Saw the wisest of the wise, and subsiding into a slower and more emphatic strain at

But completely blessed the day
When I heard my lover say, etc.

We pass to what we apprehend will prove the most popular among the choruses, No. 22; not a grand chorus, but a delicious summer-night serenade, with a prelude full of flute imitations of nightingales, and strings murmuring like breezes in the trees, "May no rash intruder," etc.

Truly a charming epithalamium! The soprano part at times separates into first and second voices, taking up the strain catch-wise. The syncopated rhythm seems to have caught the nightingale character from the outset; the light, buoyant harmonies, now soft, now swelling, spread over the broad surface of hundreds of voices, have a fine, breezy, all-pervading effect; while the occasional duet strain in thirds, first by all the female, then by all the male voices, gives you the sensation of listening through the night air to dainty sounds.

This sweetly closes the First Part.

Part II. opens with an exceedingly splendid, trumpet-tongued chorus, with a smart orchestral prelude and accompaniment, full of ringing exclamations and responses on the words "happy," etc., upon which a fugue sets in in the basses, with a very quaintly-marked, emphatic subject, on the words "live, live forever," which is wrought out at considerable length, and winds up magnificently with a repetition of the commencing strain. This is in the key of D major, like the "Hallelujah," and so many of the most brilliant and triumphant choruses.

No. 27. In the Levite's spirited and patriotic sounding air, "Thrice blest that wise, discerning king," you will readily imagine that Handel's melody does "mount on eagle wing," and that this bass voice vigorously scales up through its whole compass, from a low starting-point, to reach those heights of "everlasting fame," and that there are plenty of old-fashioned, long-spun roudades, when the word "everlasting" last occurs.

No. 28 opens the long dramatic scene of the two women claiming the same infant. Ushered in by an attendant (tenor recitative), the first, the real mother recites her wrong. Song after this would seem unnecessary, but Handel has improved the situation to introduce a lengthy trio (No. 29), in which the first woman begins to plead, with simple pathos, and as she grows more earnest, repeating, "My cause is just, be thou my friend," she is cut short by the second woman, "False is all her melting tale," in a vixen and accusing strain; these two characteristically distinct melodies are then mingled and alternated piecemeal, while "Justice holds the lifted scale" in a long-drawn note, now on the key-note (A), and now on the dominant, in the alto part of Solomon.

No. 30. Recitative. After hearing the second claimant, Solomon pronounces judgment: "Divide the babe." And then breaks in the strangest air,—more strange than interesting, though there is no telling what a great dramatic singer might make of it,—in which the second woman exults after her amiable and motherly manner:—

Thy sentence, great king, is prudent and wise,
And my hopes, on the wing, bound quick for the prize;
Contented I hear and approve the decree,
For at least I shall tear the loved infant from thee!

The sneering, syncopated melody, choking as it were with hate, and always with contrary accent to the bass accompaniment, has reference, we suppose, to the amiable state of mind of the singer; but it wants more instrumental background, and a little of that tigris stinging tone and action of Rachel to render it effective. Here are the first notes, which we give as a curiosity; the words are to the king, but the music—the real meaning of them—is addressed to the other woman.

Quite in contrast with this is the air of the real mother, who hereby proves herself such, singing (to odd words enough), after springing forward to "withhold the executing hand":—

Can I see my infant gored
With the fierce, relentless sword? etc.

It is really a song of great dramatic capabilities; and the closing phrases, "Spare my child," may be conceived of as being sung so as to be full of pathos. No. 34, a recitative by Solomon, is of course necessary to set all right again, by giving virtue its reward. And by this time we may fancy that our audience has got pretty well weary of so long a stretch of solos, all so much after the old Italian cut, and destitute of all the stimulating richness of the modern orchestration. The truth is, this old melody (that is, the average of it, sung by average voices), though one may find meaning and character in it all, has a monotony, to most ears, about as great as that experienced in reading those old conventional classic dramas of Corneille and Racine; not that these are for a moment to be mentioned in the scale of greatness with a genius like our Handel. They need some rare Rachel of a singer to create them anew and bring out their meaning. The beautiful songs of the Messiah and some others are more agreeable, or have become so by frequent hearing, and through great singers. Besides, they are incomparably finer. The songs of Solomon are by no means the best of Handel. It is the choruses that save the work; the life of it resides in them. Massive, elaborate, and complex as they are, nobody fails to understand them, nobody listens to them with a vacant mind. The charm of personality, which makes solos and duets so popular, is outworn in these songs, and we await each chorus like refreshing rain in drought.

Passing the majestic, florid melody in which Zadoc compares Solomon to "the tall palm," and the short five-part chorus, "From the East unto the West, who so wise as Solomon?" we come to No. 40. The first woman sings a simple pastoral air about "Every shepherd sings his maid," which would seem more in place in one of Handel's early love operas, or a pastoral like Acis and Galatea. And now nothing more intervenes before No. 41, the great chorus closing the Second Part, "Swell, swell the full chorus to Solomon's praise," etc.

This chorus, like the opening one of this part, is in D major, Allegro, 6-4 measure; bold, triumphal, in plain harmony, without fugue, but full of grandeur. The last lines, "Flow sweetly," etc., make a smoother episode, in 3-4 measure, with a running violin accompaniment, which soon imparts its movement to the bass voices, afterwards responded to by other voices; and after this smooth, gentle sprinkling of harmony, the bolder original movement returns.

Part III. opens with an instrumental symphony of some length, in broad, even-flowing 4-4 rhythm, without fugue, full and strong and joyous, with the usual Handelian quavering figures for the violins, strong, up-buoying basses, relieved at intervals by bits of pastoral duet, in reedy thirds, by the hautboys. This by way of prelude to the visit of the Queen of Sheba. Let their royal greeting speak for itself.

And now comes one of the most interesting portions of the oratorio:—

Nos. 45-51. The monarch calls upon his court musicians to Sweep, sweep the string, to soothe the royal fair,

And rouse each passion with th' alternate air.

And then follows a series of four choruses, of contrasted expression, illustrating the power of music in rousing or soothing the various passions. First a sweetly, richly flowing one in G, 3-8 measure, the theme being first sung as solo by Solomon: "Music, spread thy voice around."

Then he sings:—

Now a different measure try,
Shake the dome and pierce the sky,

Which words are immediately taken up in double chorus, with the same martial accompaniment, in D, of course. The full chords have the quick and stately tramp of armies. At the idea of the "hard-fought battle" and the "clanging arms and neighing steeds," the instrumental masses echo each other with more animation, and the voice parts tread upon each other's heels in uttering the same strong phrases, till the mind is filled with a bewildering yet harmonious image of general onslaught and confusion. The trumpets of course are not idle. The third is one of the finest and most impressive of Handel's choruses, although a short one. We quit the general battle for the sorrows of the private breast. The words are "Draw the tear from hopeless love."

It is in G minor, a Largo movement, for five voices (there being two sopranos); and as these roll in like wave upon wave at first, you are reminded somewhat of "Behold the Lamb" in the Messiah. The union of all the voices on the tonic chord at "Lengthen out the solemn air," with the long swell on the word "air," is sublime, and the abrupt modulations, diminished sevenths, etc., at "Full of death and wild despair," have the romantic character of modern music, and almost make one shudder. Finally, "to release the tortured soul," we have the air and chorus, in E flat, "Thus rolling surges rise." Also, a chorus for five voices, in one or another of which the rolling surge continually resounds with right hearty Handelian gusto.

The Levite, like Chorus in Greek Tragedies, chimes in with another bass air, in admiration of both "pious king and virtuous queen,"—an air after the usual pattern, now quavering through several bars on the first syllable of "glory," and now holding it at even height for the same space. This is not the only instance in Solomon where the original score furnishes nothing for the orchestra but first violin and bass parts. Robert Franz is greatly wanted to complete at least the quartet harmony.

No. 54. Recitative and air for tenor. Zadoc celebrates the splendors of the temple, and sings a melody ingeniously wedded to the words, with instrumental figures corresponding, "Golden columns fair and bright." Here the two violin parts are in unison, and the violas are divided into first and second.

No. 56. A magnificent double chorus of praise in D, with which the present performance fitly closes, without any sacrifice of unity or completeness. It is in fact the grandest chorus in the oratorio; simple and massive in its construction, offsetting chorus against chorus with striking effect, and only growing contrapuntal and complex toward the end. A very active figurative accompaniment heightens its brilliancy throughout. The work finds its real climax here. But Handel, writing for Englishmen, famed for strong stomachs and long programmes, must give heaped measure; and so Solomon must go on and sing of "green pastures," and all the outward signs of his most prosperous reign; and the queen must pray that peace may ever dwell in Salem; and there must be leave-taking and duet between Solomon and Sheba; and all this necessitates a supplementary, and on the whole superfluous finale,—another double chorus, "The name of the wicked," etc., which by no means caps the climax upon the preceding choruses, but is in fact less interesting than most of them.

As a whole, we may speak of Solomon as an oratorio which contains much of Handel's best music; but too long, wanting in unity, and unusually overloaded with long, level stretches of those conventional and ornate solos, which it requires the best of singers to lift into light and interest. The choruses are indeed wonderfully fine, and touch such various chords of human feeling that they might furnish a complete enough entertainment of themselves. The oratorio as here given is curtailed one-third. Why not curtail it even more! J. S. D.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LONDON.—"Cherubino," of the Figaro (April 7) says:

The announcements of the retirement of three leading English artists have followed quickly one upon the other. Mr. Sims Reeves, Madame Arabella Goddard, and Madame Lemmens-Sherrington represent names which for many years past have been potent in the musical world. The first as the leading English tenor, the second as the première English pianist and most faithful champion of English pianoforte music, and the third for many years the leading English soprano, the public will be sorry to lose any of them. But it is better to retire in the fulness of time, and before the physical decay which necessarily accompanies age has developed itself. It is interesting, too, to note that each artist hopes to leave behind a successor in the favor of the English public. Mr. Sims Reeves will bring forward Mr. Herbert Reeves, Madame Goddard has a son who is a poet, a musician, and a writer of great promise, while Madame Lemmens proposes to bring forward her two daughters.

The Crystal Palace concert of April 3, had the following programme:

Overture, "A midsummer night's dream" Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Wo berg' ich mich" ("Euryanthe") . . . Weber.
Herr Henschel.
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in F sharp (MS.) Parry.
(First time of performance.)
Mr. Dannreuther.
Scherzo, "Queen Mab" ("Romeo and Juliet") Berlioz.
Songs ("Die Winterreise") Schubert.
"Der Lindenbaum"
"Der Leiermann"
Herr Henschel.
Symphony No. 7, in A Beethoven.
Conductor, August Mauns.

Of Mr. Hubert Parry and his concerto, the Musical Standard says:

"He has already written a quartet for strings, a duet for pianoforte and violoncello, a trio for pianoforte and strings, a quartet for the same, a fantasia-sonata for piano and violin, and a duet for two pianos, all of which have been performed on various occasions. The works of this gentleman are distinguished alike for their individuality and spirit, and the work allotted to the principal instrument in this concerto, besides being clever in its arrangement, is of more than ordinary difficulty, requiring the experienced hands of M. Dannreuther, who on the whole did justice to the work, the band, of course, not being behindhand in their conscientious rendering of the orchestral part. The performance was but coldly received."

The twenty-second concert of the season consisted of the following:—

Symphony No. 8, in F Beethoven.
Recit., "Well hast thou told thy tale," and air, "Short and blissful" ("Hereward") . . . Prout.
Mr. Barton McGuckin.
"The willow song" ("Othello") Sullivan.
Miss Marian Mackenzie.
(Her first appearance at the Crystal Palace.)
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 1, in E flat Liszt.
Miss Anna Mehlig.
Songs, "Morgenlied" Rubinstein.
"The stormy spring" Mendelssohn.
Mr. Barton McGuckin.
Variations for strings, from the String Quartet in D minor Schubert.
Aria, "Quando a te lieta" ("Faust") Gounod.
Miss Marian Mackenzie.
Overture, "Di ballo" Sullivan.

Miss Bertha Mehlig was announced to make her debut at this concert as a pianist, but owing to the delay in her arrival in England the concerto for pianoforte and orchestra of Liszt's was substituted for the duet for two pianofortes, originally intended to be given. Miss Anna Mehlig's merits as a pianist are too well known to be dilated upon, and Liszt's rhapsodical composition was done full justice to by that talented young lady.

LIVERPOOL.—Two incidents are almost simultaneously reported by the Liverpool press, one of which is likely to give general satisfaction among lovers of music in this country; the other, quite the opposite. That Her Majesty the Queen should have granted out of the Civil List the annual pension of £100 to Mr. W. T. Best, organist of St. George's Hall, and one of the most practised living masters of an instrument in which Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, and other renowned composers took such ardent interest, will surprise none, while conciliating all; but the appointment of Herr Max Bruch to succeed Sir Julius Benedict as conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Concerts can please only those who prefer seeing a foreign candidate, whatever his bona fide pretensions, occupy a position in the disposal of which they may be able to exercise some control. With such people, no English musician, were he even another Sterndale Bennett, would have the remotest chance. The Liverpool Daily Post informs its readers that there were no fewer than thirty-seven aspirants for the place so long honorably filled by Sir Julius Benedict, who, though a foreigner by birth and descent, is a naturalized Englishman, and has spent nearly half a century of his artistic career in our midst. Among these "thirty-seven" were, doubtless, many native-born musicians, some of whom, it is not difficult to believe, could "qualify" for the post just as eminently as Herr Max Bruch, who, though accepted as a composer of unquestionable ability, has yet to be tested as a conductor. The same paper adds, "This appointment will, no doubt, give every satisfaction to members of the Society and to the musical community of Liverpool in general." There is some reason to doubt the assertion as concerning "the musical community in general," however it may apply to "members of the Society." In any case the decision of the Liverpool Philharmonic Committee is open to, and in fact is, the topic of wide comment. The Liverpool Post does not tell us whether Herr Bruch has accepted the offered appointment, and with it the under-stipulated conditions that he shall reside in Liverpool from September in one year to April in the next, and, moreover, "perform the duties of chorus-master," in addition to those hitherto appertaining to the office vacated by Sir Julius Benedict, who resided in London during the same period, and only went to Liverpool for the rehearsal and performance of each successive concert. Will Sir Julius's secession from the conductorship of the Norwich Festival induce the Committee of Management to offer the post to another foreigner? or will they, as staunch East Anglians, take example by the Leeds Festival Committee, equally staunch Yorkshiremen? The Leeds people have chosen for successor to Sir Michael Costa, an Englishman, in Dr. Arthur Sullivan, — composer, among many other things, of the music to Shakespeare's Tempest, The Prodigal Son, The Light of the World, The Sorcerer, H. M. S. Pinafore, and the now all-absorbing Pirates of Penzance — an adept in many styles, as all know, and gifted, with fair opportunity, to excel in the highest. It remains to be seen at what conclusion Norwich will arrive. — Graphic.

WIESBADEN. — The long talked-of meeting of the members — or at least of some, only thirty being in attendance — of the Baireuth Patrons' Association was held a short time since. It was resolved that the various Wagner Associations shall forthwith raise one million marks for the purpose of carrying out the "Master's" plans and desires, the "foundation of a School of Style at Baireuth and grand 'Festival Performances.'" As Wagner, who is at present in Naples, will probably not return to Baireuth till the summer is over, the meeting, by his express wish, arranged no performances for this year; but there is a prospect of symphonic performances, under Wagner's personal direction, being organized at Baireuth in 1881. Meanwhile, every effort is to be made for carrying out the resolution passed by the meeting, and a special committee was elected from among the members of the Patrons' Association, the members of the said committee being distributed among fourteen German cities.

FLORENCE. — A historical concert has recently been held at Florence, and the programme, if it be correct, is of sufficient interest to be detailed. The first item was, we are told, a prelude for the "aulos," an ancient Greek flute supposed to date 450 years before Christ. The next was a "Cossack dance" for "Dondka," and two "Balalaika." Next came a love song by Thibaut IV., King of Navarre 1201-1253, accompanied, we are told, by a harp of the time of the Troubadours. Next came a chorus, "Ludwig XII.," for four voices, by Joaquin de Prés, written in 1481; followed by a Venetian ariette, "La Farfalla," by Buzzola. Next came a symphony to the musical drama, "Sant' Alessio," by Landi Salvatore, dated 1834, for 8 Amati violins, 1 Goffuller violin, 1 Rugger violin, 1 Rugger viola da braccio, 1 Maggini viola alta, 1 Gaspare da Salò viola da gamba, 1 violin dated 1600, without name; 1 ancient harp, 1 archibutt by Aloysius Maroncini, and one clavichord by Cristofori. After an Andalusian song, the next item of the programme was the "Macbeth" music attributed to Matthew Lock, with an orchestra which included organ, flute, 2 oboes, 1 hautbois de chasse, a bassoon, viola, bass viol, a serpent, and a virginal. Airs by Mozart (from the "Nozze di Figaro") and Filippi were followed by a cantata dated 1652, by Michael Jacobi, of Brandenburg, for four voices, with accompaniment for a spinet, a czakan, 2 flutes, a bass flute, a cornet à bouquin, trumpet, violin, alto, viol de gamba, harp, cymbals, and organ. A Roumanian song, "S'a stins asa de lesne," by Canteclă, Romană, was followed by the "Marche des Mousquetaires du Roi de France," by Lully, dated 1677, and performed by 2 hautboys, a hunting hautboy, bassoon, serpent, and two drums. The air "Kathleen Mavourneen," for some reason or another, came next, and was followed by a duet from Rossini's "Zelmira," with accompaniment for cor anglais and harp; a choral students' song dated 1627, a canon for four voices by Martini, "Russische Jagdmusik," by Varschek, dated 1751, for 26 artists; and lastly, a Hungarian dance by Czardas, for Taigane orchestra. The concert was organized by Messrs. Kraus, of Florence, who possess one of the most remarkable collections of ancient musical instruments in the hands of any private persons.

PARIS. — Conservatoire (February 22): Symphony in F (Beethoven); Paternoster, unaccompanied chorus (Meyerbeer); Overture, "Gisour" (Th. Gorwy); Chorus from "Armiide" (Lulli); Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn). Concert Populaire (February 22): Symphony in D, No. 45 (Haydn); Offertory (Gounod); Violin Concerto (Beethoven); "Kernesse" (Godard); Overture, "Freischütz" (Weber). Châtelet Concert (February 22): Scotch Symphony (Mendelssohn); Fragments from Fourth Symphony (Tchaikowsky); Tarantelle for flute and clarinet (Saint-Saëns); Andante and variations from Sestet (Beethoven); "L'Arlésienne" (Bizet). Concert Populaire (February 29): Music to Goethe's "Faust" (Schumann). Châtelet Concert (February 29): Symphony, D minor (Beethoven); Second Violin Concerto (Max Bruch); Scènes Symphoniques (Dubois); Violin Suite (Raff); Fragments from "Dallia," (Ch. Lefevre); Danse espagnole (Sarasate); Overture, "Frances Juges" (Berlioz). Châtelet Concert (March 7): Symphonie fantastique (Berlioz); Divertissement from "Le Roi de Lahore" (Massenet); Concerto for Pianoforte (Marie Jaëll); Danse Macabre (Saint-Saëns); Overture, "La Forza del Destino" (Verdi). Conservatoire (March 14): Choral Symphony (Beethoven); Rondo and Bourrée from Suite in B minor (Bach); Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber). Concert Populaire (March 14): Symphony in A (Beethoven); "Wallenstein's Death," symphonic poem (d'Indy); Pianoforte Concerto, A minor (Schumann); Entracte from "Traviata" (Verdi); Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber). Châtelet Concert (March 14): "Le Tasse," Dramatic Symphony (B. Godard). Concert Populaire (March 21): Italian Symphony (Mendelssohn); Fragment from "Prometheus" (Beethoven); Concerto Romantique for violin (B. Godard); "L'Arlésienne" (Bizet); Overture, "Meistersinger" (Wagner). Châtelet Concert (March 21) "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz).

LEIPZIG. — The Committee of the Gewandhaus Concerts have invited German and Austrian architects to send in, before the 31st of next month, plans for a new concert-building. One prize of 3,000 and another of 2,000 marks will be awarded, respectively, to the best and the second-best plan. — At the Stadttheater, Ingeborg, by Paul Geisler, and Die Bürgermeisterin von Schondorf, by August Reissmann, are in active preparation, and will shortly be produced. It is intended to organise next season a cyclus of all Glück's operas, and there are good grounds for believing it will prove as successful as the Mozart Cyclus. On the 24th ult., there was a concert which derived especial lustre from the co-operation of Mad. Schuch-Proska and Mdle. Bianca Bianchi. By the side of these two ladies, Herr Robert Fischhoff, the young pianist, well-known as prize-crowned pupil of the Vienna Conservatory, held his ground with distinguished honor. He performed compositions by Chopin and Liszt. The local critics praise him for his excellent technical training and for already possessing so ripe an intellect that great hopes may be built on the further career of his eminent talent. He proceeded from this place to Berlin, with the object of giving concerts there.

COLOGNE. — The fifty-seventh Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine, under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller, will be held here at Whitsuntide. The following is the programme, as definitely settled: First day: Overture, Zur Weihe des Hauses (Beethoven), and Israel in Egypt (Handel). Second day: Symphony, No. 8 (Beethoven), Andante for String-Band (Haydn); Die Nacht, for solo, chorus and orchestra (Hiller); Pianoforte Concerto (Schumann), played by Mad. Clara Schumann; and "Whitsuntide Cantata" (S. Bach). Third day: Overture to Genoveva (Schumann); Symphony in A minor (Mendelssohn); Violin Concerto (Beethoven), played by Herr Joachim; Overture to Der Freischütz, and sundry vocal solos. In addition to the two eminent artists already named, Mad. Marcella Sembrich, of the Theatre Royal, Dresden; Mdle. Adele Asman, of Berlin; M. Henrik Westberg, of Copenhagen; and Dr. Kraus, of this place are engaged. A new and unpublished Requiem, for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, by Herr Theodor Gouvy, was recently performed, under the composer's own direction, at a concert of the Church-Music Association. A second performance took place a few days subsequently.

MADAME CLARA SCHUMANN is preparing a new and complete edition of the works of her deceased husband, as also a biography, enriched by the literary remains of that great composer in the shape of letters, criticisms, essays, etc., (hitherto not made known). Such a publication, coming from such a source, is sure of a hearty and unanimous welcome. — Graphic.

SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1880.

THE FIFTH TRIENNIAL FESTIVAL.

It was a most brilliant, grand, impressive opening on Tuesday evening. It is safe to say that the general voice of one of the largest and most cultivated audiences ever assembled in the Music Hall pronounces it by far the most perfect presentation of St. Paul — or perhaps of any oratorio — that we have ever had in Boston. And that is almost tantamount to saying that, in many important respects, it came very near the mark of a model performance. It surely did so in the chorus work. The chorus seats were full, and the five hundred voices (one hundred and sixty-two sopranos, one hundred and forty-four altos, ninety-seven tenors and one hundred and thirty-six basses) were animated with one spirit and in admirable training, so that all went promptly and decidedly, with rich and musical ensemble, and sensitively obedient to the conductor's bâton in all points of light and shade. This is equally true of the sublime choruses: "Lord, thou alone art God," "O great is the depth," "The nations are now the Lord's;" of the broad, smooth, richly-harmonized chorales, (which, though they may not show an equal polyphonic genius with that of Bach, are clearly modelled after him, and very happily, especially in the two to which Mendelssohn has given a figurative orchestral accompaniment); of the sweet and lovely choruses, "Happy and blest," and "How lovely are the messengers;" of the fierce, fanatical, vindictive outbursts of the Jews: "Stone him to death," etc. (also after Bach, — those turba in the Passion Music); of the sensuous, light-hearted, flute-accompanied choruses of the Greeks; and of such expressions of pious, tearful tenderness as: "Far be it from thy path." If there were a few shortcomings anywhere, they are lost in the abiding memory of a glorious whole, just as in any great mass of instruments and voices many slight discords, necessarily existing, are practically swallowed up in the vast volume of tone waves. Possibly, to be very critical, the addition of a dozen or more good ringing tenors would have made the balance still more perfect.

Equal praise belongs in candor to the orchestra. Rarely, if ever, have we heard a more efficient body of seventy instruments. The noble overture, built on the groundwork of a chorale — a complete work in itself, as shown in two of the Harvard concerts — came out with splendid life and energy; and the accompaniments were always delicate or brilliant, as the case required, always clear and sensitively true. The violin force, with Bernhard Listemann at the head, was of the honest, telling kind. The contra-fagotto, rather a stranger to our concerts, made its presence felt. The reeds and flutes were sweet and true, and the brass, for which Mendelssohn gives splendid opportunities in St. Paul, rang out with refreshing and exhilarating challenge: "Rise up, arise!" "Sleepers, awake," etc. Nor must we, in speaking of the accompaniment, forget the great organ, whose participation here and there, under the skillful hands of Mr. Lang, was very noticeable, and helped greatly to bring out the full intention of the composer. We understand that he had taken pains to procure from Germany Mendelssohn's full organ score, and that we heard it for the first time on this occasion.

The principal solo singers, both in recitative and song, proved equal to their exacting tasks. The limpid, lovely quality of Miss Thursby's pure and flexible soprano voice, with her finished, tasteful, refined execution, fitted her well for the music. Her recitative was clear, artistic and expressive, and her rendering of the great aria: "Jerusalem" and of that fresh and fragrant little melody, the Arioso: "I will sing of Thy great mercies," was delightful. Miss Thursby's singing is that of a bird-like, happy, child-like nature, not a deep one; she was not made for a grand singer, but surely for a most charming one. Miss Winant's rich and soulful contralto told to excellent advantage in the little that it had to do. In the fine aria: "The Lord is mindful of his own," she sang with true and tender feeling, and was most heartily applauded. Mr. M. W. Whitney, our great basso, always to be relied upon, always dignified and large in style, and of consummate ease and steadiness in execution, acquitted himself nobly, as he always does; but he hardly rose to the inspiration of which he has shown himself capable sometimes; there was a certain heaviness which needed to be lifted by the buoyant soul within.

The chief honors were borne off by Mr. Charles R. Adams. For once he was entirely himself again, his voice free from huskiness, and he improved the auspicious opportunity to show himself the noble artist that he is. Those who heard him this time, can readily believe that this Boston singer has held the position of principal tenor for seven years in the Imperial Opera at Vienna. In the recitative, of which he had by far the largest portion, he was admirable. The voice rang out clear, large, sweet and musical; his declamation was of the most positive and manly character, and his enunciation simply perfect. When it came to the great aria: "Be thou faithful until death," he rose to something like true inspiration; the effect was magical; every tone contained a wealth of fervor and of beauty, and the applause knew no bounds. The only drawback with Mr. Adams (when he is in such voice) is that, like most possessors of fine natural voices, he became a singer before becoming a musician; this was felt in several slips in the concerted pieces.

On the beauty and the grandeur of the Oratorio itself we need not enlarge here, having already expressed our opinion of it (very imperfectly to be sure) as one of the noblest monuments of this form of Art-work, superior in some respects even to Elijah, in the "Notes" appended to the book of programmes.

We have recorded a most auspicious opening of the festival. And here we are stopped at the threshold by the call to "go to press," leaving the six remaining concerts for more retrospective notice. When this appears but two more will be left for those who may be fortunate enough to procure seats at the eleventh hour. This afternoon, a miscellaneous concert, including two very noble and fresh, but short choral works, namely: Handel's Utrecht Jubilate, and a sublime Quartet and Chorus by Sebastian Bach; besides a liberal anthology of vocal solos, none of them hackneyed, exhibiting each of the principal vocalists in things of their own choice. Finally, tomorrow (Sunday) evening, Handel's Oratorio of Solomon, which has not been heard here for twenty-five years, with Miss Thursby, Miss Fanny Kellogg, Miss Annie Cary, Mr. Courtney and Mr. John F. Winch, as soloists.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE CECILIA. — The first performance here of Schumann's Manfred music, in the third concert of the season (April 24), intrinsically considered, was a musical event second to no other of the year past. Intrinsically, we say, for doubtless there have been some things more exciting to the public curiosity and more widely appreciated. But the Manfred music is a thoroughly genial and original creation, fully worthy of the noble, although gloomy poem of Lord Byron, to which it is wedded. Every measure of the composition is full of beauty, while it reveals the deep sympathy of the (sick) musician with the morbid, introspective, misanthropic mood of the poet. In spite of its monstrous plot, the poem is full of poetic inspiration, and in spite of its faithful illustration of the text, the music is most musical and full of exquisite enchantment. You cannot say that of much of the audacious and astounding "programme music" now in vogue.

The few purely instrumental numbers of Manfred, which had been heard in several seasons of the Harvard Symphony Concerts, had prepared many of the audience to expect a rare treat from the whole work. These were: first, the wonderful overture, entirely sui generis, and inspired with the very mood and genius of Manfred — one of the most remarkable overtures ever composed, — and yet, while so true, so holding the listener spell-bound to its mood, at the same time so beautiful, so glowing with at once the passion and repose of art; and then, by way of soft relief and sympathy with Nature's cheerfulness, the Entr'acte and the fairy-like accompaniment to the Invocation of the Witch of the Alps. These were finely executed by the orchestra, obedient to the baton of Mr. Lang, whose re-appearance after a severe attack of illness was the signal for hearty congratulation.

All besides these three pieces consists partly of a few short songs and choruses of spirits, and partly of melodrama, the orchestra furnishing a most delicate, suggestive, graphic accompaniment to a reading of portions of the text (this time by Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, who acquitted himself of the difficult task with good judgment, dignity and taste). The short songs of the four spirits (see article on our first page) were well delivered by Miss Ella M. Abbott, Mrs. C. C. Noyes, Mr. B. L. Knapp, and Mr. A. F. Arnold. We can hardly conceive of a more lovely, soulful melody than that sung by the violins, etc., to No. 2, the Appearance of a Beautiful Female Figure, with its delicate, breath-catching, syncopated accompaniment. Then come the four bass voices in the dark and heavy music of the Incantation, which is very impressive. But the cloud is almost immediately lifted by the scene of the Chamois Hunter, and the melody of the Ranz-des-Vaches, played on the English horn (very beautifully by M. de Ribas). The contrast of its two tunes, one a musing, melancholy strain, the other a light, merry dance, is delightful, and recalls all the pastoral fascination of the Alps.

Part II. opens with the Entr'acte and the Witch of the Alps piece already mentioned; so that the whole middle portion of the work is sweet and light and graceful. And now we are transported to the dark abode of Ahriman and evil spirits. Their hymn before their master's throne forms the most imposing chorus in the work, for first and second soprano, alto, tenor and bass. It has a gloomy and appalling grandeur, and it is a relief when the spirit of Astarte, Manfred's beloved, is summoned up, with a like tender melodramatic accompaniment to that of the former "beautiful female" apparition. The musical conception (purely instrumental) of the whole interview is exquisite.

Part III. The Faust-like soliloquy of Manfred in his chamber, his address to the setting sun, his dialogue with the abbot, the grim apparition of the fateful spirit who comes to summon him away, is all made as expressive musically as a few sparing touches of melodramatic art can make it. The concluding cloister choruses, Requiem and Et lux perpetua are Schumann's arbitrary addition to Byron's poem; but musically they are very beautiful and church-like in style and feeling, and they are very short. We must congratulate Mr. Lang and the Cecilia, and Mr. Ticknor, upon the excellent presentation of so difficult a work.

Whatever of gloom and depression the poetry and music of the Manfred left upon the audience was happily relieved by the short, and for the most part hopeful, joyful music of Max Bruch's cantata, Fair Ellen, of which the chorus work was rich and euphonious, and the solos were well sung by Miss Abbott and Dr. Bullard.

EUTERPE. — The fifth and last Chamber Concert of the second season took place at Mechanics' Hall on Thursday evening, April 22. In the expectation, probably, of larger things looming on the musical horizon, the attendance was not as numerous as usual. But the programme was one of the most inviting and rewarding of the season; and the interpretation, by the Beethoven Quintette Club (Messrs. Allen, Dannreuther, Henry Heindl, Rietzel and Wulf Fries) was equal, if not superior, to any we have had this winter. The programme offered two works of the first order: Cherubini's first Quartet, in E flat, and Mozart's Quintet in G minor.

The Cherubini Quartet was indeed refreshing after the many years during which we have not been allowed to hear it. It is a masterly work in all respects, whether of technique or poetic inspiration; full of melody, full of light, and symmetry, and progressive interest, and thoroughly plastic in form, the author's rare contrapuntal skill being always subservient to spontaneous expression. The first movement (Introductory Adagio and Allegro agitato) is a very clear, square, wholesome, vigorous and satisfactory piece of work. The Larghetto is remarkable for the richness and variety of its contents, always kept close to one leading theme which dominates the whole. It is a quaint, pregnant, and enticing theme of considerable length. Light and airy variations follow, the 'cello keeping silence, but evidently thinking very earnestly, for finally he breaks out in loud, angry running passages, carrying the tenor along with him, as much as to say to his comrades; "Enough of this dilettante toying with a noble theme! let us have earnest work." From this point the four-part development grows richer and more complex to the end. One of the variations forms a subdued and mystical sort of organ interlude, after which the figurative bass leads off again with double energy. The Scherzo, a bewitchingly light and lifesome movement, shows that Mendelssohn was not the first to overhear the fairies. The Finale (Allegro assai) is kindred with the opening Allegro, and rounds the Quartet to a symmetrical and brilliant close. We trust that we shall hear this Quartet oftener in future, and its two sisters likewise. Still more enchanting was the much more familiar G minor Quintet of Mozart, as happy an inspiration, and as flawless a model in one kind, as is his G minor Symphony in another. It requires no description. Enough to say that it was nicely and artistically played.

Mr. B. J. Lang's Two Concerts, at Mechanics' Hall (April 1, and 29,) filled every seat with eager listeners. The first programme opened with a repetition of the Trio in G minor by Hans von Bronsart, which excited so much interest last year. Mr. Lang had associated with him in its performance, Mr. C. N. Allen, violin, and Wulf Fries, 'cello. The interpretation lacked nothing of spirit or discrimination, and the impression which the work before made of nerve, originality and power was confirmed. The opening Allegro is intense and passionate; the Scherzo (Vivace), not in three-four measure, has a quaint, frolic humor; the Adagio has solemnity and grandeur, rather closely resembling Chopin's funeral march in the beginning; and the Finale (Allegro agitato), though more conventional, is vigorous and effective.

Next followed a flowery chain of ten short songs, sung as one number by Mr. George L. Osgood. These were, three by Schumann: "Der Himmel hat eine Thräne geweint," "Warum willst du Andere fragen," and "Rose, Meer und Sonne;" three by Schubert: "Barcarolle," "Dass sie hier gewesen," and "Wohin" (Brook Song); three by Robert Franz: "Die Harrende," "Sterne mit den gold'nen Füßchen," and the Serenade; one by Rubinstein: "As sings the lark in ether blue." They are all delicate and charming songs, and Mr. Osgood sang very sweetly, with great refinement of expression, only too continually sotto voce, so that at times it seemed but the delicate shadow of a voice; yet no one better knows how to let each song breathe forth its own peculiar life.

A Sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 32, by Saint-Saëns, was played for the first time by Mr. Fries and Mr. Lang. It is a clear, musician-like work in three movements, but has not left any marked impression which we can recall. But what woke us all up to new life, dispelling all possibility of doubt about its genial excellence and beauty, was the Concerto of Bach for four pianofortes, with string accompaniment, given for the first time in America. It consists of three short movements: Moderato, Largo, and Allegro. The four pianos were played by Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Sherwood, Mr. J. C. D. Parker, and Mr. Lang; and they did it con amore. It is wonderfully interesting, not merely for its contrapuntal skill and learning, but for its fresh ideal beauty. After a number of long compositions of which one hardly knows whether he likes them or not, commend us to a work like this!

Mr. Lang's second programme was as follows:

Quartet, No. 7, Op. 192, No. 2 Joachim Raff.
The Miller's Pretty Daughter, a cycle of tone-poems.
The Youth—Allegretto
The Mill—Allegro.
The Miller's Daughter—Andante quasi adagietto.
Unrest—Allegro.
Proposal—Andantino quasi allegretto.
For the Nuptial Eve—Vivace.
Messrs. Bernhard Listemann, F. Listemann, T. Mullaly, and A. Heindl.

Songs. "Mio caro bene" Handel.
"Stimme der Liebe" Schubert.
"Im Abendroth" "
"Im Mai" Op. 11, No. 3 Franz.
"Liebesbotschaft" Schubert.
"Am leuchtenden Sommermorgen" Franz.
"Au Cimetière" Saint-Saëns.
"Klinge mein Pandero" Jensen.
"Be not so coy, beloved child" Rubinstein.
"Der Lenz" Lassen.
Mr. Wm. J. Winch.

Piano-forte and String Quintet, Op. 30, B flat, (first time).
Goldmark.
Allegro vivace—Adagio—Scherzo—Allegro vivace.
Messrs. B. Listemann, F. Listemann, J. C. Mullaly, A.
Heindl and B. J. Lang.

We cannot say that Raff's "Schöne Müllerin" Quartet, played here once before in a Euterpe concert, improved much on acquaintance. Not because it is a "programme" Quartet, and not constructed on the classical model, but because most of the music of its six movements, or its cycle of six pieces, in spite of passages both sweet and passionate, seemed to us feebly sentimental and not seldom dreary; it lacked the wholesome stimulus of good sound music; its sentiment seemed artificial. But many liked it, and we may be wrong.

Mr. Winch was in excellent voice and sang with fervor, with artistic finish, and with fine expression. Especially happy was he in the Handel arias. The two by Schubert were particularly delicate and lovely, and the two by Franz were like fresh little wildflowers of melody, set in charming accompaniment, as nature sets her flowers amid exquisite surroundings. These were all delicate and tender; but a stronger breeze sprang up in the songs by Rubinstein, to die down again to a dead level in the "Cemetery" air by Saint-Saëns.

The new Quintet by Goldmark has much to interest one in the two middle movements, at least; but those who liked the Raff thing much, appear to have been but indifferently pleased with this. We will not judge without another hearing.

Several more concerts await notice.

IN PROSPECT. After the absorbing Festival one willingly rests from music for a few days; but the season is by no means over. The next event of interest will be the postponed performance (for the first time in Boston) of Berlioz's Damnation de Faust, under the direction of Mr. B. J. Lang. This will be next Friday evening, May 14, at the Boston Music Hall. With the fine orchestra of 60, the select chorus of 220 mixed voices, and such soloists as Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, and Mr. Schlesinger, and after fresh rehearsal, it cannot fail to be a success.

On Saturday evening (15th), the accomplished young pianist, Mr. John A. Preston, will give a concert in Mechanics' Hall. Besides piano solos from the works of Dvorak (new) and Schumann, Mr. Preston will play, with Messrs. Dannreuther and Wulf Fries, a new Trio by the Russian composer Náprávník, and Mr. Wm. J. Winch will contribute several songs.

Next comes, to the delight of lovers of pianoforte music, Herr Joseffy, with the charming violinist Adamowski. They will give three concerts, in the Music Hall, on Monday and Tuesday evenings, May 17 and 18, and on Saturday afternoon, May 22. The first programme offers the E-flat Trio, Op. 100, by Schubert; Violin Solos: Scherzo by Spohr, and Cavatina by Raff; Piano Solo: Schumann's Kriesleriana; Songs without Words by Mendelssohn, and "Venezia Napoli," (Turandotta) by Liszt; "Kreutzer" Sonata; piano and violin, Beethoven. The second includes a piano and 'cello Sonata by Rubinstein; Trio in G, Haydn; violin solo, "Zigeuner Weisen," by Sarasate; for piano solos: Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," and smaller things by Scarlatti, Kirnberger, Field, Schubert and Joseffy; finally, the great Schumann Quintet, Op. 44. The third concert will open with a Quartet, in A, for piano and strings, by Mozart, and end with Hummel's Septet with all the instruments. There will also be the Saint-Saëns Variations for two pianos on a theme by Beethoven, and a Romance for violin by Saint-Saëns. Herr Joseffy's piano solos will include the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, a Passepied and a Gavotte, by Bach, and five characteristic pieces by Liszt, — certainly a tempting programme of the whole!

Max Bruch's Odyseus is to be repeated by the Cecilia, with orchestra, on the evening of May 24. Dates of concerts of the Apollo and the Boylston Clubs will be found in our Calendar.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BALTIMORE, April 19. — The Seventh Peabody Symphony Concert, on the 10th inst., presented the following programme:—

a. Symphony, A minor. The "Scotch." Mendelssohn.
b. Piano-Concerto, G. minor. No. 1 Work 26.
(Madame Nannette Falk-Auerbach.)
Song, with piano (Mignon) Fr. Liszt.
"A wondrous thing 't must be indeed."
(Miss Elisa Baraldi.)
Overture to the Danish drama "Eldn Hill."
Work 100 Fr. Kuhlau.

On last Saturday the last of the seventeen Chamber Concerts was given, with the following programme:—
String Quartet, F major. Work 1.

Edwin A. Jones, ex-Student.
Allegro con trio.—Adagio.—Appassionato.—Scherzo, presto.
—Finale: Largo; Fuga, allegro vivace.
(Messrs. Fincke, Allen, Schaefer, and Jungnickel.)

Mignon. Song with piano Fr. Liszt.
(Miss Mary Kelly, student of the Conservatory, first year.)
Spring Song, from the opera The Valkyrie, R. Wagner.
(Mr. H. Glass, student of the Conservatory, first year.)
Piano Quartet, G. minor. No. 1. Mozart.
For piano, violin, viola and 'cello.
(Miss Esther Murdoch, student of the Conservatory, second year, Messrs. Fincke, Schaefer, and Jungnickel.)

The quartet by Mr. Jones, which was played here for the second time in public, is a work containing much that is highly creditable to the application of the young composer. We cannot, of course, expect to find anything strikingly original in the Opus No. 1 of a young composer; and Mr. Jones's maiden effort does not afford anything strikingly original. But in melodious and harmonic treatment, and in the artistically wrought fuga in the last movement, it must be put down as a work that interests and holds the attention of the listener throughout. The Adagio appassionato, although a very pleasing movement, is not what its name would lead us to expect, and the Scherzo is Haydn all over. The closing movement, however, is a piece of work with which the composer may well be satisfied. The whole denotes correct theoretical study and careful treatment.

Mr. Jones, who is an ex-student of the Peabody Conservatory, is, I believe, a Bostonian by birth, and left here some months ago to take up his residence in Boston. C. F.

MAY 3. — The season of Symphony concerts closed on the 24th ult., at the Peabody Institute, with the following programme:

Symphony C minor, No. 1. Work 5. Niels W. Gade.
Songs with piano. Ch. Gounod.
Le Vallon.—Le Soir.—O ma belle Rebelle.—Au Printemps.
Miss Elisa Baraldi.
a. Concert-Romance D. Work 27. [For violoncello and orchestra] Ager Hamerik.
Mr. R. Green.

b. Jewish Trilogy. Work 19. For orchestra. Composed in Paris. Overture.—Lamento.—Sinfonia trionfale.

The novelty of the evening was Mr. Hamerik's 'cello Romance, one of the few compositions for that instrument that are within the grasp of every 'cello player of any pretensions, and at the same time sufficiently scientific to make them interesting to the musician. The theme is simple and pleasing and the instrumentation is done in the most charming manner. On Monday evening the "Liederkrantz" choral society gave a complete and quite successful rendering of Haydn's Creation to a large and much delighted audience.

The Peabody chorus class, which has been under training during the season by Professor Fritz Fincke, the new vocal instructor, appeared in a concert at the Institute on Saturday last. The selections embraced the choruses "Come gentle spring" and "The heavens are telling" from Haydn's Seasons and Creation; an Ave verum from Mozart (sung alla capella) and the "Hallelujah" chorus from the Messiah. The balance of the programme was made up of recitatives and arias from the Creation and the Messiah, sung by Miss Antonia Henne, Miss Henrietta Hunt, and Mr. Franz Remmert; and the overture and pastorale from the Messiah, played by the Peabody string orchestra, who also supported the choruses in the selections named above. The work accomplished by Professor Fincke with the voices at the Peabody Conservatory during one short season is very surprising; and on Saturday he had an opportunity not only of showing his skill as a chorus director, but also gave evidence of his ability in handling an orchestra hastily brought together and with very little time at command for rehearsing. Mr. Fincke has done a great deal of good here during the past winter by his active interest in our choral societies, and by infusing much life and energy into chorus music generally, through his example as director of the Peabody choir and Wednesday club chorus class. His efforts will doubtless bear good fruits by encouraging a more lively interest in oratorio music next season.

A fitting close to this letter will be a résumé of the works produced at the Peabody Institute during the season, both at the Symphony and at the Student's Concerts.

CHICAGO, April 30, 1880. — Our musical season is quickly passing away, and the attention of all those interested in music is being called to Cincinnati and Boston, where the great festivals are to be given. A number of our representative musical people will go to these festivals from this city, and in the mean time our own season will come to an early close. Since my last letter to the Journal, we have had the pleasure of hearing the following fine programmes of pianoforte music from Mr. William H. Sherwood, the pianist, of your city.

PROGRAMME I.

1. Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue Bach.
(Arranged by H. v. Bülow.)
2. Adante and Variations, F minor Haydn.
3. Fantasia, C major, (Dedicated to Liszt.) Op. 17 Robert Schumann.
a. Durchaus phantastisch und leidenschaftlich,
b. Massig, durchaus energisch,
c. Sehr langsam, durchweg leise zu halten.
4. "La Fileuse," Op. 157, No. 2 Joachim Raff.
5. Barcarolle, No. 4, G major Rubinstein.
Serenade, D minor, Op. 93
Valse Caprice, E flat
"Eine Faust Ouverture."
(Arranged by von Bülow.)
- a. "Spinnerlied," (from "Flying Dutchman"), Wagner.
"Lohengrin's Verweis auf Elsa,"
"Isolde's Love-death," (Finale of "Trestan & Isolde"),
"March from "Tannhäuser," (Arranged by Liszt.)

PROGRAMME II.

1. Grand Organ Fantasia and Fugue, G minor Bach.
(Piano arrangement by Liszt.)
2. "Loure," G major (arr. from 3d V'cello suite,) Bach.
3. Eight Etudes Chopin.
Op. 10, No. 4, C sharp minor, (Allegro con fuoco),
Op. 10, No. 3, E major, (Lento ma non troppo),
Op. 25, No. 8, D flat major, (In sixths),
Op. 25, No. 7, C sharp minor, (Adagio Sostenuto),
Op. 10, No. 5, G flat major, (on the black keys),
Op. 25, No. 10, B minor, (Legato octaves),
Op. 10, No. 11, E flat major, (Arpeggio chords),
Op. 10, No. 12, E minor (left hand study), (Allegro con fuoco.)
4. Nocturne, A major, No. 4 Field.
"Erotron," Op. 44,
"Non per libidine, ma per gentilezza di cuore," (Leonardo Bruni, Vita di Dante.)
5. No. 1. "Kassandra." "Mein Buhle war erl und er hat mich sehr geliebt!" Adolf Jensen.
(Aeschylus, Agamemnon 1116.)
No. 2. Die Zäuberin, (The Enchantress.)
6. Etudes Symphoniques, Op. 13. Robert Schumann.
(Theme, XII Variations, and Finale.)

PROGRAMME III.

1. Sonate Pathétique, Op. 13 Beethoven.
2. "Ballade, A flat Op. 47. Chopin.
Nocturne, F sharp Op. 15,
Grande Polonaise, A flat Op. 53.

3. Prelude and Fugue, No. 3, C sharp major, Bach.
(Well Tempered Clavichord.)
Loure, from 3d V'cello suite, G. major.
4. Trois Moments Musicaux, Op. 7. Moritz Moszkowski.
No. 1, B major,
No. 2, C sharp minor,
No. 3, F sharp major.
5. Aus dem Volksleben, Op. 19 Edward Grieg.
No. 1, Auf den Bergen, (on the Mountains),
No. 2, "Norwegian Bridal Party passing by,"
No. 3, Aus dem Carneval.
6. "Waldeuschen," (Forest Murmurs), Liszt.
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsodie.

The task of playing three such programmes will be appreciated by any pianist or cultured amateur that glances over them. It is a great pleasure for us to have yearly visits from Mr. Sherwood; for the example of his fine playing is enough to incite a healthy emulation among our home pianists. The benefit to pupils of such artistic interpretations as Mr. Sherwood gives, is beyond calculation. Our home players realize this, and many a fine teacher has insisted upon his class attending the recitals of this artist. In the first place, Mr. Sherwood shows the student what lovely tones can be produced from the pianoforte when under the management of skillful hands. The tone is never forced, nor is sensationalism indulged in, simply to produce an effect. It is honest work, manifesting the ideas of a sincere musician. Art seems to be a controlling influence, and the feeling of a soul attuned to music, is manifested in all he does with his instrument. He will make it ring in very tenderness through a dreamy nocturne of Chopin's, or become heroic and grand in the polonaise, while in the Etudes Symphoniques of Schumann, a majestic power is manifested that lifts the hearer into the influence of the sublime. To the pianoforte student the advantages derived by listening understandingly to such artistic playing as Mr. Sherwood's are of more value than a number of lessons from a good teacher. For while we have a large number of careful and fine instructors in the land, the number of pianists who can play as grandly as Mr. Sherwood is small the world over. As I watch the improvement made by this gentleman, year by year, I can but realize that if the opportunity for practice, and development, is afforded him, that he will rank with the greatest pianists in the world, even with the most famous of our day. He is young and earnest, and by his early mastery of his instrument has shown his talent, and I have no doubt that in a few years his artistic playing will win for him a world-wide reputation. The great need no favors from the public, they command recognition by the very force of their powers. So I think it will be with Mr. Sherwood, if a fitting opportunity is given him for development. I know that no American pianist has the rank in the public favor that Mr. Sherwood holds in our city to-day. And he won his hold upon us by simply manifesting his artistic skill as a highly intelligent pianist; one who plays from the heart.

On Tuesday evening last, the Germania Männerchor gave a testimonial concert to Mr. Belatka, their conductor. They had an orchestra of fifty men, and the chorus numbered one hundred voices. Miss Helene Belatka, and Mr. Schultze were the solo vocalists. The programme contained the symphony in B flat, of Schumann; "Becked at Sea," for chorus and orchestra, by Fisher; Aria from the Magic F Ciete, Mozart, sung by Miss Belatka; selections from opera of "Armin," Hoffmann; Andante and variations, from Grand Septuor, Beethoven; scene from Tannhäuser, for chorus solos, and orchestra; "Cujus Animam," Rossini, sung by Mr. Schultze; and the Grand Finale to Rienzi, of Wagner. At a glance one may see that the selections were ambitious. In many respects this society has made great headway, and in others it has much to learn. Its conductor tries to bring out good music, and the works of the new school are studied most enthusiastically. In this note it is impossible to more than mention the concert, and to wish the society that success that merit deserves.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

CINCINNATI. As the Triennial Boston Festival goes out, the Biennial Cincinnati Festival comes in. It will be held for four days, May 18, 19, 20 and 21. Theodore Thomas will direct it. The chorus will be very large, the orchestra much larger than we have had here. The programme is rich and varied, containing one famous work of prime importance never yet heard in this country: the great Missa Solenne, in D, of Beethoven; also a novelty that will excite much interest, the prize composition of Mr. Dudley Buck. Here is the programme in full, with the exception of the three matinees:

FIRST NIGHT.

Cantata, "Ein feste Burg," Bach.
(Adapted for performance by Theodore Thomas.)
Miss Annie B. Norton, Miss Annie Louise Cary, Signor Italo Campanini, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Chorus, Orchestra, Organ.
Symphony, C major (Jupiter), Mozart.
Jubilate, Handel.
(Adapted for performance by Robert Frasn.)
Miss Annie Louise Cary, Mr. Fred Harvey, Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

SECOND NIGHT.

Mass Solenne, D major, op. 123, Beethoven.
Sopranos: Miss Amy Sherwin, Miss Annie B. Norton.
Altos: Miss Annie Louise Cary, Miss Emma Cranch.
Tenors: Signor I. Campanini, Mr. Harvey.
Basses: Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, Mr. Myron W. Whitney.
Chorus: Orchestra, Organ.
Symphony, D minor, op. 120, Schumann.

THIRD NIGHT.

Overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini.
Aria,
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Symphony, No. 5, C minor, op. 67, Beethoven.
The Tower of Babel, Rubinstein.
(Sacred opera in one act.)
Signor Campanini, Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Chorus, Orchestra, Organ.

FOURTH NIGHT.

Scenes from Longfellow's "Golden Legend."
(Prize composition.)
Miss Annie B. Norton, Mr. Fred Harvey, Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, Chorus, Organ, Orchestra.
Overture, King Lear, op. 4, Berlioz.
"Die Goetterdaemmerung," Act Third, Wagner.
(Scene I. The Rhine Daughters; Siegfried. Scene II. Siegfried; Hagen; Gunther; Warriors.)
Miss Amy Sherwin, Miss Annie B. Norton, Miss Emma Cranch, Signor Italo Campanini, Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, Mr. Myron W. Whitney, and others.
Zadok, the Priest, Coronation Anthem, Handel
Chorus, Orchestra, and Organ.

The sale of season tickets is said to have been enormous, having yielded, up to Saturday before last, $32,000, of which over $7,000 was for premiums at auction sales. Over 2,500 seats had been secured for the season, and the prospect was that the total receipts would reach $75,000. The orchestra will be on the following grand scale: First violins, 26; second do., 26; violas, 20; violoncellos, 19; double basses, 18; harps, 4; flutes, 4; oboes, 4; English horn, 1; clarinets, 4; bass clarinet, 1; bassoons, 3; contra bassoons, 1; horns, 8; cornets, 2; bass trumpet, 1; trumpets, 2; tenor trombones, 3; bass trombone, 1; tuba, 1; drums, cymbals, etc. Total, 155.

It was a most agreeable surprise to many musical people gathered at a Handel and Haydn rehearsal, a couple of weeks ago, to recognize the genial face of Beethoven's biographer, our old friend Alexander W. Thayer, who has returned on a short leave of absence from his laborious post of duty as American Consul at Trieste. He has held that place for sixteen years, and now the poor state of his health, compelling the suspension of the fourth and last volume of his Beethoven, is what leads him to seek rest and recreation among his old friends at home. Everywhere he is most cordially welcomed; he was for years a member of the Handel and Haydn Society, and probably no one has more keenly enjoyed the festival than Mr. Thayer. He speaks enthusiastically of our chorus-singing compared with most that he has heard in Berlin, Vienna and other German cities. In Trieste, of course, he lives in musical banishment almost.

Madame Constance Howard, the pianist, of New York, who was heard here with interest in one of Mme. Cappiani's concerts, and who is highly commended by Mr. W. H. Sherwood, has recently played at Andover, Mass., in three Piano Recitals under the direction of Mr. S. M. Downs. In one of these, Mme. Howard played the A-minor Prelude and Fugue by Bach in Liszt's arrangement; the Beethoven Sonata, "Les Adieux," etc.; the Finale to Schumann's Etudes symphoniques; the Cracoviak of Chopin, with second piano accompaniment, besides many smaller selections from Chopin, Schumann, Rubinstein, Silas and Kullak. It takes an artist to do all this.

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO LORD BYRON'S "MANFRED."

FROM THE GERMAN OF PAUL GRAF WALDERSEE.

We descend now into the nether world,—into the hall of Ahriman. He sits on his throne, a ball of fire; the spirits sing a hymn to him.

When the spirits of the lower world offer a hymn of praise to their master, heaven and earth tremble. To make this palpable to sense required the unfolding of great tone masses. Accordingly, the orchestra is strengthened by instruments of brass and of percussion, and this mightily resounding body is united with the singing chorus. Reproduction of the text in the garb of musical thought frequently suggests itself; for example, at the words: "And a tempest shakes the sea." Illustration of the text through a peculiar tone color may perhaps be recognized in the entrance of the tuba, when the chorus sings: "His shadow is the Pestilence." In the voice parts great animation is reached by the rapid setting in of one part after another in free imitation. The total impression which this hymn produces is a powerful one. It is not the quantitative mass of the resounding material that takes hold of us; it is the grandiose plan on which it is laid out, and the broadly painted working out of the idea, that draws us within its magic spell.

The Paræ and Nemesis appear, on their part also, showing their allegiance to Ahriman. Then Manfred enters. In the ensuing dialogue, in which the spirits try to compel him to bend the knee before Ahriman and worship him, the chorus mingles twice more,—episodes of a few bars, expressive of the rage that has taken possession of the spirits that an earth-born mortal should presume to intrude into their domain. This relates to the words of the text:—

"Prostrate thyself and thy condemned clay, Child of the Earth, or dread the worst."

And later:—

"Destroy the worm!
Tear him in pieces!"

When the ruler of the lower world opens his mouth to speak (it is done in a few words), the brazen throats of the trombones and tuba do not fail.

But silence now, ye trumpets, silence, ye drums; it does not become you to take part in the conversation; it demands the soft whisperings of muted strings in order that she, who alone is able to drop balm into the wounded heart of our hero, may appear,—Astarte! The elegiac mood comes to the foreground. Words of Nemesis are accompanied by a sad and plaintive melody; only at the end of each of its two sections do we find the addition of harmony; even the support of any bass is wanting to the first measures. With the closing chord the shade of Astarte rises up. A fragment of the same melody is presently brought again before us, when Nemesis lets Manfred entreat Astarte to speak. The entreaty fails. Manfred begins:—

"Hear me, hear me,— Astarte! my beloved! speak to me.
... Thou lovedst me
Too much, as I loved thee: we were not made
To torture thus each other, though it were
The deadliest sin to love as we have loved.
... I would hear yet once before I perish
The voice which was my music,—speak to me!"

The passions rest, the anguished heart sues for forgiveness, which only love can vouchsafe. This mood seizes Schumann. He chooses the song form. Mild, love-breathing tones, deeply, warmly felt, press to the heart; it is the language only given to the poet by the grace of God to speak. The answers of Astarte are not pointed, although the accompaniment, with her appearance, grows somewhat more lively. Softly, as it began, the song dies away, in faint lustre mirroring the newly found peace of soul. Before the spirit of Astarte vanishes, we recognize the same motive which we have met already in the overture, and which was there characterized as the expression of a melancholy, milder mood.

With the words, "Fare ye well!" Manfred leaves the lower world, and while the orchestra intones a short movement which stands related to the hymn, the second part concludes. The third leads us into Manfred's castle. The spirit world lies behind us; Manfred has renounced it, and now, with firm eye, meets the approach of death. The powers of hell have refused; heaven he has closed against himself; he gives himself back to the earth. Peace comes over him. Let us consider in what way Schumann musically illustrates this new sense of repose. The movement is based upon the following motive:—

It is introduced by the first violin; the violoncello follows in free imitation; in the last measures, where flutes and bassoons associate themselves with the string quintet, the beginning of the motive is elaborated in the most ingenious manner. That this musical thought bears in itself the expression of great tenderness, must certainly be recognized; but it first acquires its true worth through the accession of other very independent voices. The employment of the strict (gebundenen) style of writing evidently shows with what a fine feeling the right tone was hit.

"Peace to Count Manfred!" With these words the Abbot of St. Maurice introduces himself. In the first conception of the poem he was depicted as intolerant and hard. By the advice of his friends, Byron concluded to remodel it, and presents us a soft-hearted, truly pious priest. That the poem gained by the alteration is clear enough.

The text of the third part affords but single moments which are adapted to melodramatic treatment. But with wise judgment even these are confined to a narrower selection, and the music gradually recedes into the background, as indeed it assumes the secondary rôle in the whole drama, making itself auxiliary to the sister Art. The music fits itself in aphoristically, when Manfred in his monologue takes leave of the sun. The design is unmistakable that the spoken word here, even more than in other places, shall hold the upper hand, and so the music steps in only in single phrases. Only in the last ten measures does it become self-dependent; I allude to the wonderfully beautiful succession of harmonies which accompany the setting of the sun and Manfred's "He is gone: I follow."

We draw near the catastrophe. The form of the Evil Spirit rises, at first indistinctly, but always coming out in sharper outline. With the summons of the Spirit, "Come! 'tis time; mortal, thine hour is come. Away!" are coupled deep-lying chords of the wind-instruments, which thrill to the marrow of our bones. Other spirits appear; a prickly figure in the string instruments introduces them: first softly, then more strongly, the trumpets take up the transition to the remote chord of C minor. "I spurn ye back," cries Manfred; the strings answer in a unisono run fortissimo:—

"Back, ye baffled fiends!
The hand of death is on me,—but not yours!"

The demons disappear. Plaintively the violins sound a triplet passage; the orchestra unites in a chord of the seventh. Do we not seem to perceive a question here addressed to Fate?

Organ tones resound from the distant cloister; the requiem is heard. As said before, this text is not contained in the poem. Byron would not have refrained from a sarcastic smile had he seen this appendix, and one must confess that its interpolation is hardly justifiable. It completely contradicts the poem; it repudiates the dogmas of the Catholic Church, since for one who rejects its blessings out of hand no requiem is sung. Involuntarily one associates the present priest with the cloister hymn; the assumption that the requiem might be for another is too improbable. If Schumann had placed this song in the orchestra, instead of assigning it to the choir and organ, an image would have arisen more appropriate to the situation. One can only suspect that the composer had in his eye not only a peculiar musical, but also a theatrical effect. And this he has reached in the fullest measure. In what precedes, the passions are stirred up in such a manner that it requires a soothing antithesis, which cannot express itself better than in a church-like, soft conclusion. As a piece of music, the requiem is worthy of special consideration. It is wrought out as a double canon. Soprano and tenor on the one hand, alto and bass on the other, sing each a canon in the octave. That the strictest and severest musical form, that of the canon, is able also to interpret moments of the highest tragedy, is proved by the last measures here. One voice after the other disappears; only one maintains its place, until it too is dumb, and dying Manfred with it. The spirits of life forsake him one after another; one still lingers; this vanishes,—thou too art dumb!

"Et lux perpetua luceat eis!"

If we let this music in its collective impression pass once more before our mental eye, we cannot fail to recognize in it one of the most significant tone-creations. It contains so many salient moments, that an enumeration of them would be useless; the heart and kernel of its excellence lies perhaps in its successful union with the poem. The poetry of this, as well as the mystery, had to be transferred to the music, and who could have been better qualified to perform this than Robert Schumann? A great admirer of Jean Paul, and highly romantic himself, he had already shown in earlier compositions that the musical representation of the marvellous came natural to him; and all too frequently we meet in him a certain nervous tendency to measure such material with his own mood. Sympathetically he becomes absorbed in the poet; he follows him wherever the path may lead, through bush and briar, over rocks, and smooths many a rough place in the poem through the tenderness of his harmonies. He thrills us in the expression of despair; in that of dejection he moves us almost to tears. Wherever the music lends itself to the spoken word, the latter is the gainer; he raises melodrama to an art form.

A LISZT-IAN PROGRAMME.

(From the Neue Freie Presse,¹ Vienna.)

An attraction of an unusual description characterized the Extraordinary Concert given by the Society of the Friends of Music on the evening of Good Friday. Liszt was to be seen—Liszt, standing at the flower-adorned conductor's desk, and holding in his hand a small conducting-stick, which he occasionally used with a distinguished air. The programme comprised only three compositions, all by himself: a Vocal Mass, then Die Ideale (a symphonic poem), and, lastly, Die Glocken der Strassburger Münster. A man certainly requires a deeply contemplative and Passion-Weekish frame of mind to sit out a concert and listen while an entire mass is being performed merely by men's voices with organ accompaniment. Among the very unusual and exceptional Masses for the execution of which in the concert-room a good justification may be found, most decidedly nobody will include this Vocal Mass of Liszt's, deficient as it is in all orchestral adornment. Its proper place is undoubtedly the church, and the work might have been written specially for one of those rigorously conducted sacred institutions (like the Sixtine Chapel, in Rome, or All Saints', in Munich), where all instrumental accompaniments are on principle excluded.

The narrow range and similarity of character peculiar to four-part male singing must produce monotony in the course of any long composition, and the monotony will be felt most acutely in a mass when heard in a concert-room, where, without the help of religious reverence and sacred surroundings, we can seek only musical edification. The powerful organ accompaniment, which in Liszt's Mass progresses with the melody, proves a doubtful acquisition; employed sparingly, and as much as possible alternating and contrasting with the chorus, it would work better. When, however, the organ, with all its stops blustering forth, over-rides the melody, it changes the monotony from simple monotony to deafening monotony. The most agreeable effect is produced by the 'Kyrie,' which is naturally rounded without being commonplace, devout without straining after symbolification. But the composer cannot, it is true, suffer this simplicity long; he soon seeks in the accumulation of striking modulations to atone for the instrumental opportunities he renounces, and some of these (in the 'Agnus Dei,' for example) are among the most abrupt and ungrateful ever confided to the intonation of singers not 'infallible.' Whether the Mass and the compositions which followed transported or merely satisfied the audience, or actually wearied them, we cannot decide. That is a question not to be determined when Liszt's compositions are recommended by the magic of his own personality. His power of fascination is undeniable; very many among the audience listen with indifference, or more probably dissatisfaction, but their eyes are fixed on Liszt, and—they applaud.

With Die Ideale, a "symphonic poem," founded on Schiller's verses, we became acquainted twenty years ago, when the then young Tausig produced it with other orchestral compositions from the same source. Since then, we have dwelt so often and so exhaustively upon Liszt's Symphonische Dichtungen that we dare not tire the reader with repetitions. Die Ideale has the merits and defects of its eleven symphonic sisters. Step by step, with the strictness of a ballet-programme, the music follows Schiller's verses, seeking to bribe hearers by a special poetic interest not its own. The orchestration, sparkling with a thousand effects, is a showy garment covering a badly nourished and weakly body. Now and then there crops up a melodic fragment, such, for instance, as the four-bar motive in E flat major, intended to illustrate the words: "Wie einst mit flehendem Verlangen Pygmalion den Stein umschloss." Such themes, or rather thematic beginnings, are not organically developed in Liszt, but incessantly repeated, diluted, and starved. The pompous final movement, eked out with Turkish music, ends by exhibiting in the gaudy splendor of a military parade the would-be ideality of the Ideale contemplated.

Whatever objections may be urged against the Vocal Mass and Die Ideale, both are works of high art compared to Liszt's last tone-poem, Die Glocken des Strassburger Münster. Written for barytone solo, mixed chorus, full orchestra, and organ, this composition belongs to the class of dramatized concert-ballads, which Schumann cultivated in his last period. The poem (by Longfellow) consists exclusively of dramatic dialogue, and the action is laid round the top of the Cathedral spire. Lucifer commands the Evil Spirits to attack the Cross, as holding them up to scorn. But the Cathedral Bells peal out and frustrate the criminal design. Five times is Lucifer's summons repeated with ever increasing vehemence, followed by the hesitating reply of the Spirits of the air and the pious chorus of the bells. The bells play something like the part of yard-dogs, whose energetic barking frightens intending thieves. In the end, the Demons abandon their attempt and sweep furiously away, while the Gregorian Chant with organ accompaniment is heard swelling through the Cathedral.¹

It is no easy task for us to enounce our opinion of this peculiar work—its composer's last. We would fain bear in mind the respect due to Liszt as a man, the admiration entertained for him as a genial artist, the veneration enforced by his years. Yet we must candidly state the impression produced on ourselves individually by a work introduced with high pretensions and lavish resources. The Bells of Strassburg Cathedral will long ring in our ears! When this Christian legend, steeped in Turkish music, had reached the culminating point, when the most awe-inspiring dissonances came closer and closer upon one another, when the imploring cries of ill-treated human voices mingled in the wild strife of kettle-drums, horns, and trombones, and when to all this were added incessantly pealing Bells, we felt that Music lay dead on the ground, while the Strassburg Bells were tolling for her funeral.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

CHERUBINI'S D-MINOR MASS IN LONDON.

The Bach Choir are to be cordially congratulated on their production of the great Mass in D-minor of Cherubini, a work which is not only the longest Mass ever written, but has many claims to be considered the magnum opus of the great musician of the first French Empire. Unfortunately for the audience, the "book of words" contained no analysis of the music, nor, indeed, anything beyond the text and a few irrelevant biographical remarks on Cherubini's life. Other works, save one, written in various languages, about Cherubini, are equally reticent, and those who wish to discover facts about the Mass in question have only the admirable work by Mr. Edward Bellasis, published in London six years ago, to fall back upon. Even Mr. Bellasis notices the extraordinary silence of writers on Cherubini upon the Mass in question. All we know can be gathered from the catalogue of his works drawn up by Cherubini himself, and from it we learn that the Mass was begun at the end of March, 1811, and was finished on the 7th of October in the same year; the entire composition, therefore, having been begun and ended in Paris. That Cherubini regarded the Mass as a loved child, there is abundant evidence. His revision of the elaborate score extended over a number of years, while the "Sanctus" (though the original still exists) was recomposed in 1822. That the Mass in question is the longest ever written has already been mentioned, and an elaborate comparison on this point is printed in Mr. Bellasis' book. On this authority (and it would be a work of infinite labor to check the figures) it seems that while Cherubini's Mass in D minor has 2563 bars, his Mass in F (written in 1808) has only 2033 bars, while the Mass in D (composed in 1819) of Beethoven has but 1929 bars, and the Mass in C (written in 1810) also of Beethoven, has but 1256 bars. This extraordinary length is devoted entirely to the Kyrie, Gloria, and Credo, Beethoven having the honor (if any special honor be attached to such a question) of having written the longest Sanctus, Benedictus and Agnus Dei.

The performance last Wednesday by the Bach Choir of Cherubini's Mass in D minor was stated to be its first in this country, and there is little reason to doubt the correctness of this assertion. No public record can be found of its performance by any society until Wednesday last; while its inordinate length, and the large orchestra, and chorus, and the six solo vocalists it requires, have probably prevented its performance in its entirety at any of the Catholic churches of this kingdom. Parts of it have undoubtedly been heard at concerts, and in the course of the services of the Roman Catholic Church. Again, the well-thumbed and dog-eared score used by Herr Otto Goldschmidt on Wednesday showed abundantly that the work had been performed, if not in England, at least elsewhere. As a matter of fact, it has been heard in Paris, in parts and in whole, often with the omission of the repeats. On Wednesday it was, I believe, given from beginning to end, with the new "Sanctus," which replaces the old in the printed score, and in every respect exactly as Cherubini intended it should be given. And it may be accepted as a fact that, despite its extraordinary length, and that the performance extended over upwards of two hours, not a single person present in St. James' Hall (which was crowded by the most eminent professors of this country) arose from his seat wishing that a single bar had been omitted, or with aught than admiration of the grandeur of the work and of the extraordinary ability of its composer.

To attempt any sort of analysis of the Mass in D minor within reasonable space, or in any newspaper not specially devoted to music, would be alike unwise and impracticable. The best analysis in a modest compass will be found in Mr. Bellasis' book, already quoted. The score is so complex that columns might be written in descriptive analysis of a work by a composer of whom Fétis complained: "For a light piece in one act" (the opéra comique "Le Crescendo") "he has written a score of five hundred and twenty-two pages in small notes." Roughly speaking, it may be said that while the Mass of Cherubini may to a certain extent be considered the connecting link between the classic Church compositions of the older Italian age and the music of the present day, it on its performance on Wednesday seemed, even to the hearer of to-day, as fresh and as admirable for its lofty conception, its dramatic intensity, and its complexity of detail, as though it had been written by a great master a year ago. The "Kyrie" has 437 bars, and is in three sections, the first and last being for chorus, and the middle section for quartet. The "Gloria," the largest section of the work, not excepting the "Creed," has 895 bars, divided between a chorus, a trio for soprano, tenor and bass, a chorus, a quartet, and a quartet and chorus. In this section is found some of the finest music in the work, and notably the "Qui tollis," the "Quoniam," and the fugal "Cum sancto spiritu." The Nicene "Creed" has 668 bars, the first part down to the "Incarnation" being sung by the choir. The "Incarnatus" is arranged for sextet, while the "Crucifixus" (in which the voices sing in unison on the note E for 53 bars, with muted violin accompaniment) is for chorus, the "Et in spiritum" being for quartet, continued down to the "Amen," with the usual fugue. The "Sanctus," of 66 bars, was that substituted by Cherubini in 1822 for the original "Sanctus," while the "Benedictus," of 130 bars, is familiar to most musicians. The "Agnus Dei," of 367 bars, for quartet and chorus, concludes a work which is, in many respects, one of the greatest Cherubini ever wrote. Too much praise can hardly be accorded the orchestra, the chorus, and all concerned, an especial word of commendation being the meed of the chief soloists, Mrs. Osgood, Madame Patey, Mr. Shakespeare and Herr Henschel, for their very admirable rendition [!] of unusually difficult and trying music. The general programme included a "Sanctus" in D by Bach, the "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt" of Beethoven, and the "First Walpurgis Night" of Mendelssohn, sung to the original German text, though none the better on that account.—Figaro, April 28.

FESTIVAL PROGRAMME NOTES.

HANDEL'S "UTRECHT JUBILATE."

THE Utrecht Te Deum and Jubilate were written in 1713, thirty years before Handel's greater Dettingen Te Deum. They belong, in fact, to the period in which he was mainly engaged in the production of Italian operas, and before he had turned his attention to the oratorio. Chrysander is astonished not only by the contrapuntal art displayed in this work, but still more by the fact that Handel, at the age of twenty-eight years, should have gained the ripe experience here shown in religious matters. "At the same time that he was cultivating soft Italian love strains, we see him also leading a serious inward life, which, from time to time, excited by joyful experiences of his fellow-men, broke out with power." The same writer adds:—

"The genesis of this composition can be traced. With this work for the church, Handel came nearer to the old English masters than in the Italian operas. Purcell, twenty years before, had also set a Te Deum with Jubilate for the festival of St. Cecilia's day, which was performed at least once a year, and was universally regarded as the greatest composition on that text,—indeed, as unsurpassable. This work Handel laid before him as a model. The relationship is as great as could be without positive equality. Commonly, the chorus with Handel is what the chorus is with Purcell; and it is the same with the solos. Nay, in the Jubilate, the identity of plan goes so far that, in both works, the words 'Be sure that the Lord' form a duet in A minor, and the following, 'O, go your way into his gates,' an Alla Breve chorus. Frequently little passages have almost the same tones. With such inward spiritual affinity as existed between Handel and Purcell, their Te Deums must have become similar, even if Handel had never heard of the work of his predecessor. Handel made his first Te Deum after Purcell, just as much as he made his last, the Dettingen, after Urio. But here you may seek in vain for the faintest shadow of a plagiarism. Purcell's Jubilate can least bear the comparison; it lacks the deep and devout poetry of Handel's. Good music it is always, but after Handel's mightier work it takes but little hold."

The Jubilate, with its short, trumpet-toned introduction, is well suited for performance separately from the Te Deum, although it consists of only six mostly short, but elaborate pieces. The opening chorus, an exhortation to holy joy, sprang from a Latin psalm, "Laudate pueri," which Handel had composed in Rome in 1707. A single voice, following the hint of the trumpet in the prelude, first unfolds the theme, dwelling long on the first note, "O"; then proceeding in rapturous rousades, "Be joyful in the Lord," the last tone again held out, and finishing the florid melody on "all ye lands," with a hold of several measures upon "all." The chorus takes up the strain with emulous response and imitation in four parts. This is all inspiring and brief, and in the key of D.

2. The next chorus, still in D, "Serve the Lord with gladness," begins with a short, joyful fugue theme in four parts, and while the same goes on in the orchestra, a counter-theme in long notes, descending from the fifth to the key-note, sings, "and come before his presence with a song." Afterwards the soprano is divided into two parts, for the fuller expansion of theme and counter-theme in double fugue.

3. The next sentence, "Be ye sure that the Lord he is God," etc., is naturally in a more thoughtful strain, a duet for alto and bass, in A minor, of great beauty and tenderness.

4. Five-part chorus, Alla Breve, in F, "O go your way into his gates." This might stand by itself as a most beautiful, poetic, spiritual motet. The voice parts move in smooth and even half notes, almost uniformly, while the string quartet supplies a modestly ornate counterpoint, all in a cheerful, tranquil, and contented strain, and full of lovely sequences. In expression it is as simple, heart-felt, and naive as possible, yet in its uniformity there is no taint of commonplace, it is sincere religious music; the consummate art conceals itself.

5. "The Lord is gracious, his mercy is everlasting," etc. Here again, by way of relief between two great choruses, Handel treats one of the gentler texts in an individual form, making a trio for two altos (or tenors) and bass. It has "so much warmth and pathos, that it requires but a slight breath to make it blaze up again into the bright flames of the chorus."

6. The Jubilate ends, as it began, in the bright key of D, with two strong, brilliant choruses: the first an eight-part Gloria, or ascription, the voices all in uniform long notes, with an active figurative accompaniment, followed by a five-part fugued chorus, "As it was in the beginning," etc., and "Amen," forming a splendid climax to the work.

The additional accompaniments by Robert Franz are used in this performance. J. S. D.

CHORUS BY J. S. BACH.

DURING five years, mostly in the earlier period of his residence in Leipzig, Bach composed, for every Sunday's service and church festival, a cantata, consisting of orchestral introduction, recitatives and arias, chorales and great choruses. These were sung once and then laid aside, only to reappear within these last few years in the splendid volumes of the complete edition of Bach's works, now in course of publication by the Bach Gesellschaft, in Leipzig. Some three hundred and eighty of these cantatas are either published or known to exist in manuscript. This short selection for the festival is the concluding number of the cantata (once performed here in a Harvard Symphony Concert), entitled "Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss" (My Heart was full of Heaviness), which dates back to an earlier period, when he lived in Weimar, 1714. It was composed for the third Sunday after Trinity, June 17, and the text has reference to the epistle of that Sunday. Nevertheless, Bach wrote over it, "Per ogni tempo" (Good for any time).

This splendid final chorus, upon the same text with that of Handel's Messiah, is even more exciting and sublime than that, although it is very much shorter and its musical subject-matter of the simplest. But in its wonderful conciseness, every phrase, every chord strikes with an electric force; and it is all over, leaving the hearer breathless with amazement, before Handel's lengthier "Worthy the Lamb" and "Amen" chorus has more than got fair headway. Here Bach's three trumpets come in with stirring effect. It is in C major. The words "The Lamb, that for us is slain, to Him will we render power and glory," etc., are declaimed by all the voices with stupendous and startling modulations. Nothing could be more exciting and full of grand presentiment. As each deliberate phrase rings out, you seem to hear the echoes in the pause that follows. Then the time changes to Allegro. A solo bass voice declaims, "Power and glory and praise be unto him forevermore," lengthening out the "Amen, Allelujah" in florid roulades, while voice after voice (soli) take up the theme and pursue the fugue. Presently the tutti join them, first in one part, then another, until the whole mass is drawn into the harmonious vortex, and amid stirring trumpet-calls, it surges on to a higher and a higher climax, and the whole ends in a blaze of glory; almost too suddenly, you think, although the musical matter has been fully treated and exhausted. It is truly a sublime conclusion to a noble work.

MENDELSSOHN'S "FORTY-THIRD PSALM."

It is almost unaccountable that this short Psalm, so much more available for numerous occasions, as well as for church service, than the longer Psalms with which we have been familiar,—a work, too, of the ripest period of Mendelssohn, a perfect instance of his purely vocal writing, requiring no accompaniment,—should now be heard here only for the second time. We owe its introduction to the "Cecilia," at one of its concerts of the present season. It is in every way a noble, an impressive, and most interesting work.

The first words, "Judge me, O God, and plead my cause," etc., are strongly given out in unison by tenors and basses, in D minor 4-4 measure; holding out the last note (dominant) to form a firm organ-point, on which the sopranos and altos in four-part harmony deliver the second clause of the sentence, "O deliver," etc. The same process is repeated with the next two clauses of the text, "For thou art the God," and "Wherefore mourn I," only this time the organ-point is on C, leading as dominant to the bright key of F major, filling the clouded harmony with sunshine at the thought, "Send out thy light," the tenors and basses now dividing, like the upper voices, so as to form a rich eight-part harmony.

Here the rhythm changes to Andante, 3-8, and a new but kindred theme is taken up, still in D minor; and in the same antiphonal manner the fourth verse is sung as far as "I will praise thee on the harp," when all the eight parts are again united. On the last two verses the key brightens into the major, the time becomes Allegro Moderato, and in square 4-4 measure the Psalm concludes in a resplendent and triumphant blaze of harmony. At the exhortation, "Hope in the Lord," many will recognize the same repeated little phrase that occurs also in the Psalm "As the hart pants," and which seems to have been a favorite with Mendelssohn in the setting of such words.

SAINT-SAËNS'S "THE DELUGE."

The Deluge, by M. Camille Saint-Saëns, is the most notable novelty in the Festival programme. Conceived apparently in the same romantic vein as the symphonic poems which have become somewhat familiar to Boston audiences—Le Rouet d'Omphale, Phaëton, La Danse Macabre, and La Jeunesse d'Hercule—the composer seems to follow in the wake of Hector Berlioz, employing all the modern instrumental appliances for heightening musical effect. The Deluge is, in fact, an orchestral work, with only enough of recitatives, solos, and choruses to describe the story of God's punishment of sinful man and His subsequent covenant with Noah. The vocal portions of the score are, in fact, its weakest. Saint-Saëns, with all his knowledge of Bach and the masters, and with all his attainments in composition and orchestration, has not, so far as we have been permitted opportunities to judge, displayed great skill or invention as a vocal writer.

The Deluge, is divided into three parts. The prelude is for strings, and includes motifs which are repeated in the interludes and accompaniments of the opening recitatives. The theme of the tenor solo, "This race I'll exterminate," is taken as the subject of a choral fugue. The Almighty's command to Noah is told in a dignified aria for baritone. The choral fugue is repeated, ending with an emphatic enunciation, simply harmonized, of God's reasons for His course. In these movements for chorus there occur episodes in a chanting style, while beneath is heard the theme of the fugue in detached phrases.

The Second Part begins with a short recitative, "And Noah did as God had everything commanded," and the musical painting of the scene of the deluge begins at once. It is a most gorgeous piece of instrumental writing, and in it is employed every form of instrument which may serve to heighten the effect of the picture. Here is a list of the instruments for which parts are written; Strings and harp; one piccolo; flutes, oboes, clarinets, and bassoons, in pairs; horns, chromatic horns, trumpets, trumpets with pistons, trombones with pistons, all in pairs; three trombones of the common form, and three bass tubas; four kettle drums, great drum, cymbals, and gong. The composer has used them all with consummate skill. The vocal part amounts to little more than a chant, having no melody to speak of, and when not in unison is modestly harmonized. The effect at the close, as the chorus chant against sustained chords, "Mid the horror of night eternal, waste and void," and indeed of all the movement which succeeds the storm, is very impressive. Amid the storm we hear thundered out the motif of the fugue in the First Part. The entire scene is intensely exciting in its treatment by the composer.

Milder orchestral means are employed in the Third Part, which is largely of a pastoral character and, though sounding tame in comparison with the Second Part, includes the loveliest music in the cantata. The sending forth of the dove, the return of the winged messenger with the olive branch, the going forth from the ark, the heavenly sign of promise, all are pictured with great skill, and, what is more to the composer's credit, great beauty, especially in the orchestration, the vocal part always remaining weak by comparison. A spirited fugue, in which the covenant is enunciated, brings the cantata to a close.

OPINIONS OF THE SAINT-SAËNS
"DELUGE."

(Correspondence of the New York Tribune.)

Then came Saint-Saëns's "Deluge," about which expectation had been raised to fever-heat. There are some compositions which one neither comprehends nor enjoys at the first hearing, but which one feels impelled to return to again and again, until their meaning becomes clear, and their hidden beauty or sublimity makes itself felt at last. Again, there are other works which bear utter vapidly, spiritual and intellectual poverty, and hopeless emptiness stamped upon their very forehead. To this latter class the "Deluge" belongs. One asks himself in sheer amazement how a man of Saint-Saëns's ready invention, easy fascination, electric nerve and profound musical erudition—how a man of his musical savoir faire should have been, not willing, but able to produce such a monstrous inanity as this cantata. There is one melodic and one contrapuntal idea in the "Deluge." They are not strong, grand, nor even very beautiful ideas, but still they are tangible themes. They are used to no purpose whatever. Curious, but true; for the man is one of the cleverest writers living, and his subject is certainly a strong one.

The "Deluge" may be described as one of the most superb feats of orchestration ever accomplished. Never was musical Nothing so wonderfully scored. No matter what instruments are used, whether it is the simple string quartet or the whole orchestral panoply that Paris alone among the cities of the world can furnish, the instrumental effect is as beautiful as it is astounding. The chorus and solo voices have little to do save in the way of recitative (and what recitative!) except in two bits of fugued writing; the first to the words, "This race I'll exterminate surely," in the first part; the second in the final chorus. Both of these passages are thoroughly poor. The cantata consists of three parts:—

First, The Corruption of Man. The Anger of God. The Covenant with Noah. In this part the orchestra is scored for strings and harp only, exceedingly beautiful effects being produced by solo instruments.

Second, The Deluge. This part consists of a single movement. The score is a curiosity: one piccolo flute, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, three trombones, two trumpets with six pistons, two trombones with six pistons, (new Sax instruments, not procurable except in Paris) three "contrabasses" (immense Sax instruments of the tuba tribe, not to be had out of Paris), two pairs of kettle-drums, cymbals, tam-tam, big drum, harps; strings divided into seventeen parts; four-part mixed chorus. Forty-eight instrumental parts in all!

In this extraordinary movement every possible noise, whistling, howling, sighing, rustling, roaring, clashing, banging, that can be drawn from the above combination of instruments, by the aid of pure concords and atrocious dissonances, is made for the benefit of the dumbfounded listener. As a piece of scoring, it is simply wonderful; as a piece of marine painting, it is true to nature, except that the clashing cymbals do not sound as nature looks; as a piece of music, tone-painting, or anything else that is meant to be listened to, it is singularly and even ingeniously impressive.

Third, The Dove. The Descent from the Ark. God's Benediction. Here the orchestra assumes more usual proportions, and we pass from one enchanting bit of tone-color to another still more beautiful; only the trombones in the closing fugato are really vulgar.

The orchestration of the work only is dwelt upon. There is nothing else to describe; absolutely nothing. "Much Ado about Nothing" should be inscribed upon the tombstone of this unique composition.

(From the Boston Courier, May 9.)

The thunder chorus (Haydn's) was rather tame compared with the storm which followed it in the Deluge. To have two showers in one evening was a bold innovation, and Haydn's weather suffered by comparison with the general cyclone of the French composer. To us it seemed as if the sopranos casually remarked, "Oh what horror," and the kettle-drum proceeded to get up what horror it could at short notice, while the tenors assisted it by singing out of tune. Far different was the storm passage of the Deluge. The curse of Heaven had been pronounced against a fallen race. Amidst the rising storm are heard the notes of the curse motif, rising higher and higher, and with an import that was big with impending fate. The rise of the storm itself is worked up with all the skill of a master of modern instrumentation, from drum to cymbal; from cymbal to gong, the fury of the crescendo rises; its subsidence from sixteenths to triplets, eighth notes to quarters, etc., in gradual retard, is most thrilling. To us the work seemed as the most powerful of pictures. We feel bound to say that this awe was not shared by the audience, who gave the number but little applause. It was not always correctly sung, but it is terrifically difficult for the chorus to intone properly, even though the vocal passages are in unison. The third part is most melodious, and ends with another difficult chorus. Strings are much used in the first and third parts, the former containing a violin solo of great beauty, which Mr. B. Listemann played with breadth and expression. The soloists, Misses Hubbell and Winant, and Messrs. Adams and Dudley, all exerted themselves earnestly, and Miss Hubbell deserves credit for carrying through a most trying part very successfully. The only fault to be found with her is the needlessly reedy (or violin con sordino) quality of her upper notes, which on some vowels (O, for example) was disagreeable. While there was lack of power in the male soloists, there was no incorrectness of importance, and they, as well as Miss Winant, whose rich voice was heard to advantage even in a small part, deserve praise. L. C. E.

(From the Saturday Evening Gazette.)

From The Seasons to Saint-Saëns's The Deluge was a tremendous leap—a ridiculous leap, in fact, as it was from extreme naturalness to extreme artificiality. It would hardly be fair to pronounce judgment upon Saint-Saëns's work upon only a single hearing; but it is not unfair to state the impression it made upon us, which was a thoroughly unfavorable one. Its vocal features seemed absurdly insignificant, flat, insipid, and inexpressive. The whole value of the composition is found in its orchestration, which is marvelously rich and effective. The work is an exaggeration of all that was prominent in the style of Berlioz, who might have exclaimed prophetically, "Après moi Le Deluge!" The opening prelude is a graceful and flowing endless melody of the Wagner school, marked with much poetic charm of sentiment; but after this there is nothing upon which the memory dwells with any pleasure. The tone painting of The Deluge, in the second part, is a wonderful bit of orchestration, but it is excruciatingly noisy, ear-splitting and bizarre. Knowledge and power are undoubtedly shown, but in such a lurid, confusing, and extravagant manner as to perplex, daze, and overwhelm. So furious is the working up of this portion of the work, so completely has the composer expended all his force upon it, and so utterly has it deafened and prostrated the listener, that what follows seems not only ineffably tame, but superfluous. If Saint-Saëns wished to show how thorough a command he has over all the resources of orchestral effect, how perfect is his knowledge of the timbre of every instrument, how great a master he is in combining and contrasting varied qualities of tone, he has succeeded beyond all question. But if he imagined he was writing music in which there was the faintest trace of what is understood as inspiration, he has made a consummate failure. Nothing more deliberate, nothing more cold, in spite of the simulation of fire in it, can be well imagined. It is hard and mechanical from beginning to end; at times a blood-and-thunder tone melodrama, and when it is not that, a dreary waste of artificial and insipid sentimentality. The solos did not afford the artists concerned any opportunity to distinguish themselves. They were sung by Miss Hubbell, Miss Winant, Mr. C. R. Adams, and Mr. G. W. Dudley, who are to be commiserated even while they are praised for their efforts.

VERDI'S REQUIEM—TWO OPINIONS.

(From the Evening Gazette.)

The oftener we hear this great composition the more beauties we discover in it, and the more we are struck by its power. It will stand as the finest effort of the present day in the direction of sacred music. That it is dramatic in effect, that its passion is physical rather than intellectual, that it follows too closely the literal interpretation of the language, have been brought against it as coarse and unpardonable faults by those who are wedded to the belief that the example set by the profounder German composers of church music is the only one to be followed; but who is authorized to frame an arbitrary law to confine genius within the limits of a fixed style. Verdi is not to be condemned because his "Requiem" is not modelled upon that of Mozart; is not to be depreciated because he has followed the dictates of his own genius instead of having bent it in the direction of another's. The real question seems to us to be, does Verdi's music fairly express the sentiment and the spirit of the words to which he has set it? We believe it does, and with wonderful power and effect. The true test of such a work is not the impression it makes on transcendental pedants who condemn the composer because his practice does not follow their theories; because he has not confined himself within the arbitrary limits within which they insist elevated imagination shall be confined. On the contrary, the test is the effect his achievement has upon refined natures, who do not feel it incumbent upon them to think by rule. At each performance of this work here, the audience that has listened to it, certainly as cultivated an audience as our city can produce, has been profoundly stirred and deeply impressed by the lofty sentiment of this masterly effort. The musical genius of our day can show nothing equal in combined power, grandeur, tenderness, true poetic feeling and tremendous energy. Verdi's manifest aim was to produce what seemed to him the most impressive effect. He accomplished his task with unquestionable genius, preferring to think and write as a man of his era instead of trying to think after the fashion of a bygone time, and after the manner of composers with whom his temperament had no affinity. The chief censure of the martinets of style, who believe that no serious music is born out of Germany, is that Verdi has not written as Bach, Handel and Mozart have written. That point may be safely conceded. He has written as an Italian, and a great one. As such let him be judged.

The interpretation of this work on Thursday evening was the best it has received here. The choruses as a rule were grandly sung, the only fault being a slight fatigue shown in the wavering of the voices, which may perhaps be accounted for by the tremendous pace at which that body had been driven by rehearsals and performances. The orchestra merits unqualified praise for the brilliant quality of its work. The soloists were Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Cary, Signor Campanini and Mr. Whitney. Mrs. Smith did but scant justice to the soprano solos, and her intonation was often painfully false. The great solo triumph of the evening was achieved by Signor Campanini, who sang the "Ingemisco" magnificently, exciting a frenzy of enthusiasm in his hearers. The concerted music was delightfully interpreted. Taken altogether, the performance, despite a few shortcomings, will be memorable for its brilliancy, its strength, and the profound impression it created.

(From the Sunday Courier.)

After hearing Verdi's Requiem for the third time, we can say, truthfully, that the work does not, as a whole, grow upon acquaintance. Its dramatic beauty thrills the first time—pleases the next—and leaves one unmoved the third. Its chromatic scales (of which there are dozens and dozens) show signs of wear, and its kettle-drums and sudden pauses become tame, since they no longer take one unawares. Of course, we have no intention of denying great beauty to some parts of the work as, for example, the opening number, the Ingemisco, the Confutatis, and others. The chromatic harmonies of Quam Olim are not widely different from effects which Mendelssohn introduces in his Athalie, and are more legitimate than the mere scramblings of double basses and brass in the other numbers. The chorus singing was not as good as when the work was previously given, and it only confirms the statement above, that the enthusiasm (of the chorus) seems to have evaporated. The attacks were not always prompt, the pianissimi never soft enough; but the broader portions, such as the Dies Irae, were strongly given. The solo quartet, was the best balanced of the festival. Mrs. Smith's voice rang out with telling effect throughout, and she really accomplished Verdi's requirement of singing softly and sweetly in altissimo. Once or twice only, was there a wavering and indecisive tone, but her general work was excellent. Miss Cary sang her solos with electric power. To our mind, hers was the most artistic singing of all. Mr. Whitney sang the Confutatis finely, except at the passage, after the agitated chromatic runs, at the words Voca Me, where pathos (a quality which his grand voice lacks), was wanting. Campanini sang the Ingemisco very dramatically and with pathos. He committed one blunder which would have raised hisses in Italy; at the final phrase, he forgot where to take breath, and (wind failing) he cut the word Dextra in two, breathing in the middle of the first syllable. He was encored and repeated the song, but not the mistake. L. C. E.

LADY PIANISTS.

Pretty much the same principle holds good in pianoforte virtuosity at the present day in Germany as of novel-writing in England—both are almost entirely in the hands of women. On looking through the lists of English booksellers, we find at most only one romance from a masculine source to ten or twelve by female writers. A survey of our concert-bills gives about the same proportion between female and male pianists. Nay, in many a concert season, such as that just over, for instance, the male pianists seem to vanish altogether before the preponderance of their key compelling sisters. That this universally established and daily increasing supremacy of young ladies over the pianoforte does not greatly benefit them or the pianoforte is an opinion we have already often expressed. The similarity with female novelists does not entirely cease, even with regard to quality. We have many very excellent and some eminent lady pianists, while one here and there attains the height of accomplished male art. But this is an exception, only proving the rule that women, owing to their more tender organization, physical and intellectual, are restricted to a less extensive domain of art, mostly that of small, delicate delineation; and, even in the case of their most brilliant representatives, we miss a last decided something in grandeur and depth, in soaring boldness and free humor. We will not to-day again give utterance to our serious and unfortunately quite useless warning against the practical and social disadvantages attendant on the increasing number of young ladies who select as their career that of a virtuosa; we will merely mention the simple fact that, during the present scholastic year, out of some four hundred paying pianoforte pupils received at the Vienna Conservatory, more than three hundred and fifty belong to the gentler sex. To what is this to lead?—EDUARD HANSLICK, in the Neue Freie Presse.

THE FIFTH TRIENNIAL FESTIVAL.

SECOND CONCERT WEDNESDAY EVENING, MAY 5.

THE audience was even larger than on the opening night for St. Paul. Two strongly contrasted works were given: Spohr's Oratorio, The Last Judgment, for the first time here in twenty-five years, and Rossini's rather too familiar Stabat Mater. Both works are full of melody, though of a very different style. The general impression of the former corresponded essentially to the description which we have already given. All found the music sweet, melodious, delicately refined and finished; wrought out with a rare, peculiar subtlety of harmony, with much contrapuntal skill, and with a perfect mastery of orchestral means,—modest compared with the orchestras of to-day. The sweetness, however, with the perpetual chromatic and even enharmonic modulation, while, everything was beautiful in detail, was cloying on the whole. A few bars, now and then, of plain diatonic harmony would have been so refreshing! whereas at each harmonic step we have an accidental flat or sharp, or double flat or sharp, either in the upper or the lower part, if not in both! Spohr never could divest himself of his mannerism, great musician as he was.

Then, as a treatment of an awful theme, this whole music, with hardly an exception, is extremely mild and amiable, as we have said before; and for the most part the texts selected justify it. Only one of the choruses: "Destroyed is Babylon," in the second part, taken with the (not immediately) preceding Bass recitative: "The day of wrath is near," contains any hint of anything appalling. There are several grand, majestic choruses, like the opening, "Praise his awful name," and the final, "Thine is the kingdom, Hallelujah," etc. But there are more of tender sentiment and beauty, some of which are heard occasionally in churches. The chorus singing and accompaniment was all admirably well done.

The solos, as we have said before, form rather a secondary element in the work. Miss Ida W. Hubbell, the soprano, sang with intelligence and taste, as well as with zeal and fervor; she has a clear and telling voice, sometimes a little strident in the highest tones, — a voice which holds its own against full orchestra and chorus, but not particularly sympathetic. Miss Winant's rich, sympathetic alto was very serviceable in several quartets. Mr. Courtney, the tenor, was in better voice than commonly before, and sang, as he always sings, with true style and expression. Mr. M. W. Whitney was more fully himself, more thoroughly alive, and less the passive slave of his grand bass voice, than in St. Paul.

The orchestra throughout was satisfactory, and it has really the most important part. Besides the long overture, which is serious and impressive, and contains many beauties, there is a yet longer introductory symphony to the second part, where, if anywhere, one would expect to feel a dark and terrible foreboding of the wrath to come. On the contrary, it is almost festive, — at least the larger part of it; it moves with a gay, buoyant rhythm, and seems like the prelude to some gorgeous pageant. Does it perhaps mean (we heard the question asked) that "in the midst of life we are in death," that in the midst of joy and merriment the great doom may overtake us unawares? Think what we may of Spohr's oratorio, it certainly added, in the way of contrast and of knowledge, to the interest of the Festival. We should not wholly forget Spohr; even in this form he is worthy of revival now and then.

If any musical work of equal magnitude and merit can be called hackneyed, it is Rossini's Stabat Mater. It is the one thing always put up by the travelling Italian and other opera troupes, when they wish to utilize a Sunday evening by giving a "sacred" concert. We have performances of it, good, bad and indifferent, without end. It cannot be called a profoundly serious and impressive work; Rossini himself, in a conversation with Ferdinand Hiller, spoke of it as only mezzo serio. But it is beautiful, it is genial music; it abounds in melody, — clear, spontaneous, original, and full of sensuous charm, while portions of it go deeper and are almost sublime, particularly the opening and the Inflammatus (this time wisely made the closing piece, omitting the weak fugue). All the singers like it, because it affords fine opportunities for their voices.

On this occasion, so good was the performance, the work seemed to have received a fresh lease of life; we listened to it all with unexpected pleasure; it was an agreeable surprise to find that after all it had still something interesting to say to us, — nay, positively fascinating after such overstrained efforts as the Manzoni Requiem and the Deluge.

It was indeed an admirable performance as a whole, and in nearly every part. The choruses rolled out with a clear, full, satisfying volume; light and shade, accent, color, were carefully regarded, and the accompaniment was excellent. The great sensation of the performance was Signor Campanini's singing of the Cujus animam. The wonderful power and sweetness of his tenor voice, so evenly developed throughout its great compass, his perfect method, great endurance, sure and finished execution, were only equalled by the fervor and the freedom with which he gave out his best. And it was all unimpeachable in point of taste. He did not, like most tenors, shout this aria in a loud, aggressive style, making it a mere display of startling power; there was much of delicacy, of tender and fine feeling, revealed in his subdued, expressive rendering. Miss Annie Cary (her first appearance in the Festival) was perfectly at home in the contralto parts, and never were her noble voice, her consummate execution, her whole honest, hearty style of singing shown to more advantage. Miss Fanny Kellogg had hardly the physical strength for the Et inflammatus, though it was an intelligent and creditable effort: but in the rest of the soprano part she was eminently successful. Mr. J. F. Winch, too, proved himself quite adequate to the trying Pro peccatis, and the requirements of the bass parts generally.

THIRD CONCERT, THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

Beethoven's Choral Symphony, with the miscellaneous selections that preceded it, drew an overflowing audience. First came (for the third time in Boston) Mr. Chadwick's Overture to Rip Van Winkle, heard with new interest from the fact that the young composer, who had recently returned from his studies in Germany, conducted it in person. He held the orchestra well in hand, and was warmly received as soon as the public became aware who the conductor was. The work loses nothing upon renewed acquaintance.

Then Carl Zerrahn resumed his wonted place, and Mr. Charles R. Adams sang the Erl-King, Schubert's Op. 1, with orchestral accompaniment, by no means overpowering or extravagant, by Berlioz. The singer was not in so good voice as he was in St. Paul; yet we think justice has hardly been done to the fine qualities of his singing, which was certainly artistic and dramatic, although the contrasts of the three voices in the ballad fell short of the interpreter's intention. Then appeared Miss Thursby, whose sweet, light, birdlike tones were by no means destitute of pathos in the scene of poor, crazed Ophelia from the Hamlet of Ambrose Thomas. It was a charming, and a touching piece of vocalization, and seemed admirably suited to her; the audience were delighted. Miss Cary, in the fullness of her voice, and in her noblest style, with perfect ease of execution, sang the jealous Juno's Recitative: "Awake, Saturnia," and Aria: "Hence, Iris, hence away!" from Handel's Semele, superbly.

The short Psalm, without orchestra, by Mendelssohn: Judge me, O God, which we have described elsewhere, was very impressively sung by the great chorus, the unison passages being firm and massive, and the responses prompt and sure. It must henceforth be a favorite work in choral societies and large church choirs.

As for the Ninth Symphony, it will never cease to be decried for the "unvocal" character of the "Hymn to Joy" portion, its overtaking of average human voices by straining them up to an exceptionally high pitch, and keeping them there; nor will it ever cease to excite the desire of all who know, or have had assurance, of its wonderful beauty, its inspired sublimity, its glorious expression of the sentiment of human brotherhood, and the pure, spontaneous, free religion of the universal heart. The number of the latter class of hearers is continually increasing, while the critics one by one have had to yield to the triumphant efficacy of not a few mainly successful, and altogether inspiring performances. On this last occasion we even thought the chorus more successful than the orchestra. The prime condition of success, enthusiasm, clearly possessed the singers. In the most difficult parts, in the sustained high notes of the religious climax, it all sounded well, however inconsiderately (for voices) Beethoven may have written it. The high soprano tone was smooth and sweet, and hardly ever shrill, so that the ideal of the tone-poet made itself felt for once, if never before. The quartet of soloists, Miss Thursby, Miss Cary, Mr. Adams and Mr. Dudley, were, with occasional momentary short-comings in one part or another, more nearly equal to their arduous task than any we remember to have had before, even in that almost impossible quadruple cadenza. Mr. Dudley has a manly, ponderous, telling bass voice, which he wields to good purpose, and led off in the vocal work, after the suggestion of the orchestral basses, very nobly, giving a spirited impulse to the entire chorus. The orchestra, of over seventy, played the three purely instrumental movements on the whole very finely, especially the heavenly Adagio. The first movement might perhaps have been made a little clearer; and we are not sure that the Scherzo, especially where the rhythm changes to 4-4 in the Trio, did not suffer from the extremely rapid tempo. The double basses burst their bonds and talked out very effectually where the need of human utterance makes itself first felt. Certain we are that the great mass of the audience — those who gave themselves simply up to the music and the thought — found it a delightful, glorious experience, and went home edified, and in a happy, hopeful and believing frame of mind. If St. Paul was the best achievement of the Festival, this was the other best.

FOURTH CONCERT, Thursday evening. — Verdi's Manzoni Requiem, preceded by Mr. Dudley Buck's Symphonic Overture on Sir Walter Scott's Marmion, formed the programme. On a first hearing, the Overture appeared to be a good square piece of orchestral writing, largely laid out, clear and symmetrical in form, effectively and richly instrumented, with several good themes well developed, although perhaps at too great length. It is the work of a clever and experienced composer, one perfectly at home in all the routine of his art, to whom the plastic faculty of form has become almost second nature. Yet it did not impress us as very original in ideas or treatment, but rather as an essentially commonplace, though outwardly imposing specimen of clever, good musicianship. Mr. Buck can do better things. We speak of it purely from the musical point of view; our recollection of Scott's Marmion is not distinct enough to warrant any judgment as to how far the music is a successful illustration of the poem.

Verdi's Requiem (heard here for the third time) seemed to call forth the best energies of the orchestra and chorus, and to prove highly satisfactory to the great mass of the very large and eager audience. Of the composition itself, its merits and defects, its great ingenuity and skill, — in some respects originality; the beauty of the opening and many of the middle portions; the preponderance of graphic, realistic and sensational portrayal of the terrors of the Day of Wrath; the artificial, labored show of contrapuntal learning; but the vivid, splendid, picturesque effects of highly colored instrumentation, we have recorded our impressions before, nor do we find them in any way essentially changed or modified. It is not a question of form; that Verdi has not written like a German, but like an Italian as he is, is of no consequence. The question is one of sentiment, of beauty, of poetic and artistic feeling: is the music genial and refined, or is it coarse and artificial? Does it appeal to the deepest feelings of the soul, or only to the sense of wonder? Does it win, inspire and elevate, or does it only startle? We feel that just here is its weakness; its appeal is not to the best that there is in us; it does not — or only seldom — touch the springs of deep religious love and aspiration, but it appeals to fear. Those texts of the old Latin hymn, which offers the best chance for great sensational display of orchestral effects, are the texts chiefly dwelt upon; it is not so with the greater masters like Mozart, Jomelli, Cherubini, — the last two Italians just as much as Verdi. If it were a question of mere form, then it would readily be seen that Verdi himself has made it so, for, next to the sensational element in this work, is it not the struggling effort to compete with the old masters in this very matter of form, in fugue, and polyphonic treatment, which lends a novel interest to this Requiem? No one will ask him to write like Bach, like Mozart or Beethoven, like Cherubini even; but it is fair to ask whether he has written anything as good, as beautiful and true, as independent of the moment's popular impression.

The performance on the whole was excellent. Chorus and orchestra were very seldom at fault. The grander scene-painting came out vividly and strongly. Light and shade were for the most part carefully regarded. The arias and concerted pieces were mostly satisfactory. Mrs. H. M. Smith's clear and powerful soprano voice did good service, though sometimes its effects were overstrained and marred by impure intonation. Miss Cary was altogether equal to her part. Signor Campanini made another great success in the aria: "Ingemisco," and was applauded to the echo. Mr. M. W. Whitney sang the bass solos with grand sonority and dignity.

FIFTH CONCERT, Friday evening, May 7.—The "Spring" and "Summer" from Haydn's Seasons offered the greatest possible contrast, most refreshing and most soothing, to the unpeaceful Requiem of the night before, and the overwhelming Deluge that immediately followed. The fresh, spontaneous, lovely melody served to restore the healthy tone of life again. The music is so uniformly beautiful, flows so easily and naturally, is everywhere so smooth and exquisite, so altogether musical, so free from anything at all forced or sensational, that for this very reason some spoiled appetites are apt to find it commonplace, conventional and dull. The fault is in themselves. To the most musical, to the more deep poetic natures, it was the most delightful. Composed by an old man of seventy, it is the happiest expression of a most genial, child-like sympathy with nature. Its flowing honey does not cloy like that of Spohr. It presents a varied picture nowhere over-colored, nowhere weak or tame. All is characteristic, free from startling contrast and extravagance. The chorus of the thunder storm, so naturally prepared by passages descriptive of the intense midsummer heat, may be a puny tempest by the side of Saint-Saëns's picture of the Deluge, but intrinsically it is more near to Nature and more powerful.

It was sung and played Con amore. All the choruses went well except the first, "Come, gentle Spring," which was a little scrambling. The soprano melody was particularly suited to the voice and graceful, naïve style of Miss Thursby, who sang most charmingly. Mr. Adams was again in better voice, and with his true artistic instinct gave a most expressive rendering of the tenor part; especially in the Recitative and Air descriptive of the summer heat and its effects: "Distressful nature fainting sinks," he realized the full intention of the music in the most complete and tasteful manner. It is always a pleasure to listen to so true an artist, even if his voice be not in its best condition. Mr. Whitney sang the song of the "Husband-man," and indeed all that fell to his share, very finely.

The general verdict on the Cantata, The Deluge, by Saint-Saëns, was, it must be confessed, upon the whole unfavorable, and for once, we think, the popular verdict was about right. The vocal writing seems to have interested very few, while plentiful praise and admiration have been lavished on the transcendent brilliancy and power of its descriptive instrumentation. All the usual and unusual means, to be sure, of the modern orchestra are employed to work up the actual description of the rising of the waters to a fearful and extraordinary climax. It begins suggestively with a faint, watery tremolo, and presently a bubbling and gurgling sound of flutes, and a chromatic whistling of the wind, all quite exciting to the imagination, till finally the great deeps are unloosed with universal, stunning tumult, the like of which in intensity, variety and cumulative persistency of noise, still kept within the bounds of music, was never realized before. Of course the culminating point of rest, and the subsiding of the waters, is turned to good account by the ingenious composer. But taken as a whole, the work, instrumentally as well as vocally, is to our feeling weak, coarse, wilful, wanting dignity, unequal to the subject, and unworthy of a composer who in other things has shown so much genius, though of an idiosyncratic character, and so much musical learning and savoir faire.

The orchestral prelude, (which, strange to say, was much applauded, probably for its mere sensuous charm of sound) is but a vague, creeping, wandering, monotonous, tiresome piece of "endless melody," to use the Wagnerian phrase, which we found singularly dreary and which seemed to come to nothing. Was it meant to represent the spiritual inanity of a race hopelessly lost in sin? This is further explained, and feebly, in a few vocal solos which follow; and then comes the central motive of the whole first, and indeed the second part, upon the words: "This race I'll exterminate surely!" It has an undignified and jig-like rhythm, which it is almost blasphemy to put into the mouth of the Almighty; yet it is first sung as a tenor solo, and then worked up in chorus, to reappear occasionally in emphatic trombone blasts in the midst of the great deluge scene. A few sentences of bass recitative, simple and majestic, would have conveyed the idea more impressively. Then comes a short sing-song chorus in recognition of the upright Noah, about as commonplace and homely as the song "Old Grimes is dead, that good old man."

After the great flood has begun to subside, we have in Part III. most interesting and suggestive themes for an imaginative composer: the scattering of the clouds, the sending out of the dove, the olive branch, the descent from the ark, the rainbow, etc., etc., and here indeed we find the gentlest and most pleasing portion of the music. But again all is spoiled by what should be a sublime conclusion. The command: "Increase and multiply" naturally suggests a fugue. But what a fugue we get! Learned enough, ingenious enough it may be, but desperately dry and uninspiring; the second phrase of the theme is most undignified and scrambling.

The English words are often difficult to sing, and no wonder, for it is commonly a thankless task to turn French vocal texts into anything like singable English.

The performance on the whole was as good as could reasonably be required, especially the orchestral work. And the principal vocalists (Miss Hubbell, Miss Winant, Mr. Adams and Mr. Dudley) did themselves as much credit as could be expected in such music.

— Want of room compels us to postpone our review of the last two concerts.

BERLIOZ'S "FAUST."

Mr. Lang's great zeal and energy in bringing out La Damnation de Faust, for the first time in Boston, on Friday evening, May 14, were crowned with success. The means employed were adequate: an excellent orchestra of sixty (Mr. Listemann at their head), a select, well-trained, efficient chorus, of two hundred and twenty mixed voices, and four good solo singers. The rehearsals had been thorough, the reports from New York had excited eager interest in advance, and the Music Hall was crowded with the best kind of an audience. The result was in the main most satisfactory. Hundreds came away convinced of the inventive genius and originality, the many-sided power, the rare musicianship and learning, the consummate savoir faire, of Berlioz. Pieces, in every form, of tender or romantic beauty, of startling and terrific power, of vivid portraiture and scenical suggestion, were found in abundance. It is a mingling of many elements: the sentimental; the deep brooding, thoughtful, discontented; the comic and grotesque; the airy, fairy, tricky, will-o' the wisp; the martial and exhilarating; and, more than all, the fiendish and the terrible. One quality pervades it all, — intensity; and this alike whether it spring from real feeling, as when it expresses the brooding melancholy of Faust, and the love of Faust and Marguerite, or from a mere passion for effects as in the "Racockzy March," the "Ride to Hell," etc. What Berlioz does, he does with all his might. The strangeness of his genius, on the other hand, was felt: its bizarre and sometimes repulsive traits, the hard side that it has, the defiant, wilful, almost cruel pleasure in humiliating contrasts and surprises, the singular sympathy with the unbelieving, scoffing, Mephistophelian element; and consequently the frequent sacrifice of musical charm, as such, to this sort of indulgence. This Mephistophelian element is after all the main-spring and motive of the whole work; in spite of any formal apotheosis of Marguerite. Not so with Goethe; his Faust is optimistic.

But the music, in all its moods, is almost always interesting, and takes hold with a certain strange magnetic power. The orchestral alone, of which Berlioz is a consummate master, would make it so, however weak it might be otherwise. We must wait for room and leisure to enter into anything like an analysis of so remarkable a work, and doubtless opportunities will be furnished by more than one repetition of the Faust in the next fall or winter. For the present a few first impressions must suffice.

We thought the opening portion, Part I., where Faust is wandering in the Plains of Hungary, musically one of the best. The orchestral accompaniment to his soliloquy, so suggestive of the sunrise and the verdure, and the scents and sounds of the woods and fields, with now and then literal bird-like imitations from the piccolo and horns, is very beautiful; only perhaps too rich and overloaded, suggesting a heavy atmosphere and an overpowering tumult of sweet sounds. But from a subjective point of view, to Faust himself, the very breath and smile and song of Nature might be depressing. The chorus of peasants is thoroughly naïve and charming, one of the most beautiful things in the whole work. Now comes the distant sound of approaching soldiers, and the Racockzy March (a separate inspiration, for the bringing in of which this scene is placed in Hungary) breaks out. We like it best in the simplest form as he first gives it; but it is worked up to a wonderful orchestral climax as it goes on.

Part II. opens with Faust brooding in his study; the introduction is sombre and impressive, but Gounod has surpassed it in that prelude which in the theatre is always thrown away upon an inattentive audience. The Easter hymn is very beautiful, a pure, religious piece of harmony, lifting the mind upward; and it was finely sung. With a sudden sharp orchestral figure, like a flash of lightning, appears Mephistopheles, and in like manner he is always heralded. The chorus of drinkers (in Auerbach's cellar), Brander's "Song of the Rat," with its provokingly short, vulgar rhythm, the satirical but regularly built, ecclesiastical "Amen" fugue which follows, the fiend's "Song of the Flea," with all the dialogue, are grotesque enough, and wonderfully clever; but Faust soon sickens of such specimens of "low life," and the scene changes to the banks of the Elbe, where Faust is sung to sleep by a most exquisite chorus of gnomes and sylphs, worthy of Mendelssohn, or of the opening scene in Oberon, but very different. This too was charmingly sung. And then the orchestral Dance of Sylphs, which follows, shows an almost inexhaustible vein of fairy fancy. On the way to the home of Marguerite, whom he has seen in dream, choruses of soldiers and carousing students are heard, finally mingling their 6-8 and 2-4 rhythm in a skilful manner, making a bustling, noisy contrast to the quiet, tender scene that follows.

Part III. Faust in Marguerite's chamber. Here is some of the loveliest music in the half-hushed, expectant aria of Faust, and the wonderfully expressive wandering melody of the violins alone, as he walks slowly about the room, examining with passionate curiosity what he sees. As a whole, however, the love scene did not impress us as the best part of the work. It has many delicate and lovely passages; but the "King of Thule" ballad, conceived as an old Gothic song, lacks real melody, and has a hard and artificial character. So, too, farther on, Marguerite's "Meine Ruh ist hin" lacks simplicity, being elaborately composed through, with change of rhythm and accompaniment for every stanza. Here, in the first meeting and the sacred privacy of the dream-acquainted lovers, comes some of the most fascinating, and at the same time most uncanny, music. Mephisto conjures up his will-o' the wisps (Irrlichter, "lights that do mislead"), to weave their fatal spell, in an intoxicating and bewitching minut, around the unsuspecting hearts and senses of the innocents, entranced by the young miracle of love. It is a wierd, wondrous, and inveigling piece of instrumental music. And then Mephisto's serenade, borrowing a text from poor, crazed Ophelia's love-lorn ditty, is absolutely fiendish, with the ringing ha-ha of the spirits. The duet of the lovers is beautiful and tender, until the interruption of the fiend, and the infernal taunting chorus of the gossips whom he has gathered round the house.

One of the grandest passages is Faust's "Invocation to Nature," in the scene entitled "Forests and Caverns," one of the noblest parts of Goethe's poem. Here we reach the climax of the fateful drama; here, at the acme of Faust's discontent, the Evil one steps in, informs him of poor Marguerite's imprisonment and condemnation, and persuades him, under the delusion that he thus may save her, to sign the fatal scroll. No time is lost, he summons his two black steeds, and instantly begins the more and more terrible and breathless "ride to Hell." The galloping rhythm has an alarming persistency; on their way they pass and frighten off a group of peasants singing to the virgin; skeletons and monstrous shapes crowd round them, with hideous, appalling sounds; Faust is horror-struck; but the demon urges on his steeds, and suddenly the fatal plunge is made into the sulphureous abyss; and it is all wrought up with such imaginative power, that the listener almost seems to make the plunge himself. This all reminds one of the ghastly ride in Raff's Lenore symphony; but it is far superior to that and very probably suggested it. The scene called "Pandemonium," the welcoming chorus of the demons in an outlandish tongue, was wisely omitted, and the performance closed with the Apotheosis of Marguerite, in a chorus of aerial and celestial harmony.

Mr. Lang had orchestra and chorus well in hand, and all was complete except that the two harps were replaced by two pianos. The only drawback of importance was, that the orchestra too frequently covered up the voices. This was particularly the case (where we sat) with the part of Mephistopheles, although Mr. Clarence E. Hay has a sonorous bass voice, and sang extremely well. Mrs. Humphrey Allen's pure, clear, sweet soprano, and chaste, tasteful and expressive style of singing, were singularly well suited to the part of Marguerite. Mr. William J. Winch sang the tenor part of Faust with true expression and with fine effect, although he was obliged now and then to spare himself in a sustained high passage. Mr. Schlesinger, an amateur, showed disinterested good nature in undertaking the thankless little part of Brander, of which he made perhaps as much as any singer could expect to make.

CROWDED OUT.—The Festival and Berlios monopolize all our available space. Meanwhile there have been some highly interesting concerts to which we must revert hereafter; for instance, those by Mr. Perabo, Mr. Preston, Mr. Tucker; above all, the two admirable programmes of Joseffy, with the aid of Adamowsky and Wulf Fries; the successful concert of Madame Capplan and her pupils; the Apollo and the Boylston Club, etc.

Our concert calendar has nearly run out. There yet remain, however, the third Joseffy concert, for this afternoon, in which, with the exception of one piece with Mr. Lang, the entire programme—an extremely rich and varied one—will be performed by the wonderful Hungarian pianist; and, on Monday evening, the repetition by the Cecilia, with orchestra, of Max Bruch's Odyssus.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., May 6.—The Heine Quartet closed its series of Chamber Music Recitals, April 29th, with the following programme:

String Quartet (B flat), Mozart.
Sonata for Piano and Violin, op. 47, Beethoven.
Andante con Variazioni, Finale, Presto.
Misses Mary and Lizzie Heine.
Trio for Violin, Viola and 'Cello, op. 9, No. 3, Beethoven.
Quartet for Piano, Viola, Violoncello, op. 25, J. Brahms.
Andante con moto, Rondo alla Zingaresca.

The performances have been exceedingly creditable, and it is a good sign that six such concerts could be given here in one season by local talent. The audiences, though not large, have been fair in size, and enthusiastic in temper.

The 270th concert of the Musical Society presented a composition for solos, chorus and orchestra, by Geo. Vierling, a composer not yet well known in America, but one of high standing in Germany, both for talent and musicianship. The text of this work is founded on the familiar episode known in legendary Roman history as The Rape of the Sabine. After the orchestral prelude, Romulus opens the action in a short recitative announcing that all quarrels between the Romans and the Sabines are amicably settled. Then follows at once a joyous chorus of the two peoples, rejoicing over the cessation of strife, giving thanks to the gods and invoking their blessing on the newly sworn compact. Annus, a Roman, whose love-episode with Claudia is to form a main interest of the story, invites to festal pleasures. A chariot race follows, in which Annus is victor, the crowd celebrating his praise in a spirited double chorus. Then the Sabine maidens dance and sing, while the Romans look on enchanted, and Annus declares his love for Claudia in a passionate aria. The Romans join in the chorus of the Sabine women. Then comes a wrestling match in which Annus's victory is again celebrated in an exciting double chorus. At the end of this the Romans begin to warn each other that the time approaches for their plan of seizing the women to be carried into effect. They watch for the signal, which Romulus gives by striking on his shield. He gives the order, and the women are at once seized and hurried within the walls, protesting, and calling on their fathers and brothers for help. This chorus forms the climax for the first part, and with it, the "Rape of the Sabine" is completed. Part II. deals with the unsuccessful attempt of the Sabine men to rescue their women, but the main interest of it centres upon the loves of Annus and Claudia. Claudia reproaches Annus with bitter scorn for his treachery, and declares that, though a weak woman, she will never become the wife of a man who has sought to obtain her by violence. Annus replies passionately that he cannot regret what he has done; his passionate love for her drove him to his act of violence. She grows more and more disdainful, assures him that he has only secured her hatred, not her love, and that she will kill herself sooner than wed him. At last, stung to the quick, Annus gives her his own sword, bidding her kill him, since she hates him so; he will at least die loving her. She takes the sword, but she has at last reached the end of her paroxysm of passion, and a reaction has already begun; his behavior has already softened her, and a terrible inward struggle ensues between her old hate and her dawning love. Annus notes the signs of her change of feeling, and, confident that he has won her; he goes out to beat off the Sabines, who have assembled to rescue their women. While the Romans are gone, the women assemble in the temple of Diana and pray for deliverance, but Claudia watches the progress of the fight from the walls. She sees the Romans victorious, but Annus slain, and over his corpse she acknowledges her love for him in a burst of passionate grief. The whole ends with a new reconciliation of the Romans and Sabines, the former keeping their booty, and all joining in celebrating the kingly race which is to spring from the union of the two peoples.

This text might have been made into an extremely effective opera, instead of a dramatic cantata. It is, however, exceedingly effective in its present form. Both choruses and solos are characteristic of the situations and of the dramatic moments of the play. The composition is musician-like, and the instrumentation is as good as the rest of the technical treatment.

The performance was, on the whole, a good one. The choruses went mostly with spirit, in spite of some timidity in attack on the part of the ladies, who are comparatively inexperienced singers, and also in spite of fatigue due to over-rehearsal. Mr. Luening's enthusiasm led him into this mistake. He needs to temper his zeal slightly, but is nevertheless entitled to great credit.

THE MUSICAL VERSIONS OF
GOETHE'S "FAUST."BY ADOLPHE JULLIEN.¹

I.

THE "FAUST" OF JOSEPH STRAUSS, OF G. LICKL, OF THE RITTER SEYFRIED, OF BISHOP, OF CARL EBERWEIN, OF BEANCOURT, OF BARON PEEL-LAERT, OF SCHUBERT, OF Mlle. LOUISE BERTIN, AND OF LINDPAINTER.

Faust was the constant and favorite occupation of Goethe, the work of his whole life. "Here it is more than sixty years since I conceived the Faust," he says to William von Humboldt, on the 17th of March, 1832, in the last letter that he wrote; "I was young then, and I had already clearly in my mind, if not all the scenes with their detail, at least all the ideas of the work. This plan has never quitted me; throughout my life it has quietly accompanied me, and from time to time I have developed the passages which interested me for the time being." . . . The poem of Faust, as everybody knows, is divided into two very distinct parts. The first appeared in 1807; the second, commonly called The Second Faust, only saw the light in 1831, after being the preferred labor of the great poet to the decline of his days. But music did not wait so long. Scarcely had seven years passed since the appearance of the first Faust, when it resolutely attacked this gigantic work.

Joseph Strauss² was the first to enter upon the career. A musician of merit, pupil of Teyber and of Albrechtsberger, and a very able violinist, Strauss was by turns first violin at the theatre of Pesth, musical director at Temeswar in Hungary, and finally capellmeister at Mannheim. It was towards 1814 that he brought out in a province of Transylvania, where he was director of the German Opera, his opera, The Life and Actions of Faust.

One year later another musician, George Lickl,³ distinguished as a professor of the piano and organist, got hold of the same subject, and lengthening the title, to distinguish himself from his predecessor, gave his opera, The Life, the Actions, and the Descent of Faust to Hell, at the Theater Schikaneder, in Vienna.

Five years rolled away between this attempt and the next. In 1820 the Chevalier Ignaz-Xavier von Seyfried⁴ had represented at Vienna, under the title of Faust, a melodrama of which he had composed the music. The Chevalier was no novice. He had had the honor of being a pupil of Mozart for the piano, of Haydn for harmony, and of Winter for dramatic composition. Of these three illustrious masters he had retained, it seems, only an unparalleled zeal for labor; and, if he was destitute of all originality, he had at least the reputation of an indefatigable worker.

Another interval of five years, and an English composer, Bishop,⁵ pupil of Bianchi, brought out in London, at Covent Garden Theatre where he was musical director, an opera Faustus, which, although signed with his name, was in reality only a more or less successful arrangement of Spohr's Faust. This kind of work, indeed, was the not very meritorious specialty of this author, who after the same fashion wrote a considerable number of dances, vaudevilles, melodies and pasticci.

About the same period, Carl Eberwein, the same who, while a very young man, charmed the leisure hours of Goethe by his talent on the piano, composed an overture and some melodramatic music for Faust, at the same time that he wrote entr'actes for several dramas of the poet and an overture for his monodrama of Proserpine; these various works were given with success at Weimar. This composer, who became musical director of that city, where he was born in 1784, had learned music under the direction of his father, while he made his literary and scientific studies at the gymnasium of Weimar. Later, he received lessons in harmony and composition from his older brother Maximilian; but he possessed ideas more original than his brother, and a richer fund of invention. These gifts of nature vanished as his admiration for the works of Mozart grew; he contented himself with imitating, as closely as possible, the style and formulas of his favorite master.

At length, in 1827, the tragedy of Goethe was transported for the first time upon the French stage, but under what a form and with what music! Faust, an opera in three acts, words by Théaulon and Gondelier, music by Béancourt, was played Oct. 27, 1827, at the theatre des Nouveautés. The music shall not have the privilege of arresting our attention; let it suffice to know that it was drawn from various French operas. But what a pitiful scenario was this of Théaulon, what a miserable parody! Those of our readers who would like to form an idea of it, have only to open the journals of the time, especially the Constitutionnel; there they will find a very amusing recital of a piece which was very little so itself. Four actors of talent were charged with interpreting this lyrico-burlesque drama: Bouffé and Armand played Mephistopheles and Frederic (read Faust), Mme. Albert impersonated Marguerite, and Casaneuve represented her father, the good-man Conrad, a retired old soldier, whose figure is often found in the vaudevilles of the period.

Such is the charm inherent in the creations of genius that, even when disfigured by the most vulgar arranger, they preserve the gift of attracting and seducing real artists. Thus it was with Goethe's drama. Although cut up and travestied as we have seen, it had still the singular power of tempting a man sincerely fond of musical matters. The Baron de Peelaert⁶ was the son of an ancient Chamberlain of Napoleon I.; he had been sub-lieutenant of infantry, was then attached to the staff, and was decorated at the siege of Antwerp. Unfortunately he could only consecrate to Art the moments of respite which the military career allowed him; but he was passionately fond of work, and, in the want of librettos, he wrote the poems of his first operas himself. Finally he had performed at Brussels several works which were not without merit, notably his Faust (March 1834), which obtained a real success, being very well sung by Chollet and Mlle. Prévost for the parts of Faust and Marguerite.

Without composing an opera of Faust, Franz Schubert has set to music some scenes of the drama, and four of his melodies are exact transcripts from the text of Goethe. The best known, Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel, which he dedicated to Count Moritz von Fries, renders in a touching manner the grief of Marguerite and the bitter joy she experiences in retracing the happiness that has vanished. The musician has found admirable accents to convey all the phases of delirium, of passion, from the beginning, sad, calm, resigned, to the instant where the poor girl cries out with a voice broken by emotion: "And the charm of his voice, the clasp of his hand, and, ah! his kiss!" . . . to that last transport of love: "Ah! that I cannot seize him and embrace him forever!"

The ballad of The King of Thule, which Schubert wrote in 1816, is as touching in expression as it is simple in form. A year later he composed his Marguerite imploring the image of the Virgin, a page dramatically treated, which begins with a song full of unctious, and grows more and more animated as the sinner, full of grief and of repentance, repeats her prayer more fervently and drags herself to the feet of the Mater Dolorosa. Three or four years earlier, Schubert had set to music the Scene in the Church, conceived exactly after the original text, but which may be sung by a single person, the chorus being written for one part. In imposing upon himself so restricted a canvas, Schubert could not pretend to compose a great dramatic page; but he knew how to lend true accents to each of his personages. The acrid irony of the demon, the burning despair of the ruined girl, the terrible grandeur of the religious chant, are there expressed with equal felicity, and Marguerite's cry for "Air!" is of heart-rending truth. This picture in miniature must not be compared to any of the creations which this scene has inspired in other composers, but it contains the sketch of a picture hors ligne.

These last two melodies, though comparatively little known, may count among the most beautiful of the celebrated composer;

but pages so pathetic are not so much melodies as they are veritable scenes of the drama, to which the orchestra alone is wanting. These four fragments of Faust, augmented by an unpublished chorus of angels (probably that of the Easter Festival), form, taken together, an ensemble of sufficient consequence to justify our title of the Faust of Schubert.

On the 8th of March, 1831, the Opera Italien of Paris announced the first performance of an opera called Fausto. It was in fact the first serious attempt in France to translate the work of Goethe. On this account it deserves to occupy our attention for a moment. The author was a woman, but a woman keenly interested in her art, and who had learned from the best masters the science of harmony and the art of composing. She held the pen with a practised hand, and her works, of a learned texture, bore in no way a feminine impress. Like a true artist, Mlle. Bertin had not consented to put into music a deformed pasticcio of the German work; she professed a too profound respect for the great name of Goethe. Accordingly the scenario which she adopted was a faithful reproduction of the capital situations of the drama. She had even the happy idea of preserving an episode disdained by those who came after her, and which lent itself singularly to the most fantastic colors. It is the scene entitled The Witches' Kitchen. It is midnight; gnomes, dwarfs, goat-footed devils, sprites, apes and monkeys proceed to their frightful mysteries and dance a Sabbath rondo round the flaming cauldron. The demon and his pupil arrive. Faust wishes to ask of the sorceress the magic potion which will give him back his youth; and while Mephisto, reclining on a couch and playing with a sprinkler, sneeringly says: "Behold me like a king upon his throne; I hold the sceptre; I want nothing but the crown," Faust, handling a mirror, distinguishes there the ravishing image of Marguerite. "What do I see? What celestial apparition shows itself in this magic mirror? Love, oh lend me thy most rapid wing and lead me where she lives!" etc.

The work of Mlle. Bertin met in the journals only kindly judges, who knew how to render justice to its merit, and also to dissemble wise criticisms under compliments quite flattering for a young woman. With regard to a person of consideration and good birth, an exaggerated praise would have been as much out of place as a too sharp criticism. There was a rock which the journalists turned with a great deal of address. See, for example, what was said by the Revue de Paris:

"Enlightened judges have appreciated and will yet appreciate this music, too new, too much out of the beaten track to be all at once popular. . . . For the rest, the anticipations of the public, as it always happens, have been completely deceived. One expected from a young lady pure and graceful strains, sweet and perhaps tame melodies; one was afraid to see so grave, so powerful a subject thrown into feeble hands which it might crush. Great was the surprise to hear an instrumentation constantly new and varied.

at times graceful, but more frequently energetic and sombre.

Meanwhile musical Germany was far from letting alone the masterpiece of Goethe. In 1832, Lindpaintner¹ brought out with abundant success, at Stuttgart, a Faust, which was taken up at Berlin in 1854. The overture especially, is a piece of grand dramatic character and of a striking color. This creation does honor to this artist of talent, who, while remaining faithful to his post of Capellmeister to the king of Württemberg from 1817 to the year of his death (1856), gave an example of a constancy too rare not to be appreciated as it deserves.

MOZART'S SKULL.

ON the fate experienced by Mozart's skull, the Vossische Zeitung contains the following very interesting communication, by the celebrated anatomist, Prof. Hyrtle, living in Perchtoldsdorf, near Vienna, who could not suppress some bitter and sharply contrasted remarks on the occasion of the Mozart Celebration, that lately took place in Vienna, and was received with great applause by the art-loving portion of society, as well as the general public. When Mozart died, there was not enough money found to bury him, and he was laid in the section allotted to the poor of the community. Only three persons accompanied this truly melancholy funeral, among them Schikaneder, the author of the Magic Flute. The most disagreeable, cold and rainy weather, undoubtedly had its share in the scant notice taken of the event.

When the sad train had arrived in the graveyard of St. Marx, near Vienna, a slip of paper, bearing the name of the departed, was as usual handed to the grave-digger, and it was now his concern to add it, as well as a mark for the grave in question, to the list in his books. Through a most peculiar combination of circumstances, the grave-digger had retained Mozart's name in vivid recollection. Once namely, when he went as usual in the time of his boyhood, with his father, — who was butler to some magistrate, — to mass at St. Stephens, they found the Dom crowded with people. Mozart's first mass, which he wrote as a boy of sixteen, was being performed. At that time, his father had held up Mozart so impressively before him, as the model of an ambitious youth, the imposing celebration made so powerful an impression upon him, that he retained the name vividly in his memory. And this gifted man, who was the highest ornament to his country, now received so miserable a burial in the "section for the poor!" Shaking his head, and much incensed over the fact, the grave-digger now put down more particularly in his journal: "A. W. Mozart, in the section for the poor, No. 4, last row, the first by the fence."

In these common graves, there were generally placed six rows of coffins, ten beside and over each other, together sixty in all. After about ten years, the remains were exhumed, and when this took place with the grave in question, the grave-digger gave strict orders to go to work carefully, as he was anxious to know how "the great musician might look now!" He found Mozart's head fallen under his left arm, took the skull with him to his house, wrapped it carefully in paper, and preserved it, again noting everything down. The man fell sick, and left to his successor, among various possessions, also Mozart's skull, which to this successor was of double value, as he was himself a musician.

At about this time died Prof. Hyrtle's mother, and was buried in the same graveyard. Hyrtle's brother, a very capable engraver in copper, and a still better violoncellist at the Beethoven Chapel, was an eccentric character, living alone, and possessing a kindly, childlike heart. Daily when his duties were ended, he betook himself to the churchyard, to spend a few moments reverently at his mother's grave. The grave-digger had remarked him for some time, and when once a violent torrent of rain came down while he remained in the churchyard, the grave-digger very cordially invited him into his house, to wait for the passing of the storm. He did so, and the two men became friends, since both, as good musicians, instantly found in a common object of sympathy a like interest in each other. After the visit to the mother's grave they now played together, views and experiences were exchanged, and thus it happened that one day the friend gave his friend the joyful surprise of presenting him with Mozart's skull as a gift. Prof. Hyrtle immediately received an invitation to come to his brother, where to his unspeakable joy and surprise he heard of the event. As an experienced anatomist, he immediately proved the harmony between the lines of the skull, and the portraits of Mozart, wrote a pamphlet in order to communicate the glad news to the art-loving world, and requested his brother to procure for him exact information as to the name of that grave-digger, his family, etc., and the latter betook himself for that purpose to the magistrate, where he was very politely shown to that official in the registry who had such matters in charge.

Here the story turns. The official, unpleasantly touched in the first place by a demand requiring his time, — asks for what purpose this name and date are demanded, listens to the report, and then remarks very indignantly that a grave-digger is under his oath of office, and has no right whatever to appropriate to himself any object, though it be only an exhumed bone. This remark was quite sufficient to fill the mind of Hyrtle's brother with all the horrors of an illegal transaction, in which he was now himself involved, so that he turned about immediately, wished to hear nothing more of the pamphlet and the glad sensation; nothing of publication, but peremptorily demanded the skull to give it up to the waters of the Danube. No prayers, no arguments were of any avail! The poor man was in such great excitement that the Professor, with a bleeding heart, was obliged to give up the precious relic. From that time a certain estrangement arose between the brothers.

"When my poor brother died," said Prof. Hyrtle, at the close of his interesting episode: "I had his musical instruments and different objects sold. I was present at the sad task of clearing out his room, when one of the men presented to me some object wrapped in paper, with the jeering remark that here was something very rare! That it was in truth! for beside, myself with joy, I recognized the Mozart skull, which I have since then preserved like a holy relic. In my will, I have made it over to the city of Salzburg, for the Mozarteum erected there, and have already informed the city of that fact. The Edinburgh Museum of arts and curiosities has offered me three hundred ducats for the skull, and with this another strange story is connected. Haydn was court musician to Prince Esterhazy, Ambassador in London at the time of the Congress. When the Congress was assembled at Vienna, Esterhazy invited the Englishmen to a hunting party, to his estates in Hungary, and there, — Haydn had then been dead for some time, — one of the Englishmen expressed the wish that Esterhazy might show them the Mausoleum of Haydn, his celebrated musician, who, like Mozart, was buried in Vienna. This put the Prince into an embarrassing position, and he gave as an excuse, that the mausoleum was not yet finished. Finally the Prince really erected one to Haydn. The body was taken up, but — the head was wanting. That is in Edinburgh. Gall's phrenological theories were then the order of the day, for neither pains nor expense were spared to procure skulls of celebrated people, — it had become a wide-spread mania, particularly in England. It is easily to be comprehended that they would have given a great deal to have Mozart's skull with that of Haydn."

The former however, has been, through the reverential affection of the celebrated scholar, preserved to his own country, as a lasting memento of one of the most brilliant names in the world of German art.

MR. DUDLEY BUCK'S CINCINNATI PRIZE CANTATA.

(From the New York Musical Review, April 29.)

... As a libretto, the composer selected portions of Mr. Longfellow's poem, The Golden Legend. This poem is too long to be used in its entirety for the purpose of musical composition. Mr. Buck, therefore, chose such parts as would give an outline of the plot, and at the same time render the composer's task a congenial one. Some passages, in which the action was delayed by philosophical discussion or for other reasons, have been summed up in orchestral movements and as a whole the composition may be considered a musical emphasis of the leading points in Mr. Longfellow's narrative. The plot and incidents are portrayed by the prize cantata in fourteen scenes.

The first of these is a prologue, and is that part of the poem which Liszt has set to music under the title, The Bells of the Strasbourg Cathedral.

Lucifer and the spirits of the air are endeavoring to pull down the cross from the cathedral of Strasbourg. It is night, and the attempt is made during a raging storm. Lucifer's commands, the despairing voices of his spirits, who fail in their attempt, and the solemn chorus of the bells are heard alternately. The cross can not be torn down, for around it

All the Saints and Guardian Angels
Throng in legions to protect it.

Then, as Lucifer hears the bells, he calls upon his host to seize them and "hurl them from their windy tower." But the bells defy the unholy powers; for they have been anointed and baptized with holy water. Lucifer, infuriated, bids his servants aim their lightnings "at the oaken, massive, iron-studded portals." There, however:

The Apostles
And the Martyrs, wrapped in mantles,
Stand as wardens at the entrance,
Stand as sentinels o'erhead.

The spirits are again baffled; the bells chant once more; Lucifer calls to retreat; and the powers of the air sweep away, singing:

Onward! Onward!
With the night wind,
Over field and farm and forest,
Lonely homestead, darksome hamlet,
Blighting all we breathe upon!

As they vanish, voices are heard chanting:

Nocte surgentes
Vigilemus omnes!

This prologue, it has been seen, demands music which is not only descriptive in character but also eminently dramatic. It forms, in a measure, a key to the entire Golden Legend, which tells of a sinner's deliverance from the evil one through the sanctity of a pure young girl who is willing to die in his stead. The triumph of religion over the powers of evil is portrayed both in the prologue and in the legend itself; only that in the prologue religion is represented by a beautiful, sacred edifice, and in the legend by a beautiful, human character. Lucifer is prominent both in the poem and in the cantata. Mr. Buck has represented him by a malicious motive which occurs whenever he takes part in the action. Before the entrance of voices in the prologue, a powerful orchestral prelude (Allegro con fuoco ed agitato) presents an eloquent epitome of the scene. It is night. A fierce storm is raging around the spire of the Strasbourg Cathedral. The opening bars of the cantata represent a momentary lull in the tempest. The scene begins with a tremolo in the bass; and at the third beat rapid passages are heard on the violas and cellos. These gusts increase in fury as the rapid passages rush impetuously higher and higher, until at length, while the wind shrieks through the spire, Lucifer appears with the powers of the air. Mr. Buck has very cleverly imitated the shrill blast of the wind in high air, by suddenly ending the rapid chromatic runs and the shake in the bass, and allowing the wood instruments and violins to continue a tremolo far up in the treble. After this has lasted during a single bar, Lucifer's appearance is announced by the following motive:

This theme is given to the trombones and the trumpet, while the storm is continued in the accompaniment until a fine climax is reached. Then, as the motive grows fainter, the storm gradually subsides, and, after a few fitful gusts (flutes, clarinets and oboes), the bells toll solemnly and are followed by the chant to which the final words of the prologue, Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes, are sung when the spirits of darkness are vanquished. Nothing could better represent the religious element in this triumph than the old chant which Mr. Buck has selected. It is the familiar Gregorian chant with a slight rhythmic alteration by which it assumes this form:

It is continually interrupted by the storm, which grows louder and louder until the chant gives way to the Lucifer motive; after which the vocal recitative of Lucifer begins. All the time that he is heard urging on his spirits, his motive is audible in the orchestra. In despairing cries his host deplores its inability to injure the cross. Then follows the solenelle of the bells. When Lucifer furiously commands the powers of the air to hurl the bells to the pavement, the orchestra breaks in with a bar of descriptive descending octaves. But again his spirits are baffled. As their cries are repeated, the flutes, clarinets and oboes play a shrill, malignant accompaniment. Then the chorus of the bells is renewed, and during it the orchestra intones a mournful song to the words: Defunctos ploro, and a triumphant strain to the words: Festa decoro. The music incidental to the attack which Lucifer directs against the portals is based on the same thought as that which accompanied the preceding incidents. But the interest is sustained by a variety of instrumentation. Finally the spirits rush from the scene, singing a chorus, whose quick time and sweeping rhythm well represent their swift departure. After they disappear the Gregorian chant alternates between chorus and orchestra; the orchestra gliding back to the chorus in gentle syncopations. Toward the end of the prologue the music gradually fades away, until the last strain seems no more than a breath. Vigilemus omnes is alternately sung by male and female voices, while a peaceful orchestral accompaniment adds to the tranquility of the scene.

The second scene represents a chamber of Vautsberg castle on the Rhine, in which Prince Henry of Hohenek, ill and restless at midnight, laments his fate. A disease for which he can find no remedy has blunted his powers of enjoyment and his life is a weary monotony of sorrow. His sadness finds expression in a touching melody. As he recalls the scenes of former days, the accompaniment becomes descriptive of his thoughts and in various changes depicts his fantasies as they follow one another. Finally he exclaims: "Rest! Rest! O give me rest and peace." The bars accompanying these words are typical of his longing and give musical expression to its effect upon his character. Since they recur and in a certain sense may be regarded as a leading motive, the vocal part is quoted:

As the third scene of the cantata begins, a flash of lightning suddenly illumines the night; and Lucifer appears in the garb of a traveling physician, his presence being announced by the orchestra sounding his motive. When Lucifer makes a storm which has detained him in the village an excuse for his intrusion, the tempestuous passages heard in the prologue are repeated, and he thus seems to have ridden to Vautsberg on the same storm which had borne him to the Strasbourg Cathedral; as though, immediately after his defeat by the guardian angels, the anointed bells and the apostles at the portals, he had thought of directing his attack against human frailty. Prince Henry describes his malady, while a reminiscence of the tenor solo in the second scene is heard in the accompaniment. He tells Lucifer that even the learned doctors of Salerno have no remedy for him except one which it is impossible to obtain. Their prescription reads:

The only remedy which remains
Is the blood which flows from a maiden's veins,
Who of her own free will shall die,
And give her life as the price of yours.

Lucifer then offers Prince Henry an elixir of his own concoction. As he pours out the limpid fluid, his motive is played on the trombones. Prince Henry drains the goblet, while a chorus of angels is heard warning him against the evils to which he who drinks the elixir is subjected. As he swallows drop after drop he feels new life in every vein. As golden visions hover around him he sings a delirious melody. In the accompaniment Mr. Buck has skillfully contrived to combine the mocking voice of Lucifer, a semi-chorus and a full chorus of angels. As the warning of the angels has been disregarded, their voices are mostly heard pianissimo. Only once, at the word "contrition," they rise to a forte, while, during the entire number, Prince Henry's melody must be delivered with ecstasy.

Up to this point the libretto has followed the poem pretty closely. Now, however, many parts of Mr. Longfellow's work are omitted; and, in order to understand the connection between the succeeding scenes in the cantata, it is necessary to glance from time to time at the poem itself. After Prince Henry has drained the goblet offered him by Lucifer, the scene changes to the courtyard of the castle. In it Hubert, the seneschal, relates to Walter, the minnesinger, that Prince Henry has been sent by the church into disgrace and banishment, and has found refuge with some of his tenants in the Odenwald. The second part of the poem brings the reader to Prince Henry's place of refuge and introduces Elsie, her parents, Gottlieb and Ursula, and Elsie's playmates, Bertha and Max. Elsie, Bertha, Max and Gottlieb sing, as they are lighting the lamps in the farmhouse, the evening song, which forms the fourth scene of Mr. Buck's composition.

Elsie enters with a lamp, Max and Bertha follow her and they all sing the evening song on the lighting of the lamps. It is a beautiful quartet for soprano, alto, tenor and bass without accompaniment. It will probably be the most popular part of the composition; though there are other portions in the cantata which appeal more strongly to the cultivated musician. The melody is naïve and its sentiment well in keeping with the graceful simplicity of the scene.

Prince Henry is heard at the door pronouncing "Amen." In the conversation which follows, Elsie learns that he must die unless some maiden, of her own accord, offers her life for his and is willing to die in his stead. This brings us to the fifth scene of the cantata, where Elsie, who is determined to make the sacrifice for Prince Henry, is praying during the night for strength to carry out her purpose. In the sustained measures of the music there is a spirit of determination which well gives utterance to the feelings of resignation and of religious repose with which she looks forward to her fate.

The poem then narrates Elsie's announcement of her purpose. Prince Henry will not at first accept the sacrifice until he has consulted a priest at the confessional. Lucifer disguises himself as a priest and in this assumed rôle advises the prince to accept the sacrifice. This advice Lucifer gives,

"To foster and ripen an evil thought
In a heart that is almost to madness wrought,
And to make a murderer out of a prince."

Thus he hopes to gain Prince Henry's soul. He has also persuaded Elsie's mother that God wishes her daughter's sacrifice. Accordingly, Elsie and Prince Henry set out for Salerno, where Elsie is to die. This pilgrimage to Salerno follows Elsie's solo in the cantata, since a musical treatment of the intermediate incidents and developments of the plot would have unduly lengthened the composition.

The sixth scene is, therefore, entitled The Pilgrimage to Salerno, and is scored for the orchestra only. It is an expression of certain thoughts which are suggested by the poem. The journey over the highway, which "onward and onward runs to the distant city," is described by a march movement heard almost uninterruptedly throughout the entire number. To recall the religious sentiment awakened by a contemplation of Elsie's character, the composer has introduced a choral melody (first heard on oboes, clarinets and bassoons), over which he has written the words sung by the pilgrims in Mr. Longfellow's poem:

"Urbs coelestis, urbs beata,
Supra petram collocata,
Urbs in portu satis tuto
De longinquo te saluto!"

In the meantime the march motive continues in the rest of the orchestra. This combination of march and chorale reaches a very effective climax with the first fortissimo, when the chorale is syncopated by the trumpets and trombones, while the march retains its old form. It continues with varying instrumental coloring until a movement, Poco più mosso, is reached. The march movement continues alone for two bars and is then employed as an accompaniment to the music (quoted above) in the second scene of the cantata, when Prince Henry sings "Rest! Rest! O give me rest and peace!" etc. Then the Lucifer motive appears; for it was Lucifer's evil prompting which induced Prince Henry to accept Elsie's sacrifice. Again part of the tenor solo of the second scene is heard. This time it is the music which accompanied the words: "Sweeter the undisturbed and deep tranquillity of endless sleep." The same motive occurs again on the return of the Tempo di marcia, after the chorus and march movement have again been combined and after several recurrences of the Lucifer motive. Finally, the majestic chords of the chorale with a jubilate accompaniment for strings, depict in brilliant colors the triumph of religion. A compact Allegro molto—the march movement and a syncopation of the chorale—closes a most descriptive and interesting episode. It is, in a measure, an overture to the remaining portions of the cantata. For, without attempting to enter into many incidents of the plot, it gives, by recalling typical motives from former scenes and by the introduction of the chorale, a terse but eloquent account of the characters concerned in the pilgrimage, the causes to which it may be traced and the result. It is also interesting as a new musical form. Raff somewhat approached it when he introduced a dramatic episode into the march of the Leonore symphony. But Mr. Buck has written a march with which he has combined other incidental themes. The constant reiteration of the march emphasizes the main fact, the pilgrimage; while numerous phases and incidents are introduced or recalled by the continuous recurrence of typical motives.

In narrating the pilgrimage to Salerno the poet has described a number of picturesque situations, many of which had to be omitted from Mr. Buck's work. At first the pilgrims are seen in Strasbourg, where they visit the cathedral and attend a miracle-play. From here the reader follows them on the road to Hirschau, whither they are going to sojourn for the night in the convent and neighboring nunnery. In the next part of the poem they pass over the Devil's Bridge, through the St. Gotthard Pass, and, after passing a night at Genoa, sail thence to Salerno.

From these incidents Mr. Buck first selects the revel in the refectory of the convent at Hirschau for musical treatment. It forms the burden of the seventh and eighth scenes in the cantata. In the former Friar Paul sings a boisterous drinking song, which is followed by an equally boisterous refrain by the chorus of merry monks. After the first refrain Friar Paul sings a solo with exaggerated portamento, and this mock-religious dignity, while singing the praise of the wine, is a clever point of this humorous episode.

The next scene, "The revel and appearance of the abbot," is an Allegro bacchante for orchestra only. The movement opens with a jolly, noisy theme which, when played with zest, calls up vividly the monks making merry over their cups. Suddenly while the violas and clarinets continue the revel, the chords of the Gregorian chant are intoned by the horns. The religious sentiment of this chant is in strong contrast to the abandon of the carousing monks. Its orchestral combination with the boisterous themes of the revel is an instrumental satire. The chant symbolizes the servants of God as they should be; the revel is typical of the worldly desires to which they only too frequently yield. After the orchestra has played the melody of Friar Paul's drinking song, and the revel theme has occurred as a fugato and has entered into several interesting combinations with the chant—at times appearing as an accompaniment to it, and at other times accompanied by it,—the revel when at its height is interrupted by the appearance of the abbot. His presence and his surprise at the scene are indicated by three sustained notes. As he gives vent to his anger, the three notes are repeated twice with increasing rapidity. Some time evidently elapses before all the revellers are aware of his presence. For, as indicated by the fitful recurrences of the revel theme, the carousal subsides gradually until, when quiet is restored, the movement closes with the Gregorian chant.

Those parts of the poem in which the action takes place in Genoa, form the ninth and tenth scenes of the cantata. The former is a solo for Elsie. The night is calm and cloudless, and, as she looks over the sea from the terrace, she hears the solemn litany from the rocky caverns and the shelving beach, and the ghostly choirs answering Christe Eleison. In the music this Christe Eleison does re-echo. It is sung at intervals by a chorus which, with the orchestra, accompanies Elsie's solo.

The following scene is a melodious barcarole, for orchestra only, descriptive of the verse beginning:

"The fisherman who lies afloat,
With shadowy sail, in yonder boat
Is singing softly to the night."

The instrumentation suggests a moist atmosphere, and the melody is sombre and mysterious, like the night and the sea.

The barcarole is followed in the eleventh scene of the cantata by a sailors' chorus, the music of which is incidental to the voyage by sea from Genoa to Salerno. It is a manly song with a highly descriptive accompaniment, especially to the words:

"Around the billows burst and foam."

and

"They beat her sides with many a shock."

In the twelfth scene Prince Henry, Elsie and their attendants enter the College of Salerno. The orchestra opens with a phrase which recalls Henry's solo in the second scene. Lucifer is disguised as Friar Angelo and answers Henry's questions in recitatives accompanied by the Lucifer motive. When Lucifer asks Elsie if she comes of her own will and has thought well of the step she is to take, her religious faith is expressed by a short orchestral prelude, based on the Gregorian chant before referred to; after which she asks to be killed, while the chorus sings:

"Against all prayers, entreaties, protestations,
She will not be persuaded."

As she turns to her friends and bids them rejoice rather than weep, the Gregorian chant is heard again. When Elsie has been led away, Prince Henry repents of having brought her to be sacrificed. He calls upon the attendants to aid him in rescuing her, and with cries of "Angelo! Murderer!" they burst open the doors and save her from destruction.

The thirteenth scene represents Prince Henry and Elsie who have been wed at evening on the terrace of the castle of Vautsburg. They sing a melodious love-duet, which does not call for special analysis. It should be noticed that a silvery light passes over the orchestra at the words:

"It is the moon, slow rising."

The next scene closes the cantata. It is entitled, Epilogue and Finale. An Andante molto maestoso opens with a forcible instrumentation of the Gregorian chant. Then the chorus takes up in triumphant strains the verse which begins:

"O beauty of holiness, of self-forgetfulness, of lowliness!"

After the first fourteen bars of the chorus an organ-point, A, occurs in the bass, which lasts during twenty bars. Shortly afterwards reference is made to Lucifer, and his motive is now heard for the last time in the orchestra. It serves to increase by contrast the brilliancy of the music at the re-entrance of the original chorus, which leads almost immediately to an Allegro assai. In this the Gregorian chant is used with fine effect, and thus the final triumph of religion over the powers of darkness is portrayed in the last measures of this interesting composition.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LONDON.—The Handel Festival, at the Crystal Palace, will be held on June 18, 21, 23 and 25. The list of vocalists (according to the correspondent of the New York Musical Review) includes the names of Mmes. Patti, Albani, Lemmens-Sherrington, Osgood, Trebelli, Patey, Anna Williams and Suter; Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Lloyd, McGuckin, Maas, Santley, King, Bridger and Foli. "Cherubino" (of the London Figaro), however, writes:

I am authorized to state that the principal engagements already made for the Handel Triennial Festival at the Crystal Palace are those of Madame Adelina Patti, who will sing on the "selection" day, Madame Albani, who will sing the chief soprano music in the Messiah, Madame Patey, Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Foli. A few other engagements of less importance are yet to be concluded, but these artists will be the chief vocalists at the Handel Festival. Those to whom the engagements have been entrusted have been careful—except in the case of Madame Patti, who may justly be regarded as the prima donna of the vocal profession—to, as far as practicable, retain artists of British nationality only. For this reason, and also because some at least of them are either unversed in the traditions of oratorio, or are not heard at their best in Handelian music, the claims of Madame Nilsson, Madame Gerster, Madame Marie Roze, Mrs. Osgood, Madame Sterling, and Herr Henschell have been set on one side, and their absence will, except in one or two instances, be little regretted. It is sufficient that the Crystal Palace authorities have been able to put forth a very strong list of vocalists without needing the services of others than those of British nationality; and in these days when indifferent foreigners are preferred to efficient English artists, the public spirit of the Sacred Harmonic Society and the Crystal Palace Directors is to be recommended. The arrangements for the choir of 4000 voices, which will, as usual, be composed of the best choristers throughout the United Kingdom, are now fairly on their way to completion, and, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, the Handel Festival bids fair to be as successful as it ever was.

There seems to be a strong "Know-Nothing" party in the musical world of England; witness, also, the recent outcry about the appointment of Max Bruch, a "foreigner," at Liverpool.

—Herr Hans Richter, the Wagnerian conductor, par excellence, has commenced a series of concerts, of which the Musical World (May 15) says:

The concerts, of which the first was given on Monday, are to be nine in number, with one extra for the benefit of Herr Franke, the leader of the orchestra and "artistic director." In each of the nine programmes a Beethoven symphony figures, but examples of Wagner's music appear in only four, while the selections from Schumann are two, from Schubert two, and one each from Mendelssohn, Spohr, Haydn, Cherubini, Liszt, Berlioz, Mozart, Chopin, Bach, Brahms, and Volkmann.

With the selections from foreign masters, we are not disposed to quarrel. As regards some of them, Schubert is well represented by his Eighth and Ninth Symphonies, Mendelssohn by his "Italian," and Brahms by his No. 2; while, generally speaking, the difficulties of choice amid many equal claims have been fairly surmounted. Turning to the executive means placed at Herr Richter's disposal, we find that the orchestral strings number sixty-five—e. g., first violins, fifteen; second violins, sixteen; violas, twelve; violoncellos, twelve; double basses, ten. Adding the usual complement of wind and percussion instruments, the grand total reaches nearly to 100. A glance at the list of names in this strong band shows that a large majority are foreigners. Thus the principals in all the string departments are Germans, and most of the chefs de pupitre among the "wind" have un-English patronymics.

The same critic says of Mr. Parry's Concerto in F-sharp minor, which was played in the first concert:

Mendelssohn refers with good-tempered sarcasm, in one of his letters, to certain ambitious composers of that day who "wrote pieces in F sharp minor." Mr. Parry is their legitimate successor, not only as regards choice of key, but in respect of the qualities which Mendelssohn suggested without expressing. He is a pretentious composer, and unites to pretence a degree of cleverness sufficient to "carry on" reasonably well before a public more sympathetic than discriminating. We are far from wishing to depreciate Mr. Parry's ability—indeed, seeing that he is an Englishman, we would magnify it in the eyes of the world. But, unfortunately, here is, to judge by the concerto, an Englishman gone wrong. Educated in Germany, Mr. Parry has fallen in love with some of the worst features of modern German music, and now, gravely purporting to speak as an artist, he shows himself vapid in gentle mood, incoherent in passion, eccentric in construction, and in effect irritating. We stand in amazement before such a production as this concerto, and ask ourselves under what strange delusion it was conceived and written down. An answer might, perhaps, be found in the depths of the philosophy, so called, which is now disturbing the serenity of our art with its sounding but senseless jargon. We are told to recognize the origin of music in the direct revelation of the Will—with a capital "W"—to the outer world by means of the cry, or shriek, or groan, or any other inarticulate and involuntary noise. The composer it seems, is only an organizer of these sounds, which, in their nature, are unconnected with exterior things, and become intelligible by conceding something to human weakness, and permitting themselves to be controlled by rhythmic measure.

The other numbers of the programme were: Wagner's Meistersinger Overture, Beethoven's Symphony in C, No. 1, and Schumann's Symphony in D minor. Of Herr Richter's conducting, the writer, after questioning some of his tempo on the score of slowness, says with regard to the Schumann Symphony:

"Never before in our experience, did the beauty and meaning of that fine work stand out so clearly. There was confusion nowhere—no distortion nor excess of color, nor sensational device. As the master thought, so Herr Richter, knowing well his thoughts, assisted him to speak. In truth, the conductor was beyond praise. Able to dispense with a book, his eyes were all over the orchestra, and the players seemed to be aware of it, and to feel their inspiration and authority. Wherefore every man became in his degree a Richter—and Richter may be said to have played the symphonies. If we knew any higher testimonial than this, we would give it to the Napoleon of the bâton.

—Besides songs and other unimportant pieces, 98 works of primary interest have been performed in the course of the recent Crystal Palace season. Of these, 34 works are entirely new to the Crystal Palace. The chief novelties produced during the season in the section of symphonies are Haydn's in E flat, No. 8 of the Salomon set, "La Chasse" in D, Hofmann's "Erithjof," Raff's "Frühlings Klänge," and Rubinstein's "Dramatic." In overtures, the novelties have been Bazzini's "King Lear," Dr. Heap's "Birmingham," and Verdi's "Aroldo." In concertos, Beethoven's violin allegro in B, Götz's violin concerto, Joachim's variations for violin, Molique's A minor violin concerto, Parry's piano concerto in F sharp, Saint-Saëns's third piano concerto in E flat, Schumann's violoncello concerto, Shakespeare's piano concerto, and Spohr's twelfth violin concerto in A, have been the chief novelties, and there have besides been many new miscellaneous works for orchestra. Some of these novelties are, however, new only to Crystal Palace audiences, and have been heard elsewhere. But the total result is most satisfactory, and it may be said that, thanks to the ability of Mr. Manns, his orchestra, and his soloists, and to the liberality and wisdom of the directors, the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts have worthily upheld their fame, and have contributed largely to the diffusion of musical knowledge, and to an increased love of the divine art.—Figaro."

—Sir Michael Costa has resigned the post of conductor at Her Majesty's Theatre, owing to a pecuniary dispute with Mr. Mapelson, which began some years ago. For some time past a cabal has existed against Costa, who, besides being autocratic and unbending in his department, is accused of that lethargy which must accompany age. "You can't stir Costa," has been the cry and the excuse for the non-production of novelties. Sir Michael Costa's resignation has been followed by those of many leaders of the orchestra; and notably M. Sainton, Mr. Weist Hill, Mr. Lazarus—and others who invariably follow Costa.

—During to-day pourparlers are inactive progress for the engagement at her Majesty's, of Herr Hans Richter, to conduct Wagnerian and a few other operas. Richter has obtained the necessary permission from Vienna; and the only reason why he hesitates is because it is feared his acceptance of the post would damage the success of his concerts. Still, it is admitted on all sides, that his engagement is devoutly to be wished; and it is not unlikely, if he occupies the conductor's desk at her Majesty's, the course of opera in this country would be changed for the better.

Meanwhile, Signor Arditi is acting as conductor-in-chief; and he will open the season, with Nilsson in Faust, on Saturday. Signor Boito has consented to come over to England, to direct the rehearsals and the first few performances of his opera, Mefistofele, at Her Majesty's Theatre.—Corr. Mus. Review, May 11.

—The performances at Covent Garden have hitherto excited but little interest, and people are beginning to ask whether Mr. Ernest Gye would not have done better to follow the example of Mr. Mapelson, and make his summer season as short as possible. Madame Albani sang in "Sonnambula" on Saturday, and in "Faust" on Tuesday, and on Thursday she was announced to resume her famous character of Elsa in "Lohengrin." Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine" is to be attempted to-night, with Mlle. Turolla in the part of Selika—made famous by Madame Pauline Lucca and Madame Adelina Patti. Happily, the last named prima donna will reappear on May 15 (the evening of the opening of Her Majesty's Theatre), and this will, it is hoped, infuse some new life and spirit into the season.—Figaro, May 8.

—Of Mr. Mapelson's Opera we further read:

In the soprano list Mmes. Nilsson, Gerster, Marie Roze, and Crosmont, Misses Minnie Hauck, Marimon, Van Zandt, and Salla, are among the better known names, while Mme. Robinson, Mlle. Martinez, Mrs. Mary Swift, and Mlle. Nevada are débutantes. The contralto list is more than usually strong, including Mme. Trebelli, Mlle. Tremelli, Madame Demeric, and Miss Annie Louise Cary, the last an old favorite at Drury Lane. Of tenors the list includes Signori Campanini, Fancelli, Lazzarini (from the American troupe), Maas, Candidus, Frapolli, and Runcio. The baritones are few in number, and these will probably be added to; while among the basses is Signor Papini, a buffo. The return of Mme. Cavallazzi will afford unalloyed pleasure to lovers of the dance. Boito's "Mefistofele" will, it has already been announced, be produced for Mme. Nilsson, and "La Forza del Destino" for Mrs. Swift and Signor Campanini.

VIENNA.—A magnificent statue of Beethoven, the cost of which was defrayed by a subscription among music-lovers all over the world, was unveiled on Saturday in front of the square of the Academical Gymnasium at Vienna. Beethoven is represented as sitting on a rock, his hands across his knees, his cloak fallen from his broad shoulders to his hips, and his body in the attitude of one listening to distant music. Prometheus gnawed by the eagle and the Goddess of Victory are at the left and right, respectively, of the pedestal, which is surrounded by nine geniuses. The word "Beethoven," in large Roman characters, is the only inscription. The monument, which is, altogether, twenty-five feet high, was designed by Herr Kaspar von Zumbusch, Professor of Sculpture at the Academy of Vienna, and it has been executed by that celebrated sculptor and his best pupils.

ROME.—The Società Musicale Romana is studying the music to be given at the inauguration of Palestrina's statue in the grand hall of the Palazzo Panfilii. The list includes several works composed expressly, among them being a Psalm, by Bazzini; an "Agnus Dei," by Pedrotti; a "Laudate Pueri," by Platania; a "Miserere," by Gounod; a "Prelude, for orchestra and organ," by Ambrose Thomas, etc. Richard Wagner contributed a Psalm of Palestrina's, arranged by himself, but the regulations of the festival not admitting any non-original modern composition, it will not be performed; in fact, to use a well-known expression, "it is declined with thanks." Can "The Master's" refusal of the Municipality's invitation for the first performance of Lohengrin in the Eternal City have had ought to do with this strict adherence to "regulations."—London Mus. World.

BONN.—The monument to Robert Schumann has just been inaugurated in the presence of Madame Clara Schumann and her family. Brahms directed the music, from a conductor's desk improvised on the monument, and the number "Schlaf nun und ruhe," from Paradise and the Peri, re-orchestrated by Brahms, was the leading feature of the programme. In the evening a concert was given, at which the E flat Symphony, No. 3, the Requiem for Mignon, and part of the Munfred music, were performed, with the violin concerto of Brahms, played by Herr Joachim. Next day the string quartet in A minor, the piano quartet, and the "Spanisches Liederspiel" of Schumann, were performed by Brahms, Joachim, and others. A banquet terminated the festival.

SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1880.

THE FIFTH TRIENNIAL FESTIVAL.

SIXTH CONCERT, Saturday Afternoon, May 8. — This was in one sense the gala-day of the Festival, although the givers of the feast, the old Handel and Haydn Society as such, in their own choral capacity, figured less than in any other concert. It was the people's day, when thousands from the country, far and near, thronged to the Music Hall, attracted by the array of famous solo singers. The great crowd is always drawn by a certain interest in the personal performer, more than by the beauty or the grandeur of the music in itself. Hence, such a day and such a programme are dear also to the solo artists; it gives to each an opportunity to shine in pieces of their own selection; each rides in upon his own hobby-horse, with which he has won before, and still feels sure to win. The consequence is, that non-descript affair, a miscellaneous programme. But in this case the miscellany was a remarkably good one. Ten out of the fourteen numbers were vocal solos; there were no instrumental solos or concerted pieces; no full symphonies; but the orchestra played one overture and one intermezzo; and the great chorus sang a Jubilate by Handel, and a very short, but splendid chorus by Bach—all that the whole week's Festival allowed to that great master! The crowd was overwhelming; every seat was occupied and hundreds of applicants were turned away. The order of the programme was excellent:—

1. Overture, "Rübezahl," op. 27 Von Weber.
 2. Utrecht Jubilate, Handel.
 3. Solos by Miss Cary, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Whitney.
 3. Romance from "La Forza del Destino,"
"O tu che in seno agli angeli," Verdi.
Signor Campanini.
 4. Song, "La Calandrina," Jomelli.
Miss Thursby.
 5. Aria from "Il Duca d'Eboli,"
"De giorni miei," Da Villa.
Mr. Courtney.
 6. Grand Duet from "William Tell,"
"Non fuggire," Rossini.
Signor Campanini and Mr. Whitney.
 7. Intermezzo from Symphony in F major, op. 9. Goetz.
 8. Air from "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Voi che sapete," Mozart.
Miss Cary.
 9. Miriam's Song of Triumph, Reinecke.
Miss Hubbell.
 10. Air from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," "Jerusalem," Wagner.
Mr. Whitney.
 11. Siegmund's Love Song, "Winterstürme," from "Die Walküre," Wagner.
Signor Campanini.
 12. Aria from "Giulio Cesare," Handel.
Miss Winant.
 13. Aria from "L'Etoile du Nord,"
"Non s'ode alcuna," Meyerbeer.
Miss Thursby.
- [Flute accompaniment played by Messrs. Schlimper and Riefel.]
14. Quartet and chorus from the "Cantata per ogni tempo," Bach.
The quartet by Miss Hubbell, Miss Winant, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Whitney.

The performance, singly and collectively, was most satisfactory. The two great choral pieces—which we have before described—were given with great spirit, especially the final chorus of the Jubilate, and Bach's "The Lamb that for us was slain," which, with the full power of five hundred voices, orchestra and organ, formed two of the climactic points of the Festival. The orchestra of seventy,—as good a one as Mr. Zerrahn ever conducted in this city—was at its best in the Rübezahl (or "Ruler of the Spirits") overture of Weber, and the charming intermezzo from the Symphony by Goetz.

The solo singing reached its climax in the magnificent duet from William Tell, which unites all the fervor of passionate love and of great-hearted heroism. Sig. Campanini's wonderful voice rang out superbly, with electric force, and seemed to inspire his companion, so that a new vitality was felt in his ponderous deep tones. The Italian tenor was almost equally successful in his two other selections, particularly in Siegmund's "Love Song," which he sang with feeling and with delicacy, saving the Italian liberty he took, for mere vocal display, with the concluding phrase. Mr. Whitney brought out the clumsy humor of Hans Sachs's comic air in a way that amused and pleased the audience. Mr. Courtney, the English tenor, always sings with true artistic style and feeling; but all the interest of his single Aria lay in his singing and not in the composition, which is commonplace and sentimental,—written, it is said, by a teacher of singing in Cincinnati.

We should have begun with the ladies; but it is not a bad rule to keep the best for the last. Miss Thursby, with her exquisitely sweet, light, limpid voice, was in her element in the bright and florid melody of Meyerbeer, in which she was finely seconded by the two flutes; as well as in the quaint and dainty little "Canary" song, by Nicolo Jomelli, which proved a fascinating bit of sunshine. Miss Cary took young Cherubino's love song a little too seriously, but her noble alto voice was very effective in the short passages of solo, duet, and trio in the Jubilate. Miss Hubbell threw a wonderful amount of sustained brilliancy and fervor into Reinecke's "Miriam" song, which both vocally and instrumentally, is an exceedingly effective composition; her clear soprano had just the telling quality for that. Miss Winant, with her rich and sympathetic contralto voice, sang an Aria: "Empio dirò" from Handel's Italian opera, Giulio Cesare, with faultless manner and expression; it was one of the most truly artistic specimens of singing in the Festival.

SEVENTH (LAST) CONCERT, Sunday evening, May 9.—There was some falling off in the attendance, the evening being very hot, and Solomon being understood to be not one of Handel's greatest oratorios. The effect produced essentially accorded with the description we have already given of the work, based on our impressions after hearing it twenty-five years ago, as well as more recent examination of the score. One great obstacle to its success lay in the fact that the sketchy instrumentation of the original score required such completion as was made by Mozart for the Messiah, and by Franz for several works of Bach and Handel, to fit it for performance. It was found impossible to procure Sir Michael Costa's parts from England, and at the last moment, when the Society were committed to the work, some parts for the clarinet were written, and those for bassoon and horn were amplified by Mr. J. C. D. Parker, Mr. Zerrahn preparing parts for the trombones. But this was not enough. Of course the organ in the background became all the more important, and Mr. Lang put in some good work there. Under the circumstances it was a pity that the work was undertaken at all.

Yet in spite of its tiresome length of solos of the old conventional cut, in spite of the comparatively small number of the grandest kind of choruses, and in spite of meagre instrumentation, there was much in Solomon to charm and to impress, much of the Handelian tenderness and sweetness in the airs, much of his graphic power, as well as majesty and lofty inspiration in its choruses. The latter were perhaps hardly sung with all the spirit shown in some preceding concerts, for naturally the singers had become fatigued; but the great hymns of praise at the beginning and the end, the charming epithalamium: "May no rash intruder," with its sound of nightingales, and the descriptive series in the last part, especially the mournful one: "Draw the tear from hopeless love,"—a piece of solemn harmony in which Handel is at his very best—were all well rendered, and produced a fine impression.

Of the solos the chief part, the alto part of Solomon, was carefully and smoothly sung by Miss Cary, though her noble voice showed some signs of fatigue. The same may be said also of Miss Thursby, whose sweet voice, finished style, and intelligent conception feebly expressed the tenderness and pathos of the parts of the Queen, and the First Woman. Miss Fanny Kellogg's greater voice and greater earnestness, in the parts of the Queen of Sheba, and the vindictive Second Woman, were in strong contrast with the other. Mr. Courtney sang in a thoroughly artistic manner in the part of Zadoc, rendering the long stretches of roulades with perfect evenness and grace; and Mr. J. F. Winch was fully equal to the trying bass songs in the character of the Levite.

The Festival was in every sense an unquestionable success. To Carl Zerrahn, who trained the great chorus and the orchestra, both separately and together, and who conducted the whole, working with gigantic energy and endurance, in season and out of season, until all was ready and accomplished, inspiring all the forces with his own enthusiasm, the first praise is due. But to the rare organizing faculty of the Secretary of the Society, Col. A. Parker Browne, and to the President and whole board of directors, who so wisely planned the whole, we must give almost equal credit. In some respects, to be sure, the programme was not, in point of grandeur and intrinsic musical importance, quite up to the high standard which the Handel and Haydn Society had set in previous festivals. At this stage of our musical progress it really seems strange that there could be a whole week's festival of music, mostly sacred, without some one important work of Bach; for it is in this direction that true progress must be sought. Former festivals, too, have given us more in the form of great orchestral music; and there was a pretty general desire to hear Mr. Paine's new Symphony on this occasion; but room could not be made for it after the whole festival was planned. The Cincinnati festival certainly undertook greater work than our own in two important features: the Missa Solennis of Beethoven, and the cantata: Ein Feste Burg, of Bach. Let us comfort ourselves with the assurance that the Handel and Haydn Society propose to work upon the former during the coming year.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

DEFERRED NOTICES.

JOSEFFY.—The three concerts in the Music Hall, arranged by Mr. Peck for the great Hungarian pianist, drew large audiences, especially the last. There was no orchestra, and they were essentially chamber concerts (in too large a place), Herr Joseffy's only assistants being Messrs. Adamowsky and Allen, violins, Heindl, viola, and Wulf Fries, 'cello, and neither of these appeared in the last concert, of which the programme was essentially remodelled. In the first concert (May 17), Mr. Adamowski's violin was heard to good advantage in the E-flat Trio, op. 100, of Schubert, which opened, and in the "Kreutzer" Sonata, which closed the programme. The young violinist's solos—a bright, fantastic Scherzo by Spohr, and a broad cantabile cavatina by Raff—were played with admirable technique, manly style and feeling, and were received with enthusiasm, which rose to a greater height on his playing for an encore, a transcription of a Nocturne, by Chopin. Mr. Joseffy's solos were, first, the eight numbers of Schumann's Kreislariane, very moody and fantastic, as well as very difficult, pieces. The slow movements are far more enjoyable than the quick ones, which have a certain wilfulness and puzzling vagueness. The execution and interpretation were singularly perfect. Next he played three of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words, and Liszt's Venezia e Napoli (Tarantella), all in the clearest, most delicately finished, and most brilliant manner, especially the Tarantella, a kind of thing in which he is at his best.

The second concert (May 18) was the most satisfactory, both in programme and performance, of the three. It opened with the bright and cheerful little Trio, No. 1, by Haydn, which was charmingly rendered by Messrs. Joseffy, Adamowski and Fries, so far as the Andante and the Adagio Cantabile were concerned; but the Rondo Ongarese suffered from the extremely rapid tempo at which the pianist took it up, compelling the violin to scramble through it at an uneasy pace.

After a Prelude and Bourrée from a Suite of Bach in A minor, played with wonderful grace and neatness, Joseffy quite astonished even those who had not been entirely satisfied with his interpretations of Beethoven, by the splendid fire and pathos, as well as the delicacy, the subtle finesse, and the superb bravura which he threw into the Sonata Appassionata. Something seemed to have roused in him a spirit he had scarcely shown before; he played like one inspired, and with a magnetic influence on the audience. That Sonata we could not desire to hear better played by any artist.

Mr. Adamowski won new favor by his artistic and effective rendering of an interesting fantasia on Gypsy dances (Zigeunerweisen) by the gifted Spanish violinist, Sarasate.

Then came a remarkably interesting group of pianoforte solos, chief of which in magnitude and intrinsic value was the Variations Sévères by Mendelssohn, which Joseffy played most admirably. Two of the little one-movement Sonatas (in G minor and F minor) by Domenico Scarlatti, arranged by Tausig, and a quaint Gavotte by Kirnberger, of Bach's and Handel's time, made a genial impression. But nothing more perfect in its grace and delicacy has yet come from Joseffy's fingers than the Nocturne in E flat by John Field, the inventor of that form, and Chopin's model. A minuet by Schubert, from a sonata, was delightfully rendered; and two flowery Etudes, graceful enough, but too much alike, composed by Joseffy and dedicated to Liszt, of course were faultless in the execution. The great Schumann Quintet, in E flat, for piano and strings, saving some accidents, due again, we fancy, to the tendency to hurry rapid movements, brought the concert to a noble close.

The programme of the farewell matinée (Saturday, May 22) consisted, with only one exception, of performances by Herr Joseffy alone, as follows:—

1. a. Chromatische Fantasie und Fugue.
b. Passapied. E minor.
c. Gavotte. G minor. J. S. Bach.
d. Sonata. Op. 53. C major. Beethoven.
2. a. Menuet. Mozart.
b. Etude. Henselt.
c. Träumerei. Schumann.
d. Two Preludes. St. Heller.
e. Prelude (D flat major.) Impromptu (A flat.)
Mazurka (A minor.) Valse (F major.) . . . Chopin.
f. Four Etudes. Op. 25. (A flat.) (F minor.)
(C sharp minor.) (A minor.) . . . Chopin.
3. Variations on a Theme by Beethoven. . . Saint-Saëns.
TWO PIANOS.
Herr Joseffy and Mr. J. B. Lang.
4. a. Valse caprice. (Schubert.)
b. Au bord d'une source.
c. Consolation. No. 5. E major.
d. Gnomenspiel.
e. Campanella. Liszt.
5. a. Menuet.
b. Serenade.
c. Près du ruisseau. Rubinstein.
d. Midsummer Night's Dream. (Paraphrase.) . . Liszt.

Here was a marvellous amount of work in a single concert, for one pair of hands! That the interpreter was equal to it, all passes without saying; and it is useless to try to invent new terms of praise and admiration for the faultless technique, the light and shade, the delicacy and the strength, the exquisite finish, etc., etc., which he again displayed under so many forms. At the same time it must be admitted that the impression of his art lost, rather than gained by that afternoon's experience. Left now to himself, and also, perhaps, unconsciously prompted by the anticipation of the long list of pieces to be gotten through with in a given time, it is no wonder that his tendency to rapid tempos had full swing. It showed itself in the smaller things by Bach, in the Beethoven Sonata, and in many of the following selections. To be sure, such an artist can execute such tempi evenly and clearly, and without a flaw, where others might have to scramble; but is the mere fact that one can perform a certain feat a valid artistic reason for his doing it? There were, moreover, some instances of affectation and sophistication in certain renderings, as, for instance, the Minuet from Mozart's E-flat Symphony, and Schumann's Träumerei, which Theodore Thomas has in a questionable sense made "everlasting." Besides, the audience were wearied and bewildered by so many pieces so alike in florid elegance and so much fairy arabesque. By no means would we intimate that many of them were not played wonderfully well, while, naturally enough, some in such a long procession of pictures seemed to be passed before us quite perfunctorily and coldly. In the variations by Saint-Saëns, which went at a rational and steady time throughout, it must have been very hard for any listener to discover that the two pianists were not capitally well matched.

(To be continued.)

MR. MASON IN JAPAN.

It will be remembered that Mr. L. W. Mason, late Supervisor of Music in the Boston Schools, left three or four months since for Japan to undertake the introduction of the study of music into the schools of that Empire.

Letters lately received announce his arrival at Tokio, and the cordial reception extended him there. A banquet was given in his honor, at which were present all the high officials, including his Excellency the Minister of Education, with the Vice Minister, the President and Vice President of the Imperial University, and the heads of the Normal Schools, sixteen in all; Mr. Mason being the only foreigner.

No one, perhaps, of any nation has been furnished at the start with means so liberal as have been provided him. A building has been erected purposely for Normal instruction in Music, with a view to preparing teachers in this branch of study for all the common schools. When in operation, this institution is intended to be connected directly, not only with the two Normal and Training Schools, but with all the public schools of Tokio, which are to serve as patterns for the rest throughout the Empire. From this movement will probably result a National Conservatory of Music.

For the present, Mr. Mason will confine himself chiefly to labors in school music, believing that the beginning is to be made with the children. Their ears, it must be borne in mind, have yet to be attuned to our scale even—as their own consists only of five sounds; do, re, mi, sol, la. A year or two ago, while giving instruction in singing to a couple of Japanese pupils here in Boston, Mr. Mason happened to play over a song which attracted their attention, and seemed to give them special delight. This little air was none other than the familiar tune:

"We have come from a happy land
"Where care is unknown"—

A melody involving, as will be seen, only the sounds of the Japanese scale. No doubt it reminded the young men of home.

Mr. Mason does not conceal from himself either the magnitude or the difficulty of the work he has undertaken. He recognizes, however, the very favorable auspices under which he has commenced, and hopes not to lose, in this new field of labor, the good wishes and kindly remembrance of his friends in America.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

The Handel and Haydn Society held its annual meeting May 31, in Bumstead hall, and elected the following officers: President, C. C. Perkins; vice-president, George H. Chickering; secretary, A. Parker Browne; treasurer, George W. Palmer; librarian, John H. Stickney; directors, Henry M. Brown, M. G. Daniell, F. H. Jenks, George F. Milliken, George T. Brown, Eugene B. Hagar, W. S. Fenollosa, Josiah Wheelwright. The report of the treasurer showed that $3,300 had been added to the permanent fund,—$2,500 earnings of the society during the year, $500 a donation from a generous friend who does not desire his name to be made public, and the remainder interest; music to the value of $1,000 has been added to the library, and $500 remains in the treasurer's hands. The receipts of the recent Festival, in round numbers, were $20,500, and the expenses $19,300. The profits of the three concerts given previous to the festival were $800. The amendment of Mr. Daniell, in which it was proposed to admit the ladies of the chorus to the privileges of honorary membership, after twenty years service, and to excuse them from further attendance on rehearsals and concerts, was not adopted.

The Harvard Musical Association, finding the result of the past winter's Symphony Concerts in all respects encouraging, have re-elected the same committee (Messrs. J. S. Dwight, C. C. Perkins, J. C. D. Parker, Augustus Flagg, B. J. Lang, S. L. Thorndike, S. B. Schlesinger, W. F. Apthorp, Charles P. Curtis, Arthur Foote and G. W. Sumner) to prepare another series (the sixteenth) of eight or ten concerts.

At Wellesley College the 73d concert (fifth series) was given on Monday evening, May 10, by the following performers: Miss Louise Elliott, Soprano, Mr. A. L. De Ribas, Oboe and English Horn, Mr. E. Strasser, Clarinet, Mr. E. Schormann, Horn, Mr. Paul Eltz, Bassoon, and Mr. Charles H. Morse, the musical Professor at Wellesley, Pianoforte. The programme was as follows:

- Quintet for Piano and Wind Instruments, in E flat.
(Largo, Allegro Moderato—Larghetto—Allegretto). Mozart.
"Ave Maria." Schubert.
(English Horn).
Songs—a. "Joys of Home." Schumann.
b. Serenade. Gounod.
Quintet in E flat, Op. 16, for Piano and Wind Instruments. Beethoven.
(Grave, Allegro ma non troppo—Andante cantabile—Allegro ma non troppo).

Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood's Normal Musical Institute, which has been so successful in the past two summers, will be resumed at Canandaigua, N. Y., (one of the pleasantest spots imaginable) on the 7th of July next, and the session will continue five weeks, ending Tuesday, Aug. 10. The corps includes for the piano: W. H. Sherwood, Eugene Thayer, and Miss Grace Sherwood; vocal culture: Harry Wheeler, Eugene Thayer; Musical Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Musical Form and Sight-Singing, L. A. Sherwood; Organ, Church Music, Oratorio: Eugene Thayer; Violin: Gustav Dannreuther; Violoncello: Chas. F. Webber. Lectures will be given on Vocal Physiology and Culture, by Mr. Wheeler; on piano-playing, by Mr. Max Piutti; on various musical topics, by Mr. Thayer; on the Physical Theory of Sound, by M. Armand Güys; on Elocution, with dramatic readings, by Miss Jennie Morrison. The opportunities to hear the pianoforte and organ compositions of the best masters both analysed and played by such able interpreters as Mr. Sherwood and Mr. Thayer, will be numerous.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE FOURTH CINCINNATI MAY MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

It is a pleasure to be able to record that the progress which has been noticeable in each succeeding festival was again apparent this year. The programmes in general design were far in advance of those of the past festivals, while the principal works they contained gave evidence that the musical director had reason to expect material, both in the chorus and orchestra, superior in quality and quantity to that formerly at his disposal. The sequel proved that he was not mistaken in assuming this, for it is acknowledged on all hands, that these principal requisites were present and achieved a remarkable success, notwithstanding the extraordinary demands which several of the works performed made on them.

The central figure around which the other choral works were symmetrically grouped, was of course Beethoven's Massa Solemnis, in D. It is not surprising that this great work is so seldom performed, for it contains difficulties which under ordinary circumstances are almost insurmountable. When, in the year 1824, four parts of it were given under the personal direction of Beethoven, he was fairly besieged by the soloists and chorus director, with requests to allow them to make alterations in passages which they claimed could not be sung. The composer, however, made not the slightest concession, but insisted on the original reading. The physical exertion which is required of the chorus and soloists almost throughout the entire work, can only be overcome by earnest determination and never-failing enthusiasm. The intervals are frequently unsingable, while many of the passages which occur it is almost impossible for the chorus singer to execute in a manner technically correct. Whatever may have been his reason for so doing, it is certainly true that the composer has completely disregarded the ordinary rules of vocal composition. But in this case the end justifies the means.

As is well known, the Mass was composed for the installation services of the Arch-duke Rudolph, as Archbishop of Olmutz. While it was evidently the purpose of the composer to adapt the work to the ritual of the Catholic church, he could not long remain under the restrictions thereby imposed upon him. It is interesting to note how in the course of the composition the musician Beethoven cast off these fetters. Thus it happens that the Mass is not a church composition in the strict sense of the word. Beethoven was not a believer in dogma. In his work we find expressed in music the general ideas which the texts suggests, such as humility, adoration, omnipotence, wonder at a supernatural occurrence, as for example in that exclamation et, which introduces the et incarnatus est, and again the et homo factus est. The narrative of the crucifixion, death and resurrection of Christ is treated dramatically; likewise the Agnus Dei in the solo recitative, and, after the remarkable symphony in the thrilling phrase for the chorus. Frequently the meaning of the words is almost realistically illustrated in music. In the Gloria in excelsis, for instance, the voices ascend in a rapid scale passage to the outermost limits of their compass, suddenly to sustain full chords in the lowest register with the words et in terra pax. The et ascendit is interpreted in much the same way, while in the et sepultus est, the darkness of the grave is vividly depicted. From these few examples it is evident that Beethoven construed the text, not in an ecclesiastical but in a general sense. Whatever there was in the words calculated to give rise to musical ideas, he made use of to the fullest extent. He did not hesitate to represent violent emotions which are foreign and antagonistic to the traditional conception of the Mass. This also accounts for the prominence which he gives to the instrumental accompaniment. In the Mass, the preference with which Beethoven, during his so-called last period, made use of the highest forms of counterpoint, is very evident. Here, as in his last string quartets and piano sonatas, he does not permit the treatment of a musical idea to be in any way affected by a consideration of the technical difficulties which may arise. In the Gloria fugue these are very great. Skips of augmented and diminished intervals, of major sevenths and ninths, are not unusual. These difficulties, however, fade from sight in comparison with those of the Credo fugue. The composer seems to have had no regard for the compass of the different voices, or for technical possibilities. In view of this, it is really astonishing that the chorus sang not only well, but with excellent effect. Almost in every instance the phrases were attacked with precision and confidence. The intonation was very good, even in the most difficult and sudden modulations, of which there occur many. A remarkable feature of the chorus singing was the intelligent way in which the principal themes of the fugues were made prominent, as well as the discretion with which such parts as, for instance, the violin solo and solo quartet in the Benedictus, were accompanied. So close and constant was the attention paid to the conductor, that by the slightest sign he could control the entire body of six hundred singers. It was this thorough discipline which enabled Mr. Thomas to infuse life into the work of the chorus. The signs of expression were observed not so much because they had been learned by rote, as because the singers had become accustomed to exercise their own judgment, and to catch the idea of the conductor by giving him their undivided attention. The parts were excellently balanced. The tenors and basses were especially good, owing in a great measure to the fact that there was present in these voices a large German element. The two solo quartets consisted of Miss Sherwin, Miss Cary, Sig. Campanini, Mr. Whitney, and Miss Norton, Miss Cranch, Mr. Harvey, Mr. Rudolphsen.

Next to the Mass in importance was the Bach Cantata: "A Stronghold Sure" (Ein feste Burg), with which the Festival opened. It is one of the most effective of the several hundred composed by the great master, for the Sundays and Festivals of the church year. Luther's grand choral yields the subject matter for the whole work. Its first line, with slight melodic and rhythmic alterations, constitutes the first subject of the grand opening fugue; in remarkable contrast to which, the second line is introduced in its original weighty and incisive rhythm. The second verse of the choral: "Our utmost might is all in vain," is sung by the solo soprano accompanied with an uninterrupted running figure of the solo bass. Much after the general plan of the "Passions," there follows a moral reflection, an admonition, called forth by the preceding words of the choral: "Consider then, Child of God, all the wondrous love." To this the soprano, representing the Christian soul, replies in an Aria: "Within my heart of hearts, Lord Jesus, make thy dwelling." Then follows the third verse of the choral: "If all the world with fiends were filled."

The voices sing the melody in unison, while the orchestra storms and rages round about them. The order of the first part of the Cantata is now followed again. The tenor pronounces the admonition: "Then close beside thy Saviour's blood-sprinkled banner, my soul, remain," to which in a duet for alto and tenor comes the reply: "How blessed then are they, who still on God are calling." The last verse of the choral in beautiful sustained harmony, sung a capella, forms the fitting close. In accordance with the custom followed by Bach, a prelude written and played by Mr. Whiting, the Festival organist, formed the introduction. The laborious task of adapting the work from the mere sketch left by the composer, for a performance with grand orchestra, Mr. Thomas was compelled to undertake himself. He made use of all the resources of the modern orchestra; but, as the result showed, with good judgment. No foreign elements were introduced. Only such motives and passages as are to be found in the original were employed. The original reading was retained wherever practicable. In the duet for alto and tenor, for instance, the only change made was in giving the part of the oboe da caccia to the English horn.

The chorus sang the Cantata almost faultlessly. The choral in unison was rendered with the greatest precision and accuracy, notwithstanding the confusing orchestral accompaniment. In the last verse, for voices alone, a beautiful, sustained, yet powerful volume of tone was developed, and the pitch from beginning to end held without the slightest deviation. In Handel's Jubilate the chorus did most excellent work. The final Adagio in the last chorus, with the mighty crescendo, made an overwhelming impression.

The prize composition, "Scenes from Longfellow's Golden Legend," by Dudley Buck, was the novelty of the third evening concert. The work consists of fourteen scenes which comprise the principal and salient points of the entire poem. Of these, three are wholly instrumental. It would lead too far to attempt detailed analysis. There is apparent throughout a perfect knowledge of instrumental effects, alone, as well as in combination with voices. While the work contains but little that is strikingly original, the author can lay claim to the merit of having carried out successfully and satisfactorily all he has undertaken to do. There is no attempt to accomplish things which are beyond his power. Of contrapuntal writing and elaborate work there is but little to be found in the choral numbers. There is almost throughout a sameness of rhythm in the different voices which borders on monotony. There are, however, many effective passages to be found which more than offset the weak points of the work. Its reception at the hands of the vast audience was most flattering. Every scene was warmly applauded, and several were demanded encore. At the close of the performance the composer was called for by the chorus and audience. Mr. Buck was conducted upon the stage and introduced by Mr. Pendleton, President of the Festival Association, and received an ovation which must have been a source of great satisfaction and pleasure to him.

Of the work done by the soloists and orchestra at the evening and afternoon concerts it is impossible to speak in detail. The band consisted of one hundred and sixty performers, and it was the general opinion that the like of orchestral playing has never before been heard in this country. The richness and power of tone which came from the army of strings, under the most perfect discipline, and in the most perfect harmony with the conductor, were grand beyond expression. The corps of wood and brass instruments was composed of solo artists who knew how to produce a large volume of tone without forcing their instruments and sacrificing its beauty.

The Fourth Musical Festival was certainly a grand success, and beyond a doubt will prove a landmark in the history of the musical development, not only of Cincinnati and the West, but of the whole country.

CHICAGO, May 29. — The interests of the musical season have had two centres of culmination in this country, in the great Festivals of Boston and Cincinnati. In our own city, the musical entertainments have been placed so far in the shadow by these great attractions that your correspondent felt that he had better not trespass upon the space of the Journal, when others had far more interesting matter to offer, and had a just claim upon the columns of the paper.

Since my last note, we have had a visit from Mr. E. B. Perry, the blind pianist of your city, who gave us the pleasure of hearing him in two recitals. His programmes contained interesting music, and he played with a fine appreciation of the interest of the composers he was interpreting. Indeed his accomplishments are of such a high order, that one is hardly able to understand how it is possible, without sight, to obtain such a command over the pianoforte. In this respect, his energy, and the result of his work, are lessons to many a pianist who has the full use of all his powers; for when one can accomplish so much under the perplexities that the want of sight must produce, I am sure a man with his whole powers ought to be ashamed of any ordinary progress. In the West, we need many lessons upon the proper development of talent, for the superficial is often taking the places which belong to real attainment.

Sensationalism was again the active power in one of our recent concerts. Madame Rivé-King, Miss Litta, Miss Sherwin, Messrs. Fritsch, Conly, and Fischer, with Mr. Dulcken, came here for a single concert, when it pleased the enthusiastic manager to call the entertainment a "Musical Festival." That your readers may have some idea of what this gentleman calls a Festival, I annex the programme:—

1. Flotow — Duo from "Martha."
Messrs. Fritsch and Conly.
 2. Servais — Fantaisie Brillante.
Mons. Adolph Fischer.
 3. Mozart — Aria from the "Magic Flute."
Mr. George A. Conly.
 4. Meyerbeer — "Vane, Vane," (?) from "Roberto."
Miss Amy Sherwin.
 5. a. Chopin — Prelude in D flat, from Op. 28.
b. Mendelssohn — Andante and Rondo, from the Violin Concerto, Op. 64, transcribed for the piano by Mme. Rivé King.
Mme. Rivé King.
 6. Donizetti — Aria from "Lucia."
Miss Marie Litta.
 7. Verdi — Trio from "I Lombardi."
Miss Amy Sherwin, Messrs. Fritsch and Conly.
 1. Saint Saëns — Second Concerto in G minor, Op. 22.
Andante sostenuto — Allegro Scherzando — Presto.
Mme. Rivé King.
- Orchestral parts on Second Piano, with Organ Obligato written by Mr. Dulcken.
Mr. F. Dulcken.
2. Puccini — "Havi un Dio," (Preghiera.)
Miss Amy Sherwin.
 3. Fischer, a. "Au bord du Russian," (?)
b. "Caprice Espagnol."
Mons. Adolph Fischer.
 4. Benedict — "Carnival of Venice."
Aria and Variations.
Miss Marie Litta.
 5. Rossini — "Romanza."
Mr. C. Fritsch.
 6. Braga — Concertante.
Mons. Adolph Fischer.
 7. Berlioz — Trio, from "Damnation de Faust."
Miss Marie Litta, Messrs. Fritsch and Conly.

The idea of so great a musical gathering as a "Festival," beginning with so important a work as a Duo from Martha, may make the lovers of music, or of propriety, smile. The unfitness of the thing must have also become apparent to the singers; for at the last moment they substituted "the Fishermen," by Gubussi, but unfortunately the work had not received that rehearsal that its importance demanded, for Mr. Conly made many false notes, and at one place lost himself completely, but the tenor came in with much promptness, and helped over the difficulty, and the selection was ended with more effect than we had reason to expect. Yet it was a rather sad opening to a "Festival." But seriously, the concert, notwithstanding its very bombastic announcements, had a number of good points. Mme. Rivé King played well, and gave us much pleasure. Also Mr. Fischer, the cellolist, and Miss Litta won the applause of the audience for her brilliant singing. Miss Sherwin sang with much taste, although her voice upon the high notes was not as pleasing as one might wish. Perhaps she was not in her best voice.

On Tuesday evening last, the Beethoven Society closed its season with a concert, presenting the following works:—

- The Erl-King's Daughter, Ballad, Gade.
The Fisherman's Grave, A Ballad Cantata for Solo, Quartet and Chorus, with Orchestral and Piano
Score, J. Maurice Hubbard.
Finale from 1st Act of "Lohengrin" Wagner.

This society has not had the support that it deserved this winter; for, although the houses have been well filled at each concert, I am inclined to believe that the financial return has not been as large as it ought to have been. This society has undertaken to depend upon home talent in producing the many works they have given us this and past seasons, and unfortunately our people do not seem willing to encourage efforts made to aid musical development in our city, but demand the attraction that foreign artists present, in order to be led to pay full tribute to enterprises in the concert direction. It is a pity that such is a fact, for we have many musicians in our city, who should be encouraged more than they are.

At Hershey Music Hall, a number of popular matinees have been given, at which our home artists have appeared. They have been reasonably successful.

THE MUSICAL VERSIONS OF
GOETHE'S "FAUST."BY ADOLPHE JULLIEN.¹

II.

THE FAUST OF PRINCE RADZIWIŁŁ, OF RIETZ, OF CONRADIN KREUTZER, OF L. GORDIGIANI, OF JOSEPH GREGOIR, OF HENRY COHEN, OF HUGH PIERSON, OF BOITO, OF FERDINAND DE RODA, AND OF ED. LASSEN.

In 1835, Prince Anton Radziwiłł,² governor of the Grand Duchy of Posen for the king of Prussia, and for the rest a passionate amateur of music and a brilliant violoncellist, published at Berlin a musical poem of Faust, having perhaps the Capellmeister Wilhelm Schneider for a collaborator. This remarkable work, as Fétis says, has been executed in many cities of Germany, and represented many times at Berlin, where the Royal Academy often plays it on the anniversary of the Prince's death. Goethe has praised it in the year 1814 of his Annals: "The visit of Prince Radziwiłł awakened a desire difficult to satisfy; the original music which he has composed for Faust, this happy and entrancing music, gave us only a remote hope of bringing upon the stage this singular work."

Finally, toward the year 1836, Julius Rietz,³ pupil of the celebrated Zelter, and a very able violoncellist, had Faust represented after his fashion in the theatre founded by Immermann at Düsseldorf. He had been expressly called there by Mendelssohn, who had confided to him the musical direction of that theatre. He soon succeeded Mendelssohn in the post of musical head of the city; then he became at once director of the Gewandhaus of Leipzig and conductor of the orchestra at the theatre, and finally Capellmeister of the king of Saxony.

At very nearly the same period, Conradin Kreutzer, whose works are more remarkable for qualities of technical structure and experience, than for richness of invention, composed and had executed at Vienna a series of pieces on the principal scenes of Faust. This renowned musician, who, of very low extraction, had known how to elevate himself to the first rank in his art by dint of perseverance and of labor, finished, as he had begun, under the patronage of Goethe. He had, in fact, composed his second theatrical work upon Goethe's comic opera libretto, Jery und Bätely, and had seen it played in the Court theatre of Vienna through the miscalculation of the director, Weigl, who, always hostile to young débutants, had only given this piece under the conviction that it would have no success. The expectation of the envious man was deceived, and this representation recruited numerous partisans for the young musician. Goethe had served him favorably at his début; he inspired him equally well at the end of his career; for these two works may be ranked among the best which Conradin Kreutzer has produced for theatre or concert.

To adapt to the German poem the inspirations of the Italian muse was a perilous undertaking, only to be excused, in case of non-success, by the honor of attempting it. The Italian Opera, Fausto, by Gordigiani,⁴ appeared in 1837 at the Pergola Theatre in Florence. The author had allowed himself to be seduced by a very bad libretto, and had finished his music in a very short time at a fixed date. The result was a flagrant fiasco, one of the few such to be counted in the history of theatrical revolutions. This check was due to the absurdities of the book, to insufficient rehearsals, to the negligence of the artists, and finally to the puerility of the machinery employed for the transformations and enchantments. The music, in which one remarked some facile melodies, was not of force enough to exorcize such a disaster. This unfortunate event was, as it were, a prelude of the career of the author, who went on composing pieces of chamber-music, and vocal melodies, without ever being able to succeed upon the stage.

At the very period when Berlioz was writing the first scenes of his Damnation de Faust, in the midst of the noise and agitation of Paris, a young Belgian musician was polishing and repolishing a score inspired by the same subject, which he wished soon to produce in public. On the 27th of January, 1847, Joseph Gregoir had his work executed at Antwerp in a grand festival which he had organized with the aid of two hundred singers and as many instrumentalists. The début of the young composer made a great noise in his native country. The concert took place in the hall of the Cité, "all resplendent with lights," say the journals of the time. Ladies of the city sang the choruses, and so the tickets for the festival Gregoir were at a premium for some days at the Bourse. The author was received with acclamations, and was sung in verse and prose; then music and musician sank into oblivion.

The plan of this "musical poem" is very nearly that which the collaborators of Gounod afterwards followed in writing their libretto; for M. Gregoir has simply chosen the principal scenes of the first Faust of Goethe, and has put them into music. Strangely, he has conceived his subject in very nearly the same manner with Gounod, and has rendered it in the same amiable and discreet gamut, in that demi-tint which is like the moonlight of genius. He pauses by preference at the sentimental, touching and impassioned scenes which are met with in the philosophical drama of the German poet; he is even so well quartered in this agreeable domain, that he has eliminated the person of the devil from his poem. A Faust without Mephisto is as bad as a Faust without Marguerite or without Faust.

In that same year, 1847, a French composer, M. Henry Cohen, had performed in the hall of the Conservatoire, at Paris, a lyrical poem, Marguerite et Faust, which met with a very good reception. One grand scene, entitled The Triumph of Mephistopheles, was especially applauded. This lyrical poem remains the principal work of the well-taught musician, who had learned harmony of Reicha, singing of Lais and Pellegrini, and who, after having twice gone to try his theatrical fortune in Italy, became director of the Conservatoire of Lille, a function which he soon resigned, on account of disagreements in opinion with an administrative commission which was joined to him as council.

Some years later, England paid a new tribute to the poet in the person of Hugh Pierson, an artist of merit (born at Oxford in 1816), who had devoted himself to music against the will of his father, titular preacher of King George IV., and who had made his musical education in rather a fragmentary manner, receiving lessons and counsels by turns from the organist Atwood, from Paër at Paris, Walmisley at Cambridge University, Tomaschek and Reissiger in Germany. When Bishop died, he replaced him for an instant at the University of Edinburgh; but he was soon tired of being professor, and returned to Germany, where his opera, The Triumph of the Sylphs, was played at Brünn with some success, while that of Leila raised a storm at Hamburg. He lived eight years in that city, then returned in 1853 to London, where he composed an oratorio of Paradise, and a second Faust, which passes for his best work. Pierson died at Leipzig in the beginning of 1873.

In March, 1868, an Italian composer, M. Arrigo Boito, who is, on the Peninsula, the most convinced partisan of the innovating theories of Richard Wagner, produced at La Scala, in Milan, a Mephistofele which must be counted among the musical pasticci of the drama of Goethe. This opera did not succeed, and the second representation raised a frightful tumult; it was for the work a sentence of immediate death. The principal reproach incurred by the young musician was the want of melody. Could it be otherwise, knowing his neo-German tendencies, his preferences, and his admiration for the "music of the future"? This check, then, did not imply that the opera was devoid of merit, and, by the admission even of the musical journals, it contained several pages of a fine conception and a powerful execution. Moreover, the merit of the author was recognized by all unprejudiced judges when his opera was resumed at Bologna, October 4, 1875. It was for the city, which was the first in Italy to admire and applaud Lohengrin, to render justice, not without passionate discussion, to the efforts and the talent of M. Boito, whose sole offence was being born in Italy.

² Prince Anton Heinrich Radziwiłł, born at Posen in 1775; died at Berlin in 1833. The exact nomenclature of the scenes and pieces of his score will be found in the Dictionnaire des Musiciens Polonais et Slaves, by M. Sowinski.

³ Born at Berlin in 1812; died at Dresden in 1877.

⁴ Gordigiani (Luigi), born at Florence in 1814. Died there in 1860.

It must be said, also, that this dramatic work is of a very singular conception, and of very unequal value. M. Boito, who appears to be a real worshipper of Goethe, and who surely has studied the commentaries written in many languages on Faust, has carved a poem for himself out of the drama of Goethe, just as Berlioz or Wagner might have done; but it is less an opera libretto, than it is a series of eight scenes badly dovetailed together,—the Prologue in Heaven, the Easter festival, the scene on the ramparts of the city, Faust in his study, the garden, the Witches' Sabbath, the death of Marguerite and that of Faust, these last two episodes borrowed from the second Faust. Furthermore, M. Boito, who is a philologist, and who, after the example of Wagner, attaches almost more importance to his verses than to his music, has prefaced his score with a note, in which he examines the different orthographies and explanations of the word Mephistopheles; finds himself authorized by Le Loyer's book on Spectres to make those invited to the Sabbath sing Saboté, while the witches sing Hor Sabbah! explains why he has adopted the metre of Greek verse in the scene of Helen, and how the Italian language lends itself better than the French to all the pomps and graces of the Greek metre, and the Latin, etc. Finally, he is so penetrated with his favorite author that, at almost every scene, he brings in evidence some verse, some tirade, in which he sees, not without reason, the essence, the knot of the entire scene. In Faust's study chamber, for example, that apostrophe of the doctor to the demon, "If I ever say to the passing moment, Stay, thou art so fair! then mayst thou surround me with chains; then I consent to annihilation"; and for the amorous tête-à-tête in the garden, that reply of Faust, "My love, who dares say, I believe in God? You may ask priests and sages, and their answer will appear but a mockery of the questioner."

The score of M. Boito shows what efforts a composer trained in the Italian school must make to shake off those obsolete formulas, to conceive a truly serious work, and above all, to give it a severe form. Whatever pains he takes, so great is the influence of the artistic medium, that he only succeeds in producing a very unequal, very laborious work, in which certain parts clash with others, and of which the merit, very real on the whole, consists more in tentative efforts than in any realized effect. In general, the fantastic passages have served M. Boito better than the scenes of tenderness; in the latter his melody is for the most part common, and his orchestra but slightly interesting, while he treats the former with great power, and not without originality. Evidently it is toward force and dramatic passion that his natural talent urges him; but a composer of such merit ought to keep a severer watch over himself, and not fall back into the ruts in which a Petrella has dragged himself all his life.

At the beginning of 1872, March 7, Ferdinand de Roda, pianist, harpist, composer and professor of music at the University of Ros-tock and Schwerin. The author himself directed the execution of his work, which recommended itself, they say, by real dramatic qualities, and obtained a certain success. However that may be, this first hearing was also the last; and this musician, who had already produced oratorios, cantatas, a symphony, several piano pieces, died in September, 1877, at the Chateau de Bülow, near Crivitz (Mecklenburg-Schwerin), without ever having a chance to hear his Faust again. He would have been sixty years old on the 26th of March following.

Finally, in 1874, a Norwegian composer, Edouard Lassen, brought out at Weimar a new musical adaptation of Goethe's drama. Born at Copenhagen, but taken at the age of two to Brussels, having made his musical studies at the Conservatoire of that city, and having been several times laureate in the competitions in composition instituted in the principal cities of Belgium, Lassen made a grand tour in Germany, and was particularly well received by Spohr at Cassel, and by Liszt at Weimar. It was Liszt who caused his opera King Edgar to be represented on the Grand-Ducal stage, though it had been pronounced impracticable at Brussels, and with such success that Lassen was offered the place of director of the court music, and became attached to Weimar, where he fixed his permanent abode after the great success of his second opera, Frauenlob.

His new work, which follows Goethe's drama scene by scene, is very important, for it comprises more than fifty pieces of all kinds; but it is also very interesting, and contains more than one page that is remarkable. The Prologue in Heaven, with which the score naturally opens, and then all the melodrama accompanying the meditations of the doctor in his study, are of an excellent color; and the Easter hymn is of a touching simplicity, with its persistent sound of bells. The scene at the gates of the city is very pretty, with its sad complaint of the mendicant and the animated rondo of the peasants; the murmur of invisible spirits in Faust's chamber, and their joyous whisper during the doctor's sleep, have inspired the musician with graceful thoughts of an altogether fairy lightness. The scene in Auerbach's cellar, on the contrary, is rendered with a great freedom and rare vigor; the short phrase in canon of the surfeited drinkers, "We are as happy as cannibals, and gorged like five hundred swine," is inexpressibly clumsy and stolid.

The scene of the Witches' Kitchen is no more wanting in color. But it is, above all, the chaste figure of Margaret and the different episodes with which it is associated, that Herr Lassen has treated in a charming manner. So, too, the beautiful melody of the orchestra when she enters her chamber, the old song of the King of Thule, of which he has so well marked the archaic character; Dame Martha's lamentation of her absent husband; the brusque entrée of the devil, etc.; also many little pieces, simple phrases sometimes, very varied accents, leading to the promenade in the garden, which the composer accompanies with a light rustling, the charm of which excites to reverie and to sweet confidences. The monologue of Faust dragging his disillusion through the woods and caverns is underlined by an orchestral piece which shapes the image of the wanderer, and seems to depict his repeated efforts to climb from height to height. As for the melodrama placed under Margaret's invocation to the Mater dolorosa, it is impressed with a penetrating sadness, which brings out the strangeness of the devil's song in bolder relief; and the exact transcription of the Dies iræ in the scene of the cathedral produces a terrible effect. But the capital piece of this first part, that in which the author has displayed the most power and imagination, is, without contradiction, the romantic scene of the Walpurgis Night; there we find a rare strangeness of invention, served by a very skillful hand; and these two qualities united were not too much to measure them with this astonishing conception of the fantasy of Goethe.

These same qualities are found to an equal degree in all the fantastical scenes of the Second Part. But the prolongation of this kind of music, aiming always, by means slightly varied, at the fairy-like, the supernatural, can not fail to fatigue in the long run; and this monotony, it must be confessed, sprang perforce from the subject, music not having resources multiple enough to paint episodes of very nearly the same nature, with colors varying incessantly. There are, among the number, some delicious pieces of a vaporous lightness, like the chorus of Ariel and the elves which opens the Second Faust; like the song of the Sirens in the upper Peneus and the whirling refrain of the Lamie; like the intertwining dances of Euphorion and the young girls in the scene of Arcadia. This tableau begins with a pretty pastoral prelude; and two other orchestral pieces of great importance, very richly colored, are the grand Bacchanale which terminates the third act, and the Polonaise which accompanies the masquerade in the palace of the Emperor.

The two fragments of the poem to which the author has given, by good right, the most musical importance, are the great scene of the Classical Walpurgis Night, and the charming episode of Helen; he has rendered them with a lightness of touch and a variety of tones truly remarkable.

In the second Faust still more than in the first, one meets with certain scenes which seem to demand some traits of purely descriptive music; and the author could hardly avoid painting the noise of the car of Plutus, the course of the centaur Chiron, the wriggling of the gnome Homunculus, the fall of Icarus-Euphorion, etc. But he notes only what is strictly necessary in this rather puerile kind, and passes on. He has done wisely also to adopt as it were a connecting thread, to bind these scattered pieces together; and he happily brings back from time to time two characteristic melodies, differing in kind,—that altogether graceful one which has signalized the first apparition of Helen in the scene of astrology, and the grave and sombre melopœia upon which the demon has revealed to the doctor the origin of things, the existence of the primitive divinities, the Mothers.

In approaching the end of the second Faust, in reaching the scenes where Care blinds the presumptuous doctor, where the Lemures dig the grave reserved for Faust, in arriving at the Chorus Mysticus, the composer found himself, as in the initial scene of Ariel and the Sylphs, in the presence of pictures where music has nothing more to say after the admirable translation by Schumann. Accordingly Lassen has treated these scenes as briefly as possible without curtailing them, but also without developing them, so as not to appear to wish to enter into rivalry with a master whom he certainly admires, for he proceeds directly from him.

This valuable work, then, is the last attempt that has been made at a musical adaptation of Faust; or rather, it was the last five years ago; for, with the constant attraction which the bizarre conception of Goethe exercises upon composers, it would be indeed astonishing should no Faust have been hatched since that time in the brain of a musician. Whether it be hatched, or whether it only germinate, there surely will arise some other in a little while, and then another still, and that will never be the last.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, BOSTON, MAY 31, 1880.

PRESIDENT PERKINS'S ADDRESS.

Gentlemen: In October last we met at the first rehearsal of the season, with the hope that, though arduous, it would be in every way successful; and now at the end of May, being assembled at our annual meeting, we have the satisfaction of knowing that we did not hope in vain. Certainty is better than hope, gentlemen; and, pleasant as it was in the autumn to anticipate success, it is still more pleasant in the spring to be assured of it. The season has, indeed, been so exceptionally good, both in its artistic and its financial results, that I feel tempted to express my gratitude by pronouncing an indiscriminate eulogy upon it; but, although according to the proverb, nothing but good should be said of the dead, I shall refrain, knowing that it is wiser to allow of some falling short of perfection in the best of seasons as in the best of completed lives, since wholesale praise is apt to challenge criticism; and, being convinced that those who search for spots, will find them, even in the sun itself. Were I to say that the season of 1879-80 has been the best so far in the annals of the society, and that the fifth triennial festival which closed it far surpassed its predecessors, I might be contradicted; but when I say that no exertions were spared by the conductor, the singers, the organist and the board of management to make the concerts given before, and at the festival, as good as possible, I cannot be gainsayed, for this is strictly true. Beyond this I need not go. The public and the press have said all that we could desire in praise of our work, and, now that the grateful hum of applause has somewhat died away, it should be remembered not as a balm to our self-esteem, but as an incentive to self-examination. It is by studying the causes of such success as we have met with that we may learn what can be done to deserve a still greater meed of praise. Like the allegorical figure of Prudence, whom Raphael represented in a fresco at the Vatican, according to the quaint fancy of mediæval symbolism, as a woman with two faces, the one aged and turned backward, as if looking into the past, the other, young and beautiful, gazing into the mirror of self-knowledge, so should we study the present in the light of the past, and thus prepare ourselves for better work in the future.

After the earliest period in the history of our society had been passed through, during which the footsteps of its founders were guided by the feeble rushlight of New England psalmody, it entered upon the study of works belonging to the higher levels of musical thought, which has ever since been unfalteringly pursued. Every year the horizon widened, and, as the society advanced, the public, to whom it revealed the new treasures of which it had possessed itself, advanced with it in appreciative power. By this means it helped to raise the standard of taste in music, and aided in bringing about that more general enjoyment and cultured appreciation of the best sacred music in which we now rejoice.

May we not justly claim that the Handel and Haydn Society has had some share in that impulse to advance in other fields of the divine art, which has brought about an improved state of public taste in what is distinctively, though obnoxiously, designated as profane music? It taught our people to love the Haydn of the Creation, and so made them eager to know the same Haydn in his symphonies and his quartets; it made them familiar with the Beethoven of the Mount of Olives, and thus prepared them to enjoy his great instrumental compositions. Thus, if we have today our excellent choral and symphony concert associations, it may be said that it is in some measure due to the initiative taken, by the Handel and Haydn Society so many years before they came into being. While we rejoice in their vigorous life, and wish them all prosperity, we must be watchful lest they surpass us in attainment. They have the public ear now as well as we, and what they teach it to appreciate will be demanded from us under pain of censure. Nor is this spur to exertion limited to our immediate vicinity. We have rivals elsewhere, rivals in our special domain, young and enterprising societies who surpass us in numbers and in resources. "Westward the star of empire takes its way." Let us look to it that its light is not quenched in the East. I say this in no other spirit than that of thankfulness that the love and study of the noblest music is spreading in all directions. The more choral societies spring up, North, South, East and West, the better, for their multiplication can only serve to keep up a spirit of healthy emulation, and insure the best general results.

As the progress of public taste is commensurate with our own, as each year increases the number of our judges, and as the better our performances are the stricter will be the account exacted from us, it is not only our duty but our best policy to labor faithfully to correct our defects and bring our performances up to the highest standard. At the end of every season we should ask ourselves, Have we made an advance? and to this question I think we may this year answer, yes. The excellent performance of St. Paul on the opening night of the festival proved it, as it seems to me. It was generally admitted that the chorus sang with a closer attention to light and shade; a higher comprehension of the more subtle shades of expression; a less frequent tendency to what a newspaper critic has called our "stalwart style" of singing; and, in short, approached nearer to that form of perfection, which consists in exactly weighing and rendering all those shades of difference in volume of tone, which lie between the extremes of pianissimo and fortissimo. If it be difficult for the performer upon an instrument or a solo singer to do this with perfect evenness and accurate correspondence of result to intention, how much more so is it for a body of 500 or 600 singers, since it requires that each one should have perfect command of his voice, an identical conception of the quality of expression needed to give effect to the words sung, and that, collectively, they should be inspired with one will and one impulse! The perfect chorus, like the air around us, has mastery over the extremes of delicacy and power. "Didst thou feel," says Diogenes to Plato, in one of Landers' "Imaginary Conversations," "the gentle air that passed us? That air, so gentle, so imperceptible to thee, is more powerful than all the creatures that live and breathe by it." To sing softly as the zephyr blows; to "shake the dome" with the full resonance of united strength; to ask in hushed astonishment, "is this He? is this He who, in Jerusalem?" and to make the heavens ring with the "Hallelujah Chorus," so that the exact volume of sound intended by the composer will be given to each composition—this is only possible to a body of singers each one of whom has perfect command of his voice and a perfect comprehension of how it should be used. The more closely the singers watch the conductor and lose themselves in him, the nearer approach will they make to unity of style and feeling. They must yield to his every impulse, as the keys of a pianoforte to the pressure of a player's fingers, and thus embody the conception of the work which he has formed in his mind. When, then, you sing in the chorus, pay the closest attention to your leader and be plastic in his hands. Cultivate a sense of individual responsibility, ever keeping in mind that your work will mar or enhance the general effect; and endeavor to give the full meaning and expression to words and music, for it is certain that, unless you interpret them with feeling and intelligence, you will produce no effect upon your hearers. When your audience is before you, sing as if you thought that it depended upon you personally to rouse its enthusiasm, knowing that "There is in souls a sympathy with sounds.

And as the mind is pitched, the ear is pleased
With melting air, or martial, brisk or grave.
Some secret chord in unison with what we hear
Is touched within us, and the heart responds."

A rumor lately went abroad that our conductor, for more than a quarter of a century, had been tempted by the offer of an important post, to turn his back upon us and make his home elsewhere. To do him justice, I can honestly say that I never gave it a moment's credence. He has worked too well and too long with us to break the old ties, whose severance, when it takes place, will not probably be a matter of will on his part, nor on ours. We are all grateful to him for his unwearied efforts during the past season, and feel how much the success of the festival is due to him. Our thanks are also due to Mr. Lang for his most efficient aid, and to the members of the chorus, ladies and gentlemen, for their attendance at rehearsals, and their cheerfulness under necessary discipline and rebuke. I know that they have found their reward in the consciousness that they have well served the interests of the society to which they are so much attached, and ask for no other recompense.

In conclusion, I have to offer you the usual statistics relating to the events of the season. Fifty-four rehearsals have been held, with an average attendance of 360 members, and ten performances given, with an average attendance of 440 singers. Thirty-five new members have been admitted to the society, of whom two have not qualified. Fifty-five ladies have joined the chorus and fourteen have been dismissed. Eight members have resigned, and three have been dismissed. The works performed before the festival were the Prodigal Son, under the direction of its composer, Mr. Arthur Sullivan; The Messiah, Christmas, and Israel in Egypt, at Easter. At the festival we gave Mendelssohn's St. Paul and Forty-third Psalm, Spohr's Last Judgment and Rossini's Stabat Mater, Verdi's Requiem, a portion of The Seasons, Saint-Saëns's Deluge, Handel's Jubilate and Solomon, Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony, a portion of one of Bach's Cantatas. The programmes of the miscellaneous concerts included a great variety of vocal as well as instrumental pieces, among which latter we must not omit to mention the two overtures of our countrymen, Messrs. Dudley Buck and Chadwick. This is a long list of works, gentlemen, whose variety of school and period says much for the liberality of our musical creed.

It is proper that I should ask you to remember those whom death has stricken from our list of members within the past year. They are six in number, namely: Charles Henderson, who joined in 1834; Henry A. Coffin, who joined in 1865; T. Frank Reed, who joined in 1866; Thomas Greeves, who joined in 1870; Leopold Lobsitz, who joined in 1876; and Philo Peabody, who joined in 1877. One among them, Mr. Reed, was a member of our board of government in 1870 and 1871. Actively interested in the cause of music, always conspicuous among those who were best capable of promoting it, genial, kindly and courteous to all who came in contact with him, Mr. Reed has been not a little missed by those who knew and valued him.

One thing more, gentlemen, and I have done. You are probably aware that, so long ago as 1867, Dr. Upham, the president of the society, suggested that some one should be appointed to write its history; that Mr. Farnham began the work, and that it was afterward committed to the highly competent hands of Mr. Samuel Jennison, who entered upon his arduous task with enthusiasm. Having collected a great amount of material through diligent research, and begun to collate and arrange it, he was obliged to turn his attention to other things, and finally to lay the work aside altogether. Several years having passed without hope of renewed leisure to resume it, Mr. Jennison informed the committee that to his great regret he must give up what he had so much desired to do, and asked that some one should be appointed in his place, to whom he liberally offered the materials which he had collected with so much labor. By vote of the board of government, the now vacant office of historian was offered to me, and I accepted it, after vainly endeavoring to break Mr. Jennison's resolve. I did so because I have so long been connected with the Handel and Haydn Society, that I felt I had no right to refuse, and, because incompetent as I feel myself to be to do the work as I could wish it to be done, I knew that whatever can be done through the stimulating force of affection for the Handel and Haydn Society I may hope to do. To serve it in any way is to me a privilege, and I therefore welcome the opportunity which now offers itself, of doing what I can to make its history accessible to the many who will wish to know it better than they can at present.

Wishing the society increasing prosperity, and offering you my congratulation upon the highly encouraging result of the last season, whose receipts, despite the great expense of the festival, have allowed us to add $3,300 to the permanent fund, I offer you my thanks for the renewed honor of election to the presidency, and bring these all too long remarks to a close.

CHARLES C. PERKINS.

BEETHOVEN AND VIENNA.

BY EDOUARD HANSLICK.

It was as a lad of sixteen that Beethoven came from Bonn on his first flying visit to Vienna. He carried home with him at least one inestimable advantage: that of having made the acquaintance of Mozart, who heard him play, and spoke prophetically of his future greatness. Five years later, in November, 1792, he once more entered Vienna, never again to leave it. It was an Austrian Arch-duke, the Elector Max Francis, son of the great Maria Theresa, who sent the much-promising young man to improve himself in the Austrian capital; an Austrian gentleman, Count Waldstein, the Elector's favorite, procured him the means for his journey to and residence in Vienna. At the very earliest part of his career, even ere he set foot on Austrian soil, Austrian influence was, therefore, actively employed in protecting him and advancing his interests. After his arrival in Vienna, he quickly amalgamated, socially and artistically, with the Austrian people. It was not Bach and Handel, but the great Austrian masters, Haydn and Mozart, who were his models in the task of creation, while Haydn, Albrechtsberger, Salieri, and Schenk were for a time his masters, though their pupil soon soared above all teaching. But it was not so much Beethoven the composer as Beethoven the pianoforte virtuoso who first afforded Vienna matter for wonderful stories. Though he soon renounced this kind of fame, his career as a pianist and concert-giver left a deep and permanent impression on the musical life of Vienna. His first public appearance took place on the 24th of March, 1795; he played in the Burgtheatre, for the Tonkünstler-Society, his C major concerto, Op. 15, for the first time. The period of his career as a virtuoso is strictly comprised between 1795 and 1814. Wherever we cast our eyes, we come on landmarks in his artistic life. If we follow, till it has wound along a short distance further, the streamlet on which his monument looks down, we stand before the Theatre an der Wien, where his Fidelio and Christus am Oelberge were first performed, and many concerts, in which he himself conducted grand instrumental works, were given. For the opening of the Josephstädter Theatre he composed and conducted his overture: Weihe des Hauses. In the inner town, the great Hall of the University reminds us of the remarkable first performance of the Seventh Symphony and the "Battle of Vittoria"; the Great Hall of the Redoute calls to mind the cantata: Der glorreiche Augenblick, and the concert of 1824, the last he conducted; the Burgtheater, his ballet of Prometheus and the share he took in the concerts of the Tonkünstler-Society: the Kärntnerthor Theatre, Fidelio, as re-arranged, and the first performance of the Ninth Symphony. Even the modest rooms 'zum römischen Kaiser,' 'auf der Freyung,' and 'zur Mehlgrube,' could boast of works by him being played at concerts there. At the Morning Concerts in the Augarten were first heard the D minor Symphony and the C minor Concerto. Lastly, on May morning in 1814, Beethoven played in the Prater, with Schuppanzigh and Linke, his grand Trio in B flat major; this was his last appearance as a pianist. Who can calculate the amount of happiness, joy, consolation, and elevation of mind, which, from his 'Adelaide,' his Septet, and his earlier Sonatas, down to his last Symphonies, he lavished on mankind! And Vienna was first to possess and enjoy all these works. It was a publisher of Vienna who issued his Opus 1, and it was a publisher of Vienna who issued his Opus 137 (the last). Like one of the mighty Nibelungs, who migrated from the Rhine to the Danube, Beethoven came here and amassed an incalculable treasure. But it was not hidden away or buried; it flowed as current gold from Vienna over the entire globe.

The smiling villages which surround Vienna in a garland of forest-green, were, so to speak, his workshops, the garrets of the poet. Trees under which he thought and created still send forth their leaves. Sauntering among the vineyards of Baden and Merkenstein, he thought out his Ninth Symphony; at the foot of the Kahlenberg in Heiligenstadt, he conceived the Pastoral and the C minor Symphony; in Hetzendorf and the Park of Schönbrunn, Fidelio and Christus am Oelberge; and at Mödling, the grand 'Festmesse.' The cool, cozy, summer haunts so familiar to us are all distinguished and immortalized by his having repeatedly staid there; it was in their woods and their gardens that the precious fruit of his mind germinated and ripened. As it was in Vienna that he found the stimulus to his mightiest efforts in art, so it was Vienna over which his genius first diffused its fruitifying light and warmth. We will name only the Incomparable One, Beethoven's son in spirit, Franz Schubert! Not more than a few paces from Beethoven's grave is that of Schubert in the Währinger Cemetery, and—as we can now joyously add—only a few paces separate to-day Schubert's Monument among the green bushes of Town Park from the Statue of Beethoven.

Who could ever calculate and name all the mighty results which emanated directly from Beethoven! There is the immense influence exerted by him on modern pianoforte playing. Young Viennese virtuosos, Czerny, Moscheles, Ries, Bocklet, etc., after studying under his own eyes, publicly performed his works for their instrument, and, when they had themselves ripened into mastery, were able to hand down the tradition of the style. Through his Sonatas, which, for the first time overstepping the limits of five octaves, turned to account a greater range of sound and demanded a more powerful tone, he exercised a decisive influence on the gradual amelioration in the manufacture of pianofortes at Vienna, and distinguished by marks of friendly attention the best representatives (Streicher, Stein, and Schanz) of the trade. Through Beethoven, whose new chamber-music was immediately studied by the Rasumowsky Quartet, quartet playing in Vienna attained a height of which no one had previously any conception. Schuppanzigh was the first violinist to organize in Vienna regular Quartet Concerts, and Vienna was, moreover, the first city which could boast of such concerts. This we owe to Beethoven, because the public were eagerly anxious to hear his quartets, while none save professional musicians could perform them. From Schuppanzigh the tradition was handed down to his pupil Mayseder, and from the latter partially to the artists of the Vienna of to-day. The seed Beethoven strewed about here has come up well, the crop growing thicker and higher with each successive year. If musical matters among us are immeasurably superior, as regards sterling purport and admirable execution, to what they were fifty years ago, to Beethoven is the credit directly owing. In his days, amateurs executed his orchestral works, in the vast majority of cases, at the Sacred Concerts and the concerts given by the Society of the Friends of Music, etc. The increasing desire to enjoy his difficult instrumental works rendered in a way worthy of them led subsequently to the establishment of our Philharmonic Concerts, to the engagement of professional musicians at the Society's Concerts, and to the stability and increase of Quartet Associations among us. We have penetrated more and more deeply into Beethoven's innermost being; we have extended more and more the circle of his works for performance; and we have raised higher and higher the standard of executive perfection. Our great concert institutions and our Quartet Associations cultivate his music above all other, and at domestic musical rites his songs and sonatas are heard in every family of Vienna. The most palpable proof of the Beethoven cultus existing in Vienna and ever increasing in depth and consciousness, stands to-day proudly erect before us: His Monument.

For ever will the view of the majestic bronze figure awoken in the spectator devout emotions, strong pure feelings and bravely aspiring thoughts. The bronze Beethoven shall work on us through the eye as his music works through the ear; it shall master and elevate us, so that, in his own words, 'we may be freed from all the wretchedness which other children of this earth drag about with them.' — Neue Freie Presse, May 1.

MUSICIANS IN MOTLEY.

The great event of the evening was the production, under peculiar and distinguished auspices, of Romberg's "Toy Symphony." Haydn, who dearly loved a joke, is credited with being the first to burlesque symphonic music by associating toy instruments with those of a graver sort; and Romberg follows his example, while not a few other composers since the time of these pioneers into the region of musical fun have allied the nursery to the concert-room. But of all toy pieces, Romberg's was, perhaps, the best for last night's purpose. It is heavily "scored" for the toys, and, therefore, best adapted to convey the lesson intended by the managers of the concert. We assume that the managers intended a lesson, arguing with themselves that when the audience witnessed the pleasure derivable from toys by grown-up people, they would reflect upon the infinite delight those can get out of them to whose "kingdom" they properly belong. It would be a charming result of performing Romberg's piece if an avalanche of toys were to descend upon the Children's Hospital, making Great Ormond Street echo the wild charivari of St. James's Hall. The moral of the nursery instruments was well pointed by the distinction and gravity of the artists who played them. Messrs. Manns, Cusins, Carl Rosa, and Santley, with violins in their hands, supported by Mr. Ganz (viola), Mr. Daubert (violoncello), and Messrs. Cowen and Barnett (pianoforte), though a rare, could hardly be called a remarkable spectacle. But Mr. Arthur Sullivan imitating a cuckoo, Mr. Charles Hallé peacefully piping the note of a quail, Mr. Joseph Barnby emulous of the nightingale, Mr. Arthur Chappell throwing his energies into the part of a woodpecker, Sir Julius Benedict ringing bells, Mr. Randegger beating a baby drum, Mr. Blumenthal "pleased with a rattle," Dr. Stainer and Mr. Kuhe lustily blowing tiny trumpets, and Mr. Louis Engel throwing the whole force of his nature into the tintinnabulation of a triangle! This was, indeed, a striking and suggestive sight. One may be permitted to speculate upon it a little, and ask whether the toy performers were influenced by any law of "natural selection" in making choice of their instruments. It is a fair inference that they were. The sight of the toys would naturally revive in each manly breast the fresh and unsophisticated feelings of childhood. For a moment the warping forces of the world would relax their strain, and the genuine individuality be drawn at once to the toy best adapted for refreshment and consolation. Yet we cannot in every case make out the link between last night's players and their instruments. Why should Mr. Sullivan affect the cuckoo? The cuckoo is a lazy bird, that builds no nest, and hatches its young vicariously. Yet we know that American publishers and managers consider Mr. Sullivan as having been rather too solicitous about the personal incubation of the latest operatic egg. Then the idea of Mr. Charles Hallé's affinity with a quail, which has only one note, is absurd; while nothing in the course of Mr. Barnby's useful life suggests the nocturnal "goings on" of Philomel. Considering that the director of the Monday Popular Concerts has "tapped" the British public to some purpose, we admit the fitness of his playing the woodpecker; and, having in mind a recent happy event, there was decided propriety in the bell-ringing of Sir Julius Benedict. But why should Mr. Randegger, who is what Lord Bacon would call a "full man," love such an empty thing as a drum; or Mr. Kuhe, who is modesty itself, find happiness in a blatant trumpet? These are the psychological mysteries of the occasion, which the thoughtful among the audience carried away to ponder. But whatever the facts as to affinities, it is certain that each performer played his instrument as though to the manner born. The amount of expression in Mr. Sullivan's cuckoo might have revealed to the bird itself an unsuspected possibility of pathos; Mr. Randegger's drumming could not have better shown how sometimes great results flow from an apparently disproportionate cause; Mr. Blumenthal, grasping two rattles, wore a smile so "child-like and bland" that obviously he was in the nursery again, and the glowing countenance of Sir Julius Benedict as he jangled his bells did one good to see. Of course the infection of innocent enjoyment spread to the audience; St. James's Hall burst into smiles; the smiles soon became laughter, the laughter ended in applause, and the applause secured an encore for Mr. Henry Leslie, who had conducted the performance with a due sense of his responsibilities. It is a pity all this could not have been telephoned to the Great Ormond Street wards. The little inmates there would easily have discerned that the rich and happy folk in St. James's Hall were not far removed from their own poor suffering selves. — London Musical World, May 22.

"SCIENTIFICALLY!"

There are more things in Heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy. — Hamlet.

THE number of persons who derive more or less enjoyment from hearing music is, undoubtedly, very great. The great art of tones makes itself felt, and hence is understood, in a certain mystical and transcendental sense of the word, by very many who are by no means musicians. It were an interesting psychological study to discover exactly what the larger mass of listeners find in music; to find an answer to the question: in how far is the evident enjoyment with which such and such a person listens to the Fifth Symphony intrinsically musical, and in how far is it a vague sense of being in the presence of something undefinably great? Is this enjoyment based upon even an approximate appreciation of specifically musical beauty, or does it spring from a sort of mystic revelation of the individuality of the composer or performer through the medium of tones? Is it music, or is it animal magnetism that is at work?

Certain it is, however, that the art appeals strongly to a vast number of people who, by the way they talk about it, would seem to the musician to be utterly incapable of receiving musical impressions. Yet let him but play to them, and he holds them spell-bound. But only let him try to talk to them about music, and it is almost impossible for him to make himself understood. Here is the paradox: they enjoy the music, but can give no account of their pleasure; they cannot even have their pleasure accounted for. They enjoy they know not what.

It is often curious to note by what a slender and, at times, undiscoverable thread, music connects itself with the consciousness of many an entranced listener. How subtle this connection is, is shown by the exceedingly odd conjectures people make concerning the nature of the difference between their own enjoyment of music and that of the musician. Exactly what their own enjoyment is, they do not rightly know; what the musician's enjoyment is, they have not (or think they have not) the faintest conception. But as people are not long comfortable in dealing with the unexplained, they cannot but try to fathom the mystery in their own way; the upshot of their reasoning is usually this:

"The musician's enjoyment cannot be what mine is; mine is emotional, ergo the musician's must be intellectual." And then grasping at random among the various fields in which the human intellect exerts itself, they pounce upon science as one of the most universal and imposing, and say: "I do not enjoy music scientifically, as you do." This italicized word is much in favor.

"Don't you think Mr. X — played the Moonlight Sonata beautifully?"

"I am sorry to say, that I do not."

"Don't you think he played with expression?"

"Oh, yes! with a great deal of expression, with no end of expression, in fact."

"Then I suppose his execution was not good, and that he played wrong notes; but you know that poor I do not know enough about it to notice such things."

"On the contrary, his technique is superb at every point; his execution is positively wonderful."

"But if his execution is good, and he plays with expression, why don't you like his playing? Ah! I suppose he did not play scientifically."

Now let it be said, once for all, that, no matter what trying positions unkind fate may place people in, it is never absolutely indispensable for a man to make a fool of himself. But as surely as he tries to make a long word do duty for an unknown something, he inevitably will perform that undesirable feat.

Music is not Science; people neither play music nor enjoy music scientifically. The very people who so misuse the word, feel in their hearts that it must mean sheer nonsense in this connection. When a person says, with apparent modesty: "You enjoy music scientifically, but I do not," it is always with the secret reservation: "But I enjoy it psychically, and that is better."

Come, admit it; is it not so?

Now what this peculiar something is which people try to explain away by calling it scientific, is hard to describe. It has more to do with what we call cultured perception than anything else. But one thing is certain; scientific or scientifically have nothing to do with it. Listen to music scientifically (if such a thing be possible), and you at once kill its whole charm. I can never hear people speak of scientific music without having a suspicion that their æsthetic capabilities are very much on a par with those of a man I once met in Switzerland. He was a fellow countryman. I had just come from Porlezza to Lugano, and was standing on the quay trying to console myself for two hours spent on the deck of the little steamer under a burning mid-day sun, by looking out over the beautiful lake at the entrancing scenery. It was one of those slightly hazy summer days when the thermometer's scoring 90° in the shade gives but a faint idea of the all-subduing heat. But the thin haze, impregnated with the sun's rays, threw a golden glory over the distant hills, and everything seemed to invite one to lazy enjoyment of the divine landscape. The hero of my story came up to the water's edge, and stood beside me a few moments; I recognized him as one of the passengers on board the boat, and thought at first that he was probably enjoying the scene in peace and quiet, as I was. Feeling particularly lazy, I did not speak to him at first, but he soon opened the conversation with: "There ain't much enterprise about here!"

The anecdote has not much relevancy, but I give it as showing an example of æsthetic vacuity unsurpassed in my experience. Anybody, however, is at liberty to equal it by speaking of enjoying music scientifically. W. F. A.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

DEFERRED NOTICES.

(Concluded from page 95).

Among the various performances which occurred while our columns were pre-occupied with musical festivals here and elsewhere, as well as by the Faust of Berlioz, were a number of interesting Pianoforte Concerts, or Recitals. We have already recalled our impressions of the three given by Joseffy in the great Music Hall; it remains to gather up, if only by way of record, some of the more important ones which were enjoyed in a more modest way in smaller halls,—Chamber Music in a proper place. We begin with the concert given by Mr. JOHN A. PRESTON, at Mechanics' Hall, on Saturday evening, May 15. There was a goodly number of appreciative listeners to the following programme:—

Theme with variations, Op. 36 (first time). Anton Dvůřák. Song, "Adelaide". Beethoven. Kreisleriana, Eight Fantasies, Op. 16. Schumann. Agitato assai—Molto espressivo e non troppo vivace—Molto agitato—Molto lento—Molto vivace—Molto lento—Allegro assai—Allegro Scherzando. Songs, Unter blühenden Mandel Bäumen. Weber. Au Cimetière. Saint-Saëns. Marmelades Lüftchen, Blütenwind. Jensen. Grand Trio in G minor, for Pianoforte, Violin and 'Cello. Op. 24 (first time). Eduard Nápravník. Allegro con fuoco—Allegretto grazioso, quasi Andantino—Presto—Vivace (Alla Russe).

The vocalist was Mr. William J. Winch. In the Trio Mr. Preston was assisted by Mr. Gustav Dannreuther, violin, and Mr. Wulf Fries, 'cello. We were accidentally too late to hear the variations by Dvůřák, and will not undertake to speak knowingly of the work. In his rendering of Schumann's Kreisleriana—the whole series of those fantastic pieces, some of them of a haunting beauty and deep feeling, others of a wayward, mystifying will-o'-the-wisp persistency—we were astonished not only by the technical excellence, the clearness and finish, the sustained poise, ease and freedom of Mr. Preston's execution, but still more by a mental grasp and an interpretation of the work which left nothing vague or dull, but took strong hold of the attention and held it to the end. It would be hard to name his superior among our younger pianists; and he is steadily gaining both in strength of conception and of execution.

Of the Trio by Nápravník, the imperial Russian Capellmeister, our impressions from a single hearing have somewhat faded away. But it struck us as quite exceptional in form, particularly the first movement, and as having a strong flavor of nationality throughout. The term alla Russe, appended to Vivace in the finale, might with equally propriety, we thought, apply to the whole work. The Allegro is intense and fiery. The Allegretto grazioso has a dance theme steadily repeated, which seems to go on tip-toe, and is rather monotonous. The Scherzo, wavering between the major key and its relative minor, is alternately bold and charming, with interesting imitation in the strings; and the Vivace, in G major, 2-4 measure, has a short and barren sort of theme, of which the obstinate monotony lies perhaps in the nature of the Russian dance. On the whole, however, we found it one of the more interesting, certainly unique, among the recent novelties in this line, and it was finely played by the three artists. Mr. Winch's singing was tasteful and delightful, and so were Mr. Preston's delicate accompaniments.

MR. H. G. TUCKER gave a concert at Mechanics' Hall on Thursday afternoon, May 20, with the assistance of the tenor singer, Mr. Charles R. Adams; this being the programme:—

Sonata, Op. 100, A minor. Rubinstein. Songs, "Bussied". Beethoven. "Ich grolle nicht". Schumann. Prelude, E flat major. Prelude, E major. Chopin. Etude, C major. Rubinstein. Songs, "Liebesfrühling". Scher. "Der Neugierige". Schubert. "Die blaue unendliche See!". Scher. Allegro de Concert, A major. Chopin.

The Rubinstein Sonata, the novelty of the occasion, is exceedingly long,—three quarters of an hour,—a length seldom reached by a grand Symphony. We lost the first two movements, and were told that the second, the Scherzo, was the one really rewarding thing for the listener. The slow movement (third), we must confess, appeared to us interminable, and vaguely wandering nowhere; it seemed like a huge blind creature burrowing in the ground; in the Finale there was more of a savage sort of life; here the monster showed his teeth. Well, perhaps on better acquaintance we might like the Sonata better, and feel disposed to treat it seriously. It offered a plenty of technical difficulties, and called for great strength and endurance in the interpreter, to which Mr. Tucker proved himself abundantly equal. Much more clear and satisfying was the more familiar Etude by the same composer, in which, as in the two Chopin Preludes, Mr. Tucker showed more of grace and delicacy than was his wont. The Concert Allegro of Chopin was played with great brilliancy and freedom. It was a rare satisfaction to hear the Bussied of Beethoven and Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" sung so artistically, with such fine phrasing and enunciation, and such commanding accent and expression, by Mr. Adams. All our singers may learn something from him. His second group of songs were fresh and pleasing, but not quite fresh his voice.

MR. ERNST PERABO'S artistic zeal and resolution in the cause of new, as well as old and classical pianoforte music, dedicating his best powers without stint to let the new composers have a hearing, held out to the extent of eleven industriously prepared Matinees in Wesleyan Hall. Since our last report he has given two, on Monday, April 26, and on Friday, April 30. Messrs. B. Listemann and Wulf Fries assisted him in the concerted pieces. It may be taken for granted that the interpretation by these artists, single and combined, was all it should be. In the press of other cares we were compelled to lose the concerts; we can only, by way of record, give the programmes, in which it will be seen that almost every number is marked "first time in this country"; or something practically equivalent; the disciples of "the newness" cannot complain of Perabo:—

MR. ARTHUR B. WHITING, a pupil for the past three years of Mr. W. H. Sherwood, made his debut as a concert pianist on one of the very hottest evenings at the very acme of the "heated term" in the last week of May (Thursday, 27th). Nevertheless Mechanics' Hall contained about 400 listeners according to report. A concert of angels could not have tempted us at such a time; and as for duty—perhaps length of service may be pleaded in excuse! That the occasion may not pass here without record, we copy from a notice in the Transcript, having good authority for believing that its estimate is a just one:

The opening selection was the Fourth Handel Concerto, arranged for two pianos by D. Krug. The style of the composition is very precise and set, and requires a broad and firm rendering, with great precision in execution. Mr. Sherwood took the part for the second piano, with Mr. Whiting in the primo. The piece was rendered in an almost faultless manner, the five movements being played with the strictest fidelity to the score, and with mathematical accuracy in time. This piece is not heard in public often enough for our people to be very familiar with its rare merits as a technical work. Mr. Winch gave a group of songs from Rubinstein, Schubert and Franz. "The Asm" was particularly enjoyable. The others—"Du bist die Ruh," "Die Wasserrose," and "Be not so coy, beloved child"—were sung in Mr. Winch's well-known manner, and were warmly applauded. Mr. Whiting's test piece was the "Appassionata" sonata, Op. 57, of Beethoven, and he is to be congratulated on the truly artistic manner in which he rendered this masterly composition. Here he showed more than in any other selection the careful and conscientious manner in which he has studied music, and exhibited unmistakable indications of deep musical feeling and sympathy which promises much for his future as an exponent of classical music. He was deliberate, self-possessed and dignified, and controlled the instrument, particularly in the pianissimo arpeggios, in a truly admirable manner.

His technique is easy and graceful, and he has a commanding, but not ostentatious presence at the piano. As a whole this sonata may well mark his appearance as a concert pianist.

The next number on the programme was a group consisting of Chopin's Impromptu in A flat, one number from Jensen, Nocturne, Op. 21, No. 5, Schumann, and the great Faust waltz by Liszt from Gounod. These Mr. Whiting played entirely from memory. They were all executed with great care and with artistic truth, and were fully appreciated by the audience.

The closing piece, as well as the most impressive of all, was the symphonic poem on Victor Hugo's "Mazeppa" for two pianos, by Liszt. This has never been produced here before, and it is truly a wonderful and a majestic composition. It taxes the capacity of both piano and performer to a great degree, and attracts the listener with irresistible power as it sweeps along like a whirlwind. . . . Mr. Whiting has earned the right to recognition as one of the most prominent of our local pianists, and if his future may be judged by the past, he certainly has a great musical career before him.

MR. JUNIUS W. HILL, the accomplished pianoforte teacher, has for a year or more been carrying out an excellent idea with excellent results. It is simply giving to some of his pupils frequent opportunities of ensemble practice in Sonatas, Trios, etc., with the violin and 'cello. We can think of nothing more beneficial in the way of musical culture and progress to pupils who have musical natures and sufficient zeal and talent. The young lady of that stamp is to be congratulated, who can take part in periodical rehearsals of such music with such experienced artists as those named in the following programme of an "Ensemble Rehearsal" of pupils from Mr. Hill's Second and Third Classes, which took place at his Music Room, 151 Tremont St., on the 19th of May:

Trio in F sharp minor, Op. 56. Allegro moderato. Reissiger.

Miss Appleton, Messrs. Allen and Fries.

Sonata for piano and violin, Op. 8. Allegro con brio. Grieg.

Miss Dana and Mr. Allen.

Songs. { a. "O! that we two were Maying." Gounod.

{ b. "May-dew." Bennett.

Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen.

Trio in E flat major, Op. 100. First movement. Schubert.

Miss Bowker, Messrs. Allen and Fries.

Trio in F major, Op. 42. Gade.

a. Andantino.

b. Allegro con fuoco.

Miss Nolte, Messrs. Allen and Fries.

Song, "Spring Flowers." (With violin obligato.) Reinecke.

Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen.

Sonata for piano and violin, Op. 30, No. 2. Allegro con brio. Beethoven.

Miss Holmes and Mr. Allen.

Trio in B flat major, Op. 52. First movement. Rubinstein.

Miss Ranney, Messrs. Allen and Fries.

THE VOCAL CLUBS gave each its final concert of the season in the latter part of May. First came the BOYLSTON CLUB, always kept in admirable drill and up to concert pitch by its conductor, Mr. G. L. Osgood. This time it essayed no formidable work with orchestra, but fell back upon its old ground of "popular," mostly part-song music, with the following choice programme of its kind, the only entremets being a Mendelssohn Fantasia played by Mr. Peteraile, the pianoforte accompanist of the Club:

For the Male Chorus.

"Shed no Tear," Masker.

"The Nightingale," Schubert.

"Forsaken," Koehat.

"The Ruined Chapel," Becker.

"Go, speed thy Flight," Otto.

For the Female Chorus.

"Ave Maria," Marchetti.

"Fidellin," Brahms.

"Procession of Spring," Holländer.

For the Mixed Chorus.

"May Dew," Rheinberger.
 "Have you my Darling seen," Osgood.
 "The Pine Tree," Rubinstein.
 "King Eric," Rheinberger.
 "Peasant's Wedding in Carinthia," Koechat.

THE APOLLO CLUB gave two concerts, the second (May 20) being mainly a repetition of the first, with the great improvement of an orchestral accompaniment. The principal and longest piece with orchestra formed the opening number: selections from "A Night at Sea," by W. Tschirch. As given with the instruments it proved to be a very graphic, well contrasted series of scenes in music (without the instruments we could hardly imagine it to be very interesting), consisting of, first, a chorus: "Hymn to Night;" second, "Pleasant Voyage," a duet between the captain and helmsman, tenor and baritone; third, a tenor solo, "Home and Love;" and finally an exciting "Storm," for chorus with interjections of captain and helmsman. It was all very effectively and finely sung and played, Mr. Lang, as usual, conducting. Beethoven's Chorus of Dervishes, preceded of course by the Turkish March (substituted for Mendelssohn's part-song, The Turkish Cupbearer), was also given with orchestra; as was the concluding number, the Roman Song of Triumph, by Max Bruch. The orchestra also performed, for the first time here, a very bright and genial Overture, called "Spring," op. 15, by Goetz.

The other numbers of the programme were: the old English Glee: "Strike, strike the lyre," by Thomas Cooke; "Twilight Song," by Lachner; Schubert's grandly impressive Die Allmacht ("The Almighty") for tenor, solo, and chorus; "O who will o'er the downs with me," by De Pearsall; "Evening," for Bass solo and chorus, by Lachner; the Bass recitative and air, "The Husbandman," from Haydn's Seasons; sung by Mr. Clarence E. Hay; and "The Flower-Net," by Carl Goldmark. Throughout the Apollo sang with life and with refinement.

Finally the CECILIA, May 24, gave the long contemplated repetition of Max Bruch's Odysseus, as before, with orchestra. The soloists were the same as before, with the exception of Miss L. F. Pierce, who sang very acceptably the parts of Pallas Athena and Nausikaa. The performance was even better than the first one; but the night was extremely hot, and the work with its ten scenes is very long; and with all the inventive talent which the composition shows, and all its elaborate wealth of orchestration, it did not seem to have enough of the magnetic quality of genius to keep the audience alive with interest to the end.

There! we have at last cleared off the old scores, and hope to be ready, after the summer's rest from concert worry, for whatever of real interest another season may bring forth.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BALTIMORE, JUNE 7. — The season is now so far gone that there remains little or nothing in the way of classical entertainments to chronicle. The halls are closed, the lights are out, the directors have flown to cooler shores, and there is a general air of tropical calm where, during the winter, there was musical bustle and activity. The Peabody Hall, on a hot summer night, frowns down on the passer by like a dismal man — solemn — the sepulchre of symphonies — and the doors of the Academy of Music are closed, even against the strains of the popular orchestral selections that were wont to issue thence on warm June evenings.

This state of musical inactivity, however, offers an excellent opportunity for reflection on what has been accomplished during the past season, as well as for giving some attention to such musical events as have not received the notice they deserved.

It will doubtless be of some little interest to the readers of the Journal — published in the city of choral societies — to hear something new of at least two of our many chorus classes. The one is the Beethoven Chorus Class, composed of about sixty lady voices, which gave two delightful entertainments during the season. The latter of the two concerts was given on the last day of May, and the following programme is an evidence of the taste and judgment employed in the selection of just the proper music for such a chorus:

Motet Giovanni da Palestrina.
 Motet Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.
 Chorus from Blanche de Provence Cherubini.
 Serenade by the Seashore W. Kjerulf.
 The Spanish Tambourine Girl R. Schumann.
 The Seasons Niels Gade.

At the first concert there were compositions of Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Schumann, Hamerick, Rheinberger and Brahms. The fact of sixty well-trained female voices singing such music with so much charming grace and refinement, leads one to marvel why we do not have female choruses in abundance in every musical city in the Union. It is around such combinations of thoroughly schooled female voices that tenors and basses can be collected to form fine mixed choruses.

The average male amateur singer is too much engrossed in his daily pursuits to be able to devote nearly so much time to concerted vocal practice as the better half of a mixed chorus; and the separately and thoroughly trained female chorus should act as a confident and reliable nucleus.

So much for the Beethoven chorus class, although not so much by far as could, or ought to be, said of it.

The other choral event was the production of Handel's Alexander's Feast (words by "Mr. Dryden") by the Wednesday club chorus, on the 29th of last month, complete and after the original score! There were some shortcomings, of course, in the orchestra, hastily brought together as it was, and with little time at command for rehearsing music entirely new — for within the recollection of the oldest musical inhabitant, there had been no Handel chorus sung here for — well, ever so long! But the chorus was conceded to have reached the most sanguine expectations of all musical listeners. The rendering of the closing fugue, with its four beautiful themes —

Let old Timotheus yield the Prize,
 Or both divide the crown:
 He raised a mortal to the skies;
 She drew an angel down, was acknowledged by several musicians of excellent judgment in matters of voice, to have been as fine a piece of chorus work, for confident attack, force and precision, as could be expected from ninety voices, and an orchestra of twenty men. It must be admitted that a chorus which has been singing together for but one short season, no matter how good its material, must be making very satisfactory progress to produce an entire work of Handel with any degree of success. And so our chorus music for the past season has wound up in a blaze of glory, leaving behind the conviction that the best of chorus music is possible here, if only it be managed in a proper spirit. VASSAR COLLEGE, POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., JUNE 14. — An event, as novel as delightful in the annals of Vassar College, took place on Saturday, when the students of the School of Music of the college, celebrated the close of the most brilliant musical season of its annals, by an eight hours' sail on one of the large Hudson River steamers. Two hours of the time were spent in an impromptu concert, two hours in discussing the merits of an excellent collation, accompanied by speeches from the students, President Caldwell and Dr. Ritter; and two hours in dancing; the other two hours disappeared unperceived, a margin of delightful idling, marked with the red line of merry conversation and happy laughter.

The students entered into the whole affair with warm zest, feeling a just pride in the remarkable artistic and financial success to which this department has attained, and sang and played con amore, encouraged by the enthusiastic applause of more than one hundred fellow students, and a limited number of guests — those members of the college government distinguished by their taste for musical art. Before starting down the river, the excursion party, by request of Dr. and Mrs. Ritter, steamed up to West Park, and there took on board Mr. John Burroughs, the delightful essayist, who had previously most kindly volunteered his services as cicerone, in case a majority of votes had led the party into the recesses of wood and waterfall near his cottage, rather than to the possible haunts of mermaids. Even the order of dancing was marked by a novelty. At the suggestion of Mrs. Raymond Ritter, who was present as a guest, and who took a warm and natural interest in the success of this first festival of a department over which her husband presides, dancing was opened by a "Marche Polonaise," participated in by the entire company, to the music of a Chopin polonaise. For instruction in regard to the way in which this march should be danced, see Liszt's Life of Chopin. The gentlemen were in a very considerable minority; those ladies who took the gentlemen's side in the gay procession, donned pretty French costume hats and caps for the occasion.

As the happy party neared Poughkeepsie wharf, on its return home, one of the "Midsummer Nights' Dream" choruses was sung, and silvery cheers were raised for the captain, the college, and him to whom his attached students have given the sobriquet of "Our Dear Doctor." But Mrs. Ritter's original and fantastic programme will give you a fuller idea of the novelties of the occasion, especially those of the menu!

SALVE!

FIRST SUMMER FESTIVAL OF THE SCHOOL OF MUSIC, VASSAR COLLEGE, June 12, 1880.

On Board the Steamer D. S. Miller, 1.30 P. M. (In search of Arcadian happiness.)

"Arcadia is the only country in which men of condition dare not avow themselves unskilled in music; for instruction in that science was established by the Arcadian government as a solid branch of education, and as a means of divesting the people of dullness, rusticity and brutality." — Polybius.

IMPROMPTU CONCERT, 3 TO 5.

Solos, and concerted music, for Voices, Violin, Piano-forte, Guitar, by the students of the Music School, under the direction of Dr. F. L. Ritter.

"Our choir is a school whose aim is health, and wisdom, and whose means are poetry, melody and harmony." — Zelter.

COLLATION, ADDRESSES ETC., 5.30 TO 7.

MENU.

Oysters, from "Fingal's Cave."
 Mermaid Soup, à la "Lovely Melusina."
 Broiled Bass, Flying Dutchman Sauce.
 "Mazeppa Cutlets," sauce Hyron-Liszt.
 Salmi de Pégase, with eagles' brain sauce, Beethoven style.
 Fête of singing swans, shot by the seventh bullet in "Der Freischütz." Roast beef à la Handel.
 Cosmopolitan hash à la Meyerbeer.
 Antediluvian devilled bones, à la Bach; broiled in the 4th part of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust."
 Calves' sweetbreads, à la Abt and Pissani.
 Roast shoulder of mutton, from Dr. Blow's "Orpheus Britannicus."
 Vegetables, salads, pickles, etc., selected, with the morning dew upon them, from Haydn's "Seasons."
 Cheese. Deutscher Kunst Käse, from Wagner's Nibelungen Tetralogy.

 Chromatic cream à la Chopin flavored with rose-tragique-unique.
 Oriental fruits and sherbets, prepared by Moore's Peri during the Carnival in Schumann's Paradise.
 Coffee from David's "Le Désert."

"No true musician ever was a bad man, and no good man ever was a dull man; therefore are all good musicians inclined to gaiety" — Luther.

DANCING, 7.30 TO 9.

Marche polonaise. Waltz. Quadrille. Polka. Waltz. Lancers. Scotch Reel. Quadrille. Galop.
 "And now the golden lyre of Apollo regulates the measure of the dance, source of order, health and joy." — Pindar.
 "Poetry, music, dancing, formed the enchanted circle of active living Grecian art; a mystic cortege, veiled with the glow, the pulse, the truth, of actual life! All that humanity has since invented in the arts, seems but a pale, puny memory of this once vital movement of the three immortal Muses, noblest educators of the people!" — Schuré.

Towards the close of the evening, a grand performance will be given by Signor Maccherignoli Cavallieri and Count Noeneboff Flitterowski, two distinguished veterans, in reduced circumstances, who have appeared with great success before awe-stricken masses of crowned heads, as well as select, cultured, and supercilious audiences, in every quarter of the civilized globe.

COMMITTEE SYMPHONY.

Andante risoluto, Miss Hartmann. Scherzo, Miss Shaw. Largo, Miss Cecil. Andantino grazioso, Miss Wetzel. Allegro, Miss Cooley.

Programme (opus 1), composed, by desire, expressly for this occasion only, by Mrs. Raymond Ritter.

VALE.

Next week, Commencement week, will close the college year; the musical season at Vassar may be said to end with the annual Commencement concert, on Monday next; a fit close to other concerts in which the students have participated during the year, as well as those in which they have had the assistance of Messrs. Bergner, Matzka, Remmert, Werrenath, Miss Beebe, the Philharmonic Club of New York, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club of Boston, and others. A. Z.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LEIPZIG. Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen will be given here this month, with Frau Materna, Frau Vogl, and Herren Jaeger and Vogl in the principal parts.

— A concert in aid of the Orchestra Fund was given, under the direction of Hans von Bülow, May 5. The programme included: Overture to Benvenuto Cellini, Berlioz; Fantasia in C, Schubert-Liszt; "Kaisermarsch," Wagner; and Ninth Symphony, Beethoven.

DRESDEN. Here is the repertory of the Royal Court Theatre for one week: Sunday: Die Zauberflöte, Mozart; Monday: Drama, Schiller's Die Braut von Messina; Tuesday: Die Stumme von Portici (Masaniello), Auber; Wednesday: Drama, Goethe's Faust; Thursday: Don Juan, Mozart; Friday: Shakespeare's Othello; Saturday: La Dame Blanche, Boieldieu. Let us all emigrate to the Saxon Florence!

GERMAN FESTIVALS. The London Musical Times (June 1), says:

Two of the most important annually recurring events in German musical life, took place during last month, viz., the Music-Festival of the Lower Rhine, held this year at Cologne, from the 16th to the 18th ult., and the meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein, which assembled at Baden-Baden, during the days from the 19th to the 23d ult., and which invariably includes some interesting musical performances, in addition to the social intercourse of its members, which these annual gatherings are intended to promote. The musical programmes of both will be found below. The Cologne Festival was conducted by that veteran musician, Herr Ferdinand Hiller, and was, according to the Cologne Gazette, a great artistic success, both as regards vocalists and instrumentalists, some 600 choristers and an orchestra of about 130 professors having taken part in the performances. Among the artists taking part in the Festival may be mentioned Frau Clara Schumann and Herr Joachim. Of the performances held in connection with the Baden-Baden meeting, that of Weisheimer's Opera "Meister Martin und seine Gesellen," the libretto of which is founded on Hoffman's well-known tale, is said to have scarcely gained more than a succès d'estime; while among orchestral novelties, a Symphony, No. 2, by A. Borodin, a Russian composer, attracted universal attention.

COLOGNE.—Music Festival of the lower Rhine (May 16, 17, and 18): Overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses" (Beethoven); Oratorio, "Israel in Egypt" (Handel); Symphony No. 8, (Beethoven); Andante for stringed orchestra (Haydn); "Die Nacht," hymn for chorus, soli, and orchestra (Hiller); Pianoforte Concerto, A minor (Schumann); Cantata, "O ewiges Feuer" (Bach); Overture, "Im Hochland" (Gade); Air from "Cosi fan tutte" (Mozart); "Schicksalslied" (Erahms); "Ave Maria," for one voice, with stringed orchestra (Verdi); Symphony, A minor (Mendelssohn); Violin Concerto (Beethoven); Scene and air from "Traviata" (Verdi); Overture, "Freischütz" (Weber).

BADEN-BADEN.—Meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein (May 19 to 23): Opera, "Meister Martin und seine Gesellen" (Weisheimer); "Kaisermarsch" (Wagner); Ballade for orchestra (E. E. Taubert); Violoncello Concerto (E. Hartmann); "Die Löwenbräut," ballad for one voice and orchestra (W. Weisheimer); Overture, "Torquato Tasso" (Schulz-Schwerin); Concertstück for violin, A major (C. Saint-Saëns); Symphony No. 2 (A. Borodin); Introduction and Choruses from "Christus" (Liszt); String Quintet, Op. 10 (O. Dessoff); "Dolorosa," cycius of songs (A. Jensen); Sonata for pianoforte and viola, F. minor (A. Rubinstein); Songs (E. Lassen and R. Franz); Pianoforte Trio, Op. 9 (C. Rübner); Prelude and Fugue, E flat major, for organ (Bach); Adagio from Third Sonata, for violin and organ (Bach); Two Sacred Songs (A. Becker); Rhapsody No. 1, for organ (Saint-Saëns); Organ Fantasia, C sharp minor (F. Kiel); Adagio religioso, for violoncello and organ (A. Wolfertmann); Cantique français de Denizot, for organ (Pierre François Boëly); Two Songs (P. Cornelius); Introduction and Allegro from Organ Sonata, Op. 42 (A. Guilmant); Overture "King Lear" (Berlioz); Concertstück, C minor (Saint Saëns); Two orchestral pieces to "Roméo et Juliette" (Dumoulin); Jeanne d'Arc, dramatic scene (F. Liszt); Phæton, symphonic poem (Saint-Saëns); Fragments from "Tristan" (Wagner); Pianoforte Quartet (Bungert); Theme with variations and Polonaise, for pianoforte (Tschalkowski); Sestet, in G major, Op. 36 (Brahms); vocal soli.

LONDON. The chief theme of interest in musical circles has been the concerts of Herr Hans Richter, who first came to London, two years ago, as a Wagnerian Conductor. The wise-acres shook their heads when it was announced that he would conduct Beethoven's Symphonies. But this season, Figaro (June 2) says, "He is showing his surpassing ability as a conductor of music of well-nigh every school. At the first concert of the present season he proved he was equally great in the music of Schumann as he was in that of Beethoven and Wagner; at the second concert he added Cherubini and Spohr, at the third Mendelssohn, and last Thursday Schubert (the great Symphony in C) to his London repertory." There is a good deal of jealousy towards him, it seems, among the older conductors; but the same writer thinks that they had better investigate the reason of his remarkable success, and describes his method as follows:—

In the first place, Herr Richter thoroughly masters his score in letter and in spirit; that is to say, he has not only deeply studied every possible effect to be gained without violence to the composer's intentions, but he is often able to conduct without book. He does not always dispense with the score—a practice which is, indeed, by no means to be commended—and it was satisfactory to notice that last Thursday the conductor had before him the music both of Dvôřák's Rhapsody and Schubert's Symphony. Herr Richter has also an intimate knowledge of every instrument in the orchestra, and at rehearsals he frequently plays to the performers the respective instruments in the way he wishes the passage performed. Armed with these gifts, he faces his orchestra, well knowing that he is in truth a director able to prove his knowledge not only of the score but also of the parts and of the proper method of playing the various instruments. The orchestra has often been compared to a highly-spirited hunter, which, unless its rider shows himself in every respect its superior, will speedily run away with him. It is a lamentable fact that in some—though happily not all—of our orchestras the members are perfectly well aware that they are superior in knowledge to their conductor, and all sort of respect and of subordination is lost. With Herr Richter, however, a movement of the left hand is equivalent to a touch of the spur, and all the members of his band are only too willing and proud to implicitly obey the slightest hint of one who is admittedly and really their chief. At rehearsal, beside very complete instructions as to shading, and the keenest ear for errors and false notes, Herr Richter often adopts the system of sectional practice, each set of instruments playing separately; and to this must be attributed not only the admirable precision, but especially the wonderful clearness, of the parts which characterises his performers. There is no need to carry a score to the concert hall. The parts may be distinguished with the utmost clearness, and in this respect Herr Richter is not only unrivalled, but stands alone among modern conductors. His method of beat is also, while firm, singularly modest; he does not, like some foreign conductors, dance about, kick the ground, nor thrash the music desk; the bâton serving to give the beat and the cues, while the slight, and to the audience almost imperceptible, movement of the left hand supplies the shading. In short, the orchestra becomes under Herr Richter an unerring machine, and the conductor, by apparently the simplest of movements, moulds it to his will and plays upon it as surely and as easily as a great performer plays on the piano.

SIR JOHN GOSS, who died on the 10th ult., at the ripe age of eighty, was a pillar in the temple of Anglican Church Music. He may be named with Samuel Sebastian Wesley, as twin founders of the modern anthem. Attwood, the predecessor of Goss at St. Paul's and his teacher had all the intention of a reformer, but he had neither grace nor genius sufficient to give commanding form and expression to his thoughts. At the time when Goss and Wesley began to work, the composition of anthems had virtually ceased for many years. Adaptions were offered in lieu of new works. These two men set to work to restore to the anthem its dignity, and at the same time to give it the benefit of all the resources of modern musical expression which could be used without detracting from its sacred character. Goss, notwithstanding his long life, was by no means a prolific composer. He was noted for a wise fastidiousness in the selection of words, and for deliberate habits in composing. He often kept his works in hand for years, and touched and retouched them until he was satisfied. To this habit of being his own critic we attribute the well sustained character of his writing. Other men have more spontaneity, but he is always solid and strong. Goss's life as a producer extended over fifty years (1819 to 1893), but his best church work was done in the last ten years of this period. As a church composer he stuck to his last. The catalogue of the British Museum, where every man's literary transgressions are writ in letters of iron, holds him guilty in early life of a few pianoforte arrangements, and a few songs, while one of his glees is popular, but these are the mere accidents of his artistic life. His Introduction to Harmony and thorough Bass (1833) is for the most part full of common sense. It may be commended as easy and pleasant reading, but it by no means enables the student to parse the chords of one of Goss's own anthems. We must remember, however, that it is forty-seven years old, and that it has never been brought abreast of the times. Goss as a theorist lived in the past; he made no adequate attempt to legalise the innovations of the present. None have surpassed Goss as a harmoniser of our standard hymn-tunes. His arrangements are seen at the best in Mercer's Collection, and they have a smoothness and solidity which marks the finest judgment and balance of taste. In character Sir John was remarkable for diffidence and modesty; in private life he was known to a few friends as a most lovable man, and a truly English gentleman.—Tonic Sol-Fa Reporter, June 1.

—The death, after a very brief illness, of Mr. John Curwen, the founder of the Tonic Sol-Fa movement, occurred on the 30th ult. Figaro says of him:

A member of an old Cumbrian family, a son of the Rev. Spedding Curwen, the originator of the Tonic Sol-Fa movement in this country was born at Heckmond-wike, in Yorkshire, on Nov. 14, 1816. John Curwen was educated for the Ministry, first at Coward College, and afterwards at London University. He does not appear to have taken any degree, and he was in 1838 appointed assistant minister at the Independent church at Basingstoke. Here he first experimented with his extraordinary talent for making difficult things easy to the youthful mind; teaching the Sunday School children to sing, and inventing the now celebrated "Look and Say" method of teaching to read. In 1841 he moved to Stowmarket, in Suffolk, and it was from this place that he visited Miss Glover's schools at Norwich, and gained the idea of the Tonic Sol-fa. In 1844 he was elected pastor at Plaistow, in Essex, and from this appointment may be dated the foundation of the Tonic Sol-fa system. Having great energy, and abundant powers of organization, John Curwen entered heart and soul into the new ideas, delivering lectures on the subject, and sending forth books and pamphlets in large quantities. In 1853 he established the Tonic Sol-fa Association, a body through whose agency thousands and tens of thousands of persons to whom music was previously a closed book, were taught to sing. In connection with, and in illustration of, Tonic Sol-fa, he issued the "Standard Course of the Tonic Sol-fa Method," "The Child's Own Hymn Book," "How to observe Harmony," "Construction Exercises in Elementary Musical Composition," and he likewise established the Tonic Sol-fa Reporter, a periodical which has attained a very wide circulation, as a disseminator of Tonic Sol-fa news, throughout the country. In 1862 Mr. Curwen founded the Tonic Sol-fa College, for the education of teachers of this method; and in 1867, having retired from the ministry on the ground of ill-health, he established a printing and publication business in support of the Tonic Sol-fa system. That system has had many enemies, and by partisans it has been warmly attacked. But Mr. Curwen has lived to see the triumph of his method, and the wide adoption of a system of music which now gives recreation and enjoyment to many thousands of our fellow creatures.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

NEW YORK. Of Chamber Music in private houses there are too few examples in this country. Here is one worthy of emulation. A gentleman of New York, Mr. Charles B. Burrell, sends us a printed "Souvenir of the Chamber Music performed at his residence (30 Seventh Avenue) during the season of 1879-80." This was the fifth season in which every other Sunday evening has been devoted in this way to the enjoyment of classical Trios, Quartets and Quintets. The performers have been Miss S. A. Ruchau, piano; Dr. L. D. Mainville, first violin; Joseph Lewenberg, second do; Samuel V. Speyer, viola; and Carl G. F. Martens, 'cello. These formed the stringed quartet, assisted by I. Id Meyer, violin, Emil Gramm, viola, and E. W. Reccius. The list of works given during the past winter is remarkably large, including:

Trios, for violin, 'cello and piano: Beethoven, Op. 1, Nos. 1 and 3; Jadasohn, Op. 16; Barzeli, No. 1, Op. 6 and Op. 20; Schubert, B flat, Op. 99; Rubinstein, B flat, Op. 52, and No. 1, Op. 13; Gade, "Novelletten," Op. 29; Mendelssohn, Op. 66; Reissiger, Op. 167; Raff, No. 1, Op. 112; H. Schotte, Op. 51.
Quartets, for Strings: Schubert, Posthumous (andante with variations); Fesca, Op. 28, arr. from 2d Septet; Beethoven, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, of Op. 18; Mozart, No. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6, of "the ten."
Quartets, with Piano: Rheinberger, Op. 38; Mendelssohn, Op. 3; Fesca, Op. 26; Mozart, G minor; Beethoven, Op. 16.
Quintets, for Strings: Beethoven, Op. 29; Mozart, No. 6; Mendelssohn, Op. 87.
Quintets with Piano: Schumann, Op. 44; Reissiger, Op. 191; Reinecke, Op. 83; Louis Ferdinand, Prince of Prussia, Op. 1.
Concerto, Op. 34, for 'cello, Lindner.

NEW YORK is to have its May Musical Festival. Arrangements are in progress for a series of performances in May 1881, under the combined direction of the Oratorio and Symphony Societies. The first public announcement says:

"No exertion will be spared to put it on the highest plane of musical performances. The choral forces, of which the chorus of the Oratorio Society is the nucleus, will number about one thousand, and the orchestra will comprise two hundred instruments. The best talent, both of this country and Europe, for the solo parts, will be secured, negotiations for eminent artists from abroad being already in progress. The entire force will be under the musical lead of Dr. Leopold Dumm-roech."

DAYTON, O. The 21st concert of the Philharmonic Society, with chorus and orchestra of 150 performers, W. L. Blumenschein, director, took place May 7, with the following programme:

"Spring's Message," for Chorus and Orchestra. . . . Gade.
"On Mighty Pines," recitative and aria, (Creation). Haydn.
Symphony in C, for Orchestra. Beethoven.
"Capriccio Brillante." Op. 12, for Piano and Orchestra. Mendelssohn.
"By Babylon's Wave," Chorus and Orchestra. . . . Gounod.
[Arranged for Orchestra by W. L. Blumenschein.]
"Remembrance," for Flute Solo. Tschak.
Prof. Hugo Wittgenstein.
"Forty-Second Psalm." Mendelssohn.

THE MUSICAL VERSIONS OF
GOETHE'S "FAUST."BY ADOLPHE JULLIEN.¹

III.

THE OVERTURES OF CHRÉTIEN SCHULZ, OF FERD. HILLER AND OF R. WAGNER. THE SYMPHONY OF F. LISZT. THE BALLET OF AD. ADAM.

Before we come to the four great vocal composers inspired by the Drama of Faust, we must add to all these operas, opéra-comiques, musical poems, or collections of melodies, four orchestral creations, — a symphony and three overtures, — in which the authors have endeavored to condense the entire poem of Goethe. They are signed by Chrétien Schulz, Ferdinand Hiller, Richard Wagner, and Franz Liszt.

The first of these Faust overtures dates back from the first years of this century, and was composed at Leipzig, between 1800 and 1810, by Chrétien Schulz, who wrote from that time a quantity of overtures, choruses, marches, dance tunes, etc., for the "dramatic" troupe of Seconda, and who every year directed the theatre orchestra during the sojourn of that troupe in Leipzig. This brave Schulz, to-day so completely unknown, had arrived in this city at the age of ten, and never left it. At first a pupil in the Thomas-schule, having had some inclinations toward theology, having then turned his attention to music, having studied first with the organist of the castle, Engler, then under the direction of Schicht, he had finally obtained the place of director of the weekly concerts of the city, and he died in that position in January, 1827. He had spent seventeen years in office, had lived fifty-three years, and forty-three years in Leipzig.

Hiller's overture to Faust is a work of the youth of the celebrated Musikdirector, who composed it and had it performed in Paris, during the eight years he spent there from 1828, in order to establish his growing reputation as pianist and composer among French amateurs. At the same time that he was producing himself with success by the side of pianists such as Liszt, Kalkbrenner, Osborne and Chopin, he could, thanks to the fortune of his family, organize grand meetings with orchestra to submit his principal compositions to the public. It was in the second of these concerts, given in December, 1831, in the hall of the Conservatoire, that he brought out this overture to Faust, as well as a symphony and a concerto for the pianoforte.

Fétis, whose declared hostility towards what he calls the romantic school is so well known, judges with comparative indulgence the work of the young composer; but not without first bringing an inditement against French and German musicians, "who, like Berlioz and Hiller, try to follow up the revolution which Beethoven wished to consummate in music, and who are borne by their tastes and their conviction toward a vague style, where melodic charm is replaced by images more or less happily expressed; where variety, the fruit of an imagination without bounds, disappears before one dominant thought, with which the composer is always preoccupied, and to which he attaches all his ideas of melody, of rhythm, of modulation and of harmony . . ."

Having once enunciated his grievances against this poetic music, which to-day appears so just, so elevated, Fétis examines the symphony at considerable length, finding in it a fatiguing uniformity of thought, an irksome monotony, which outweighs the real beauties of the work; then he proceeds in these terms: "The overture for Goethe's Faust, having a definite subject, ought to be more easily comprehended; accordingly it had success among the audience. Yet I confess, the success has not absolutely convinced me in favor of the system adopted by M. Hiller. I saw indeed that he wished to paint the three characters of the drama: Faust, Mephistopheles and Marguerite; but in this very design one might meet with a variety of effects which I have sought in vain. The color is generally sombre, and the rhythm too uniform. I have no doubt of the affection which M. Hiller has for this piece, several parts of which are, for the rest, very remarkable; one never adopts half-way a system which he believes good, precisely because he has faith, but at the age of M. Hiller it is easy to modify oneself; and I believe that he will modify himself with time." The observations of Fétis were as vain as his hope, and M. Hiller had the good sense not to modify in anything his tendencies nor his so-called system.

But Liszt conducted not only the works of others; he also directed his own, and he composed many of them at that period; he wrote then and published his twelve Poèmes Symphoniques for orchestra, his symphony La Commedia Divina, after Dante, his Mass for the consecration of the basilica at Gran, a quantity of works for the piano, and finally his symphony of Faust. He was inspired by the poem of Goethe in the largest fashion, without endeavoring in any way to translate its dramatic episodes. He only wished to portray and sum up, in three pieces very different in character, the three principal personages of the drama; he has professed to give, in some sort, a musical and psychological synthesis of each of them. It is certainly a singular idea to wish to personify Faust in an Allegro, Marguerite in an Andante soave, and Mephistopheles in a Scherzo molto vivace ironico; but the very strangeness and the difficulty of the enterprise were just what would excite such an artist to attempt it,—one for whom the new has always had so much charm, and who, to inspire himself with Goethe and to measure himself with Berlioz, would doubtless be unwilling to do anything which any one would have done before him.

The first piece of this symphony is built upon an agitated and impassioned phrase of the violins, which a short entrance of the bassoon connects with a sombre and threatening introduction. This characteristic melody of Faust has power and spring; it develops well and reappears each time with new instrumental resources, with a new increase of sonority, until it dies out at last in a long smorzando, as the doctor, after vain convulsive efforts to seize the youth that flees him, falls crushed under the weight of a life all doubt and ennui. Such is the general plan; but these different resumptions of the symbolical motive, which form the unity of this long piece, are traversed now by short melodies, now by long episodes designed to render all the movements of the doctor's soul. Weariness of existence, involuntary return to the springtime of life, doubt and disgust for all things human, mysterious appeals of love, dull sensations of terrestrial indulgence,—all these shocks of the human mind, all these fluctuations of the old man at once tired of life and eager to enjoy, has the composer sought to translate by sonorous combinations the most diverse that can be imagined.

The Andante entitled Marguerite, rests upon two tender and dreamy phrases; one, sung first by the oboe on a batterie of altos, then taken up in duet by the flute and clarinet, before reappearing in the violins in a mysterious tutti; the other, of a more amorous expression, more abandoned with its very marked syncopation on the third beat, expounded in turn by the quartet of strings and by that of the wood wind instruments, which are not slow to melt away in a vaporous melody. The middle of the piece is filled by a passionate melody which the violoncellos and the violins sing with interchange of parts under a soft murmur of flutes united with the second violins; then the primordial phrase reappears under an uninterrupted stroke of the first violins and brings happily back the amorous plaint of Marguerite. These various sounds are soon lost in silence; the altos alone repeat discreetly a few notes of the first melody; all is hushed; Marguerite succumbs to the temptations of the Demon and sinks into the arms of her beloved.

After the seduction and the gushes of tenderness, the strident laughter of the Devil and the frightful cries of the Sabbath; after the swoons of love, the despairing remorse and the menacing appeals of hell; Mephistopheles has lost the soul of Marguerite, but he has gained that of the doctor, and the demons celebrate the victory of their lord and master. This infernal tableau offered an irresistible attraction and an assured success to a composer so well versed as Liszt in the management of the orchestra, and who knows so well how to draw from the instruments all that they can give—and even a little more. And so this diabolical finale has been successfully treated by him even to the most bizarre and most audacious effects. All Hell resounds in his orchestra, and these thousand instruments hissing, growling, gnashing, howling, give to the damned a concert terrible in a different way from so many other rose-water hells where the demons sing waltzes to distract themselves, and where the sinners express their suffering by imitating the sound of the wind in the trees. This explosion of sardonic joy is suddenly arrested when the human voices unite themselves with the orchestra; the basses, aided by an organ or harmonium, then intone the final chorus under a mysterious beating of bow instruments. This Andante mistico, which closes the whole symphony, is truly of a beautiful character and develops itself with a remarkable placidity after so many bursts of laughter and of fury; the choir of men, alternating with the tenor solo, above the groanings of the organ and the broad strain of harmony united with the brass, calmly terminates this trilogy of doubt, love and hate, letting us hear the chorus mysticus which Goethe has placed at the end of the Second Faust: "Alles vergänglichliches ist nur ein Gleichniss; . . . das Ewig-Weibliche zieht uns hinan."

Just ten years after Hiller, Richard Wagner wrote, also at Paris, A Faust Overture, during his first sojourn among us, at the same time that he finished his Rienzi, with a view to our Grand Opera, and composed the Vaisseau Fantôme (Flying Dutchman), the overture of which was inspired by the recollection of the terrible storm which had assailed him on the passage from Riga to Boulogne. Maurice Schlesinger, the publisher, who, on the recommendation of Meyerbeer, had taken an active interest in bringing forward his young countryman, giving him orders for some critical or musical labors with salary enough to supply his most pressing wants, had obtained a formal promise from the musicians of the orchestra of the Conservatoire, that they would try a piece by his protégé and execute it in a public concert, if it should seem to them to merit that honor. Happy in this assurance, Wagner wrote with inspiration this overture, which, in his thought, was not to remain isolated, but to form the first page of a grand symphony summing up the entire drama of Goethe; and the artists of the Conservatoire tried the piece, "which appeared," as Fétis says, "one long enigma to the executants." To produce such a lucubration in public was a thing not to be thought of; and the author had to guard his precious work for better times. But it was written that this overture, composed in Paris for Parisian amateurs, should be performed in Paris, as in fact it was—at the end of thirty years. On Sunday, March 6, 1870, M. Pasdeloup gave it a hearing in the Concert Populaire, but without great success, and without making any great stir, for that hearing has never yet had a morrow.

Nevertheless this production of the youth of the celebrated composer is quite superior to his operas which date from the same period; it is in fact much more personal, and indicates in the author a maturity of mind, a full possession of himself, not met with to an equal degree in Rienzi, nor even in The Fly- ing Dutchman. This overture, bearing the impress of a power, a passion, a melancholy, raised to the extreme, is like a work apart in the entire work of Wagner. It does not in fact affect that form of an immense crescendo which was to inspire the master with his magnificent overtures to the Flying Dutchman, to Taunhäuser and to the Meistersinger; it is of a conception not more admirable, but more free, which permits him to follow nearly all the phases of the original drama and to translate them and accentuate them with a surprising truth. This incessant contrast of force and of gentleness, this perpetual shock of joy with sadness, these delicious melodies suddenly cut short with a cry of rage, these outbursts of gasping passion traversed by melancholic effluvia, these transports of fury followed by mournful despondency, this calm disillusion of the beginning, these fierce infatuations which plunge mind and body into a complete annihilation, form together a conception hors ligne. This overture, then, with that which Schumann was destined to compose later, offers the most admirable synthesis that can be found of Goethe's drama. We have unfortunately but an overture; we should no doubt have to-day a whole symphony, if the doctors of the Conservatoire had not, in their infallibility, condemned this creation of genius as a "long enigma."

Ten years after Wagner had written his overture, twenty years after Hiller had composed his, Franz Liszt approached the same subject, and wrote not solely an overture, but an entire symphony, a purely orchestral work, at the end of which merely there is joined a choir of men to reinforce the peroration. Liszt must have been much more taken with the dramatic legend of Berlioz than with the poem of Goethe; and if he undertook to translate it into music in his turn, it must have been from admiration for the creation of Berlioz, and from an ambition to measure himself on the same field with the great French musician. Two facts seem to prove the justice of this inference: first, the dedication of the work—Berlioz had dedicated his Faust to Franz Liszt, Liszt dedicated his to Hector Berlioz;—then the date of the composition, for this symphony was written during the years which followed the appearance of the Damnation de Faust in France and in Russia. It was in 1848, two years after the first and unfortunate hearing of the Damnation de Faust at Paris, that Liszt, forced by the political events to interrupt his musical peregrinations to the four corners of Europe, took definitive possession of his functions as first capellmeister at Weimar, never absenting himself unless for rare musical festivals and short journeys, consecrating himself entirely to the amelioration of the Chapel of the Grand Duke of Weimar, and of his Opera which, unrenowned before, soon fixed the attention of the whole musical world. It was on this stage, in fact, that there were represented at that time, through the care and under the direction of Liszt, the principal works of the greatest contemporary composers, particularly those of Schumann, Berlioz, and Richard Wagner; first, that incomparable chef-d'œuvre, Lohengrin, played for the first time in 1850 under the direction of Liszt, and dedicated to him by the author; then, in the following years, Genoveva and Manfred, by Schumann; Alfonso and Estrella, by Schubert; other new operas by Sobolewski, Raff, Lassen, Cornelius; finally Benvenuto Cellini, in reparation for the check experienced by that fine work in Paris, and for which the Parisian public has not yet made the amende honorable to Berlioz.

Gluck composed a ballet of Don Juan, Adolphe Adam wrote one upon Faust. The idea, in either case, was singular, and I should not dare to affirm that the idea was justified in the execution, with Gluck any more than with Adam. It was during a stay of nine months in London, in 1832, that the future author of Le Chalet accepted the strange proposition to write the music of a ballet composed by the dancer Deshayes on the poem of Goethe. It is true that this proposition was made to him by his brother-in-law, Laporte, who had taken the direction of the King's Theatre; it would have been cruel to refuse this scenario in three acts, which they laid upon his arms while pressing him to compose it during the short visit which he was about to make in Paris to assist at the first representation of Le Pré aux Clercs. Adam labored very actively upon this new work, and when he set out again for London on the 21st of January, 1833, his score was completed. It was immediately put in rehearsal, and the ballet of Faust, danced and done in pantomime by Albert, Perrot, Coulon, Mmes. Pauline Leroux and Montessu, all artists of the Grand Opera of Paris, was played at the end of February or the beginning of March. "The success was very great," writes Adam, "even for the music." The final remark is becoming, for such an enterprise is more bizarre than glorious, even after a success, and a little modesty was very well in such a case.

We have rapidly passed in review nearly all the composers who have not feared to measure themselves with the sublime conception of the German poet. There remain yet four, whose works, to be surely judged, ought to be studied at some length: these four composers are, — in order of date, — Spohr, Berlioz, Schumann and Gounod.

GEORGE ONSLOW.

[From the French of A. MARMONTEL.¹]

I shall now search back amongst the memories of my childish days, memories which are still fresh and green in my recollection though belonging to the distant past, and endeavor to describe the sympathetic character of George Onslow. He first directed me in my artistic career, and became, later on, my affectionate and attached friend. Endowed with a charming disposition, a thorough gentleman by birth and feeling, an eminent musician, few figures in the gallery of modern composers stand out in clearer relief or possess a more penetrating charm.

The great French symphonist and composer of chamber music, which in Germany ranks with that of the most celebrated masters, never labored under any uncertainties as to his musical vocation, and his profession was not interfered with by other and more material necessities. His father, Sir Edward Onslow, was a member of the English aristocracy, and it was during a tour in France that he made the acquaintance of Mlle. Bourdailles de Brantome, a lady of great beauty. They were married shortly afterwards, in 1783; the bride possessing youth, beauty, intelligence, and a considerable fortune as her dowry. George Onslow was the son of this union, and was born on the 27th July, 1784.

Lord Onslow, the grandfather of the young George, wished his grandson to live with him in London, in order to take charge of and personally supervise his education. He was taught music merely as an accomplishment and a pastime, but this pastime soon became full of seduction for the child. Hulmandel, Dussek, and Cramer were successively chosen to teach the piano to the young patrician; but Cramer's lessons in particular left a lasting impression on his mind. Thirty years later, when I was still almost a child, he spoke to me about him with great enthusiasm. It was owing to this careful training that George Onslow acquired in a few years brilliant execution, intense love of music, and a fine deep touch, as well as that legato manner of playing which was the basis of the teaching of Clementi, Dussek, and Cramer. Onslow retained all his life the traditions of that school which were so well appreciated by his friend Camille Pleyel. And yet, strange to say, this youthful enthusiast, full of delight at interpreting anything musical, pleased at overcoming any difficulty, and bringing out the finest qualities of the instrument, had no ambition to become a composer.

Nothing denoted the musical fecundity that lay dormant in the young man. When he returned to live with his family in Auvergne, where his earliest days had been passed, he seemed destined to lead the life of a country gentleman, residing on his own estate, with a taste for literature and the fine arts generally, but with no desire to attain to more than mere brilliancy of execution in music. George Onslow, however, soon began to experience that fever which Halévy so well describes in his "Souvenirs and Portraits"—that indefinable but intense sensation which he who loves his art, and finds in it priceless treasures, experiences, and yet all the while lacks the power, enthusiasm, and comprehension which alone are the key to masterpieces causing sublime inspirations to blossom into life.

All Onslow's biographers, enlightened as to this part of his life by the master's own avowal, mention the astonishing fact of the musician endeavoring for nearly four years to compose, and finding himself utterly unable to do so. He was insensible to the masterpieces of dramatic art, and was even indifferent to the beauty of Mozart, though eventually he became one of his most ardent admirers. Intense intuition of the beautiful preceded his direct perceptions, and the desire to attain an ideal easier to divine than to grasp, at last conquered this inertia. The experience was long and discouraging. Mehul's overture to "Stratonice" finally accomplished the prodigy, though it was not solely owing to that work that this miracle was performed. Onslow's love of art was the supreme initiation.

In order to comprehend more thoroughly Mozart, Haydn, Boccherini, and Beethoven—those masters of chamber music—and to take an active part in the execution of their trios, quartets, and quintets, Onslow studied the violoncello. He even acquired some proficiency upon this instrument, for which, later on, he composed with marked predilection. Encouraged by his friends, who were as enthusiastic about music as himself, Onslow made his first attempts at composition in 1806, at the age of twenty-two.

But from being unacquainted with the study of counterpoint, and completely inexperienced in the art of developing his ideas, it only resulted in an elaborate copy of Mozart, without the genius of the master.

This work, however, served as a basis for further study, when George Onslow received instruction from Reicha, whose lessons he pursued with that determination which was so characteristic of his temperament. It was at the house of his friend Camille Pleyel that the young amateur composed his first quatuors and quintets for stringed instruments—violins, alto, and basso; his first trios for the violin and basso, and his beautiful sonata for the piano. His individuality slowly began to assert itself from the imitations of style which had both guided and led away the budding composer; but the absence of early study was still visible. Freedom and clearness in musical dialogue were still wanting, so—following Haydn's example—at the age of forty Onslow began to study counterpoint. He learned rapidly and thoroughly, and from that time the composer felt himself sustained by a real knowledge of his power.

Then began a period of retirement and labor more known to myself personally than to the world in general. My childhood was passed at Clermont, and I was fortunate enough to gain the affections of the celebrated musician. George Onslow spent part of the winter at Clermont, passing six weeks in Paris, and remained during the whole of the summer at his Chateau of Chalandrat, near Mirefleur, a small town where my grandfather, who was a friend of the Onslow family, was born. Here the composer lived with his family and a few intimate friends, amongst whom were MM. Murat de Sévres and de Pierre. His friends were a source of great encouragement and support to him. I have often been present at his receptions of chamber music, and have preserved a lively recollection of the sympathy which existed between the audience and the interpreters. George Onslow's reputation increased rapidly, seconded as it was by his interpreters—Baillot, Tilmant, Kreutzer, Vidal, Norblin père, Alard, Sauzey, Cuvillon, Dancla, Franchomme, and Gouffé, who were among those invited the beginning of every winter to attend the first performances, which were as a rule enthusiastically received.

In 1842 George Onslow was elected a member of the French Institute in place of Cherubini. The dramatic works, "L'Alcade de la Vega," "Le Colporteur," "Le Duc de Guise," three symphonies, seven trios for piano, violin, and violoncello, thirty-six quatuors, thirty-four quintets, a sextuor, septuor, duets for piano and violin, sonatas, one pianoforte sonata, and various themes, formed at that period the extent of his musical compositions.

The name of George Onslow was long celebrated and popular in Germany; it ranked with our neighbors, who are good and impartial judges of the merits of foreign composers, with those of the greatest symphonists; and as an author of chamber music his name was coupled with the immortal ones of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. But in France, with the exception of a small number of real musicians, the majority of the public only knew of Onslow by his lyrical works, which were not received with much enthusiasm. The composer of symphonies and chamber music remained unknown to the mass of the people, who only appreciate theatrical music.

In 1829, George Onslow, who was always fond of the pursuits and amusements of a country gentleman, and was a great lover of the chase, nearly lost his life in a boar hunt which had been got up in his honor. He was stationed near some trees, which partially hid him from the rest of the party, and fired at a boar which passed near. He missed it; but one of the huntsmen had noticed a rustling in the bushes near where George Onslow stood. He fired, and the shot hit the composer full in the face, instead of the boar.

His recovery was long and tedious; his fine, clear cut features were not disfigured, but this accident was the cause of a partial deafness, which increased every year. This deafness was less painful than that to which Beethoven was a martyr; nevertheless, it threw a gloom over our illustrious compatriot, and caused him to feel discouraged and melancholy. Other causes added to his despondency. He suffered at not receiving from France the justice rendered by Germany to his works, and the admiration there accorded to his chamber music. I have often heard him speak bitterly of that want of appreciation which saddened his last days.

George Onslow died on the 3d October, 1852. His friends can remember how much sympathy for the man was combined with admiration for the composer. The best portrait of George Onslow is by Grenodon, but I do not require to see it to recall to my remembrance that handsome face, with its clear cut, noble features, one of the finest types of the great Anglo-Saxon race, softened and perfected by a mixture of French grace. His high forehead, Bourbon nose, the perfect oval of his face, his arched and smiling mouth, frank and genial expression were most attractive. He was tall, and his easy, graceful carriage added an additional charm of stateliness and dignity.

CRAZY CRITICS.

The following (says the London Musical Standard) has been brought to our office by a queer-looking individual, who stated that he had written to Franz Liszt to offer his services as analyst, whenever the Abbate wrote another Epic of Hades, and had sent this article as a specimen of his critical acumen. The advanced composer, however, declined to have anything to do with him, on the ground that he was evidently demented, and saw more in music than the composer had ever intended should be in it—a failing with which his (Liszt's) school had no sympathy whatever. The writer of the article confessed to us in confidence that he was a "Crazy Critic," and that he differed in only one point from many other critics—he was crazy, and knew it; while they were crazy, and didn't know it:—

"The next item in the programme was the —th Symphony of L. Van Beethoven. This important work is one of the immortal nine composed in one day to the order of the Emperor Francis Joseph. The story of the composer's wife keeping him awake with fairy tales to enable him to finish his task within the allotted time, is well known. This set of nine is, in its turn, part of that glorious series of twenty-one, familiarly referred to in the 'Esoteric Critic' as: the full score of Beethoven's Symphonies in all the major and minor clefs, and including, among the rest, the popular Pastoral, 'Moonlight,' 'Reformation' and 'Blue Danube' Symphonies—the third named of which will rank high even when compared with such masterpieces as the 'Battle of Prague,' the March from 'Athalie,' and the overture to 'Tancred.'

"The opening movement is in one of the master's characteristic moods. His individuality is reflected alike in the rallentando treatment of the wind, and the half scornful, half beseeching tone of the syncopated passage for the drum—an instrument which, since the time of our own Orlando Gibbs, has rarely been treated with such felicity as in the present movement. As Fétis, in his standard Traité de l'Instrumentation, has justly observed, the management of the drum is the one mark by which genius is distinguishable from mere talent:—"The capabilities," says he, (we quote from memory), "of the violin, the horn, the flute, and the thorough-bass, may be taught in the schools; genius alone can probe the hidden recesses of the drum." Though briefly developed, this movement is nevertheless replete with feeling and floritura.

"The succeeding Non Troppo served well to display the penetrating adagio quality of the double-basses and oboes; while the bravura passages assigned to the horns were delivered with a sympathetic appreciation of the composer's hidden meaning. We observed, by the way, that the players of these instruments used fresh mouth-pieces for this section of the work—a truly original idea; interesting, moreover, as showing the ready command of the composer over the resources at his disposal. By the simultaneous employment of the ritardando and accelerando, a climax of an exciting nature is skilfully worked up, culminating, most unexpectedly, in a discord of the prepared sixth. The repeats were delicately played, and the resolution of the well-known double-bass produced all its customary effects. A passage in the reprise of the leitmotif suggests to us the thought—"Was not comic opera, after all, Beethoven's true mission?" But man is the creature of his own age. To Beethoven was the task assigned, of perfecting old material; the glory of originating a new form of art was reserved for the present age, and for Offenbach.

"The Andante, a soft and vivacious movement, consisting, as it does, of a binary counterpoint in the octave, three against two, might by some be considered pedantic, but, to our mind, is redeemed by the flowing staccato melody for the clarinets, oboes, and bassoons, accompanied by an expressive pizzicato on the reed instruments. A note in the programme informs us that the movement is written in five parts. Of these, we confess our preference for the second, third, and fourth, though the opening and conclusion are also deservedly admired. In the Scherzo the composer reverts to one of the old forms perfected by his talented countryman, J. S. Bach—a composer, the trifling and ad captandum nature of whose compositions procured him an ephemeral popularity, but whose works are now rarely heard except as act-music at some of our provincial theatres. The rapid dramatic passages for the horns were delivered with a brilliancy, and a purity of tone, that left little to be desired. In this movement an ethereal effect is obtained by causing the violins to be played 'con sordini,' i.e., without rosin. We are informed by a dilettante friend, that the same end may be gained by freely soaping the strings of the instrument. It would be interesting to know whether this process, which seems to be not without its advantages, has been brought to the notice of the masters of the craft. In the Finale, science and genius combine to enthrall the listener. The composer is here at his strongest. By turns, he enchants and terrifies. Whispers of hope are succeeded by wails of despair. The movement is a complete epitome of man and his destiny. Whole doctrines are set forth in single notes. Systems of philosophy are refuted within the space of a double bar; while, here and there, the curtain is momentarily raised that divides the known from the unknown, and, for a short time, man is brought face to face with the mystery of existence, grasping the illimitable, sounding the unfathomable. Every member of the band becomes for the moment an inspired Hebrew—a Heaven-sent messenger of the decrees of relentless Fate; while every member of the audience yields himself up to the dominant harmony, and blindly, yet thankfully, clings to the guidance of the leading note. Swept along by the full torrent of passion, the enraptured hearer is hurried onwards into the frenzied whirlpool of the Coda, where every truth that has been set forth at large before is now resumed in brief. By an uncommon, but not, we believe, unprecedented tour de force, the master has here made every instrument play a different tune, in a different key, and in a different time. The crisis reached, the sound gradually dies away, as the exhausted fancy softly sinks to earth; the meek bleating of the trombones proclaiming in language that only the scoffer can afford to despise as meaningless, that there is hope for man beyond the grave.

"Mr. X. was a graceful conductor; and it seemed to us, as far as we could judge from our somewhat distant seat, that his gestures followed implicitly the windings of the music. Although we should be sorry to miss the chef d'orchestre from his accustomed throne, we think it our duty, in the interests of the art, to inquire whether his movements have not a tendency to distract the attention of the performers. We observed that several of the latter from time to time threw an eye in the direction of their chief.

"With regard to the performance, though we have no wish to be unduly severe in criticising the efforts of amateurs, we would suggest that the tempi of the more strictly minor passages might have been taken a shade flatter. It is by attention to minor details that general effect is secured. For the rest, the bars were nicely accented; many of the instruments seemed to come in very appropriately, and the clarinets struck us as being fairly in tune."

JULES BENEDICT.

The following account of Sir Julius Benedict's artistic career is taken from the Dictionary of Music and Musicians—edited by George Grove, D.C.L.:

"Sir Julius Benedict was born at Stuttgart, November 27, 1804. Sir Julius is one of the most eminent of the numerous foreign musicians who have settled in England since Handel's time. As composer, performer, and teacher of music, he has now held an exceptionally high position in this country for upwards of forty years. After studying under Hummel at Weimar—during which he saw Beethoven (March 8, 1827)—he was, in his seventeenth year, presented by the illustrious pianist to Weber, who received him into his house, and from the beginning of 1821 until the end of 1824, treated him, in Sir Julius's own words, 'not only as a pupil, but as a son.' At the age of nineteen young Benedict was, on Weber's recommendation, appointed to conduct a series of operatic performances at Vienna. A few years afterwards we find him as chef d'orchestre at the San Carlo at Naples, where he produced his first opera, Giacinta ed Ernesto—a work which seems to have been too German for the Neapolitan taste. On the other hand, I Portoghesi in Goa, which Benedict composed in 1830 for Stuttgart, may have been found too Italian for the Germans; since, unsuccessful in the city for which it was specially written, it was warmly received by the operatic public of Naples. The youthful master, who showed himself a German among the Italians, and an Italian among the Germans, went in 1835 to Paris, at that time the head-quarters of Rossini and Meyerbeer, a frequent place of rendezvous for Donizetti and Bellini, and the home of Auber, Hérold, and Adolphe Adam, of Halévy, Berlioz, and Félicien David. At Paris, Benedict made the acquaintance of Malibran, who suggested his visiting London: and from 1835 until now, we have had Weber's favorite pupil residing permanently among us. In 1836 Benedict was appointed to the musical direction of the Opera Buffa, started by the late John Mitchell at the Lyceum Theatre. Here he brought out with success a little work called Un Anno ed un Giorno, originally given in 1836 at Naples. In 1838 he produced his first English opera, The Gipsy's Warning—known in the present day to those who are not acquainted with it as a whole by the very dramatic air for the bass voice, 'Rage, thou angry storm.' Benedict was engaged at Drury Lane Theatre as orchestral conductor throughout that period of Mr. Bunn's management during which Balfe's most successful works were brought out. To this period belong Benedict's finest operas, The Brides of Venice, and The Crusaders, both produced at Drury Lane under the composer's immediate direction. In 1850 Benedict accompanied Jenny Lind to the United States, and directed the whole of the concerts given by the 'Swedish Nightingale,' with such unexampled success, during her famous American tour. On his return to England he accepted an engagement as musical conductor at Her Majesty's Theatre, and afterwards at Drury Lane, whither Mr. Mapleson's establishment was for a time transferred. When in 1860 Mr. Mapleson was about to produce (at Her Majesty's Theatre) an Italian version of Oberon, he naturally turned to the composer who, above all others, possessed the secret of Weber's style, and requested him to supply the recitatives wanting in the Oberon composed for the English stage, but absolutely necessary for the work in Italianized form. Benedict added recitatives which may now be looked upon as belonging inseparably to the Italian Oberon. Eighteen hundred and sixty was also the year of Benedict's beautiful cantata on the subject of Undine—produced at the Norwich Festival—in which Clara Novello made her last public appearance. In 1862, soon after the remarkable success of Mr. Dion Boucicault's Colleen Bawn, Benedict brought out The Lily of Killarney, for which Mr. Orenford (probably in collaboration with Mr. Boucicault) had furnished the excellent libretto. In 1863 he composed the cantata of Richard Cœur de Lion for the Norwich Festival of that year. His operetta, The Bride of Song, was given at Covent Garden in 1864; his oratorio of St. Cecilia at the Norwich Festival in 1866; that of St. Peter, at the Birmingham Festival of 1870. As 'conductor' at chamber-concerts, where the duties of the musician so entitled consist in accompanying the singers on the pianoforte, and in seeing generally that nothing goes wrong, Benedict has come at least as often before the public as in his character of orchestral chief. With rare interruptions he has officiated as conductor at the Monday Popular Concerts since they first started, now some sixteen years ago. His own annual concert has been looked upon for the last forty years at least as one of the great festivals of the musical season. There is no form of music which this versatile composer has not cultivated, and though more prolific masters may have lived, it would be difficult to name one who has labored with success in so many different styles. In 1873 a symphony by the now veteran composer was performed for the first time at the Crystal Palace; and a second in the following year; so that a complete edition of Benedict's works would include, besides ballads and pianoforte fantasias, operas, oratorios, and cantatas, compositions in the highest form of orchestral music. Sir Julius received the honor of knighthood in 1871. On the occasion of his seventieth birthday he was named Knight Commander of the Orders of Francis and Joseph (Austria), and of Frederick (Württemberg). It was determined in the same year, by his numerous English friends, to offer him a testimonial 'in appreciation of his labors during forty years for the advancement of art, and as a token of their esteem.' In accordance with this resolution a service of silver, including a magnificent group of candelabra, was presented to Sir Julius the following summer, at Dudley House, before a number of the most distinguished musicians and amateurs in London. Besides being a member of the before-mentioned Austrian and Württembergian orders, Sir Julius Benedict has been decorated by the Sovereigns of Prussia, Italy, Belgium, Sweden, Portugal, and Hanover."

With regard to Sir Julius Benedict's instrumental compositions, orchestral or otherwise, there is a good deal to be added to the foregoing, besides something to elucidate. The scherzo from the symphony in G minor, for example, had been played at the Norwich Festival previous to its admirable performance (in 1873) at the Crystal Palace, under the direction of Mr. Manns. The symphony No. 2, in C major, on the other hand, has never been given entire at the Crystal Palace, or elsewhere. It may here not be inappropriate to notice what is passed over in the Dictionary of Music and Musicians: viz., that Benedict has conducted the Triennial Norwich Festival twelve times, beginning from 1845 (when he succeeded the late Professor Edward Taylor). This explains his having composed three cantatas, Undine, Richard Cœur de Lion, and St. Cecilia (which has no pretensions to be an "oratorio,") for that important triennial event. At the last festival (1878) he produced his Käthchen von Heilbronn, an overture intended to illustrate the well-known drama of Heinrich Kleist—if not, indeed, to serve as prelude to an opera bearing the name and telling the story of Kleist's impressive work. To all his operas and cantatas, as well as to his oratorio, St. Peter, Sir Julius has written overtures; so that these may be understood in connection with the works with which they are allied. But independently of opera, cantata, and oratorio, he has composed what may be designated as "concert-overtures," of which the subjoined may be accepted as a tolerably correct list:—Raoul de Crequy, 1830 (for Berlin; the Minnesinger, 1842; a "Festival Overture," in D, for the opening of the new Liverpool Philharmonic Hall (the annual series of concerts held, in which he has conducted since the demise of Alfred Mellon); overture to Shakespeare's Tempest, 1854; overtures, The Bride of Song and Prince von Homburg, 1864 and 1865; overture to Macbeth, on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Royal; and two overtures—Return of the Crusaders and Axel and Walburg, never yet made known to the public. Apart from symphonies and overtures, however, Sir Julius Benedict has written other instrumental works, among which may be named a Rondo Brillante in A flat (1824), a Concertino in the same key (1830), a Concerto in C minor (1849), and a second Concerto in E flat (1870), all for the pianoforte with orchestral accompaniments. The Concerto in C minor was played by Sir Julius himself, at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, not long before his departure for the United States with the then famous Jenny Lind. Three years later (April 25, 1853) it was performed at a concert given by the Harmonic Union, a society of which Mr. Benedict himself was conductor, by Mme. (then Miss) Arabella Goddard, who has also played the Concerto in E flat at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, at the Crystal Palace, and at the Birmingham Festival of 1867—the year of the production of Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria and John Francis Barnett's Paradise and the Peri.

The Quartet for stringed instruments, in C minor, is the second composition of this form from the pen of Sir Julius Benedict, one in E major (still in MS.) having been written as far back as 1825. The Sonata in E minor, for pianoforte and violin, has also two precursors—the first in D minor, Op. 1, published in 1822 by Peters of Leipzig, and dedicated "to his beloved master, C. M. von Weber," the second in A major, composed in 1824, and still unpublished. He has, moreover, composed two sonatas for pianoforte alone—one in E, "Op. 2" (1824), another in D minor (1825), "Op. 4."

The Quartet and Sonata, introduced for the first time before an English audience on the occasion of Sir Julius Benedict's recent benefit concert in St. James's Hall, were written in London—the Quartet, in 1872, the Sonata in 1868.

That Weber treated Benedict "not only as a pupil but as a son," may be gathered from the letter addressed by the composer of Der Freischütz to the father of the young student, who, having terminated the period of his apprenticeship, was on the point of starting to rejoin his family at Vienna. Coming from such a source, this letter is worth being made public, and a translation is subjoined:—

"If God grants Julius the perseverance and modest humbleness of the true artist who pursues his art for art's sake only, added to his eminent gifts and talent, he cannot fail to achieve considerable success in the world; provided he does not endeavor to sow and reap at the same time, and to snatch in a few months what for others is the labor of so many years. For myself, at least, I can solemnly assert and know that I have neither neglected, kept back, nor overlooked anything which, according to my belief, could make him a thorough artist and man. I could read to him from the book of experience, and have done so with affection, strictness at times even, with words of deep earnestness. I pray God vouchsafe his best blessing on his exertions."

Had Weber lived to see the result, he would in all probability have admitted that his hopes were fulfilled even sooner than he had anticipated.

. The overtures to the Tempest and the Minnesinger were written expressly for the Norwich Festivals. The Bride of Song is an operetta virtually the same as Un Anno ed un Giorno, originally produced at Naples. It was performed at Covent Garden Theatre in 1864. Der Prinz von Homburg is another drama by Heinrich Kleist.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1880.

JOACHIM AND CLARA SCHUMANN.

There are reports of an intended visit to this country by the great violinist,—too good, we fear, to be true. But let us hope that he will come, and with him his wife, the admirable singer. We have had hopes before now that both Mme. Schumann and Joachim, so long associated in artistic labors, would one day let themselves be heard in America; but we fear it is too late to expect all that. Meanwhile we are tempted to draw from our reminiscences of a week spent in Dresden, twenty years ago, when it was our privilege to enjoy the friendly acquaintance and the daily performance, in rehearsal or in concert, of that noble pair of artists.

It was in Leipzig, one October evening, after a Gewandhaus concert, while the wild harmonies of Schumann's Manfred music were yet ringing in the brain, that we took up the Zeitung and there read that on the morrow evening two of the noblest interpreters of the noblest in German art, whom more than any two perhaps we wished to hear and know, and to whose fame the readers of this Journal were not strangers would commence a series of three musical soirées in the Hotel de Saxe at Dresden. Is it not enough to say that these were Clara Schumann and Joachim!

It is but four hours by the railroad. So off we start in the cold, foggy morning, seeing nothing nor caring much to see, while whirled across those flat, uninteresting battle plains that stretch beyond Leipzig. A white, dry fog; there is a sense of promise in it; and by the middle of the forenoon the warm sun glows through, revealing through a hazy and poetic atmosphere, a picturesque succession of red-roofed towns, and little vine-clad hills (nothernmost region of the grape this!), with pretty glimpses of the Elbe sparkling across green fields, and, beckoning in the distance, the domes and spires and palaces of Dresden. At noon we cross the stone bridge, over the swift, broad river that comes sweeping round through "Saxon Switzerland," whose hazy purple outline already tempts you on the far horizon,—the blue Elbe cradled in Bohemia—and enter the stately, cheerful city, and are soon housed in the pleasant hotel in which the concert is to be. Seated at the table d'hôte, there is a vacant chair beside us. Presently a sense of somebody entering and asking for somebody; and somebody introducing himself with cordial hand-grasp, and sorry to have been engaged in rehearsal when our letter was sent in, and "shall we talk German or English?" (of course we choose the latter), has taken the vacant seat, and we are in full tide of eager conversation, as clear to one another as old friends, and in instant rapport on most topics of most interest to both. We talk of the "Diarist," whom he knows and esteems; of music, from Bach to Wagner, of the first of whom he is one of the truest exponents, entering into the very spirit of him, while he can afford to admire much in the latter; of Art, mutually pleased to find that each had been thinking of Kaulbach as a sort of Meyerbeer in painting. We talk of Emerson, of whom he is a warm admirer, familiar with all his writings, and delighting in such free, quickening mountain air of thought; of America, whose generous idea and destiny he understands, and has more interest and faith in, than I have found before in Germany; of England, and the rival musical critics, Davison and Chorley, both of whom he esteems, and Macfarren more than either; of what music has to offer us in Leipzig and in Berlin, in Dresden and Vienna, and in his own Hannover; of Schumann and his noble artist widow; of Liszt at Weimar, and of his partie in Germany, and what not.

Our companion is a strong, broad-shouldered, manly looking fellow, of two or three years under thirty; with a massive, overhanging brow, Beethoven-like; a heavy mass of rich dark hair; large, gray, earnest eyes; pale face, full of intellect, of firm will and genial good feeling; a certain gleam of genius in those eyes; a somewhat knotted habit of the brows, as from intense, concentrated brain-work, and a strongly marked, almost severe look when the face is in repose; but quickly lit up with glad recognition, or softened with tender sympathies; the sunshine of a cordial, generous, social nature breaks out in an instant from those eyes. Decidedly a strong, fresh, wholesome individuality; generous and sunshiny; full of friendliness; moody withal, and capable of feeling bored; high-toned, brave, and genial, both in our English sense of hearty, and in the German and artistic sense, implying imaginative, creative energy—the adjective of genius. A large and catholic view of men and things; and a strong character. You do not often find all these traits in a virtuoso; and this is no mere virtuoso; this young man is Joseph Joachim; who, though his chief medium has been the violin, has made himself more known and deeply felt by a certain magnetism of genius and of character that works behind all that.

And now—begging our friend's pardon for thus unceremoniously and bunglingly attempting his portrait—let us leave him to the drudgery of putting on strings, while we talk a walk on the Brühl terrace along the Elbe, over the bridge and back, and by the royal palaces and church and theatre, coming unexpectedly upon the newly erected bronze statue of Weber by the way; and back to the hotel to find ourselves in the evening in the pretty concert-saal, where are assembled all the beauty and refinement of Dresden musical society, awaiting the beginning of the first concert. It is a small hall, holding perhaps, from six to seven hundred persons, and is completely full. This is the only regular concert hall in Dresden, strange to say; and even the symphony concerts of the fine large orchestra, which Rietz directs, have to be given here. Here is the programme:

Sonata (D minor, Op. 121) for piano and violin, played by the concert givers	Schumann.
Cavatina, from the "Swiss Family,"	Weigl.
Ballade (G minor), piano played by Clara Schumann,	Chopin.
Allegro brillante, 4 hands, by Fri. Marie Wieck and Mme. Schumann,	Mendelssohn.
Sonata for Violin, by Joachim,	Tartini.
3 Lieder: a "Im Freien,"	Señubert.
b "Schneeglöckchen,"	Schumann.
c "Er ist,"	Schumann.
Sonata, (A minor, Op. 23) for piano and violin, Beethoven

[We are writing twenty years ago, mind, and will continue now in the first person singular].

Of the first piece, as a composition, I can hardly venture to speak after a single hearing, and at this distance of time. It certainly interested me much, and impressed me with that sense of depth and power and passion, with passages of playful fancy of quite exquisite individuality, that Robert Schumann almost always gives me. But it was one of his latest and by no means clearest works. It is a high and worthy mission which Madame Schumann takes upon her, of interpreting to the world, through her wonderfully perfect pianism, so genial and so classical, the, as yet, but poorly understood and undervalued creations of her talented husband's genius. Of her I can speak, for the impression is distinct; how could it fail to be! She has the look, the air and manner of the true artist and the noble woman. Her face is full of sensibility and intellect; large dark eyes, full of rich light, and lips that always quiver with the exquisite sense of music. A large, broad forehead, and head finely shaped, with rich black hair. The profile is just that of the twin medallion portrait which represents her with her husband; but the face and head are wider than that had suggested to me, and indicate a greater weight and breadth of character. The features are in constant play, lit with enthusiasm, as if the music never ceased. Her technique as a pianist is beautifully smooth, clean and perfect; she has mastered all that, years ago, under the severe but admirable teaching of the old Wieck, her father. There is an inexhaustible energy in her playing, when she deals with the strong tone-poets such as Beethoven; you miss none of their fire and grandeur. I never heard more sustained nobility of play, nor more facile, nor more finely finished.

But such an artist does not play to exhibit her own skill; but to bring out and present in all their individuality, in just the right light, the beauties she discerns and feels in those creations of the masters which are worthy of such illustration and will live. She is a thorough musician; has a clear and true conception of all the classics, the inspired tone-poems of the piano; and an equal contempt for all trivial or weakly sentimental show-pieces; to the performance of mere operatic fantasias, and the like, she never condescends. Mere brilliancy is nothing; she knows the real gem from the bit of glass that also sparkles in the sun. Her thorough acquaintance with her memory of, all the principal sonatas, trios etc., of Beethoven and other masters is remarkable; in the rehearsals her memory often is the test to which the correctness of differing editions of the parts is referred. I have heard no more satisfactory rendering of Beethoven, Bach, Mozart or Haydn. Of Schumann's music she is, of course, the interpreter. The Ballade of Chopin, and all that I have heard her play of him, were admirably executed by her, especially the brilliant side of Chopin; but I would not dare to say that I had never heard the peculiar individuality and fineness of that poet par excellence of the piano, brought out with a more intimate and sympathetic truthfulness. Altogether, Clara Schumann seems to me the noblest, truest type of the artistic woman that I have known, with the exception of Jenny Lind. Not that she has the same force of genius, or the same all-conquering magnetism. Without magnetism, of course, a great singer were inconceivable. But she has the same artistic feeling and entire devotion to the pure ideal. She is a living impersonation of the artist conscience, aided by rare native faculties and rare educational experiences. She is gifted alike with sharp, discriminating insight, and with unflinching enthusiasm. Some think she has not so much warmth as critical correctness. But she is a woman, large-hearted, loving, full of sensibility, as well as a skilled, clear-sighted critical musician. Her art is religion to her; relates itself to the very ideal end of life. If she has not creative genius, if she does not compose, if she gives readings, no one can doubt the fervor with which she loves her authors, nor the deep genuine joy with which she reproduces them.

It surely was a privilege, and not a shade of disappointment in it, to sit there and hear sonatas of Schumann and Beethoven rendered by those two large-brained artists. They have played much together, sympathize in tastes and principles, maintain the same uncompromising attitude of loyalty to truth in Art, agree in their conceptions of what they play together, are equally above all drawbacks of uncertain skill, and so are perfectly sure of one another in what they undertake. It is rarely that such artists meet in any work.

Of Joachim's playing one owns first of all its magnetic, searching, quickening quality. It is not a violin, but a man that speaks. There is a feeling of depth and breadth conveyed in what he does. He draws the largest and most marvellous tones out of his strings that we have ever heard. There is force of character in every sound; and yet the most subtle, fluid modulation through all shades of feeling, the tenderest as well as the strongest. And nothing seems dramatically got up for mere effect; it all comes so natural, so real that you yield yourself entirely to the music, and never think to analyze, to mark just what is done. It is alike full of passion and of self-possession; strong emotion and repose. I had heard that Sonata of Tartini, with the trillo del diavolo, finely played before; but never did it present itself in half so vivid colors as when he played it. In Joachim's playing I never thought to notice in what particular technical feats or qualities he shone, or how he compared in any of them with others. These were all forgotten in his music. Nor did he, the virtuoso, ever place himself between you and the music. Dignity, nobility of style, depth of feeling, and a certain intellectual vigor characterized his playing. But if we are asked, wherein above all he shows the master, it is in what may be called contrapuntal playing. This is much more than giving out full chords with the melody; it is the giving of a distinct individuality to each of the four parts in the harmony; it is the eliciting of a virtual quartet from a single violin. This makes him preëminently the player of the violin sonatas, preludes and fugues, toccatas, etc., of Sebastian Bach; and indeed, this art he must have learned from his deep, close study of the violin works of Bach and from his earnest penetration into the very spirit of Bach, into the very soul of his method. Among all violinists, and all virtuosos, Joachim is the greatest Bach-ist. That height won, all the rest is easily and of course his.

The only disappointment of this evening was that there was no Bach in the programme. But I was easily reconciled, knowing how soon that satisfaction was in store for me. The next morning we had more long talk together in the artist's room, and then he fulfilled his promise of playing to me Bach's Chaconne, the noblest of all violin solos that I had ever yet heard. It was without accompaniment, complete in itself as Bach wrote, and, as Joachim plays it, not to be improved by even Mendelssohn's piano part. How the inspired sounds filled the room like a great flood of tone, and filled the soul of listener and player, and how the former felt that those whom he will never see on earth again must hear (for what so bridges over the gulf between time and eternity, as music that is so true and great?), it were idle to attempt to tell. In that listening I incurred a great debt which only a renewed life can pay. Visitors came in; Capellmeister Rietz, Concertmeister Schubert, Hans Christian Andersen, the Danish novelist, and an intelligent, enthusiastic, gentlemanly musician, the conductor of the Tonkünstler-verein, a social club mostly of accomplished musicians, who compose an orchestra, and meet once or twice a week to practice the less known works of Bach, Handel and other old writers; and he invited us to the club room in the evening to hear so rare a curiosity as a couple of the famous Hautboy Concertos of Handel. From there I went to the Royal Gallery of Paintings, and was soon seated in wonder and transport before the incomparable "Dresden Madonna" of Raphael. Was it not a work of inspiration? The parallel between Raphael and Mozart has been often drawn. I could not but feel the force of it after seeing this picture. As Mozart said of his own music, here was a work which must have stood before its author's mind at once, whole and entire in all its parts, completely realized in one fusing instant of genius at its full heat. It is beauty, loveliness, holiness itself. Was not that a morning to thank God for? The Chaconne of Bach interpreted by Joachim, and the loveliest of all Madonnas, realized by Raphael! Nor was that all.

NEXT SEASON'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

The Harvard Musical Association has mainly planned its Symphony Concert scheme for next season, and the prospect appears promising for a brilliantly successful series of performances. This will be the 16th season of the association, and eight concerts will be given in the Boston Music Hall on Thursday afternoons as follows: Nov. 18, Dec. 1, 16, Jan. 6, 20, Feb. 3, 17, March 8. Mr. Carl Zerrahn will conduct the concert, and the orchestra (including Mr. Listemann's Philharmonic orchestra) will be as strong in numbers, and even better in discipline, than that which gave such general satisfaction last year. Among the orchestral works in contemplation may be named the following:

Symphonies. Haydn, in C (No. 3, Rietz-Biedemann), first time. Beethoven, Nos. 7 and 8. Schumann, "Cologne" (E flat). Gade, in D minor (with pianoforte), first time. Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique, second time. J. K. Paine, "Spring," second time. Raff, in G minor, first time. Symphony by Saint-Saëns, first time. Ferd. Hiller, "Spring," first time.

Overtures. Gluck, "Iphigenia" (or "Alceste"). Mozart, "Titus." Beethoven, "Leonore," No. 3. Spohr, "Faust." Mendelssohn, "Melusina." Schumann, "Maurice" and "Julius Caesar." Bennett, "Wood Nymph." And for the first time: Berlioz, "Carnaval Romain"; Goldmark, "Penthesilea"; Reinecke, "Hakon Jarl"; Bassini, "King Lear."

Miscellaneous. Bach, Pastorale from Christmas oratorio. Beethoven, Adagio and Andante from "Prometheus." Mendelssohn, Scherzo from the Reformation symphony. Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Berlioz, Marche Nocturne, from "L'Enfance du Christ," second time. Wagner, "Siegfried Idyll." Bennett, prelude and funeral march, from "Ajax," first time. Dvorak, Slavick dances, first time. Norbert Burgmüller, Andante (with oboe solo) from symphony in D, second time. Liszt, "Orpheus" (short symphonic poem), first time. Goetz, Intermezzo from symphony in F. Fuchs, serenade, first time.

Other works may be found desirable and practicable as the concert season approaches. Solo artists, vocal and instrumental, will be announced in due time. Subscription lists for season tickets, with particulars, will be opened early in the autumn. Meanwhile, any persons eager to lend assurance to the enterprise by an earlier pledge for tickets have only to send in their names to the chairman (12 Pemberton square), or to any member of the committee, as follows: J. S. Dwight, C. C. Perkins, J. C. D. Parker, B. J. Lang, S. B. Schlesinger, Charles P. Curtis, S. L. Thorndike, Augustus Flagg, William F. Apthorp, Arthur Foote and George W. Sumner.

—In addition to the above, there will be, presumably, another series of the popular concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Mr. Bernhard Listemann; and probably Mr. Theodore Thomas, no longer tied to Cincinnati, will again organize an orchestra to travel through the cities, taking with him the Hungarian pianist Joseffy, who by a sudden somersault has vaulted over from the Chickering to the Steinway instrument. There has been much interviewing and reporting, and even controversial gossip about it in the musical and music-trade papers of New York, into which we do not care to enter; but whether Joseffy will ever play upon a better piano than those which he has used already in this city, remains to be proved. Thomas, with Joseffy, in the Boston Music Hall, any way, will be a strong attraction.

PERKINS INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND.

The annual graduation exercises at this world-renowned institution for the education of the blind are always an occasion of interest. Yesterday afternoon there assembled an audience which completely filled the chapel, and which included several prominent gentlemen, including Governor Littlefield and Secretary of State Addeman of Rhode Island, Hon. J. W. Dickinson of the State Board of Education, and several clergymen. The chapel was prettily decorated, and the pupils occupied seats facing the audience. The exercises in charge of the superintendent, Mr. Anagnos, opened with a selection of instrumental music, arranged by Mr. Joseph H. Lucier, one of the graduating class. Then followed an essay, "The Growth of Liberty," written by Edward Ware, and delivered by Lemuel Titus. This paper and all that followed were written in the direct style which gives peculiar force to the works of the blind essayist. After a chorus by male voices, an exercise in physiology, illustrated by the use of models, was given by Henry Harriek. William H. Wade performed upon the organ Bach's "Great Fugue in G Minor" with excellent effect. Miss Elizabeth Hickie's exercise upon diamonds furnished a wonderful example of the power of memory, a great variety of facts and figures concerning the celebrated gems of the world being given with accuracy. A declamation "The Present Time," was forcibly given by Arthur Hatch, and the four-part song, "Laugh, Boys, Laugh," by Messrs. Titus, Hammond, Lucier and Stratton, was most heartily enjoyed. George G. Goldthwait explained in an interesting way the manufacture of the piano, and the delicate ear and careful instruction necessary to qualify a tuner of that instrument. William H. Wade executed Liszt's difficult Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2, with delicacy. An illustrated exercise in botany by Miss Ellen Hassett was well given. The school sang in chorus a selection from Rossini's "Cinderella." An essay by William H. Wade, was delivered by Henry W. Stratton, on the development of civilization, by means of coercion and conviction. In closing, Mr. Stratton briefly bade farewell to the school in behalf of his classmates, and expressed their thanks and appreciation for the efforts of teachers and patrons of the institution. The exercises of the graduating class closed with the singing of the class song, the words and music of which were by Mr. Stratton.

Mr. Anagnos, before introducing Dr. Peabody of the Board of Trustees, to conduct the remaining exercises, with a brief prelude, presented to the Rev. Mr. Photius Flske of the United States Navy, the first copy of the History of Greece, which his liberality had enabled the school to have printed in raised letters for the use of the blind. Mr. Anagnos added that by means of a recent improvement in the stereotyping process, books for the blind are now published at a considerably lessened expense than formerly, and the institution hopes through the liberality of its friends to issue other standard works.

Rev. Dr. Peabody presented Governor Littlefield of Rhode Island, who expressed his interest in the institution, and introduced Hon. J. M. Addeman, Secretary of State. The latter gentleman added his congratulations to members of the graduating class, who had been able in so great degree to make up the deficiency caused by the loss of sight. Mr. Goddard of the Advertiser, Rev. George A. Thayer, Rev. Mr. Whitaker, Rev. Mr. Mansfield, Dr. Tourjée, John S. Dwight and others added brief words of commendation and encouragement to the pupils in their hard struggle against such formidable obstacles.

Dr. Peabody, urging the class to even higher and nobler work in the battle before them, presented diplomas to the following named graduates:

George C. Goldthwait of Lynn, Arthur E. Hatch of Wilton, Me., Joseph R. Lucier of Worcester, Henry W. Stratton of Neponset, Lemuel Titus of St. John, N. B., William H. Wade of Lawrence, Ellen E. Hickie of Charlestown. — Transcript, June 29.

A delightful musicale was given on Thursday morning, June 24, at Mr. John Orth's rooms, 12 West street, with the following programme: Fifth concerto, Beethoven, Miss Josephine Ware and Mr. Orth (two pianos); Phantasie, Max Bruch, Miss Ware and Madame Dietrich Strong; Fugue, Rheinberger, Mrs. MacKenzie; Songs, Hoffman, Mr. C. F. Webber; Songs, Schumann, Miss S. E. Bingham; Symphony, Schumann, Miss Ware, Madame Strong, Messrs. Whitney and Orth (two pianos); Polonaise, Liszt, Mr. Orth; Variations, Schumann, Miss S. S. Winslow and Mr. Orth (two pianos). The character of the selections and the brilliancy of the performances made this musicale especially noteworthy.

The Boston Conservatory of Music gave a concert in Union Hall Saturday afternoon. The programme consisted of vocal, piano and violin solos, and violin and cornet duets, all performed by pupils of the institution. The closing number was a nocturne and terzetto, for three violins, played by some twenty-two of the smallest lads and misses belonging to the junior classes.

MUSIC ABROAD.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY. — The London Telegraph's correspondent (June 8), describing the Oxford Commemoration, concludes his letter as follows: —

The Oxford Philharmonic Society's Commemoration concert given in the Sheldonian Theatre this morning, was, perhaps, the most successful for many years. When we say that, instead of the usual cantata and miscellaneous afterpart, Haydn's masterpiece of the Creation was selected for performance, and that besides the really strong choruses of the society and the powerful co-operation of an old Oxford favorite, Herr Henschel, the services of Miss Lillian Bailey and Mr. Joseph Maas and Miss Mason had been secured; that Mr. Taylor conducted in his best style, and that the usual band, under Mr. Burnett, played with all its customary brilliance and precision, such a result cannot be wondered at.

The music of the Creation has been so often criticized in your columns that I need not follow it in detail, but as deserving of especial mention I would select the rendering of "With verdure clad," by Miss Bailey, who, though rather weak at times in some other of her parts, sang here with perfect finish and all the splendid compass of her voice. The fact that this charming vocalist was yesterday singing in Utrecht, and crossed the Channel only last night, would have sufficed to justify more than occasional weakness of voice; but in this particular air, and in the "On mighty wings," she was at her very best, and carried with her all the admiration of her very critical audience. Herr Henschel was in grand voice, and gave with splendid feeling the passionate music of "Rolling in foaming billows," and throughout the programme took all his parts with conspicuous success. Mr. Joseph Maas, in the air "In native worth," escaped a recall with difficulty, for his singing, which had been very fine throughout, culminated in the dignity and tenderness of this air, and the audience tried hard to bring the singer back. The music assigned to Eve, in the third part of the oratorio, and taken by Miss Henriette Mason was creditably rendered, but, to quote a recent American critique, "her voice exhibited a slight inaccuracy," especially at the beginning. The choruses were conspicuously bright and full, the quality of the soprano element being particularly rich, and Mr. J. Taylor, the conductor of the society, well deserved the hearty congratulations which he received from all sides. The organ was ably presided over by Mr. Parratt, the well-known and popular organist of Magdalen College, so that in every feature of the day's performance, not omitting the audience, which was as large as the theatre could hold and as brilliant as even fastidious Oxford could wish, the society's concert must be pronounced a most successful event of the present Commemoration.

LONDON. — This day (Friday), says Figaro of June 19, the public rehearsal for the Handel Festival will be held at the Crystal Palace, and the Festival itself will take place on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of next week. This year the Handel Festival, which was established in 1859, will attain its majority, while four years hence English amateurs will have to celebrate the bi-centenary of Handel, who was born at Halle, Upper Saxony, in 1684. English amateurs need not to be told how the Festival has grown since the preliminary experiment projected by the late Mr. Bowley in 1857, and first carried out on the centenary of Handel's death in 1859. Bowley had not only to form the idea, but to work out the details of the gigantic experiment — building the great orchestra (double the diameter of the dome of St. Paul's) and the great organ, causing fresh instruments to be constructed, and designing the arrangement of seats. Few minds could grasp details like that of Mr. Bowley, and the success of the Festival was due in the first instance to him. The choir of 1859 consisted of 2800 voices, and the band of 454 players, including 92 first violins, conducted without adventitious aids solely by the baton of Sir Michael Costa. The orchestra is now slightly reduced, and the chorus increased, the true balance being thus, it is hoped, found. The acoustic properties of the Central Transept, too, are also greatly improved, and the present Festival promises to be, both from an art and financial point of view, one of the most successful yet held. Outsiders know little of the magnitude of the details such an enterprise demands. To give an idea, in the department of the librarian alone, the "parts" for chorus and orchestra would, if piled one on the other, reach higher than the Central Transept, and these have to be placed each on its appointed desk every morning of the Festival. The slightest hitch would cause disaster, and when the audience watch that enormous body of executants set in motion, and keeping time like clockwork to the beat of the 18-inch wand of the speck in the distance we know to be Sir Michael Costa, they may imagine the trouble and organization necessary to accomplish the task. The Handel Festival is essentially a national festival, for the chorus and orchestra are drawn from the best voices in nearly 100 towns in the United Kingdom.

The Messiah was the oratorio for June 21, and Israel in Egypt for June 25; on the 23d a selection was sung from Solomon, Acis and Galatea, Alexander's Feast, and other works.

The special attraction which sufficed to fill every seat at the final Richter concert on Monday, was indisputably the choral symphony of Beethoven. The performance of the Mozart symphony in G minor was a mistake, for with so great a body of strings the not very excellent wind of the Richter orchestra could not fail to be swamped. The introduction and death-scene from "Tristan und Isolde" was, of course, a repetition from a previous concert, but the marvelously delicate performance made it well worth hearing again, even to the exclusion of a newer work. When, however, after a brief interval, Herr Richter took up the baton, and without a score before him commenced the direction of the choral symphony, it was obvious that this was to be the crowning point of a fine series of concerts. As is not unusual with Herr Richter, the performance of the first movement was a partial disappointment, and amateurs have heard equally fine, and perhaps superior, renderings at the Crystal Palace under Mr. Manns, and at the Viard-Louis concerts under Mr. Weist Hfl. But from this point there was a steady increase of excellence. The scherzo, and especially the trio, were admirable, while the slow movement offered one of the most beautiful readings of Beethoven's music Herr Richter has given us. The special clearness of the parts in the recitative did not escape notice; and, indeed, in this and the two preceding sections there were many beautiful effects gained by nuances which were quite new to many of the audience. It was, however, reserved for the vocal movement to show Herr Richter at his greatest. Rarely in London is the final section of the work performed in any other than a slovenly manner, and, indeed, it is, owing to difficulties which are often thought well-nigh insuperable, not uneldom omitted altogether. The four soloists — Misses Friedländer and Hohenschild, Messrs. Candidus and Henschel — indeed, were somewhat overweighed by the trying nature of the music, and the tenor and the soprano, both excellent artists in their special line, obviously found the choral symphony beyond their capabilities. The fine chorus of 200 voices, however, had been well selected and thoroughly trained by Herr Theodore Frantzen, and they united with the orchestra in giving such a rendition of the final movement as few London audiences have heard. The bald and often silly English translation was very wisely abandoned, and the vocal parts were sung to the original text of Schiller. Every amateur is aware of the terribly trying character of the choral parts, and the manner in which they were performed by Herr Frantzen's choir was worthy of all praise. Old concert-goers claimed that no such performance of the choral symphony had been heard in London since Berlioz conducted it at the New Philharmonic concert in 1852, and it certainly has not been so magnificently rendered within the memory of the large majority of those who were present on Monday. The choral symphony was a worthy conclusion of a splendid series of concerts. — Ibid.

The début of the rising son of the retiring Sims Reeves was a topic which "Cherubino" (Figaro, June 19) would naturally discourse about with interest. It was in one of Mr. Ganz's concerts. We copy as follows:

When young Mr. Herbert Reeves stepped for the first time in his life, upon a public platform at St. James' Hall on Saturday, he was naturally received with a roar of welcome. There was something so peculiarly suited to English tastes in the spectacle of a great and popular tenor — well-nigh sixty years of age and who had been more than thirty years an honored representative of his art — in the autumn of his life bequeathing, as it were, his beloved son as a legacy to the public he has served so well, that if Mr. Herbert Reeves had been the veriest pretender on earth he would still have been as heartily cheered for his father's sake. His friends — and there was not a member of that vast audience who was not Mr. Sims Reeves' friend or admirer — were aware that the peculiarly nervous temperament of the father had been sorely tried in expectation of his son's début. Sleep, we know, had been banished from his father's eyes for nights before the afternoon of the eventful day, and if it had been necessary that Sims Reeves should throw his fortune and the high popularity which have rewarded his labor of years into the scale to assure his son's success, the sacrifice would have been cheerfully and gladly accorded. Happily, nothing of the sort was needed, and Mr. Herbert Reeves, for what a young artist of twenty-two can pretend to be, can very easily afford to throw aside all considerations of parentage, and to stand as an artist before the public on his own merits. His first appearance on the platform bore traces of a mother's care and a father's example: two benefits and virtues which must always enlist the deepest sympathies of a British audience. The dress, the personal appearance, the bow, first to the audience and then to the orchestra, the well-known Sims Reeves pose, the holding of the sheet of music in the exact line of the emission of the sound from the throat, and the curious wag of the head which everybody who has ever heard his father will readily recollect, all recalled Mr. Sims Reeves as we have so long known him. Mr. Herbert Reeves first sang the trivial air, "Alma Soave," from Donizetti's happily forgotten opera, "Maria di Rohan," produced at Covent Garden in 1847; and, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Sullivan, he was subsequently heard to far better effect in the air, "Refrain thy Voice from Weeping," from the somnolent oratorio "The Light of the World," and to still better advantage in the "Ave Maria" of Schubert, conducted by Mr. Ganz. To expect a matured voice from a young gentleman of twenty-two would, every member of the audience felt, be too exacting. At present, indeed, the voice of Mr. Herbert Reeves is that of a very light tenor, incapable yet of declamation or power, but just fitted for the music he undertook. He was, after he left the care of his mother—once Miss Lucombe—placed under Mr. Sims Reeves' old teacher, Signor Mazzucato, and, on that gentlemen's death, under the tuition of Signor Lamperti, at Milan. But the influence of the father is so distinctly traceable in the style of the son that it is difficult to believe he ever had any other professor. We have in Mr. Herbert Reeves the same purity of phrasing which has ever characterized Sims Reeves, the same keen ear for correct intonation, the same faultless system of emission, and the same lovely quality of voice which, in years gone by, rendered Sims Reeves an English artist distinguished even among the Italians. There were old concert-goers among the audience who stoutly declared that, in his early years, the voice of the father was no stronger than that of the son is now; and that vigor and power came with maturity. That this freak of nature will be repeated in the case of Mr. Herbert Reeves will be hoped by all who respect his father. In the meantime, it is satisfactory to know that his organ—at present the organ of Sims Reeves at half power—will be watched and nurtured with a parent's care, and that, until his voice attains its full development, he will not be permitted to attempt tasks which are beyond his strength.

PARIS.—We are indebted to the industrious gleaner of the Musical World (London), for the following "Scraps":

At the Opera, the ballet of Sylvia, with its charming music slightly touched up by M. Delibes, has been revived, Mlle Sangalli making her re-appearance, after a considerable absence, in her original part. What with her dancing and the charming score, the revival has proved a trump card. . . . A new Valentina, Madame Montalba, has made her debut in Les Huguenots. Though extremely nervous she made a favorable impression, which she strengthened at a second performance. . . . In order to vary his somewhat limited repertory, M. Vaucorbell resolved to give a series of Historical Concerts, but the series will probably not be a long one. The realization of his project has cost him a vast deal of money and trouble, with little prospect of an adequate return. A considerable sum was spent in re-arranging the stage, with the sole result of proving the bad acoustic qualities of M. Garnier's brilliant house, and the experiment was abandoned as a bad job, the gentlemen of the orchestra re-occupying their usual places. The programme of the first concert included pieces from Lullu's Alceste (1674); Rameau's Fêtes d'Hebé (1739); Gluck's Iphigénie en Tauride (1779); Gretry's Anacréon (1797); and Rossini's Motet (1827). The second part of the concert was devoted entirely to La Vierge, a sacred legend in four parts, words by M. Grandmougin, music by M. J. Massenet, the four parts being entitled, respectively: "L'Annonciation," "Les Noces de Cana," "Le Calvaire," and "L'Assomption." Though the merits of the new work were duly appreciated, the general opinion is that a theatre is not the place for music of this description, and the public were much more interested in the mundane compositions which preceded. If this was evident at the first concert, it was still more so at the second, and the chances are that M. Vaucorbell will quietly and quickly return to his ordinary class of entertainment and hurry on the production of Le Comte Ory, which has been in preparation for a considerable period. Another work now in rehearsal is Guillaume Tell, in which Mlle. Edith Ploux will make her debut as Jenny. . . . M. Carvalho has been doing well at the Comique. The returns for April were 175,000 francs, and subsequent receipts were to match. The first twenty-five performances of Jean de Nivelle brought in some 200,000 francs. On the other hand, M. Carvalho's expenses are very heavy, no less than 120,000 francs a month, irrespective of author's fees and the droit des pauvres as well as the outlay for new works and revivals of old ones, such as Le Domino Noir, for instance, which has been put upon the stage with the greatest care, and with a pious restitution of the original text and score. Mlle. Isaac especially distinguished herself as Angele, the character "created" by Madame Damoreau in 1831. This young lady, who has been gradually becoming more and more popular, never appeared to greater advantage. The representatives of the other personages, also, were entitled to high praise. . . . A new one-act comic opera, La Fée, words by M. Feuille, music by M. Henery, organist at Saint-Lo, is in rehearsal; so is Le Signal, by MM. Dubreuil, and Pujet; and L'Amour Médecin by MM. Poise and Monselet. Galante Aventure, by MM. Silvestre and Davyl, music by M. Guiraud, will be the first novelty next winter. It will be succeeded by Les Contes d'Hoffmann by MM. Barbier and Offenbach, and then will come probably an opera as yet to be written by M. Delibes. The book by MM. Gondinet and Gille, has for its principal personage the well-known Jacques Callot, the great delineator of Bohemianism. . . . Madame Engali has left the company, and will soon start for Moscow. Madame Sbolgi, who succeeded her as Meala in Paul et Virginie at the Theatre-Lyrique, is engaged in her place. . . . Repeating his experiment of last year, M. Leroy, the tenor-manager, has opened the Theatre du Chateau-d'Eau with Si j'étais roi. This is to be followed by Le Bijou perdu and Lu Fanchonnette. He has a good company and deserves to succeed. . . . The Fine Art Sub-Committee's report has, after considerable discussion, been adopted by the General Committee, and will be laid before the Chamber. It proposes to maintain the annual grants made to the Opera and the Opera-Comique: 800,000 and 400,000 francs respectively. A sum of 10,000 francs is set down for the installation of the library of the Opera in the pavilion originally destined for the "head of the state," i. e., Napoleon III. The collection of models of scenery which figured in the Exhibition of 1878, will be added to the library, and the whole open to the public. The 20,000 francs for the Padeloup and the 10,000 for the Colonne Concerts are continued. . . . The "Festival" organized for the benefit of M. Padeloup at the Trocadéro was a grand affair. The huge building was crammed with an immense concourse, anxious to show how much they esteemed the founder of the Concert Populaire, in honor of whom Madame Fides Devries, who left so prematurely the Opera where she was so triumphant, and M. Alard, emerged from their retirement once more to delight the public. Faure, too, so seldom, alas, now heard in Paris, was there, and at his best. M. Guilman presided at Cavaille-Coll's magnificent organ, and held the vast audience enraptured by his mastery over the king of instruments. MM. Gounod, Reyer, Delibes, Godard, Guiraud, Joncières, and Lalo swelled the ranks of volunteers in the good cause, each conducting a composition of his own. . . . Writing to Le Ménestrel, a "Vieillard" says: "Madame Mailbrun was celebrated the moment she came out, and instantly proclaimed without a rival. I recollect that, one evening, having promised her services at a concert given by an artist in distress, she came late. On arriving, all out of breath, she excused herself by stating that she had first to appear at a party given by the Duc d'Orléans (this was previous to July, 1830); after the concert she handed a small purse to the lady for whose benefit the concert was organized: 'My dear,' she said, 'this belongs to you, since I promised you my evening. It is what the Duc d'Orléans gave me.' The small purse was opened; it contained three hundred francs in gold! . . . Now-a-days, it is said, an Israelitish banker, who is not only rich, but liberal and charitable, gives Madame Patti ten bank notes, of a thousand francs each, to sing at a party in his house. Artists must have greatly gone up in merit during the last fifty years, or money must have gone down very much in value. . . . Chopin's monument in Pere-la-Chaise was erected in 1849 by a subscription among his friends. Those who undertook the care of it are dead, and an appeal has been made to the surviving friends and to the admirers of the deceased for funds to ensure the preservation of his tomb. The Princess Marceline Czartoryski, the Baroness Nathaniel de Rothschild, Prince Ladislas Czartoryski, MM. C. Dubois, A. d'Eichthal, Franchomme, and Ch. Gavard have formed themselves into a committee to receive subscriptions. The amount of each subscription is limited to 20 francs. . . . Mlle Krauss has been decorated with the Cross of Venezuela; she was already an "Officier d'Académie" here. . . . M. Victor Masse, the composer of Paul et Virginie, is busy at St. Germain on his new score, Cléopâtre. . . . Mlle Marimon has returned here from America. . . . A petition is in course of signature to the Deputies of the Seine begging them to obtain a government grant for a Popular Opera. . . . Madame Panseiron has presented the library of the Conservatory with a number of Italian scores, dating from the end of the eighteenth and the commencement of the nineteenth century. Besides scores by Jomelli, Sarti, Tarchi, Cimarosa, Martini, Porpora and Scarlatti, the collection includes a book containing the part-chants formerly in use at the Sixtine Chapel. Another portion of the lady's gift is all the sacred music composed by her late husband.

COLOGNE.—As it began, so it continued, a great success, the Festival of the Lower Rhine. One of the principal features of the second day was the performance of Schumann's A Minor Concerto by Mme. Schumann. When she concluded, the audience burst out into a hurricane of applause, and the orchestra gave a "Tusch," or flourish. Another attraction was Ferdinand Hiller's remarkable cantata, Die Nacht, one of the most effective and most inspired works the venerable master ever wrote. It produced as deep an impression at this Festival as it did on its first production eighteen years ago. The composer received an "ovation," one factor in which was the presentation to him of two laurel wreaths. The programme included, also another cantata: Bach's "Phingescantate," or "Whitsuntide Cantata," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. On the third day, half the programme was, as usual, devoted to the solo artists, and Joachim achieved a triumph by his magnificent rendering of Beethoven's Violin Concerto.—Corr. Lond. Mus. World.

DRESDEN.—Carl August Krebs, the well-known Capellmeister, died here on May 16, at the ripe age of seventy-six, honored by all musical Germany. The Musical World (London) says of him: The career of Herr Krebs, if neither brilliant nor romantic, was that of a man devoted heart and soul to the work he undertook. His was not the world-wide mission of a Beethoven or a Mozart. But with what success he labored in a more restricted sphere, the record of his life and the testimony so amply borne since his death put in the clearest light. From a very early age his inclination towards music was determined and irresistible. The good lady and well-known vocalist, Mme. Krebs, who adopted him on the death of his mother, Mme. Miedke, and whose name he took, destined him for the pulpit. But as with many another born musician, so with Krebs. He gravitated into the profession of the art divine as by a natural law, and at twenty-three years of age found himself musical director of the Hamburg Theatre. In that post he remained until 1850, meanwhile using the composer's pen as industriously as the conductor's baton. It was here that he produced his successful opera, Agnes Bemauren, a work still spoken of with admiration. In 1851, Krebs removed to Dresden, and dwelt in that city for the rest of his life. Till 1872 he discharged the functions of capellmeister at the Royal Chapel and Opera, removing then to the Catholic Cathedral, to the service of which he devoted his whole energies. His Dresden period was prolific in works for the pianoforte, songs, and church music, no small proportion of which obtained more than local recognition. Herr Krebs's first wife having died at Hamburg, he contracted a second marriage soon after his removal to Dresden, his choice falling upon Mlle. Aloysia Michaelis, one of the court singers. This lady became the mother of the Marie Krebs (the pianist, who visited America some years ago), whom a German paper has just described as the "greatest pride and joy" of the worthy capellmeister's life.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

AURORA, N. Y., JUNE 21.—The Thirty-Fifth (Commencement) Concert at Wells College took place June 15, under the direction of Mr. Max Piutti. We give the programme:

1. Trio: "Calm is the glassy ocean," (from "Idomeneo.") Mozart.
Misses A. Ames, N. Pettibone, Walker, White.
2. Valse Caprice, Op. 116 Raff.
3. a. "Thou'rt Like a Lovely Flower." Rubinstein.
b. Dedication. Miss Boynton. Schumann.
4. Dance of Gnomes Liszt.
Miss Annie Pettibone.
5. a. Slumber Song Franz.
b. Who is Sylvia? Schubert.
Miss Nettie Pettibone.
6. Capriccio in B minor, Op. 22 Mendelssohn.
Piano primo: Miss Shepard.
1. Concerto in E minor, (Romance.) Chopin.
Piano Primo: Miss Goldsmith.
2. Concerto in G minor, (Presto) Mendelssohn.
Piano primo: Miss Kendall.
3. Cavatina: "Although a cloud o'erspread the heavens." (From "Freischütz.") Weber.
Miss Agnes Ames.
4. Spinning Song Wagner-Liszt.
Miss Nettie Pettibone.
5. a. Slumber Song, (from "Snowdrop.") Reinecke.
b. Boat Song Froch.
Choral Class.

* Absent.
The Department of Music of Wells College closes with this concert its most successful year. We learn that during the year twelve concerts have been given by the teachers and artists from elsewhere. Mr. W. H. Sherwood took part in three concerts. Mr. Piutti has delivered twenty-eight musical lectures. This College enjoys a wide popularity, partly for its musical work, as shown by the large number of pupils from all parts of the country.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., JUNE 19.—The Arion Club has just given its fourth concert of the season. The programme ought to have been Elijah entire; but bad management, and singular perversity of view on Mr. Tomlins's part, resulted first in repeated changes of plan and waste of time in rehearsals, and finally in a programme made up of one-half of Elijah and some selections from the Creation. Moreover, a series of accidents disabled three out of the four soloists engaged, and prevented the use of an orchestra, so that a complete failure was feared. However, the singers were on their mettle, Mr. Tomlins braced up for a vigorous effort, and the choruses went well on the whole. Mrs. Carrington was the principal soloist, and acquitted herself nobly. Mr. Knorr and Mrs. Hayden did creditable work. Mr. Tomlins himself sang the part of Elijah very effectively.

Conductor Bach has begun summer concerts at Schiltz's Park. I have no programmes.
I append the closing programme of the Milwaukee College Musical Department, where Mr. John C. Fillmore is in charge:

1. Sonata in C major. (Allegro moderato, Andante cantabile, Allegretto.) Mozart.
Miss Georgiana Paine.
2. Arabesque, Op. 18 Schumann.
Miss Carrie J. Smith.
3. Berceuse Chopin.
Miss Orelle Turner.
4. Silver Spring Wm. Mason.
Miss Anna Camp.
5. Cascade Pauer.
Miss Lisselle Paine.
6. Spinning Song Liszt.
Miss Jessie Medbery.
7. Fantasia on Themes from "Faust." Liszt.
Miss Kate A. Stark.

THE MUSICAL VERSIONS OF GOETHE'S "FAUST,"

BY ADOLPHE JULLIEN.¹

IV.—THE "FAUST" OF SPOHR.

Spohr's Faust has long continued popular in Germany; this gives it a right to our attention, although it is in no way a translation of the masterpiece of Goethe. This opera has nothing of Faust besides the name; the author of the poem (libretto), who has prudently concealed his name, has only borrowed from the master two of his personages, Faust and the demon, to launch them on a series of adventures, now of the most absurd, and now of the most naïve, purely of his own invention. We will presently give the reader an idea of them; let it suffice for the moment to know, that in this drama there is no Marguerite.

However it may be with the poem, we owe it to the musician to study his work seriously; it merits it in all regards, once for all setting aside this fallacious title. By the date of its representation, the work of Spohr is but the third of the operas which have been inspired by Goethe's poem, or which have decorated themselves with the name of his hero; but it is the second in the order of conception. Written at Vienna in 1814, the very year in which Joseph Strauss brought out his Life and Actions of Faust, Spohr's opera was successfully represented at Francfort in 1818. From that time it has maintained itself for more than thirty years in the repertoire of the great theatres of Germany, without any loss of public favor. It was played with especial success at Berlin, where the celebrated singer Devrient shone in the part of Faust, and at London, where the author went to direct the execution of the work in person. Finally in 1830, France was permitted to hear this much vaunted work; the German opera troupe directed by Roeckel, which came to give performances at Paris, in the salle Favart, played on the 20th of April the Faust of Spohr.

But it is necessary to know the drama before speaking of the music. Faust, rejuvenated, enriched, has long been enjoying the advantages which his compact with the devil has procured him. But, like grand seigniors and kings, he suffers ennui. Mephistopheles, on his part, is tired of being the lacquey of his slave, and, to hasten his ruin, he inveigles him in adventures which may draw him into crime. Enter Faust: he comes from a ball and is thinking of Röschen, a young peasant girl with whom he is enamored. Soon he carries her off, swears love and fidelity to her in a duo, of which the situation is the same as that of "Là ci darem la mano" in Don Giovanni. The jeweller Franz, a regular Masetto, arrives in force, and, sword in hand, reclaims his affianced bride. Mephistopheles conceals her from all eyes; Faust and his friends escape by a trap door, to the great disappointment of the jeweller and his companions. Röschen remains in the hands of the devil, who restores her, to all appearances, to Franz, since it is with him that we find her again afterwards. The scene changes and transports us to the castle of Gulf, a brutal and discourteous lord, who holds in captivity the beautiful Kunigunde, and threatens to employ all means with her to obtain the gratification of his amorous passion. Resistance of Kunigunde, rage of Gulf; the scene changes, and we see a forest where Count Hugo sings a cavatina, after the manner of an harangue, to engage his soldiers to deliver Kunigunde, whom he wishes to marry. Röschen réappears with Franz; Mephistopheles puts them to sleep and carries them off, making the grassy bank on which they are seated move away. We are before the stronghold of Gulf. Faust and the Devil meet Hugo; the Count accepts their services, and they assault the citadel, which crumbles to pieces. Kunigunde is saved, but Gulf still lives; the demon gets possession of him and casts him into the fire that consumes his castle.

The second act opens with a chorus of witches; Faust comes to consult them and demands of them a love philter. The next scene passes before the church where Count Hugo is married with Kunigunde; we hear the religious chants; Franz and Röschen are still together in spite of the artifices of a maladroit imp. The wedding procession passes; Faust is invited, Röschen complains of the coldness of this lover and follows him to the ball offered by Hugo. All the nobility of the neighborhood is assembled at this fête. In the midst of the ball Mephistopheles reveals to the Count the culpable enterprises of Faust, and shows him at the knees of Kunigunde. The seducer offers to the lady the love potion which he has received from the witches. Kunigunde wishes to defend herself; but the poison glides into her veins. . . . Hugo draws his sword, Faust puts himself on guard, they cross blades, Hugo falls mortally wounded, Mephistopheles has turned his sword aside. It were useless to point out the resemblance of this scene, which terminates the second act, with that of Don Juan. Faust escapes the anger of the Count's friends, but he becomes a prey to remorse! Röschen, in despair, throws herself into the river; Kunigunde seeks to poniard her seducer, Mephistopheles arrests her hand, and, seizing Faust by the hair, drags him down to hell. — Such is the beautiful poem upon which Spohr has not feared to write his music; this ingenious imbroglio is after the fashion of the German poet, C. Bernard.

In spite of the epithet which he has given it, this work of Spohr has nothing of the romantic. The music of the German master, in general not very melodious, and of very closely interwoven harmony in the vocal parts as well as in the orchestra, is full of classic, even of scholastic forms, and of the tours de chant in use in the last century.

This opera begins with a learnedly-written overture, which would require a fulminating execution to produce much effect. Toward the middle is found an Andante, of which the entrances in imitation are not wanting in elegance; but the whole piece has a character more instrumental than dramatic. The introductory duo between Faust and the demon, preceded by recitatives in the Italian manner and so written by Spohr himself, does not mark the outline of the persons very strongly; at all events, it is a general reproach to Spohr that he has not known how to give the demon a different color from the other rôles. The love duo between Faust and Röschen is of an expressive melody; the doctor would soon seduce the heart of the young girl, did not the jealous Franz arrive with his friends and defy his rival. This scene is treated with great fire and vigor.

The following tableau transports us to the castle of Gulf. The air of the captive Kunigunde is graceful at its beginning, and the agitato includes a good movement of the orchestra. The air which Hugo sings to exhort his partisans to deliver his beloved forms the counterpart of the preceding scene; it is written with choruses and begins largely, but the passage in roulades which concludes it is of a superannuated taste. The trio which follows, between Röschen, Franz and Mephistopheles, is one of the most beautiful pieces of the score; the dialogue of the two lovers is gracefully accompanied by a violin passage, interrupted by languishing sighs of the oboe. The fine phrase of the devil evoking sleep detaches itself upon a soft rustling of the orchestra; the lovers yield to the power of the demon, and fall asleep; all is hushed, the thousand sounds of night are lost in space. The finale of the first act is an important page, which does not lack brilliancy; accordingly, it produces much effect when the work is performed in Paris.

The whole scene of witchcraft which opens the second act is of good color. The witches' chorus has sufficient originality, and the alternation of the melody from 2-4 to triple measure has something strange and fantastical. In the following tableau we are before the church where is celebrated the marriage of Count Hugo and Kunigunde. The religious chorus, in imitation of the Protestant chorals, has a beautiful effect. The young Röschen then sings a cavatina in G minor, of an elegant form and of a harmony full of delicacy.

The air of Faust which follows contains a beautiful phrase: "Ma di Rosa il dolce amore," but it soon plunges into a series of roulades altogether unseasonable. Spohr, as afterwards Schumann, has written the part of Faust for the baritone voice. So far, nothing could be better; the timbre of the baritone is as well suited as that of the tenor to the character of the rôle; but it seems singularly exaggerated to let it roll down to E flat, below the bass staff.² Schumann, on the contrary, knew how to guard against this rock. The great scene of the ball has only half inspired the composer; the dialogue at the beginning, between Hugo and his wife, is tender and languishing; the dance airs are graceful; but the final catastrophe, the defiance of Hugo and his duel with Faust, are not rendered in a sufficiently impressive manner. The part of the devil is not put in strong enough relief; he acts no more; he sings a part; he does not seem to direct this scene of murder with laughter and sarcasm on his lips; he is no more the demon.

One may bring the same reproach against the air which Mephistopheles sings after this great scene; it is diabolical in intonation and in construction, but it is not so in character. There are yet fine accents in the finale, touching phrases—that of Röschen among others: "Chi l'amato ben m'addita?" But the author has not met with the powerful inspiration necessary to retrace in music the ruin of Faust—the eternal loss of the man who has given himself to the Evil One.

Such, sketched in rough outline, is this work, which, for a long time, was the only opera of Faust known and admired. It is interesting to study. Of a melody often a little short and devoid of originality, of a very curiously-wrought, sometimes too learned harmony, this opera addresses itself more to the erudite in music than to the mass of the public. Nor is it exempt from a fault with which the author has often been reproached, and which consists in accumulating unlike harmonies in the shortest possible space, in such a manner as sometimes to make too many different chords pass under a single note of the melody. The Faust of Spohr is anterior to Der Freyschütz by eight years, and yet there exists between these two works a family resemblance, which can only be explained by the taste for novel combinations which Spohr, like Weber, pleased himself with trying.

To judge it in a word, Faust is the work of an artist whose temperament and faculties were much less suited to the theatre than to instrumental music, to the symphony. In fact, although it contains some fine pages, his opera in general is devoid of élan, of contrasts, of variety, of what gives life to music, and, above all, to dramatic music. And yet Faust is, with Jessonda, the best lyrical work which he has produced.

"Faust! grand subject, worthy to inspire a Germanic muse," wrote Fétis, at the time of its representation in Paris. "But Faust, for the French, is the work of Goethe, with its beauties, its defects, the vagueness of its style, and the exaggeration of its ideas. The characters so strongly traced, the situations so interesting, although improbable, which distinguish this creation, are what one desires to see upon the stage. Unfortunately, nothing of all this is found in the formless libretto of which Spohr has written the music. . . Only a very strong music could struggle against the disadvantages of such a canvas; unhappily I am forced to avow that that of Faust is not what was needed. It has not justified the high reputation of its author, and I have difficulty to persuade myself that this is the work of which I have read so many praises. And do not believe that the composition here in question is one of those whose novelty in kind, whose subtle combinations and audacities demand time to make them comprehended; for, beyond a few modulations which are too precipitate, nothing is more simple or less new than this music. From an artist like Spohr, accustomed to manage instrumental masses, and of whom I have heard in London a symphony full of beautiful effects, I hoped for a vigorous overture, analogous to the nature of the subject, and I only feared to find some Germanisms a little too bold; instead of that, I have heard a symphony in the ancient manner, of a style more gay than sombre, filled with well-worn formulas, and which one would have taken for the overture of an opera bouffe, if the title of the work had not been upon the play-bill. . . In short, Faust has not justified the hopes to which it had given rise."

On the other hand, Mendelssohn, arriving the next year at Paris, and, pressed by his father to choose a French opera libretto, in the want of a German poem such as he would have liked, replied to him, in his letter of Nov. 19, 1831: ". . . The success which these subjects (La Muette and Guillaume Tell) have throughout all Germany is not owing to the fact that they are good or dramatic, for Guillaume Tell is neither the one nor the other; but it is because they come from Paris and have pleased there. Assuredly if there is a road to take to be appreciated in Germany, it is that which passes through Paris and London; yet it is not the only one, as is proved not only by all of Weber, but by Spohr himself, whose Faust is now placed here in the rank of classical music, and will be given the next season at the Grand Opera of London. . ."

A few years after being played at Paris, in German, this opera was sung at Marseilles, in French. It had been translated by the director of the theatre, Clérissieu, and by an artist of the orchestra, De Groot, the father of M. Ad. de Groot, who was chef-d'orchestre at the Châtelet and at the Vaudeville. Hébert, the husband of Mme. Hébert-Massy, played Faust; Potet, Mephistopheles; and Mme. Margueron, Rose. To break the monotony of the work, the director conceived the idea of introducing into it some dancing airs, and De Groot undertook to compose them, preserving his incognito. The opera was only half successful, but the dance music made a furor. The whole Marseillaise public was in ecstasy, declaring that never had Spohr composed anything so beautiful as these airs de ballet; that it was the most charming page of his opera, that none but a German musician was capable of writing such delicious dance airs, etc., etc. . . Good care was taken not to undeceive these enthusiastic admirers, and they continued to fête De Groot, under cover of Spohr, just as one day at Paris they applauded The Flight into Egypt, by Pierre Ducré, which they would not have failed to hiss under the name of Berlioz; and just as our fathers had received with enthusiasm, under the name of Gluck, Les Dan- aïdes, a masterpiece which they would perhaps have disdained if it had been signed Salieri.

HANDEL'S CONCERTOS FOR ORGAN AND ORCHESTRA.¹

M. GUILMANT AND M. COLONNE.

At the admirable concerts organized by M. Guilmant at the Trocadéro, the intelligent spectators, thoughtfully listening to his marvelous programme, honor in him the musician who has been the first to reveal to us the superb concertos written for the organ and the orchestra by Handel. And so we think we are responding to a desire generally manifested, in presenting these concertos in a serious study from an æsthetic and a technical point of view.

This work of Handel is the historical revelation of a whole epoch and a whole civilization. . . We begin at once the scientific analysis of the four concertos already heard at the Trocadéro, and henceforth preserved in certain memories as a feast of the mind and soul, through the memorable interpretation of them by MM. Guilmant and Colonne with his select orchestra.

Handel's concertos, so popular in England, in Germany, in Scandinavia, are, according to Fétis, eighteen in number. Treuttel has published them in three series of six each. We find in reality but seventeen concertos for organ and instruments, to which must be added six concertos for organ without instruments, making twenty-three in all. Schœlcher, who is law in this matter, verifies but seventeen. In the edition of Walsh, recognized and signed by Handel, the last six concertos present themselves uninstrumented. For the first two only, in this series, is the instrumentation indicated, but it has not been discovered. M. Guilmant has never been able to find it in England, and we remember that in our original edition this orchestration was wanting. This precious edition, the loss of which is irreparable, had been personally presented to us by M. Louis Blanc from London, at the request of Mme. George Sand. To make it complete, M. Louis Blanc had availed himself of the researches of English publishers and musicographers. During the bombardment of 1871 it was all destroyed.

Of the seventeen concertos, M. Guilmant has chosen the four which he preferred, which popular success has always consecrated, and which the savants cite for models. All the other concertos are also interesting, and they will be executed and applauded in their turn. But in the four now known, and familiar to French audiences, are well summed up the genius of Handel, his exquisite and superior style, his expert hand, and that cleverness of expression and of mise-en-scène which prove that the great man elaborated his thought and his success, and consulted the pleasures of the public as well as the austere exigencies of art. Our study will consult the dates and numerical order in the work of the master, and will then proceed historically.

The first concerto is in G minor and major. It is divided, like nearly all the concertos, into four parts, or two double parts. The first piece is marked Larghetto e staccato, a strange indication which belongs to Handel. It is in 3-4 tempo. The organ plays here the part of a dreamy personage, and maintains itself in solemn contrast with the nervous and jerky movement of the orchestra. The debate terminates, the instruments reproduce the accents of the organ, and at the end, organ and orchestra unite in an energetic and masculine ensemble.

The Allegro, in G major, is very brilliant. It is cut by an expressive phrase resumed, now by the organ, now by the orchestra. We give it in substance on account of its rare charm, and on account of certain allurements of expression, and a certain changeful play of form, in which is revealed all that Handel's muse contained of what is learned, coquettish, exquisite.

This Allegro is chained to the preceding piece by a cadence which presents itself invariably in each concerto, major or minor, and which is quite characteristic. In the organ part it is generally surmounted by the words ad libitum. One can then vary it, as in an example which will be seen in the second concerto before the finale. In this cadence, which ends on the dominant, we recognize a familiar process of Handel's for binding the pieces together, making a bridge between two pieces of contradictory physiognomy, as, for example, when he leaps from an Adagio to a brilliant Finale.

The Finale is an Andante in 3-8 tempo. It moves with the elegant gait of a minuet. The violins and the organ question and respond, then blend in variations in which the organ monopolizes the preponderating part. The working out of this concerto is very fine and very profound. Piquant sonorities abound in it. The serene joyousness of Handel sets every phrase in sunshine. Here there is nothing of that doctrinal hypocrisy which under a pedantic mantle hides poverty of imagination, absence of knowledge and emptiness of brain. Of all the concertos it is the most beautiful in the purely musical sense. . . .

The second concerto is in B flat. It begins, as Handel marks it, A tempo ordinario, e staccato. It is in 4-4 measure. The chords are very large. The whole has a beautiful gait. A moment of repose arrives, and we hear the habitual cadence. The Allegro moves off lithe and slender, like the popular inspirations of England in its historic songs and dances. It is well known that a whole marvelous library of these has been preserved, and that Handel had a deep acquaintance with all this jewelry. Our French public thrilled to these accents as if it recognized them: and this is explained when we think how much the popular music over all the planet is animated with the same inspirations.

We will give a single example. In 1758, the English being at war with France, a company of Welsh mountaineers disembarked on the beach of Saint-Cast in our old Brittany. Immediately the Breton peasants seized their muskets and flung themselves before the enemy. All of a sudden the Welsh mountaineers intone their song of war. The arms fall from the hands of the Bretons. Our peasants halt, and, in their turn, with a strong voice, full of sobs, they join their French music with the Welsh music, and sing the same warlike hymn, at once Welsh and Breton, which, in the two camps, the combatants have heard during their infancy and have repeated all their lives. Same words, same music. On both sides the officers, Welsh and Breton, give the command to fire in the same language. How can they fight, how can they kill each other! The arms are thrown aside; tears run from all eyes, they embrace. Together they sound forth the same hymn, which is no longer a song of war, but a song of reconciliation.

The Adagio is a recitative confided to the organ, and accompanied by a few harmonies of string instruments. It is again tied to the Allegro by the inevitable cadence on the dominant, but this time with an ornamentation on the organ which we copy from the edition of Walsh.

In the Allegro ma non presto we find again the easy carriage of minuets, the grace, the gayety, and that freshness of soul which Handel preserved through all his life, as an artist and as a man.

The gift of communication with the public belongs essentially to Handel. The popular fibre is in him. The artistic mediocrity of a stiff and formal talent, seek it not in this musician. He has neither puerility, nor affectation. His lively perception, his vast knowledge, his active thought renew themselves from the songs and dances of a triple nationality: Ireland, Scotland, England. You will feel the breath and balm thereof in the fourth concerto, in F. M. Guilman had happily chosen it to inaugurate his séances and win the public at a blow. Aristotle and his learned cabal, La Harpe and Lebatteux have nothing to be seen here. We have politely taken leave of them, to give reception to Shakespeare and his undisciplined beauties, to Milton, religiously inspired, to Dante, to Ariosto, to Cervantes, to Molière, to all the geniuses whose thought is deep, undulating, luminous as the vast, vague expanse of the Indian oceans. The beginning is in unison and challenges attention. The musician meant to strike sure and quick. The phrase is energetic; the Andante announces itself by successions of grandiose chords confided to the organ and repeated by the instruments. It continues in delicate outlines, in light phrases, which form an opposition with the beginning. The organ commences, the orchestra responds; then there unrolls, in triplets, a fine ribbon of lyric arabesques. M. Guilman lets them fall from his delicate, free fingers like the scattered drops of a summer shower, while a rainbow detaches itself upon the stormy horizon. A double thought appears in all this clever and simple arrangement. It is the religious sentiment, and the sentiment of elegance, of fine ornamentation. Then comes the episode, an air declaimed by a solo register, and the traditional cadence which binds the Adagio to the Finale.

CARL KREBS.¹

Carl Krebs, Royal Saxon Capellmeister, died at Dresden on the afternoon of the 16th of May, and, though he had been suffering for some time, his death was somewhat unexpected. By this sad event, musical art loses another of its well-approved and renowned old masters, one of those genuine musicians with whose name an entire chapter of the history of art is closely mixed up. It was in a triple capacity that Carl Krebs attained celebrity: he was a distinguished pianist, a sterling composer, and an excellent conductor, displaying in the last character rare energy, mental freshness, and vigor, up to a very advanced age. As an artist active in only the best sense, he was, as a man, universally beloved and esteemed, being one who, in the thorough uprightness and honesty of his nature, met everybody openly and frankly, and was utterly ignorant of petty professional envy.

Born on the 16th of January, 1804, at Nuremberg, Carl Krebs soon lost his mother, Charlotte Miedke, an excellent singer, who died at Stuttgart, and, with his father's consent, he was adopted by Herr Krebs, a member of the operatic company at the Theatre Royal there. His extraordinary natural gifts were shown even in his earliest boyhood, and, in his sixth year, he was one of the child-phenomenons of that time. He played pianoforte concertos by Mozart and Dussek, and, when seven years of age, wrote his first opera, Feodora, to a libretto of Kotzebue's. In 1825 he went to Vienna, for the purpose of improving himself in thorough-bass and establishing still more firmly his reputation as a pianist. A year later he received his appointment as third Capellmeister at the Kärnthner-Theatre, and it was under his direction that La Dame Blanche and Le Maçon were performed there for the first time. The year 1827 saw him exchange this honorable sphere of action for Hamburg, whither he was invited, on brilliant terms, as conductor at the Stadttheater, then just built. He exercised an extraordinary influence on the elevation of musical matters in the old Hanse-Town. For ten years he organized grand musical performances, which, in their way, were musical festivals, held in high esteem far and wide. In Hamburg, too, he wrote his opera Agnes Bernauer—he had previously completed another, Sylvia, in Vienna—and produced it in 1843, with gratifying success. He retained his appointment for twenty-four years, till, in 1850, he received an offer from the Theatre Royal, Dresden, and, to the great regret of the Hamburgers, accepted it. In June, of the same year, he entered on his new duties, and, at the age of forty-six, married Aloyse Michalesi, till 1870 one of the chief ornaments of the Dresden Royal Opera. She was his second wife, his first having been Adelheid von Cotta, whom he married at Stuttgart on the 6th of June, 1828, and who died on the 9th of December, 1847. A daughter born of the second marriage, has added fresh lustre to her father's name; that daughter is Marie Krebs, the pianist.

At the end of July, 1872, Krebs gave up his post at the Theatre Royal, and retained only the direction of the sacred music at the Royal Roman Catholic Church, for which he composed several valuable masses and cantatas, as well as a "Te Deum." Of his other compositions, his brilliant pianoforte pieces and songs were especially successful, some of the latter, the one entitled "An Adelheid," for instance, obtaining worldwide renown.

The deceased enjoyed the rare happiness of celebrating on the 1st of April, 1876, his fiftieth anniversary as a conductor. On that occasion, the numberless congratulations and offerings from all points of the compass, as well as the various marks of distinction from crowned heads, proved once more in what high esteem his professional services and busy life were held. As recently as June, 1878, he conducted, with vigor unimpaired, a part of the musical performances organized to celebrate the Silver Wedding of the Royal couple of Saxony. Since last Autumn he was ailing, but no one expected so soon the hour which would summon the youthful old man, whose intellect was as bright as ever, from the life to which he was so attached.

On the 19th of May, his mortal remains were laid in their last resting-place. The evening before, the Dresden Liedertafel gave him who for years had been an honorary member a funeral serenade by torch-light. Manifestations of profound sympathy were received from various places; the Brunswick Ducal Chapel forwarded, through Herr Abt, their conductor, a cushion with laurel, and a large number of laurel wreaths were sent by professional admirers and private friends in Hamburg. All the most prominent representatives of art and science in Dresden attended the funeral, and the imposing procession wended its way towards the Roman Catholic Cemetery to the strains of Chopin's Funeral March. At the grave, Herr Stolle, Court Chaplain and President, first delivered an address in the name of the Church, and was followed by Dr. Pabst, Hofrath, speaking in that of the Direction General of the Theatre Royal. Herr Müller, cantor, as representing the choir, recited some valedictory verses. After a composition of the deceased Master had been given by the chorus from the Theatre Royal, the proceedings were brought to a close with a "Salve, Regina," sung by the choir-boys of the Roman Catholic Church.

DR. RITTER ON "CHAMBER MUSIC."

Dr. Frederic L. Ritter's lecture in Standard Hall, New York, on May 13th, concerning the historical and æsthetic development of "Chamber Music," (says our contemporary, The Musical Review), was one of the most instructive as well as entertaining events of the musical season. No other musician in this country has a more thorough knowledge of such subjects and no other is more practised in their exposition than Dr. Ritter, who, by similar instruction of numerous students at Vassar College (who afterwards return to their homes all over the land) is continually sowing the seeds for future development in this country. Music as an art is a growth. When, in this sense, it is not indigenous to our soil, it must be transplanted here; and that is what is going on at present — thanks to many pioneers who have patiently tilled among us for many years.

One of the characteristics of Americans is a love for sensationalism; and it is against the abuse of this characteristic as applied to art that the leaders of taste find it most necessary to guard. Hence, music which, while good, is characterized also by high coloring and varied adornment, is more apt to be appreciated by the multitude than good music (and even better music) with less flashy pretensions. Anything, therefore, which tends to make more intelligent the appreciation of the less obtrusive merits of good works, by explanation and illustration of works which are characterized almost exclusively by such refined beauties, should be heartily welcomed in our midst. Of such good service are the various "chamber-music" concerts now increasing in number in many American cities; of such good service, also, was Dr. Ritter's lecture last week, when the professor was assisted in the illustration of his subject by so good a string quartet as Messrs. Brandt, Schwarz, Matzka and Bergner, and accompanist as Mr. J. H. Wilson.

There were two facts which impressed most prominently those who listened thoughtfully to the lecture and the illustrations; and these were: first, the fact that music is a growth; for you could almost see the sprouting as the first six illustrations were played, beginning with the incomplete and monotonous long chords of Maschera (1593) and culminating in Corelli's soulful "Adagio" for violin (1700), played on the 'cello by Mr. Frederick Bergner in his noblest style; and you could see in the later composers represented (ending with Haydn) the germs of expansion into the subsequent development of Mozart, Beethoven and others. Secondly, the individuality of the various composers, notwithstanding their dependence on the past, was brought out into striking prominence. For example, Bach, Handel and Haydn could easily have been identified from their handiwork without the appearance of their names upon the programme of their selections which were played.

The lecture was, in substance, as follows:

Modern instrumental music owes its most essential æsthetic qualities to the development of the different forms of chamber music, culminating in that of the sonata. A fine understanding of the forms of chamber music is sure to widen the listener's horizon, and to stimulate his appreciation of the large orchestral forms. In the illustrations of such an historical sketch as the present, we can not expect to find invariably the finish, the melodic charm, the harmonic variety of our classic epoch. Some possess merely an historical interest; euphony, perfection of form, and sufficient emotional expression and meaning are yet wanting. In listening to them the hearer must transplant himself mentally into that epoch during which they were written.

Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina died at Rome in the year 1594. He was a composer famous, not alone on account of his unique, unsurpassed genius, as evinced in his wonderful works, but also as the artist pointed out by history as the one in whose labors culminated the first great epoch of Christian musical art development — based then exclusively upon the culture of vocal music. "When music began to be associated with religious service, the human voice was considered the only appropriate organ to sound God's praises. But, besides, before the perfection of artificial instruments, this natural organ was the best at the disposal of men for artistic purposes. During the mediæval period, Harmony, the great vital agent of modern music, was discovered, and Counterpoint (the art of uniting two or more distinct melodies into one logical form, growing out of the harmonic basis as the flower grows out of the root) was invented and perfected, and straightway became the almost exclusive mode of composing both sacred and secular works. Variety of timbre and compass of the different voices afforded full scope for the most complicated contrapuntal development.

With Palestrina the climax of that age was reached and even the germs of the coming epoch were manifested. The invention of instruments led to transposition for them of prevailing vocal pieces. But the instruments of that time were not considered capable of responding to the artistic requirements of the learned contrapuntists. Minstrels and strolling players were the agents of this transition. Gradually these instruments found their way into the music-rooms of princes and nobles and into monastery halls, whence eventually they took a foothold in the organ gallery of the cathedral — lending, although still awkward in form and in production of tone, additional power and brilliancy to the vocal parts.

For the present purpose, attention will be confined to those of the instruments of that time which were played with a bow upon strings and belonging to the family of violins. These were first thought of as imitations, in diversity and compass, of the human voice; and consequently, the treble violin, the alto or tenor viola and the bass violoncello were produced; and their introduction revolutionized music and paved the way for the great modern orchestra.

The first development of the art of composition and performance along this line originated, like the most important musical forms, in Italy; and, of course, the first improvements in formal construction of stringed instruments, so as to become artistically manageable, emanated from Italy. At the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th century, the Gabriellis (Andrea and his nephew, Giovanni) had already begun to assign to the violin important parts in connection with other instruments. About the same time, Claudio Monteverde, distinguished also in the dramatic development of the opera, penetrated deeper into the true character and technical capabilities of the violin and discovered that motion, rather than the sustaining of tones, is the essential element of stringed instruments. On this principle he was able to give to some of the scenes in his operas increased vivacity, intensity, and dramatic expression. He introduced, also, the "tremolo" and the "pizzicato." These changes, of course, incited players to new efforts; and so, gradually compositions for stringed instruments alone began to be written — the first models for their forms (aside from the dances) being found in the vocal music, and the new compositions being written in accordance with the strict rules of counterpoint. Often, too, vocal pieces were played instrumentally, without the slightest regard to the natural capabilities of the different instruments. The composers even wrote on the title-pages of their motets, madrigals, canzonettas, etc., "Da cantare e sonare" — to be sung, or played on instruments. And even in distinctively instrumental works at that time, the vocal forms were closely followed. The harmonic construction, like that in vocal pieces, was based upon the old ecclesiastical modes, which differed, in many essential points, from our modern major and minor keys. All this imparts to these early instrumental efforts an air of stiffness, awkwardness and archaic quaintness. The instruments sound as if groping in the dark, outside of their natural sphere, and endeavoring to find a more congenial, artistic existence. All these peculiarities are presented by the first illustration, a "Canzon" by Florentino Maschera, who, at the end of the 16th century, lived in Brescia, as organist of the cathedral, and was considered a very able musician. The piece, published in 1593, was originally written for organ; but, the four parts having been printed separately, it may be assumed that it was intended to be played also by four instruments. What kind of instruments the composer neglected to state. The piece is in two parts, each to be repeated. The first has twenty and the second has thirty measures, closing with a "coda" of seven bars. This form, though in an improved state, we meet again in the modern sonata as illustrated by Haydn. In each part one principle "motivo" is worked out contrapuntally. Our modern tonality, G minor, already predominates. Each part closes upon the key — the decisive interval (the third) which would determine the nature of the chord, being, however, left out; while the closing chord of the whole piece sounds that of G major. This is a characteristic harmonic peculiarity used in connection with the ecclesiastical modes — its raison d'être being based on acoustic grounds.

Here followed the performance of Maschera's "Canzon," and attention was called to the fact that it shows the melodic element in its veriest infancy.

Only when forms could be constructed with a regard to the tone-element and the technical character of the different instruments, was an independent and original instrumental melody possible. As composers began to understand the distinctive marks of stringed instruments, and the manifold, rich resources that lay dormant within those strings, chaos began also to disappear, and, step by step, the previously almost identical forms of Toccata, Canzona, Preludia, etc., received more logical, æsthetic shapes. One became slower in motion and broader in melodic phrasing; another moved more swiftly, its æsthetic construction being characterized by shorter themes and simpler rhythmic phrasing. Thus each separate movement adopted a distinct character and individual physiognomy. One was called Allegro; another, Adagio; a third, Presto, and so on. Eventually they were united in a successive progression, in order to form relieving æsthetic contrasts. This was the origin of that noble form, the Sonata, which eventually enabled the genius of a Haydn, a Mozart and a Beethoven to create so many immortal works. It became at once the favorite form of the old Italian instrumental composers. The word Sonata is derived from Suonare (to sound) and was used at first to signify that a piece was to be played by instruments, instead of being sung.

Afterwards the word came to signify a distinct form of instrumental music; and still later (about 1650) it began to be used interchangeably with the word Sinfonia (symphony) — there existing no formal distinction between the two.

(Conclusion in next Number.)

VIENNA. — Beethoven's statue, which was inaugurated on the 1st of May last, is the work of the sculptor Zumbusch; it was exhibited at the Paris Exhibition and formed one of the principal ornaments of the Austro-Hungarian façade in the Rue des Nations. About £7,600 have been collected towards the monument. The Emperor of Austria gave 1,000 florins, the Vienna opera 1,043 (the result of a representation of Fidelio), Liszt 10,396 florins (the proceeds of a concert), and Verdi 500 francs — several musical societies, the Conservatoires of Vienna, Munich, Brussels, Baltimore, etc., have also subscribed various sums. — It is proposed to perform Wagner's opera, Tristan und Isolde at the Imperial Opera. The master will stop at Vienna on his return from Italy to make arrangements with the superintendent of the opera house for the execution of his work. He will be invited to direct personally the first performance of Tristan.

MUSIC AT COLLEGE FESTIVALS.

This seems to be one of the hopeless problems, like the squaring of the circle. It would naturally be presumed that a time-honored, cultured University, classical in everything else, and fond of the dear old "classic shades," and setting a model in all the arts and influences of refinement, would also, in its annual festivals, Commencements, dinners and processions of Alumni and societies of the elect, set a high example of music such as could be regarded as in some sense classical, — at all events superior, tasteful, apropos of the ideas and sentiments of the occasion, and as well worth listening to as the orations, poems, toasts and after-dinner speeches. Where, if not to a University, should we look for such fine ministry of the tone-art?

Several times, in summers past, have we alluded to the condition of things in this respect at the ancient seat of our own Alma Mater, Harvard. The plea for all shortcomings has always been economy, the want of means. A cheap military band, mostly brass, to regulate the tramp of the procession from the library to the theatre and to the dining-hall, has been the last extremity of grace, and grudgingly allowed. This band, in furtherance of the same economy, has entered the hall with the procession, and furnished such occasional preludes, interludes, divertimenti, echoes to patriotic toasts and speeches, as were deemed appropriate, — though nine times in ten they are most inappropriate. For instance, at the Alumni dinners of several summers past, the band, stationed in that sacred entrance transept of the memorial tablets, has kept up its ringing march until all the classes have entered the vast dining-hall, and then ascending to the end gallery has prolonged its stunning brazen din, so overwhelming that no one could talk or even think, for some ten or twenty minutes, until all were seated. For the rest, an occasional operatic pot-pourri, or sentimental air, or galop, would be played, out of all relation to what was passing, and apparently for no end whatever, but to relieve the tediousness of speech.

This time (Commencement 1880), the management — whether the young President of the University, in his heroic way, or the Committee of the Alumni, we are not informed — as if ashamed of past shortcomings, surprised the sons of Harvard, assembled for the annual procession, with a practical joke — there was no band at all! The hot, dusty march, huddling and measureless, seemed doubly long and tiresome. No note of music of any kind, in Sanders Theatre, or in the dining-hall, except the venerable hymn: "Give ear, my children," to the tune of Saint Martin's led off by the venerable ex-librarian. Well, perhaps this was better, for once, than the old order of things. At least it called attention to the subject, as going without dinner might invest the gastronomic problem with a new importance.

On the following day, the Phi Beta Kappa Society provided better for its guests and members. There was a band, and a good one. And, better yet, when all were seated at the bounteous tables within those bare, white-washed, "storied walls" of old Massachusetts hall, and the feast of wit, of reason and of soul, had begun, this band had put aside some of its loud brass instruments, and transformed itself into the gentler and more artistic semblance of an orchestra with strings, and once at least, (the rule of secrecy, we presume, does not apply to the music as well as to the speeches of the Phi-Beta symposiums), they played a somewhat lengthy piece of a rather delicate and refined character, not severe nor profound, which might have been worth listening to, if the talkative and genial company had only thought of it. As it was, it was entirely lost, — music scattered to the winds, — nobody heard, or cared to hear it, though its tuneful murmurs may have mingled certain pleasant, half conscious sensations with the other pleasurable circumstances of the flying hours.

And this brings us to the point of the whole matter. Music is of three kinds: that which is to be listened to, that which is not worth listening to, and that which may or may not be listened to, inasmuch as its end resides not in itself, it being not music for its own sake, but for the sake of something else, as dancing, marching, soothing the impatience of a waiting crowd at a spectacle, etc. Music of this third kind is certainly legitimate, and may be good of its kind; it times the march or the procession, and relieves the weariness thereof. It gives the measure and the rhythmic impulse to the dance, and sets the brain and senses of the dancers whirling: they have no need to listen to it; one outside may listen and may find it good, may exquisite; but ten to one he finds it a bore, from the persistent mill-wheel monotony of the rhythm, even in the most luscious waltz of Strauss or Lanner. Of bad music, music insufferably commonplace and shallow, coarse and noisy and obtrusive, not worth listening to, always untimely, out of place, the less said the better.

But real music is that which has a right to listening attention. In a feast of wit and intellect, of poetry and fine or noble sentiment, it appeals to heart and soul and mind by as divine a right as the eloquent speech that is made, or the inspired verses that are recited. It is as much an insult to this Muse, as it would be to St. Cecilia in church, to cease to listen and plunge into a general hubbub of chatty conversation the moment the minister stops speaking and her voice begins. That there is so seldom any music really worth heeding on occasions of the kind referred to, is doubtless mainly owing to the fact that, be it ever so good, we know that it stands no chance of being listened to. We think that a better state of things might gradually be brought about in the anniversary festivities of our Universities. It is they that can and ought to set the good example and try to realize some true ideal, or approximate ideal, of a possible mutual relationship between music, poetry and eloquence in the theatres and dining halls where college men meet once a year.

To define this ideal satisfactorily and fully, and sketch out its working programme, would be a matter of much thought and tentative experiment. But one principle, and that the central one, is clear. Whatever music, whether of instruments or voices, is set loose on such occasions, it should have significance and purpose; it should utter no uncertain sound; its raison d'être should be clear and unmistakable. That is to say, it should, in Music's way, coöperate to the same end that the speeches and the poems do in their way. Either it is there to be listened to, and taken to heart, or it had better stay away. Silence is golden, but music unheeded, not expected to be heeded, is not even silver. Rightly prepared, and rightly heeded, think what inspiring, edifying and idealizing contributions this divine art might make to such feasts of reason and of soul. When the silver-tongued welcome and exhortation of the chairman of the feast are uttered, let music take up the theme in noble harmonies responsive to the very thought, — not rattle off a waltz or pot-pourri, entirely irrelevant, as at a picnic on a steamboat. If there is a poem full of sentiment and tender memory of youth and college days, let there be a fit selection ready which shall heighten and prolong the feeling, and not rudely break the spell with brassy clamor fitter for a circus. If the eulogy of the noble dead be pronounced, let the dirge, or the uplifting strain of comfort, which follows, be selected from the best that Mozart's or Beethoven's deathless treasures have to offer. If ringing eloquence of high resolve and aspiration swells the common breast, let the musical response be grand enough and vital enough to intensify the effect and make it haunt us afterwards. For lighter flashes of wit and humor, there is plenty of heat-lightning music that would seem born of the same simultaneous inspiration. But there would have to be a previous understanding about it all. The programme, in its essential features, leaving room enough for inspirations of the moment and for happy accident, should be carefully prepared. Music would be sure to do her part much better, if she knew that she would be respected, that her voice would be listened to, and that she would be treated as an essential, vital, equal element in the festive communion of choice spirits. It would be very difficult undoubtedly; the problem might be quite as hard to solve as that of Civil Service for the unfortunate man who is or is to be the President of these United States. It would require a committee of rare tact and judgment, if not of imaginative, creative faculty. Or, better yet, there should be some one all-competent "Philostrate, master of the sports," who should be in the secret of all the speakers and the poets and the musical director beforehand, able to divine their thoughts even without consulting them; with a rare gift for combinations, for bringing together by sure instinct what belongs together; and with a quick-witted faculty for seizing the apt moment, for seeing just when the music can come in to good advantage, when it fairly should have something to say, and when it had better hold its tongue; and what it ought to say in keeping with each text. He should have an ample, various repertoire provided from the best artistic sources, with electric signals of the eye or hand established between him and the conductor, so that something good and fit and worth the hearing should be sure in every case to be forthcoming.

Of course all this is very sketchy, vague and general. Nothing but careful thought and slow and gradual experiment and many partial failures, can even begin to approximate so lovely an ideal. But is it not worth studying and attempting?

"MUSIKER" AND "MUSIKANT."

Continuing in the same strain as above, we say: If true music be worth listening to, if music be an Art, entitled to respect, and not a mere accessory or humdrum accompaniment to something else, as dancing, circus shows, etc., then, for the same reason, is the true musician an artist, one who respects his art, and who respects himself, and must not, therefore, be confounded with the man who only makes a trade of music, gets hold of some of its instruments, acquires some knack or sleight of hand with them, and uses them mechanically with no higher sense or aim than to grind out a living, whether by scraping a fiddle, blowing a squeaking clarinet, or shouting ballads in the street. Yet the names artist and musician, like the titles Doctor and Professor, are most indiscriminately assumed and worn. Even the man who "shines" your boots puts up the sign of "artist." Our attention is turned to this phase of the subject by reading the following paragraph in the London Musical Times:

Passing through a back street in London the other morning our attention was attracted by a board nailed against a door, announcing that on the second floor lived "Jones, musician." Now without wishing to detract from the public estimate of Mr. Jones's artistic acquirements, we came to the conclusion that this "musician's" talents were more usually exhibited outside than inside houses—a surmise which, on inquiry, we found to be correct. It certainly seems strange that whilst a certain amount of knowledge should be absolutely essential before a follower of other arts and sciences can legitimately exercise his powers as a means of living, any person who can scrape on a stringed instrument, blow through a tube, or shout out popular songs, should be styled a "musician." True it is that the public acknowledges grades amongst the professors of music; but there can be little doubt that the indiscriminate use of the word we have mentioned tends very much to lower the status of the real artist. An instance of how this term is perverted occurred very recently at a police-office. A chimney-sweep was charged with assault, and on being called upon to state the charge, the complainant said, "Well, your Worship, me and my missus gets our living by the musical profession, and they are sweeps and always come quarrelling with us." Naturally, the magistrate asked, "What do you mean by the musical profession?" to which the witness answered, "Well, sir, we sing, sir, at races and other places, and we keep ourselves respectable." It is gratifying to find that these members of the "profession" keep themselves "respectable"; but we can scarcely think that, even with this social claim to their regard, "Musicians," in the highest sense of the word, would care to consider them as belonging to their own fraternity. It is of course immaterial what these peripatetic vocalists and instrumentalists call each other; but the want of any definite term to separate them from artists is a sign of the times, and the sooner this is remedied the better will it be for the position of those whose lives are devoted to further the progress of intellectual music in this country.

We do indeed need some distinction of terms. The Germans have it in the terms Musiker and Musikant. The former designates the real musician, in the sense of artist (Tonkünstler), the man whose study and whose practice, whether as composer or performer (that is to say, interpreter), is inspired by a true love and reverence for Art, for the ideal. The Musikant is the term for the strolling street musician, the man who sings and plays out of tune, in a mechanical and humdrum way, at fairs and races, in pothouses and beer saloons, using the implements of a divine art, commonly in a most bungling way, merely to make the pot boil and keep body and soul together. Who will invent some equally distinctive and convenient terms in the English language?

MUSIC ABROAD.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.—That the triennial assembly of amateurs and musicians in honor of the grand Saxon musician who (with brief intervals of absence) made England his country and London his residence from 1710 to 1759, the year of his death, and whom Germany herself hardly dares to claim as her own, so thoroughly did he succeed in meeting English tastes and conquering English hearts, should have absorbed all attention during the week which ends to-day may easily be understood. Mendelssohn, although he composed Eljah for Birmingham, and was almost worshipped in this country, could never be entirely happy away from Germany; while Handel (a naturalized Englishman), despite his German birth and his successes in Italy, could never be entirely happy away from the new country of his choice. In fact, he was celebrated here before he can be said to have been recognized at home in any degree proportionate to his absolute worth. What the Handel Festival, held triennially in the Crystal Palace, signifies, is a theme so familiar to our musical readers that to dwell upon it again would be sacrificing space to no purpose. Enough that from 1857, when the idea was first put into action by the spirited directors of the Sacred Harmonic Society, with the late Mr. Robert K. Bowley at their head, Mr. George Grove as secretary sans pareil, and Sir Michael Costa "generalissimo of all the orchestras," justly so styled, as conductor, they have been carried on until now with ever increasing interest. The meeting of 1857, though advertised as "Handel Festival," was but tentative, the first "Festival" properly so denominated taking place in 1859, when the centenary of Handel's death was commemorated. The success on that occasion was so marked, that in 1862 another meeting was organized, with results so satisfactory that it was determined by the Committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society and the Crystal Palace directors to perpetuate the festivals as "triennial." Thus it has been continued, with always increased and increasing resources, until the present time, and is likely to be continued on the same footing, so long as the Crystal Palace (for no other "locale" could be found so happily suited to the purpose) remains at disposal of the promoters. It is gratifying to be able to state that the festival which came to an end yesterday with such a performance of Israel in Egypt as in no other circumstances could be possible, has been as remarkable as any of its predecessors—more remarkable, indeed, in some respects.

The festival comprised two oratorios—The Messiah and Israel, separated from each other by a miscellaneous programme made exclusively out of Handel's works, sacred and secular, and preceded, as on former occasions, by a general public rehearsal—a sort of epitome of all that was to come, comprising, as it did, the most admired pieces from the oratorios and the intervening "selection." For such a celebration nothing could be fitter than the oratorio of the New Testament and the oratorio of the Old, subject, nevertheless, to the suggestion that, by logical order of precedence, Israel should come first, and The Messiah last. About the rehearsal we need say no more than that it brought a large concourse of visitors to the Crystal Palace, and that all the leading singers, with the exceptions of Mme. Adelina Patti, took part in it. The first test was the performance of The Messiah, on Monday, than which we can remember nothing more admirable. The "Sacred Oratorio" was brought out in all its glory by a host of interpreters, vocal and instrumental, over 4,000 in number. There were upwards of 21,000 visitors, and the sight, favored by a glorious sunshine, was as imposing as the sound was magnificent. The reception given to Sir Michael Costa was no more than a just tribute to one who has directed these festivals from the beginning, and has, since 1848, been conductor to the Sacred Harmonic Society, by whose directors they were first set on foot, and by whose responsible officers they have been so ably managed from the beginning. The first grave and stately measures of the overture showed the orchestra at its best; and this efficiency was sustained to the very end. The chorus were not only strong in numbers but in excellence, and this was proved no less clearly by the ease and pointed accentuation with which they executed such pieces as "He shall purify the sons of Levi," where florid passages abound, than in their emphatic rendering of "For unto us a Child is born," the superb "Hallelujah," and the overpowering "Amen"—worthy climax to a masterpiece in all essential respects unequalled. We have little but praise for the leading vocalists. To Mme. Albani was confided the soprano music throughout, and rarely has she won more honorable distinction. Only to single out two pieces—"How beautiful are the feet," was given by this accomplished artist with all the simple and plaintive tenderness which is its chief characteristic, while "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was sung with a fervor of expression that revealed all its deep significance. An unbeliever might have been converted by such unaffected and persuasive vocal eloquence. Mme. Patey, our reigning contralto, sang all the recitatives and airs allotted to her register; and to more competent hands they could hardly have been confided. Her renderings of "He shall feed His flock," and of the truly pathetic air, "He was despised and rejected of men," were equally to be admired, as examples of model Handelian singing. The tenor music was shared between Mr. Barton McGuckin and Mr. Maas, the former earning good opinions on all sides by the earnestness imparted to the "Passion" recitatives and airs, the other creating quite a sensation by his energetic delivery of the declamatory air, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron," immediately following upon the defiant chorus, "Let us break their bonds asunder." The "future of Mr. Maas may henceforth be regarded as secure." The bass music in the opening part devolved upon Mr. Foli, who gave the recitative and air, "The people that walked in darkness," with commendable judgment, and Mr. Stanley, whose Handelian singing happily stands in no need of eulogy, and whose "Why do the nations" and "The trumpet shall sound" (with Mr. T. Harper's splendid obligato), were, as usual, worthy unqualified praise. In fact, the performance of The Messiah was such a beginning to the Handel Festival as its best well-wishers could desire. The miscellaneous concert was, as always, an entertainment of varied interest, consisting, however, exclusively of solo airs, choruses, and instrumental music, including the concerto in G—first of twelve for stringed instruments, which, played by all the violins, violas, etc., under Sir Michael Costa's control, produced a unique effect. There was no concerted music, not even a duet or a trio. The effect, in consequence, was somewhat monotonous. Mme. Adelina Patti, however, being one of the solo singers, the vast audience were more than satisfied, applauding her unanimously in "Let the bright seraphim" (Samson), and insisting upon a repetition of "From mighty kings," (Judas Macabæus)—both in her hands models of taste and perfect execution. All the leading singers took part in the concert, which ended in triumph with "See the conquering hero comes" (Joshua). Sir Michael Costa, conducted with his accustomed vigor, and that perfect command of a multitude of singers and players in which he is unsurpassed and unsurpassable.—Graphic.

"Israel in Egypt" brought the Festival to an end on Friday (25th ult.) with all possible distinction, save that the audience did not appear to be quite as large as on the preceding days. A better performance has never distinguished a Handel Festival. It was not perfect, we admit, and no reasonable person, knowing the difficulties in the way, expected it would be, but perfection was more nearly approached than ever before. This fact had a striking exemplification in "The people shall hear," where Handel disregards the convenience of his singers much as Beethoven might have done. In this chorus, generally so unsteady and ragged, the choir showed a marked improvement, and the effect of the wonderful music proportionately gained. The less exacting numbers went thoroughly well, enthusiastic applause following "He gave them hailstones" (encored), "The horse and his rider," "But as for His people," "But the waters overwhelmed their enemies," and other favorite examples of the master in his most gigantic aspect. To sum up, the choral display on this occasion satisfied the most exigent. It was an achievement justifying Englishmen in making as much boast as befits the modesty imposed on natives of a land which by the general verdict of foreigners is "unmusical." The solos can be briefly dismissed. They were intrusted to Madame Sherrington, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Bridson, and Mr. King, the honors falling to Mr. Lloyd in "The enemy said" (encored), and Madame Patey in "Thou shalt bring them in." At the close of the performance loud cheers were raised in honor of Sir Michael Costa, and by way of mutual congratulation upon the result of a Festival worthy to rank among the best of those given in the Crystal Palace.

The total attendance was 79,643, being 5,519 more than in 1877, and 804 more than in 1874.—Musical Times, July 1.

LONDON.—Of the Opera, Figaro (June 26) makes note as follows:

There have been no novelties at Covent Garden, but "Le Pré aux Clercs" is announced for to-night, and "Estella" for next Saturday.

On Saturday Mr. Mapleson revived "The Force of Destiny," with the alterations made by Verdi after the failure of the opera in St. Petersburg and London. That this tinkering-up of a feeble work will cause the public of to-day to reverse the verdict of thirteen years ago is unlikely. Piave's libretto still smacks too much of the charnel-house to excite sympathy, while the music is some of the poorest Verdi has ever written. Some of the incongruities which rendered the opera ridiculous in 1867 have now been eliminated, and although a good deal of stage blood is still spilt, much of the butchery is done behind the scenes. The Don Carlos no longer chases his stage sister round the stage, the floor is not now strewn with corpses, and we miss the spectacle presented by Signor Mongini, who, finding he was the only man still alive at the fall of the curtain, rushed up the scene to a mimic rock and plunged himself in effigy into the torrent below. The Alvaro now lives to repent, less of any particular crime than of the offence of participating in a tedious story. Signor Verdi is at his brightest in the camp scene, in which a friar, clad in a costume which strangely resembled the dressing-gown of the comic stage-father, sang a song on a tub; and Mme. Trebelli, beating a drum at the head of 80 full-grown men and women, sang a "Rataplan," the males safely concealed behind the females accompanying her with the words "Pim, pam, pum." No more ridiculous situation is to be found in modern opera. It would be waste alike of space and of patience to criticize with seriousness the efforts of the Leonora, Mme. Marie Louise Swift; and the revival of "The Force of Destiny" will only engender a feeling of regret that money and trouble have been wasted upon an opera that is unworthy of either.

The Henry Leslie Choir gave the first of their farewell concerts at St. James's Hall, June 19, there being yet two more to follow before the choir is disbanded. The choir was on Saturday heard in Bach's Motet, "The Spirit also helpeth us"; in a "Pater Noster" by Meyerbeer, in Mr. Leslie's part song, "The Pilgrims"; in Wilbye's madrigal, "Sweet sucking bees"; in Festa's "Down in a flowery vale," and other favorite works of their repertory. A new and pretty part song, "It is not always May," by Mr. J. F. Barnett, was also given and repeated. Mlle. Renz, who made her debut, was hardly equal to the solo part of Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," Madame Patey sang the cradle song from Mr. Leslie's "First Christmas Morn," and Mr. Maas sang "Cujus Animam."—Ibid.

A new opera entitled "The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan," composed by Villiers Stanford, organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, is to be performed (presumably in German) at Hannover during the winter season.

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.—The series of nine concerts thus designated have terminated successfully, and to the infinite honor of the magnificent Viennese conductor. The nine symphonies of Beethoven have been given, as promised, in chronological order, and though the third ("Eroica"), fifth (C minor), and seventh (A major) created an extraordinary impression, the ninth (the "Choral") perhaps excited more interest than any of its precursors. St. James's Hall was thronged on the occasion, and some hundreds of eager amateurs were unable at any price to obtain admission. Mozart's inimitable Symphony in G minor began, and the "No. 9" of Beethoven ended the concert. The bitterest enemy of Richard Wagner could not have dealt him a severer blow than by placing the introduction and death scene from Tristan und Isolde between the symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven. How little this strange and tortured music had to do with the earlier master, who died nearly a quarter of a century before Wagner was born, and will live centuries after Wagner is forgotten, was at once seen; but still more apparent was the monstrous assertion of the "advanced" party that Beethoven's noblest inspiration is but a link between the past glories of art and the incommensurable nonsense we are now told to accept as the art work of the future, and of which such amazing specimens were presented at the seventh Richter concert in the shape of Wagner's "Kaiser March" and Liszt's "Battle of the Huns"—each an outrage to art and a defiance of common sense. The effrontery of such wild empirics in making a stepping-stone of a Colossus like Beethoven surpasses comprehension. But for the Tristan selection, so absurdly out of place, the programme was as interesting as the performance was superb. At the conclusion, Herr Richter was enthusiastically cheered—an honor in the highest sense merited.—Graphic.

UTRECHT. We have before us the handsome pamphlet programme and book of words of a musical festival held in this old Dutch city on the 4th, 5th and 6th of June. It will interest Bostonians from the fact that our own favorite young soprano, Miss Lillian Bailey, together with her teacher and affianced lover, Henschel, the baritone, took part in it. Other principal singers were: Mlle. Hohenschild, alto, from Berlin, and Herr Raymond von Zurmühlen, tenor, from Frankfurt; pianist, Carl Heymann, from Frankfurt. The programme of the first day consisted of the first three parts and the first chorus from the fourth part of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, followed by the second Symphony (in D) by Brahms.—Second day: Concert Overture in C minor, by R. Hol; Des Sängers Fluch, Ballad by Schumann, Op. 139, for chorus, soli and orchestra; Beethoven's E-flat piano Concerto; and Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht, for chorus, soli, and orchestra.—Third day, matinée for chamber-music: String Quartet in E minor, Op. 15, by S. de Lange; two songs with piano, Beethoven, (1. Irish: "Sad and luckless," 2. Scotch: "Faithful Johnie"), sung by Miss Bailey; piano solos: 1. G-minor Fugue, Bach-Liszt, 2. Barcarole, Chopin, 3. Elfenspiel, C. Heymann; three songs ("Wohin," "Pause," "Eifersucht und Stolz") from Schubert's Schöne Müllerin, G. Henschel; Serbische Liederspiel, Op. 32, (ten Servian folk-songs, for soprano, alto, tenor and bass,) by G. Henschel; Female choruses, with accompaniment of two horns, harp and piano, Op. 18, by Brahms, (1. "Es tönt ein voller Harfenklang"; 2. Lied von Shakespeare; 3. "Der Gärtner"; 4. Gesang aus Fingal); Duets: a, "Tanzlied," by Schumann, b, "So lass uns wandern," Op. 75, Brahms, sung by Mlle. Hohenschild and Herr Zurmühlen; Kreutzer Sonata of Beethoven, played by Herren Heymann and H. Petri.

It seems odd that a musical festival in Utrecht should not include Handel's Utrecht Te Deum and Jubilate in its programme; but doubtless they have given these in former festivals.

LEIPZIG. The Carola Theatre opens for a six weeks' season of "model" operatic performances by some of the most eminent lyric artists from the leading theatres in Germany, including those of Dessau, Hamburg, Brunswick, Munich, Dresden, Schwerin, Karlsruhe, Bremen and Stuttgart. The operas to be given are: Fidelio, (Beethoven); Don Juan, Die Zauberflöte, Die Entführung, Figaro's Hochzeit, and Der Schauspielerdirector (Mozart); Der betrogene Cadi (Gluck); La Serva Padrona (Pergolesi); Euryanthe (Weber); Der Vampyr and Hans Heiling (Marschner); Lohengrin (R. Wagner); Il Barbiere and Guillaume Tell (Rossini); Jean de Paris and La Dame Blanche (Boieldieu); Le Maçon and Fra Diavolo (Auber); Le Postillon de Longjumeau (Adam); Der Waffenschmied and Czaar und Zimmermann (Lortzing); Jessonda (Spohr); and Der Haideschatz (F. von Holstein).—Herr and Mad. Vogl, from the Theatre Royal, Munich, opened an engagement at the Stadttheater with Lohengrin, followed by Armida and Tannhäuser. They were subsequently to sing in the Nibelungenring, Materna and Jäger being also included in the cast.

BADEN-BADEN. The annual meeting of the "Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein," held this year in Baden-Baden, under the direction of Franz Liszt, was a brilliant one. The point d'appui of the performance was, of course, the Abbé's "Christus," an oratorio in name, but in little else, for it is an utter deviation from the traditional oratorio form and style. The words of the evangelist instead of being sung in recitative are intoned, and the main part of the work consists of powerful choruses or instrumental movements. The lyrical character of the oratorio is discarded entirely, and Herr Liszt's "Christus" may be regarded as a return to the early earnest spirit of the music of the Romish church. Among other works performed were Weisshelmer's "Meister Martin," and an original and it would appear boldly humorous symphony by the Russian composer, Borodin. Mons. Saint-Saëns and Gustav Holländer also appeared, the former directing his "Phaeton," the latter as the interpreter of a concerto of his own for the violin.—London Musical Standard, June 19.

BERLIN.—Goethe's Faust is being arranged for the stage by Otto Devrient, the music by Edouard Lassen; it is to be performed at the Victoria Theatre. Faust will be thus divided into two distinct parts, with two scores; so it will require two performances. The work has already made its mark—it was executed at Weimar two years ago.—M. E. Rudorff has been unanimously elected director of the "Sternsche Gesangverein," in the place of Max Bruch. Before M. Bruch takes his departure for Liverpool he will preside over the performance of his grand cantata Ulysses.

At a quiet secluded spot, in one of the most pleasant parts of the Thiergarten, near the Brandenburg Gate, the ceremony of solemnly unveiling the Goethe Monument was celebrated at 11 o'clock, A. M., on the second inst. Opposite the site and on the western side of the park, a stand had been erected for the Emperor, the Crown Prince, Prince Wilhelm, and the Meiningen Princes, with other distinguished personages. The Empress, now at Baden, expressed in an autograph letter to the committee, her regret at not being able to attend. All round the site were stands and platforms for the Ministers of State and other high government officials, military officers, municipal authorities, representatives of art, literature, and the press, and others who had received invitations. The only relative of Goethe's present was Mad. von Stralendorff, granddaughter of Mad. Nicolavius, the poet's sister. In front of the statue, to the right, were the members of the committee, headed by their chairman, Dr. von Löper, a great Goethe-scholar, while to the left were the members of the magistracy and of the corporation. The approaches to the open space round the monument were lined on both sides by representatives of the Academy of Arts, the University, the Technical High School, etc., with their respective emblems. Punctually at 11 o'clock, a band concealed from view and under the direction of Joachim struck up the chorus, arranged for brass instruments; "Welche Hoheit, welche Anmuth," from Gluck's Iphigenie in Aulis. This was followed by the speech in which Dr. Löper delivered over the statue to the town of Berlin. The speaker began by observing that Vienna had recently erected a monument to Beethoven, who came from the Rhine, and that Bonn had raised one to Robert Schumann, a native of Saxony, and that, therefore, it was a matter of more than ordinary congratulation that Berlin, the capital of the newly-united German Empire, was that day discharging a debt of honor bequeathed her by men like Wilhelm Grimm and Böckh. The covering bow fell to the ground, and the splendid marble monument, the work of Fritz Schapel, stood revealed. Herr von Forckenbeck, chief-burgomaster, replied in a few words to Dr. Van Löper, and the proceedings closed with a chorus of Goethe's, set by Zelter. Wreaths and garlands were laid at the base of the monument by the admirers of the poet, and later in the day there was a grand dinner.

ST. PETERSBURGH. Besides A. Rubinstein's Kalashnikov, The Merchant of St. Petersburg, and Wagner's Rienzi, the list of novelties at the Russian opera house included A Night in May by Rimsky-Korsakoff, who himself wrote the libretto, constructed upon one of Gogol's stories. Goldmark's Königin von Saba, performed by the Italian Company at the close of the season was not so well received. A concert was given by the Free School of Music, assisted by the band from the Russian Opera, under the direction of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Several interesting novelties were given, noticeable among them being the symphony, Jeanne d'Arc, by Moszkowsky; Les Troiennes, by Hector Berlioz; choruses from Liszt's Prometheus; scenes from Borodin's Igor and Korsakoff's Psikovitjanka. Charles Davidoff's last composition, a sextet, has been performed at a concert of the Association for Chamber music. The works of other native composers contributing to the programmes of the Association have been Tchaikowsky's second Quartet, Fitzenhagen's ditto, and Afanasjeff's Double Quartet. The concert-season, limited, properly speaking, to the short period of the grand fasts, was, nevertheless, a busy one. The concert which made the most stir was that of Anton Rubinstein. The net receipts exceeded five thousand roubles. The Imperial Russian Musical Society organized a concert in aid of the Fund for Musicians, when Professor Brassin played a pianoforte concerto of his own composition, and Professor Auer, Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Mad. Lawrowskaja, also, figured on the list of solo artists.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

Many of the arrangements for the coming season of the Handel and Haydn society have been decided upon, though the possibility of a failure in the supply of suitable vocalists may necessitate some changes in the works contemplated during the winter. The regular performance of the Messiah will of course be given at Christmas, this grand work being announced for the Sunday following the holiday. About a month later it is proposed to give a performance of Mozart's R-requiem Mass, last given in March, 1857, and Beethoven's Mount of Olives, heard here last in March, 1837. On Good Friday a performance of selections from Bach's Passion Music will be given, the numbers to be chosen so that the performance shall be of average length. On Easter Sunday evening, the last oratorio of the season will be presented, but the choice of the work has not yet been made. Aside from this regular season, it is more than probable that the society will be heard in the Messiah and Elijah during the first week in October at the new Tremont Temple. It is about decided that a performance of one or the other of these works shall constitute the opening attraction at the new hall on Monday evening, October 4, and some other work will probably be presented by the society during the opening week, a series of musical attractions being contemplated to celebrate the completion of the edifice.—Herald.

So far, good. But is not the complete success of the experiment of giving the entire Passion Music in two performances on Good Friday, year before last, worthy to be repeated, and to become as much an annual observance, as the singing of the Messiah at Christmas?

—Mr. B. J. Lang is considering the idea of giving, late in the coming season, a number of Symphony Concerts, in a hall of moderate dimensions, with an audience exclusively of subscribers for the season. This plan, perhaps through a certain piquant attraction of real or seeming exclusiveness, has worked well in the Chamber Concerts of the Euterpe: why may it not upon a larger scale?

—The Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, says the Herald, will give but five concerts in this city during the coming season, instead of the larger number at first contemplated.

—The Mendelssohn Quintet club has returned home to Boston after a very brilliantly successful concert trip of 19 weeks. Miss Abbie Carrington has proved an excellent vocalist for the club during their tour, and won favor throughout the western circuit.

—Mr. S. B. Whitney, organist at the Church of the Advent, in this city, gave an organ recital at Beverly, on Tuesday evening, June 15th, on the new organ in the Unitarian Church. This is the 998th organ that has been built at the factory of Messrs. Hook & Hastings, and takes the place of an old instrument which was the Op. 28 of the same firm.

WELLESLEY COLLEGE. Here is the programme of the 75th concert, Friday evening, June 11th, by the pupils, with the assistance of Mr. C. N. Allen, Prof. C. H. Morse, and Miss Mary E. Turner, teacher of vocal culture:

- Concerto in D minor, * Mozart.
a, Allegro, * b, Romanza.
Miss Skeele.
- Song—"Expectancy" Buck.
Capriccio Brilliant, Op. 22, in E minor, * Mendelssohn.
Miss Richardson.
- Song—"Angels' Serenade" Braga.
(Violin Obligato.)
Miss Emerson.
- Ballade in G minor, Op. 23, Chopin.
Miss Lyman.
- Song—"It was a Dream," Cowen.
Miss Stowe.
- Symphonic Poem—"Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns.
(As arranged by the composer for two Piano-fortes.)
Miss Telford and Miss Bell.
- Song—"Spring Flowers," Reinecke.
(Violin Obligato.)
Miss M. M. Cleary.
- Piano Solos—"On the Mountains," Op. 10-1, Grieg.
b, "Norwegian Bridal Procession
Passing by," Op. 19-2, Grieg.
Miss Jones.
- Song—"Heavenward," Tours.
Miss Rollins.
- Violin Solos—"a, Cavatina, Raff.
b, Gavotte, Popper.
c, Slumber Song, Alard.
d, Ungarisch, Hauser.
Mr. C. N. Allen.
- Concerto in A minor, * Hummel.
(Last Movement.)
Miss L. C. Bell.
- Songs—"a, 'The Lark,' Rubinstein.
b, 'Dormi pure,' Scuderi.
Miss Shearn.
- Concerto in E flat, No. 5, Op. 73, * Beethoven.
Adagio un poco moto—Rondo.
*Orchestral parts on second piano.

The 78th (June 21) was a Chamber Concert, the performers being Messrs. B. and F. Listemann, violins; Mullaly, viola; A. Heindl, cello; E. Strasser, clarinet; P. Elitz, bassoon; E. Schormann, horn, and H. A. Greene, contra-bass. The selections were: Mozart's Quintet, No. 9, with clarinet; Raff's Quartet, (No. 7, Op. 192), "The Miller's Pretty Daughter," a cycle of tone-poems; and Beethoven's Septet with all the instruments.

WORCESTER, MASS. Among the soloists engaged for the Festival in September, are Miss Lillian Bailey, and the famous baritone of London, Mr. George Henschel, whom she is about to marry; also, Mrs. J. M. Osgood (who makes the trip home for this engagement), Mr. M. W. Whitney, Mr. W. C. Tower, and Mr. Adamowski, the Polish violinist, now in London for a short season.

NEW YORK. Mr. J. H. Mapleson, (according to Figaro, June 26) has decided not to open his American season until after the Presidential election, and to remain in England until October. His New York season will, therefore, not begin until November 1. He has, however, practically settled the details of his prospectus, which may now be announced. The sopranos will in all probability, be headed by Madame Gerster, Madame Marie Roze, Miss Minnie Hauck, Mlle. Lilli Lehmann, and Mrs. Swift, while the chief contralto will be Mlle. Tremelli. The tenors will be MM. Campanini, Candidum, Frapolli, and perhaps Fancelli, and the basses MM. Galassi, Pantaleoni, Del Puente, and Nannetti. Such a troupe would be a strong one, even without the assistance of Madame Christine Nilsson, with whom negotiations are still pending. Should Mme. Nilsson come to terms, she would play Semiramide, Valentina, Elsa, and very likely Norma; Madame Gerster will resume the rôles of the light soprano; Miss Hauck will, of course, play Carmen, while Mme. Marie Roze, who has refused an engagement under Mr. Max Strakosch in order to continue with Mr. Mapleson, will perform the great dramatic parts formerly in the repertory of Titians. The novelty of the American season will be Boito's oft-promised "Mefistofele," with, should Madame Nilsson be engaged, that lady in the part of Margaret. The conductor will be Signor Arditi, and the American season will be preceded by a short tour in the English provinces.

—Strakosch advertises as something new, a "Grand International Opera Company," for next season. Although not heretofore advertised, the "international" has been the distinguishing feature of the Strakosch Italian opera for several seasons. The principal artists during the last two years have been the Americans, Kellogg, Cary, Litta, Marco, Lancaster, Adams, Graf, Gottschalk, Verdi (Green), and Conly; the English, Palmiera, Marie Roze, Tom Karl, and Carleton; the French, Castelmary; the Spanish, Martinez; the Germans, Teresa Singer, Behrens, leader, and Behrens, basso, and the Russian, Petrovich. Indeed, the Italian was the only nationality not prominent in the Strakosch Italian Opera, the only representatives of the land of song being a second-rate contralto, Belocca; a little light tenor, Lazzarini; old Brignoli; and two baritones, Pantaleoni and Storti. These, with a good German orchestra and a bad Italian chorus, constituted a genuine international opera company, with which Strakosch managed to lose $40,000 last season. International English opera will meet the same fate. People will not put up with such indifferent acting in English as characterizes the average Italian opera singer.—Sunday Mirror, Philadelphia.

BUFFALO, N. Y. The Music Teachers' National Association, in convention at Buffalo, has listened to elaborate papers on subjects relating to their calling from Mr. Eugene Thayer and S. A. Emery, of this city, and Mr. H. G. Hanchett of St. Louis, and to an address (in the course of a debate), by Mr. W. H. Sherwood, of Boston, on "Music, its Relation to Piano Playing." The discussion was opened by Mr. Sherwood, whose remarks are thus reported: "There is," he said, "a great mental discipline to be obtained from the study of any important subject, and, of course, so of music." He called attention to Dr. Mason's writings on practice, which should be slow enough to allow perfect mastery. Some masters made a great mistake with beginners in not giving them an incentive which will give them an interest in their studies. Give them cause to climb instead of merely trying to push them. The second order of practice, according to Dr. Mason, was to go from one thing to another without stopping. The third order of practice was in velocity. If the slow, mechanical practice were carried too far, as in the German conservatories, the pupil became a mere drudge. There was very little danger of that in this country as yet. "Now what is music?" asked Mr. Sherwood. "What is music?" he asked. "There are probably few here who could give a good definition of it." He related an anecdote in the life of Rubinstein, who, after playing some magnificent numbers of Beethoven and other masters, was approached by a man who complimented him upon his execution, asked why he did not play more music "for the soul." "Whose soul?" asked Rubinstein. "In America," said Mr. Sherwood, "there are too many people of the mind of Rubinstein's questioner. They like the simple airs like 'Home, Sweet Home,' and do not find any enjoyment in classical music. It ought to be the aim of music teachers to instil a love for the great, immortal musical powers of Beethoven, Mozart and the other great masters. There is more music written for the piano than for any other instrument, and an immense amount of it is bad. If the piano had the power of prolonging a tone indefinitely and of swelling it, it would be the most perfect instrument in existence. As it is, both the organ and the human voice have immense advantages over the piano. For this reason it is much easier to please an audience by a simple ballad than by piano playing. It ought to be our duty to make piano playing as attractive as possible. Music ought to be alive to be effective. It makes a great deal of difference whether the piano be struck with a stick, with mechanical fingers, or with fingers that are full of life and magnetism. I have examined Rubinstein's hand and arm and found that they are not only full of magnetism, but that they are extremely elastic and the fingers are so soft that the bones are scarcely to be felt. Can practice produce these qualities? I believe so, and I make it a point both with my pupils and myself to practice slow motions. It is much easier to strike quickly than slowly, and practice in the slow movements will develop both muscular and nervous power. And the tone made by this motion is much better than that obtained by striking. The mechanical practice in vogue at Leipzig and other European conservatories often fails because the subject of aesthetics and tone beauties are neglected." Mr. Sherwood carried out this line of thought a little more in detail and then turned to the mechanical movement of the hand and wrist, illustrating the difference between well and ill balanced playing. Mr. A. H. Pease and Mr. W. H. Sherwood have given recitals of piano music with signal success. Mr. Sherwood's programme included a Liszt-Bach fugue, a Beethoven sonata, Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," a barcarolle by Rubinstein, and polonaise by Chopin, the Bülow-Wagner "Faust Overture" and the Liszt polonaise in E. The local paper says the "real excitement showed how well the great pianist was appreciated."

To the above, from the Transcript, it may be added that organ recitals were given by Mr. Eugene Thayer, and by Mr. W. Kaffenberger, of Buffalo; the former playing Handel's twelfth Organ Concerto, Bach's Vorspiel, "Wir glauben all," Schumann's "Skizzen," Nos. 4 and 2, Op. 58, Guilmant's Caprice in B flat, and a Concert Fugue, a Chromatic Fantasia, and Variations on Old Hundred of his own composition. The latter played a Fantasia Sonata by Rheinberger; Allegretto, "Marche Funèbre and Chant Seraphique," by Guilmant; Choral in three voices, by Merkel, "Keigen" by Jensen, and a grand Toccata by Widor. Mr. Thayer, also, delivered an address on "Reform in Church Music," which seems to have met with great favor; and Dr. Carl Seiler, of Philadelphia, read a lecture with interesting illustrations, on "Vocal Acoustics."

NEW ORLEANS. M. de Beauplan, who, it will be remembered, visited this country with his wife, Mme. Ambre, last season, is the first to announce the plan of his operatic scheme for next season. It is interesting reading, through some parts of it recall the brilliant prospectus of flush times a decade ago. M. de Beauplan's centre of operations will be New Orleans, where he has subscriptions for a four months' season, ending on March 15th, '81, and subsequently the company will visit Chicago, Philadelphia, New York and Boston. Official information regarding the scheme is as follows:

"The repertoire will be something of a change from what we have had for some years, as you can see by the following: The Jewess, 'Violetta,' 'Faust,' 'William Tell,' 'Trovatore,' 'Norma,' 'Africaine,' 'Mignon,' 'Robert the Devil,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Favorita,' 'The Barber of Seville,' 'Charles VI,' 'The Prophet,' 'Huguenots,' 'Hamlet,' 'Lucia,' 'Don Juan,' 'Jerusalem,' 'Oberon,' 'The Queen of Cyprus,' 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' 'Freischütz,' 'Don Pasquale,' 'L'Etoile du Nord,' 'Romeo and Juliet,' 'Aida,' 'Carmen,' 'Paul and Virginia,' etc.

"The company will be a grand one in every respect, numbering nearly 200 persons. One of the first prima donnas will be Mme. Emilie Ambre, who sang last season in this country with Col. Mapleson's Italian opera. M. de Beauplan has just signed a contract with one of the greatest tenors in Europe, M. Tournes, and at a very high salary, 20,000 francs a month for a season of six months. It is stipulated in his contract that for non-fulfilment of the same, he forfeits 200,000 francs. It was in doubt for some time whether he would stay with M. Vaucorbell, the director of grand opera, Paris, but the inducements offered to him in the way of money, etc., decided it, notwithstanding the tempting offer of M. Vaucorbell for Tournes to create the tenor rôle in the new opera of Ambrose Thomas, (which is to be brought out this coming fall in Paris) of 'Françoise de Rimini.' The stage will be in charge of Mr. Lablache. This gentleman is a professor of the Conservatory of Paris, and has been in charge of the principal opera houses in St. Petersburg, Havana, and Cairo, Egypt. In the latter place it was under his direction that 'Aida' was first brought out, and from which the representations since throughout Europe and America are only copies, that is, in the way of stage setting, properties, etc. Mr. Momas has been engaged as director of the music and conductor. He has, until lately, been the musical director of the Lyric Theatre, and ranks as one of the great conductors of the day.

"Mr. Jordan, the most celebrated basso in Europe, and who has just finished a long season in Russia, has signed for the season here in the States, and Mlle. Lablache, daughter of Mme. Lablache, contralto with Col. Mapleson, will be one of the prima donnas. Her voice is similar to Mme. Gerster's, only stronger. She is young and very pretty. M. de Beauplan is negotiating for other artists, of whom due notice will be given. We shall have the pleasure of hearing in Boston next season Les Huguenots in French, comprising the last act, which has been so often omitted in Italian. We shall have L'Africaine and a number of others, with which Bostonians have not been familiar for years."—Boston Herald.

THE MUSICAL VERSIONS OF
GOETHE'S "FAUST."BY ADOLPHE JULLIEN.¹

V.—THE "FAUST" OF BERLIOZ.

[We deem it unnecessary to translate what the author has to say of the origin and of the contents of La Damnation de Faust, since it does not differ substantially from what has already appeared in this journal at the time when the work was first performed in New York and Boston, during the last Spring. (See pages 36, 49, 58, 87 of this volume.) We will only give the closing paragraph of the chapter, and pass on to the next, which treats of Schumann's Faust music, and will be comparatively new to English readers.]

The Damnation of Faust, we must recognize in conclusion, is a work of the greatest value. Berlioz has been served in this perilous attempt by an imagination of the richest order, highly excited by the grandeur of the work and by the ideal beauty of the model. Even when he departs from the original text, and when, combining after his own fashion various episodes, he brings forth a totally different situation, such as the love-scene interrupted by the arrival of the demon, the musician feels himself still sustained by the poet, and his inspirations gush forth just as richly and as grandly. It is, assuredly, a work worthy to figure in the future by the side of the original drama, one which, like the designs of Delacroix, would have snatched from Goethe, could he but have heard it, a word of admiration. How welcome would that word have been in Paris! How that encouragement, coming from so high a source, would have brought to the composer a just consolation for the criticisms and the raileries for which he was the mark! Unfortunately, Goethe had long been dead when the French musician produced his work, and nothing came to sustain him in this trial but the conviction of having by his labor made the work of a veritable artist, and the rare delight of having been, during this assiduous intimacy, the pious disciple of that illustrious master.

VI.—THE "FAUST" OF SCHUMANN.

Faust—with Manfred, with the Pilgrimage of the Rose, with Genoveva, with Paradise and the Peri,—is one of the master-works of Schumann; unhappily he had not time to finish it. It was his favorite work. He had occupied himself with it from the age of thirteen years, and he returned to it con amore in the moments when he felt himself the best inspired. In fact few subjects offered to his eminently poetic genius a more living spring of graceful or fantastic inspirations. No one, better than he, could have known how to paint the tormented character of the doctor, or the gentle figure of Marguerite; no one could have lent a more satanic color to the demon. But it was above all, the second Faust, a work all ideality and fantasy, that must have charmed and inspired his nature so inclined to mystery and reverie. Accordingly in this interpretation, by him alone attempted, of the life-like or the abstract conceptions of the poet, he has lifted himself to a great height. Several of the most remarkable pieces of this second part were written by the composer in the midst of the political storm of 1848, which, by a singular phenomenon, seems to have given new nerve to his creative faculties. "I have to thank God," he wrote at that time to Ferdinand Hiller, "that he vouchsafes me, in such times, the courage and the faculty to labor!" And again elsewhere: "Let us work while it is day."²

And so he did. Toward 1850 he at last finished, not his entire work, but the second part. He wrote then the last two pieces, and judging, as by a melancholy presentiment, that he would not have time to complete the first part of his work, he collected the various fragments which he had put into music, and preceded them by a grand instrumental introduction. "I have worked much in these latter times," he writes, toward the end of 1853 to M. Strackerjan, a young officer who was a great amateur of music, "I have written a Faust overture, the crown of the edifice of a series of scenes drawn from the tragedy." Does it not seem, to look at this unfinished work, like a cruel irony of fate, which, of so many composers, imposes silence precisely upon that one, who comprehended the conceptions of the poet best of all, who thought (so to say) his thoughts, and translated them with genius into the inimitable language of music?

It is not a dramatic legend that Schumann has professed to write, still less an opera; he has simply taken the poem, the very text of the master, and put it into music. There could not be a simpler manner of proceeding; and none could serve the musician better; thus his work is better than a translation, it is a veritable musical transfiguration of the drama of Goethe. The Faust of Schumann comprises three parts. The first, unfortunately very incomplete, counts only three detached scenes. The second includes several fragments of the second Faust; at the beginning, the scene of Ariel and the Sylphs, then various episodes: Midnight, the scene of the four witches, the dialogue of the doctor with Care, and the death of Faust. Finally, the third part, the only one that is complete, contains only the final scene of the second Faust, but it is much the most considerable scene, thanks to the grand developments which the composer has given it.

The overture, which Schumann has placed at the head of his work, bears the impress of his genius. At once proud and charming, full of grace and of terror, it gives a marvellously good ensemble of this admirable poem. And the musician, in these inspired pages, written late in life, does he not seem to exclaim with the poet, in the dedication of Faust:

Once more, sweet visions, are ye floating hither —
Forms, who of old oft gladdened my dim sight!
Shall I now hold you, Beautiful, together?
Years my heart still for that illusion bright?
Nearer ye throng! Let not your beauty wither,
As from the misty cloud it bursts in light.
How with the joy of youth my bosom springs,
Breathing the magic air shook from your dewy wings!

The three scenes of the first Faust which Schumann had time to write are: the scene of the garden, that of the church, and of Marguerite imploring the image of the Virgin. In each of these pages he has endeavored to translate the spirit and the very word of the poet. Others will expend themselves upon the same scenes (the garden and the church) with lengthier developments adapted to the exigencies of the stage; no one will put more of veiled charm and infinite tenderness into the first avowal of the two lovers; no one will overwhelm the tardy repentance of the unfortunate Marguerite with a more terrific Dies iræ.

The garden scene, that chaste prattle of two souls yet pure, is one of exquisite melody; the phrase of Faust excusing himself for having taken the young girl's hand has a penetrating suavity, as well as the timid response of Marguerite. She plucks a flower and pulls off its petals, and the sweet murmur of the orchestra accompanies with burning words spoken in a low voice. "He loves me!" she cries, and Faust with transport launches forth an admirable melody, which seems to bear his cry of triumph up to heaven. All, in this music, all, even to the dry laugh of the demon, paraphrases in an inimitable style the original scene, the garden of Martha.

Schumann and Prince Radziwill alone have had the idea of treating the scene where Marguerite implores the Mater Dolorosa, while dragging herself to the foot of the holy image. What an admirable page the affrighted supplications of the fair sinner have inspired the master of Zwickau with! At first her prayer is full of unctiousness, but grief tortures her at the thought of finding the mother of Christ inflexible, and she cries out with a panting voice: "Come, save me from shame and death. Deign, O mother of griefs, to cast down one look of pity upon my distress."

As for the scene of the church, Schumann makes an untranslatable creation out of it. Never has music expressed with more force the ardent repentance of the guilty girl, the railing and burning imprecations of the demon. And when the crushing appeals of the choir break out, it seems as if the earth opened, ready to engulf the unhappy victim, so pure yet in her shame.

After these pictures of a passionate and terrifying color, the author abandons himself, in the scene of Ariel and the Sylphs, to his most dreamy inspirations. The veiled arpeggios of the harp transport us to the ethereal regions where the gentle voice of genius enchants us by its sweet cantilenas. It is the very scene which opens the second Faust: An agreeable ² Notice of M. Ernouf on Schumann (Revue Contemporaine, Jan. 31, 1864). There exist, as yet, in French, but two complete works on Schumann: that of M. Ernouf, who, the first in France, has rendered homage to the musician of genius, and the biography by Wasielensky, which has appeared in Le Ménestrel, translated in a very fantastical fashion by M. F. Herzog.

landscape. Scarcely is the voice of Ariel hushed, when the doctor comes out of his strange dream and sings a canticle of thanksgiving to the day that dawns, to nature re-awakening; this exquisite melody is deliciously accompanied by the altos and the violoncellos. But doubt is born again within this troubled soul, and the music, changing character, paints to our ears his unappeased desires, his distracting anguish.

Midnight.—It is the dreary chant of the Gray Old Women, Guilt, Want, Misery. It is the exulting cry of Care, who glides in where her sisters cannot penetrate. "The door is closed, we cannot enter. It is the abode of a rich man, we do not wish to enter." "You, my sisters, cannot and dare not enter; Care slips through the key-hole." Faust appears, his soul the victim of a dull inquietude. "Hast thou never known Care?" asks the malignant genius. "No," replies the Doctor in an air full of warmth, accompanied by an incessant figure of the orchestra, true image of life's whirling vortex. "I have done nothing but rove about the world; I caught each pleasure by the hair; what did not content me, I let it go; what escaped me, I let it run. I have only desired and satisfied my desires, and still continued to wish more." But Care responds in a chant full of bodiful menace: "To him, whom I once possess, the whole world is useless. Eternal shades descend upon him; the sun does not rise, nor does it set; with senses perfectly sound, darkness dwells within him; if he owned all treasures, he would not know how to enjoy them." The doctor laughs at the absurd anger of the witch, and refuses to recognize her power. "Try it then!" cries Care, who breathes in his face as she flies away; and Faust, made blind, loses himself in senseless projects, in dreams unrealizable. This scene, so abstract as it is, has found in Schumann a musician equal to it; for he has rendered this struggle between man and Care in a very moving manner.

The great court before the palace.—such is the scene which Schumann has literally translated from the original poem, under this title: The Death of Faust. At the beginning, the fantastic scene of the demon evoking the Lemures and exhorting them, with a strange laugh, to dig a grave, the fatal end of all human existence. It is needless to say with what sombre color, with what sinister tones Schumann has painted this strange episode, as well as the appearance of Faust, awakened by the dull sound of the spades, and issuing from the palace stumbling against the door-posts. Even now, on the brink of the grave, the doctor gives himself up to the most chimerical projects. To toil, to sow, to embellish, to construct,—such are the last dreams of the man who is about to die. "Let it be given to me to see such a movement on a free territory, with a free people, and I will say to the passing moment: 'Stop! thou art so beautiful! The trace of my terrestrial days cannot be lost in the course of ages. . . . In the presentiment of so great a felicity, I taste the most beautiful moment of my life!'" And Faust falls backward into the pit dug under his feet by the phantoms, amidst harsh bursts of laughter from the Devil.

The last chapter of the second Faust, entitled: Forests, Rocks, Ravines, Solitudes, has furnished Schumann the canvas of his third part, and inspired him with a long suite of admirable pieces. What can be more fresh than the first chorus with its sweet responses: "The forest waves, the rocks weigh heavily around, the clinging roots intertwine, trunks lean against trunks, waves dash upon waves; the deep grotto shelters us; the lions creep about us, silent and caressing; they respect the consecrated place, love's holy sanctuary!" What more inspired than the invocation of Pater extaticus, with its figure of violoncellos enlacing the melodic phrase like a flowering ivy round the arches of an ancient cloister? What canticle more full of unction than that of Pater profundus: "O God! appease my thoughts, enlighten my heart which seeks for thee!" What melody more vaporous than that of Pater seraphicus? What song more full of a holy ardor than that of the Blessed Boys, beginning with a caressing melody, then bursting out in brilliant concert, in a burning hymn of thanksgiving: "Tell us, Father, whither we are going; tell us, good Father, who we are? We are happy; for all, yes all of us, it is so sweet to live."

Another marvelous piece of grace and freshness is the Chorus of Angels hovering in the upper air and bearing the immortal part of Faust: "Saved is the noble member of the world of spirits, saved from evil. He who always strives, him can we deliver, and if even Love has taken interest in him from above, the troop of the blest meets him with hearty welcome." One knows not what to prefer in this marvelous page, the songs of the perfected angels, or those of the younger angels, the grand final ensemble, or the seraphic murmur of the little choir of happy boys: "With joy receive we this one in the chrysalis state; in him we obtain an angelic pledge. Remove the slough that envelops him; already is he great and beautiful with holy life."

What resplendent beauties! and we have not yet done with this superb work. Here is the beautiful invocation of Doctor Marianus, accompanied by a soft concert of oboes and harps; here is the chorus of Penitent Women, with its long suppliant phrase of those three: the Magna Peccatrix, Mulier Samaritana, and Maria Aegyptiaca, uniting their repentance and their prayers. Here is the supreme invocation of Marguerite, imploring the divine clemency for Faust: "Deign, O deign, incomparable radiant Virgin, to turn thy propitious countenance toward my happiness! He whom I loved on earth, no longer troubled, has come back. Surrounded by the noble choir of spirits, the new-comer scarcely knows himself, scarcely suspects his new life, so like is he already to the holy troop. See how he tears himself loose from all the terrestrial bonds of the old envelope, and how under his ethereal vestment the first youthful vigor shows itself! Permit me to instruct him." The new day still dazzles and confuses him." And here, at last, we have the double final chorus (Chorus Mysticus), the song of triumph, the celestial hosanna, for which Schumann has reserved his most sublime ideas, his most original harmonies, his most resplendent colors:¹

All that is transient
Is but a symbol;
The unattainable
Here becomes real;
The indescribable,
Here is it done,
The ever-Womanly
Beckons us on.

Such is this exceptional work; such is this unrivalled translation of the work of Goethe. Schumann, we have said before, is of all the composers the one who has best comprehended the poet's thought. We cannot regret too much that he did not have the leisure to translate all the capital situations of the drama. After reading these scenes, admirable paraphrases, by a man of genius, of a work of genius, we can judge how much the musical art has lost by Schumann's not being able to complete the first part of Faust. Then we can comprehend, seeing him rise to such a height in this musical interpretation of the second Faust, which he alone has dared, and he alone perhaps was competent, to make so exact and so brilliant, how truly Goethe saw when he wrote, not dreaming of the masterpiece with which he was about to inspire this great composer, "My works are not capable of becoming popular. I have not written for the masses, but for a class of men, whose will, whose studies, and whose tendencies have some analogy with mine."

THE MUSICAL SEASON IN LONDON.

(From the "Continent and Swiss Times," Geneva, June 26.)

It is the justified boast of English philharmonic dilettanti, when twitted by carping Germans and skeptical Frenchmen upon the sore subject of British shortcomings in the way of musical culture and taste, that during some ten or twelve weeks of each successive year this huge metropolis attracts to its opera-houses and concert-rooms four-fifths of the leading vocal and instrumental executants of the Continent; and that, between primrose-tide and rose-blowing, better performances of classical and operatic works, rendered by absolutely first-class artists, may be heard in the western, and western central districts of London than in all the other capitals of Europe put together. This vaunt is unquestionably founded upon fact; and those who advance it as an argument in support of the postulate that the metropolitan public is, by instinct or cultivation, as intelligently appreciative of musical excellences, creative or executive, as that of Berlin, Vienna, Leipzig, Munich or Paris, are not altogether illogically encouraged in their entertainment of that assumption by an inferential process of reasoning which may be succinctly summarized as follows:—"London imperatively requires (on pain of its high displeasure, expressed by withdrawal of patronage), from those who stand pledged to provide it periodically with musical entertainments, that they should, regardless of trouble and expense, produce upon the boards of our two opera-houses and upon the platforms of our half-dozen concert-rooms all, or nearly all the foreign celebrities whose fame has reached our shores by trustworthy report during the nine months immediately preceding the opening of the London season, or who are recognized celebrities in their respective specialties, firmly established in public favor. In order to secure the fulfilment of its will in this respect, London is content to pay higher prices for its opera and concert tickets than are obtainable by impresarii in any other capital, except St. Petersburg, to fee artists extravagantly for their performances at private parties, and to offer them generous tribute of hero-worship into the bargain. Therefore London must be not only a musical, but the most musical of cities. In proportion to its expenditure in securing the services of the very best artists in existence must be its love and taste for music, its knowledge of the art, and faculty of discrimination between the relative merits of professional competitors for its approbation." The deduction is a plausible one, and the vast majority of Englishmen, including many musically educated amateurs not altogether forlorn of reasoning power, is prone to admit its correctness. In our sea-girt realm, even art-dilettanti are frequently patriotic, and strongly disposed to defend British taste against any ill-natured foreign sneers and imputations, levelled at its quality. The wish is father to the thought with such eager vindicators of our judgment's soundness in matters musical. We are angrily intolerant of the very notion that we can possibly be inferior in development of the æsthetical faculties to mere Germans or Frenchmen, and comfortably assume that, because we pay more money than these latter for our indulgence in the higher executant efforts to attain artistic ideals, we are truer lovers of art and "know more about it" than they.

To run counter to popular fallacies is ever a thankless enterprise. From the purely conscientious point of view there is not, probably, a loftier duty nor one which, like many another virtuous practice, is more inevitably foredoomed to be its own reward, for lack of any other. Neither does it always commend itself to fervent promulgators of abstract truths, when large-minded enough to recognize and respect honest instincts and laudable motives underlying frail superstructures of defective reasoning and erroneous assertion. But Englishmen are in possession of so many indefeasible titles to equality with, if not superiority to, their Continental competitors in science and art, manufacture and commerce, manners and morals, that no serious breach of patriotic considerations is involved in hinting to them from time to time that, as far at least as musical taste, instruction and judgment are concerned, they are still remote from having attained the standard obtained in Germany, Austria and some parts of Italy and France. To convince any educated musician of their inferiority in this regard, it is only necessary that he or she should bestow careful and unprejudiced attention upon the musical incidents of such a London season as that now rapidly drawing to its close—upon the character and composition of the audiences thronging opera-houses, concert-rooms and music-halls, their attitude towards performers and performances, the nature and quality of the works eliciting their plaudits or provoking their condemnation—and, finally, upon the evidences of advancement in the culture of musical art afforded by the compositions of strictly English origin brought forward in the course of the fashionable trimester by rival impresarii, who, be it remembered, are accurately and exhaustively cognizant of their customers' requirements, and scrupulously supply them with what they want, no more and no less. Watchful contemplation of the London public during its spring surfeits of costly musical pabulum will lead the intelligent observer to conclusions widely different from those deduced, as above, from the broad fact that Englishmen willingly pay twice or even thrice as much for their vocal and instrumental entertainments as Germans, Austrians, Frenchmen or Italians. Indeed, the vulgar inference drawn from that circumstance will be found, upon examination of its merits, to be totally unworthy of serious consideration. There are more wealthy people, forlorn of any engrossing occupation and chronically plagued by the craving for sheer amusement, no matter of what kind or quality, in London, than in any other four European capitals, not exclusive of Paris. These people's lives are chiefly passed in the enjoyment of superfluities, material and æsthetical. Cheap pleasures lack charms for them; nay, are almost unknown to them. In order that they may appreciate aught, or, more correctly speaking, think that they appreciate it, the thing itself must be extremely expensive. If it achieve that desideratum, they will consume it greedily and without stint, but not otherwise. That they are lavish of their money in what is conventionally termed "the encouragement of art," is simply attributable to two causes wholly irrespective of taste and judgment, of which, however, the wealthier classes of English are by no means devoid, though their pretensions to the possession thereof are seldom based upon a solid foundation of technical education. Firstly, they have more money to spend than they know what to do with; and secondly, the chief aim of their existence is to purchase excitement and diversion of one description or another—to kill time, in fact, at a maximum of pecuniary outlay, and minimum of personal trouble.

A brief retrospective glance at the performances and audiences of the 1880 London musical season will serve to exemplify the views above propounded. London supports two magnificent opera-houses, in which representations of the lyrical drama, in the Italian language, take place every night in the week. Both these establishments are in the hands of entrepreneurs married to prime donne, and neither of them are remunerative to their lessees, notwithstanding the exorbitant prices demanded and obtained by the latter from the public for places. The working expenses are so heavy that nothing short of crowded houses every night can avail to secure the least margin of profit upon the whole season's performances. At one theatre the chief attraction and managerial anchor of hope is a cantatrice of surpassing abilities, who never opens her mouth until two hundred guineas have been paid in to her bankers; at the other, several stars of lesser magnitude compete for public favor with varied success, one of whom, well aware that her name on the bill is sure to fill the house, and being, moreover, profoundly penetrated with the wisdom of the axiom that pronounces prudence to be the progenitrix of prosperity, sternly exacts the payment of her stipulated honorarium before she goes upon the stage. Are the performances at these two great theatres truly artistic, or even such as would be tolerated in the Hofoper at Vienna or the Berlin Opernhaus? It were Midsummer madness to answer this question affirmatively. Apart from the leading artists, some of whom are superexcellent whilst others are simply intolerable, either from the musical or dramatic point of view, there is no single element in the operatic entertainments offered to the public at Her Majesty's or Covent Garden that can be pronounced deserving of unqualified praise: The orchestral accompaniments are frequently faulty and always coarsely rendered—the chorus-singing is beneath criticism—the incidental ballets are executed by females so ill-flavored and ungraceful as to be scarcely human—and the scenery and decorations, with a few brilliant exceptions where timely expenditure has been incurred for the mise en scene of absolute novelties, inconceivably inartistic and shabby. Turning to the audiences gathered together to witness and listen to these unsatisfactory performances—audiences chiefly composed of well-to-do and fashionable pleasure-lovers—we find amongst their salient characteristics that they will mildly applaud a primo tenore who sings every note of his part out of tune, if only he shout out the notes of his upper register loud enough to capture their attention—that they will receive a musical revelation of exquisite beauty with perplexed silence, whilst they will respond spasmodically to any hackneyed air, rendered familiar to their ears by the irrepressible barrel-organ or by the dismal iteration of school-room practising, a process that has not its equal for grafting conventional operatic selections upon intrinsically unmusical human natures. These, the best-paying London audiences—and therefore, according to the corollary afore referred to, the most musical—applaud without discrimination and calmly condone executive derelictions that stridently invite, in discordant accents, the reprobation of gods and men. A few nights ago such an audience assembled, some two thousand strong, in Covent Garden to the dullest and tamest of Rossini's operas, the sole interest of which to any musician present was Adelina Patti's transcendent vocalization, vehemently encored the overture to "Sémiramide," played as no scratch band engaged for the season at a Bohemian watering-place would have ventured to perform it to a Kursaal full of valetudinarians.

A conspicuous musical feature of the season has been the Richter concerts at St. James's Hall, relative to which some genuine excitement of an eminently healthy character has been displayed by English dilettanti. These entertainments, under the personal direction of the greatest living orchestral conductor, who slaved night and day during a whole month to such purpose that he may be said to have revolutionized all the venerable traditions of tempi and treatment to which contemporary British leaders have rigidly adhered for the last forty years, were splendid successes, financially as well as artistically; but principally owing to the enthusiastic support they received at the hands of the German residents in this metropolis. On more than one "Richter evening" whole rows of sofa-stalls which should have been occupied by wealthy English-folk, Beethoven-worshippers and seekers after truth in the interpretation of that immortal Titan's compositions, were dismally empty; but the galleries and balconies were crammed well-nigh to suffocation by bearded and spectacled Teutons, accompanied by the homely, thriftily attired females of their families, and laden with full-scores or "pianoforte reductions" of the glorious symphonies played, they might well think, for their especial delectation. It is no exaggeration to say, too, that all the really cultivated amateurs resident in London were present at one or other of these superb performances. But how many benches did these, the elect of our musical public, fill—and, had they been told off in line as against the musically instructed Teutons thronging the galleries, could they have held their own, in numbers or appreciativeness, with these latter? It is to be feared that, had such a comparison been instituted by any accomplished and unbiased votary of the divine art, it would have resulted unfavorably to the British dilettanti, who are, like angels' visits, few and far between, too frequently lacking in technical knowledge and executive skill, and, in ten cases out of twelve, painfully cramped in their conscientious efforts towards advancement in the practice of the musical art by the unsympathetic character of their immediate entourage, and the chilling pococurantism of English society in general.

WM. B. KINGSTON.

THE LYRICAL DRAMA.

BY G. A. MACFARREN, ESQ., M.A.,
Mus. Doc. Cantab., Prof. Mus. Cantab.

When the subject of this address was decided upon, I had an idea that I might bring before the attention of this meeting many unfamiliar facts in connection with a most important, possibly the most important branch of musical composition; but in the interim there has appeared the beginning of an article in Mr. Grove's Dictionary — which, although it is not yet signed, I guess from internal evidence to be the production of Mr. Rockstro — which anticipates many of the novelties I might have advanced, and set those forth in the most clear, in the most interesting, and (I can say nothing short of the highest terms of eulogy) the most satisfactory and instructive light. I can with the fullest confidence refer persons who are attracted to the subject to that article, which, in supplying many dates which are difficult to recollect in a visâ voce enunciation, and many unfamiliar names, will be of very great service as an authority, and will, I am certain, repay anybody's attention and careful reading. If the article continue as it has begun, it will give to the world a concise, but a most valuable, history of the course of the lyrical drama.

As to the lyrical drama itself, we must first regard the familiar objection that, as mankind do not sing their sentiments, the dramatic representation in music is wholly artificial, and apart from nature. Being artificial constitutes it a work of art, apart from nature, in so far as it is not a fac-simile, but true to nature in so far as it is the heightening of the realities of ordinary life, and heightening them with the bright color of poetry. It is the province of art to heighten and to brighten, to embellish and to beautify the facts of nature. It is Bacon who has stated that there is no such means of enforcing a lesson as by presenting it in living action, and thus the drama in itself is a most powerful means of instruction. I think it is a happy omen for the coming time that the best authorities seem now to entertain this view of the drama. The institution of the Society for Dramatic Reform, the many speeches of distinguished men of letters, and distinguished theologians, at the meetings of the Social Science Congress on the great importance to the world at large of dramatic production and dramatic performance, show that the greatest minds of the time are taking the possibilities of the drama into earnest consideration.

If a work of art were to be limited to the realities of the world, a looking-glass might stand in place of a picture, a police report in place of a tragedy, and music would drop out of being entirely. But it is in a picture, as distinct from the reflection in a mirror, that one sees nature through the mind of an artist. It is in poetry that we can enter into the feelings of men through the representation of an artist's imagination; and music expresses those feelings more forcibly than words can utter them, more delicately, more intensely; and if the hearer have the perception which can rise to the fullest power, of the work addressed to him, he may find in musical expression the grandest presentation of the feelings of man. The drama "holds the mirror up to nature." Music is that mirror, with such spectral phenomena as show nature in a beautified aspect.

The lyric drama is the most ancient of all dramatic representation. It is attested that Æschylus composed the music for his own tragedies. That those tragedies were musical throughout there can be no doubt, the dialogue being, as we should now describe it, chanted or intoned upon some prescribed arrangement of musical notes, and the choruses which intersperse this dialogue being set to more formal music. This identity of musician and poet, constituting a twofold "maker," was not continued in the case of subsequent Greek tragedians. It seems not to have been with Sophocles and Euripides as it was with Æschylus; and although it has been rarely that the musician and the literatist have been combined in the same person, there have been instances in after times where this has been the case; and it must be maintained that if the lyrical drama is to be at its best, it must be the result of concerted work between two persons, if two are concerned in it. No musician can do himself, or his work, or his art justice, who shall take a stereotyped libretto without the power to extend, or contract, or alter, or diversify it, according to the exigencies of his own view of the subject, and thus it will be found that where the musician-composer has not been also the text composer, in the best instances, his poet has played into his hands, and modified the situations of his drama and varied his text according to the musician's casual requirements.

The principle of the Greek drama was continued in Christian times in a very remarkable and signal instance; that was a religious rite to keep alive in memory the men and their deeds which were held sacred, and this, of which it is now to speak, appropriated the same means to the same end when persons and facts of another character claimed reverence. Gregory of Nazianzus, a town of Cappadocia, wrote a tragedy upon the Greek model, embodying the story of the Divine Passion, in which the chanted dialogue was interspersed with choruses; and we have at the present moment a genealogical descendant from this drama of the fourth century, in the Passion Play represented every ten years at Oberammergau, save that the musical element has dropped out of the play, and the dialogue of the present day is spoken instead of intoned. Subsequently to the tragedy by Gregory, in the miracle-plays and the mysteries, there was always incidental music, but not music connected with the action — music interspersed more or less to illustrate the situations or the sentiment of the text, but not to be necessarily or at all concerned in the presentation of the incidents.

We find, however, in the fifteenth century, a drama on the subject of Orfeo, by Poliziano, for which Enrico Isaaco, I believe of German birth, wrote music in Italy, but little or nothing, as to the musical merits of this work has reached us. In the English drama, subsequently to this, music was introduced episodically, but with such seeming necessity for the satisfaction of the audience, that there are not a few instances where personages are brought on the scene for the sake of singing their song, and not for fulfilling any incident in the story or taking any part in the action; such as the appearance of the two pages in the fifth act of As You Like It. They enter to Touchstone and Audrey, and, at the invitation of these two, sing "It was a lover and his lass;" and having sung and having received the comment on their performance, they leave the stage, and then the action goes on as if it had not been broken by their presence. This is, I think, an evidence that the audience of the time wanted the embellishment of music in the course of a long dramatic performance. More directly connected with the action of the scene is the music of the witches, introduced in Macbeth, and this music, with the doggerel text to which the greater part of it is set, was previously in the play of The Witches, by Middleton, and it had attained such general esteem that when Macbeth was to be produced it became almost a necessity, or Shakespeare must have felt it as an entire necessity, to surround his witches with music, because this class of beings was in the public mind thus associated, from the success of this preceding play; and no music could so well fulfill his idea as that which already existed, and the verses to which this music is set were transplanted entire into the great tragedy of our greatest poet.

Now comes into consideration the real foundation of the modern opera, and this has an intimate connection with that great movement for art, the Renaissance. Letters, paintings, sculpture, had received already the benefit of the revival of classic principles, and then it came to be considered that the same view might be applied to music. The tradition was extant — nay, we have written evidence — that music had been the most powerful means of impressing on the audiences of the Greek theatre the poetic power of the plays. The music of the period at which we have now arrived, namely, the end of the sixteenth century, was either the scholastic music now described as polyphonic, of which a very main interest lay in the imitative nature of the part-writing, or else the music of the people, which may be best described in our English idea of the ballad, that is, the recitation of a story to many and many repeats of one very concise melody.

Now from those two styles of music, declamation and expression of the poetry were necessarily excluded. In the fugal, or canonic, or imitative style, which prevailed as much in the madrigal compositions as in the music for the church, it would be impossible to express or to declaim words, since the many voices would be singing different words at the same moment. In the ballad, there could be small expression in a tune that was to be again and again repeated through a long and various story, which might comprise incidents of gaiety, of gravity, of regret, and of rejoicing; and the utmost that could either be in the ballad tune or in the polyphonic composition of embodying character, would be a general resemblance to the nature of the subject, but by no means to the proper declamation of the words.

Then a society of gentlemen, men of letters, lovers of art, was formed in Florence. Count Vernio was at the head of this; Vincenzo Galileo, father of the astronomer, and a nobleman of the name of Corsi were among his associates. These formed the idea of restoring to music that declamatory character which it is supposed to have held in the Greek tragedy. They employed a poet, Ottavio Rinuccini, to construct some verses with a view to musical declamation, and they engaged, at first, two singers, Giulio Caccini and Jacopo Peri, who were, from the point of musical composition, little skilled, but were well adapted for the task proposed, from their habit of singing and from a singer's point of view regarding the exigencies of the words, and the capabilities of the voice for vocal expression.

You, sir (addressing the Chairman), and many other persons here, can very well estimate how important it is to one who undertakes the task of setting poetry to music to feel the singer's quality in approaching his subject, and from a singer's point of view he may be able to do a higher justice to his music and to his verse than any one could who had not the habit of singing or the experience of listening to singers. It was in 1590 that the first productions of these singer-composers were privately performed, at the house of the gentleman I have named.

Then also came upon the scene Emilio del Cavallieri, a Roman by birth, who was an educated composer; and he brought to the task a theoretical knowledge of musical principles. Now it is to be considered that this term "lyrical drama" is not necessarily, or by any means, limited in its application to secular subjects; and whereas the performances of Peri and Caccini were in the first place monologues, Cavallieri wrote a continuous drama, interspersed with dancing and action, which was represented with scenery, and which was not on a Biblical story, but on a religious theme. La Rappresentazione di Animo e di Corpo was performed in the oratory of a church, and classes at the head of the dramatic oratorio, distinct from didactic oratorio, — this being exemplified in works at present familiar by the Passion of Bach and the Messiah of Handel, whereas specimens of the dramatic oratorio are many other works of Handel, which are always described by himself with the epithet "oratorio or sacred drama," such as Samsan, Judas Maccabæus, and Jephtha. The composer last named had so keen a sense of the dramatic treatment of his subject, that he wrote always in his scores such stage directions as would be given for a theatrical performance of the works in a theatre, describing the entrances and exits of personages, and other actions bearing upon the conduct of the story. Many and many such instances are to be found throughout the MSS. of Handel, although they are, I believe, always omitted in the printed copies of the music. They are still, however, to be found in some of the separate librettos, and I think they clearly show how strong was his sense of the scene, although he wrote with the view of his pieces being sung without the adjuncts of theatrical effect.

"MUSICALLY MAD."

The London Times, in criticizing a recent performance of "Lucia," very sensibly says: "Owing to a curious perverseness of fate, the age which has produced perhaps the finest 'light' soprano ever heard is by no means prolific in operas adapted for their special gifts. The modern German school on principle abhors roulades and fioriture, but even in modern French and Italian operas the chief task is rarely intrusted to the quality of voice just referred to. The Queen in the 'Huguenots,' Filina in 'Mignon,' such are the parts with which light soprano have to be satisfied; even Marguerite in 'Faust' does not properly belong to their domain, although it approaches the border-line. The consequence is that they have to fall back upon the earlier Italian repertoire; and many a good old-fashioned opera owes its survival to the circumstance. We do not say that this is altogether the case with Donizetti's 'Lucia.' No unprejudiced critic can deny its merits. The septet in the second act is a masterpiece, and the entire finale of that act full of dramatic power of the highest order. The duets of Lucy with her lover and her cruel brother also are not without beauty of their special kind. On the other hand, there are shallow places innumerable, and the mad scene in the third act is from a dramatic point of view grotesquely absurd. In a curious volume entitled 'Pills to Purge Melancholy,' by Tom D'Urfey (published in 1719), that prolific poet and playwright distinguishes five varieties of 'the lady distracted with love.' We have the lady 'sullenly mad,' 'mirthfully mad,' 'melancholy mad,' 'fantastically mad,' and 'stark mad.' Had Tom D'Urfey lived in our days, Donizetti, M. Gounod, and other composers would have taught him that there is still another species, — the lady 'musically mad.' A person thus afflicted would, according to Donizetti's notion, seem to be inclined and able to sing the most difficult and florid music conceivable, to venture without hesitation upon scale passages and fioriture and shakes, at which a prudent singer might certainly well stand aghast. To speak plainly, the composer, like many other writers of his school, forgets in the scene we are speaking of his dramatic mission entirely. He wishes to write a show piece of musical execution, and in this task, at least, he has not failed. The singer very naturally follows the composer's example. She also forgets her identity with the unfortunate Lucy Ashton, and merrily warbles away at the audience regardless of the sympathetic chorus behind her back, which, as in duty bound, puts in an occasional 'Gran Dio' or 'Di lei, signor, pietà.'"

DR. RITTER ON "CHAMBER MUSIC."

(Concluded from p. 116.)

At this point the second illustration, Allegri's Symphonia, was played, and attention was called to the form of it — there being three rather short movements; the first, common time, of a lively character; the second, triple time, of a slow cast; and the last, common time, consisting of two parts — one rather slow, the other swift. The first movement is worked out in two themes; the second is rather melodious, in the style of the Canon. The contrapuntal treatment and the grouping of the instruments are still similar to those of vocal compositions. The tonality wavers between C major and G major. The old ecclesiastical mode still predominates. The musical effect is still antiquated for modern ears; yet, here and there already appear passages peculiar to the mechanism of stringed instruments; especially in the first movement. This piece is published in full in the second edition of Dr. Ritter's "History."

The impulse given by Monteverde developed violin virtuosity. Trills, skips, quick passages, based upon chords or scales — all these, widely differing from characteristics of vocal compositions, were gradually introduced. Violinists began to publish works for their instruments alone. These were mostly in the dance-forms of the epoch — such as Pavanes, Galliards, Giguees, etc. Success in this new line bred vanity in the violin virtuosi — as, for instance, in Carlo Farina, of Mantua, who, before 1650, published, among other violin works, a Capriccio stravagante, in which passages occur imitating the noises of dogs, cats, roosters and hens. And Farina showed the seriousness of his vanity by carefully explaining how these effects should be produced. This was, truly, coarse materialism in tone-painting. A difference between instrumental and purely vocal means began now to be noticed. The livelier and more distinct rhythms of the dance-tunes lent to the instrumental melody a more concise phrasing and more elasticity. Violin players at this time did not venture to make an elaborate use as yet of the "G-string," its technical difficulties being considered too great. Tarquinio Merula, of Cremona (about 1600), is said to have made the first success in this respect. It took, also, a long time even measurably to conquer the technique of the violin, beyond the "first position." The celebrated twenty-four fiddlers of the band of Louis XIV. seldom succeeded, in spite of great efforts and bodily contortions, in reaching with pure intonation the C, two ledger lines above the treble-clef. Their audiences knew this, and were accustomed to cry out, whenever they knew the C was coming: "Gars à l'ut!" — "Look out for the C!" Thus the compass was enlarged in every direction; and this was supplemented by increased facility in working out characteristic themes melodically as well as harmonically, giving more unity and more logical construction to the different movements. The inventive variety resulting from the adoption of the major and minor modes (leading, for example, to the introduction of cadenzas to designate harmonic changes and cuts of phrases and periods) made the whole construction of works more lucid, symmetrical and effective. The modern chromatic element began to relieve the diatonic monotony of the ecclesiastical keys which was manifest in the previous illustrations; and the next illustration, a sonata for violin solo, with violoncello obligato, by Giuseppe Torelli, of Verona (1650-1708), shows this advance. Torelli is said to have been the first composer who wrote concertos for solo instruments with accompaniment of orchestra. The form he chose was the sonata. The illustration here is a sonata in four movements. The custom of uniting four movements and calling the whole a sonata became thus raised to an æsthetic principle. This sonata consists of an Allegro, frequently interrupted by a short Adagio; again an Allegro; then an Adagio; and lastly, an Allegro. The first movement has more the effect of a varied, brilliant introduction; the second is in three parts — two being assigned to the violin, in fugue style; while the violoncello adds brilliant, contrasting passages. A figured bass is directed to fill out the harmony. The whole movement is easy, graceful and rather brilliant. The instrumentalist per se now stands firm upon his own feet.

The next two illustrations were a Sonata da Chiesa, for two violins and 'cello, by Giambattista Bassani, written in 1685; and a Sonata da Camera, for the same instruments, by that great "Bach of Italy," Arcangelo Corelli, written in the same year, 1685.

The sonata began to be varied in form by circumstances. It was introduced into the organ gallery, where the violin, sustained by harmonic accompaniment of the organ, began to replace the solo singer and the chorus. Instead of a Salve Regina or an Ave Maria, a sonata would frequently be played. This use of it changed its character; it then consisted of three or four movements and was of a generally serious cast, in accordance with its sacred surroundings. The first movement was generally grand and majestic; the second an animated fugue; the third, a pathetic Adagio; and the last, a lively Allegro. This was called the "Church Sonata" — Sonata da Chiesa. Its more mundane sister, "Chamber Sonata," or Sonata da Camera, was of a light, cheerful character and composed of a succession of dances, such as the Allemande, Pavane, Air, Corrente, Sarabanda, Minuetto, or Gigue and the like. The order and number of pieces had no rule, but varied with individual fancy. But they were all (three or six) in the same key; while, in the "Church Sonata," the Adagio (second) movement was written in a relative key to that of the sonata — major, if the other was minor, and vice versa. In France the "Chamber Sonata" was called Suite or Une Suite de Pièces — a form diligently cultivated by Bach and Handel and their German contemporaries. At a later period the sacred and secular sonatas were merged into one, as we have them now.

Bassani was born at Padua, 1657, and was chapel-master successively at Bologna and Ferrara cathedrals. He died in Ferrara in 1715. He was one of the most distinguished musicians of his time — composing operas, church music and instrumental pieces. In the sonata he crystallized ideas in which his predecessors had waveringly groped; and unity and symmetry characterized his works. He idealized the sonata in his use of contrapuntal means, rhythm, melody, harmony. A gracefulness of style is predominant. In the present example, the principal motivo of the first movement (similar to that in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony) is worked out with ingenuity and mastery — for his time. The two violins and 'cello have a figured bass accompaniment for the organ. The second movement is a short, pathetic Grave; the third, an Allegro, with many interesting points of a contrapuntal imitation; the fourth, an Adagio, in triple time — a short Canon, sweet and melodic, followed by a light, graceful, humorous Prestissimo, the prototype of Haydn's cheerful finales. The last movement is suddenly interrupted by a return of the Adagio (this time in another key), after which the Prestissimo is repeated and closes the sonata. A similarly happy thought is embodied (but, of course, with much greater effectiveness) in the finale of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, where strains from the Scherzo interrupt the triumphant march movement. Bassani exercised great influence, not only in Italy; for even the English composer, Purcell, studied him diligently, and wrote sonatas in similar style.

But Italy's "Arch-angel" was Corelli, who was born in Fusignano, Bologna, in 1653, — four years earlier than Bassani, who nevertheless, instructed him in violin playing. His teacher in counterpoint was Matteo Simonelli, a member of the Pope's Chapel. As a young man he visited Germany and passed several years at the court of the Elector of Bavaria. In 1681 he settled in Rome, under the protection of his friend, Cardinal Ottoboni. Here he was at home for the rest of his life. Here he founded the famous Roman school for violin playing. Here he died in 1713. He was a great musician and a noble man. His tone and soulful expression he magnified beyond mere technique, and he far outshone all his predecessors. In fact, he marks the first epoch in this form of instrumental music. The same qualities which distinguished his playing are to be found in his sonatas. He filled Torelli's and Bassani's form with far deeper sentiment than theirs. The present "Sonata da Camera" illustration is a string trio, with figured bass accompaniment; in four movements, Preludio, Allemande, Sarabanda and Corrente — the first two in common time (Adagio and Allegro), the others in triple time (Largo and Allegro); all four in the key of E major. The names are the regular dance denominations of the secular sonata; but an artistic approach of the composer to the dignity of the more serious "Church Sonata" is manifest. The work is Op. 2, No. 10.

A second selection from Corelli was played on the 'cello by Mr. Bergner, with piano accompaniment, although written for violin. The selection from Biber which followed, after explanation of the immigration of the Italian sonata-form into Germany, was inferior to the climax of Corelli, and was interesting only as foreshadowing the greatest Bach, of whom an Andante followed from a Sonata for Viol da Gamba, played also on the 'cello by Mr. Bergner. The Biber Gavotte was admirably played by Mr. Brandt. It was from a violin sonata, published in Salzburg in 1681. Dr. Ritter paid a glowing tribute to the genius of Johann Sebastian Bach, who so transformed the Italian Sonata as really to keep only its name and its four movements. His sonatas were so difficult as to lead one to think he must have calculated for an organ key-board on the neck of the violin; and it was many years before musicians, after great exertions, learned to do justice to these works in performance and in appreciation of their nobility and deep poetical charm.

Handel was next illustrated, for contrast's sake, by an Allegro (preceded by a few bars, Adagio) from a violin sonata (1732), played by Mr. Brandt. Great as were Handel's achievements in other branches in the sonata form, he did not, in Dr. Ritter's opinion, open new roads like his great contemporary, Bach.

The rest of the lecture showed how Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach made a compromise between his father's severely contrapuntal style and the more simply melodious Italian style; and also how much Haydn owed, by his own acknowledgment, to this later Bach. In fact the Largo from a Trio by C. P. E. Bach, for two violins and 'cello, which was subsequently played by Messrs. Brandt, Schwarz and Bergner, showed how much inspiration even Mozart may have got from him. Dr. Ritter called attention to the fact that, before Haydn's development of the true quartet form, the viola was neglected in its individuality. The characteristics of Haydn's fully crystallized quartet form were then explained in too much detail for report at this time; and, after a glowing tribute to the elevated refinement of music, the lecture closed with an earnest peroration, after which Haydn's First Quartet in B flat was performed in full; and the audience dispersed after a most interesting evening. The peroration of the lecture was as follows:—

But where are those amateurs to be found in our days, for whom a Haydn, a Mozart, a Beethoven wrote so many exquisite works? The universal piano-forte, stimulating musical egotism, has killed the modest and unobtrusive quartet player; while it has helped to render musical culture more narrow, more superficial and also more sensational. Do we not see that even orchestral conductors, misled by outside considerations, endeavor to tear the refined string quartet from its ideal sphere and lend to it a temporary, sensational effect by having it performed by a numerous band of orchestral strings? According to my views, this is a misunderstanding of the true æsthetical form and functions of the quartet. In this case orchestral mechanism, uniting a number to the beat of one, takes the place of the highest ideal individuality; and, formal, conventional expression replaces the free flow of the imagination of the intelligent one exponent of the idea. The four performers are not slaves; each of them follows his own heart-beat; the ideal symmetry, harmony and unity of the whole form binds them all naturally together, without tampering with the necessary, spontaneous, free life of the spirit. In the interest of a more solid, refined and substantial æsthetical development of music, I should like to see a more universal cultivation of the forms of chamber-music.

REFORM IN CHURCH MUSIC.

This was the subject of an address or lecture delivered by Mr. Eugene Thayer, the well-known organist of this city, before the annual meeting, at Buffalo, a few weeks since, of the "Music Teachers' National Association," a brief abstract of the proceedings of which was given in our last number. Mr. Thayer's paper is interesting and suggestive enough (and here and there pleasantly spicy withal) to warrant copying in full; but at present we can only call attention to certain points in it, thoughtfully and ably treated, which seem to go pretty nearly to the root of the matter as to the reform needed in the music of the churches of to-day—at least, in the vocal music, to which we shall confine our extracts and our comments for the present.

After a very brief historical introduction, sketching the progress of church music from the Ambrosian chants and the Gregorian "Tones," barely enumerating the great church composers who came after the long, dark period between that time and the fifteenth century, and then tracing the progress of our New England Psalmody from Billings and Holden down to Lowell Mason; alluding by the way to our fathers' puritanical aversion to the organ, Mr. Thayer expresses his enthusiastic faith in the religious mission of music, as the one language that can reach all hearts, and that will live forever. Now he is ready for the question of reform. Beginning with the church choir, he says:

I believe that the first thing to do is to have true choirs in our churches, if we are to have any choirs at all. Good music is of little worth unless we have it properly produced. The true choir is the chorus choir. This might or might not include a quartet; it properly should. For it is hardly possible to call together a large body of singers without finding at least four who could creditably, if not most ably, serve as soloists. I would, in fact, to have our choir perfect in its organization, have a double quartet; that is, four male and four female soloists. To be more explicit, I mean a high and a low voice on each of the parts, and a chorus of from sixteen to sixty, or even a hundred voices, according to the size of the church. I doubt if it is ever best to exceed the latter number except in very large churches. Mere numbers do not necessarily increase the effect desirable, and too many hinder rather than help. Of course, I presuppose a good organ well played; for a weak or poor one, or a badly played one, is worse than a poor preacher to drive away the ungodly or even the faithful. I do not believe in quartet choirs as such; that is, simply and only quartet choirs for church service. Quartet choirs will agree with me, I think, when I assert that there is always felt to be something wanting in their musical service, however good it may be: a want of contrast, a want of climax, a want of heart as well as of mind; a want felt if not always understood. That want I believe to be the universal play of the feelings, the universal sympathy of the people, which can only come when all join in praise to the Lord. I would not be understood as saying that the people should always join in the singing. Let them listen sometimes; let them receive as well as give a part of the time. When the singers carry through the whole of the musical service of the church, it becomes a performance, and nothing else but a performance; and the better the singers the more in fact is it a performance. Now, if the people wish to go to church simply to listen to a fine performance—in a certain sense, the same as they would at the opera or concert-hall—then there is nothing more to say about choirs. Church music either means something more than a performance or it does not. If it does not, then banish a usage which at once profanes our divine art, and commits sacrilege in the house of God. It remains for pastors and people to take hold of the work, and raise it to a higher plane than its present one. Upon the pastors chiefly devolves the duty of bringing this matter before the people, and arousing them to a full sense of its importance. Many a sensational sermon, or even a practical or doctrinal one, could well give place to this work. If pastors only knew of the unlimited power of music to assist them in their work, I could almost believe that half their sermons would be about music in the church.

All this is sensible and to the purpose. We only wish that it were a little more explicit on the point of congregational singing, or the part the people are to take in the tuneless portion of the service. It is only by implication that Mr. Thayer appears to allow any place for this. He would not be understood as saying that the people should always join in the singing; they should sometimes listen. This implies, then, that they should sometimes sing. But how? when? with what preparation, organization and arrangement? We should think this the first point to settle, and the choir the next; and we wonder at the omission all the more, inasmuch as our reformer farther on is so strong in his recommendation of the choral in place of the trashy four-line psalm-tune, the choral being in its very origin and essence a sort of tune or simple melody to be sung in unison by the whole congregation, though capable of wondrous transfiguration in the polyphonic harmony developed from it by a master spirit like Sebastian Bach. Of this hereafter. Let us follow Mr. Thayer's own order, and first give what he says about the hymns, the words to be sung. We entirely sympathize with him in his aversion to the unlimited number of hymns of all kinds, lyrical, didactic, prosy or poetic; and in the idea that twenty-five or fifty hymns, each inseparably wedded to its tune, are quite enough for that form of the musical service,—age and old association and familiarity being of far more consequence than novelty. (To be sure, this would be a death-blow to the trade of the endless multipliers of mere psalm-tunes and "collections;" but let them find some better work to do, if they are competent; if not, let them seek it outside of the art of music; but Mr. Thayer suggests a better occupation for competent musicians in what he calls the "hymn anthem," a form capable of multiplication without all this fore-doomed monotony and emptiness). All this portion of the lecture is so good, that we must give it here without abridgment:

After the choir has been properly organized, the hymnology of the church needs revision and reform; for it will scarcely be possible to reform the music of the church until the hymn-books are reformed, or, at least, used in a different manner than now, by pastors and congregations. The leading collections have from six to sixteen hundred hymns, including, possibly, a few repetitions. Now, there are not sixteen hundred good hymn-tunes in the world, and I hope there never will be. I doubt if there are even fifty thoroughly good ones, if we except the chorals. Unfortunately, most of the chorals cannot be used for American church service; for, being mostly of German origin, the metres are of such an irregular kind that they will not adapt themselves to our hymns. Such of them as have been used in our service, as, for instance, Old Hundred, Nuremburg and others, have proved beyond question how well the people like them, and by their singing of them how perfectly they are adapted to the wants of the great congregation.

I fully believe that fifty hymns or even half of that number are enough for any congregation; for a congregation that can sing twenty-five hymns and sing them well is a rarity; and one that can sing fifty good ones well does not exist hereabouts. Let me say here that I believe it best in congregational singing that each hymn be sung to a certain tune. This law of association of certain words with certain melodies will not only give a better devotional effect, but will surely make the people sing better. We all know what words we expect and wish to hear to such lovely melodies as "Sweet Home" and the "Last Rose of Summer," and when the organist gives out "Old Hundred" even the children know what to sing. For these and other reasons I conclude that there are altogether too many hymns in our hymn-books. Shall we, then, ignore or cast out all above the half hundred? Certainly not. Many of the others can be sung by the choir, if there be one; if not, let them be read by the pastor as often as may be wished. Why should not the reading form a part of the service? Many a hymn, which is most beautiful in its religious sentiment and devotional character, is totally unfit for the people to sing—in fact, for anybody to sing. The only hymns fit to be sung are those of prayer and adoration, or those of praise and thanksgiving. All of a didactic, reflective or simply rational character, are much better read than sung. Of course, a choir or congregation can find some tune of the same metre and worry through the poetry; but musically and devotionally the result will be a failure. If the pastor or people have favorite hymns which are not singable, let them be read as often as desirable, but let any attempt to sing them be abandoned.

There should be an entire reform about reading hymns that are to be sung. Don't read them at all! Let the number of the hymn be announced and the first line, or, possibly, the first verse be read; and let that suffice. If it is to be read through, and played through, and sung through, why not have a grammar lesson and parse it through, and then have a spelling match and spell it through?

One of the customs of the Germans could be adopted in American churches to great advantage. Not a word is said over there about the hymns, except, of course, by the female portion of the congregation. As one enters the church he sees posted in some conspicuous place, generally in front of the pulpit, and in figures large enough to be read anywhere in the church, the numbers of the hymns to be sung. When the time comes for the hymn the organist plays a short prelude and the people rise and sing without being asked or commanded to. All appears so spontaneous and natural that the effect is enhanced a hundred fold. It seems as if they sang because they wanted to; and they certainly do sing as if they loved to, for they are never given any hymns or tunes but what are adapted to them both devotionally and musically. I make this suggestion for the benefit of both pastors and people, and hope it may soon be generally adopted. If pastors will give the people only such hymns to sing as are suitable to sing, and if organists and choir directors will give the people only such melodies to sing as are proper for large numbers of people to sing, we shall hear no more complaint about congregations failing to sing both heartily and well.

So much of the hymns, the verbal text, and of the desirable limitation of their number, as well as of the tunes that are to go with them, and which properly belong to them by true affinity and time-hallowed, fond association. Here again Mr. Thayer implies, but has not once distinctly treated, the singing of the people, of the congregation, of course in unison, as the common groundwork of the whole church music. And now for his arraignment of the automaton psalm-tune multiplier:

If the choir is to sing any of the hymns in the service, let the music be in the form of the hymn anthem; or, if we cannot always have this, let the hymn-tune be in the form of the eight-line or double hymn-tune. The four-line hymn-tune is essentially an incomplete, weak and meaningless thing. The reason is plain: the form is meaningless and incomplete, and therefore worthless. The shortest form in music should have at least four parts, to be satisfactory either to musical taste or common sense. These four parts are as follows: First, a theme; second, a counter theme or answer; third, an episode or digression; fourth, the coda or conclusion. As these cannot all be comprised in the limits of a four-line hymn-tune we are forced to the conclusion that the form is defective and inadequate, and therefore practically worthless.

As it is now, we have a mere rhythmical play of three or four chords, and the thing comes to an untimely end, dying of sheer inanition. It is not only not a hymn-tune but it is not a tune at all, simply because it has not the requisites of a theme or tune. See, too, the practical result of its use in church service. Let us take a hymn of four verses, and we have not infrequently, a greater number. First we hear the pastor read the four verses; then we hear the tune from the organ; next the choir sings the tune once, then over again, then once more, and finally, to conclude with, they do it some more. Five times we are forced to listen to a tune which, in all probability, was never fit to be heard once. Barrels full, cartloads full, warehouses full of this nonsense have been published and sold, and will be as long as there is a gullible public, or organists, choir directors and singers cannot see the everlasting sameness of the stuff and refuse to be further fooled and plundered.

What shall we have in the place of it? For choir singing we must have the hymn anthem, wherein each verse has its appropriate setting, and all the verses are so joined that we not only have unity in the poetry but in the music as well, and really get a whole piece of music instead of half a dozen fragments of one—a whole uncut loaf instead of a half dozen thin slices. Are such things to be found in the psalm-books already issued? Yes; only unfortunately, in very limited numbers. But I believe as soon as our church music composers awake to the importance of the subject and see what nonsense the four-line hymn-tunes are, they will issue no more books for choirs except such as shall practically prove the truth of these assertions.

And now we come to the heart of the whole matter,—to the importance of the choral as the true church music (why not say plain-song?) of the people; and we might add, as the pregnant germ of the whole development of sacred music, at least the Protestant music, in its larger and more complex forms. Our reformer advocates it on these grounds:

The best and only true hymn-tune for the people is the choral—not necessarily the German choral, but any choral or hymn-tune of like character. Now the choral is generally a four-line tune, and doubtless every one will think me involved in a hopeless dilemma of contradiction. Let us see if this apparent inconsistency cannot be clearly explained. If the form of the four-line hymn is worthless and nonsensical for the choir, how is it so good for the people? Let us see. First, the conditions are entirely different, and the principles upon which the choral is founded are entirely different. In the choral no melodic treatment or development is developed or desired; it depends wholly on its harmonic structure. In the choral, except possibly at the end of the lines, there should never be any repetition of harmony in two consecutive chords: each melody-note, so called, should have a new harmony. This does not mean that there should be no repetition of any given harmony or chord in the piece, but only that it shall not occur on two successive chords. A choral will then contain all, or nearly all, the chords possible in any one key; and, so far as harmony is concerned, really does all that can be done, and is so far wholly and unqualifiedly satisfactory. I said that there was no attempt at melody, in the ordinary acceptance of that word, neither was melody essential or desirable. First, because the choral had its origin in the chant, the oldest form of all church music; and the chant, as we all know, has no melody proper, and can have none and needs none; it is above melody, for it is harmony; and harmony is melody transcended, or many melodies together. That is, not any special melody in the upper part, or at the top, but melody, in a certain sense, everywhere. So we do not look for melody, or for the satisfaction for the sense of melody, in the choral; or for any thematic development, or contrast of themes, or variety of form. Its one theme is like the sun at noonday; one is all sufficient.

Why, then, is not the four-line hymn-tune equally satisfactory? Or, why has not the church music composer of to-day the same right to make a four-line hymn-tune as the old composers had to make their four-line chorals? He undoubtedly has the same right, and, if he did not attempt rhythmic or melodic treatment in this short limit, might produce something to rank with these grand old chorals. But the joke of the thing is that he would produce—what do you suppose? It would be either a chant or a choral, for it couldn't be anything else. These, then, are the reasons why a four-line choral is good and a four-line hymn-tune is worthless. The four-line hymn-tune attempts rhythmic and melodic treatment in four lines, in which limit no satisfactory treatment is possible. The choral ignores melodic treatment, but gives us a complete harmonic structure to a plain succession of notes. The former attempts and promises the impossible and consequently fails; the latter does all it promises or suggests, and all that is possible in this compass, and is consequently complete and wholly satisfactory.

My further reasons for claiming the choral as the only music for congregational hymns are: that it has notes of equal length and the people can sing it together; that it is within the compass of the voice of the masses; that little, indeed, we might almost say, no knowledge of music is required to sing what is termed the melody. For it must be remembered that the masses, considered as such, have little or no knowledge of music, and never can have so long as they must struggle for bare existence.

These are excellent reasons in the main; and the infinite superiority of the choral to the humdrum modern psalm-tune, with its would-be melody and its helpless monotony of harmony, is well explained. Indeed, so many good things are said here of the choral, that we wish the statement were more accurate in some particulars. For instance, how can anybody think that the best of the old chorals, say the Lutheran, lack melody? Take for example, as among those which have become somewhat known here of late years, the chorals introduced in Bach's Passion Music; not only do they shine transfigured and immortal in Bach's wondrous harmony, but the chorals in themselves, the mere tunes, as sung by rote, in unison, by the people, are full of the sweetest, tenderest, most haunting melody, every one of them. It is possible that some of them may have been invented by musicians, who composed them in their four-part melodic harmony at first; but the mass of them undoubtedly were simple melodies for one voice-part, which received harmonic treatment later. The truer statement would be, that these melodies were of such peculiar pregnant quality that they implied all that rich and ever-varied harmony which Mr. Thayer so well describes; these harmonies were latent in them, in the very soul and genius, so to speak, of every melody, and men like Bach divined them there and brought them out.

Again, we do not understand his description of the choral as commonly a four-line tune, and as composed of notes of equal length. Many chorals are so doubtless, at least in earlier ages when they stood nearer to the chants. But in the Lutheran hymn and choral books, the great majority are in six or eight lines, and lines of every sort of length, making it difficult, to be sure, to adapt many of them to the stanzas in our hymn-books; but, if we should adopt Mr. Thayer's plan of reducing the number of tunes and hymns sung by the people to some thirty or forty familiar ones, would it not be possible to find fitting poetry for each?

Moreover, we fail to see that Mr. Thayer has quite absolved himself from the "apparent inconsistency," which he undertakes to explain. For in claiming that the choral is wholly a thing of harmony, and not of melody, he takes it at once out of the mouths of the singing congregation, and relegates it to the choir,—unless in so far as the organ represents the harmony, while the people sing the melody.

Could not a wholesome and inspiring, at once artistic and in the best sense popular, church music, or music of public worship, be composed of the following elements? 1. As the groundwork, a few real chorals, wedded each to its own words, to be sung in unison by the people, the harmony supplied by the organ. 2. Alternate verses of the choral to be sung in the best four-part polyphonic harmony, without accompaniment, by the trained choir, giving the effect of a celestial choir responding to the earthly,—as we have heard it done in Germany with almost mystical impressiveness. 3. The "hymn anthem" to which Mr. Thayer refers, and other freer forms of anthem, not necessarily to metrical texts; these, of course, for an artistic, or at least a musical and select choir; music to be listened to, with edification, if it be only good. 4. Still other and it may be larger forms of truly artistic religious music; such as some noble Gloria or Benedictus from a mass, or chorus or quartet from an inspired oratorio, drawing from the greatest masters such practicable pieces as are most sure to lift the thoughts above the world. If we were thinking of great cathedrals, we might go even further and call in the orchestra.

But we must not omit the peroration of this part of Mr. Thayer's discourse, his plea, namely, for the choral; it makes a good conclusion. Hereafter we may copy what he says of the organ and the organist.

Finally, the choral is the grandest simple expression of the religious life and feelings of humanity. All can sing it, and all love to sing it better than anything else in the service of the church. Let anybody listen to a great congregation singing Old Hundred, Dundee, Nuremberg or America, and doubt this if he can; and these mentioned are by no means the best of chorals, as they are both poorly and incorrectly harmonized. Wait until bye and bye when we get all the good ones, and you will see that no ordinary inducement will tempt the people to sing any other music to the hymns of the church. All this shall as surely come as day follows night. The weak and worthless shall all disappear, and to the harmony of the grand old chorals shall the people praise God with heart and soul and voice; and the church service be one for the people, and of the people, and music shall shine out in fullest glory and power in the sanctuary of God the Lord.

SIGNOR BOITO'S "MEFISTOFELE."

The musical world just now seems to have Faust on the brain. Gounod's opera is still popular. Berlioz's dramatic legend of the Damnation of Faust was the last stone thrown into the still water, and the widening rings of agitation have by no means yet died out. But with Berlioz, Mephisto is the real hero of the drama, Faust but a puppet in comparison. Now comes a new sensation, the Italian musical version of the theme, which calls itself outright by the name of the devil, Mefistofele. Of Sig. Boito's work we have already translated in these columns what M. Adolphe Jullien has to say. After a fiasco at Milan in 1868, and a successful revival at Bologna, for which the way was paved by the success there of Lohengrin, it has come to be recognized as the finest opera which modern (that is to say, recent) Italy has produced. It has now reached London, where it was brought out at Her Majesty's Theatre in the beginning of the present month, under the personal superintendence of the composer, but with Sig. Ardit as conductor, and with great éclat. And now we hear that Col. Mapleson intends to produce it in New York and Boston during the next season,—at the Boston Theatre in December. Below will be found some description of the work and its performance from the London papers. Sig. Boito is, it seems, a Goethe scholar; and he draws his text both from the first and second parts of Faust, actually beginning with the Prologue in Heaven, where Satan, as in the book of Job, appears before the Lord, and gets leave to try to tempt a mortal from the right path. But this, brought upon the stage, would shock the English sensitiveness; therefore the scene is modified in the English version of the libretto, and Mephisto makes his proposition to a choir of angels, instead of to the Lord. Any how, the opera is but a succession of a number of detached scenes, with no very continuous dramatic progress. And, strangely, he brings into the Prologue in Heaven the chorus of Female Penitents from the very last scene of the second Faust.

Meanwhile, we read that still another Faust opera, that by Edouard Lassen, of Weimar, is soon to be revived at Berlin. Of this, M. Jullien speaks in high praise. Our readers must have been astonished by the long list of Faust composers whom that French writer has enumerated; and after his description there might be some curiosity (while Faust, and still more Mephistopheles, are "on the brain") to hear that other full-fledged opera of Faust by the Parisian lady, Mlle. Bertin. But, as will be seen by the chapter of M. Jullien's book which we present to-day, he gives a most decided preference, over all the musical versions of Goethe's drama, to that of Robert Schumann, who, to be sure, lived to complete only certain scenes of it, but these, particularly the last and most important, in a way only possible to a musician of his rare and deep poetic genius. We are happy to say that there is a fair chance of our hearing Schumann's Scenes from Goethe's Faust sung by the Cecilia, with orchestra, next winter.

MUSIC ABROAD.

BERLIN. The Royal Opera-house closed on the 22d June, for two months, with Robert le Diable. The following statistical items are furnished by Ferdinand Gumbert, the critic of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung:—

From the 15th August, 1879, to the 22d June, 1880, there were 236 operatic performances of 30 works by 28 composers. The novelties were Die Königin von Saba by Goldmark; Der Rattenfänger von Hameln, by Nessler; and Carmin, by Bizet. Die Königin von Saba scored 16 performances; Lohengrin, Tannhäuser, and Carmin, 12 each; Czar und Zimmermann, 11; Fidelio and Les Huguenots, 9 each; Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, Der Freischütz, and Der Rattenfänger, 8 each; Don Juan and Le Lac des Fées, 7 each; La Muette de Portici, Le Prophète, L'Africain, and Die Zauberflöte, 6 each; Der fliegende Holländer, Hans Heiling, Das goldene Kreuz, Il Trovatore, Le Nozze di Figaro, La Fille du Régiment, and Robert le Diable, 5 each; Rienzi, Die Maccabäer, La Traviata, Le Domino Noir, and Fra Diavolo, 4 each; Das Feldlager in Schlesien, Genoveva, and Die Meistersinger, 3 each; Aida, Lucia, Hamlet, Faust, Ferruccio, Armin, Roméo et Juliette, Oberon, Olympia, and Martha, 2 each; Templer und Jüdin, Euryanthe, Iphigenia in Tauris, Jessonda, La Juive, Armida, La Dame Blanche, Joseph en Egypte, and Il Barbiere, 1 each. Richard Wagner claimed 36 performances with 5 works; Meyerbeer, 29 with 5; Auber, 21 with 4; Mozart, 17 with 3; Goldmark, 16 with 1; Bizet, 12 with 1; Lortzing, 11 with 1; Weber and Verdi, each 11 with 3; Beethoven, 9 with 1; Nessler and Nicolai, each 8 with 1; Donizetti, 7 with 2; Marschner and Rubinstein, each 6 with 2; Brüll, 5 with 1; Gounod, 4 with 2; Schumann, 3 with 1; Gluck, 2 with 2; Spontini, Hoffmann, Flotow, Halévy, and Thomas, each 2 with 1; Spohr, Méhul, Rossini, and Boieldieu, each 1 with 1.

Herr Kahl, hitherto chorus-master at the Royal Opera-house, has been appointed conductor. The appointment has been received with general satisfaction. There are two conductors at the Royal Opera-house. The other is Herr Kadecke.

LEIPZIG. Active preparations are making at the theatre here for bringing out, during the coming winter, the whole series of Gluck's French operas, as well as the operas of Weber. Independently of these great enterprises, several operas will be performed for the first time; viz., Lancelot, composed by Hentschel, Iwein, by Klughardt, and Agnes Bernauerin, by Mottl.

BRUSSELS. The representation of Belgian works, at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, during the fêtes of Independence, began with Gretry's Richard Cœur de Lion, which was finely interpreted and produced a considerable effect. M. Soulaeroix, in the part of Blondel, and M. Rodier, in that of Richard, distinguished themselves particularly. In the third act was interpolated a ballet, composed of dances borrowed from other scores of Gretry.

VIENNA has raised a monument, at the Grinzing cemetery, to Ambros, the celebrated historian of music, and writer of those delightful papers collected in two volumes under the title, "Bunte Blätter," several of which we translated a few years since in this Journal.

LONDON. The programme of the last week of the season (July 12-17) at Covent Garden Theatre offered: Estella, by Jules Cohen, with Patti, Nicolini and Cotogni; I Puritani, with Albani, Gayarré and Graziani; Lucia, with Mme. Sembrich; Semiramide, with Patti, Scalchi and Gailhard (Patti's benefit); the first two acts of Mignon, and the grand scene of Norma, for Albani's benefit, with Mmes. Scalchi and Valleria, and Messrs. Engel and Vidal; and La Traviata, with Patti, Nicolini and Graziani.

—The event of the London season was the long expected Mefistofele of Arrigo Boito, poet and composer in one, at Her Majesty's Theatre, July 6. The Graphic says of it:

"The cast of the dramatis personæ was in most respects all that could be desired, even by Sig. Boito himself—who can hardly have witnessed so consummately natural and, at the same time, artistic embodiment, in one and the same person, of the Gretchen and Helen of his own conception, as that of Mme. Christine Nilsson. Without entering into details, for which space is wanting, we may briefly say that the now universally accepted 'Swedish Nightingale,' by this her latest assumption, has added fresh laurels to a brow already overcharged. Her Margaret was the Margaret of Goethe and Boito (not the Ary-Schefferized Margaret of Gounod and his two librettists); her Helen was the very type of antique grace and beauty; so that we had before us, first the 'romantic,' then the 'Grecian' ideal, which at the end seemed fused and moulded into one. Signor Campanini was the Faust we all know so well—in one part as in the other the same marked individuality. Mme. Trebelli was the Martha of the first, and the 'Pantallis' of the second part—in both, it is needless to add excellent; and Signor Grassi 'doubled' the characters of Wagner and Nereus. The Mephistopheles of Signor Nannetti (who, with Signor Campanini, first appeared in the opera of Signor Boito at Bologna) is in every respect a notable performance—open, however, to criticism as it is to praise. With such a combination it is not surprising that all the vocal music should fare well. The orchestra was throughout what might have been expected from such a body of executants, in a work so new and strange as to excite all their interest and rivet all their attention."

The plot of the opera is thus described in Figaro:

"The opera opens with the 'Prologue in Heaven,' consisting of a dialogue between an unseen chorus and Mefistofele, in which the demon derides the inhabitants of earth, and lays a wager with the angels that he will entrap Faust. At the end of the prologue a chorus of penitents arises, and the scene ends with an eight-part chorus, in which the two choirs are united. The first act proper opens with the 'Kermesse' scene, the people holiday-making, and the Elector and his cavalcade passing at the back of the stage. The choir of holiday-makers have a waltz, but Faust is troubled at the approach of a certain gray friar, whom the leitmotiv in the prologue proclaims to be Mefistofele. From this scene in the same act we are carried to Faust's cell, and the philosopher is seen studying the Scriptures. He is startled by the appearance of the gray friar, who, quickly throwing off his gown, is discovered as a gallant. He sings a diabolic aria, in which he proclaims himself the Power of Darkness, and Faust, by a shake of the hand, seals with him the contract by which the devil is to be Faust's servant on earth, he becoming Satan's slave in hell. As Mefistofele is about to carry off the philosopher in his cloak the curtain falls. The garden scene, which opens the next act, is very curiously treated, certain fragmentary duologues, in which the various leitmotivs figure, serving to disclose the love passages between Faust and Margaret and Mefistofele and Martha. At last Faust gives Margaret the potion, and the scene is changed to the Brocken. Here the wildest and most powerful music of Signor Boito is given. Mefistofele carries Faust to the summit of the heights, and, amidst a diabolical chorus of witches, he seats himself on his rocky throne, breaking the ball of pasteboard, in type of the destruction of earth. The diabolical chorus is renewed with even greater fury, and amidst a scene of general excitement the act ends. The third act is the death scene of Margaret. Alone, lying on a straw pallet, and bereft of senses, she awaits the coming of the executioner who is to award mundane punishment for the death of her babe and the alleged murder, by the potion, of her mother. Tempted to escape by both Faust and Mefistofele, she resists, and after tender love passages, at the break of day, when the devil becoming more importunate as he finds his power escaping, she dies. Mefistofele shouts 'She is damned,' but the choir of angels retort 'She is saved,' and as the executioner with his escort arrives Faust and the devil disappear. In the next act we are carried to the shore of the Peene, and, amidst scenes of laurel and Doric temples and flowers, Helen of Troy with Pantallis sits on her jewelled throne, with Faust reclining on a mossy bank at her feet. The duet between Helen and Pantallis is one of the most beautiful numbers of the opera, and after a stately Greek dance of sirens it is succeeded by a love scene between Helen and Faust, the latter attired (for what reason does not appear) in all the panoply of a fifteenth century cavalier. As Helen and Faust embrace, the act closes. The epilogue, between which and the succeeding acts much has happened, takes place in the laboratory of Faust, the philosopher reading the Scriptures and Mefistofele looking over his shoulder. In vain the devil tempts him by lust of gain, of safety, and of flesh. The trumpets of Heaven and the Celestial Choir are heard. Faust, sorely tried, seizes Holy Writ, and as he dies angels shower roses on his body, Mefistofele sinks to earth, and the Celestial Choir proclaims the sinner is clouded with the odorous roses of salvation."

Of the musical merits of the work and its interpretation, the same authority continues:

"That Signor Boito has been uniformly happy in his musical treatment of this great subject cannot be said. The opera was written when the composer was but twenty-seven—that is to say, at an age when great ideas are usually followed by slender fruition. Signor Boito had obviously heard or read Wagner's works, and he adopts from them the leitmotiv and, to a certain extent, independence of orchestration. With these are allied the Italian love of pure unfettered melody, and so far as its ground plan is concerned, 'Mefistofele' far more resembles Meyerbeer than Wagner. It is in the fantastic portions of the work that he has succeeded best, and although 'Mefistofele' is indisputably the finest work which has emanated from modern Italy, the power and the weakness the composer has alike displayed show that he is capable of far better things. Signor Boito was fortunate in his interpreters. No finer nor more artistic exponent of Mefistofele, on whom the burthen of the work rests, could well be desired than Signor Nannetti. A good singer with an admirable voice, and a powerful actor, the laurels of the opera indisputably fell to the artist who performed the title-role. A Faust more certain in his intonation and less superabundant in energy than Signor Campanini (who, with Signor Nannetti, was concerned in the revival at Bologna) would have been desirable; but Madame Christine Nilsson, the successor of Madame Borghi Mamo, looked charming alike in the simple dress of Margaret and the not too classic robes of Helen of Troy; and Madame Trebelli as Martha and Pantallis did the little she had to do in the spirit of a true artist. The opera is splendidly mounted, and the stage management, particularly in the scene on the Brocken, was unusually effective. Signor Ardit, although he, like Herr Richter, could not induce the worn-out chorus of Her Majesty's Theatre to sing in tune, conducted admirably, and the production of 'Mefistofele' was a marked success. The grand season ends to-night, but the extra season will be prolonged while 'Mefistofele' runs, at any rate."

DIALOGUE

BETWEEN AN ENQUIRING YOUNG MUSICIAN AND A DOCTOR OF THE ADVANCED SCHOOL.

YOUNG MUS. God save thee, master. Give me speech of thee.

DOCTOR. Have with thee, sir. Mine ear is bent thy way. YOUNG MUS. Doctor, most learned in the subtleties Of music's mysteries, I pray thee aid

A youth who but commences his career, And fain would learn to be as great as thou!

DOCTOR. What I can tell thee shall be told at once.

Far be it from me to deny the hand Of welcome and good fellowship to one Who comes with simple faith to learn of me. Now that the glorious light of modern thought Has dawned for music as for other things, Your path seems plain. Eschew decayed old creeds; Heed not the dotards who would have you keep An old-world style; throw antiquated forms To the four winds. We for Sonatas read Rhapsodies, and for Symphonies, Tone-poems, Unmarred by idle tunes in order ranged, Or page on page of loathsome prettiness.

YOUNG MUS. Is music then not made of melody?

DOCTOR. By no means, sir. For all our best effects Are gained with what uneducated ears Would take for discords, in a strange array Made up of accidental sharps and flats, And double sharps and flats which cannot be Comprised within the diatonic scale. A few strange octaves in the inner parts (Sounded on some unwonted instruments), Provided they but be consecutive, Are seldom out of place. Then some throw in A dash of fifths for seasoning, and mind, Thou may'st not quarrel with an unresolved Seventh or ninth; for it has doubtless been As unprepared as it is unresolved; And so by Nature's equipolse (nihil ex nihilo fit) that or any chord Which prudes deem doubtful, but which we admire, Passes along unquestioned if unloved, Back to the limbo whence it first emerged: Its very weirdness makes it exquisite, And fills with peace all true musician-souls!

[Smiles with ecstasy, and, closing his eyes, is for some moments lost in thought.]

YOUNG MUS. Have I your leave to prosecute my art?

DOCTOR. Do so, my son. But of all things beware Of too much tune. Full many have there been Who, like thyself, have sought to soar and sing Of Time and of Eternity, whose fault Was that they fancied themselves larks, whereas Twittering sparrows they were mostly like, And, snapping beaks in childish crudity, Unlike the lark who has somewhat to sing, Gave to the world what the world wanted not, Or had been given better long before.

YOUNG MUS. Alas! meseems I had best hold my peace, For ever I a sparrow must remain Compared with larks like Beethoven.

DOCTOR. Stop there!

Precisely now we touch the very point, Which I and others of the Grand New School Labor to demonstrate. Thou sayest well That, judged by Beethoven's, thy precious airs Seem rather less than feeble.

YOUNG MUS. Pardon me.

I never said so, though may be 'tis so.

DOCTOR. No doubt 'tis so. Yet is there hope for thee.

No woman yet looked ugly in the dark! Ah! how becoming is a bridal veil!

A ruin is most picturesque o' nights!

What we see least of we admire the most!

So with thy melodies. Let listeners have So little of them that they long for more:

'Tis wonderful how even commonplace

And unoriginal airs, if quaintly garbed,

And nicely broken-off in nick of time,

Just as the attention of the swinish crew

Begins to be concentrated, charm the ear

Of true musicians qualified to judge.

Believe me, child, these last will gladly bear

Inflections of a really cruel kind,

So thou but wand'rest through sufficient keys,

And bear'st in mind the golden rules of sound,

—Suspension's strain, delicious dissonance,

Vagueness and wailing, 'wondering wonderment,—

These, with the octaves and aforesaid fifths, And unexpected enharmonic change, Will gain thee hearing amongst men like US, And stamp thee as a SYMPATHETIC SOUL!

YOUNG MUS. Ah Sir, thou meanest this: that I must hide

Myself as much as may be in a guise

Of cumbrous and extraneous mannerism,

Must start in horror from simplicity,

And clothe my meanness in pretentious rage!

DOCTOR. [Delighted.] Heyday, heyday! not badly put.

I shall

Be able to make somewhat of thee yet!

THE MUSICAL VERSIONS OF GOETHE'S "FAUST."

BY ADOLPHE JULLIEN.¹

VIL THE "FAUST" OF GOUNOD.

This last Faust is first of all an opera; it cannot therefore, with the exception of some few pieces, be compared to the romantic legend of Berlioz, nor to the musical poem of Schumann. Being an opera, the work of M. Gounod had above all to satisfy the exigencies of the stage. Thus the authors have preserved the principal personages, and the most dramatic situations of the German drama, leaving aside what seemed to them unlyrical, notably the whole of the fantastical part, including the Walpurgis night.

Musical history has singular turns. A work which for a long time has a great popularity suddenly finds itself replaced in public favor by a work more young in inspiration and in structure. So it was with the Faust of Spohr. The French opera was not slow to unite all suffrages and make the German opera forgotten, even in Germany. The fact is, M. Gounod's Faust is above all a work of the epoch, which responds to the musical tastes and to the aspirations of the middle of our century. For long years Spohr's Faust had the same success. Who knows if time, that supreme judge of works of art and literature, will not rob the French Faust of the whole or part of this favor, ever so little mundane though it be?

Do not mistake our meaning; we have no idea of depreciating a work which we regard as one of the best lyrical products that have appeared in France for a long time; but, for the very reason that we so estimate it, we would fain express our thought precisely, although it run counter to the general opinion. In spite of his respect for the situation and the characters, M. Gounod does not seem to us, except in certain instants, to have rendered the interior sense of the German legend. Above all he fails to convey the simplicity, the naïve candor, which breathe through the slightest words of Marguerite or of Faust, that learned doctor whose science, painfully acquired, flies away at the breath of youth, at the spectacle of nature. This music so minutely polished, so curiously refined, so classical—although it affects certain timid audacities which the author would be glad to have pass for bold strokes,—seems to be a skillfully managed compromise between the French, the German, and even the Italian school. This manner of proceeding offered great chances of success, but it exposes the work to the risk of being more severely judged by posterity; every fashion reigns but once.

Sometimes too, the author takes too much liberty with the original poem. Certainly the choral of the swords is a large and powerful page, but why suppress the couplets of Brander? What false modesty could have counselled the librettists to modify the famous song of the Flea? The composer, as it seems to us, could only have gained inspiration from the very words of the poet. Moreover it is very curious to remark how much the composer raises him in proportion as he approaches the original drama. The opening, the soliloquy of the doctor who has resolved to die, and the end, the act in the prison, where are combined passionate love, religious enthusiasm and satanic rage, are felicitous pieces. The scene of the duel is poorly treated, and the musician has tried to get away from Berlioz by giving to the devil's serenade a less intoxicating, but more mocking color: he has not succeeded. The song of the King of Thule (setting aside the interjections of Marguerite, of which there is no trace in the monologue of Goethe) is a delicate inspiration; the scene even of Marguerite at the wheel,—without having the value of Schubert's melody, which is a masterpiece,—is full of fire and anxious fervor. Finally, the aria of Faust: "Salve, dimora casta e pura," though inferior to the melody of Berlioz, breathes the calmness and the peace of the virginal sanctuary.

Turning to the impassioned part of the drama, we meet in the French opera two capital pages; the scene of the garden, and the great love duet. M. Gounod, in his love scene, which begins with an exquisite phrase: "Dammi ancor contemplar il tuo viso," restores the delicious episode of the star flower, which he had cut out from the preceding scene. Here, and in the exclamation of Faust: "He loves thee! Dost comprehend the meaning of that? He loves thee!" the musician has remained below his model; but he quickly repairs this moment of oblivion by two ravishing pages, the Andante, "O night of love!" and Marguerite's invocation to the stars. The quartet in the garden is also a beautiful piece of dramatic music. M. Gounod has combined here the two episodes: The house of the neighbor, and the Garden of Martha. Schumann has painted but a corner of the picture, and yet the French composer, whatever his merit, is vanquished by the German master writing from inspiration a melody of incomparable expression; one has made a work of talent, of great talent, the other has made a work of genius.

Let M. Gounod approach his model once more, and he will write two very superior pages. We speak of the death of Valentine and of the scene in the church. Here the author follows step by step the German text. At this contact, his melody rises, his conception becomes more large. The imprecations of Valentine, the stupor of the crowd, the bewilderment of Marguerite, all, even to the closing chorus of the act, so terrible and so true in its brevity, all happily renders here the color of the original scene. And one may say as much of the scene of the Cathedral. To be sure, the picture of the French musician is not so terribly grand as that of Schumann; but, such as it is, it merits regard. These are two effective scenes, but with this difference, that the German composer reaches a much grander effect by simpler means.

We know not what the future has in reserve for the capital work of the French musician; but if several pages run the risk of becoming less esteemed hereafter, it is those very ones which, we believe, are too much admired to-day. Whatever may be said or done, the time is near when we shall demand of the composer, before all, a music in exact accordance with the realities of life, — not our life, but that of his characters. All that is merely conventional will disappear. And this will happen by the very force of things, by the reiterated attempts of musicians, whose strokes of boldness will perhaps be condemned, only to be afterwards admired. And for the rest, what composer of genius has not innovated in his day? Is it Gluck? is it Spontini? Is it Weber? Rossini? Wagner? M. Gounod's mistake was in not daring enough. Half-boldness never succeeds, in music, nor in anything else. Attacking a subject of this grandeur, he should not have recoiled before any audacity, although it would make the critics and the world cry out.

And after all, has not the transportation of Faust to the opera begun to realize what we have said? The pieces, the scenes which were the most admired still appear charming, but we think that we discover under these chords something of trickery and sentimentalism; the fine harmonies of the musician, his favorite cadences, begin to seem a little finical. En revanche, the finale of the prison produces a greater effect than it did formerly; the maledictions of the expiring Valentine, and the fine scene of the Cathedral which used to be heard with distracted ears, now send a thrill of terror through the surprised and troubled audience. These are the scenes in which, in our opinion, the author has the most closely approached his redoubtable model. Here it is that he has best surrendered himself to the inspirations of his rich artist nature, and has most forgotten the rules and exigencies of fashion. And it is here that he has composed the best pages of dramatic music that it was ever given him to write.

(Conclusion in next number.)

BACH AND HIS MUSIC.

On the twenty-eighth of July, one thousand seven hundred and fifty — one hundred and thirty years ago — died John Sebastian Bach, as Cantor of the Thomas Schule in Leipzig. It is said that when Frederick the Great had heard Bach extemporize a fugue in six real parts, he exclaimed, "There is only one Bach!" A hundred and thirty years have elapsed since the great composer died, and those years have given to the world the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, and Mendelssohn; yet, after taking a wide out-look upon the treasures which those honored names cover, we turn to the astounding compositions of him of Leipzig, and exclaim with Frederick — "There's only one Bach!" The humble Cantor is alone: he occupies a place which is unique in the history of music.

To collate his works, and estimate them at their true value, is in these days happily unnecessary. His very name is to-day the synonym of whatever is learned, great, noble and majestic in music. His masses and other vocal works are masterpieces of contrapuntal skill; his organ works are the treasure of every competent player; his preludes and fugues (the "Forty-Eight"), are a deathless monument of his inimitable power in combining science and art. Before this last magnificent work we fall in rapt admiration and mute astonishment. If Bach had written nothing else than the forty-eight Preludes and Fugues, the world would owe him unbounded thanks for that sublime work alone. Well might Mr. Hullah say that it is not conceivable that a time should ever arrive in the history of the race when the human mind shall grow weary of the "Forty-eight!" They are as bright and as fresh now as when they were published nearly a century and a half ago, and as long as music gives pleasure to the mind and solace to the soul, these precious gems will remain as pure and as beautiful as they are to-day. They are to music what the cathedrals are to architecture, and the works of the old Italian painters are to painting; they are the classic models of antiquity; and to lose them irretrievably would be like burning the Vatican or destroying the British Museum by an earthquake.

The works of Bach are wonderful if only for their feeding and sustaining power. They act upon the mind of a musician like wholesome food and pure, fresh air upon his body. They invigorate, strengthen and stimulate. To play them or to hear them played is a treat of no ordinary kind, and when the soul becomes weary of modern romanticism and sickly sentimentalism, it goes down to the edge of that great sea, feels the bracing breeze, hears the rolling of that mighty tide, and is restored almost as by the touch of Omnipotence. These preludes and fugues seem fit food for natures of all kinds. Chopin, when he had to appear in public, did not practice his own pieces, but had a fortnight of Bach. Mendelssohn knew the forty-eight by heart; Beethoven knew them; all the great masters knew them, and all profited by them. To open the forty-eight at all offers a tempting field of inquiry; to analyze them would be a labor of love. We need only point to a few of them to show what we mean when we speak of their feeding and sustaining power. Could anything surpass the first C-major prelude for sweetness (not played at Herr Pauer's pace — that is much too fast) or the second in the same key for marvellous dignity and mighty moving power? Or the F-minor prelude and fugue (No 12 second set) for plaintive touching tenderness? Or the first B-flat prelude for an irresistible rush of music? Who are the people, and what can they be made of, who have studied the "Forty-eight," and ever found them to tire? When we are weary of the Maudslows and the Postlethwaites of maundering mediocrity we turn to Hamlet, read "In Memoriam," go to the National Gallery, or sit down and play some of these preludes and fugues; and the jaded soul lives again under the magic touch of genius. It would be utterly impossible to estimate the influence which the immortal "Forty-eight" have exercised on music during the last hundred and thirty years; and if we add to this the effect which Bach's other works have had, we shall realize, to some extent, the debt of gratitude which musicians owe to the great Cantor. If one hundred and thirty years have only tended to establish his fame more and more firmly, we may be sure that coming years will not dim the brightness of his glory, or lessen the veneration in which he is held to-day. — *Lond. THE LYRICAL DRAMA.

BY G. A. MACFARREN, ESQ., M.A.,
Mus. Doc. Cantab., Prof. Mus. Cantab.

Another composer, who was also a cultivated musician, and who had already gained great celebrity by his composition of madrigals, but greater celebrity by his introduction of some important new principles in musical theory, was Claudio Monteverde, a man of the highest note in the history of art, as having been the first person who felt the natural basis of music as distinguished from the artificial rules, which up to the time of his appearance on the scene of history had always prevailed. He it was who first employed what must be called the natural discords — those discords, namely, which, consisting of the notes of the harmonic series, are naturally produced, as distinct from those other discords which can only be satisfactorily heard when their harshness is mitigated by the formula of preparation. These let us call artificial discords; those which Monteverde originated, natural discords. And modern music may be said to date from his first use of the chords in question, the best known of which and the most used is that ever-ready chord of the dominant seventh; and when once the principle of its use was understood an entirely new field was open in the range of the composer's art, and all time since has been most valuably, most beautifully engaged in the cultivating of this field. And how great, how noble, is the harvest it has yielded! Must we not feel that the mind of the artist is the virgin-mother, from which proceeds the divine child, that, passing through the world, bears its burden of beauty, and this is scattered freely among those whose hearts of faith enable them to receive and perceive the bounty that is offered them?

Monteverde composed first an opera called Arianna, of which but a small fragment remains. This was in 1607. It had a very great success, in consequence of which, and by its encouragement, he wrote in the following year an opera which has been preserved entire, having been contemporaneously printed, Orfeo. The work is highly remarkable in the fact that it employs a very large number of instruments, that it not only aims to declaim the words and portray the dramatic situations, but to characterize each individuality of the action, and distinguish Orpheus from Eurydice, both of them from Pluto, and every other person in the drama; and it is remarkable as giving us the oldest extant attempt at what we now call an overture — an instrumental prelude. A most remarkable piece is this said prelude, comprising nine long bars directed to be played through thrice, and entirely consisting of the one chord of C from the commencement to the end. This would seem an extravagance, but there is a composition which but a few years ago was first publicly performed, and which has drawn the attention of many musical critics and the admiration of some, that has for overture what amounts to five pages of pianoforte arrangement, and consisting wholly and exclusively of one chord of E flat, which is mostly dispersed over the melodic figure that is employed conspicuously in Mendelssohn's overture to The Beautiful Melusine. I was once present when an admirer spoke of this composition as sublime, and a bystander said he thought it went a step beyond. However, this is by the way. It is only to show that Monteverde, in his originating the overture, in his having a large orchestra, in his intermixture of chorus and solos, in his giving substantial characterization to each person in his story, indicated, although not in those early days fulfilled, but indicated all that dramatic art can fulfil in music.

Shortly after the time of Monteverde, appeared a Venetian of great merit, whose name is familiar as Cavalli; but this is an abbreviation or a pet name given by the world, and is not his real patronymic. He had very great success in Venice, and seemingly from very great desert; and so great was his success there, that he went to Paris after a time, to reproduce some of his works.

Having named Paris, we now come to a very important phase in the history of the musical drama. We have to speak of Giovanni Battista Lulli, a born Florentine, who went to Paris as a page to a princess when thirteen years old; who, because of his ugly face and awkward manner, was thought unfit for the position to which he was called. He was driven into the kitchen to act as scullion, but so greatly entertained his fellow-servants by his performance on the violin, that his fame for musicianship rose upstairs; and here really may be felt to have been an illustration, or an anticipation, of true "high life below stairs," since, with Lulli in the kitchen, there was a higher art than was to be found in the King's chambers. Lulli was called to take part in the music of Louis XIV., and such excellent part did he take that a separate band of twenty-four violins, which I suppose must have included the bass-viol as a branch of the violin family, was appointed for him to direct, for him to teach, and for him to write for. One result of this was that when Charles II. returned to his throne in England, after his sojourn in the Court of Louis XIV., he set up also his royal band of musicians, also consisting of twenty-four, with John Banister as its leader; and from that may doubtless have come down to us the nursery lines of "Four-and-twenty fiddlers all in a row." Now before the King it was very frequent to have performances of ballets. There had been in the latter part of the sixteenth century ballets interspersed with choruses performed before the Court, and Lulli was engaged to compose the music for a continuation of this line of dancing dramas.

It is worth while to rest here a moment on the somewhat remarkable fact that whereas France is regarded as the centre of taste—fashions are drawn from France, and our standard of likes and dislikes is placed in the French capital—the French themselves have in a remarkable degree referred to Italy for their music. Thus, the origination of the French opera springs from those ballets for which Lulli composed the music—Lulli, an Italian. Previous to that, Cardinal Mazarini, whose name was abbreviated and is more frequently pronounced in its French form, had introduced some Italian operas in France; and long subsequently Piccini was invited to Paris to compose operas, and to stand at the head of the most important and significant controversy on the merits of the musicianship of two nations, and to arbitrate the taste of the Parisians. There was then founded the Paris Conservatoire, of which Paër, an Italian, was the first principal, and Cherubini succeeded to him. Thus, however great power the French have had in spreading their principles of taste, they have been modest enough to derive these from whatever good sources they could draw them. The ballets of Lulli were presently extended. Some operas by Cavalli were performed by the French Court, and Lulli composed dances for insertion in them. Then was given to another composer, Cambert, and to a librettist, Perrin, a patent for the performance of operas in the Institution then called the Académie Royale. The King, after two years, withdrew the patent and gave it to his favorite Lulli, who was so great a favorite, indeed, that he was not intrusted alone with musical affairs, but he was appointed private secretary to the King, and held other functions of great importance. Now because the French opera arose from ballet, it has never been entirely exempted from it; and there will be presently occasion to show how imperative became in the constitution of French grand opera the mixture, or intermixture, of singing and dancing. Lulli's operas consisted of music throughout, either vocal or instrumental.

A great light in Italy, Alessandro Scarlatti, in 1680, produced at Rome his first opera, and this is said to have been followed by 108 others; a stupendous number in sound. But it is to be borne in mind that the operas of that day were neither of the length nor of the elaborate structure of those of later time. There may be dated from this period the two-fold school of the French and the Italian opera, with Lulli, the Italian, at the head of the French school, and Scarlatti, the Neapolitan, at the head of the Italian school. But the rest of the world was not entirely inactive in operatic composition up to this time. We find in 1625 a translation of one of Rinuccini's lyrical dramas, Dafne, set to music by Heinrich Schütz, in Germany, but it appears to have been a solitary work. About the same period Nicolo Lanieri, an Italian, settled in England, and wrote music to a masque by Ben Jonson, which music comprised the entire of the text. This masque, however, like those first Italian attempts, was not aimed at public performance, but was privately represented in the Court of Charles I., by persons of the highest social condition.

Very much to do with the growth of this declamatory style of music must be considered the cantata, of which Carissimi, in the first instance, produced many remarkable specimens. The cantata was at first a term applied to compositions for a single voice, which had an intermixture of recitative—that is, musical declamation—with rhythmical melody. After Carissimi, Stradella, Francesco Rossi, and others obtained great distinction in the composition of cantatas. The word has now come to have a different application, but such was its original meaning. These declaimed pieces were always of a dramatic character, although they were monologues. There are in the spoken drama instances of pieces that are entirely monologue; and there was, in the latter part of the last century, a fashion in Germany for such monologues interspersed with music that aimed to illustrate the passions set forth in the text, and this music would either separate the sentences after the manner of interludes, in what we call accompanied recitative, or sometimes very softly accompany the spoken declamation. These monologues would not bear the name of cantata, which, of course, signifies "sung," but they are the spoken analogy to the cantatas of Stradella, Carissimi, Durante, and persons of that class.

Let us now turn to the opera in England. It is a remarkable and an important fact that the first opera in England was represented in the time of the Commonwealth, in 1656, by the express license of Cromwell granted to Sir William Davenant, for performance in Rutland House, Aldersgate, of an opera in five acts, called the Siege of Rhodes. The libretto of this is extant, but, unluckily, none of the music. The title-page states that each act was set to music by a separate composer, and this opera was throughout, from first to last, entirely sung. Besides that this was the first English opera, there is another remarkable circumstance connected with it, that in the principal character, Ianthe, the first female performer that ever was heard upon the English stage sustained a part—Mrs. Coleman, the wife of Dr. Coleman, who composed the music of one of the acts. Thus, from the Puritan time in England dates the opening of the English opera, and that very important introduction into musical performances, the beautiful sound of the female voice.

Directly after this appears Purcell on the scene. In his youth—nay, his youth was all his life; he died young, but he was in freshest blossom throughout his entire career—but in his earliest days he wrote an opera, Dido and Æneas, which was on the Italian and French model, being entirely sung throughout. Later he wrote for the public theatre (Dido and Æneas having been composed for a private school), and then the so-called operas were spoken dramas interspersed with music. In this fact I think there is much to be regretted for the art, since, whenever there is in the scanty materials afforded him any opportunity for dramatic painting, for personal characterization, or for illustration of the scene, he grasps this with a master-hand that might well have manipulated the materials of an after age. He was closely hampered by principles enunciated by the chief dramatic poet of the time, Dryden, who alleged that on the stage the use of music should be limited either to mythological beings or to supernatural agencies; and thus, in the so-called operas of Purcell, either eunuchers, or spirits, or gods, or goddesses, or as a great stretch of the supernatural, mad men and women, are the only persons who appear as singers. Thus, in the operas on the story of Don Quixote, the scene, "From rosy bowers," and the scene, "Let the dreadful engines," are assigned respectively to the poor girl who has gone mad for love, and to Cardenio, whom Don Quixote encounters in his frenzy among the mountains.

Shortly after the time of Purcell's birth, but contemporaneously with his later writings, appeared in Germany a most important hero in our history, Reinhard Keiser, who produced an immensely large number of operas, which had very great success, firstly in Hamburg and subsequently in Berlin. In Hamburg he directed the theatre, and as director he engaged Handel to play in his band, in the early youth of that musician, who, while holding his place among the second violins, still had opportunity to convince the world of his dawning powers as a composer, for there in Hamburg he wrote his first operas.

The principle upon which the opera had first been instituted now began to degenerate. The art of the singer had greatly advanced. The power of execution, of rendering florid passages with a volubility that seems now almost incredible, since all but unattainable, made it necessary that the composer of an opera should insert pieces for vocal display rather than for dramatic propriety; and one finds in the operas of the period, that the entire action is carried on in recitative, and this action is interrupted by songs where the personages have to stand and either address the audience, or address one another; while if other persons have to listen there is the exceedingly difficult task of filling out the scene where there are no words and no notes to utter.

The opera now became more and more artificial. The songs or arias were arranged in five express classes. There was the aria cantabile, which was for the most part a grand pathetic adagio, containing very much florid ornament, but rather as a grace than as matter of continuous execution. Then there was the aria di portamento, which corresponded to a great extent with what is now understood by "cavatina." Then the aria di mezzo carattere; then the aria parlante, in which one had scarcely ever more than a note to a word, so that it approached more to the character of declamation than any of the other classes; and lastly the aria di bravura or d'agilità. It was required in an opera that every character should have two specimens of each of these five arias, that no two of the same class should ever come in succession, and that each act must have its aliquot portion of the sum total. Thus it will be readily seen that the dramatic action was a matter secondary to the exhibition of the five different qualifications of a singer, and the story of the drama of minor importance to vocal display.

We find in Handel, and in others whose names pale under the brilliant lustre of his, the power of dramatic characterization. We find a different class of music and form of phrase and idiom assigned to the several personages in his drama; and we find this, which seems to me to have been a new element at his time, for I have not been able to trace it earlier, combining several personages with their individual characters in one composition. Thus, in Acis and Galatea there is a trio, where two lovers utter their words of tenderness to one another, while the Cyclops expresses his rage that Acis should stand between him and the gratification of his monstrous love. There is in Semele a quartet where the four personators are strongly individualized. In Jephtha we find a quartet and quintet; in the quartet especially there are the anguish of Jephtha that he must sacrifice his child, the anger of his wife that her daughter should be torn from her, the devotion of Iphis who feels she is fulfilling a divine duty in becoming the willing victim of her father's oath, and the grief of the betrothed lover of Iphis at the prostration of his fondest hopes. All these characters are personified, each in a separate and distinct phraseology, and all sing together. Now in this quality, before all, of giving different characters to different persons, and combining in one performance in simultaneous action these several characters, I feel that dramatic music excels every other class of vocal composition. We may talk of the sublimity of the oratorio, and in so far as the oratorio is based upon sublime subjects its expression of the subjects may be sublime. But the dramatic oratorio is capable of all the sublimity which can be infused into didactic oratorio, and it can have this great quality of personification at the same time. It is to be regretted that such rarely occurs in the structure of oratorios, but where it does so occur it gives a most valuable resource to the composer, and opens to him a rich field for musical expression.

REFORM OF CHURCH MUSIC.

CONCLUSION OF MR. THAYER'S ADDRESS.

THE ORGAN.

I cannot forego the opportunity of saying a few words about organs and organists.

Whether professed Christian or not, I believe the organist's first duty is to consider his playing, and all his acts in the sanctuary, as worship. To enter the place for personal display, to show what skill is in feet and fingers, to exhibit his knowledge in the art of registration, to simply earn some money, or have a fine entertainment, is all false and wrong; and if sooner or later he meets with failure or rebuke, let such an organist consider it well deserved. I hold that no person, believer or infidel, Christian or heathen, has any right to step foot inside a church door without a full sense of the sacredness of the place.

On the Sabbath day, or any worshipful occasion, the organ should simply guide and sustain the service of the sanctuary. That is, it should not—festival days, perhaps, excepted—become prominent or aggressive, nor should the organist during the service seek to display either the instrument or himself. Let the service prelude, except on festival days, be always of a quiet and meditative character, or of solid, noble and dignified harmony, rarely, if ever, employing more than the fundamental registers of the organ. In the anthems and other pieces for the choir, let the organ simply and fully sustain the voices, and never at any time be played so as to render the voices obscure or the words unintelligible. When played for the congregation—as it always should be at least once in every service—let it give a full, deep, grand undertone which shall sustain and uplift all who may care to join in the grandest and noblest of all praise. After the benediction let there be a short and quiet response which shall fittingly close the service. Then I believe the time has come for the organ to speak as only this king of instruments can speak. Save on occasions of mourning or sorrow, let it speak forth the everlasting beauty and power of music, and the unspeakable goodness and glory of the Infinite Father. Is there anything beautiful in the organ, let it speak of infinite beauty. Is there anything grand in the instrument, let it speak of the grandeur of the universe, the goodness and greatness of God's infinite mercy and love to his children. For this, and this alone should the organist acquire and use his powers of heart and mind. These, most briefly stated, are the organist's duties and responsibilities; and I believe that he should be fully prepared for them before he assumes the office of musical pastor, or attempts to lead others in the service of the sanctuary.

What are the church organist's rights and privileges? First, he has the right of access to the church and organ at any and all times when they are not in use for service. This has been acknowledged throughout all Christendom ever since the organ was placed in the sanctuary. A few attempts have been made to abrogate this right, but they have always ended by all players of recognized ability shunning such places, as at once inimical to art and the cause of true church music. Who shall fill the ever-recurring vacancies if this right be interdicted? The only reason I have ever heard for such action was on account of the wear and tear of the organ and the church furniture. As for the furniture, if it be worth more than Christianity, let it be sold, and cheaper obtained, or the church go bare, if thereby the service of the sanctuary fail not for want of new disciples in our divine art of music. As for wear and tear to the organ, no more nonsensical reason was ever assigned. I am perfectly sure that every competent organist on the face of the earth will uphold me in the statement that the surest and quickest way to ruin an organ is to let it alone. I believe I have seen as many good and great organs of both continents as any person, and I have always found the best preserved ones—some of them from one to three centuries old—were those which had been most used. Unless willfully, no one can injure a good organ by playing on it. Weak and poor instruments might thereby receive injury, but to my way of thinking the sooner these are annihilated the better for the church, the people and the cause of religion.

Among the privileges now accorded by many churches is one which I hope may soon become a recognized right of the church organist—I mean the right to give organ recitals. "Why don't more people come to church?" is asked from many a sacred desk. And the people reply, "Who wants to go to a place which six days out of seven stands up a great, cold-hearted, forbidding presence, with doors locked and barred as if it were a prison, when on the seventh day it seems so new, so strange, so un-homelike that the people can scarcely enter without fear of intrusion?" With all possible respect would I say it, I believe that ministers and congregations who allow all this may ask the question until doomsday before they see churches filled, or the people, the grand mass of humanity, enter their doors gladly. The church shall become in all things the religious home of man, or it must give way to something else. But such a step backward can never be taken. The good work is begun, and many have thrown open their doors and bid well come to all who will come. It shall go on till neither bolt nor lock be on a church door; until all shall see and know and feel a welcome greeting when they enter the house of the Lord.

But how does all this specially concern church organists? Well, if they would be men of power and worth in the world, they must have a chance to speak to the people. If they would do any good in their art, or with their art, they must use it for the benefit of the people. If they would assist and second the labors of the beloved pastors of our land, they must also have an opportunity to work in the vineyard of the Lord. The true church organist is a musical pastor who must speak to the hearts of the people. Whoso among us does not feel this, is not yet worthy of his sacred calling.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL HYMNS.

And now I want to speak about something which deeply concerns us all—about the dear little folks for whose care and well-being I devoutly believe we are held answerable before the throne of judgment. The children of to-day are the Church and State of to-morrow. If these be wrongly trained and guided, it is certain that the future will be one of ignorance, wrong-doing and misery. So our work should begin here, and begin at once.

If we examine the words and music of the Sunday-school books, what do we find? Save here and there a passable selection, nothing but a mass of stupid, incongruous stuff, nonsense and twaddle; illiterate, ungrammatical, and utterly unpoetical jingle, and music that trash would be too good a name for. And this is not the worst of it. The little innocents are actually obliged to sing this driveling nonsense.

Think of children beginning life with:—

"'Twill all be over soon;
'Tis only for a moment here,
'Twill all be over soon."

Or singing such dismal meditations as this:

"A few more prayers,
A few more tears,
It won't be long. It won't be long."

Or such enforced juvenile hypocrisy as:

"Almost anchored, life's rough journey
Shortly now will all be o'er.
Unseen hands the sails are furling;
Soon I'll reach the heavenly shore.
Almost home! how sweet it soundeth
To the heart that's worn with care."

Think of it! Worn with care at the age of twelve! Further, I have seen and played from a Sunday-school book which had the words "For Jesus is my Saviour," set to that drunkard's melody, "We won't go home till morning;" three or four notes changed, but the rest note for note.

And this in my blessed native State of Massachusetts! Now the music was not bad, for there is no such thing as bad music. But there are such things as bad associations; and when we hear this, or any other melody, repeatedly sung by men reeling home at midnight, we must conclude that it is unfit for church service—unfit, because of bad association; unfit because of inappropriateness; the only things that can render music valueless for good influence and good works.

"As the twig is bent the tree's inclined." So we must begin in the Sunday-school if the music of the church is ever to be reformed. If you have any Sabbath-school books like this, buy no more fire-kindlings until they are in the ash-barrel, past resurrection. Far better that the children should have but a half-dozen hymns, or none at all, than that they be made to sing such arrant nonsense as the majority of these books contain.

CONCLUSION.

A word to choirs, and I have done. Has the choir any part or lot in these things? Most certainly, and a large one, too. What have choirs so far really done? Precious little compared with what they may do. Heretofore they have felt called upon to attend a Saturday evening rehearsal, when many of them would rather have gone to the dentist. A weary, listless struggle of an hour or so, and home they rush—all except the unmarried portion; this part usually don't rush much about getting home. Sundays the volunteers come, or stay at home, or go out driving, two in a carriage. The paid ones come, and placing their hands tenderly on their throats, tell the organist half the time that they have got either the diphtheria, or the epizootic, or both. They sing just enough to please the treasurer, draw their salary, and, with of course exceptions, take about as much interest in the worship as they do in paying the national debt. The rest of the week what are they doing for the church, for public worship, or for the people? Just what could safely be stowed away in a mosquito's vest-pocket. What should they do? Well, they should awake and do something—do almost anything rather than live torpid and useless six days out of seven. Instead of singing all sorts of operatic and other arrangements and loaf-sugar music on Sunday, and taking that day to show what they can do in vocalization, let them at least once a week give to the people, without money and without price, some music which shall make them both better and happier. It is time for choirs to do their part in unbarring the church doors and making people love to come to church. Let them but shake off this lethargy and show what they can do for the people and the uplifting of humanity, and we shall never again hear of churches discussing the advisability of dispensing with the choir.

My conclusions are:

First: Have true church music, or none; for choir hymns, the hymn anthem or full hymn-tune; for congregations, the choral or hymn-tunes of a similar character.

Second: Sing only such hymns as are singable; read the others or let them alone.

Third: Have true choirs, or give up choirs altogether and do your own singing.

Fourth: Let organists and singers, on other days than Sunday, give free to the people all the good-music they can; always letting the people take a generous share in this musical service.

Fifth and lastly: Open your churches freely to the people and let music speak to them, to comfort, to cheer and to strengthen them; and they will soon love to come to church, love to join in adoration and praise; and when they enter the house of God it shall be as a home to them, and they shall all see and know and feel his loving presence and sweet benediction.

GUEYMARD.

Gueymard, the tenor, who filled for many years one of the first places at the Paris Opera, has just died at the village of Saint-Fargau, near Corbell, where he lived in retirement since 1868. Louis Gueymard, born at Chaponnay (Isère) on the 17th August, 1822, studied at the Conservatory of Paris, which he left in 1848 to go at once to the Opera. After "creating" a part in Clappon's Jeune la Folle and playing some subordinate characters, such as Jonas in Le Prophète, he soon reached the first rank. He held his ground for a long time, thanks to a powerful voice and robust constitution, which enabled him to bear the weight of the repertory, without giving way under it. His principal original characters were in La Nonne Sanglante, La Reine de Saba, and Sapho, by Charles Gounod; Les Vêpres Siciliennes and Le Trouvère, by Verdi; La Magicienne, by Halévy; and Roland à Roncevaux, by Mermet. He possessed a voice of extraordinary fullness; it lacked, however, refinement. His style had something rough and brutal about it, but he never hesitated when unusual demands were made on his larynx, and for these, to use a common expression, he paid money down. He married Mme. Lauters, who, after her success at the Theatre-Lyrique, became one of the stars of the Opera. The union did not prove a happy one, and was soon dissolved. As we have said, ever since 1868, he lived in retirement, though the unimpaired condition of his vocal powers would have enabled him to pursue for some years more his professional career. From the time we have mentioned, he did nothing to shake off the oblivion which he philosophically allowed slowly to close over his memory. His funeral took place on the 10th inst., in the little village where he passed away. — Le Ménestrel.

MUSIC IN CHICAGO.

TWO CANTATAS BY LOCAL COMPOSERS.

(From the Chicago Tribune, July 4.)

The Commencement concert of the Hershey School of Musical Art, which took place on Friday evening last, was an event of unusual importance, and marked an era in the progress of musical education in this city, inasmuch as two original compositions were brought out by graduates of this institution. The first was a sacred cantata, written on the verses of the 121st Psalm, for chorus and four solo voices, with organ accompaniment, by Philo A. Otis, who has been for the past four years a pupil of Mr. H. Clarence Eddy. The second work is a secular cantata, entitled "Dornröschen," or "Little Rosebud," adapted from the German legend of the "Sleeping Beauty." This is scored for solo voices and chorus, with orchestral accompaniment, by John A. West, who has studied with Mr. Frederic Grant Gleason for about three years. Each work was conducted by its own composer.

Mr. Otis's cantata opens with a chorus of ladies' voices, which is preceded by an introduction of twenty-four measures in three-quarter rhythm. This is followed, after a short interlude and a change of rhythm, by a positive and characteristic theme given out by the basses. This is worked out in imitative style, and a climax is reached by full, massive chords, which is remarkably effective. By a clever management of the movement, the three-quarter rhythm is again taken up without disturbing the melodic form, and the theme of the first part is treated for mixed voices in a most pleasing manner. The second number, a contralto solo, was sung by Mrs. Oliver K. Johnson with great breadth of style and beauty of expression. It begins quasi recitativo, and introduces a number of charming bits of melodic and harmonic effects. The principal theme of this number is given to the words, "Behold, He that keepeth thee shall neither slumber nor sleep." It is a high type of melody, and the accompaniment is admirably adapted. The design is orchestral, and the blending of the flute, reed, and string qualities was successfully given by the organ. Taken altogether, this is one of the most beautiful numbers of the cantata. The third number commences in a vigorous and brilliant manner, the words of the chorus being: "The Lord is thy keeper, the Lord is thy shade at thy right hand. He will not suffer thy foot to be moved." This was brought out with great animation; but the splendid climax which was reached on the words "The sun shall not smite thee by day," was thrilling, and showed that the composer was master of his subject and of the means of expression. A fine contrast was given on the words, "Nor the moon by night," where everything was subdued and peaceful. The flute obligato in the accompaniment at this place is exceedingly beautiful, the movement given out in this passage is taken up by the other parts, and a second climax is brought out with telling effect. From this point there is a gradual diminuendo, and the movement dies away to the faintest sounds of the organ. No. 4 is a quartet, written in canon form, which is technically of the greatest difficulty. Mr. Otis has not only succeeded in adhering to the strict form of writing, but has produced a musical composition of rare beauty and interest. It was delightfully sung by Mrs. J. A. Farwell, Mrs. O. K. Johnson, Messrs. C. A. Knorr, and J. M. Hubbard. The last chorus, with its "Amen," served to display the general musical ability of the composer in the broadest sense. In this he has employed free four-part writing, the choral, simple and double counterpoint, as well as fugue form. It may be pronounced a success not only from a technical standpoint, but from an objective point of view. The style is grand and massive, and the variety always well contrasted. The theme of the fugue, which is introduced by the altos, is characteristic, and never fails to assert itself during the development of the same. The counterpoint is smooth and flowing, and the modulations well defined. The effect of the choral, which appears as an episode, is peculiarly pleasing. The accompaniment to this is an exposition of the fugue theme, and to those who could distinguish the inner workings this was probably the most fascinating feature of the whole cantata. The work is brought to a highly satisfactory close with the full powers of the chorus and organ. Mr. Otis is to be congratulated on producing a work of this magnitude, and of such sterling qualities. His abilities as a conductor are also to be commended. He possesses a large degree of personal magnetism, and the grace with which he wielded the baton showed that he is unusually talented in this direction.

THE CANTATA OF "DORNRÖSCHEN," or the "Sleeping Beauty," is a setting of the beautiful German myth of that name. It is divided into three scenes, the first being preceded by a hunting-chorus of spirited expression. The first scene proper is laid in the enchanted forest and begins with a recitative for the Prince, in which he speaks of the mysterious stillness which pervades the forest. Here the color of the orchestral accompaniment is dark and sombre and tinged with an air of mysterious melancholy. The legend follows, related by a baritone voice, telling of the castle and enchantment, and of the golden-haired maiden who sleeps in her chamber awaiting a deliverer. At this point enters the "love motive," a tender and passionate strain, which aids largely in the dramatic working out of the subject. The Prince determines to undertake the adventure, but is warned of the terrible fate which has overtaken those who have essayed it. The whole of this warning is conceived in a very original and dramatic form and works up to a climax that is powerfully descriptive, and is scored with a tremolo of the strings against a rush of chromatic scales in the high register of the flutes, while the harmonies are sustained and colored by clarinet and bassoon. But the Prince's determination does not waver, and, after singing an exquisite prayer for help and guidance, in which occurs a beautiful accompanying melody for flute and oboe, the chorus closes the scene.

The second scene is in the enchanted castle, and opens with a charming fairy chorus, announcing the termination of the hundred years of the duration of the magic spell, and the close of their vigil. At last the Prince makes his appearance, and awakens the fair sleeper with a kiss, the love motive of the first scene again occurring, worked up into many new and beautiful forms, and finally blending with a beautiful and passionate love duet, sung by the Prince and Rosebud.

The third scene is devoted to the festivities and rejoicings of the now awakened court, who thank their deliverer, to whom the King presents his daughter in marriage. Again the fairies make their appearance with their benedictions. These fairy choruses are of the most delicate construction, and are ushered in and accompanied by beautiful orchestral effects. The finale consists of full choruses and semi-choruses of men and maidens, conceived in a very unconventional vein, and finely expressive of the happiness of the occasion. The work is full of beautiful melodic and harmonic effects, and the scoring displays a fine knowledge of the color to be derived from the various instrumental combinations. Mr. West is to be congratulated upon this, his first work, which is one of the greatest promise for the future as well as a present success. He has been a faithful and diligent student, and has a fine knowledge of the various devices of the science of counterpoint, which he uses with great facility. The soloists all sang with much finish the difficult parts allotted to them. Miss Ettie Butler, who impersonated the part of Rosebud, sang exquisitely the intensely passionate music given to this character. She was ably seconded by Mr. J. L. Johnson as the Prince, who is the possessor of a remarkably beautiful and sympathetic voice, and sang with the greatest steadiness and precision, contributing largely to the successful issue of the performance. Mr. James Gill, as the King, sang with much fire and dramatic power, and received many tokens of approbation from the audience. The orchestra, it is to be regretted, was out of tune and more than once out of time, so that full justice was not done to the work; and yet, while it was not heard to its best advantage, the impression created by it was very favorable. Chicago may certainly boast two amateur composers of no ordinary ability. We hope to hear from them again.

MUSICAL DYSPEPSIA.

This is an old world infirmity which young America is fast becoming heir to. Every spring and early summer of late years we hear complaint of too much music, a plethora of concerts. The musical appetite is sated, and musical digestion spoiled by such continual listening, or half-listening, to all sorts of performances, good, bad, and indifferent, by all sorts of artists. And the most delicate stomachs, the most easily deranged or paralyzed by too dainty or excessive musical indulgence, are just those of the most refined, fastidious, experienced music lovers. How often will you hear one of the most truly musical of men declare himself not only tired, but heartily sick of hearing music!

The worst of it is, that in our great musical centres, our cities to which all artists bring their musical wares, and before whose audiences they are all eager to produce themselves, we never have precisely a natural, wholesomely regulated supply. It is always either too much or too little, always either drouth or a protracted deluge; for one spell none at all, and for another an overwhelming quantity all at once. No digestive powers are fairly equal to it. Of course we speak of music which is supposed to be listened to, which we go to with respect and take more or less in earnest. The other kind, that which is not listened to, which we do not go after, but which comes to us, accosts us everywhere in our walks and through our windows, through the long summer days and evenings, — that persecutor never gives us any peace; like the poor, it is always with us. But then one may get accustomed to it, and hear all the street organs and singers and band-horse-cars which go round to advertise the various shows, with about the same indifference that he hears the rumbling of cart-wheels or the general street hum. It is your regular, continual, set concert-going, your listening to endless programmes of music, classic and modern, but each claiming your particular attention, that does the mischief. It is this that dulls the sense, confounds the brain, overloads the stomach, paralyzes the fine nerves of musical appreciation, until all music begins to sound alike, and you are conscious of a vague humming in your ears, and of a morbid, over-sensitive condition of the very faculties and nerves through which you have enjoyed such exquisite delight, such quickening inspiration.

The greatest sufferers from this experience, of course, are those who make it a duty, professionally, to keep the run of all the operas and concerts, to try to appreciate them and to do justice to each one in the expected daily or weekly criticism or report. We are tempted just in this musical vacation-time, these August dog-days, when no one has a right to ask from us a serious essay, to give our readers, by way of lighter reading, a well-known German musical writer's experience, as related by him in a letter from Switzerland, which we translate from the last number of the Leipzig Signale.

" . . . You suffer with humming in your ears, sleeplessness, nervous irritation, shrinking from society. That's musical indigestion. All you need is rest. Go into Switzerland, as high as you can; seek the stillest air-cure place that you can find, and you will soon be better! . . ."

A brave man, my good doctor. He is fond himself of music making, but he has never played me anything. He knows what a musical season in Baden-Baden means!

I pressed his hand with grateful fervor, and took an express train ticket direct to Thun, so as to go on the next morning as far as Lauterbrunn. "If t'were done — then t'were well t'were done quickly." I had no idea of stopping in Interlaken. Interlaken is the Baden-Baden of Switzerland: magnificent hotels, cure-gardens, cure-fee, cure-music — to get all that, I do not travel to the Bernese Oberland. That I can have more conveniently and cheaper in Baden-Baden.

In Lauterbrunn I stopped no longer than was necessary to admire the landlord's pretty daughter at the "Steinboch," who stands all the day long in Bernese-Oberland costume at the door of the hotel, to draw strangers in, who are then taken in by her father.

Mürren was to be my place of rest. It lies so high among the mountains, and so far off from the high-road of tourists, that I could hope to hear no music there.

Free from all forebodings, I climbed up the bridle-path. A very cultivated, not musical fellow-countryman was my friendly travelling companion; we threw ourselves exhausted into the Hôtel des Alpes. I got an excellent corner chamber, from which I could overlook the magnificent panorama of the Jungfrau mountain range as conveniently as in a diorama, and I praised my good star that had led me there.

Alas! too early. Scarcely had I settled myself comfortably down, when directly beneath me there was piano playing. Involuntarily I listened — one gets accustomed to that, like a cavalry horse to a trumpet — and a shudder came over me. Beethoven's C-minor Symphony for four hands, played by two English ladies! O God! Furious I went down stairs to reconnoitre. There sat the whole assembly of the pension boarders in the music-room, and listened in sweet rapture to this piano, hideously out of tune. I had fallen into a downright English pension, and a musical one besides. For, after Beethoven had been sufficiently broken on the wheel, there came other ladies and sang English songs, Irish songs, etc. "We have music here in this way every evening after dinner," said mine host in a tone of high satisfaction. I begged for another room, no matter how far back, only as far as possible from the drawing-room. But that was no help at all, what with the always open windows and the thin partition-walls. So, away from here!

In sheer desperation I climbed the Schilthorn, of which Verlepsch flippantly asserts, that the ascent is "without danger." He certainly never went up himself! That I was not seized with vertigo and hurled headlong from that bald slate rock, that falls off so steeply and so many thousand feet into the Lauterbrunnen valley, I owe only to the compassionate clouds, which hid the danger from me, while on the other hand I could not once see the Jungfrau for sheer mist, still less all the other beauties which one prescriptively is bound to admire. I was vividly reminded of "Mignon," especially of the classical line:

"Where loaded mules climb o'er the misty ridge!"

I would not have returned by the same way for a kingdom. I preferred to slide down for 1200 feet on a great snow-field, arriving in Mürren with ragged clothes and soaking boots.

"That, with her — singing.
Had the English lady done!"

I remained at this "stillest" and highest habitable spot of the Bernese Oberland only long enough to have the village shoemaker of Mürren — who watched the cattle all day — nail my boots together again. Then I packed my knapsack and bade good riddance to Mürren forever.

But where now? — Schöneegg, very charmingly situated above Beckenried, on the lake of the Four Cantons, was said to be a very quiet pension. Englishmen, regarding whom I cautiously inquired, are not there; they prefer the neighboring Seelisberg. There are Swiss families almost exclusively in Schöneegg, and the Swiss know in their native land where it is good and cheap. I was friendly received by the young "director," was contented with the quarters, and resolved here to set up my tabernacle. "You come to-day just in the nick of time," said he with a smirk, "for we are to have a little evening musical party." I started back in dismay. He took it for joyful surprise. "Yes, a musical farewell soirée. A very musical lady from Basle leaves the pension in the morning, and all the forces of the house are to unite in her honor, to give her a worthy farewell. I sing tenor myself."

Ah! if this very musical lady had only gone off yesterday! The worst of it was, that I could not escape from this choice circle. As the latest arrival, I was formally invited and I had to stay. The overture to Martha, twice bungled through with four hands, opened the feast. What followed, thank the Lord, I don't remember. For I went out on the balcony, as far as possible from the piano, and gazed upon the wonderful night, where a thunder-storm moved back and forth between Pilatus and the Rigi, and with its flashes magically lit up the wildly foaming lake. And, for accompaniment, Abt, Kücken, Gounod and the Trovatore! . . .

"The world is perfect everywhere,
If man brings not his tortures there."

Only one thing amused me in it all. The Herr "Director" sang duets with the leave-taking beauty from Basle. During her stay at the pension they had evidently sung themselves into each other's hearts. Now they shook out their woe in heart-rending tones of parting, and little dreamed that an inhuman critic was making merry over their anguish. "Ich wollt' mein Lieb' ergösse" was the crown of all their efforts. It had to be sung da capo, for the hundred-thousandth time since the duet came into the world through Kistner.

The following day was a Sunday. At the dinner table the door of the corridor was set open. Around a table sit eight musicians and tune — or rather they do not tune. "They give a concert here twice a week," explained the director. "They play by turns in Kaltbad, Seelisberg, and for us." "And not on the Rigi-Kulm then?" "No." "Good! Then I go to the Rigi-Kulm." It was the stubbornness of despair that inspired me with this hasty resolution. I knew not what I was doing. In Mürren I had fled from the English, in Schöneck from the Swiss, only to fall into a wasp-nest of Berliners in Schriber's hotel. That is to say, out of the frying-pan into the fire. Real genuine imported Spree-Athenians, — some of them, however, had never been baptized in the Spree water. They took me for an anti-Semite.

I fled to the reading-room, to bury myself in the newspapers. There I took up a yellow written placard: "This evening, after the table d'hôte, concert of the Tyrolean Singing Society Jodel-Fritze from the Zillerthal." Holy Cecilia! What sin have I committed, that thou should'st do this to me!

But — when the need is greatest, help is also nearest. . . .

Berthold Auerbach was stopping last autumn in Carlsruhe, where he lived in the hotel Germania like a prince — "and am I not a prince?" he replied to my remark, — and wrote "Brigitta." Spielhagen, who was resting from his charming "Quisisana" in Baden-Baden, was on a visit to him; B. von Scheffel completed this triad of literary celebrities, such as are seldom seen together in such harmony. The conversation turned on the Swiss air-cure places. Auerbach praised above all Tarasp. It was so splendidly situated, so idyllic, so invigorating. The Lucius spring was not inferior to Vichy and Marienbad; but such splendid Alpine air was to be found in no other bathing-place. That suddenly occurred to me when I took flight before the Tyroleans. So down I went by rail the next morning toward Zug, and by evening was already in Landquart, after a gondola ride of a few hours on the Walensee. Davos, the Eldorado of consumptive patients, I passed not without a secret shudder. For behind the cloister, our mail-coach overtook a wagon load of musical instruments; the double-bass was packed on the top. These instruments of torture were just then being unloaded in Davos. Lucky for me! Only a zither went on by mail with us, but turned off in Süss toward the upper Engadine.

Now I breathe freely. Snow, to a man's height, still lay on the grand Flüelen pass, the little lake at the Hospiz was still frozen fast. But then the car flew like the wind into the Alpine summer, and all music was left far behind me, in the gray and misty distance.

The Cur-house in Tarasp was still closed, the season only begins on the 15th of June. And that was fortunate; for a peep through the window showed me in the salon a musical instrument of the most dangerous description — a concert grand piano. In former years Meister Hauser of Carlsruhe has moved more than one lady's heart here by his singing, — now it was all still as death. Yes, the season is so completely dead, that not even a barber can be found here.

The Figaro of all Cur-guests has not yet arrived, so that suffering humanity — so far only a dozen persons — drinks the Lucius spring perforce unshaved, but at the same time unrasped by the Cur music, which at present makes Meran unsafe.

But I, well satisfied, have ascended to Vulpera (4200 feet high), and here I live as the only guest in the idyllic pension Conradin, which I recommend to all, who would live pleasantly and cheaply and hear no music. For in the parlor there stands no piano. I hear nothing but the bells of the cattle on the Alpine pastures, the call of the cuckoo in the neighboring wood, and the murmur of the impetuous Inn. Hither come, ye music-weary!

RICHARD POHL.

Vulpera, June 15, 1880.

PER CONTRA.—NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

Writing and translating as above — and we confess we did it con amore, enjoying, if with "bare imagination of the feast," that picture of absolute rest from music far away in the high Alps — we could not help thinking all the while of those industrious spirits, who, after working like beavers in the city eight months of the year, teaching, concert-giving, organ-playing, training choirs and what not, have been even now in these two hottest months holding a "normal" session there in Canandaigua, and, besides lectures and class exercises, giving recitals, vocal, for piano, organ, chamber music, etc., with seemingly exhaustive programmes. Of what stuff are such workers (Sherwood, Dannreuther, Thayer, Max Piutti, Orth, etc.,) made, that musical digestion never fails them? They seem to know nothing of that peculiar dyspepsia about which we have been talking; the appetite never gives out; they are always ready for more. But then theirs is serious work, and that seldom hurts; that builds up, rather than exhausts the constitution. And there is the sense of doing good, of teaching and enlightening others, of seeing a love for something nobler in the art of music lighting up new faces. It makes an old truth, or an old good piece of music, fresh, to find a new and a responsive audience. And this, we suppose, is what keeps our friends alive and up to their work. Well may they say: Leave musical dyspepsia to mere passive enjoyers of music, to the critics and the dilettanti; we have no leisure to be sick; we work on and are well, thank Heaven!

We have before spoken of some of the lectures and programmes of this five weeks' Convention, which closed on the 10th of August. To give a fuller idea of the amount and variety of music interpreted and analyzed to the pupils, we may state that there were:

1. Eight Piano Recitals by Mr. W. H. Sherwood; one made up of works by Handel, Mozart, Rheinberger, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin and Liszt; one mainly of Bach, besides a Violin Concerto of Bruch, played by Mr. Dannreuther, and a group of piano pieces by Rubinstein. One was mostly from Beethoven, including the E-flat Concerto and the Sonata, Op. 111, in C-minor, besides things by Schubert, Mendelssohn and Dupont. One was chiefly devoted to Schumann: Concerto in A-minor, Etudes Symphoniques, Kriesleriana, etc., besides a Violin and Piano Sonata by Grieg. Another offered the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue of Bach, the G-major Concerto of Beethoven, a Violin Prelude and Romance by F. Ries, Liszt's Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody, etc. Then there was a Chopin Recital, with lecture by Max Piutti; a Liszt-Wagner Recital; and one devoted to a miscellaneous assortment of very recent European and American piano compositions.

2. Eight Organ Recitals by Mr. Eugene Thayer. In these, four of Handel's Organ Concertos figured twice each. Also three of the Choral Vorspiele, the Toccata in C, the great Toccata and Fugue in D-minor, the Pastorale in F, the Prelude and Fugue in B-minor, the Toccata in F, and the Passacaglia of Bach; besides much more of interest from other important composers.

3. Mr. Gustave Dannreuther, whose violin playing appears to have been very warmly appreciated in these meetings, gave four Chamber Concerts, assisted by Mr. John Orth, of Boston, and other artists.

This is but a part of the long story, but it is impossible to find room for all.

MUSIC IN JAPAN.

Further letters have been received from Mr. Luther W. Mason, formerly Supervisor of Music in our Boston schools, who went out last spring, in the employment of the Japanese government, to introduce the study of music, according to our system, into the schools of that empire. It was a most formidable undertaking, but most liberal provision was made there for his comfortable residence. He has been treated with sincere respect, and all the conveniences he could desire have been placed at his disposal, for the carrying out of this great educational experiment, which he has had to begin, as it were, ab ovo; for hitherto the Japanese have known nothing of music, in our sense of the word. Their scale consists of only five tones, and their ears have actually to be attuned to the complete scale, which is the basis of all real music. He has therefore almost to create the sense, as well as teach the music.

Many friends here — indeed, all the friends of popular musical education — are watching with great interest this new work of Mr. Mason, who has shown for many years, in our primary schools especially, what we have before called a genius for teaching little children both to sing and to read simple music, and in parts. In one of the letters to which we have referred (dated Tokio, June 27,) he writes as follows: —

"I am in very good health; have been at work in the two Normal Schools three months. My success has been greater than I expected for so short a time. The building for the 'School of Music' is finished, and the ten pianos are in their rooms.

"My first class out of the Normal School is composed of seven court musicians. They are young men, and are anxious to know our music. They have not the slightest idea of any system of harmony. They are much delighted with what I have shown them." — We find the following statement, based on other letters, in the Transcript:

"Professor L. W. Mason, who has gone to Japan to establish a 'school of music' for the educational department of the Imperial Government, is much satisfied with the progress of his labors. By actual experiment, he finds the Japanese teachers readily learn our system of musical notation. They know the Arabic numbers, 1, 2, 3, etc., and, with the aid of the reed organs sent out, have no difficulty in learning the system of the Mason charts. In order to more fully carry out the plans of Professor Mason, money has been sent to this country and instruments purchased in Boston for the establishment of instruction in the use of stringed instruments, and for a court band. Mr. Benjamin Cutter, of this city, was commissioned to select the instruments, in expectation of taking charge of the orchestra in Japan."

Verily, the tuneful missionary who has set out to make a musical people of the Japanese, exhibits a faith, a courage of conviction, like that which revealed a new world to Columbus! But we have no doubt his faith will be rewarded, since we believe that music is a principle divinely planted in the soul, and that it exists potentially, if not actually, in our common human nature everywhere. America has sent out the right man with the key to fit the lock, and realize some of the possibilities of the divine art to the Japanese, who show so much appreciation of the importance to a people of a large and many-sided education.

In case any person should wish to communicate with the Professor on this subject, we add his address: "L. W. Mason, Professor of Music, 16 Kaga Yashiki, Hongo Tokio, Japan."

MUSIC ABROAD.

LONDON. The two opera-houses (Covent Garden and Her Majesty's Theatre) had completed their seasons by July 24. The former lasted fourteen weeks, the latter ten. The Times sums up the Royal Italian Opera (Mr. Gye's) as follows:

Though one of the shortest, if not the shortest, on record at Covent Garden, extending over little more than three calendar months, no fewer than 22 operas were given with more or less satisfactory completeness. Twenty of these were from the current repertory, including among them Le Roi de Lahore (the grand spectacular lyric drama of M. Massenet, produced with success last season) and a revival of Mignon, for the sake of Mme. Albani, who, by her lively, characteristic and altogether charming impersonation of Goethe's romantic heroine, showed herself worthy of a new work being composed expressly for her. What are our composers about?—and especially Dr. Arthur Sullivan, whose once projected Marie Stuart would just have fitted the always aspiring and enthusiastic daughter of Albani.

The pieces added to the repertory this year have been an Italian version of Hérold's Pré aux Clercs and another of M. Jules Cohen's Les Bluets, under the title of Estella, the former providing a new part for Mme. Albani, the latter another for Mme. Adeline Patti. We shall doubtless hear more of them both next year. In the instance of these, Mr. Gye has thus faithfully redeemed his pledge, bringing out two works hitherto not included in his catalogue. Paderewski's Suzanne was set aside, and the revival of La Gazza Ladra, one of Rossini's brightest scores, for the young and promising Mlle. Turoila, will probably be reconsidered a twelvemonth hence. While several artists named in the prospectus made no appearance (the popular bass baritone, M. Maurel, for example), others were substituted, and notably Mme. Sembrich from Dresden, who, one night quite unexpectedly, took the house by storm in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, and has since maintained her position in other operas, particularly in the Huguenots, as Marguerite de Valois, the music of which is precisely suited to her florid and bravura style of vocalization. This German songstress may be looked upon as an acquisition of real value. From among those rising artists whose progress is watched with interest it is but just to single out the young and prepossessing Mme. Alwina Valleria, whose recent performance of Filina in Mignon has materially advanced her in public estimation. M. Lassalle, the Parisian baritone, has fairly established his position; Signor de Keszke, a new bass, has afforded general satisfaction; and, not to enter into further particulars, the old-established members of the company, it is almost superfluous to add, have held their own. The two conductors, Signors Viaresi and Bevington, may be complimented on the zeal with which they continue to perform their duties, and the latter more especially on the judicious manner in which he contrives to make the orchestral accompaniments subservient to the exigencies of the singers on the stage, instead of drowning their voices with excess of noise, and hurrying on the "tempo" so as to give them no chance of taking breath, which of recent years has threatened to become a persistent habit. The chorus remains what it has been for some time—decidedly susceptible of improvement. In conclusion it is worth noting that the influence of Wagner's operas is sensibly on the decline—at any rate in this great theatre. Lohengrin ceases to attract, while (all the better for the tender sympathetic voice of Mme. Albani) Tannhäuser has not been given once.

—Of the season at Her Majesty's, Figaro says: In Mr. Mapleson's list, besides portions of Il Talismano and Linorah, we have the following sixteen operas: Boito's Meistofele, Wagner's Lohengrin, Beethoven's Fidelio, Bizet's Carmen, Mozart's Il Don Giovanni, Gounod's Faust, Verdi's La Traviata, La Forza, Il Trovatore, Aida, and Rigoletto, Donizetti's Lucia and Linda, Bellini's La Sonnambula and I Puritani, and Thomas's Mignon. Many of us could have dispensed with the Bellini and Donizetti repertory to have heard Les Huguenots and Robert, Le Nozze di Figaro, and other works of a high order.

The Graphic (July 24) adds:—

Beyond stating that Meistofele has been repeated twice to crowded houses, thanks in a great measure to the Margaret of Mme. Christine Nilsson, one of the most original and in every respect remarkable performances of late years; that Rigoletto has been given, with Mme. Etelka Gerster as Gilda (a part in which she has frequently been heard and applauded), Sig. Galassi as Rigoletto, Mme. Trebelli as Maddalena, and the much-exalted new tenor, Sig. Ravelli, who obtained a general "encore" for "La donna è mobile" as the Duke; and finally, that Bizet's picturesque Carmen, with Mme. Trebelli as the heroine, was presented for the last time on Thursday, there is nothing to record about the proceedings at this establishment during the last ten days. Last night, Balfe's chivalric opera, Il Talismano, was given, the part of Edith Plantagenet devolving upon Mme. Gerster, who succeeded Mme. Nilsson, the original at Drury Lane. This evening yet another performance of Sig. Boito's very successful opera.

—Of Christine Nilsson's new Marguerite, the Morning Advertiser (July 8) says:—

Act the third, descriptive of the repentance and death of Margherita in the prison, settled the question, if question there was, of Signor Boito's success, and the effect of the very beautiful music he has supplied was made as perfect as possible by the singing of Mme. Nilsson. She gave the opening solo, a thing of uncommon beauty, with "tears in her voice." The pathos of this, "L'altra notte in fondo al mare," was, as she sang it, inconceivably touching. It was artless and yet an emanation of consummate art, it was deeply affecting and yet perfectly unaffected, and as an example of exquisite purity was simply unsurpassable. The helplessness of the girl condemned to death, her dreamy abstraction, and her gentle resignation lived and breathed through every note of the music as this truly great artist sang it. Later on, in the scene when Marguerite, wandering in her mind, speaks, with infinite tenderness, of her dead child, and in the duet with Faust, "Lontano, lontano," Mme. Nilsson's singing was absolutely perfect. Pathos could not further go, and when, roused from her sweet dream of returning love, Margherita calls despairingly upon the angels to help, Mme. Nilsson rose to the situation. Her acting was magnificent, and in its tragic force, nothing less than a revelation. Such an effort as this is very rarely seen, and can only be made by an artist of the very highest order. Spontaneity, intensity of expression, and true abundance, all were forthcoming, and the worth of this gifted lady was never more clearly demonstrated than in the prison scene of Boito's opera. Mme. Nilsson crossed the stage twice with Signor Campanini, and Signor Nannetti, and amidst a storm of applause; but this was insincere, and the audience insisted upon seeing her again, when she came on alone, to receive a third "ovation."

—Mr. William Shakespeare, the tenor singer, has been elected conductor of the orchestral and choral practice, and of the students' concerts, of the Royal Academy of Music. Figaro says:

He is an excellent musician, and is believed to be an efficient score reader; he is an admirable tenor vocalist, a gentleman, and a past student and present professor of singing at the Royal Academy. His first training was at Dr. Wyld's London Academy at St. George's Hall, and he then removed to the Royal Academy, where he was the last "King's Scholar" in 1866. He subsequently travelled in Germany and Italy to learn the art of a vocalist, and he returned to this country seven years ago, since when he has practiced his profession as a tenor vocalist and a teacher of singing. Mr. Shakespeare is also the composer of an overture in D, of a piano concerto, and several songs. He is so popular and respected a musician that it is hoped he will as a conductor justify that "confidence in the unascertained" which the Royal Academy authorities have expressed.

BRUSSELS.—Gréty's Richard Cœur de Lion has been followed at the Théâtre de la Monnaie by Halévy's Charles VI., for the rentrée of M. Devooy and Massart. Mlle. Deschamps sang the part of Odette for the first time. Charles VI. was succeeded by Les Dragons de Villars, which has long been a great favorite here.

BERLIN. Edouard Lassen's music to Derrien's arrangement of Faust is drawing good houses to the Victoria Theatre.

—The Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung contains the following announcement:

A hitherto unpublished MS. of J. S. Bach's is at present affording matter for lively discussion to the little town of Greussen in the principality of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen. Some years ago there died there Herr A., a Justizrath, or "Councillor of Justice," who was considered, by persons entitled to give an opinion, a great musical amateur. His heirs heard that he had received, as a mark of friendship from Herr Heimstedt, a well-known Capellmeister and virtuoso of Sondershausen, a present in the shape of an unpublished work by J. S. Bach. They determined to set about looking for the valuable treasure, which, it is said, they succeeded in finding. They offered it to the Leipzig Bach Society, who are reported to have expressed their willingness to pay a very fair price for it, but that price was not considered high enough, any more than that which Professor Spitta, of Berlin, was ready to give. After the heirs had separated, a short time since, the matter was reported to Herr Bitter, the Minister of Finance, in Berlin, who, as we are aware, has written a biography of Bach. Some weeks ago, His Excellency applied to the authorities in Greussen for information about the supposed treasure, adding that there was a possibility of its being purchased by the Prussian government. After a long search, a packet of music is said to have been discovered bearing marks of great age and an inscription that it was written by J. S. Bach's own hand. Some days ago, the packet was sent to the authorities at Greussen, who forwarded it to Herr Bitter. The Leipziger Tageblatt, to which the intelligence was communicated from Thuringia, very prudently leaves to its correspondent the responsibility of this very mysterious discovery.

PARIS. Music played a prominent part in the national rejoicings on the 14th July. First and foremost among the performers must be reckoned the sovereign people who from early morn till after midnight were always singing the "Marseillaise" when not indulging in "Le Chant du Départ," and "Le Chant du Départ" when not indulging in the "Marseillaise." Never probably was such an amount of patriotic—and untutored—vocalization within the same space of time; nor was there any lack of the professional element. Innumerable reed and brass bands in squares and streets discoursed more or less sweet music, in divers cases evoking the Terpsichorean proclivities of the multitude. Choral societies, singing their best, traversed the principal thoroughfares, and in the evening there were many torchlight processions to the strains of Rouget de Lisle's ever-recurring melody. A great treat was afforded to lovers of high-class music by two evening open-air concerts, one, under M. Paderewski, at the Tuilleries, the other, under M. Colonne, at the Luxembourg. The weather being unfavorable the musicians had to accomplish part of their task amid a heavy downpour. M. Paderewski's orchestra numbered 200, the programme differing materially from those of the Cirque. At the Luxembourg M. Colonne had also 200 instrumentalists, besides 800 singers. A feature was "La Marche du Drapeau," from the Te Deum of Hector Berlioz, who contributed also an arrangement of the "Marseillaise" for chorus and orchestra. Among the vocal pieces were "Gloire à notre France immortelle" (an unpublished composition by Hérold); "La Marche républicaine," by Adolphe Adam (1848); "Paris," by Ambroise Thomas; something by Boieldieu, and something else by François Bazin. The gala performance at the Grand Opera to the representatives of the new flags consisted of two acts from Guillaume Tell, with the first and third acts of Yedda. The "Marseillaise," after the ballet, served to play the audience out.

ST. PETERSBURGH. The following is Sig. Merelli's company for the Italian operatic season, commencing in October and extending to March: Soprano, Mmes. Carolina Salla, Bianca Bianchi (of Vienna), A. Bruschini, E. Repetto-Tissoloni, Giulia Nordica, Emma Romeldi, Dora de Clairvanlx; Mezzo-Soprano, Mmes. Scacchi-Lolli, Giulia Frandi, Corsi; Tenor, Signori A. Azzini, O. Novelli, Petrovich, Deillieis, Igino Corsi, Luigi Manfredi; Baritone and Basses, Signori Cotogni, Bouhy, Brugi, Leone Miranda, Ughetti, Gasparini, Caracciolo, Sculani; chief Stage-Manager, M. Albert Vincentini; Conductors, Signori K. Urigo and Delman. The repertory will probably comprise Aida, Il Trovatore, Rigoletto, La Traviata, Un Ballo in Maschera (Verdi); Gli Ugonotti, Roberto il Diavolo, L'Africana, Linorah, La Stella del Nord (Meyerbeer); Semiramide, Udolfo, Il Barbiere di Siviglia (Rossini); L'Edra (Halévy); Don Giovanni, Le Nozze di Figaro, Il Flauto Magico (Mozart); Linda, Lucia, L'Esir d'Amore, La figlia del Regimento (Donizetti); La Sonnambula, I Puritani (Bellini); Faust (Gounod); Mignon (A. Thomas); Carmen (Bizet); Lohengrin, Tannhäuser (R. Wagner); La Regina di Saba (Goldmark); La Vita per lo Zar (Glinka); Meistofele (Boito). As at present arranged, the opening opera will be L'Edra, with Mme. Salla in the principal part.

—M. Gounod is about to write an oratorio in three parts, called The Redemption, for the Birmingham Festival of 1882. The libretto, of which M. Gounod is himself the author, is already written, and said to be worthy of the subject. The work is to be on a grand scale, and it has been intimated by the composer that he intends it to be his crowning effort. The oratorio will be brought out by the Festival Committee, with the co-operation of Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co.

—Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co., are preparing for publication a translation of Spitta's Life of Bach, the author having undertaken to revise the proofs and provide additional matter specially for the English edition. The work is to consist of two volumes, and it is hoped that the first volume may be issued in 1881. A translation of Otto Jahn's Life of Mozart will early in the same year be published by the same firm. Like the Life of Bach, it is to be issued in two volumes. Lovers of music in this country will be well pleased to read in their own language works which have obtained so high a place in the artistic literature of Germany.

—Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. are preparing for publication editions of the Full Scores of Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea," the last-named work with Mozart's accompaniments. They will be issued to subscribers at a moderate price, which will afterwards be raised. Considering that this is the first time the full scores of these popular compositions have been printed in any country, and that they will be published in the style which distinguishes all the works emanating from this firm, there can be no doubt that they will command an extensive sale.

DRESDEN.—Herr Lauterbach has been offered the posts of first Concertmeister at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, and professor of the violin in the Conservatory. In each instance he would succeed Hellmesberger, who retires on a pension.

BOLOGNA.—The once well-known Russian tenor, Ivanoff, died recently in this town, where he had resided for a lengthened period. Born at Pultawa in 1810, he went, at the age of twenty, to Milan, and took lessons of Ellodoro Bianchi. He won applause, even by the side of Rubini, in Italy and England, but failed to maintain his position. Some forty years ago Ivanoff wisely abandoned professional life, to which he was in no way suited.

—Sig. Boito has returned to Milan, and is busy on the instrumentation of his Nerone. Mr. Gye will in all likelihood prefer this to the Nero of Rubinstein.

THE MUSICAL VERSIONS OF
GOETHE'S "FAUST."BY ADOLPHE JULLIEN.¹

(Concluded from p. 130).

VIII. THE "FAUSTS" PROJECTED BY BEETHOVEN, MENDELSSOHN, MEYERBEER, ROSSINI AND BOIELDIEU. RESUME.

We have now arrived at the conclusion of this study. We have in course cited or commented on some thirty works, endeavoring to lend an equal attention to the principal ones and to show forth their real value, without regard to the preferences of the world. We have drawn several names from oblivion, and, for an instant, have revived these authors and their works; and then we have studied at some length the four capital creations with which music has been inspired by Goethe's drama. The Faust of Spohr offered only a speculative interest; it was curious to run through an opera which defied all competition for a long time, but which cannot bear comparison with any one of the three rival works. There remain then Gounod, Berlioz and Schumann, three composers of great talent, or of genius, worthy to enter the list and to contend which will best comprehend and translate this gigantic poem which embraces all the universe, beings and abstractions, causes and results, realities and chimeras, the possible and the impossible.

The drama of Faust is like a mirror which should faithfully retrace to our eyes the whole life of the poet. To see the successive alterations it has undergone under his hands, one would imagine himself a witness to all the transformations of Goethe; one would seem to follow the immense and subtle labors of his mind during the latter part of his career. The first scenes, which appeared in 1790, attach themselves to his youth. Proud, bold, passionate at the beginning, Goethe, when he resumed the work and composed the scenes which were published in 1807, to complete the First Faust, became more mysterious, more symbolical.² Finally, during nearly thirty years, he conceived and caused to germinate in his mind that Secoud Part, that strange and striking work, defective perhaps in an artistic point of view, but which only genius could create. Goethe, then, has in some sort lived his poem of Faust: generous, passionate, romantic at the age of twenty; enamored of antique art, of what is serious and calm, on his return from Italy; seeking finally, in his mature age, a universal eclecticism, uniting poesy to science, the spirit of antiquity to that of modern life.

Beethoven, as afterwards Meyerbeer, had during his whole life a desire to put Goethe's poem into music. One day even, about 1807, in a moment of good humor, he wrote a Song of the Flea; but his attention, suddenly diverted, was obliged to return to more pressing labors. "I do not always write what I wish," he said sadly to his friend Bihler, "I work for money! But when the bad times have passed, I will write what will please myself, for art alone: it will probably be Faust."³

Unhappily, the bad times never passed, and some years later, when the literary writer Rochlitz proposed to him on the part of the house of Härtel, in Leipzig, to compose music for Faust, as he had done for Egmont, Beethoven, then all absorbed in the conception of the Ninth Symphony, replied: "I have already three other great works in hand for some time past; they are partly hatched in my head, and I should like first to disembarass myself of them, to wit: two grand symphonies, different from the first ones, and an oratorio. That will be long, for, you see, since a certain time I have no longer the same facility for writing, I wait and I think a long time, and that does not come just in time upon paper. I hesitate to commence a great work, but once started, it goes on."⁴ This was in July 1822. Of the works announced, no one saw the light except the symphony with chorus.

Goethe, we have said before, would have been pleased to have had his Faust put into music by Meyerbeer, who was almost on the point of realizing the secret desire and the prediction of the poet; for he had many times the idea of writing a score of Faust. If he renounced this project, it was, it seems, from fear of disobliging first Spohr, his friend, and then M. Gounod. Nevertheless Meyerbeer left at his death an unfinished work, The Youth of Goethe, the drama by M. Blaze de Bury, for which he had composed a very important musical part. This intermède comprises, besides other fragments borrowed from Goethe's poem, the scene of the Cathedral and the final Hosanna of the second part. Unfortunately, the musician's will, confirmed by the French tribunal, expressly forbade the representation and the publication of this work. . . .

Mendelssohn had been equally struck by the grandeur and the affecting pathos of the drama of Goethe. In that fruitless quest after a good opera poem, which was the constant preoccupation of his whole life and the regret of his age, he returned by preference and as if by instinct to the ineffable loves of Doctor Faust with the young orphan girl, to the sombre incantations of the demon, which he felt would surely inflame his imagination and lend more of tenderness and of fantastic poesy to his inspiration. But he never dared to pass beyond the thought to the act and to write the first notes of a work which, nevertheless, exercised an all-powerful charm over him.

⁴ Ibid, p. 217.

" . . . You are precisely the only man who could aid me if he would!" he wrote in 1843 to his dear friend Edouard Devrient. "Why will you not? Art occupies in your heart as considerable a place as in mine, and we have been in accord on all the questions we have agitated. Has nothing, then, ever fallen under your eyes of which you might make a masterpiece? Have you nothing in your portfolio? Lately I have thought that, if one were to throw into as few verses as possible some five or six pieces of Shakespeare, it would be a pleasure to put them into music. Do you not think the same? King Lear, for example, — or then again Faust, to which I am always coming back? . . ."

Rossini, also, for a long time caressed the idea of writing an opera of Faust on a libretto which Alexander Dumas was to prepare for him. Count Pillet-Will, whose intimate relations with Rossini are well known, has given to a trust-worthy person, from whom we have them, the following details upon this subject. Rossini had signed with Véron a contract, by which he engaged to compose for the Opéra five works entirely new, in different kinds. The first was Guillaume Tell, the second was to be Faust. Some time after the representation of Robert le Diable, he went to find Véron to talk with him about his future opera; but the happy director, all intoxicated by the success of a work which he played only against his inclination, received him coldly, pretended many and many a reason for deferring it: in short, Rossini, out of patience, tore up his contract on the spot, and went away. A short time after that, he returned to live in Italy. There he received one day a visit from Fétis, and showed to the astonished musician a huge score, adding: "This is a Faust by me."

Fétis himself related this occurrence to the person from whom we have learned it. Did Rossini speak the truth, or was this one of those mystifications of which his mocking humor was so fond? We do not know, but we wish to believe that he was not joking. It pleases us to think that the author of Guillaume Tell could not withdraw himself from the charm which Goethe's poem exercised over the imaginations of the élite, that he had yielded to the temptation to write, and that, alone, with no other object but his own pleasure, he had composed an entire opera, with the fixed idea that it should never see the light. It is true that we find no mention of this work in the list of the unpublished works of Rossini which appeared just after his death; perhaps he had destroyed or lost it. None the less does it appear established that we owe to the indifference of Véron our having never seen this genius of light and outward passion at close quarters with the sombre, chaste and naive poetry of the master of Weimar.

On his part, Boieldieu, without being vividly moved by the poem of Goethe, was solicited to set it to music by a well known author, who saw there a chance of one more success for a certain style of drama. It was at the time when Boieldieu wrote Les Deux Nuits that Antony Béraud, the friend of Frederic

² We may cite among these episodes the monologue of Faust after the departure of Wagner, his attempt at suicide interrupted by the Easter hymn, the double promise in the garden, and the death of Valentine.

Soulié, afterwards director of the Opéra-Comique, made him the offer—well enough received at first—to arrange the Faust as a comic opera on his account. Béraud has himself related, in a newspaper article, the propositions he had made in this sense to the celebrated composer, the hesitations of the latter, his indecision and finally his refusal. Boieldieu, it seems, had asked him if he would like to make with his coöperation a work à grand tra-la-la; these were the musician's own expressions. Proud of such an honor, Béraud, who was then working at a drama of Faust for the Porte-Saint-Martin, with the coöperation of Merle, assistant director of that theatre, had the idea of transforming this drama into a comic opera, in spite of the first opposition of his fellow-worker, which he had no difficulty in overcoming; and some days afterwards he submitted to the musician the plan of a Faust turned into a comic opera, with a feminine Mephistopheles.

But Boieldieu had already changed his mind, and he presently returned the poem to Béraud, with a very amiable letter, in which, while manifesting a desire to be his collaborator for some subject that should be original, and possibly a trifle diabolical, and while recognizing the piquant details and the dramatic effects which this piece would present, above all with the devil in the guise of a pretty woman, yet he did not believe he could accept his offer for the following reason: "As I have had the honor of telling you, M. Scribe has treated, or is to treat this subject for Feydeau. He designs it for M. Meyerbeer, and, as I have been in the confidence of this project, it would be an unhandsome proceeding on my part to engage you to treat it for the Opéra-Comique." Whether this were the real reason or only a pretext in order not to disoblige Béraud by a groundless refusal, certain it is that Boieldieu did not undertake to cope with the vast conception of Goethe, for which it is no disparagement to say he was not at all prepared. The musician's letter of refusal is dated March 9, 1828. Nine months afterwards, on the 20th October, the first representation of Béraud's grand drama took place at the Porte-Saint-Martin. It obtained a brilliant success, to which the sweet and melodious inspirations of Boieldieu would no doubt have added nothing—even if they had not hurt it.

But let us return to the musicians, who, more happy than Beethoven, Rossini and Meyerbeer, have been able to give free course to their inspiration, and allow their soul to sing as it was moved and troubled by the reading of this admirable poem.

Schumann is the only one among them who, after the example of Goethe, has made of his musical conception the work of his whole life; who has translated the aspirations of its different ages; who has, so to speak, lived the life of his personages. This complete similitude with his model gives him already an incontestable superiority over his rivals. But he has also, over Berlioz and over M. Gounod, the precious advantage of being essentially German in mind, heart and tendencies; of seizing, consequently, better than any one, the most secret meanings, the most abstract thoughts, the most mysterious depths of the German poem. Thus, compare the episodes of the Garden and of the Cathedral (the only two which both he and his rivals have treated), and instantly his superiority will flash upon the eyes of all, without searching in the other parts of his work, which abound in inspirations of the first order, and which bear on every page the undeniable mark of genius.

M. Gounod and Berlioz have the advantage, rather insignificant in its kind, over their rival, of having been able to complete their work; the one with the care and the research which he brought erewhile to his least productions, the other with his eager passion and his romantic enthusiasm. Each work bears, profoundly graven on it, the imprint of the artist; the one remarkably elaborated, finely chiseled, filled with a gentle passion and a chaste reverie, but sullied now and then by trickery and affectation; the other, more powerful, more vigorous, full of burning passion and of feverish ardor. The one seduces, charms, intoxicates; the other seizes, dominates, exalts. The one is the work of a reflective inspiration, the other of an ardent imagination.

Goethe may count, then, with good right, among the musical works which his poem has inspired, at least three exceptional creations, one of them truly incomparable. Around these three stars gravitate numerous satellites. Around the names of Schumann, of Berlioz, of Gounod, shine with a tempered lustre those of Spohr, of Mlle. Bertin, of Lindpaintner, of Radziwill, and of so many others, who, in default of success and glory, have had the precious honor of measuring themselves with genius, and have thus merited that their name should not die.

And who can tell the secrets of the future? Perhaps one day some new name will shine by the side of those who have been the most favored of fortune; perhaps there will arise some man of genius who will create yet another masterpiece upon the poem of the master, and who will come, anew, after Gounod, after Berlioz, after Schumann, at once to confirm by his attempt, and to contradict by his success, this severe prediction of Goethe: "The Faust is essentially a work which cannot be measured entire; every attempt to give the complete understanding of it must fail. It is necessary, moreover, to take account of one thing, which is that the first part is the expression of a thought still beset with obscurity. This very obscurity exercises an attraction over men, and they strive to triumph over it, as over every insoluble problem."

MEPHISTOPHELIAN MUMMERY.

Most of our contemporaries have launched forth into lavish praise of Boïto's "Mefistofele;" and we suppose we ought also to have gone mad over it, and done the usual amount of ecstatic raving. But there are certain reasons for our moderation, or rather for our silence. We do not, at the best, think very highly of Italian opera, at any rate as cultivated in England, as a branch of musical art; we do not like the uses to which it is put; and we have a special aversion to the degradation of music and the distortion of pure art which this particularly Mephistophelian opera displays. It has portions which come within the realm of pure art, there is no doubt; but they are injured by their connection. It has been "an immense success," "the feature of the 1880 season," a "veritable triumph," and so forth; and as these facts have had so many chroniclers, there was the less need that we should occupy our space by recording them. Notwithstanding its thousand-and-one trumpeters, however, we must protest against the tendency of things which "Mefistofele" illustrates. We shall, doubtless, protest in vain—but we shall still protest. We have had a "Ride to the abyss," and have seen Faust "Delivered to the Flames;" now we are bidden to rise to cooler and serenest localities, and listen to a "Prologue in Heaven." Ye gods, what next? To what further uses is music to be put? To what still more daringly impious lengths will these degraders of the divinest of all the arts be led by their feverish thirst after originality? Nothing seems to escape the prying eyes of these hunters after a name, and no subject seems too sacred to be "set to music" by this erratic and epileptic school of composers. We are not at all disposed to be prudish in these matters; but we think these modern Athenians, in their desire to hear some new thing, should exhaust earth before going either to heaven or to hell for a libretto. We have no words to express our supreme contempt for the corrupt, meretricious, depraved taste which writes musical "prologues in heaven," tries to paint the laughter of fiends by clarinets and fiddles, and dares to attempt to realize by musical cacophony the sensations of a miserable wretch about to be delivered to the tortures of the damned. If earth is not enough for these musical maniacs, let them keep their impious hands away from heaven, and confine their frantic efforts to the other place. Or, if they have exhausted (!) the almost boundless possibilities of earth, with its ever-varying kaleidoscope of human life, and human love, and human woe, and cannot write any original melodies or harmonies nor devise any new musical situations, let them acknowledge that their occupation is gone. The "prologue in heaven" style of music may or may not be to the taste of those critics who have fallen so violently in love with Boïto's opera as a whole—it is certainly not to ours; and we should consider ourselves traitors to the best interests of art if we did not cry out against such profanations of music. There have been great composers of pure music whose works will always be heard because they appeal to the artistic sense in man; and it is quite possible that the composers whose vagaries we condemn may be able to walk worthily in the steps of the illustrious dead. If they are, let them show it; by their fruits we shall know them. If not, let them be forever silent. We have enough good music to form a museum of great composers; but if the moderns can add nothing better than "prologues in heaven," we had better close the list, mark the last two centuries as "the musical epoch," and regard the vein as worked out. If no other Purcell, Bachs, Haydns, Mozarts, Beethovens, Spohrs, or Mendelssohns are ever to appear to the end of all time, we have at least one of each to fall back upon, and their works can never die. The world will worship at the old shrines until newer and better ones are erected. We have at least enough pure and beautiful music to fill a very large library, even if no more should ever be written; and its beauty can never become threadbare. These composers did not degrade their art: they exalted it to the very pinnacle of grandeur. "Prologues in Heaven" do degrade it, and posterity can very well spare the heap of rubbish which has of late years accumulated under the hands of composers of that ilk.—Lon. Mus. Standard.

THE LYRICAL DRAMA.

BY G. A. MACFARREN, ESQ., M.A.,
Mus. Doc. Cantab., Prof. Mus. Cantab.

Concluded from page 132.

We will now advance to the period of Gluck. He began his career as a writer of Italian operas. On this Italian modern (for then it was modern) model Gluck recited the whole story in what they call "dry recitative" (recitativo secco) or recitative, accompanied only with the harpsichord and with the bowed instruments, to sustain the bass note, interspersed with one or other of the five classes of aria. He attained great celebrity, in consequence of which he was engaged to write for the King's Theatre in London. Here he supposed that, his works being unfamiliar, a pasticcio would supply all that was necessary, and therefore his opera, La Caduta de' Giganti, was a collection of pieces from several of his other operas adapted to a new text, and the work produced small effect. This brought upon him the conviction that music, to fulfill its highest functions, must be written for, and written to, the situation in which it was presented; that an adaptation of old music to new words, or new words to old music misrepresented both, and that the true dramatic qualities could only be fulfilled if words and music were written for each other, and when these both belong to the situation for which they were designed. Such, indeed, was the idea which had been germinated by the Florentines, in their institution of recitative and thence of the opera. Such had been set forth at length by that distinguished Venetian amateur, Benedetto Marcello, who in 1720, published an essay on dramatic music "Il teatro alla moda," in which he satirized the vices of the dramatic music of the time. It became, hereafter, the province of Gluck to put the theory of Marcello into practice. Gluck, for many years, pondered this new view, although in its novelty it was but a revival of the treatment of the dramatic element in music. He met with a poet, Calzabigi, who entirely agreed with him in this perception of dramatic propriety, and wrote for him, and with him, and into his very thoughts, the text of the opera of Alceste.

This was produced in Vienna, in 1767. It was an extraordinary change from what had been heard before, and met with very great success. In consequence of this success Gluck thought that still higher things were possible to music than had been hitherto accomplished. He knew that the resources of the Paris Theatre exceeded those in any other capital; he knew the great powers of scenic effect, and how all the accessories then incident to the stage were to be met with in Paris. He went thither for the sake of extending his practice in the composition of opera, and he brought forward his opera of Iphigénie en Aulide with a success which fully realized all his desires. But here he was bound by the exigency of the French opera of intermixing with his music very much dancing. He met with the famous Vestri, another instance of French recourse to Italian genius, for although the French is the dancing nation of all the world by universal admission, this great Vestri, who bears the title in French annals of "Le dieu de la danse," was Italian born, and added the "s" to the end of his name only after he had been some years settled in France. When then Iphigénie was to be produced, Vestri went to Gluck to make arrangements for the ballet. He said he must have his gavotte, he must have his allemande, he must have his bourrée. Gluck exclaimed, "Agamemnon never danced a gavotte!" Vestri replied, "So much the worse for Agamemnon; the people of Paris cannot witness an opera without one"; and consequently such dances were necessarily inserted into the drama which represented the woe of Agamemnon compelled to sacrifice his daughter in order to propitiate Diana for fair winds to carry the Greeks to Troy.

We find in Handel the representation of several characters contained in one piece of music, but they have still this stagnant quality of singing so many asides together, and never addressing one another. A composer who is only known by name, for I have never been able to meet with any specimen of his works, Logroscino, is said to have, in some operas he wrote for the small theatre in Naples, represented continuous action in music, and to have had great success. Nicolo Piccini, afterwards the rival of Gluck in the great Paris musical warfare, extended the idea, and in his opera, La buona Figliuola, there are specimens of long-continued music during a varied action, where the characters address one another, where sometimes each sings his own sentiment aside while others sing theirs, and where this particular element in lyrical composition is brought to a very high standard. This was set to a text founded on our Richardson's novel of Pamela. The opera had an immense success, and, in consequence of it, Piccini's fame was very greatly extended.

The particular combination of characters and continuation of action has its highest example in the masterpieces of Mozart, and we need but refer to the great finale of Don Giovanni, to the finale of each act of Figaro, and to the sextet in the second act of Don Giovanni, to perceive the utmost to which the dramatic musical art has yet attained; the utmost to which it seems possible human genius can ever reach. The only probability that dramatic music may exceed these examples may be in the choice of a loftier subject than the gallantries of Don Giovanni and the intrigues of the Count's valet in Figaro. But with the application of such resources to a great tragic or a great religious subject, the opera is capable of becoming the greatest development of the musical art. It is especially to be noticed, in these works of Mozart, that all the principles of musical construction are manifestly fulfilled, and that while they illustrate the action, while they express and declaim the text, the musical composition is in itself so complete and so perfect that were the words withdrawn we should still be delighted to hear the music; were the action imperceptible, one still would feel his musical sense satisfied in the admirable pieces which these works present.

I have now to speak of a particular quality in dramatic composition much vaunted of late as a novelty due exclusively to one composer, and characterized by the German term of leit-motif. The rise of this may grow to be an abuse, and one must bear in mind the remark of one of the humorous journals on some more or less recent performance of the kind, that the Portuguese proverb Byron quoted may be applied to some of the works in question, and we may say that "Valhalla is paved with good motives," and those motives are not always realized. One finds a particularly strong anticipation of this allusion to a musical idea that has been previously stated in the first finale of Beethoven's Fidelio. In the scene in this opera where the governor of the prison, Pizarro, requires Rocco, the jailor, to fulfill his dreadful purpose upon the prisoner, Florestan, he has described the contemplated murder, and, after exclaiming "Ein Stoos," sings to four notes, with terrible emphasis, "Und er verstummt." In the finale, Rocco is pleading for the prisoners to be allowed to range the prison-yard, and enjoy for the first time the fresh air of heaven. Pizarro is angered to find them at large, and demands how has this man dared without order to set them for a while at liberty? No word is in the text replied; but in the orchestra are those four notes by which we read the conscience of Pizarro—that he feels he has confessed his intention to murder his victim—that he has made this man his confidant, and, of course, as he has made him his confidant, he cannot deny him the privilege which he has used, of giving the prisoners a few moments of freedom.

The same appropriation of a musical idea to the constant expression of one specialty may be noticed in the Freischütz of Weber, where the influence of the evil spirit is always indicated by that particular tremolo with the soft note upon the drum, together with the pizzicato for the basses. Again, in his Euryanthe, by that peculiar passage which occurs in the centre of the overture in slower tempo than the rest of the movement, with muted violins, which is always used in the opera when allusion is made to that ghost story, which is the means employed to injure the character of Euryanthe. Let us look further: there is scarcely to be met with in an Italian opera a mad scene, where the prima donna lets down her back hair, but she is sure to sing some portions of the love duet she had with the tenor in the first act. And in all the operas of this century, where it has been found convenient, is displayed a natural, but not lavish use of this resource. The resource is not confined to dramatic music.

It may be said to be an application of the same thing, that in setting even music for the church the recurrence of a musical idea at a later portion of the text, which idea was previously heard with other words, is employed by the composer to throw the light of that former text upon the latter expression. Thus, for instance, we find in some settings of the canticle Te Deum that when in the latter portion of the hymn the words come, "Day by day we magnify Thee," the same musical phrase is appropriated which is set to the words, "We praise Thee, O God." To magnify, to praise, are one outpouring of the heart; and the sense of this magnifying and worshipping, in the latter portion of the hymn, is aggrandized and made more forcible by such musical reference to the corresponding words at the outset of the canticle. And in such manner as this, the principle of recurrent musical ideas is to be used, not as a pantomime trick of bringing up a stage goblin, but as a very high medium of enforcing the musical meaning. Further, it is not confined to vocal composition alone, but I maintain that in the symphony in C-minor of Beethoven, when in the last movement the theme of the scherzo recurs, this is quite as much an application of the principle of leit-motif as anything that has occurred in recent operas. This is to recall in the midst of the grand heroic movement whatever sentiment the composer designed to express in the music of the scherzo; and this was not original in Beethoven, because in a symphony of Haydn in B, which is very little known, in precisely the same manner, and in precisely the same situation, namely, in the middle of the last movement, there occurs a phrase from the minuet of the same symphony.¹

Again, in the first quartet of Mendelssohn for violins, at the end of the last movement occurs that lovely melody in E-flat, which opens the first movement. In the second quartet he begins with the melody, which he had previously set to words, and the reference to which setting is a very strong index toward comprehending the expression intended by the whole quartet, and the quartet terminates with the same song set forth at length which is only hinted at in the beginning. That is the quartet in A-minor. Then again, in his octet, there recurs in the midst of the last movement, a portion of the scherzo which is interwoven with the themes of the last movement, most ingeniously combined, and the one is made to form a counterpoint to the other. Here again we find this application in instrumental music of the element that I think is very valuable, but by no means a recent acquisition in the operatic treasury.

We have to distinguish now between what the French call their grand opera and their comic opera, understanding that the term comic does not signify, as in ordinary speech, matter for jest and laughter and fun, but the comic opera corresponds with what was here called the ballad opera, or the opera of the days of Purcell; an opera, namely, in which there is song, but in which much is spoken. And this has in France a very curious origin. A patent for the performance of the lyrical drama was granted specially to the Académie Royale. It was therefore, forbidden to sing on the stage of any other theatre. There were, however, performed at the Opéra-Comique spoken dramas, which were interspersed with songs; these songs were set to popular tunes, and when the situation for their insertion occurred a scroll was displayed, on which the words were written at length and in large characters; the band played the tune, and the audience sang the song. From this has been developed the Vaudeville, and thence the opéra-comique of the French stage.

Corresponding with the opéra-comique, which has—more than our ballad operas possess—some occasional largely developed pieces, is the singspiel of the German stage, and it is to be remembered that it has been so highly developed that many of the best works in the German school are of this structure. Such are the Seraglio, the Zauberflöte of Mozart, the Freischütz of Weber, the Faust of Spohr, and many others which might be named.

It is in the last fifty years only that the composition of the highest class of opera has been aimed at in England; and although we have lost some of our dearest friends who have had best successes in this department, there are still some who aim at dramatic composition; and let us hope that they will have the opportunity, as no doubt some of them may have the talent, to add yet glories to the lyrical drama. I would lastly remark that the sunshine of the poet draws from that great ocean, the musician's mind, the clouds which reflect its light prismatically broken into countless colors, and which pour their riches upon the earth to warm, and strengthen, and nourish men's hearts with the wealth of harvest—the harvest of the human mind.

SACRED CONCERTS AND ORGAN MUSIC IN PARIS.¹

[1780 and 1880.]

It is neither by chance, nor mere caprice that the above dates, 1780 and 1880, stand side by side at the top of this rapid essay, which, while retrospective, treats also of to-day. What they prove, is that, in matters of art, tradition always presides, to a greater or less extent, at the birth and the development of everything useful and beautiful, and that the present cannot be explained without our knowing and comprehending the past. The concerts given for the last three years by M. Guilment in the hall of the Trocadéro are related to those which, a century ago, found a home at the Tuileries, in a much less spacious locality, the Salle des Suisses, afterward called the Salle des Maréchaux.

The "Concerts Spirituels," or Sacred Concerts of the last century were originally intended to replace theatrical performances during the period of Easter, and at certain solemn festivals. It was the brother of the celebrated composer, Philidor, who founded them, and the King lent him a special apartment in the Tuileries. The 18th March, 1725, was the day which saw the birth of what was a genuine Academy of Music, the number of concerts given annually being twenty-four or twenty-five. There were eighty-two performers, including a conductor, an organist, eight reciters, or solo singers, male and female, and fifty-four symphonists. These concerts, which soon enjoyed a very great reputation in France and Europe, lasted till the end of 1791, when there was a long period of silence extending down to 1805.

In the year 1780, then, if we look over the programmes of the Sacred Concerts, at the head of which stood Gossec to direct the orchestra, and one of the Couperins for the organ, we find among the principal works interpreted by such singers as Le Gros, Lays, Mmes. Todi and Saint-Huberti, symphonies by Gossec, and airs by Piccinni, Sacchini, Paisiello, Gluck, etc., besides melodies and concertos by Bach, symphonies by Haydn and Mozart, Pergolesi's Stabat, fragments from the Carmen Sæculare of Philidor, who had just achieved a great success in England, oratorios by various composers of the day, a "Te Deum," a "Dies iræ," and a "Veni, sanctus Spiritus," by Gossec, these different pieces of the liturgy being adapted for the festivals of Whitsuntide, All Saints, All Souls, etc. Among the eminent instrumentalists we may mention Duport the violoncellist; Ozi, the bassoon player; and Punto, the hornist. Among the prodigies of the period were Mlle. Murchich, a distinguished flautist, and Rodolphe Kreutzer, then scarcely thirteen, who was greatly applauded in a violin concerto, written by his master, Stamitz.

The Sacred Concerts were discontinued at the end of 1791, to be revived about 1805, with varying fortune and elsewhere than in the Tuileries. Gradually, what had so long been a brilliant institution disappeared, or was hardly ever mentioned, save at very rare intervals, and during Passion Week. From twenty-four or twenty-five, the number of concerts annually was reduced to two or three.

One especial obstacle to the continuation, or rather resurrection, of these interesting and useful meetings was the want of a locality large enough to enable their directors to render them accessible to the masses. At last, in 1878, the erection of the Salle du Trocadéro supplied this lamentable deficiency. In future, classic music has at its disposal a building worthy of it. There is a huge difference between the thousand or fifteen hundred places at the old Sacred Concerts and the five thousand of the amphitheatre at the Trocadéro. M. Cavaillé-Coll's grand organ—more favored in this respect than the other instruments and the voices, which have not much to thank the acoustic qualities of the edifice for—sounds powerfully through the vast space, and replaces Cliquot's charming, but too modest instrument, which lent its aid at the old concerts. An immense distance has been traversed, a great advance made, by passing from the fourteen or fifteen registers of Cliquot's instrument to the sixty of the organ at the Trocadéro. M. Cavaillé-Coll's organ, by itself, is equal to the most powerful orchestra in the world.

The concerts inaugurated and carried on with such brilliant success by M. Guilment for the last three years are in very many respects a revival of the old Sacred Concerts. They are, it is true, essentially organ concerts, but vocal and instrumental music fill a sufficient space in them for the assimilation to suggest itself naturally to the mind.

But this year more especially, M. Guilment has attempted a resurrection possessing all the attraction and charm of something previously untried. We refer to the performance with organ and band, of Handel's concertos, so popular in England but hitherto not known in France. Some of the great master's oratorios gave, a few years ago, a foretaste of these fine works, which are at one and the same time popular, and highly artistic in character. Handel wrote eighteen concertos for organ and orchestra. M. Guilment, with the assistance of M. Colonne's excellent body of players, has given us four of these remarkable compositions with, in addition, a notable fragment from a fifth; thereby constituting the great and legitimate success of his very interesting entertainments. We had the fourth concerto in F; the seventh in B-minor; the first, in G-minor; the second, in B-minor; and, lastly, a fragment of the sixth. We lay particular stress on Handel's concertos without again analyzing, after the reports published in this paper, the programmes of which they formed the chief ornament; indeed it was the announcement that they were to be given, which attracted to the four concerts so numerous an audience that more than 300 persons had to be turned back on each occasion. Having come with a feeling of curiosity mingled with a certain prejudice against works supposed to be purely scholastic and consequently wearisome, the public were first astonished, then charmed, and finally enraptured with such melody united to such science, and disguising art by art itself. The frank rhythms, the genuine good humor, the rapid pace which caused tolerably long pieces to appear too short, all combined to ensure the immediate success of these masterpieces, which have so long formed part of the regular repertory in Germany and more especially in England. The effect produced by their performance was well expressed by an amateur who observed: "This music possesses a rustic flavor which is charming; we breathe it like the perfume of a meadow; it has the odor of thyme." M. Guilment has been worthily rewarded for his efforts by a degree of success hitherto unprecedented in this branch of art. His concerts have been more than an agreeable recreation for the crowd; they may lay claim to the character of an artistic imitation. Are there many of which we can say as much?

CH. BARTHELEMY.

WAGNER ON BEETHOVEN.¹

... Touching Beethoven, Wagner declares that it was the mission of the master to assert the proper function of his art; to release it from the bondage of the external and trivial, and make it a revelation of the inmost soul. On this point our author, after referring to the retardation of Mozart's development by "unprecedented deviations," goes on to say: "We see young Beethoven, on the other hand, facing the world at once with that defiant temperament which, throughout his life, kept him in almost savage independence; his enormous self-confidence, supported by haughtier courage, at all times prompted him to defend himself from the frivolous demands made upon music by a pleasure-seeking world. He had to guard a treasure of immeasurable richness against the importunities of effeminate taste. He was the soothsayer of the innermost world of tones, and he had to act as such in the very forms in which music was displaying itself as a merely diverting art." We will not stop to inquire whether Wagner's picture of Beethoven's "savage independence" is exactly warranted by the facts of, at least, the early part of his career. It is more important to raise a question as to the obligation expressed in the last-quoted sentence. Wagner was bound to meet the argument that his hero accepted, and, to the last, worked upon the recognized form of art, and we find here some sort of necessity assumed. Our author admits that Beethoven "never altered any of the extant forms of instrumental music on principle; the same structure can be traced in his last sonatas, quartets, symphonies, etc., as in his first." He would have acted according to reason, we are told, if he had overthrown those forms as a lot of useless "external scaffolding"; but he did nothing of the kind, although the "rough vehemence of his human nature shows how he felt the ban these forms laid upon his genius, with a sense of personal suffering almost as great as that which he felt under the pressure of any other conventionality." The entirely gratuitous assumption expressed in these words makes it all the more imperative that Wagner should explain to us why the savagely independent spirit of Beethoven did not burst asunder the chafing fetters of form. But our author does nothing of the kind. He tells us, in words already cited, that Beethoven "had to" observe form. Why "had to"? We can see no obligation, and the fair inference is that the master adhered to accepted artistic methods in the exercise of his right of choice, conscious that they did not hinder but rather assist a full and intelligible expression of his ideas. How much Wagner is at a loss to reconcile his theory of Beethoven with Beethoven's acts appears by his riding out of the matter on the back of a compliment to the German nation: "Here again is apparent the peculiarity of the German nature, which is inwardly so richly and deeply endowed, that it leaves its impress upon every form, remodels the forms from within, and thus escapes the necessity of externally overthrowing it." This may be very true, but affords no proof that Beethoven despised the forms he, through life, so scrupulously observed. While we challenge Wagner on this point, it is impossible not to agree with his glowing description of the manner in which Beethoven's genius gave new life to the old methods. He may be somewhat hard upon the master's predecessors when he likens their works to a painted transparency with the light held before the picture, and Beethoven's to the same transparency with the light behind it, but every word of the following is true: "Assuredly it is an enchanted state we fall into when listening to a genuine work of Beethoven's. In all parts and details of the piece, that to sober senses look like a complex of technical means cunningly contrived to fulfill a form, we now perceive a ghost-like animation, an activity here most delicate, there appalling, a pulsation of undulating joy, longing, fear, lamentation, and ecstasy, all of which again seem to spring from the profoundest depths of our own nature. For the feature in Beethoven's musical productions which is so particularly momentous for the history of art is this: that every technical detail, by means of which for clearness' sake the artist places himself in a conventional relation to the external world, is raised to the highest significance of a spontaneous effusion." Surely if this prove anything beside Beethoven's greatness, it shows that the classical forms which "for clearness' sake" the master used are not incompatible with the complete manifestation of even a stupendous genius. Why then assail or ignore them, as some of Beethoven's successors take pride in doing?

Wagner next gives us some interesting remarks upon the difference in the essential natures of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. The first-named master was satisfied to be a Prince's attendant. "Submissive and devout, he retained the peace of a kind-hearted, cheerful disposition to a good old age." Mozart, on the other hand, found servitude unbearable, and spent himself in "an incessant struggle for an undisturbed and secure existence," sacrificing his fugitive earnings to the petty enjoyments of life. On his part, Beethoven, far too haughty to attend either prince or public, lived so much within himself that he was comparatively indifferent to the world of external things. And, as he withdrew farther and farther from that world, the clearer became his insight into inner and inward things. In urging this upon us Wagner becomes truly eloquent, and we follow his argument with unalloyed pleasure. In the light here shown, deafness came to Beethoven as a gift from the gods: "For the outer world now became extinct to him; not that blindness robbed him of its view, but because deafness finally kept it at a distance from his hearing. The ear was the only organ through which the outer world could still reach and disturb him; it had long since faded to his eye. What did the enraptured dreamer see when, fixedly staring with open eyes, he wandered through the crowded streets of Vienna, solely animated by the waking of his inner world of tones?"

We must pass over Wagner's remarks upon Beethoven's optimism in religious belief, and in the capacities of human nature, simply pointing out how, in view of it, he compares the master to a saint whose suffering is enhanced by every display of evil works and ways. Beethoven's reason we are told, impelled him "to construct the Idea of the Good Man," and then to find a melody proper to him. In working out this fanciful hypothesis Wagner becomes extravagant to the cool-headed reader. He speaks of the "Eroica" Symphony as "almost" indicating Beethoven's search after the Good Man; who is, however, more obviously found in the finale of the "C-minor," to which the "Eroica" appears as "a protracted preparation, holding us in suspense like clouds moved now by storms, now by delicate breezes, from which at length the sun bursts forth in full splendor." As for the melody fitted to the Good Man, Wagner discovers it in the last movement of the Ninth Symphony; "The most consummate art has never produced anything more artistically simple than that melody, the childlike innocence of which, when it is first heard in the most equable whisper of the bass stringed instruments in unison, breathes upon us as with a saintly breath. It now becomes the Plain-Song—the choral of the new congregation, around which, as in the church choral of Sebastian Bach, the harmonic voices form contrapuntal groups as they severally enter. There is nothing like the sweet fervor to which every newly-added voice further animates this type of purest innocence, until every embellishment, every glory of elevated feeling, unites in it and around it, like the breathing world round a finally revealed dogma of purest love." This is not less true than eloquent; but Beethoven would probably be surprised, could he live again, at the theory which connects his beautiful theme with search after a melody fitting for an ideal Good Man. He might also want to know why such a melody is not recognised as having been found when the Choral Fantasia was written. Wagner now goes on to insist that Beethoven "emancipated melody from the influence of fashion and fluctuating taste," and not only so, but gave to vocal music, in relation to that which is instrumental, a new significance, by treating the voices, not with reference to their verbal text, but as "human instruments." An orchestra with voices thus became simply an orchestra with enhanced capabilities—in other words, additional instruments. "We are all aware," says Wagner, "that music loses nothing of its character even when very different words are set to it; and this fact proves that the relation of music to the art of poetry is purely illusory; for it holds true that when music is heard, with singing added thereto, it is not the poetical thought, which, especially in choral pieces, can hardly be articulated intelligibly, that is grasped by the auditor, but, at best, only that element of it which to the musician seemed suitable for music, and which his mind transmuted into music." This leads our author into a philosophical discussion of "the most complete drama," as we should have it from the combination of a Shakespeare and a Beethoven, each speaking out of his inmost consciousness, regardless of forms and conventionalities. As to this part of the argument we must refer the reader to the book itself, since to touch it all would necessitate the taking up of large space.

Wagner anticipated that his peculiar ideas about Beethoven would be held up to ridicule, and he here discusses at some length the literary and æsthetic degeneracy of our age. He attributes it almost entirely to fashion—the subordination of individuality to a common pattern. The true paradise of mental activity, he tells us, was found before letters were invented, or written upon parchment or paper. But when written characters were introduced, mental activity abated, and still more was this the case after the invention of printing. Down to this point, however, there was some hope. "The genius of a people could come to an understanding with the printer," but the rise of journalism removed the last chance. "For now opinions only rule, 'public opinions,' and they can be had for money. Whoever takes in a newspaper has procured its 'opinions' over and above the waste paper; he need not think or reflect any further; what is to be thought of God and the world lies ready before him in black and white." Thus, hopelessly in bondage to fashion or "public opinion," we must, on Wagner's showing, look to music for comfort. The kingdom of music, like that of religion, is not of this world. "Let every one experience for himself how the entire modern world of phenomena, that, to his despair, everywhere impenetrably hems him in, suddenly vanishes away as soon as he hears the first bars of one of these divine symphonies. How could we possibly listen with any devotion to such music at one of our concert-rooms, if the physical surroundings did not vanish from our optical perception? Yet this is, taken in its most serious sense, the uniform effect of music over and against our entire modern civilization; music extinguishes it as sunshine does lamplight." It is the spirit of this powerful and unfettered art, from which Beethoven struck the last shackles of fashion when he emancipated melody, that, according to Wagner, will re-animate our civilization as far as concerns the artistic Man. On the same authority, the task of re-animation devolves upon the German spirit, and will be achieved by it provided it learn to comprehend the situation properly and relinquish every false tendency.—Lond. Mus. Times.

THE LEIPZIG CONSERVATORIUM.

In the columns of the Parisian, a young English lady, Miss Bessie Richards, gives a brief but interesting description of life in Leipzig, with special reference to the career of young ladies who enter at the Leipzig Conservatoire. Miss Bessie Richards was, it is well known, a student at the Leipzig Conservatoire, and she therefore speaks from experience. Altogether her picture of life in the Saxon city is a highly favorable one. For a home you have the choice of boarding with a family—married officers and persons of similar standing freely receiving boarders—or having private apartments. Miss Bessie Richards chose the latter alternative, and she had a room which served at once as a bed, sitting, and reception room. A large Berlin stove, without any visible fire, but which warms the apartment far more effectually than the open fire-places; a wooden bed, which is concealed by a screen during the day, a few chairs, a table, two or three rugs, and a parquet floor, rendering a carpet unnecessary, form the furniture of these apartments. The examination to secure admission to the Conservatoire is almost nominal, and the thing is clenched by the reading aloud of the rules and the payment of the fees. Miss Bessie Richards says:—

"As the professors present did not understand English, I fear, when on one occasion I was deputed to read the above-mentioned rules to some of my country-people, my sense of the humorous overcame my respect for the authorities; and some clauses which I added on my own account, delivered with a gravity befitting the occasion, slightly astonished my hearers. After giving the dates of their birth, with brief biographies of their nearest relations, the students are provided with a plan of the daily lessons and can begin work."

Into the system of study adopted at the Leipzig Conservatoire Miss Bessie Richards unfortunately does not enter in detail. She merely says that each student or "Conservatorist" and "Conservatoristin," as they are called, has a right to from six to eight lessons a week in piano, violin, violoncello, or singing, and harmony; besides which there are weekly lectures, ensemble classes for the practice of concerted music, and entertainments (Abend-unterhaltungen), every Friday evening, arranged for the purpose of accustoming the inexperienced artists to perform in public. These take place in the concert-hall, a room capable of holding from four to five hundred people; and all interested in the success of the Conservatorium are admitted. Miss Richards complains that at the Conservatoire "the male and female classes are kept carefully apart: a precaution which appeared to me very unnecessary, since I never met a member of the institution who could have succeeded in diverting my attention for one moment from my studies." After some cursory remarks on the hats of the gilded youth of Leipzig, Miss Richards proceeds to describe the amusements of the city. She says:—

"The amusements offered in Leipzig during the winter are the theatres, numerous concerts, and skating. The new theatre is a large and handsome building, where operas and dramas are given alternately every evening. Although the 'stars' of London, Paris, and St. Petersburg are seldom heard there, great attention is paid to the orchestra and chorus, resulting in a generally good performance. The low prices (the most expensive seats costing only four shillings on ordinary occasions) enable even persons of slender means to indulge frequently in these entertainments. The principal orchestral concerts are the Gewandhaus, the Euterpe, and occasional church concerts for the performance of oratorios, masses, etc. There are also the Kammer-musik Soiréen, or chamber music soirées, once a week, and occasional concerts organized by stray artists visiting the town. The Gewandhaus Concerts every Thursday evening are the event of the week. The rehearsals, at which members of the Conservatorium have the privilege of being present, take place on Wednesday morning, beginning at nine o'clock—the early hour raising murmurs, in which even the most enthusiastic amateurs cannot but join. All the numbered seats having been subscribed for by the same families for years, and being looked upon as heir-looms, outsiders wishing to be present at these concerts are condemned to sit in the Kleiner Saal, where it is possible to see, but not, except from the few seats facing the door which leads into the large room, to hear. To secure the coveted chairs is the ambition of all; and a formidable party may be found assembled on the stairs of the Gewandhaus an hour before the doors are opened, prepared on the ringing of the bell, the signal for their admission, to incur any risks in compassing this end. The new comers, uninitiated in these customs, are slightly astonished on arriving shortly before the beginning of the concert, to find all chance of obtaining a seat at an end. But, shortly after, the novice, who a few weeks earlier would probably have been sauntering leisurely into St. James's Hall in all the splendor of evening array, might be seen scampering madly along the passages of the Gewandhaus, upsetting any one who barred the way to the longed-for seat. The discovery of a less-frequented entrance on the other side of the hall caused at one time a certain amount of excitement, and a few admitted to the secret were missed from their usual posts on the stairs. The result was that the two parties, rushing frantically from opposite directions, fell into each other's arms; and in the struggle the seats which had been the object of this unseemly encounter fell to the lot of the less enterprising competitors bringing up the rear. The Euterpe Concerts are also of considerable repute, but not sufficiently so to necessitate a resort to strong measures in order to obtain a stall."

Miss Richards also describes the cafés, giving an amusing picture of the fondness of grown men and women for chocolate, and the horror of the average German for a current of fresh air in a room; and with a description of the arrangements for skating, and a warm panegyric of the hospitality and kindness of the inhabitants towards strangers, her interesting essay concludes.

LOCAL ORCHESTRAS.

Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, one of the rising composers of England, and a musician of culture, living and working at Cambridge University, has addressed the following letter to the organists of the English cathedrals. Though we have no cathedral cities, and no military centres of the kind here alluded to, yet the principal suggestion in the letter would seem to be, mutatis mutandis, equally applicable to the musical condition of some parts at least of our own country.

We have frequently insisted in these columns on the desirableness of having a good local orchestra in every city and large town which has acquired importance as a musical centre. Nothing could do so much to secure the musical independence of a community. It would leave us far less at the mercy of speculating managers and agents, with their travelling bands and orchestras. If we have not trained cathedral choirs, we have in many towns and cities vocal societies, which study with enthusiasm oratorios and cantatas of the highest character, and would perform them oftener if they only had the means of a suitable instrumental accompaniment without going to Boston or New York for it. What gives real musical character to a place is its possession, all within itself, of its own orchestral, as well as its own vocal, organization. The same thing may be said also of the opera; there will be no true opera in America until we cease to be dependent for this costly and luxurious entertainment upon the travelling impresarii, and have permanent, established, local lyric theatres of our own.

Mr. Stanford suggests to his brother cathedral organists that "out-going choristers" (boys we presume) in the several choirs might be taught to play instruments against the time when their voices would naturally fail them. This resource would amount to little here. But, on the other hand, with all our music schools and "Conservatories," and with the increasing interest in music everywhere about us, might not the materials for a small orchestra be found and made available by training, not only in principal cities like Boston, but in large towns like Worcester, Salem, Springfield, etc.,—in short, wherever an oratorio society exists? And it would also serve for purely instrumental concerts. Mr. Stanford writes:—

Sir,—In the present acknowledged dearth of local orchestras in England, I venture to ask your attention to, and if possible co-operation in, a plan for supplying a want so widely felt. Good chorus singers and choral societies are in plenty, while the means of adequately accompanying them is so rare, that either an orchestra must be obtained at great expense from London or Manchester, or else recourse must be had to the miserable substitute of a harmonium or pianoforte. If we except Bristol, and a very few of the larger cities, local orchestral concerts, such as are to be found flourishing in the smallest German towns, are unknown; and that too, not from the absence of musical appreciation in the English public, but from the lack of instruction in orchestral instruments. I have tried, and hitherto with success, the expedient of having out-going choristers in my choir taught orchestral instruments, and their previous musical training stands them in such good stead, that I confidently expect to find eventually good results in a competent local orchestra. The knowledge of orchestral instruments will be profitable to them, in that it will supplement their income from whatever mercantile or other pursuits they enter upon when they leave the choir. I trust that you will see your way to developing this idea in your town and choir. If the Cathedral cities were to make an effort in this direction, the effect both upon English audiences and English music, would, I feel convinced, be a most marked one. As many Cathedral towns are also military centres, no difficulty would be found in procuring the services of a band-master or other qualified person to teach the various instruments.

Hoping for your valuable co-operation in this plan, and for any suggestions you may make for its furtherance, I remain, dear Sir, yours very faithfully,
C. VILLIERS STANFORD.

HOUSEHOLD MUSIC.

One of the most powerful means for the dissemination of musical knowledge and the consequent progress in musical art, is the proper practice of music in the household. Sufficient attention is not given to the cultivation of this phase of the art. It is too generally looked upon as an unimportant branch of education, which may take care of itself. But this is a mistake; because it denies the people a vast amount of pleasure and profit. Musical enthusiasts who are continually running wild over music and musicians would do well to devote some of their exuberant energy to the propagation of music in the home circle. The average young lady amateur should be taught that outside of her two or three little piano pieces there is a world of music, which, if she will, she may enter with delight and profit to herself. As a household instrument, the piano is unsurpassed; but its abuse must be guarded against. It is so popular a form of music-making that people are apt to look upon it as the only musical instrument available for the household. The interchange of sympathy and enthusiasm, brought about by the practice of part-singing or part-playing in the household, is far more conducive to the propagation of musical art among the people than is the incessant and indifferent use of any one instrument.

The violin and orchestral instruments generally are now much studied by ladies, so that, besides the gentleman players who can be procured, the material for home orchestras is not lacking. This form of home music combines informal social enjoyment with deep study of the works of the great masters. Moreover, it has the additional effect of familiarizing the casual listener with the masterworks of musical genius, until their intrinsic beauties grow upon him. Hence, side by side with the spread of concerted music in the household, will grow the popular appreciation of that classic music which is now too rigidly believed to be far above the comprehension of the masses. Many persons do not enjoy classic music, not because they lack a natural taste for it, but because they do not listen to it often enough to grow familiar with it. The practice of holding musical evenings in the house, for the performance of both solo and concerted music, is one likely to stimulate a love for the art. In the performance of part music, the piano can be brought into use in numerous ways. Apart from its unique use as a solo instrument, the piano is invaluable for accompanying, on account of its harmony-producing powers. Though it has not that perfection of intonation to be found in the stringed instruments, its unique qualities will always sus-tain it as the instrument of instruments for household use. It certainly is a much abused thing, but its use is so important that the abuse is, in a measure, excusable. Very few people take proper care of the piano. They allow it to be exposed to the vagaries of the atmosphere and of piano-thumping young ladies. Not having an acutely musical ear, they do not know when their instrument gets out of order, or, knowing, they neglect to have it tuned often enough. The consequence is that such neglect inflicts a permanent injury upon the instrument, destroying its quality of tone and purity of intonation. These defects combine to blunt the musical sensibilities of the learner on the instrument, as well as to grate upon the sensitive ear of the musician.

The quality of the musical compositions for the piano in use of late years is much better than formerly, yet much room remains for improvement. Trashy songs and piano pieces still occupy too prominent a place upon the household music-stand. When a higher standard of musical appreciation is reached by the general public, this demand for trashy music will cease. Meanwhile, it is reasonable to think that an inferior quality of music in the household is better than none at all, since it may indirectly lead to the appreciation of something better. Many hot-headed musicians and ultra-classicists do not endorse this view of the matter, but erroneously urge the introduction of classic music into every household, where not even the slightest preparation has been made for its reception. The adequate appreciation of classic music is a matter of education and time. There is no reason why the best and highest music may not, in course of time, become a common means of household enjoyment. The general public has begun to find that there is greater beauty than they had supposed in classic music, as the appreciation of it at concerts testifies. And so, in very many homes it has justly usurped the place of the light and ephemeral trash which has so long held sway.

To place music in the house upon its legitimate footing, it is necessary that it should be somewhat systematized. Every household ought to form a musical club, composed of a few select members, who would meet together regularly for practice and for social enjoyment. The musical duties ought to be carried out earnestly, and the evening's pleasure ought not to degenerate into a mere pastime. Nor is it sufficient that devotees of the art be merely executants. There are many branches outside of the playing of music which are of deep interest to the true music-lover. The perusal and discussion of the several branches of musical literature are never-failing means to arouse in thinking minds an interest and enthusiasm which cannot but bear good fruit. To read the biography of a composer, then to study an analysis of certain of his works, and hear those works performed, is an absorbing treat to the man who is not a practical musician, as it is to one who is a deep student of the art. It is the intellectual phase of musical appreciation which our household musicians need to cultivate. The perusal of standard musical literature and the musical periodicals is one means to this great end. In addition to his inherent love for music, the more general culture a man possesses, the more will he be enabled to appreciate the depth and grandeur of the art—the broader will be his capabilities of conception and appreciation. If people thus gifted would bestow some of their attention on the cultivation of music in the house, in course of time there would be very little heard about the lack of general admiration for the best and highest in musical art. The sooner people learn that musical appreciation does not wholly consist in their passive attendance at concerts and operas, the sooner they will learn that their perfunctory contributions to musical societies and the like are not the only requisites for the elevation of music; the better it will be for the ennobling art which demands active, personal sincerity from those followers who would elevate it to its proper place among the people. GEORGE T. BULLING.

OLE BULL.

A despatch from Bergen, Norway, by way of London, received here on the 19th inst., announced the death of the veteran violinist and great popular favorite, Ole Bull. For many years, and even until the past few months, he was a familiar figure in these parts, still attracting attention and admiration by his noble stature, his courteous demeanor, his outward dignity and grace, his benevolent and beaming countenance, crowned by the copious mass of hair white with age, which made his aspect venerable. He lived last winter at Cambridge, in the house of James Russell Lowell, enjoying the friendly intercourse of Longfellow and other friends of culture and distinction, who celebrated his seventieth birthday there last February; and he was often seen in concerts, both as performer and as hearer.

As a man, a mind, a character, he could be admired, without much admiration of his music. His personality was striking. There was a touch of genius, or something like it, in his face and in his conversation, and there was a certain charm in all his eccentricity. He was noted also for his public spirit, his generous aid of charitable or noble causes, and for the outspoken freedom of his opinions always on the side of liberty and of humanity. He could tolerate no nonsense, no affectation (although he has been often charged with the latter weakness, himself, in his art). He hated Wagner's music; we have heard him say: "There's murder in that music, it appeals to the lower passions." On the other hand, he was an intense admirer of Mozart, even more so than of Beethoven. Schumann seemed to be too much for him.

As a violinist, and as a composer, Ole Bull ranked rather as a virtuoso, than as a musician in the best sense. He had undoubtedly a sincere love of his instrument, could woo from it the sweetest, richest tones, and had acquired, in certain respects, a rare mastery of execution. But he dealt too much in brilliant, startling effects and in exaggerated sentimentality. He played down to his audience. He became the spoiled child of popular applause; always repeating himself, playing over and over for many years the same small stock of pieces, which were sure to please the multitude; manifesting no progress whatever as a musician and composer from the time of his first popular triumphs here in 1843. His compositions, which he almost always played, as well as his fantastic, rarely felicitous improvisations, were mostly of the flimsiest and even claptrap character; they pleased the crowd, and he was always upon exhibition, caring more for that, apparently, than for real earnest growth in art. Yet there was a certain halo of romance about him, a certain legendary something, that made him still a hero with the people. To them he seemed to embody and continue into our modern times the outworn minstrel character and function of the middle ages. While he has added nothing to the history of Art, his memory will be cherished as that of an imposing, genial, attractive personality. We take from the Transcript the following sketch of his career:

He was born in Bergen, Norway. His passion for music manifested itself at a very early age, but was discouraged by his father, who destined him for the church. At eight years old he played in the Philharmonic concerts at Bergen, and at nine he played first violin in Beethoven's symphony in D. When he was eighteen years of age his father sent him to the University of Christiania, which he soon left on account of taking charge of an orchestra at one of the theatres during the illness of the leader. In 1829 he went to Cassel to study with Spohr, but his reception was so cold as to almost entirely suppress his musical enthusiasm. He then began the study of law at Göttingen, but soon recovered from the despondency caused by his interview with Spohr, and once more determined to devote himself to his art, and went to Minden, where he gave his first concert with considerable success. At this place a quarrel with a fellow artist resulted in a challenge, and in a duel which followed his antagonist was mortally wounded. Compelled to leave the country, he went to Paris, where he led a most precarious and wretched life, and after being robbed of everything he possessed, including his violin, he attempted suicide by drowning. He was rescued and taken to the house of a recently bereaved mother, who found in him a remarkable resemblance to her dead son, and assisted him so liberally that he was enabled to appear in public in the profession he had chosen. The next seven years were spent in professional tours through Europe, by which he acquired not only an extended reputation but a handsome fortune. In 1838 he returned to his native place with his wife, a Parisian woman, and five years later made his first visit to the United States, where he was enthusiastically received, his concert tour yielding him a rich pecuniary harvest. In 1845 he returned to Europe, and during the succeeding seven years gave a series of concerts in the principal cities of the continent, made a campaign in Algeria against the Kabyles under General Yusuf, built a theatre in his native town, and made an effort to establish in Norway national schools in literature and art. His liberality and patriotism brought him in contact with the police because of his political preferences, and a number of vexatious lawsuits dissipated his fortune, and in 1852 he made his second visit to this country. In the same year he purchased a tract of uncultivated land, comprising 120,000 acres, in Potter County, Pennsylvania, and founded an agricultural colony, to which the name of Oleana was given in honor of its founder. The project, however, was only partially successful, and to relieve the pecuniary embarrassments which followed he resumed his concerts. Upon the completion of the Academy of Music in New York in 1854, he leased the building and undertook the management of Italian opera, which, however, proved extremely disastrous, and at the end of two months was abandoned. He again returned to Europe, where he gave concerts with much success. In April, 1866, he was reported to have died in Quebec, but since that time he has had a very busy and prosperous life. On June 1, 1870, he was married to Miss Sarah C. Thorp, daughter of Hon. J. G. Thorp of Madison, Wis. Some months later he came again to America. Since then he has lived in America most of the time, and during last winter was a resident of Cambridge, where he occupied Hon. James Russell Lowell's estate. During recent years he has frequently appeared here in concerts, and he has taken a deep interest in all matters pertaining to music, the drama and art.

LOCAL ITEMS.

Miss Lillian Bailey and Mr. George Henschel, the noted baritone, late of London, arrived here last week, and are now visiting at Haydenville, Mass. Mr. Henschel will not sing here before his return to England, where he is engaged for the Leeds Festival in October. He will make his American debut on his return here, Nov. 6, in New York, and will be heard first in this city in the Bay State course, Nov. 11. Pity that the Handel and Haydn Society cannot have him to sing the part of Elijah, at the opening of the new Tremont Temple!

—The Handel and Haydn Society will perform the Messiah and Elijah in the opening week of the new Tremont Temple. In the first oratorio, October 11, Miss Lillian Bailey will be the soprano soloist, making her first re-appearance in this city after singing at the Worcester Festival.

—The Mendelssohn Quintet Club's new members for the coming season are Isidore Schnitzler, first violin, from Rotterdam, and Ernst Thiele, violin, from Philadelphia. Messrs. William Schade, flute, and Frederick Giese, cello, make their second season with the club, and Thomas Ryan begins his thirty-first year with the organization which he created. The club, with Miss Lewis, who has just returned from Europe, after an absence of two years, are preparing to make a concert tour in Maine and the Provinces, appearing in St. John, N. B., Sept. 7, returning to Boston about the 25th.

—The Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, Bernhard Listemann, conductor, is to be increased for the coming season to forty-two men, and will give five concerts of classical and miscellaneous selections before the New Year. The principal works promised are the following:—

Symphonies: Beethoven—Pastoral in F, No. 6; Liszt—A "Faust" symphony in three parts, with Schlusschorus and Dante symphony (first part, "Inferno"); Raff—"Im Walde"; Tschalkowski—Suite, Op. 42. Overtures: Weber—"Freischütz"; Berlioz—"Le Carnaval Romain"; Gluck—"Iphigenia in Aulis" (finished by Wagner); Beethoven—"King Stephen"; Wagner—"Eine Faust Overture"; Goldmark—"Penthesilea"; Dvorak—"Der Bauer ein Schelm"

(The Peasant a Rogue). Miscellaneous: Rubinstein—"Don Quixote" (musical character picture); Hoffman—Three character pieces; Mozart—Divertimento in D; Wagner—"Siegfried's Funeral March," "Waldweben" and "Kaisermarsch"; Tchaikowski—Andante for strings; Dvorak—Slavonic Dances (new); Ed. Kretschmer—"Abendruhe," for strings; Brahms—Hungarian Dances; Saint-Saëns—"The Youth of Hercules" and "Phaeton"; Paine—Scherzo from "Spring Symphony"; Handel—Andante and Menuet from the Fourth Concerto, and Musette from the Sixth Concerto; Bach, Gavotte in D minor; Liszt—"Carnival of Pesth" and "Rakoczy March"; Zopf—"Idyllen," for two orchestras; Strauss—Waltzes, etc.

—The Sunday Herald tells us:—

Few musicians have been more in demand than Theodore Thomas has since his return, managers from all sections vying with each other in their efforts to secure his services. Offers for one hundred night engagements and for more extended concert tours have been made him by a number of responsible amusement caterers, but largely with no result. Manager Peck has, however, secured his services, with that of his newly-organized orchestra, for the last week in October, when a series of concerts will be given in this locality. It is more than probable that one of the attractions of this engagement will be the production of "The Damnation of Faust," with all the attractions, as regards a perfect orchestra, efficient soloists and chorists that can be desired. A number of the novelties brought over by Mr. Thomas, and so strictly guarded (!) from public knowledge, will also be produced during this engagement.

WORCESTER, MASS. The twenty-third annual festival of the Worcester County Musical Association will occur September 20th to 24th inclusive. Its scheme embraces eight concerts of a very high character, introducing artists prominent in every department, in Europe as well as this country, in solo and concerted music; and, in connection with the great chorus of the association an augmented orchestra and the Worcester organ, in works of the largest and most brilliant character.

At the head of the long array of eminent artists, under engagement for the festival, is the name of the charming soprano, Mrs. E. Aline Osgood, who, having been engaged at large expense by the association for this festival, retires for a short period from the scenes of her recent triumphs in England, to return there at once upon the fulfillment of her contract at the Worcester festival, in order to fill an engagement as principal soprano with Albani, at the Leeds festival of October 14th to 18th, and other engagements immediately following. Mrs. Osgood is one of the very foremost sopranos in public estimation, and the committee who boldly assumed the necessary expense to secure her services deserve commendation.

Miss Lillian Bailey, the pleasing young soprano just arrived from England, Italy, Germany and Holland, where she has created great enthusiasm by her pure voice and sympathetic, artistic singing, has also been secured. Miss Bailey's appearance here at the festival of 1877 is well remembered, and she will be welcomed home again from successes abroad with much pleasure.

As it is a part of the plan of the committee to introduce new and, to our audiences, unknown but meritorious talent each year, they have made an effort to do this the present year, and have engaged the services of Mrs. J. C. Hull, a rising soprano, lately secured as soprano at the Church of the Incarnation, New York city, who will appear on one or more occasions during the festival. Mrs. Hull has sung the leading rôle in Auber's Crown Diamonds and Balfe's Bohemian Girl as well as in most of the oratorios, and good things are expected of her.

Annie Louise Cary, who sustains the principal alto solos at the festival, requires no word of praise from us, and no introduction to a festival audience. It is understood that the committee, by insisting upon the fulfillment of her contract with them, simply occasioned Annie (sic) to conclude an engagement following with Mapleson here, rather than in England; contralto of the calibre of Miss Cary are not common enough on either side of the Atlantic to remain long unemployed. Miss Ita Welsh will assume the mezzo-soprano solos in the Requiem Mass by Verdi, which will be brought out with the same grand orchestral and general dramatic effect as called out such interest at its presentation in Boston at the triennial festival of the Handel and Haydn Society in May last.

Mr. C. R. Adams, who sang the work under its composer, and who first brought it to this country, will sing the great tenor airs in the Requiem Mass, while Mr. Clarence E. Hay will sustain the baritone solos in the same work. Also appearing in other concerts during the festival, Mr. Theo. J. Toedt, the principal tenor of last year's festival, will sing, as will also Mr. W. C. Tower and Mr. C. F. Bonney, the latter having lately returned from several years' study abroad and recent successful appearances at the Crystal Palace concerts, London. Myron W. Whitney heads the list of basses, which also contains the name of D. M. Babcock.

The Schubert Concert Company, comprising sixteen of the leading members of the Apollo Club, (male voices) of Boston, will also appear. The Eichberg Quartette of young lady violinists will undoubtedly repeat their success of last year's festival and confirm the good impression then made by them.

Timothie Adamowski, the violin virtuoso, has been secured, as has also an increased orchestra of selected musicians. Negotiations are in progress with a first-class pianist for concert solos, and also with other vocal and instrumental artists.

We have said enough to show conclusively that the coming festival will take a step in advance in interest over any its predecessors, and need only add, as a still greater assurance of success, that Messrs. B. D. Allen, George W. Sumner, and E. B. Story are to be the accompanists, and Carl Zerrahn conductor.

The festival chorus begin their fall series of rehearsals on Monday evening, August 30, continuing them on the evenings of September 2, 6, 9, 13, 16 and 17, the festival beginning the 20th of September, and continuing five days.—Worcester Spy.

CINCINNATI. The Inquirer has the following intelligence, which has also been widely disseminated by circular:

The College of Music, it may be safely said, is now a permanent institution of our city. It passed through a fiery furnace during the first few months of its existence, and has come from the flames of dissension, jealousy and discontent purified and perfect.

There are many of the doubting kind, who, when Theodore Thomas withdrew from the college, with looks of wisdom and nodding heads, said, "they knew the college would not be a permanent institution," and with the passing away of Mr. Thomas these people expected the college would also disappear; but they have been disappointed.

The name of Theodore Thomas undoubtedly gave prestige to the college and proved a charm, but as he was not the soul of that institution, its life was not even threatened when he withdrew.

The college directors recently announced that a new department, "A School for Operatic Training," was soon to be added to its already numerous branches of study. Col. George Ward Nichols, president of the college, has been in New York city for some time making arrangements to secure a competent teacher for this department, and it will be gratifying to our people to know that he has secured the services of the well-known and popular impresario, Max Maretzek. Mr. Maretzek will bring to the college his invaluable services as a teacher of singing, which, together with his long experience as an impresario, eminently fits him for this position. The letter of Mr. Maretzek to Colonel Nichols accepting the appointment is so interesting that we publish it. He pays a high compliment to the "native talent of America," and displays his confidence in the College of Music and its success when he says that there is no need for American singers to go abroad to attain a perfect training when they have an operatic department in such a school as the College of Music. The acceptance of the position is also an evidence of the faith Mr. Maretzek has in our College of Music and its ultimate perfect success. It will not be out of place to state here that the number of pupils at the college during the coming winter will be almost double that of last year. The applications of scholars are coming in daily, and it is now thought that at least one thousand pupils will be instructed in the college during the coming fall and winter terms. The letter of Mr. Maretzek is as follows:

NEW YORK, August 7, 1880.

"GEORGE WARD NICHOLS, Esq., President College of Music of Cincinnati. — Dear Sir: I accept with pleasure the flattering invitation of the Board of Directors of the College of Music, of Cincinnati, to perform the duties of Professor of Voice and of the Operatic Department in your great institution. For over thirty years I have been associated as conductor and manager of the operatic stage, and during that time I have assisted in the appearance of the most prominent artists who have visited this country, and of many others who have been ambitious to become great artists. This long experience has revealed to me an immense amount of native talent, which only needed the right kind of musical training to produce American singers equal, if not superior, to any in the world. There is no need to go abroad to attain such training when there is, as you propose to have in connection with a school like yours, where the rudiments of music are already taught, a department where the student can be placed upon the stage and taught to act as well as sing. The position you offer to me suits my inclination, and I sincerely hope and believe that it may result in the much higher elevation of the standard of the operatic stage in this country.

"Believe me, yours truly, MAX MARETZKE."

—Speaking of the Cincinnati college circular, announcing the engagement of Max Maretzek, the Worcester Gazette says: "Again appears to us the now familiar envelope of the Cincinnati College of Music, containing another circular. Both the enclosure and the shell bear the device of the college, with a lion rampant, regardant, with his tail curled round a post to steady himself, while he sings wildly of the departure of Theodore Thomas, accompanying himself on the harp. It is an ingenious bit of heraldry."

MUSIC ABROAD.

PARIS. "C. H. M." writes (July 31) to the London Musical Standard:

The public competition which has just ended at the Conservatoire has not disclosed many unsuspected Patis or sucking Rubinsteins, nor indeed can it be said to have satisfied even the modest expectations we had formed of it. One artist of unquestionable talent has however been made known to us through it—Mlle. Tua, the young lady who carried off the first prize in the violin competition. First prizes for singing were awarded to Miss Griswold (a clever American pupil of M. Barbot), and to Mlle. Merguiller. The first prizes for piano fell to M. René (a pupil of M. Mar-montel), and to Mlle. Blum, (a pupil of M. Le Couppé). It is worth remark that Stephen Heller, the veteran composer of so many original and beautiful works, was one of the members of the jury in the piano section. The number of lady competitors in the violin class was this year larger than ever. Besides Mlle. Tua, two ladies, Mlles. Hillemacher and Roger, figure in the honor of the list—the first with a premier accessit, the last with a deuxième accessit.

In opera and opera comique the results have been disappointing in the extreme. The first prize for opera comique in the masculine department went to M. Piccaluga, a baritone whom we have heard on several occasions at the concerts. No other baritone need be singled out for mention. As to the tenors, all of the five who were admitted to the contest failed miserably. So the coming Mario must be looked for outside of Paris. In the wind instrument competition I was glad to notice that that effective and much-neglected instrument, the trumpet, is being cultivated more than it has been of late. And this is, I think, all that need be said of the great annual event at the Conservatoire, so far as details are concerned. If the matter were examined from a more general standpoint, perhaps a great deal might be added. It might be asked for the hundredth time, whether the principle of these competitions is not radically mischievous and cruel: whether it would not be better to suppress all such delusive distinctions as accessits and second prizes, and whether it would not be better still to suppress even the first prizes rather than encourage fond, and in so many cases utterly unrealizable hopes, in the breasts of the unfortunate prize winners.

There is quite a romantic story attached to Mlle. Tua, the winner of the violin prize. The young lady (who is barely fifteen, I believe) is the daughter of a strolling Italian player, of whom she received her first notions of music, and with whom, when quite a child, she performed very often in humble places of amusement in Italy. A charitable French professor heard her play during a voyage a year or two ago, and was so struck by her extraordinary promise that he at once undertook to get her admitted to the Paris Conservatoire. With the aid of some generous friends he collected the modest sum necessary to support her and her father here till she could finish her studies and earn her own living by her art. She proved, as the result of this year's competition shows, an apt pupil, and her future, at least, may be now considered as assured. The distribution of prizes will have taken place by the time this finds its way into print. M. Turquet, the Under Secretary of State, is again to preside at the ceremony. It is said that he will have the pleasing task of handing M. Ambrose Thomas the decoration of a grand officer of the Legion of Honor on the occasion.

There is absolutely nothing stirring in musical circles outside the Conservatoire and the opera of a nature to interest the general public. I may however, mention the report that the Paris Municipality has resolved to subsidize the Gaiety Theatre, and to use it in future for alternate performances of drama and opera.

At the opera we are being surfeited with "Guillaume Tell" and "Freischütz." M. Massé has just finished his new opera, "Les Nuits de Cleopatre," and we are, it appears, very shortly to be allowed to hear M. Widor's ballet, the scene of which is laid in Brittany.

—A daily paper, says of Miss Griswold:

"The principal honors of the Concourse de Chants, of the Paris Conservatoire, have fallen to Miss Gertrude Griswold, an American young lady, the niece of Mr. Brett Harte. This is the first time since the establishment of the famous Conservatoire that an American or even an English-speaking person has carried off the grand prize. The Parisian says: 'Miss Griswold's grand success this year is only the more gratifying because it was not only wholly deserved, but was achieved despite many and what would have been to almost any other person overwhelming difficulties. Day after day, through all the twelve months of three long years, she has sung and studied at the Conservatoire. It is not necessary for us to review Miss Griswold's labors; it is sufficient to say that after a more than usually hard contest, she was pronounced both by the jury and public the best singer in the school, and the first prize was accordingly awarded to her. As to her artistic future Miss Griswold is not yet determined. After the public distribution of prizes, next month, at which Miss Griswold will sing, she may be engaged for a season at the Grand Opéra.'"

A WEEK IN DRESDEN, 1860.

OCT. 30, 1860. That Tuesday shall be memorable for a long day's excursion, in company with Clara Schumann, her daughter, (a blooming maiden with musical voice and the father's features), the sister Marie, and our strong tone-hero Joachim—in a great open carriage, a driver that would lose the way, so as to prolong the pleasure—and the finest of October days, though far from warm—out to one of the most characteristic and romantic points of the so-called "Saxon Switzerland," the Bastei. When such artists have holiday, it is a good thing to be of the party; that is, if they want you. And was it not a charming way to take, to make the stranger acquainted—a stroke of hospitable genius on the part of the warm-hearted artist woman, ever occupied with earnest cares and duties, mother of seven children, thrown upon her art for their support, busy with the concerts, busy with a thousand artistic relations, and with the laborious practice necessary to maintain, as she fully does, her pre-eminent position among genial classical pianists? A few hours' drive brings us to the path down in the famous Uttewalde Grund, through which wonderful ravine we thread our way afoot, winding upwards to find ourselves upon a narrow gallery of rock, perched high in air, some six or seven hundred feet above the Elbe that sweeps right round its base. This is the Bastei, and you look off over a vast plain, broken by low mound-like mountains, round and flat like huge Titanic mill-stones, each entirely by itself, with miles of dearest level between it and the others. The sun is just dropping down in the West, purpling the water and the skies, (how short the days!) and the great round moon is already taking color and serenely throned above the whole magnificent, cold scene. Art has contrived curious towers, and bridges, sacred niches and inscriptions all about our rocky perch; and feudal legends, of robber knights who used to swoop down upon their prey on that quiet river, are not wanting; while close around us, springing from the plain, and rising to an equal height with us, are strange fantastic shafts of rock, a sort of Giants' Causeway, only all set apart, as if the whole sand-stone mass had been cleft this way and that way to the very bottom, as we see a block of wood cleft into a bunch of matches. But I am not going to describe the Bastei; you will find it very well done in Murray. Suffice it to say the only title of this region to be called a "Switzerland" lies in the fact that it is as unlike Switzerland as possible. That is the very charm of it. It has no snowy mountains, no glaciers, no blue peaks and needles, no cols, no mountain chains, nor valleys, nor pasture Alps and Matten—nothing that is Swiss, nothing that is grand. But it is a wild kind of beauty on a smaller scale, entirely sui generis and unlike anything else; a weird, romantic beauty; some strange old poetry and magic seems to haunt there; the tones of the wind seemed fraught with mystical suggestion as they swelled and died away around the Gasthaus, in which our merry company were sitting after yielding to the fascination of the scene outdoors as long as cold and hunger would permit. I wonder if their secret did not pass into the strings of that matchless violin, whose soul and master we had with us!

What a cold drive we had home under that harvest moon! The fields and hills spread white with frost around us, blanched in the pale moon-gleam. And when we reached the broad part of the river where we had to cross, behold, the ferry boat was on the other side, and Charon snug asleep, insensible to our repeated shouts, or hearing in his dreams the halloos and shrill whistles of our driver mellowed into the wild hunter's waldhorn or the Wunderhorn of Oberon. Happy boatman! What cruel disillusion waits thee! Still we shiver. A whole half hour we stand there at the water's edge and freeze; the glistening air itself is frozen white and solid. At last a light begins to wave reluctantly and sleepily about the cottage; and there are sounds of chains and paddles, and a boat steadily approaching through the small eternity it takes to cross a rapid stream in such an hour, and brisk exchange of tongue artillery between our charioteer and Charon, and we are underway again—or underweigh—chilled into society of silence like a Quaker meeting, musing on the rich day we had had, and owning the majestic beauty of the night, grateful for all this to nature, although her hand-grasp just now is none of the gentlest. But we were soon thawed, we two, after we had bid good night to our fair entertainers, and were snuggled over a good fire and other good things in our hotel, just in the mood for talk, and quite agreed that such a day was worth the freezing.

OCT. 31. A sharp, clear air, fit to be breathed upon this day of the Reformationsfest—proudest anniversary of Protestant Germany. And where should it be celebrated if not here in Saxony, in spite of the anomaly of a king, one of whose Elector ancestors slid back to Rome and then picked up a crown? The shops are closed, and the streets have an almost New England Fast or Thanksgiving aspect. All the large churches—the court church excepted—are thronged two or three times during the day for solemn, cheerful service; the old Lutheran hymns ring out with a will from thousands of united voices, and the debt of Germany, of civilization, to Luther, with the duties thence arising, is the theme of many a glowing preacher. I go in the morning to the most curious and interesting, perhaps, as well as one of the largest of these old churches, the Sophien-Kirche. There we may hear perchance some organ-playing by the most famous of the German organists now living, the old Johann Schneider. His post of duty is here, at the old Silbermann organ, stuck up in the gallery in a corner of the vast and unsymmetrical interior. Such was the crowd, standing in every aisle, that there was no penetrating beyond a place directly underneath the organ gallery. If there had been any fugue or voluntary before service, I had lost it. But it did edify and thrill one somewhat to stand there part and parcel of that crowd, when there went up from young and old the mighty intonations of Ein feste Burg, sustained by the great flood of organ harmony. Many stanzas were sung; and between them were short interludes, often of a very brilliant character, which showed a master-hand indeed, but not a very sober taste. One could not help thinking that the old man had taken a strange time to figure in the character of virtuoso and indulge in such fantastical surprises.

Then came an hour of chamber music, of Bach and violin, all by ourselves. A beautiful Andante of the old master was played to an audience of one—and it is probable that not so much as one was thought of when the thing was written. The full brook flowed just as steadily and sweetly in the unbroken solitude, as when the world looked on. And so it would have kept on running (for it was the right master-hand that smote the rock, that is the strings) that morning, but that a visitor, a poet, dropped in full of talk, Hans Christian Andersen, the Dane, a homely, tall, good-natured, lively, gaily-dressed, enthusiastic individual, pleased with his own echo in the world. And should he not feel pleasantly? Had he not just been bidden into the presence, to read before his Saxon Majesty, the royal Uebersetzer of the more than royal Dante, his last drama, romance, or what not in MS.? But now adieu! auf Wiedersehn! because my lady waits. We step across the hall, into the concert room, where the two artists must rehearse for their last soirée. So, after cordial inquiries and assurance on all sides that all are safely thawed out after the last night's cold adventure (for surely Charon, the real mythological old fellow, never had a colder, stiller set of ghosts to ferry over—though we were no ghosts, nor that stream a Lethe, as these presents show), the audience of one is ensconced in a corner, and the morning business proceeds. Sonatas for piano and violin, one by Mozart and one by Haydn, are the subject. Fine specimens of their authors' finest art and genius, and not dismissed until the rendering was so faultless, that one saw the genial masters in a fresh light and conceived a new love for both of them. It is a good thing, after long preoccupation with such deeper spirits as Bach or Beethoven, to be reminded, in such a way as a pianist like Clara Schumann can remind one, of a Clementi, a Haydn, etc. Such interpreters as these two know how to place them all in the right light, relatively, before you.

NOV. 1. Another morning rehearsal. Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven (glorious sonata), Bach. After dinner a long walk, over the bridge, through the Neustadt, and round towards the right bank of the river, to the place of entertainment called the Linksche Bad, where there is another large and sumptuous café concert-hall. The programme was rich; containing, besides lighter things, the "Pastoral Symphony," Gade's "Ossian" overture, duet from "Jessonda," overture to "Egmont," Andante and variations from Haydn's 12th Symphony, overture to "Nozze di Figaro," and to the "Swiss Family," Lieder ohne Worte by Mendelssohn, and an arrangement from a very striking song by Schubert, the Greisengesang (Song of the Old Man), which impressed me as one of the best things for this kind of treatment, if we must have such things served up by an orchestra. The frigid chords (so Schubert-like) which describe the wintry snows of age upon the head ("the roof"), contrasted with the warmer harmonies of the summer that abides within, are quite effective. It would be a good change in our Music Hall "Rehearsals" from the "Serenade" and Lob der Thränen, now so staled by repetition (1860).

In the evening came the third and last soirée of Clara Schumann and Joachim, with the assistance of Frau Garrigue-Schnorr von Carolsfeld as singer. The illness of Herr Schnorr, the husband, caused a real disappointment, and some change of programme, making it as follows:

1. Sonata (F major), piano and violin:
Allegro, Variations. Tempo di Minuetto. Mozart a "Thürnenregen," (Wir saßen so traulich beisammen.)
b "Mein." (Büchlein, lass dein Rauschen sein).
2. Sonata (Op. 101) for piano Beethoven
3. Three Duettinos, piano and violin . . . R. Schumann
5. a Romanza, for violin Beethoven
b Bourrée and Double, do. J. S. Bach
6. a Ballad; "Heinrich der Vogler" Löwe
b "Lithuanisches Lied" Chopin
7. Sonata (G major), piano and violin: Andante—
Adagio. — Cantab. — Finale all' Omgarese. Haydn

The piece by Haydn is found as a Trio; but the violoncello, which scarcely more than doubles the bass in the piano, could be left out without loss—by such players. It is one of the happiest strokes of Haydn's genius; the last movement exquisitely sunshiny, like jack o' lantern on the wall. It was played con amore, with the most accurate and nimble fingers, and such nice and vital accent as the best player only can command when all the nerves are rightly strung. Those variations by Mozart could not have been more generally perfect and Mozartish in the rendering. It certainly was a notable achievement for a woman to bring out clearly, finely, warmly, grandly, as Mme. Schumann did, the beauty, force and meaning of a sonata which is one of the most difficult, alike to comprehend and execute, of those remarkable works of the last period of Beethoven—and one of the most richly imaginative and original. If there is any part of it into the sense of which perhaps a man might enter more completely, it is that singular quick march, the like of which no other hero mood of genius ever marched by; for that treads airy heights for which, methinks, only a man's brain can be at once enough intoxicated and enough self-possessed. Talking the thing over together, afterwards, we did not find the lady fully sympathized with our admiration of that particular movement. (Among the "Davidsbündler"—Eusebius, Meister Raro, and the rest—there would have been none to say us nay). As Joachim dealt with it, there seemed a great deal more in that often played Romanza of Beethoven, than there ever had before. It held the audience in ecstasy. The Bourrée (old dance rhythm) and double (or variation), were given with masterly vividness and truth of outline, and afforded still new evidence that old Bach is the youngest man alive in music, as well as the ripest. The vocal selections were choice; each with a characteristic charm; the singer could not be charged with neglect of expression; there was only too much of it; a certain extra dramatic infusion of energy, which let the melodies have no peace to "flow at their own sweet will." The three little instrumental duos by Schumann were a nice substitute for some duets of his which were to have been sung. More rare or charming song selections one can scarcely hear than graced these concerts. Robert Schumann is never more genial, more felicitous than in his songs; and where should one expect to make their acquaintance in the right way, if not in just these concerts, which are pious tributes to his memory and genius, by one who has the best right to interpret him?

The concert over, now imagine a very pleasant, sociable symposium in an upper room of this same nice Hotel de Saxe. It is a genuine German sit-down, where everybody is expected to be just as free and happy as he can. And everybody can be just as happy as he has a right to be; and no more, nicht wahr? It is at once an artist and a family Gesellschaft. All of the Wieck and Schumann representatives are there, who chance to be at hand. But the Amphytrion is our hero of the violin, who would insist upon the mountain's coming to Mahomet. There's magnetism in the man, as we have said; and where do you ever find power that is not tyrannically used? So, not content with "ascending me into the brain" in the form of Beethoven and Bach, he must needs start other subtle effervescing spirits on the same track. We are a dozen all told. Three generations of that musical family of Dresden represented. A right German party! But it is not complete, the younger branches are not happy, nothing can go on, until the grandpapa is found, dragged from his Kneip, led in triumph and installed with all due honor and uproarious rejoicing at the head of the table. Then all are very happy; the middle-aged and youngest are very talkative and jokeative, and the dear old lady looks a deal of silent happiness; and Altmeister Wieck is very wise and fatherly and witty in his chair of state, and jokes about the Wunderkindervater, as the father and the teacher of two such artists as Clara and Marie, with such a son-in-law as Robert Schumann, may well call himself. Not a few sharp criticisms he drops, too, on the new school music—all in fun of course! And very comical and to the point are some of his illustrations of prevailing tricks in fashionable false schools of singing. For this old man possesses the true art of disciplining the voice as well as the fingers. The daughter Marie, who is full of generous good nature and good sense, as well as musical talent, is a fine singer, has a rich mezzo-soprano admirably developed, and sang one evening in my hearing Mendelssohn's Auf Flügeln des Gesanges, and that impassioned song of Beethoven, to Goethe's verses, Herz, mein Herz, in a way to make them felt. I think I forgot, in speaking of the first soirée to mention the artistic touch and finished, tasteful execution with which this young lady played the upper part in the "Allegro Brillante" of Mendelssohn with her sister. I have heard her also play Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" variations, and some of those bewitching little quicksilver clavier movements of Bach, with a spirit and a nicety not to be surpassed. Good for the Wunderkindervater! Health!

GEORGES BIZET.¹

The public, being in a hurry or used up, often judges flippantly the early works of young composers. Those spectators who, indifferent or weary, attend the first efforts of such novices, sometimes destroy, with a shrug of the shoulders, an edifice laboriously constructed at the price of long years of study and sleepless nights without number. Serious criticism hardly knows—and does not always deign to recollect—how many painful struggles every young composer must go through, and how many desperate attacks he must make, before he obtains even a moderate success. Side by side with the courteous judges who do not decide off-hand—who think it worth while to listen and take the trouble of discussing a subject in detail,—how many indulge in peremptory sentences, brutal condemnations, and unreasoning, foregone conclusions, crushing in the bud the legitimate hopes of young composers. All artists do not possess the admirable stoicism of F. Halévy, who, referring one day to some bitter and unjust criticisms on his fine score of Charles VI, observed: "Let them say what they choose; do not let us be affected by criticism. If the work is strong, it has nothing to fear; if there is no life in it, criticism will simply have accelerated its fall." Few composers possess this firmness of soul. Ill-natured or simply indifferent criticisms irritate the majority of conscientious workers; their life is worn away on this ever-revolving grindstone, on which they leave the best part of themselves.

Georges Bizet's honest, frank nature suffered cruelly from the often excessive harshness of criticism. Under a cold exterior, the heart of the valiant composer beat quickly and strongly, and, though finely tempered, his soul was prematurely crushed in the daily combats in which a man should be able to look at his enemies with a smile. Had Bizet been less taken up with his art, and less jealous of his works, he would still be the glory of the French school. Extreme nervousness, combined with a strong feeling of professional dignity, has conferred on him the sad privilege of figuring in our gallery of the celebrated dead.

Bizet (Alexandre, César, Léopold, called Georges) was born in Paris, on the 25th of October, 1838, amid essentially artistic surroundings. His father, an excellent singing master, was married to a sister of Mme. Delsarte, a talented pianist, who carried off the first prize at the Conservatory. Bizet's uncle, A. Delsarte, a friend of my childhood, was a musician of taste, but his erudition was not well balanced. He undertook to combine with vocal science a mass of subjects which appeared to unprejudiced judges quite distinct from this branch of art. An ardent apostle and sincere utopian, he advocated preparing the way for vocal studies by a knowledge of physiology, anatomy, phrenology, etc.; previous to their attempts to emit a sound, his pupils had to study the rationale of acoustics, as well as of look and gesture. The really solid part of his instruction, on the other hand, was deeply interesting. The study of sound in its gradations and varieties, and the gamut of its color, were the theme of attractive demonstrations; reading and reciting aloud, declamation, spoken and sung, formed a body of subjects which often frightened timid pupils, but fanatized those of finely tempered minds.

Delsarte sent his young nephew to me. Georges Bizet was nine years old, and, though not very advanced, played with good taste and natural feeling Mozart's sonatas. From the very first day I was able to perceive in him a strongly marked individuality, which I endeavored to preserve. He did not wish to show off, but to "render well;" he had his favorite authors, and I took a pleasure in learning the cause of his preferences. It is thus, I think, that, by awakening the intelligence and reason, a master may guide and form the taste of his pupils. Admitted into my own class, and successively into Benoist's for the organ, and F. Halévy's for fugue and ideal composition, Bizet won, surely, if slowly, all his grades, never allowing himself to be discouraged when not successful, but always redoubling his efforts. He gained one after the other the prizes for solfeggio; the second and the first prize for the piano, extempore playing and organ; the second and the first prize for counterpoint and fugue; and lastly the "Prize of Rome." We see with what patience he went through his musical humanities before appearing as a master; an example to be noted at a time when eagerness to come forward, united to the suggestions of self-love, persuades so many students that they are wasting their best years on the benches of the Conservatory. It was step by step that, from 1849 to 1857, Bizet went through the due course of study and of recompenses. Here are some probatory dates: 1849, prize for solfeggio; 1851, second prize for piano; 1852, first prize for piano. Under the above dates must be placed also the first "accessit," the second, and lastly the first prize for the organ in Benoist's class; 1854, second prize for fugue; 1855, first prize for fugue; 1857, second "Prix de Rome"; 1857, Grand "Prix de Rome."

We must not forget to record here an incident which Georges Bizet never forgot. When I was nominated to the piano class, Zimmermann begged me to point out among my pupils those who would like to study counterpoint under his direction, that being a study of which he was especially fond. Bizet was one of those I selected, and thus it was that, before entering the class of the illustrious master Halévy, the young man was already familiar with the contrapuntal style according to the pure lines of Cherubini, whose traditions Zimmermann had inherited. It is also interesting to remember who were Bizet's fellow-pupils at the Conservatory. My class then comprised among its members, Wieniawski, Thurner, Francis Planté, Martin Lazare, Jules Cohen, Deschamps, etc., a brilliant generation of accomplished virtuosos and future composers, with which are directly connected the pupils of the following years: Guiraud, Paladilhe, Dubois, Fissot, Duvernoy, Salvayre, and many others, and it is not without a melancholy feeling that, when contemplating their living celebrity, I think of the glory, so soon ended, of Georges Bizet.

The new "Grand Prix de Rome" had valiantly earned his artistic holiday. A residence in the Eternal City was the realization of his youthful dreams. His letters, of which I possess several from Rome, breathe an ardent love of art, as well as a lively and confident faith in the future. But there was a black spot obscuring the radiant horizon. The young composer's mother was in bad health, and very strong fears abridged his stay in Rome. It was written, however, that Providence should preserve some years longer, for her affectionate family, their worthy and courageous mother, so eager to devote herself to their happiness. On his return from Italy, Georges Bizet, while busying himself in looking about for a poem satisfying his aspirations and musical temperament, was wise enough to make a modest income by giving lessons in pianoforte playing, harmony, and singing, or by undertaking arrangements and reductions for the music publishers. This was a halt, but not a period of repose; it was a period for the concentration of the young composer's living force, so that he might make a breach in the stormy conflict of life, in which every one too frequently fights for himself alone, and a brother-in-arms, an old schoolfellow, rarely uses his influence and his connections for the comrade of one day who has become his rival on the next.

It is only right to state that, thanks to the intelligent and artistic initiative of the popular impresario, Jacques Offenbach, G. Bizet and Ch. Lecocq were bracketed as ex æquo to receive the prize for a buffo opera—Le Docteur Miracle. Bizet's work was a clever pasticcio in the old Italian style, containing several excellent pieces, and especially an exceedingly well-written finale; but this excursion into buffo composition was destined to be the only instance of Bizet's playing truant. His robust temperament and conscientious nature inclined him to treat impassioned subjects, really suitable for the stage. Les Pêcheurs de Perles offered him an interesting canvas, moving scenes, and an opportunity of proving his value as a musician. Despite some portions which were too long, the public must have recognized in so important a first work, a composer of style, capable of frank, true melodies, speaking his language with great facility, and able to make his inspiration bend to dramatic sentiment. Yet Les Pêcheurs de Perles scarcely reached fifty representations, despite the efforts of M. Carvalho, who had a presentiment that Georges Bizet was a lyrical musician. Les Pêcheurs de Perles was followed, some years later, by La Jolie Fille de Perth, the book being written by Saint-Georges, and very skilfully arranged for the stage. It was an easy task for musicians and sincere critics to note great progress, undeniable firmness of style, and, lastly, a more strongly marked individuality, real originality in the form of the pieces, and new effects of sonority as well in the choruses as in the orchestra. Thenceforward, and despite the half success of this highly meritorious work, Georges was in the first rank of new composers. The score of Djamileh, one act, for the Opéra Comique, was a charming work, dreamy, impassioned, and bearing the stamp of that Oriental morbidez which Félicien David and Ernest Reyer have so happily transferred, palpitating with life, to the delicious pages of Lalla Roukh and La Statue. Georges Bizet's work may, with due allowance for difference of proportions, take its place unchallenged side by side with these two masterpieces, and that without his having borrowed aught of the originality and peculiar style of the two masters of Orientalism. In the intervals between his larger creations, Bizet produced orchestral suïtes, fragments of symphonies, and a characteristic overture: Patrie. We must not forget to mention, also, his poetic score of L'Arlésienne. These orchestral and symphonic works, while proving the young composer's supple talent, rich imagination, and learning, afforded him, likewise, an opportunity of demonstrating his great ability, his perfect tact in the art of orchestration and of musical color. He followed, within due bounds, and without allowing himself to be carried beyond the limits of good taste and a sense of the beautiful, the happy audacities of innovators; but, while admitting the grandeur of certain Wagnerian conceptions, he admired unreservedly the genial works of Verdi, and delighted in praising the ardent inspirations of that great master of Italian dramatic art. It is to be remarked that his predilection for the German and for the Italian school did not render him unjust towards our own national dramatic music. Auber, Halévy, Gounod, and Ambroise Thomas were to the last his favorite masters, and we have often heard him analyze, with the most sincere admiration, Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, of which, by the way, he left two remarkable transcriptions for the piano, the one two-handed and the other four-handed.

We are now nearing the happiest years of his life. After marrying Halévy's second daughter and becoming the father of a charming little girl, it was not long ere he was to know the delight of a real theatrical success. Carmen, a three-act work, which the Opéra Comique public, at first a little startled by the realism of the libretto, eventually applauded with enthusiasm, established his reputation on a solid basis, and justified his having received a short time previously the knight's cross of the Legion of Honor. Carmen, so warm and so full of color, at one and the same time original and frank in its inspired flights, soon became a modern stock-piece in France and abroad. But the already celebrated artist was about to be struck down in the midst of his triumph. Death came and seized him surrounded by those near and dear, by the side of his wife and in the arms of his friends, in his charming villa of Bougival, of which he was so fond, and whither he was always going to awaken inspiration. The catastrophe occurred the same year that Carmen achieved its success. Carmen was brought out in March, 1875. On the 3d of June, that same year, Bizet succumbed to acute heart disease, accelerated by the emotions he had gone through during the few preceding months. The emotion caused by the event was considerable, and the sorrow general. All who, like us, knew Bizet will bear evidence to the noble and generous qualities of his heart, as well as to the elevation and delicacy of his sentiments. Endowed with healthy and correct judgment and a rigid conscience, he would hear nothing of compromises; he entertained to a supreme degree a sense of justice and a horror of intrigue. Possessed of refined and ready wit, he shone in conversation with intimate friends by his amusing and original repartees, observations full of sense, and happy sayings. On his days of gaiety he delighted in maintaining paradoxical theses, after the manner of Méry. But in these games of wit he never employed irony. His sharp-pointed darts were always arms of courtesy with his friends, and, when he might with certainty have wounded, he was contented with indicating he had touched. He was good, generous, devoted and faithful in all his affections; his friendship, sincere and unalterable, was as solid as his conscience.

When a child, he was blond and ruddy, with a somewhat chubby but highly intelligent face. When a young man, his round features assumed a firmer character. His clear glance, open physiognomy, and smiling mouth, testified to great energy. Confidence was their predominant expression, and I still see him, despite the bitterness of his earlier dramatic essays, happy at living, and easy as to the future, cashing the joys and the glory he had so well deserved.

THE LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—ITS LIBRARY.

ON account of alterations to be made in Exeter Hall, this fine old Oratorio Society is obliged to move into more narrow quarters. Its concerts for the present will be given in St. James's Hall, which does not afford accommodation for more than 200 choristers. Figaro tells us what is to become of its valuable library, as follows:—

The question, what is to be done with the library of the Sacred Harmonic Society when the Corporation of the city of London declined to take charge of it, has been solved. Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co. have, in the most handsome manner, agreed to take care both of the library and the famous statue of Handel by Roubillac, and if at any time the Sacred Harmonic Society again has a habitation of its own, the goods will of course be restored. The Sacred Harmonic library is both a large and important one. It contains about 3,000 volumes, about 450 volumes of which are manuscripts. Among other rare printed works, it contains the Sarum Missal of 1527, and that of Ratisbon of 1518, much of the ecclesiastical music of Palestrina, Orlando di Lasso, Willaert, and other writers of the Italian and Flemish schools; the Cantiones of Tallis and Byrd, the Musica Deo Sacra of Thomas Tomkins; the very rare and curious sheet published by Matthew Locke, containing his communion service, with the Kyrie set ten different times; Lowe's directions for the performance of Cathedral Service, and a perfect set of Barnard's Selected Church Music, published in 1641, said to be the first collection of English Cathedral music ever issued. First, or early editions, in type, of the "Psyche" of Matthew Locke, of many of Purcell's works, and the operas of Lully and other French composers, are also in the library. In specimens of madrigals by the great English madrigal writers of the 16th and 17th centuries, the Sacred Harmonic library is peculiarly rich, most of the specimens being original editions. The song collections of John Playford and his contemporaries of the days of the Commonwealth and Restoration down to the time of George I. are also included in the collection. The library also possesses a large quantity of music for the lute and other obsolete instruments, and particularly the rare "Book of Tablature," published in London by William Barley in 1596, with Gasparo Fiorini's "Nobiltà di Roma," published in Venice, 1573, and the "Laute Buch of Wolf Heckel," printed at Strasburg, 1562, exemplifying the different kinds of tablature for the lute in use in England, Italy, and Germany respectively. Indeed, from the point of view of musical typography, the library is one of the finest in the world, as it contains specimens of type-printed music produced in different countries and at various times during a period of upwards of three centuries. In the brief account of the library appended by Mr. Husk to the catalogue of 1862, it is stated that the collection includes specimens of the beautiful types used by the English-Flemish and English printers in the sixteenth century, the bold but less finished English and the rough Italian types of a succeeding age, and the rude German printing of the last century. Since then, large additions have been made to the printed portion of the library. Nearly 400 different English operas and other musical pieces, many of them unique, are now in the library, besides Starter's "Friesche Lusthof," published at Amsterdam in 1621; a "Bishop's Bible," dated 1585; and a collection (by no means complete) of musical literature and journals.

It is, however, in the manuscripts that the Sacred Harmonic library is the most valuable. It contains the vocal score of the "Elijah," mostly in the handwriting of the composer; the autograph of Auber's "Exhibition" march, autograph "services" and other works by Greene, Arnold, Samuel Wesley, Balef, Henry Purcell, Blow, Croft, Boyce, Arne, Durante, Clari, Geminiani, and others, for the most part never published. Among the manuscripts is also a complete opera by Joseph Haydn, entitled "Armida," in full score, and in the autograph of the composer. This work was, it seems by the brief but admirable account written by Mr. Husk, sent to England by Haydn in fulfillment of an engagement entered into by him when in this country to furnish an opera for the King's Theatre, now Her Majesty's Theatre, in the Haymarket. During the interval between the making of the engagement and the sending of the opera, an alteration had taken place in the management of the theatre. On the arrival of the work the new manager refused to receive it, and it was consequently never produced. There is also a curious manuscript score of an opera called "The Demon," which proves to be an adaption by Sir Henry Bishop, Tom Cooke, Hughes, and Corri, for performances at Drury Lane, of Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil." It is in instrumental score only, and is in the autograph of the adapters. A manuscript copy of Carey's "Dragon of Wantley," in the autograph of Thomas Barrow, one of the gentlemen of the Chapel Royal, is also here. The full score of Blow's "A Song on New Year's Day, 1700," in the composer's autograph, is likewise here, together with the commonplace-book of John Stafford Smith, the cuttings from newspaper criticisms collected and pasted in books by John Parry between 1834 and 1848, with manuscript notes by him, and the whole of Professor Edward Taylor's unpublished lectures. These lectures (which should repay publication) comprise discourses on church and dramatic music, on Purcell's "King Arthur," on the Italian, Flemish, and German schools of music, on English vocal harmony, English vocal part music, and on English madrigal-writers.

The special autographs in the library of the Sacred Harmonic Society are curiosities, if they have no abiding interest. One is a letter from Franz Abt, asking for a ticket for a Handel Festival. A curious letter from Beethoven's brother Johann, dated Vienna, 24th of February, 1825, offers the right of publication in Great Britain, America, and England, of seven of Beethoven compositions (Op. 124 to 130) for sale for £40. There are two letters from Beethoven, one of them addressed to Herr von Holz, apprising him of his discovery, after Holz had left his house on the previous evening, of some mislaid spoons which he had supposed lost, and his subsequent recovery of his equanimity. He invites Holz to dine with him on the following Sunday, when he would give him fuller explanations. By the tone of the letter, it is evident that crusty old Beethoven had accused, by implication, his friend of stealing the spoons, and wishes to remove the disagreeable impression he has created. The second letter is dated from Baden, July 10, 1813, to Herr Narens, in which he requests his friend to return his symphonies in C-minor and B-flat; his oratorio he did not immediately require, and thanking him for fifty florins. A letter of introduction sent by Donizetti to Sir Michael Costa is also here. A receipt by Orlando Gibbons, dated 24th February, 1617, for £10, a quarter's pension due to him as one of his Highness's musicians, is mutilated, only the initial of the signature being preserved. There is a letter from Handel dated October, 1723, to Francis Colman, British envoy at Florence, thanking him for negotiating the engagement of Senesino, the vocalist; and autograph letters or other documents of Attwood, William Ayrton, Bishop, Boieldieu, Grétry, Hummel, Lully, Meyerbeer, Paer, Spontini (respecting a performance of portions of "La Vestale"), and Weber. A letter dated Paris, November 6, 1856, to Sir Michael Costa thanks the great conductor for the present of a Stilton cheese, and compliments him on the success of "Eli." Perhaps the most important manuscripts, are, however, from Mendelssohn, and particularly two having special reference to the Sacred Harmonic Society. The first is written in English to his librettist, Mr. Bartholomew, and is dated May 11, 1846. He tells Mr. Bartholomew that the oratorio for the Birmingham Festival is "not the 'Athalia' nor the 'Edipus,' of course, but a much greater, and, to him, more important work than both together. He says it is not yet quite finished; but that he writes continually to get it finished in time, and that he intends sending over the first part (the longer of the two it will have) in the course of the next ten or twelve days." We now know that the oratorio referred to was the immortal "Elijah." He begs Mr. Bartholomew to try and find some leisure time towards the end of the month, that the chorus-parts may be in the hands of the chorus-singers as soon as possible. And he concludes by begging Mr. Bartholomew to give it his best English words, for he (Mendelssohn) feels so much more interest in this work than in any of the others, and he only wishes it may so last with him. Another letter from Mendelssohn accepts the invitation of the Sacred Harmonic Society to come over and conduct "Elijah" in April, 1847, though he cannot give a positive promise. Last of all, in the autographs is a letter from Nicolo Zingarelli, dated Naples 9th November, 1829, to Sir Michael Costa, inquiring as to the success of the cantata written by Zingarelli for and produced at the Birmingham Musical Festival in the preceding October. It is the charge of this work that brought Costa to England and, as we all know, after failing as a vocalist at this same Birmingham Festival, he remained here to become conductor at the King's Theatre, and laid the foundation of a fame which has lasted half a century.

THE "MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS."

Without counting the "extra" concerts when the later quartets of Beethoven are annually brought forward, the season recently closed brought the total performances to the number of seven hundred and twelve. Such a series of concerts, of the same character throughout, and under one director, is probably unique in the history of music. The programmes alone form an extensive library, and must have afforded to thousands the first opportunity of becoming acquainted with the lives of the great composers. Taking a glance at random through the volumes of two or three seasons, we find biographical sketches of Brahms, Gernsheim, Grieg, Raff, Rubinstein, and others of the modern school; Marcello, Leclair, Corelli, and others of more distant periods; while interesting notices of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, and Mendelssohn—to say nothing of Bach and Handel—abound in almost every programme. Mr. Arthur Chappell has earned the gratitude of musicians, as well as an enduring niche in the temple of Fame, by his unprecedented achievement. It is unnecessary to write the history of these "Popular Concerts," for an interesting though brief account appears in the second volume (p. 352) of Doctor Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," which will, it is hoped, endure to inform future ages of the doings of the present.

As a generation has passed away since these concerts were established, and The Musical Standard was not then in existence, our readers will not perhaps think it is out of place, before examining the work accomplished, to have placed before them a brief account of the plan of the earlier seasons, from contemporary notices and personal recollections. The instrumental music will alone be considered, deferring notice of the artists engaged till a future time. The vocal selections we do not propose to notice.

The only musical journals in 1859, when the "Monday Popular Concerts" started, were the Musical World and the Musical Times; the latter not at that time the important and influential paper it now is, being devoted chiefly to the interests of choral societies, does not notice the performances till the commencement of the sixth season. To the Musical World, then, we must go for a description of the early days of this now celebrated institution. As stated in Grove's "Dictionary," the concerts were originally of a truly popular character, the "classical series" being a continuation of them, and regarded as an experiment—the last miscellaneous concert being held, February 7, 1859, and the first "classical" taking place on the Monday following. The notice in the Musical World of February 12, 1859, of the last "popular" is amusing:—"The success of these concerts is undoubted. Hypercritics may object to them on the ground that they are calculated to please, not to enlighten or elevate the hearers. The directors, we take it, have no ulterior object beyond that of gratifying the general public, and thus honestly filling their own pockets. They resign to the Philharmonics, to the London Musical Society, and other institutions of the kind, the task of instructing through the medium of amusement, and only claim credit for carrying out their intentions in perfect consonance with these principles. Their aim is to render their entertainments popular—no more. For this purpose they invariably engage for each concert one or more artists of celebrity. A name like that of Arabella Goddard, or Sims Reeves, is attraction sufficient to fill the hall. If the hall be filled, and the people pleased, the captious critic becomes a secondary consideration. The success the popular concerts have achieved is a proof of their necessity. Besides, are we not to have a Mendelssohn selection on Monday? The following extracts from the director's advertisement puts a different face upon the matter:—"In commencing a new series of entertainments, the design of which may be understood by reference to the programme of this evening, the Directors of the Monday Popular Concerts wish to endow their undertaking with a more universal character than it has hitherto assumed. The advantages offered by St. James's Hall, and the resources placed at their disposal by the generous patronage they have experienced, will, it is confidently hoped, enable them to carry out their plans with success. So rapidly is the taste for pure and healthy music spreading through all classes of the community, that no enterprize of this kind can hope to prosper for any length of time, much less to attain a solid permanency, without taking this great social fact into consideration." . . . "It will be perceived that the programme of this evening's concert is made out from compositions, vocal and instrumental, by one master (Mendelssohn). In its exclusive application to chamber-music, the experiment may claim to be regarded as in some measure new; and so rich is the catalogue of vocal and instrumental works bequeathed to us by the great composers in this special branch of their art, so marked by sterling excellence, and so undeserving of neglect, that, backed by the suffrages of the public, the Directors of the Monday Popular Concerts have no doubt whatever of being able to present a succession of entertainments unprecedented at least in variety of attraction."

The programme of the first concert was repeated, in part, at the five hundredth, January 18, 1875, and will bear a further quotation;—Quintet in B flat, Op. 87, strings; Sonata in F minor, Op. 4, pianoforte and violin; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, organ; Quartet in D, Op. 44, No. 1, strings; Tema con variazioni in D, Op. 17, pianoforte and violoncello; Fugue in B flat (from the Magnificat), organ. The organ-pieces were omitted in 1875. From the date of this "Mendelssohn" concert to the present day, the "popular" element—in the common acceptance of the word—has disappeared; but the directors' estimate of public taste has been fully justified by the support their enterprise has received; and "popular" the concerts still remain. A "Mozart" night was given on Monday, February 21, 1859, and the Musical World devotes a leader to the subject, from which we quote the opening paragraph:—"The Monday Popular Concerts at St. James's Hall have taken a turn which promises excellent results. The directors have, at length, condescended to assume for granted—however much against their inward conviction—that the public generally is not an aggregate of dolts, with ears wholly insensible to the influence of divine harmony. They have condescended to admit just so much, and begun to act upon the admission extorted from them 'à rebrousse poil.' To their surprise, no doubt (if not to their satisfaction), the two concerts already given, at which nothing but good music was allotted to either singer or player, proved eminently successful. To their astonishment, perhaps, (if not to their satisfaction), the quintets, quartets, and sonatas, not only pleased the multitude, but were heard with greater attention, and applauded with greater enthusiasm, than anything else. In short, most probably to their utter consternation (if not to their satisfaction), the two so-called 'classical' concerts threw all that had preceded them into the shade—and this without the aid of great names, but solely on account of the musical attractions quand meme." This is rather cruel, after the remarks by the critic first quoted. The next concert was devoted to Haydn and Weber. Beethoven filled the programmes of March 7, 21, and 28; the Mozart selection being repeated at an extra concert, on Wednesday, March 9. The original series of six concerts was extended; Bach and Handel being represented April 4; Mendelssohn again on the 18th; and an "English" night on the following Monday; the season terminating with another Beethoven night, May 30th. As, though the directors felt parting to be "such sweet sorrow," they announced another extra concert for June 27. We were present for the first time on that occasion, and heard a Sonata, by Dussek, for piano-forte and violin (Op. 69), the themes from which still "haunt the ear." The second season commenced November 14, 1859, and was continued till July 2, 1860. The arrangements were generally the same; evenings being devoted chiefly to one composer. There were two "Italian" nights, and one more "English" night, April 9, 1860—the last, unhappily. The next few seasons presented the same features—the fourth being prolonged to July 29, 1862; two concerts taking place on consecutive evenings, owing to large numbers being unable to obtain admission to the director's benefit, July 7. The fifth season began October 13, 1862, with the one hundred and third concert from the commencement. The seventh season did not begin till January 16, 1865. Morning performances, on the Saturday—now a permanent feature—were introduced this year. The remaining period is sufficiently familiar, and requires no particular notice. In another article attention will be directed to the works performed, and the number of composers represented.—Lond. Mus. Standard, Aug. 7.

THE LETTERS OF BERLIOZ.

The letters of Hector Berlioz to Humbert Ferrand prove that the composer's memoirs do not tell the whole story. Like other Paris critics, Berlioz draws a sharp line between written and spoken truth. His letters to Ferrand contain the latter. What has so far appeared in Madame Juliette Adam's (Lamber's) Nouvelle Revue and in the Neue Freie Presse is indescribable, and there is more to come, unless Charles Gounod prefers not to edit the rest. Berlioz was haunted by the idea that he must be wretched, ever in love, and constantly changing. In February, 1830, a few days after he had fallen in love with Harriet Smithson, while she acted Ophelia, he writes: "Horrible! Could she but comprehend for one moment the poetry and infinity of such love, she would rush into my arms and die of my kisses." A mere rumor then led him to execrate the same woman, to vilify her name, and to begin another affair. Both his love and his hatred he invariably desires to express by an orchestra and chorus of not less than two hundred and fifty performers. By way of contrast, Beethoven's "Adelaide" may be recalled, and Mozart's musical glorification of Konstanze. From Florence he writes: "Saw an opera here, Romeo and Juliet, written by a dirty little pig called Bellini—mind you, I saw it, and the Shades of Shakespeare did not appear to destroy these Myrmidons!" When a Roman Music dealer was unable to show him anything of Weber, Berlioz wrote: "Do what? Sigh?—Childish. Gnash my teeth?—Trivial. Patience?—Still worse. One must concentrate all poison within, let nothing evaporate, let it ferment until the heart cracks."

October, 1833, after he had married Harriet, he writes: "I kept my faith in defiance of you all, and my faith has saved me." He had to borrow three hundred francs to pay his marriage expenses; but he pretended for once to be happy, and when he wanted to please his bride he sang to her from the same Symphonie Fantastique which he had written to execrate her. She liked Auber's music, whereupon Berlioz remarks that her taste is not good, but yet lovely. A few weeks before his marriage he abandoned Harriet again, and wrote: "To make this terrible separation bearable an unheard-of accident led a poor girl of eighteen into my arms. . . If she loves me, I shall crush a little love out of my heart and imagine that I love her. What a foolish novel!" In 1841, he writes: "They talk of giving me Habeneck's place; but they would have to place him in the Conservatory where old Cherubini is sleeping persistently. When I am old and incapable the management of the Conservatory cannot slip away from me." In 1841 he says: "France is getting duller and duller in musical matters; the more I see of foreign countries, the less I like France. Pardon this blasphemy, but 'art in France is dead, rotting.' At Brunswick he was given a public dinner; a hundred leading men were present, he wrote, so you can imagine the feeding. 'Victor Hugo is raving because he is not emperor, that's all,' he writes in 1853; 'I am a thorough imperialist. I shall never forget that the Emperor has redeemed us from that dirty and lunatic republic. In matters of art, he is a barbarian, but the barbarian is a savior—and Nero was an artist.'"

In 1864 he wrote: "I have heard enchanting little Patti as Martha; as I left I felt like covered with fleas, and sent word to the dear child that I should pardon her singing such platitudes at me, but could do no more for her. Fortunately the work contains 'The Last Rose of Summer' which she sang with so much poetic simplicity that the sweet fragrance is almost enough to disinfect the rest of the opera." When Scudo of the Revue des Deux Mondes died insane, Berlioz remarked that his rival and enemy had been crazy for fifteen years. In 1862, when quite ill, he asked innocently: "Must we suffer all this because we have adored the beautiful for a lifetime? Very likely." In May, 1854, he wrote: "A part of our little musical circle is mourning; so am I; the rest is merry because Meyerbeer is dead." In 1833 he wrote of himself; one day good, quiet, pensive, poetic; the next day sick, annoyed, doggish, malicious like a thousand devils, and ready to spit out life were there not prospects of some possible intoxication, friends, music and curiosity. My life is a novel in which I take much interest." This he wrote in his honeymoon; he might have written it on the eve of his death. His life is a sensational novel à la Zola, but he never read it, he never understood it, and it never did him any good. Like Byron, he thought it bliss to look extremely unhappy. He wanted to be sick with Chateaubriandism, Wertherism, Shelleyism, Byronism—with all the most civilized products of the century that usually sicken him whom they need not in the least concern.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1880.

WHAT LACK WE YET?

OUR good town of Boston has a certain pride in what is called æsthetic culture. If we do not all plume ourselves upon being artists, we at least have an idea that we are something rather hors ligne as intelligent art-patrons. We are not, as a rule, a close-fisted people, and although we do not claim to be more munificent than our neighbors, we have been brought up to fancy that when we give our thousands or hundreds of thousands to establish, or enrich any art institution, we may possibly do so a thought more intelligently than they. Be this as it may, we certainly have this in common with other American cities, that so soon as we are thoroughly persuaded that we really want a good thing, the means of getting it — that is, the money — comes quite easily, almost of itself, as it were.

Thus, we wanted a large music-hall, well situated, architecturally fine, and of good acoustic properties. No sooner said than done; the Music Hall was built.

We wanted a large and expensive organ, and we got one which leaves nothing to be desired, either in point of size or expensiveness.

We wanted an art museum, and we have it. We had only to assure ourselves of the reality of our want, and to assure our moneyed fellow-citizens of its reasonableness, and the dollars poured in as fast as we could desire.

Now we have another very crying want, and it is rather odd, by the way, that just this want has been so long in formulating itself in Boston, of all cities in the Union, — we want an orchestra.

One would have said that, if Boston were anything in an artistic way, she was musical; notwithstanding the noble array of Boston names which are famous in the annals of Painting and Sculpture, our chief æsthetic pride has been that we are — almost par excellence — the musical city of the United States. Yet we neither have, nor ever have had, an established orchestra.

Remember: an orchestra is not merely a large or small body of musicians playing together at this or that concert after a few preliminary rehearsals. It is a body of musicians who play and rehearse together from one end of the season to the other. Its members do not play various stringed and wind instruments in as various military bands and theatres or ball-room orchestras, and meet together en masse only when some grand concert is to be given, to be dispersed again after the concert. In a real orchestra the members play together all the time, every week and every day.

We have for years had most excellent material for an orchestra at easy command, although this material is yearly growing smaller, and more difficult to concentrate; but we have never had a real orchestra.

The reason? An orchestra costs money, a great deal of money. But this is not the whole reason, neither is it an insurmountable obstacle in the way of our having one.

One thing is certain: without a standard orchestra we shall die out of the musical world. Boston has already fallen behind New York and Cincinnati as a musical centre, simply and solely for want of an orchestra; and, if things go on in the same course, we shall soon sink to the level of the mere musical provincialism of Baltimore or Portland. An orchestra is the musical focus of a city; it is idle to say that we can have Mr. Thomas's admirable and admirably drilled body of players whenever we want it. Admitting that we can; an orchestra, no matter how superb it may be, that is attached to our city only by so many miles of telegraph wire can never become a musical focus.

How are we to get an orchestra of our own, for that is what we need?

By paying for it. Nothing more or less. But how? Aye, there's the rub!

It is very evident that we cannot look to the general concert-going public merely. An orchestral fund can only be raised by appealing to individual munificence; by large subscriptions and donations. An orchestra is too expensive a machine to be purely self-supporting; it cannot, especially in the beginning, live on "gate-money." Still less can it be established and founded upon the mere hope of possible "gate-money." It must rest upon a foundation, in every sense of the term.

The question is: Can our moneyed men, our merchant princes and millionaires, be got to give their money, and give it freely for this object? Well, they have given before now to other artistic objects not more worthy than this one. Take for instance, the Art Museum.

It is not necessary for a rich man, inclined to be munificent, to have an individual sympathy with the object of his donation. He needs only to be satisfied of its worthiness, its utility, and above all things that it is something tangible. He very naturally wishes you to show him some tangible and permanent equivalent for his expenditure; in other words to get his money's worth. He knows the value of his money better than any one else, and is not willing to see it wasted on chimeras. It is a mistake to think that he has a prejudice against music; look at the great organ! he gave his money readily enough for that.

But on the other hand, look at the Harvard Musical Association. This most excellent society has never been able to lay hands on any money that did not come from the annual assessment of its members, or from its Symphony Concerts. It has not been the recipient of large donations. Why? Because the Harvard Musical Association has stood in the public mind as the representative or a merely abstract idea, of a certain musical tendency. Its object has been to raise the standard of musical taste, to preserve, as far as might be, the purity of musical tradition, to present the public with finely constructed programmes. True, its desire has been to found an orchestra, but it has never had the means of setting to work. How much money does any one suppose would have been given by individual capitalists to a society for the improvement of artistic taste in painting and sculpture? Not much, surely. But a great deal of money was given to found an art museum.

Now an orchestra is something tangible. When once formed, it has a corporeal existence, and has at least the possibility of permanency. Ask a man to give his money to found an orchestra, and you can show him some tangible equivalent for his giving something that, whether he be musical or not, he can feel sure is more solid than smoke, and which can make him realize the fact that he has been in truth a public benefactor.

When the Harvard Musical Association established its symphony concerts, one cannot help feeling that it began at the wrong end. It said: "We want concerts of good music." It should have said: "We want an orchestra that can play any music." The symphony concerts are a great deal that is good, and very little that is bad, but they have the fault of hovering in mid-air; they rest on nothing solid. Take away the fifty musicians who play on the Music Hall platform, and they fall to the ground at once. But an organized orchestra is something solid; no matter to what uses it may be put — whether to the playing of waltzes and potpouris, or to the rendering of Beethoven symphonies, it is still there, with its powers and energies unimpaired, a never-failing stand-by in all emergencies, a centre of musical force. Let it play quadrilles in a beer-garden for six nights in the week, on the seventh it is ready for symphonies and overtures.

It is unquestionably to this object that our rich fellow-citizens should now give their money. If the Harvard Musical Association comes forward and asks for donations, and large ones too, for this purpose, we think that it will not be disappointed. Who indeed should be better trusted to spend money intelligently for this object than it? Only, if it does ask it, let it assure every one it asks that the orchestra itself is to be the main and only object; that everything shall be done to keep up the orchestra when it is once organized; that it shall be made as self-supporting as possible, and that its existence shall not be sacrificed to the fighting out of any special principle. If it has to live by playing "popular" music, it can still live for playing the very highest music. So long as it really exists it can do anything. W. F. A.

MUSICAL ADVERTISING.

Time was when musicians were hired lackeys in great men's households; now they are not only their own masters, but are, in appearance at least, masters of a good many people beside themselves. The arts are making fortune, as the French say. Musicians — composers and performers — are now kings and princes in comparison to what they used to be; yet their kingship rests upon very singular foundations. One would think that if any man were king over men "by the grace of God," that man was the heaven-inspired composer. But if we look a little curiously into the situation, we find that his mastery is far more of the democratic sort, and that his reputation — in other words, his title to office — rests, to a great extent, upon more or less universal suffrage. It is difficult to find a musician who is not, to a greater or less degree, a party leader or a prominent party adherent. It is to the strength and enterprise of his constituents that he owes much of his own material strength.

An artist now-a-days is not only a man who makes money, but one out of whom a great deal of money can be made. In all communities where the ballot-box plays a part in political machinery, a man wins the suffrages of his constituents, not so much as a mark of personal esteem and admiration, but because his constituents believe him to be at once more willing and competent to further their own interests than any one else.

Just so a large proportion of the loud admirers of certain composers and performers are men who are anxious to make money out of them. Most of us remember that great patriotic procession from Boston to Bunker Hill, on June 17, 1876. At first sight it looked like a pure expression of veneration of the heroes of the Revolution and of renewed fraternity between North and South, shaking hands over the bloody chasm. But upon closer examination it was found that a good half of that brilliant procession was nothing more than a gorgeous phantasmagory of bakers', brewers' and shoemakers' advertisements. One-half of our fellow-citizens shouted praises to the Spirit of '76, while the other half pasted advertisements all over her wings.

A prominent composer of to-day may imagine himself to be an æsthetic world-power, and the recipient of the unrestrained homage of men, while he is in reality looked upon by many in the crowd merely as a successful advertising medium. He is covered all over with flaming placards. It would be well, in one sense, if artists went about with a strip of paper pasted on their foreheads, bearing the inscription "Stick no bills!"

There are many musical journals in Germany, and each one extols a particular composer. Every new work he produces is declared to be epoch-making. The world stands astonished at this enormous quantity of epoch-making compositions, until it finds out that the musical journal which proclaims these works as divine is edited by the very firm that publishes them. Hinc illæ—jubilationes!

Does the composer imagine that these laudatory articles show that the writers appreciate his genius at its full value? Perhaps he may; but they really show that the writers appreciate at its full value his power of advertising their publishing-house. Business is business. But this advertising system has one unfortunate result, and that is, that if you look for sound criticism on contemporary music in Germany, you must not look for it in the musical press, but in the larger daily papers.

What are nine pianists out of ten, to-day, but walking advertisements of pianoforte manufacturing houses? Of course it is dinned into your ears that So-and-so is the greatest living pianist, but even that consoling announcement is made secondary to the all-important fact that he plays upon the Such-and-such pianoforte. And yet it is hinted that So-and-so, in spite of his being the greatest living performer, could not earn his bread and butter without allowing himself to be used as a show-card.

Kings and princes? No! Musicians, from being rich men's hired lackeys, are fast becoming the servants of ingenious speculators. They wear crowns made of newspaper and adorned with gaudy job-print. It is only years and years after their death that they are placed upon ideal thrones, when their works have had time to prove their divine greatness, as saints in the Roman Church are canonized only after their relics have worked indisputable miracles. MR. MASON IN JAPAN.

TOKIO, July 21, 1880.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq.:—

Dear Sir,—If I recollect rightly, you are one of the trustees of the Perkins' Institute for the Blind. My object in writing you is to obtain specimens of printed music for the blind, also of all elementary instructions in music. They have an institution for the blind here on a small scale, not supported by the government. While I am here I desire to do what I can for them. I have as a pupil a blind man, who is the best performer and teacher of the Cota, their harp of thirteen strings, in Japan.

Their most scholarly musicians seem to have no scientific knowledge of harmony. I have seven of the court musicians, all young men, as pupils in singing and harmony. Our simplest ideas of harmony seem to open a new world to them for the study of music. My work thus far has been in the two Government Normal schools and in the training school connected with them. So I have had about five hundred boys and girls, corresponding in their ages to our primary and grammar schools, to work with. I can say that my success for the time and under the circumstances (less than four months and knowing but little of the language) has been the best I ever experienced.

I will not speak of my special work in the schools, but will briefly mention some of the most important things which I met with, and how I manage to get over the difficulties which come in my path.

I found that their two scales, in which the Cota was tuned, contained each five sounds, one in F-major, 4th and 7th omitted, and F-minor.

This is the key and scale in which they mostly sing. I enclose a melody of one of their most cheerful songs, a New Year's song, sung by everybody high and low, men, women and children, all over the empire. It has twelve verses, one for each month in the year.

This is a favorite way of ending their songs. If the Cota be tuned in F-major, the above cannot be played.

In the Girls' Normal School, which is patronized by her Majesty, the Empress, the court musicians taught this kind of singing, while I was trying to teach in our scale. I found it very difficult to get the young ladies to sing 8 and 4 and 7 and 8, and mentioned the fact to the authorities upon the different scales. They then wished to know which I thought was the true scale. I replied that I had not come to Japan to decide matters of that kind, but suggested that, as they had a first-class Professor of Physics in the University, I had no doubt that he could decide the matter upon scientific principles. They seemed to jump at that suggestion, and arranged that Professor Mendenhall should be invited to give a course of lectures upon the subject of sound, especially illustrating the musical scale, and the harmonic relation of sounds; which he did in three lectures.

Professor M., having all the apparatus for this purpose, was entirely successful in his demonstrations. The result was that it decided the whole matter: (1), that their scale had not even been submitted to scientific treatment; (2), that they had not included the idea of the harmonic relation of sounds in their system. At these lectures they took good care to have all the Japanese musicians of note in the capital invited, including the court musicians. A large number attended. From this time I had my hands full. The musicians come to me to learn about our scale and about harmony.

A commission was appointed by the educational department, to decide (1), as to the scale; (2), as to nomenclature; (3), as to the poetry to be furnished me to set to music for all grades of schools. This commission consists of three of their literary men, and one blind musician, the Cota-player, whom I have mentioned, Mr. Isawa, and myself, including my interpreter. We have met three times a week and spend about three hours each time. The first hour is taken up by my giving a course of lessons based on our system of music and in our notation. They copy all my exercises from the blackboard, and then go to work with their songs or words for songs.

By the above you may get some idea as to what I am trying to do. Every thing seems to proceed with an excellent spirit, and I feel very much encouraged in every respect, for I feel that, if I do not progress very far, we are working in the right direction; and I feel that you would approve our course. Yours truly, L. W. MASON.

LOCAL ITEMS.

Of the operatic outlook last Sunday's Herald tells us:

In the absence of an established operatic season, such as New York has enjoyed the last two years, Boston will during the coming months enjoy a series of short visits from nearly a dozen different organizations for the presentation of Italian, French and English grand opera, as well as opera comique and opera bouffe. The list of companies expected during the season includes the "Boston Ideal," Manager Mapleson's, the Strakosch and Hess and Emma Abbott English, the Gilbert and Sullivan company, with the new and unnamed work of those notable workers, the Aimée and Soldene opera bouffe, the De Beaulieu and Grau French, the Roosevelt English, Mahn's "Boccaccio," the Bijou, the Flora E. Barry company, and an organization for Italian opera, headed by Sig. Tagliapietra, now being formed. The "Ideal" company will open at the Boston Theatre late in the season and present "The Pirates," "Chimes of Normandy," "Bohemian Girl," in addition to their former repertoire, with Mary Beebe, Marie Stone, Adelaide Phillips, and Messrs. M. W. Whitney, W. H. MacDonald, Tom Karl, W. H. Fessenden, H. C. Barnabee and George W. Frothingham as the leading soloists. The Mapleson company come to the Boston Theatre Dec. 27, for two weeks, and will, undoubtedly, make the entrée of Mme. Gerster the leading event, and Boito's "Mefistofele" and "Rienzi" the novelties of the season. The Strakosch and Hess English Opera Company open at the Globe Theatre Nov. 15, for a single week, producing first in America Boito's "Mefistofele" with Mme. Marie Roze as Margherita. The Emma Abbott English company come to the Globe Theatre during the latter part of the season, and, with a repertoire including "Romeo and Juliet," "Lover's Pilgrimage," "Merry Wives of Windsor," as its novelties, will introduce Sig. Brignoli in English opera. Beyond the fact that the new opera by Gilbert and Sullivan will be first presented in this city at the Globe Theatre, nothing is known as to this promised new composition.

—Of the singing societies we learn from the same source:

The opening concerts to be given by the Handel and Haydn Society will serve as the leading events in the dedicatory week of the rebuilt Tremont Temple, a performance of "The Messiah" being announced for the evening of Monday, Oct. 11, and one of "Elijah" on the evening of Wednesday, Oct. 13. Miss Lillian Bailey makes her entrée to the Boston concert hall on the former occasion, singing the soprano rôle. The other soloists will be Miss Emily Winant, contralto, William J. Winch, tenor, and Mr. M. W. Whitney, bass. For the "Elijah" the soloists have not been fully decided upon, but Messrs. John Winch and Charles E. Adams and Miss Emily Winant will probably be heard on that occasion. For the regular season of the society there have been plans made for four performances, "The Messiah" at Christmas, Mozart's "Requiem Mass," and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," a month later, selections from Bach's "Passion Music" at good Friday.

The Cecilia Club programme for the season is full of attractions, and promises a far more enjoyable series of concerts than have been given the last few seasons. The works to be given by this organization are cantatas by Bach and Grieg, two motets by Beethoven, Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Liszt's "Die Glocken des Strassburger," Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," Mendelssohn's "Loreley" and Schumann's "Faust," all with full orchestral accompaniment, to which rare array of attractions will be added four unaccompanied psalms of Mendelssohn. It is quite possible that these concerts will be given in the new Tremont Temple.

The absence (in Europe) of the conductor of the Boylston Club, Mr. George L. Osgood, has made it impossible as yet to arrange the season's programme for this organization. Mr. Osgood will unquestionably bring with him more or less novelties for the Boylston singers on his return late this month, and the notably choice selections included in the concerts of this club the last few years ensure an equally interesting series of performances the coming season.

—The Old Bay State course of entertainments will begin on Thursday evening, Sept. 27, with a concert by Miss Annie Louise Cary and the Temple Quartet Glee Club, and subsequent evenings will be filled with a reading of "Midsummer Night's Dream" by George Riddle, with all of Mendelssohn's music by the Philharmonic orchestra; and concerts by the Theodore Thomas orchestra; Marie Roze and the Listemann concert company; the Ideal opera concert company, consisting of a double quartet of the principals; the Mendelssohn quintet club and Lillian Bailey and George Henschel as soloists; the Barnabee concert company; and readings by Prof. Churchill and Miss Cayvan. At some of the entertainments Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Sherwood, pianists, will appear, and Miss Fanny Kellogg will also be heard in this course.

—First among the miscellaneous concerts of the season come those announced by Manager Peck for the evenings of Oct. 4 and 5, and the afternoon of Oct. 9, by Miss Annie Louise Cary, Wilhelmj, Joseffy and the Temple Quartet.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LONDON. Mr. Henry C. Lunn writes, in the Musical Times (Aug. 1):

The rise of new Associations for the practice and promotion of music is a sure indication of the growing interest in the art. The London Musical Society, under distinguished patronage, has this season given a concert of the utmost interest; and there can be no question that as this Society appeals not to the general public for encouragement, the professed object it has in view—that of performing high-class works, either ancient or modern, and of any country—will be carried out. The Bach Society, too, continues its career of usefulness, under the conductorship of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt; and amongst the Societies in other parts of the metropolis we may mention the Borough of Hackney Choral Association (which, since Mr. Ebenezer Prout has assumed the conductorship, has grown into the greatest importance), the Hampstead Choral Society, so ably directed by the founder, Mr. Willem Coenen, and the Highbury Philharmonic Society, placed under the efficient conductorship of Dr. Bridge; many others, however, deserving the warmest praise for their zeal, not only in presenting compositions of recognized worth, but in performing new works which, but for the existence of such institutions, would scarcely obtain a hearing.

We think it may now be safely said that the anticipated dissolution of the Sacred Harmonic Society will be averted. Exeter Hall, it is believed, will undergo such extensive alterations that the concerts of the Society will probably not be given there next season, but the following year it is hoped that they will be resumed in the old locality; and we sincerely trust that the conservative policy which has for so many years ruled supreme at the councils of this Association will at least be slightly relaxed in the future. It is true that the works of one living composer have annually a place in the programmes of the concerts; but there are many others anxiously waiting, and the Sacred Harmonic Society may not only do good to the art, but benefit its funds, by admitting their claim to a hearing. The concerts this season have been quite up to the usual standard.

—ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE FOR THE BLIND. The Musical World (July 17) says:—

Some very interesting proceedings in connection with this college took place at the Crystal Palace on Saturday last, but before noticing them in detail, it may be well to state precisely the objects of the Institution and the means by which they are attained. According to the just issued report of the energetic Principal, Mr. F. J. Campbell, a misconception exists on this vital point, it being often supposed that the College is an academy of music and nothing more, consequently that, as in an academy of music, only persons with special gifts can be received, its field of operations is a restricted one. But, in reality, the charity exists specially as a normal school for the training of blind teachers, and generally as a place where blind persons are fitted, by thorough physical, mental, and artistic development, for the task of earning their own living. Its doors are open, therefore, to all afflicted with loss of sight, and its mission appeals to a universal sympathy with those whom hard fate has deprived of a precious sense. The instruction afforded at the college is carried on in four departments. First comes that of general education; next, that of special training for teacher's work; next, that of the science and practice of music; and last, that of pianoforte tuning. In addition, particular regard is paid to such physical exercises as tend to encourage confidence and independence, even skating on ice or concrete being part of the regular course. But while the charity thus seeks to render the widest possible service to blind persons, its usefulness is, perhaps, more apparent in the department of music than in any other. For some mysterious reason, loss of sight is often partially compensated by susceptibility to the influence of music, and skill in the practice of the art. It follows that a blind school anywhere must be, in a particular sense, a school of music. The Royal Normal College is such a school, and its "Annual Prize Festival" on Saturday last was, with entire propriety, a musical demonstration. The latest report contains some interesting facts illustrative of the good already done in preparing pupils, musical and other, for the work of life. We read of an ex-scholar "successfully engaged in the coal trade at Belfast;" of another who emigrated to Canada, and is doing well as a pianoforte tuner; of two others who have established themselves as music publishers, etc., in Glasgow; of three young ladies who are employed under the School Board for London at good salaries; of a youth who is earning his bread as an organist; of two young ladies, still connected with the college, who are more than self-supporting; and so on to the number of forty-five out of fifty-five whom the college has sent forth into the world. The percentage of successes is a high one, and it is impossible to read the details given in the report without pleasure.

But the highest value of those details lies in the testimony they give as to the thoroughness of the training imparted by Mr. Campbell and his assistants. Blind persons compete at enormous disadvantage with those who can see, and to equalize their conditions in any tolerable measure, the education of the blind must be as painstaking and as thorough as possible. This necessity is simply recognized at the Normal College, for proof of which take the department of music. Not only do the pupils receive the ordinary instruction, but the professors of the pianoforte (Mr. Hartvigson), and of the organ (Mr. Hopkins), give weekly recitals throughout the year, at which classical compositions are systematically analyzed and performed. In twelve months 645 different pieces were thus brought to the knowledge of the pupils by Mr. Hartvigson. Nor is this all. The young people are themselves required to give recitals from time to time. A weekly rehearsal of the music under study takes place, and by frequent attendance at the Crystal Palace concerts the highest forms of creative and executive art are made familiar.

As a result of so much thoroughness we find the examiners in music dwelling with emphasis upon the attainments of the scholars. They tell us of a lad who played Bach's organ fugue in B-minor "excellently," and gave an account of its construction, after having had the copy "only a few days." We read also, of a young lady, Miss Amelia Campbell, who could play by itself alone any one of the four "voices" in Bach's C-major fugue—an achievement nothing short of wonderful under the circumstances. The examiners (Messrs. Manns and Stainer) say further: "Regarding the principles on which the various teachers seem to develop the reproductive powers of musical art of their sightless pupils, frequent and searching questions put to the latter, sometimes at the cost of interrupting their performance, placed the fact beyond a doubt that they are made as familiar with the notation and the practical details of the compositions they perform as if they had not the sad experience and heavy labor of gaining information under the deprivation of one of the most important 'doors of the mind.'" Better testimony to success than this could neither be given nor desired.

According to the balance-sheet issued last September, the financial state of the charity is good, the excess of receipts over expenditure for the nine months then ending being £1,394. This, however, is due to a self-sacrificing economy which may be measured when we state that the total cost of the educational department during that period was but £1,138, while the expenses of management amounted to no more than £140. A charity so administered should, by preference, be helped, and we need scarcely say that further assistance in this particular case would meet with thankful acknowledgment. The property of the college is mortgaged to the extent of £12,000, and the executive committee—of whom Lord Richard Grosvenor, M.P., acts as chairman—have, no doubt, good reasons to say that "the annual interest on this sum is a heavy strain upon the income of the college." The friends of the institution, however, look forward to a time when it will be self-supporting. There is room in the present building for 120 pupils, and were these forthcoming, "the annual income would, from scholarships and fees, cover the expenditure." That the empty places will soon be filled we have every reason to hope. The patronage liberally bestowed upon the college by members of the Royal Family, the influence untiringly exerted in its favor by the president, his Grace the Duke of Westminster, K.G., and many other distinguished persons, and the effect inseparable from such proof of good work done as is occasionally given, cannot fail to raise the institution to the place it deserves.

—KATHARINE STEPHENS. A correspondent writes to ask me the date of the death of Miss Stephens, who became the Countess of Essex. Happily the lady is still alive, and although nearly blind, her great age sits upon her as lightly as it should upon one who has led a useful and spotless life. Katharine Stephens was born on September 18, 1794, and in 1807 she studied music under a forgotten teacher, Lanza. It was during 1807 and 1812 that she sang under articles to this Lanza at Bath, Bristol, and Southampton, and also at the London concert-hall then called the Pantheon, but now used as wine and spirit vaults. The lady's first appearance in London, therefore, dates back about seventy years. Sixty-eight years ago we find her playing the part of Mandane in Arne's "Artaxerxes," and such characters as Clara in the "Duenna," and Polly in the Beggars' Opera, at the old Covent Garden Theatre. Sixty-six years ago she was singing at the Ancient Concerts, and afterwards at Drury Lane (then a comparatively new) Theatre. More than half a century since she declined an engagement at the King's Theatre (now Her Majesty's) to succeed Catalani, and in 1838, after a public career of 31 years, Miss Katharine Stephens became the second wife of the fifth Earl of Essex. On her marriage she of course retired from the stage. The Earl died in 1830 without issue, and his widow has since resided at the family mansion in Eaton Square. After a public career of thirty-one years the Countess of Essex has enjoyed a retirement of forty-two years, and is still, at the advanced age of eighty-six, in fair health. One of her few contemporaries who seemed likely to survive her was Planché, who was, of course, one of her oldest friends.—Figaro.

—Figaro quotes the following testimony in favor of London rather than Milan as the best place for students in the art of singing:—

Signor Brocolini (Mr. John Clarke, of Brooklyn), well known on the operatic stage here, has been giving his experiences of matters musical in various parts of Europe. Signor Brocolini first studied in Italy, and he gives a horrible, but by no means over-drawn, picture of the dangers to which young English and American girls are subjected in Milan:—

"What should be exposed is the extortion practised on students in Italy by the operatic managers. Just before the commencement of the season they would come to Milan, visit the different professors of music, and inform themselves concerning those pupils who desired to make a debut. The price which the debutante was to pay would be fixed according to the amount of money which he or she could command. After one or two nights the manager would have the singer hissed by the audience, and making that an excuse for dismissal, would engage another debutante who had more money, perhaps. The whole system was connected with extortion and abuse. Lady students, especially, were hounded by the sixpenny Italian nobility, and I knew of one case in which an American lady having refused to receive calls from a Baron, the latter would order his carriage, which was well known, to be kept standing in front of the lady's residence till two or three o'clock in the morning."

Signor Brocolini next discussed the relative advantages of study in London over Italy. He said:—

"I should advise all young people to study in London. The only advantage to be found in Italy is the opportunity for studying and practising the language. In London you can have the finest teachers in every branch of the art. There are, for instance, Profs. Deacon and William Shakespeare, and also Madame Dolby, one of the most successful teachers of female voices in London. Many of the teachers are connected with academies, but not all. The Royal Academy and the London Academy are under the management of professors, and furnish a systematic and thorough course of instruction. The South Kensington Training School is under the directorship of Sullivan, the composer, and is the especial pet of royalty. All the principal orchestral solo players are connected with the academies. Joseph Barnby, the well-known composer and conductor, is professor of music at Eton. Prof. Garcia is connected with the Royal Academy. Outside the academies there are also Profs. Veschetti, Li Calsi, and Sir Julius Benedict, who are all eminent in their profession."

Signor Brocolini has by no means exhausted the list of singing professors in London, and, indeed, one of the most popular, Signor Randegger, and many of the best, such as Mr. Welsh, Mr. Walworth, Mr. Montem Smith, and numerous others, he has not mentioned at all. The name of Professor Deacon, too, I do not recollect, while Sir Julius Benedict does not teach singing. In regard to the cost of tuition in London (and the figures, which are correct, may be quoted for the benefit of provincial and foreign students), Signor Brocolini says:—

"The best teachers charge from 10s. to £1 per lesson. It is customary in London to take furnished apartments, which can be had for from 15s. to 25s. per week. Meals will be furnished at one's apartments at any hour, or can be procured at a neighboring café. One can live very comfortably on £3 per week. This is more than the same accommodations will cost in Italy."

Signor Brocolini likewise details a few of the many musical performances of all sorts which the student can enjoy, and which will interest and instruct him, and with a brief sketch of his own career, his interesting paper concludes.

GERMANY. The vacant post of organist at St. Thomas Church, of Leipzig, has been conferred on Prof. Carl Piutti.

—The recent repetition of the performances, in chronological succession, of the whole of Mozart's operas at the Imperial Opera at Vienna has proved, as in January last, a most complete success. Among the vocalists specially engaged for the "cyclos" of representations were Mmes. Pauline Lucca, Marianne Brandt, Prochaska, and Schuch-Proska.

SONNETS.

TO AN ARTIST. — J. M.

I.

What if thou spurn me, slight me, pass me by
In haughty silence, O thou proud and grand!
Where sometimes meekly on thy path I stand,
And, with vain patience and a secret sigh,
Pray humbly that on me might light thine eye, —
If, like a pilgrim from some foreign land,
I knock upon thy door with weary hand,
And never hear a friendly voice reply! —
The feeble heart may bleed, but while thou still Art deathless true to thy immortal goal,
And godly purposes thy spirit fill, —
Unchilled, unchanged, unflagging, my strong soul
Soaring triumphant o'er such petty ill,
Shall follow thee from distant pole to pole.

II.

Ah no, ah no! I was deceived! — in vain
The daring courage and the dauntless song;
The flight is weary and the way is long;
The soul, grown feeble, faints beneath the strain
Of aching toll, while from the founts of pain
The heart draws nourishment, and waxes strong,
Back to its core the purple life-drops throng,
And fill it full of flushing power again.
— Aye, from thy path shall my dumb prayers ascend,
Until a smile shall kindle in thine eye
For me alone, — still with a noiseless cry
I'll knock upon thy door, till thou shalt bend
From thy high state, and draw me gently nigh,
And clasp my hand in thine and call me friend!

STUART STERNES.

RICHARD WAGNER.

... In approaching the twentieth period of our history, the last into which we have thought it necessary to subdivide it, we find ourselves brought face to face with a master whose earnest devotion to the cause of Art entitles his opinions to a more than ordinary measure of respectful consideration. We have, it is true, expressed our intention of avoiding, as far as may be, the invidious task of criticizing the productions of living authors, from a firm conviction that the time for fairly and dispassionately considering the extent of their influence upon the progress of Art has not yet arrived; but in this case no choice is left to us. The theories of Richard Wagner have already been so loudly proclaimed and so freely discussed, his works have been so fiercely attacked by one class of critics, and so extravagantly praised by another, that it is no longer possible to ignore either their present significance, their connection with the history of the past, or their probable effect upon the future. We therefore propose to conclude our rapid sketch of the changes which the opera has undergone since its new birth in the opening years of the seventeenth century, by reviewing, as briefly as the nature of the case will permit, the peculiarities of the phase through which it is now passing, and thus enabling our readers to form their own opinion as to its relation to, or points of divergence from, the schools we have already attempted to describe.

[From the article "OPERA," by W. S. BOKSTRO, in Part XI. of Grove's Dictionary of Music.]

Wagner's contemplated regeneration of the lyric drama, as he himself explains it, demands changes far more significant than the mere adoption of a new style; changes which can only be met by the creation of an entirely new Ideal—a conception so different from any proposed since the time of Gluck, that the experience of a hundred years is utterly valueless as a guide to its elaboration, except, indeed, as affording examples of the faults to be avoided. Rejecting the very name of opera as inapplicable—which it certainly is—to this new conception, he contents himself with the simple title of drama. The drama, he tells us, depends, for the perfection of its expression, upon the union of poetry with music, scenery, and action. Whenever one of these means of effect is neglected for the sake of giving undue prominence to another, the result is an anomalous production which will not bear the test of critical analysis. If we are to accept him as our oracle, we must believe that, hitherto, composers, one and all, have erred in making the music of the drama the first consideration, and sacrificing all others to it. That they have weakened rhetorical delivery, for the sake of pleasing the ear by rhythmic melodies which cannot co-exist with just dramatic expression. That they have impeded the action of the piece, by the introduction of movements constructed upon a regular plan, which, whether good or not in a sonata, is wholly out of place in a musical drama. That they have kept the stage waiting, in order that they might give a favorite singer the opportunity of executing passages entirely out of character with the scene it was his duty to interpret. In place of such rhythmic melodies, such symmetrically-constructed movements, and such brilliant passages of execution, Wagner substitutes a species of song, which holds a place midway between true recitative and true melody—a kind of mezzo recitativo, to which he gives the name of "melos." This he supports by a rich and varied orchestral accompaniment, designed to form, as it were, the background to his picture, to enforce the expression of the words by appropriate instrumental effects, and to individualize the various members of the dramatis personæ by assigning a special combination of harmonies, or a well-defined leit-motif, to each. The management of this accompaniment is incontestably his strongest point. No man now living possesses a tithe of his command over the resources of the orchestra. The originality of his combinations is as startling as their effect is varied and beautiful. He can make them express whatever he feels to be needful for the effect of the scenes he is treating; and he frequently does so with such complete success, that his meaning would be perfectly intelligible even were the voice part cancelled. His "melos," thus supported, adds power and expression to the poetical text, and furnishes us with a very high type of purely declamatory music—the only music he considers admissible into the "drama," except in an incidental form; while the infinite variety of orchestral coloring he is able to impart to it deprives it, to some extent, in his hands, of the intolerably monotonous effect it would certainly be made to produce by an inferior composer.

That he has selected this style from conviction that it is more exactly adapted to the desired purpose than any other, and not from any natural inability to produce rhythmic melody, is certain; for his earlier operas clearly show him to be a more than ordinarily accomplished melodist in the best sense of the term. "Mit Gewitter und Sturm aus fernem Meer," "Traft ihr das Schiff im Meere an," and "Steuermann! lass die Wacht!" in Der fliegende Holländer, would alone prove this, had he never written anything else. His principles, however, were but very faintly perceptible in Der fliegende Holländer. We find them more clearly enounced in Tannhäuser, more strongly still in Lohengrin and Tristan und Isolde; but they only attain their complete development in his last great drama, Der Ring des Nibelungen, a so-called "Tetralogy," consisting of four divisions, each long enough to form a complete work, and respectively named, "Das Rheingold," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," and "Götterdämmerung." From this quadripartite conception the aria in all its forms is strictly banished, and music is made throughout the handmaid of the libretto, and not its mistress. The correlation existing between the two is so intensely close, that we may well believe it could never have been satisfactorily carried out, had not the poetical text been furnished by the composer himself. Wagner evidently takes this view of the matter, for he has written the libretti as well as the music of all his later operas; and it is evident that, where this arrangement is possible—that is to say where the dramatist is great, and equally great, both as a poet, and a musician—it must of necessity lead to higher results than any which are attainable when the work is divided between two men of genius, who, however closely their ideas may be in accordance, can never think exactly alike. In the "Tetralogy," the subject selected, and carried on throughout the four grand divisions of the work, is founded upon certain Teutonic myths, which it is scarcely possible for two great writers—a word-poet and a tone-poet—to contemplate from exactly the same point of view: the advantage, therefore, is immeasurable, when one mind, of great and varied attainments, can arrange the whole. Wagner inclines to the idea that myths of this description furnish the best if not the only subjects on which the musical drama can be founded, though both Lohengrin and Tristan und Isolde are founded upon Celtic legends. But, in this he would, perhaps, lay down no very strict law; for the Teutonic myth could scarcely appeal very strongly to the imagination of an English audience, and, to a French one, the Nibelungenlied would be utterly unintelligible.

The force of our remarks will be best understood by those who have enjoyed an opportunity of hearing Wagner's works performed in his own way; but a mere perusal of the score will illustrate them with sufficient clearness to answer all practical purposes. In either case, the student cannot fail to be struck by the undoubted originality of the style: but, is the general conception a new one? Assuredly not. It is the fullest possible development of the Ideal which was proposed, in the year 1600, at the house of Giovanni Bardi, in Florence. Wagner looks back to Greek tragedy as the highest available authority on the subject. So did Rinuccini. Wagner condemns rhythmic melody as altogether opposed to dramatic truth. So did Peri. Wagner keeps his instrumental performers out of sight, in order that he may the better carry out the illusions of the drama. So did Emilio del Cavaliere, and Peri after him. Wagner uses all the orchestral resources at his command, for the purpose of enforcing his dramatic meaning. So, in 1607, did Monteverde. The only difference is, that Monteverde had but a rude untutored band to work with, while Wagner has a magnificent orchestra, fortified by the experience of two hundred and eighty years. It was not to be wondered at that Monteverde's style of recitative grew wearisome, or that, when the power of introducing orchestral coloring was so very small, Alessandro Scarlatti endeavored to increase the interest and beauty of his works by the introduction of measured melody and well-constructed movements. In process of time these well-intentioned improvements attracted too much attention, and weakened the true power of the drama. Then Gluck arose, and resolutely reformed the abuse—but for the time only. No one can say that his principles have been fully carried out by later composers—that too many operas of the present day, in more schools than one, are not grievously lowered in tone by the pernicious habit of introducing irrelevant, if not positively flippant tunes, in situations where they are altogether out of place. Against these abuses Wagner has waged implacable war; and, in so doing, he has merited the thanks of all who have the true interests of the lyric drama at heart: for the evils which he has made it the business of his life to eradicate are no light ones, and he has entered upon his task with no faltering hand. Only while giving him all due honor for what he has done, let us not wrong either himself or his cause by pretending to give him more than his due. He has called our attention, not, as some will have it, to a new creation, but to a necessary reform. He has nothing to tell us that Gluck has not already said; and Gluck said nothing that has not already been said by Peri. The reformation, so far as recitative, declamation, and melody are concerned, is nothing more than a return to the first principles laid down at the Conte di Vernio's réunions. It brings us therefore not one step in advance of the position that was reached little less than three centuries ago.

These, however, are not the only points concerning which it is necessary to call the reader's attention to the strange analogy existing between the new school of the nineteenth century and that which flourished in the seventeenth. The disciples of Peri and Caccini cast aside, as mere vexatious hindrances, the restrictions imposed upon them by the laws of counterpoint. Modern composers have done the same; and striving, like Monteverde, to invent harmonic combinations hitherto unheard, have justified their innovations by the not very easily controvertible dictum, "That which sounds well must, of necessity, be right." Admitting the force of this argument, must not its converse—"That which does not sound well must, of necessity, be wrong"—be equally true? It seems difficult to dispute this; yet our ears are sometimes very sorely tried. Can any one, for instance, really take pleasure in the hideously "out-of-tune" effect of the following "false-relation" from the third act of Der fliegende Holländer?

The great danger attendant upon such aberrations as these is that the progression used by the master, in a few isolated instances, for reasons of his own, is too often mistaken by the disciple for a "characteristic of the style," and introduced everywhere, usque ad nauseam. Should the disciples of the school we are considering fall into this pernicious, though almost universally prevalent error, its results cannot fail to exercise a most disastrous effect upon the future prospects of the drama. We have already said that the value of a work of art depends entirely upon the amount of natural truth it embodies, whether that truth be exhibited in the perfection of symmetrical form, as in Il Don Giovanni or Le Nozze di Figaro, in power of emotional expression, as in La Sonnambula, Norma, or Lucia di Lammermoor, or in purity of harmonious concord, as in Il Matrimonio Segreto. Wagner's strict adherence to dramatic truth distinguishes his writings from those of all other composers of the present day. He declares himself ready to sacrifice all less important considerations for its sake, and proves his loyalty by continually doing so. No one will venture to assert that the value of his own works, strengthened as they are by his conscientious adherence to a noble principle, is materially diminished by a heterodox resolution, or an occasional exhibition of harshness in the harmony of an orchestral accompaniment; but should his school, as a school, encourage the use of progressions which can be defended upon no natural principle whatever, we may be sure that no long time will be suffered to elapse before it is pushed aside, to make room for the creations of a twenty-first period.

(Conclusion in next number.)

THE LONDON "MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS."

II.

Having, in our last, given a short sketch of the "Rise and Progress" of this Institution, which may now fairly claim to be of national interest and importance, we purpose entering somewhat into detail with regard to the work accomplished during the twenty-two seasons of its existence.

Our readers are probably familiar with the "catalogues" which Mr. Arthur Chappell has issued from time to time, containing lists of the works performed to the various dates. Having a two-fold purpose in view, we shall select as our starting-point that published at the end of the eighteenth season, April, 1876. The genius of a Gladstone can throw the halo of poetry around such a prosaic subject as the "Budget;" scarcely less is required of him who would make a work of art of a "catalogue," even though the subject-matter be the divine art itself. We have no such lofty purpose in view; but shall be satisfied if we can make our survey useful, and perhaps interesting. The last programme of the eighteenth season concludes thus:—"End of the Five Hundred and Fifty-seventh Concert." The number of pieces given, up to that period, may be put down in round numbers as five hundred and fifty—it being impossible, without examining every programme, to get at the exact number; as detached movements from the Suites of Bach and Handel, selections from the "Lieder ohne Worte" of Mendelssohn, and other extracts, occur from time to time. The number of composers represented is sixty-two. The following season—the nineteenth—consisted of thirty-five concerts, and the new works amounted to nineteen, and new composers to five. The last three seasons show the following results respectively:—Forty-one concerts, thirty new works, nine new names; forty-one concerts, twenty-two works, four names; thirty-eight concerts, thirty-three works, four names—bringing the grand totals to seven hundred and twelve concerts, six hundred and fifty-four works, and eighty-four composers. We beg to draw particular attention to this apparently "dry" enumeration, for reasons which will appear later on.

In the course of our investigation we shall frequently find cause for surprise: and the first is afforded by the above figures. Whether in the aggregate, or in detail, we invariably find that the "concerts" outstrip the "works" in number—the first few seasons being a necessary exception. The second "surprise" is, the small number of composers—only eighty-four! Of these, thirty are still living; five have died within the last ten years, leaving less than fifty to recall to mind that great army of musicians of the past whose works exist to delight and edify the civilized world.

To classify the names according to nationality would be a pleasing and interesting task. But our purpose will be better served by dividing them into periods—thus affording ready means of comparison as to the relative proportions of the music, ancient and modern, that Mr. Chappell has brought before his audiences. This classification is rather difficult, as some names obstinately refuse to enter either category—their owners living too long for the one, and born too early for the other; still we give our best judgment to the matter, and submit the result to our readers.

Firstly, we will take the "Old Masters," and their immediate followers. To avoid wearisome repetition, we shall give the names in alphabetical order; and, excepting the "giants," refer to them once only. Antonioti, and Ascoli, are each represented by one work only—for the violoncello. The next name is that of Sebastian Bach, the bare enumeration of whose works that have been given would form a decent "catalogue" in itself. Fifty-three pieces have been presented—some, complete works; others, selected movements. The number of performances amount to one hundred and forty-six. The first work given was the Organ Fugue in G-minor; the last, the sixth "Suite Anglaise," in D-minor. Many of his works have been performed several times—including the concertos for three and two pianos; the celebrated Chaconne in D-minor, for violin alone, has been played twenty-four times. The name of his eldest son, Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, appears in the programmes but twice—in 1870; on the second occasion, his fine "Fantasia Dramatica," in C, was given. There were a good many "Bachs," as Mr. Chappell is doubtless aware. We hope the future may bring some of their works to a hearing. Boccherini is represented by eight pieces; two quartets, the remainder for the violoncello—the favorite sonata in A coming in for nineteen performances. Corbelli only appears twice. His Sonata in D, for violin, has been given four times; and the Trio in E-flat, once only—at the first "Italian" night, February 27, 1860. Pierre Gaviniès appears on the scene so late as December, 1876, when a sonata of his, for violin, was performed. The programme states that he made his début at the age of fourteen, and played in public when seventy-three—such an "old stager" surely deserved a little more notice! Geminiani, who passed half his life in England, is limited to a sonata and gavotte, both for violoncello—a curious thing about them being that they were performed, the one, March 20, 1875, the other, March 20, 1876 (one on a Saturday, the other on a Monday). Another curious thing is, the different estimate of the composer's age. The programme (following Burney, I presume,) gives the year 1666 as that of his birth; Hawkins (followed by the Harmonicon, Mendel's Lexicon, and Grove's Dictionary), gives the year 1680, or "about." Grove's Dictionary states that he died in 1761; the others, without exception, give the date, September 17, 1762. When "doctors" like these disagree, who shall decide? Handel, like his great contemporary, was introduced by a composition for the organ—the concerto, No. 6, according to the "catalogue;" No. 3, according to the notice in the Musical World. Our readers will recall our mention of the Bach and Handel night, April 4, 1859. There is a great difference in the number of works given by these masters; the last named only counting fifteen, and forty-four performances. The fifth "Suite," first collection, is the favorite, and has been played fourteen times; the Air therefrom, known as the "Harmonious Blacksmith" (with how little reason, our columns, years ago, gave evidence), once in addition. The last work heard was the Sonata in A, for violin, performed for the twelfth time, November 17, 1879. The last four seasons show only five performances from Handel—the work just named, coming in for four of them. For a nation of Handel worshippers this is a sorry record, and furnishes another "surprise." Hasse, an illustrious contemporary, fares much worse, being represented by a solitary sonata, and that so late as January, 1879—almost a century after his death. Leclair and Locatelli are represented by two works each; one from the latter, being a "derangement" for the violoncello, of a violin sonata. Two works, by Manello, for violoncello, have been given several times. Nardini only figures once—in 1873. Porpora, the same—in 1868. Rameau, ditto—but not till 1878, when his charming and well-known Gavotte with variations, in A-minor, was given. Rust's D-minor Sonata (the only one performed,) has met with better success—not allowed to "rust," we are tempted to add—having been brought forward seven times between the years 1871 and 1880. Domenico Scarlatti, another débutant at an "Italian" night (the second), has had ten performances devoted to his "Harpsichord Lessons;" and, after an interregnum of seven years, is coming again to the front, several sonatas having been introduced during the last three seasons. "Let not the Germans," says the critic of the Musical World, referring to the "Italian" nights, "imagine that they are the only people who can compose chamber-music."

And so say we; without any disrespect for German music, and having other than Italian composers in our mind's eye. Tartini numbers only three works; but the "Trillo del Diavolo" has been heard twenty-three times at these concerts. Veracini, Vitali, and Valentini, close our list of names for this period. They number six works, and twenty-one performances between them. Our readers will notice the preponderance of Italian names, and the total absence of English ones—of this, the "Old School;" still, with that one exception, we must admit that Mr. Chappell has dealt liberally with this period; having presented twenty-two composers, and one hundred and ten pieces—"Old Bach" claiming nearly one half. For the next few years Mr. Chappell can easily find as many more from the same sources.

III.

Our second period will embrace the founders of the "modern school," and range from Haydn to Schumann. Towering high above a race of "giants," it is only natural to expect that Beethoven should surpass them all in the number of works presented in these programmes, and such we find to be the case. It would be a much easier task to enumerate the works not given than to mention those performed. No fewer than ninety-three works have been presented; the performances reaching the enormous total of eight hundred and sixty-one! To the complete repertoire of the "Monday Popular Concerts" we find Beethoven contributing one-seventh—another of the "surprises" we hinted at in our last. There are so many points of interest in looking over this vast array, that we would fain linger over our task; but, space forbidding, a few instances must suffice. The first work given was the Quintet in C, Op. 29; the last the "Kreutzer" sonata, March 20, 1880. Sufficient evidence of the popularity of the last-named work is afforded by the fact that it has been played forty-eight times. The Septet in E-flat, Op. 20, comes next in order with thirty-four performances. Of this work, a critic writes (1828): "As a happy union of musical science and beautiful melody, no work of Beethoven equals his Septet." Eight other works appear twenty times and upwards. All the quartets for strings have been given, with the exception of the Grand Fugue, Op. 133 (so numbered in Breitkopf & Härtel's edition); the six trios, Op. 1 to 97, for pianoforte and strings; the whole of the sonatas for pianoforte and violin, for pianoforte and violoncello; thirty sonatas for pianoforte, and much besides. Indeed the difficulty in finding novelties seems to have been so great, that the last four seasons only produce one—the variations "Se vuol ballare," for pianoforte and violin. We might ask, Why are none of the pianoforte quartets given? Why not perform occasionally the octet, or sextet for wind, or the sextet for strings and horns? We believe the subscribers would be pleased to hear the clarinet, oboe and bassoon somewhat oftener. This homage to Beethoven may be truly described as magnificent; and any city in Germany might be challenged to produce its equal.

We pass on to the next name: that of Cherubini, who wrote but little chamber-music, of which still less is published. He is represented by three string quartets, and the pianoforte Sonata in B-flat, the total performances numbering fourteen. Chopin comes next. He is introduced by his Valse in A-flat, Op. 42, April 8, 1861; but according to the Musical World, that work was looked upon as a trifle—along with Schubert's Impromptu in B-flat—infringing the systematic order of the concerts, and, to the minds of many, out of place. He does not appear again till June 13, 1864, when the Scherzo, Op. 31, was given, and the valse repeated. The number of works given now reaches twenty-seven, of which thirteen have been introduced during the last four seasons: a proof that his music is making way—the performances numbering fifty-six. The favorite work appears to be the Polonaise, Op. 3, for pianoforte and violoncello (composed in early youth), which has been given eight times, the Scherzo named above coming next with six performances. We now reach Clementi, "the father of all such as handle the pianoforte," as was remarked on the occasion of the "grand dinner" given in his honor in 1828. Among hundreds of "pianoforte solo" performances, we might expect to find a fair proportion allotted to the music of Clementi. As a matter of fact we do not find it so. Six works and seven renderings are all the programmes record. He was represented at each "Italian" night (there were three in all during 1860); at the first, Feb. 27, was played his sonata "Didone abbandonata," which, says the Musical World, "created the profoundest impression. The sonata is the work of a poet as well as a great musician, and sets at naught the idea entertained by some modern amateurs, that Clementi was a pedant." One work was given in 1861, another in 1866, and the last in 1877. We will only remark that here is another "surprise." Donizetti was represented at the second "Italian" night, by his fourth quartet for strings (in D), which we are informed was "heard to perfection." Dussek, who follows in our list, is fairly well treated, a quintet for pianoforte and strings, two string quartets, two sonatas for pianoforte and violin, and five for pianoforte alone, gracing the programmes at intervals; the total performances numbering thirty-five, of which fifteen were devoted to the beautiful sonata mentioned in our first article. Like Clementi, Dussek has not been heard since 1877. More's the pity! Ernst had a "benefit" concert, June 6, 1864 (a concert of great interest, says the Musical Times), when five of his compositions were brought forward, including three numbers of the "Pensées Fugitives," written in conjunction with Stephen Heller. A string quartet had been given two years earlier, with some of the pieces repeated at the "benefit," making in all six works and nineteen performances—the "Elegie" coming in for eleven.

At the name of Haydn the mind instinctively reverts to quartets; it is no matter of surprise that forty-seven of the eighty-three have already found a place in these programmes. It would cause no displeasure, we venture to predict, if Mr. Chappell should think fit to give one at every concert each season till the "cycle" was complete. The performances of the quartets alone reach the large number of one hundred and seventy-three. The other works given include six trios, a sonata for pianoforte and violin (arranged from a quartet), two sonatas, and the variations in F-minor for pianoforte solo—making in all fifty-seven works and two hundred and six performances. Seven pieces were marked "first time" last season. "Papa" Haydn has been well looked after. To Hummel is accorded ten works and twenty-seven performances, thirteen of these belonging to the Septet in D-minor, last heard November 13, 1875, after which date the name of Hummel disappears. Krommer, who follows, appears only once, December 17, 1861, when his string quartet, Op. 24, No. 3, was introduced. The Musical World remarks: "The programme commenced with a quartet by Krommer, a composer doubtless new to the majority of the audience, and, judging from the specimen produced, not likely to become familiar, although this same 'Moravian' composed no less than sixty-nine quartets for stringed instruments, besides a vast quantity of music for the church."

Mendelssohn is well represented, numbering forty-nine works (selections from the Lieder ohne Worte, Books 3 to 8 here counting as six), and three hundred and twenty-one performances. The favorite pieces seem to be the trios; that in E-minor appearing twenty-six times, and the D-minor, twenty-three. The splendid quintet in B-flat was given twenty-four times; the Octet, fifteen; the Sextet (posthumous), once only—March 16, 1868. The "Preciosa" variations written by Mendelssohn and Moscheles ("improvised" at the Philharmonic Concert—see Life of Moscheles), were performed July 6, 1863, the only occasion when the name of the latter composer is mentioned. Molique has four works and seven performances. Mozart, who comes next, has fifty-three, and numbers two hundred and seventy-nine performances. There is a fair distribution of pieces in the various departments of "chamber-music," the quintets and quartets, perhaps, taking the lion's share. The clarinet quintet comes in for twenty-five performances; the Quintet in E-flat, for pianoforte and wind, for one!—a like fate to that of the similar work by Beethoven. Of the quartets, that in C, No. 6, has been played the most frequently: twenty-one times. Paganini and Romberg we class together as composers and virtuosi; they have three works in all; the former, two, and the latter, one—each performed once.

Rossini has had three of his string quartets performed—one at each of the "Italian nights." The Musical World says: "Rossini's quartet (in D), an amusing bagatelle, was (together with four others) written at the age of sixteen, and published without the consent or knowledge of the master." We have only heard of five, but of one a writer remarks in 1828, when Rossini was a score of years beyond sixteen, that it was then about to be published simultaneously in Milan and London, to secure the copyright. Schubert shared the honors of the programme with Spohr, May 16, 1859, when his Quartet in A-minor, Op. 29, introduced his name to these concerts. He has kept his place well, the last novelty having been the Quartet in B-flat, Op. 168, given January 28, 1878. His works reach the total of twenty-nine, with one hundred and seventy-two performances, the lovely Trio in B-flat counting twenty-five, the Quartet in A-minor, eighteen, and the Octet, sixteen. Schumann, whose name comes next, exceeds Schubert in the number of pieces, but not in the performances, having forty-six of the former and one hundred and fifty-six of the latter. The first work that appeared by Schumann was the famous Quintet in E-flat, for pianoforte and strings, introduced December 1, 1862. There is a long notice of the performance in the Musical World, which space will not allow us to quote, and of which no extract can give the "argument" clearly. That the work is now better understood is shown by the fact that it has reached its twentieth performance, and appears to be classed with the regular "annuals."

Now we come to Spohr, who is down for twenty-nine works—the number given to Schubert, with whom he was introduced. His part of the programme opened with the Double Quartet in E-minor, No. 3, Op. 87 ("This was a very great performance of a great master-piece." Musical World, May 21, 1859), and which has been given altogether seven times. The greatest number of performances fell to the barcarolle and scherzo from the "Salon Duettinos," Op. 135, which were played twelve times, the total performances numbering only fifty-one. Steibelt appears but once, December 17, 1860, when his sonata in E-flat, dedicated to Mme. Bonaparte, was performed. We cannot resist inserting another extract from our much-quoted contemporary and senior: "The last of the Monday Popular Concerts was interesting for more than one reason, and especially for the introduction of a name which has hitherto been somewhat unaccountably neglected." Further on, attention is directed to another sonata, Op. 60, possibly with the hope that it may be introduced—a hope not yet realized. Viotti is represented by three works and six performances. Our next name is that of Weber, who, it will be remembered, was introduced with Haydn at the third concert, February 28, 1859. The works then given were the Trio in G-minor, Op. 63, for pianoforte, flute, and violoncello, and three of the Chamber Duets, Op. 60, (on two pianos). To these works we can only add six others—the quartet in B-flat, for pianoforte and strings, the four pianoforte sonatas, and the sonata for clarinet and pianoforte; the total performances being thirty-six. The last name belonging to this period is that of Woelfl, who appears on the scene December 5, 1859, with the "Ne plus ultra," which has been given in all seven times. The only other work introduced being the Introduction, Fugue, and Sonata in C-minor, Op. 25.

Our survey of this period gives a total of twenty-three composers, and four hundred and forty-eight works. Embracing, as it does, the names of Beethoven, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Spohr, and Weber, few will be disposed to cavil at the enormous total—more than half the "catalogue." If there were "communists" in the musical world, they might clamor for a more equal distribution. Our present object being simply to record the work done, we reserve further comment till our examination is completed. We might, and do, wonder at the omission of names by no means unfamiliar to the student; we might, on the other hand, have included at least, two English names as belonging to this epoch, but we prefer keeping the "little flock" of native composers for separate notice.—London Musical Standard.

A faithful friend and a devoted comrade, knowing neither envy nor petty jealousy, Georges Bizet, whose generous heart was never found wanting, felt delighted at the success of his fellow-competitors of the day before and his rivals of the morrow. His elevated mind and delicate sentiments impelled him to encourage those less fortunate than himself, to console those whom Fortune had betrayed, and it was in perfect sincerity that he applauded the triumph of his competitors. I have under my eyes several letters dated from Rome, in which the young inmate of the Villa Medici speaks with frank enthusiasm of his comrades and fellow-students, Guiraud, Th. Dubois, Paladilhe, pupils, as he was, of our masters, Halévy and Thomas, and also of myself. These unreserved communications, penned without premeditation, with thorough open-heartedness and freedom from artistic and literary affectation, are, as it were, the reflex of his temperament, so vigorous and marked by such individuality. Side by side with sincere criticism, free from prejudice or disparagement, I find examples of warm enthusiasm and outbursts full of frankness. A few extracts will enable the reader to judge:—

"30th JANUARY, 1858.

"I reached Rome safely the day before yesterday and hasten to send you a little visiting card. I did not forget to think of you on the 17th; though far away, I drank your health and shared with all my heart in your family rejoicings. . . . I was highly delighted when informed of the great success of Le Médecin Malgré Lui. Have you heard it? I fear your health has not allowed you to do so. As for myself, I have had a splendid journey; I have seen Lyons, Vienna, Valencia, Orange, Avignon, Nîmes, Arles, Marseilles, Toulon, Nice, Genoa, Pisa, Lucca, Pistoia, Florence, Perugia, Terni, etc. As you perceive, I have lost no time. I will soon forward you particulars of the life we lead at the Academy of France in Rome. . . ."

"11th JANUARY, 1859.

" . . . Though I am actually absent, my heart will be all with you. I wish you, my dear master, as much success this year as last. . . . This, I think, is about the most affectionate thing which can be wished for you and consequently for myself. With you, a pupil learns more than the piano; he becomes a musician. The further I get, the more plainly do I perceive the large part which belongs to you of the little I know. Your manner of teaching suggests to me a very great deal, which I will develop at length on my return. Just as you make students who are not first-rate play Haydn's earlier sonatas, might we not employ for sol-fa, the easy works of the great masters instead of the A, B, C, of M. X . . . whom I like very much—and whom I should be deeply grieved to see at the Institute? I am at this moment giving a short course of musical instruction to a painter and a sculptor in the Academy. I make them sol-fa fragments from Don Juan, Le Nozze, etc. I can assure you they do not complain. Had I the courage to undertake anything educational, I would try and turn this idea to some account; but I am not strong enough, and I am too egotistical. This is not a piece of pleasantry or a paradox; I confess it with shame. I have not much to tell you concerning myself. I indulge in long and delicious draughts of the delights of Rome, which at present are superior to those of Capua. What a life! And to think that in two years it will be ended! This grieves me; but I shall come back here, that I swear; perhaps we will come back together. . . . I am working very hard now. I am finishing a buffo Italian opera, with which I am not too dissatisfied, and I hope the Academy will think my style exhibits progress. With Italian words, one must do the Italian; I have not attempted to escape this influence. I have made every effort to be intelligible and distinguished; let us hope I have succeeded. I shall send for the second year an opera of Victor Hugo's, Emeralda, and for the third a Symphony. I do not avoid difficulties; I want to test my strength while the public are not concerned in the matter. I will not disguise from you the fact that I expect to be exposed to a great many annoyances on returning to Paris. The 'Prix de Rome' are not spoilt, but I have a little will of my own which will overcome a great many obstacles, and it is on that I rely. Faust will soon be given. Tell me what you think and ce qui est. It will be a master-piece, that is certain. Will it be a success? "

"3d AUGUST, 1860.

"It is an infinitely long time since I had a talk with you. I should be very angry with myself were this the result of forgetfulness or indifference; it is only idleness at the worst. To begin with, I worked very hard to finish what I had to send, Don Procopio, a two-act buffo opera. Then I have been travelling and had a splendid trip to the mountains. What a country, my dear master, and what travelling companions! At Astura, Cicero; at Cape Circe, Homer and his Ulysses; at Terracina, Fra Diavolo. . . . This is thoroughly Scriblish, and when I think that from Homer to M. Scribe there are only three leagues, I feel amused. I start to-morrow for Naples, and I shall go and spend a few hours with Tiberius and Nero. This is a step in the wrong direction, you will remark, but Virgil and Horace will console me for the tyrants. I am busy on the work I have to send. It is a grand Symphony on Camoëns' Lusiade. I have just despatched my scene-plot to a friend. If he can put it into verse, I shall feel encouraged in my design. But let me speak a little about you. . . . I must congratulate you on your success at the Institute, for I know better than any one else how largely you contribute to the education of those who are lucky enough to pass through your hands. I am delighted at Guiraud's getting the prize; he is a real musician; I hope he will console me a little for the small sympathy existing between poor X. . . . and myself. I am really not very fortunate with my musical comrades. Dubois, also, has had a good year, for he carried off the organ-prize, did not he? Paladilhe must be enchanted. . . . Jules Cohen likewise has achieved a fine success at the Théâtre Français. . . ."

"17th JANUARY, 1880.

" . . . It is with regret that I see the end of my stay in Italy approaching. Shall I have made during the three years sufficient progress to take the place I wish to occupy in musical art? That is something which I dare not yet hope. . . . I wanted a long time ago to write a symphony on Camoëns' Lusiade; I made a plan of the work and then I had to find a poet. I put my hand on a certain D. . . . a Frenchman, very learned but destitute of taste. I am obliged to re-write a portion of his poetry, which is not an amusing process, especially as I perceive with terror that my lines are infinitely superior to his. . . . I am expecting Guiraud from day to day. I shall experience all the more pleasure in seeing him, because I have not spoken to an intelligent musician for two years. My colleague X. . . . is pretentious and wearying. . . . Our musical conversations always end by irritating me. He talks to me about Donizetti and Fesca, and I answer Mozart, Mendelssohn, Gounod. . . ."

"26th July, 1880.

"So then I am at length about to leave Rome. When shall I see it again? It is the true home of artists. . . . The class is distinguishing itself and among your boys are some of the right stuff for 'Prix de Rome,' such as Fissot, Diemer, Lavignac, etc. I was sorry to hear of poor Goria's death. . . . What is there new in musical Paris? There are no master-pieces, are there? Revivals, and what revivals? Ridiculous old vaudevilles adapted to music still more ridiculous. I have a horror of the little 'musicket' of Monsigny, Philidor, Nicolo, and Co.; to the deuce with all the people, who saw in our sublime art merely an innocent amusement for the ear. Stupidity will always find numerous worshippers; I do not complain, however, and I assure you I should experience great pleasure at being appreciated by none save persons of pure intelligence. I do not care much for the popularity to which men now-a-days sacrifice honor, genius and fortune. . . ."

On becoming a composer, and one of our most highly endowed masters of dramatic and symphonic art, Georges Bizet continued to be a skilful virtuoso, an intrepid reader, and a model accompanist. His execution, always firm and brilliant, had acquired an amplitude of sonorousness, a variety of expression and gradations which imparted to it an inimitable charm when he performed his orchestral transcriptions and especially his vocal pieces, L'Ecole du chanteur italien; allemand, et français, a collection of one hundred and fifty specimens, transcribed for the piano and constituting an admirable preface to Thalberg's work, L'Art du chant appliqué au piano. Bizet excelled in the art of modulating sound and of rendering it fluid under the pressure, delicate or intense, of his fingers. Like a consummate virtuoso as he was, he possessed the secret of causing the melody to stand well out in the light while leaving it the envelope of a transparent harmony, the undulated or cadenced rhythm of which was identified with the recitative portion. The auditor submitted unresistingly to the seduction of the performer's suave and persuasive touch, similar to the — so to say — magnetic charm of Gounod, when he sings his adorable melodies, and for the voice substitutes a genuine echo of the soul.

Among the works written especially for the piano by the author of Carmen we may mention his Chants du Rhin, six characteristic Lieder which may unhesitatingly compare with the collection of Songs without Words, by Mendelssohn. Bizet was also most nearly related, as regards form, to Robert Schumann. His Chasse fantastique, dedicated to me, is characterized by the chivalric and diabolical accents of the old legends. It is an imaginative piece, exceedingly interesting in its details and finish—an epic ride through the world of spirits. The Thème varié in the chromatic style, dedicated to Stephen Heller, is a composition written with a master's hand. It is impossible to carry imagination and ingenuity to a higher pitch. Some of the variations are exquisitely charming and elegant. The self-imposed necessity of adhering to the chromatic style is productive, however, of a few dissonances; but these shadows bring out all the more strongly the real beauties of the picture. We must mention, furthermore, some delicious little infantine pieces for four hands, and the Scherzo of Saint-Saëns' Concerto in G-minor, transcribed with very great skill as a pianoforte solo. The beautiful scores, too, of Mignon and Hamlet found in the future poet of Carmen a conscientious translator, full of tact and delicacy. It is not our purpose to give a complete catalogue of the varied labors of the young master who has been snatched from our admiration, and we will content ourselves with naming his fine collection of melodies, so full of such charming individuality, of such delicate and penetrating emotion. Among so many rare gems, we will point to L'Hôtesse Arabe, which Mme. Bataille interprets like a great artist—a masterpiece of sentiment which she completes by putting into it the sorrowful accent of regret and of tenderness inseparable from the exquisite melody. The orchestral pieces and the choruses written for L'Arlesienne were highly appreciated by amateurs of taste and the dilettante portion of the public. The thoroughly picturesque local coloring, the true and expressive sentiment of the symphonic pieces interpolated in Alphonse Daudet's moving melodrama were praised without restriction by the musical critics, happy to encourage the young master's novel tendencies. Carmen was the brilliant consecration of the transformation of Bizet's style, and his most splendid day's march on the ascending road to the ideal of which we had caught glimpses in his former works. The composer had at length effected an alliance between ingenious, brilliant orchestration and vocal melody of light and elegant outline. The equilibrium of the harmonic edifice, without being disturbed, assigned to the symphony a more than usually large space; the more than ordinary vigorous coloring of the accompaniments or symphonic fragments corresponded with the inspired flights of the musical poet, without being injurious to the full and reassuring affirmation of his return to the healthy traditions of dramatic art.

Carmen, no matter at what point of view we place ourselves to judge it, is a work of high value. The inspiration in it is sustained; the warm melody, full of color, is distinguished by expressive sentiment thoroughly suited to the stage; the different numbers, perfectly proportioned, well arranged and well conceived, belong without exception, by the originality of the ideas and the way in which those ideas are set in a light at once expressive and limpid, to that normal and rational art which is accepted by all, and to which we owe so much strong emotion as well as so much sweet and pure enjoyment. Apart from its incontestable melodic value, the music of Carmen is scored with really surprising ingenuity. It is no longer the work of a musician of the future, rich in hope, but a lasting monument constructed by a musician sure of his effects, master of himself, and expressing his thought with the certainty of saying what he thinks in the form he has chosen. Two symphonic fragments and an overture, Patrie, were performed with success at the Concerts Populaires conducted by Pasdeloup. These instrumental pieces exhibited the composer's talent in a special light. The symphony, broadly treated and written with the firm hand and style of a master, exhibited the science of a consummate musician, possessing the most secret resources of his art. As for Patrie, it is a noble specimen of inspiration, vigorous, full of color, and vibrating with emotion. Among the vocal and instrumental pieces written for L'Arlesienne, many also figured in the programmes of the Pasdeloup Concerts. The orchestral Minuet was transcribed, with great fidelity of details and effects, by Delaborde, who, like Guiraud, was one of the composer's intimate friends during the later years of his life.

Georges Bizet, by virtue of his laborious life, so courageously employed, may be held up as a model for young composers, too yielding either to premature discouragement or to the more dangerous seductions of early success. He devoted his whole existence to searching for new forms, taking, at the same time, religious care not to stray from those grand principles without which, art is no longer aught save phantasy. Being a man of progressive mind, he underwent the reaction of the numerous transformations and evolutions which affect the domain of music. He never lost his interest in the novel tendencies of the German school towards a special expression of dramatic sentiment; the descriptive, picturesque, philosophical, realistic, and other designs of the Wagnerian group, did not leave him indifferent, but he knew how to make an intelligent selection, as they say in the vocabulary of the other side of the Channel. He was sometimes beguiled, but never assimilated.

And no one was less calculated to undergo the exclusive influence of an absolute system. Bizet, on the contrary, represented the French school, so profoundly jealous of its characteristic qualities, and too personal to allow itself to be taken in tow by new prophets. He was a "clairvoyant" in all the force of the term. His straightforward natural good sense, his sound judgment, prevented him from going astray after subtle differences. Sometimes finical, he had on the other hand a horror of what was obscure; his distinguished harmonies go as far as labored refinement without falling into affectation. Even the paradoxes with which he enameled current conversation, the way in which he was pleased to parody certain airs by Méhul or Boieldieu, ornamenting their melodies with old-fashioned embroidery work and repetitions, was only an exaggeration of his "musical straightforwardness;" but his passionate admiration for the flights of Verdi or the sublime inspirations of Rossini was equalled only by his enthusiasm for the really fine pages of Wagner or Schumann. He was a man of eclectic temperament, just mind, indefatigable imagination, and an open soul, endowed with a rare facility of assimilation; no contemporary artist knew less of the petty prejudices of the school, and, had death not come to interrupt him in his work, no one would have been worthier to take a well-marked place in the sublime and glorious land illuminated by the fraternal equality of genius.

A. MARMONTEL.

GERMANY. Adalbert von Goldschmidt, whose oratorio, "The Seven Cardinal Sins," had drawn the attention of German connoisseurs to the young composer some time ago, has just published the textbook of a musical drama entitled "Helianthus," which is said fully to confirm the high opinion formed from the preceding work of the author's exceptional poetical qualifications.

—A fresh contribution to the already most voluminous Wagner literature has been added by that able and indefatigable exponent of the poet-composer's music-dramas, Hans von Wolzogen, editor also of the famous "Bayreuther Blätter." The new pamphlet is entitled "Tristan und Isolde, ein Leitfadens durch Sage, Dichtung und Musik."

—A commemorative tablet has been placed in the building of the elementary school at Hainburg, in Austria, where, during the years 1737 and 1740, Joseph Haydn had been a pupil, receiving there also his first musical instruction. Numerous vocal societies from Vienna and the vicinity of Hainburg assisted in the interesting ceremony.

TURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1880.

THE ORCHESTRA QUESTION.

WE sympathized so fully with the main thought and purpose of the article in our last number by our friend and frequent contributor "W. F. A.", (who kindly undertook the task of writing us a "leader" during our short vacation in the country), that we preferred to print it as it was, reserving the few and perhaps not very essential qualifications that occurred to us. We agree with him of course (for "we ourselves have said it" many times) as to the absolute importance of having a complete established orchestra in Boston. But we have too much faith in the essential power of music, and in the genuine love and appreciation for the great symphonies which has for forty years existed in this community, to share the gloomy apprehension that "without a standard orchestra we shall die out of the musical world." We shall always manage to get our feasts of Beethoven, Mozart, and the rest, as for forty years we have done thus far, even should we have to rely upon the most make-shift orchestras. The main thing, after all, is the love of the best music—that is the master compositions, the truest inspirations of musical genius—and the provision of sufficient opportunities of hearing them at least decently well performed. Somehow we have always managed to get at the heart of the matter, even through performances open to criticism on the score of technical precision and fine finish. For it must be remembered that there was a time in the musical history of Boston, twenty or thirty years before we ever heard anything that could in any sense be called a model orchestra, when season after season more of the classical works were heard here, and more keenly enjoyed, more deeply felt, and talked about with more enthusiasm, than hardly any music which is heard here now. Because then the appetite was fresh and healthful; it had not been spoiled by incongruous medleys of things highly spiced and indigestible; the musical stomach was not overloaded, and dyspeptic symptoms had not supervened. Sure of good meat (good programmes) we were less fastidious about the style in which it was served. We gave ourselves up in simple good faith to what we had a right to believe to be intrinsically good, and that faith was rewarded by the revelation of a new world of wonder and of beauty. We listened in an accepting and not in a critical spirit; we cared more for the matter than the manner. Cannot an open and susceptible young mind find out Shakespeare for himself in the most soiled and badly-printed cheap edition, without waiting for the fine type and paper, and the sumptuous binding of our modern books? Did we not feel and love the Fifth Symphony quite as much as any body feels and loves it now, in those old days of the Odeon (Federal Street theatre) when we first made acquaintance with it through an orchestra which perhaps would hardly be tolerated to-day?

We say this only in qualification of the gloomy hint of "dying out." Of course we desire as much as any one that Boston should have its own local orchestra, permanent, in constant practice, always in readiness for all worthy musical tasks, under the control of some respectable body or bodies of enlightened and disinterested friends of music, and kept most religiously out of the hands of speculators, advertising agencies and "bureaux."

We want it, and we have great faith that it can be had. But our young friend must consider that such a thing, as a local institution, does not exist, and never has existed yet in any city of America. Mr. Thomas's admirable orchestra is in no sense a local institution any more than are the travelling opera troupes of the Maplesons and Umanns; moreover it is not permanent, it is continually changing, and its whole principle of unity and continuity resides in the individuality of Mr. Thomas. Boston, therefore, is not worse off than other cities, except in so far as it is less populous and has not the crowd of musical immigrants to draw from that New York has.

With our collaborateur we are fully of the opinion (we have often expressed it here) that it is not at all unreasonable to expect public-spirited rich men of Boston, sooner or later, to do here for an orchestra what they have so readily and generously done for the Art Museum, for Harvard College, and for all the higher agencies of culture and enlightenment. It seems as if in the very nature of things some such special providence must speedily appear. And we agree with him in feeling that the Harvard Musical Association, having for so many years taken the initiative, and having in the tone and character of its membership so good a guaranty of disinterestedness and of a high ideal in its endeavors to promote the art of music among us, might very fitly, and without too much modesty, make a direct appeal to wealthy friends of music, or of culture generally, to aid it in building up that permanent, efficient orchestra, which is now felt to be so essential to the musical character and progress of our city.

At the same time we cannot admit that the Harvard Musical Association, in its Symphony Concerts, "began at the wrong end." It began at the only end that could be taken hold of. There was no real orchestra existing; but there was a strong desire to hear the symphonies, and there were musicians enough in town to make up a fair orchestra for their interpretation. Was it not well to make the most of the small means we had, knowing that what deep genuine love of such music there was in Boston had sprung from the even poorer opportunities of an earlier day, and believing that by keeping the sacred flame alive, even in a small way, the desire would increase and extend itself through larger audiences, and the means for its gratification would in time come also? Nor do we quite see what is meant when the Symphony Concerts are spoken of as "hovering in mid air," as "resting on nothing solid." Is not a banding together of lovers and workers for good music something solid, or might it not make itself so? Are not good programmes something solid? Indeed we think them of prior consequence, if there must be priority, to very "advanced" conditions of performance. And we still believe that "we want concerts of good music" more than we want an orchestra per se. The end is surely greater than the means, the use than the machine.

Yet we could see how all our friend's remarks were capable of a construction not essentially in conflict with our own ideas, which we have here felt called on to express mainly from the fear that his ideas, as he expresses them, are open possibly to wrong constructions in the minds of others.

The whole orchestral question is now open; other solutions will of course be presented; and we trust the theme will be discussed until some tangible, concrete, "solid" plan shall be agreed upon as fit to be submitted in an earnest canvass for support.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS. One suggestion prompted by the great want expressed above, though tending only in a partial and subsidiary way to meet it, is that of an amateur orchestra which might co-operate with our amateur vocal clubs in the production of cantatas and other choral works composed for an orchestral accompaniment. The idea seems to correspond in certain features to the plan of Mr. Stanford (to which we referred a few weeks since) of local orchestras connected with church choirs in England. Mr. S. L. Thorndike, in his annual report as president of the Cecilia (which we hope soon to give in full) says:

Allow me here to offer the suggestion that an amateur orchestra would be a valuable and useful feature in the musical life of any city large and cultivated enough to furnish it. The suggestion is certainly not new. The experiment has often been tried, with varying success, but with sufficient success to warrant its repetition. There is no reason in the nature of things why success might not be as complete with an orchestral as with a vocal club. Admit all that can be said by way of doubt or disparagement; that fair playing implies a greater amount of musical capacity and training than fair singing; that the variety of skill required in an orchestra is tenfold that required in a chorus; that the time needed for private practice and for joint rehearsal by the orchestral player is double that needed by the member of a singing society. All these are matters of degree and detail. We are growing more musical year by year. Amateurs now vie with professionals. The time is coming, perhaps is close at hand, when it will be as easy to find five good amateur violins or 'celli as to find twenty good amateur tenor or bass singers. When that time arrives, a good amateur orchestra is possible. And when a good amateur orchestra shall exist in any city, the vocal clubs of that city will have a fresh encouragement and support. They will not need paid assistance, but will join hands with those who approach the sacred art with the same end as themselves, not as a livelihood, but as one of the delights and graces of a cultured life. Therefore I take this opportunity of saying that the Cecilia, the Apollo, and the Boylston, ought to promote the formation of any association who will lend aid with instruments to what they are trying to do with voices.

MR. CONSTANTIN STERNBERG, THE RUSSIAN PIANO VIRTUOSO.

[The line of wonderful pianists who come knocking at our doors from Europe, one after another, every year, seems to be endless. After all epithets of praise have been exhausted, over and over, new ones have to be invented. We hope the glowing first impressions of the enthusiastic friend, who writes us the following letter, will be measurably, if not absolutely confirmed when we all have a chance to hear.]

MY DEAR MR. DWIGHT:

It is not often that one is permitted to enjoy so rare a musical treat as I did this week. Having been somewhat exclusively privileged to hear, in private, the Russian piano virtuoso, Mr. Constantin Sternberg, last Thursday evening, the day following his arrival in this city from Germany, I hasten to communicate to you a few particulars of the highly artistic treat which was accorded me.

In the first place, I must conscientiously state that I had read highly laudatory criticisms of Mr. Sternberg's playing, published in several German and other European musical papers, but I was rather egotistically inclined to wait and judge for myself as to the pianist's artistic merit. But I have heard for myself, and am convinced that Mr. Sternberg is a great artist in the fullest sense of the word. Not only that, he is a true man, full of noble humanitarian principles, genial, and without a particle of affectation or pride. This I proved by an extended conversation with him. His soul and mind are richly stocked with a love of everything good and admirable in painting, poetry, sculpture, literature, as well as his predominant art of music. His knowledge of the multifarious art-works of the various nations of the world is surprisingly full. To my mind he is the ideal artist in music. He is not only a virtuoso, he is a deep-thinking and deep-feeling musician. Music in America cannot but largely benefit by his advent among us.

His touch on the piano, and his style of playing, are at once massive and sweet, grand and poetical. Were I to stop and compare his playing to that of Liszt or Rubinstein, I should immediately feel that it is Sternberg who is playing, and that with either of the three names comparisons would be odious, since each possesses his own strong individuality. Mr. Sternberg's virtuosity is superb, yet, it is all under the powerful control of his rich artistic gifts. His touch in soft passages and runs is pearly and delicate, full of poetical suggestions, and his force in loud, grand playing is highly impressive, and absolutely artistic. It is in this latter attribute that he differs favorably from many of the virtuosos of the day who lose their artistic instinct when they soar to the height—a mechanical and intellectual height, you well know—of their prodigious virtuosity. In all the multifarious phases of his playing there stands prominently out the mother-wit, the manly feeling, the noble sentiment, of the great artist.

His repertory is all-embracing; it includes, among all the old, a rich vein of new piano works by modern masters, of which he is the unique exponent. It is his musical mission to America to interpret, as he above all others can interpret, the rich piano literature of those more modern composers the artistic merit of whose works is destined to make them ultimately become classic. In the selection of these works, he has been guided by his own deep artistic instinct. In addition to this he is a noble exponent and admirer of the grand old classics in music. He is an original genius of the piano, who will ably place before us things which are not only absolutely new, but highly meritorious.

I picked up a copy of Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord" which was lying near the piano; "Ah!" said Mr. Sternberg to me, in an affectionate tone, looking at the Bach, "that is my daily bread." Whereupon he sat down at the piano and played several of the fugues in clear, noble style, giving a palpable individuality to each melody, and yet making each part sing with the other in artistic unity in such a unique manner that it made me feel that I was not listening to a mere virtuoso, but to a great artist. He played several of his own compositions, published in Germany. One, a quaint "Gavotte," which he called a "little piece," but which is an artistic gem, pure and original. His repertory includes several of Grieg's, Saint-Saëns's, and Scharwenka's works; a concerto of the latter master which is full of strength and beauty, and when under Mr. Sternberg's hands, in conjunction with orchestra, it will have an effect which might be given forth by a combination of two orchestras.

Of Russian music Sternberg is indeed a rare interpreter. He fosters a loving admiration for the folk-songs of his nation. He played one or two highly difficult transcriptions of the songs of the people, which are master-pieces of musical composition. "The songs of the people," he remarked, "come from the heart, not the head, and they are never-dying." Sternberg's masterly interpretation of them will certainly live in the hearts of true musical people the world over. He will make his debut in America at the Academy of Music, in this city, on the 7th of October, in association with Mr. Carlberg's orchestra. Mr. Carlberg's experience in the interpretation of Russian music will doubtless make his orchestra a valuable supplement to Mr. Sternberg's playing. Altogether there seems to be no doubt of the success of Manager C. C. Colby's enterprise in securing so truly great an artist as Mr. Sternberg for one hundred concerts in America.

Personally, Mr. Sternberg is about the medium height, well-built, has a massive Beethovenish head, strongly-marked features, evidencing well-developed character. He is twenty-six years of age, and is possessed of a knowledge of men and things far in advance of his years. He spoke of his acquaintance in Germany with two of your Boston musicians, Mr. Ernst Perabo and Mr. Carlyle Petersilea, and presumed upon their welfare in your city. I may state that just before he sailed for this country, Mr. Sternberg was offered the directorship of the great Russian Conservatory of Music.

Always with best wishes, sincerely yours,

GEORGE T. BULLING.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEWPORT, R. I., SEPT. 13.—Lovers of music in Newport have within a few days enjoyed a rare treat in three Schubert Song Recitals, given by Mr. Jules Jordan, of Providence, R. I., with the assistance of Mr. Wulf Fries, 'cello, of Boston, and Mr. James H. Wilson, of New York, pianist and accompanist. The recitals were the musical event of the season. They were given in the beautiful new theatre of the Casino, on Thursday, Tuesday and Thursday, Sept. 2, 7, and 9, at noon, to audiences fair in numbers, but very critical and appreciative.

Mr. Jordan will be remembered in connection with the concerts of the Boylston Club of your city, in which he has often appeared. Last season he took the part of Faust in the master-piece of Berlioz, as given by the Oratorio Society of New York under the direction of Dr. Leopold Damrosch. In this work he appeared six times, winning high commendation for his rendering of the music of the part.

These recitals were first given near the close of last season in Providence. At each one the interest deepened and the attendance increased. The songs given were the three sets known as "The Pretty Maid of the Mill," "The Winter Journey," and the "Swan Songs." These Mr. Jordan has arranged in a sort of story, giving one set at each recital. At the third recital, as the "Swan Songs" are fewer in number than the other two sets, he gave in addition miscellaneous songs from Schubert, Schumann, Rubinstein, Jensen, Liszt, Franz, etc., with a view of illustrating the development of German song. This was a happy and very appropriate idea, as the "Swan Songs" were written by Schubert only a short time before his death, whence their title, and really formed "the beginning of a new era in German song." This new era found its full development in Schumann and Robert Franz, and has been still further illustrated in the compositions of those authors whose names are mentioned above.

Mr. Jordan's renderings, considering the great variety and difficulty of the songs, some of which are not quite in the best range for his voice, were superb. He had studied them with great care, and had entered very completely into their spirit and meaning, so that he was able to convey their many-sided moods to his audience with remarkable success. The audience showed their appreciation of his rendering by frequent and hearty applause.

Mr. Wulf Fries gave us some very fine 'cello playing, delightful to listen to, and satisfying in every way. His selections were especially appropriate. All were very choice morceaux and beautifully rendered.

Mr. Wilson furnished a discriminating and sympathetic accompaniment, which received its full share of appreciation.

The recitals were in every way a splendid success, and Mr. Jordan has every reason to congratulate himself on his effort. Surely it cannot fail of awakening in many who were present a higher appreciation and a deeper love for those wonderful songs and, through them, for all music of this noble character.

As Mr. Jordan contemplates giving these recitals in Boston and New York during the coming season, I will not attempt at this time any elaborate and detailed criticism of them. We are sure that the mere prospect of such an opportunity to become acquainted with these gems of song will of itself awaken a lively interest in the subject, among all musical people. A. G. L.

CHICAGO, SEPT. 18.—Your correspondent has been silent some time, for musical matters were at a point of rest, and "every body" was out of town, including the writer. But again there is new life in our musical circles, and there is a general awakening on all sides. Plans for the near future are being developed by our musical societies, and our season bids fair to be a brilliant one. There has been a great improvement in the taste of our musical public in the past few years, and managers have found out by experience, that in order to obtain paying houses they must furnish entertainments worthy of support. The weak point in last season was our want of symphony concerts; for during the entire winter only one orchestral work of any importance was played. We have a goodly number of musicians, with whom the formation of a fair orchestra would be possible; but unfortunately, no plan of organization has yet been made by which a result can be obtained. Your correspondent has endeavored, by means of his humble influence, and with his pen, to bring about some plan of organization, that our city might be blessed with an orchestra worthy of the name; but up to the present hour the endeavor has been fruitless. We are to have, so I am informed, a visit from an orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Theodore Thomas, some time during the winter. It will be delightful, after such a long time of waiting, to hear a symphony well given; and there is no doubt but that Mr. Thomas will be received with enthusiasm when he comes. Yet the question of a home orchestra remains unsettled, and our need cannot be supplied by any foreign band that visits us simply to make money. Real development in art is only possible when it rests upon sure and lasting foundations. A city should endeavor to support whatever adds to its reputation as a cultivated place; and it is only when an art atmosphere has been created, that real refinement in taste is universally possible. Thus I look for our best helps towards musical development to come from within the circle of our city. Home talent is always our own, and is ever active in usefulness.

Our vocal societies are hard at work, and we are promised a number of fine things. The Beethoven Society will honor the birthday of the composer, whose name they bear, by giving a concert, in which some representative compositions will be performed. Our Apollo club has also a fine plan before it. The culmination of the season is to be a large Festival, which will take place some time in the spring. Among the productions of the summer, was the publication of a book by Mr. W. S. B. Mathews, entitled "How to Understand Music." The writer has given us a book that will be useful to a large number of thinking teachers, and also instructive to those who are interested in music as an art. Our teachers should give more reflection to their art, and view it from its grand stand-point, that of its meaning. Intellectual teachers are an honor to the art; and the day is past when the superficial in any profession can command either respect or support. Thus one views every indication of thoughtful observation and reflective study, on the part of any earnest teacher, as so much accomplished for the art. In this connection it pleases me to mention that Mr. A. W. Dohn of our city has placed in English dress the interesting work on "The Art of Singing" by Prof. Ferd. Sieber.

The study of the voice is one that lies at the foundation of the musical art, and as such, it becomes a matter of much moment, and every new thought on the subject is of importance.

Among the new arrivals of the summer comes Mr. Boscovitz, the pianist, who intends to locate here. I have not heard him play as yet, but I understand he will give a public recital next week. As the season advances I shall take pleasure in sending my notes to the JOURNAL and endeavor faithfully to transmit word-echoes of our music to the East,—for in art our interests are common.

MUSIC ABROAD.

BERGEN, NORWAY. The Norwegians have celebrated Ole Bull's death and funeral with great solemnity. Some of the newspapers, including "Bergensposten," went into mourning, and most of them brought out elaborate eulogies and anecdotes. B. Björnson left Gansdal, and Edward Grieg, the composer, arrived from Hardanger to attend the funeral, which took place at Bergen. The funeral was arranged on an elaborate scale, officers of all kinds appearing in full uniform, civilians in black, with white neckties. On the 23d of August, the day preceding the funeral, a special performance took place in the Bergen theatre, one of the actors pronouncing a poem beginning: "Crown his grave, the haven of rest." Then came Nordquist's funeral march and the play of "Michel Perrin," all before a full house. On the 24th, the day of the funeral, the steamer "Kong Sverre" took a distinguished company of ladies and gentlemen to Ole Bull's villa, where breakfast was served. The company then entered the concert-room where the coffin stood. E. Grieg played on the organ, a singing society sang an air, and several addresses were made. The coffin was then taken on board. In the city, a procession was formed, led by the Norwegian flag, a band of music and singers. Sixteen young ladies, with the trophies of Ole Bull, preceded the funeral wagon which was drawn by four horses. The latter was followed by Consul John Grieg, who was marshal of the day, and Edward Grieg, who bore the golden wreath given to Ole Bull in San Francisco. All the corporations of the city took part in the procession, the band played Chopin's funeral march, all the church-bells were rung, and nearly ten thousand persons are supposed to have witnessed the grand pageant. The drug store of the Swan, Bull's birthplace, was specially decorated, and in front of it the procession stopped, the singers rendering a selection. At the cemetery the Reverend Mr. Walnum made a solemn address in front of the grave, and was followed by Björnson, E. Grieg and Bendixen. Between the addresses there was singing or instrumental music, and finally the grave was filled while the choral "Who knows how near I am my end" was sung. Ole Bull's orders, diamonds and presents have been given to the Bergen museum. One account of the wide-spread mourning at his burial says: "At the grave the poet Bjarnstjern Björnson spoke, and in the whole country there was hardly a village in which the day was not solemnized in some way. For Ole Bull was something more than a virtuoso; he was a character in the history of Norway, a power in the national life of the country. . . Patriotism was his great passion. All the honors he earned in the world he sent conscientiously home. He forgave people when they said that he could not play the violin; but he never forgave them when they doubted that Norway had the stuff within herself to become a great country. His patriotism was fanatical, and his fanaticism often gave rise to very queer freaks. But his countrymen, who reaped the benefits of all he did and all he said, understood him, and the country in mourning at his burial is a simple and natural expression of gratitude."

LEIPZIG. Ernst Ferdinand Wenzel, one of the oldest and most highly esteemed professors at the Leipzig Conservatorium, died on the 16th ult., at the age of seventy-two. He had been the intimate friend and fellow-student, under F. Wieck, of Robert Schumann, and a contributor to the music journal founded by the latter. Soon after the establishment of the Leipzig Conservatorium in 1843, under the direction of Mendelssohn, Wenzel obtained the professorship of piano-forte-playing at the new institution, which post he filled with great ability to within a few months of his death.

—A complete edition, in five volumes, of the literary writings of Franz Liszt is just now being published by the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel.

—A medallion portrait of Robert Schumann, which had recently been secretly removed from the memorial erected to the composer at Leipzig, has been found in the possession of a young student of the University, whose admiration for the master has doubtless prompted him to commit this crazy act of vandalism.

DUESSELDORF. Under the title of "Festive performances of works by Düsseldorf Music-directors, from Mendelssohn to the present time," a musical festival was held at the Rhenish town just named, under the direction of Julius Tausch and Ferdinand Hiller. The performances were given on the 8th and 9th ult., being intended as a contribution to the Exhibition of Art and Industry recently held at Düsseldorf. From an artistic point of view the festival is said to have proved highly satisfactory, whereas, financially, the result has been a deficit of some 6,000 marks. Among the solo performances, Herr Leopold Auer's violin-playing created much enthusiasm. The programme of the two days included:

Symphony, D-minor (Schumann); Oratorio, "St. Paul" (Mendelssohn); Overture, "Dionys" (Burgmüller); "Dein Leben schied" from Byron's Hebrew Melodies, for male chorus and orchestra (Julius Tausch); Violin Concerto (Mendelssohn); "Wall-fahrtstied," for mixed chorus and orchestra (F. Hiller); Frühlingsnacht, for four solo voices and orchestra (F. Hiller); Symphony, C-major, MS. (F. Hiller); "Festouvertüre" (Julius Rietz); Ave Maria, for alto voice with organ (Julius Tausch); "Abendlied," for violin (Schumann); Scenes from "Faust," Part III. (Schumann).

—The Royal Opera of Berlin resumed its performances on the 24th ult., with Beethoven's "Fidelio." The Imperial opera of Vienna reopened its doors on the 15th ult., with the same classical master-piece. Schubert's little-known opera "Alfonso and Estrella" will be the first novelty to be introduced by the latter establishment during the season just inaugurated.

GLOUCESTER, ENGLAND. The Festival began on Tuesday, Sept. 7, with a morning service and a sermon by the Dean of Worcester. These "Three Choir Festivals" are supposed to date from 1724, although the annual meetings really began some years earlier. At first the united choirs very sensibly gave their concerts for the benefit of the sick and infirm members among their own body, but in 1724 the clergy took the matter in hand, and the subscriptions 'now go to widows and orphans of the benefited clergy within the three dioceses. Widows get £20 and orphans £15 a year. This, be it said, does not arise from the "profits" of the Festival, which, under many years of somewhat inefficient management, form an inappreciable sum. Indeed, until the absurdity be recognized of permitting the cathedral organist to air his ability in triennial conducting, and until far more adequate performances are given, the receipts bid fair to do little more than cover the bare expenses. This year the programme has been better selected than heretofore, and three novelties (Mr. Parry's "Prometheus," Mr. Henry Holmes's "Christmas," and Mr. Lloyd's Service) will be brought forward. The Festival opened on Tuesday morning with Eljah, and in the evening a miscellaneous programme, including Mozart's E-flat symphony and Mr. Parry's novelty, was given in the Shire Hall. On Wednesday morning, September 8, Mozart's Requiem, Schubert's unfinished symphony in B-minor, and Spohr's Last Judgment, were given, and in the evening St. Paul was performed. On September 9, the service was to be that of Mr. Lloyd in E-flat, with Ouseley's anthem, "Great is the Lord," and the programme of the performance was to include Leonardo Leo's "Dixit Dominus" in C, Palestrina's "Stabat Mater," Henry Holmes's "Christmas Day," and Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in D; the evening concert including Schumann's symphony in B-flat and Sterndale Bennett's Waldmynphe overture. On September 10, the morning service will include the "service" Tallis in D, Doric, and anthem, Gibbon's "Hosanna to the Son of David"; the morning performance will be of the Messiah, and the Festival will close in the evening with the air for strings from a suite in D of Bach by way of prelude, Tallis's music to the Responses, Evening Service in F, (newly composed by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, the cathedral organist), Mendelssohn's "Let all men praise the Lord," from the Lobgesang, and the "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's Mount of Olives. A new anthem by Dr. Stainer is expected.—Figaro.

LOCAL ITEMS.

The event of the present week was the Worcester Festival, which has passed off successfully, beginning on Monday afternoon and ending last evening with Judas Maccabæus. A summary of its eight concerts we shall make room for in our next.

BOSTON. The earliest concerts of importance for the coming season are the three announced by Mr. Peck, at the Music Hall, for Monday, Oct. 4, Friday, Oct. 8, and Saturday (matinée), Oct. 9. In each of these will appear Miss Annie Cary, Herr Wilhelmj, the great violinist (for the first time here in two years), and the phenomenal piano virtuoso, Rafael Joseffy. Wilhelmj will play: an Andante and Intermezzo (first time here) by Vogrich; Ernst's Otello Fantaisie; Bach's Chaconne (without accompaniment); the Andante and Finale of the Mendelssohn Concerto; a Fantaisie of his own and a Polonaise by F. Laub. Joseffy's selections include: the Andante Splanato and Polonaise by Chopin; the Sonata Appassionata of Beethoven; and many witching little things, such as a Prelude by Bach; Liszt's Campanella, Tarantella, etc.; Rubinstein's Etude on "false notes," aria from Pergolese; Spinning Song, Wedding March, etc., by Mendelssohn; a nocturne of Chopin; and a polka and waltzes of his own. Miss Cary's pieces are not yet selected. Once more the world of music will be felt about us.

—The rehearsals of the Handel and Haydn Society begin tomorrow evening at Bumstead Hall. The soloists engaged for the Messiah, at the opening of the new Tremont Temple, Oct. 11, are Miss Lillian Bailey, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. W. J. Winch, and Mr. M. W. Whitney. Eljah will be given in the same hall on the 13th.

NEW YORK. Boito's Mefistofele will be the leading attraction of the coming opera season. Strakosch will present it with Marie Roze as Margherita; Byron, the English tenor, as Faust, and George Conly as Mefistofele. Mr. Mapleson's cast will include Gerster as Margherita, with Campanini and Nanetti, the original representatives of Faust and Mefistofele.

—It is stated that Mr. Theodore Thomas has finally consented to permanently accept the directorship of the choral and orchestral department of the New York College of Music. Herr Rafael Joseffy has accepted the place of first professor of the piano. The board of management has decided to institute a system similar to that of the Paris Conservatory, by which six free scholarships will be maintained, open to competition by any young ladies of talent who may choose to apply for examination.

CHICAGO. The musical statistics of last season form a long list, which records quite a number of important events. Perhaps this activity is greatly due to the influence of the Hershey School, which numbers many excellent musicians among its professors, and includes in its course of instruction recitals by eminent soloists. We have already referred to several of these recitals given by Mrs. Wm. H. Sherwood and also to those of Mr. H. Clarence Eddy, who is one of the finest organists in the country, and, we believe, one of the principal teachers of the Hershey School. His recent programmes have included parts of Widor's second organ symphony, Bach's St. Ann Fugue, Thiele's Concertsatz in C-flat minor.

Mr. Harrison Wild, the organist of Union Church, gave an organ recital last week, playing Merkel's sonata in G-minor, and Thiele's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue.

Among other recitals we mention an afternoon of songs given by Professor James Gill. His programme included songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Rubinstein and Purcell; Bach's aria My heart ever faithful and Arcadelt's Ave Maria.

A review of the musical events in Chicago since June 1, 1879, gives the following list of one hundred and sixty-nine concerts, which may be classified as follows: Rivé-King troupe, four; Williams College Glee Club, one; Yale College Glee Club, one; Germania Männerchor, one; Exposition Building concerts, three; Sherwood recitals, three; Mendelssohn Quintette Club, three; Remenyi troupe, three; Beethoven Society, three, besides reunions; Liebling recitals, three, besides several pupils' recitals; Carlotta Patti troupe, four; Apollo Club, four; Joseffy recitals, four; Thursby troupe, including the Ole Bull concerts, six; Blind Tom (!) concerts, eight; Liesegang chamber concerts, eight; Musical College concerts, eight; Eddy organ recitals, eleven; Lewis chamber concerts, eleven; Hershey School concerts, including chamber concerts, pupils' matinées, and popular concerts, twenty-nine; miscellaneous, including church concerts, charity concerts, testimonial concerts, etc., forty-six. The most important works which have been performed at these concerts have been Hiller's Easter Morning, Hoffman's Cinderella, Bruch's Lay of the Bell, the Creation, the Messiah, Rossini's Stabat Mater, Rubinstein's Paradise Lost, Bruch's Frithjof and Gade's Erl King. Three new cantatas by amateur composers have also been performed: J. Maurice Hubbard's Fisherman's Grave, Philo Otis's One Hundred and Twenty-First Psalm, and J. A. West's Dornroschen.

There have been twenty-three seasons of opera as follows: Aimée troupe, Haverly's, August 20-24; Mahn's Fatinitza troupe, Hooley's, August 25-September 6; Haverly's Church troupe, September 15-20; Strakosch troupe, McVicker's, October 20-November 1; Haverly's Juvenile troupe, November 10-15; Maretzek troupe, McVicker's, November 18-23; Haverly's Juvenile troupe, second season, December 8-13; Emma Abbott troupe, December 15-20; Haverly's Church Choir troupe, second season, January 5-10; Mapleson troupe, Haverly's, January 12-24; Grand French opera troupe, Haverly's, February 2-28; D'Oyley Carte opera company, Haverly's, March 1-8; Oates troupe, Hooley's, March 8-13; same, Olympic, April 5-10; Amateur troupe, Haverly's, April 19-24; Peerless (!) Pinafore company, Music Hall, May 31-June 21; Bijou opera company, McVicker's, June 14-19; D'Oyley Carte opera company, second season, Haverly's, June 14-19; Nathaniel English opera company, Hooley's, June 14-19; Mahn's opera company, McVicker's, June 14-July 5; Daly's New York company, Haverly's. These troupes have given two hundred and twenty-five performances of opera, which may be classified as follows: Fatinitza, twenty-five; Girofle-Girofla, nine; Le Petit Duc, five; Les Brigands, two; La Jolie Parfumeuse, four; La Marjolaine, two; La Fille de Mme. Angot, three; Die Schoene Galathea (new), one; Der Liebes-Trank, one; Pinafore, sixty-nine; Trial by Jury, twelve; Trovatore, four; Faust, four; Mignon, six; Aida, five; Lucia, four; Traviata, one; Bohemian Girl, three; Martha, two; Norma, one; Rigoletto, two; Sleepy Hollow (new), nine; Paul and Virginia, two; Chimes of Normandy, four; Romeo and Juliet, two; Sonnambula, two; Linda, one; Daughter of the Regiment, one; Dinorah, one; Grand Duchess, four; La Perichole, one; La Belle Hélène, two; *Mme. FRANZ LISZT.

... Franz Liszt was born in the year of the comet, 1811, October 22, in the village of Raiding, near Oedenburg in Hungary. His father, Adam Liszt, the descendant of a noble family, which, however, had renounced its title of nobility in consequence of reduced circumstances, held there the position of accountant of Prince Esterhazy. Being a zealous friend of music, playing several instruments himself, he recognized the early manifestations of his child's endowment and, at his urgent entreaties, began instruction. Three years later little Franz had already with him in his sixth year, on the pianoforte. played in the concerts at Oedenburg and Presburg, winning the admiration of his hearers to such a degree, that several Hungarian magnates offered at once to bear the expenses of his education through a stipend of a thousand gulden for six years.

Father and son at once resorted to Vienna after the former had resigned his place, and the work of education was energetically pushed on under the direction of Czerny and Salieri in piano playing and in composition. On the 13th of April, 1823, the music-loving imperial city heard Franz Liszt for the first time. The extremely favorable result of this first concert, which won for the genial boy the high reward of the embrace of Beethoven, who did him the honor to be present, afforded him, in connection with a second concert, the means of completing his artist outfit in Paris. On his way there he appeared in Stuttgart and in Munich and was greeted as a "second Mozart." The coveted reception into the Paris Conservatoire was refused him, as a foreigner, by Cherubini, in spite of a brilliantly passed examination; but in Paër and Reicha he found active furtherers and guides of his youthful strivings. He was soon the fêted hero of the day, the favorite of the musical aristocracy, and the Parisian journals were enthusiastic in their praises of the phenomenal talent which "knew no longer any rival." As a composer, too, in which capacity he had already excited the attention of Salieri in Vienna, he now came forward publicly, and in the year 1825 brought out at the Académie Royale a one-act opera: "Don Sancho, or the Castle of Love," which was so well received that Nourrit, who represented the leading rôle, took up the young composer in his arms and bore him before the shouting public.

Journeys into the provinces, into England and Switzerland, brought him new triumphs.

[We translate from the article: "Franz Liszt, a Musical Character Portrait," by LA MARR, in the Gartenlaube.

Then suddenly his faithful, provident father died, and the youth of sixteen saw himself thrown upon his own resources. Speedily he summoned to himself, to Paris, his mother, to whom he cleaved with all the devotion of his heart until her end, and laid at her feet 100,000 francs, all that he had saved up thus far, as a welcome greeting; this made the evening of her life secure from care.

Religious scruples and internal conflicts, questions of political principles and party, philosophical and general studies, which latter won for him the much admired universality of his intellectual culture, occupied him during the next years. Not only an artistic talent and development, but in combination with them a comprehensive culture of the mind and character are, according to his view, the conditions and supporters of the true artist life. He would have all virtuosity regarded "only as the means, and not the end." If virtuosity before him had run into not much more than mere finger facility, he appeared, according to the testimony of Dehn, the celebrated harmonist, as "the first who gave an inner meaning to the technique so remarkably developed through himself, the first who used it to a higher end." The high superiority of his art was evident at once, when, on the occasion of Thalberg's appearance in Paris, he entered into a competition with him and came off victorious. "Thalberg is the first, but Liszt the only," was the decision of the company, to which the critics were not slow to assent. And he has remained the Only to this day.

It was his principle as a director, that "the task of a capellmeister consists in making himself so far as possible superfluous and vanishing out of sight with his function so far as he can." So, too, in his activity as a teacher he left to each one's individuality the greatest freedom in development. He would have nothing to do with any pattern; complete individuality and independence were secured to every pupil to whom he unfolded the inestimable treasures of his experience in the technique of his art. If the individual, soulful magic of his playing cannot be transferred to any other, still his school, long since diffused over all parts of the world, cannot be lost. From it have proceeded the most famous names of the younger pianists, at their head Rubinstein, Hans Von Bülow, Von Bronsart, Tausig, Sophie Menter, Anna Mehlig, Ingeborg von Bronsart, Laura Rappoldi, to whom may be added a wider circle of capellmeisters and musicians, such as Joachim, Laub, Singer, Cossmann, Cornelius, and Lassen.

Before his competition with Thalberg, Liszt had lived for a long time in retirement at Geneva, induced by his friendly relation with the Countess d'Agoult (known by the nom de plume of Daniel Stern)—the mother of Richard Wagner's wife. Then he spent two full years (1837-39) studying and giving concerts in Italy. Brilliant successes in Vienna, too, established his artistic fame in Germany and formed the beginning of the virtuoso travels, which now led him from the North to the South, from the East to the West of Europe, through all countries and all music-loving cities. Fêted with enthusiasm everywhere, he received in Hungary and Germany especially, the greatest homage. Princes decorated him with titles and orders; the Austrian Emperor restored his nobility, and afterwards made him a member of the Imperial Council, with an honorary salary, and president of the Musical Academy of Pesth; cities raised him to the dignity of honorary citizenship; Pesth conferred on him the sword of honor, and the University of Königsberg the Doctorate. A tumult of enthusiasm followed his steps wherever he went. Then, suddenly—the world saw it with amazement—he stopped short in his victorious progress and, standing at the zenith of his fame, closed his career as virtuoso, to exchange it for the more thorny path of the composer.

Weary of triumph, longing for a home, a more concentrated sphere of labor, he allowed himself to be imprisoned in the little town of Weimar, where, yielding to the call of the Grand Duke to become capellmeister, he fixed his permanent abode in November, 1847. He settled down upon the "Altenburg" in company with the Princess Caroline Sayn-Wittgenstein, a lady of high intellectual importance, who had followed him from Russia, and with her he soon gathered about him a circle of choice spirits. Here he caused art to bloom afresh upon the old classic ground, and developed an activity which became of far-reaching significance for the whole musical life of the present time. As his appearance in the virtuoso character had been epoch-making, so was it also when he came forward as director, as teacher and as composer. There as here, in all directions of his activity, it was a bold, consciously powerful spirit of progress which spoke from his artistic achievements and opened new paths to Art. Together with a fostering care for classical works, he was, above all, interested in the furtherance of the rising musical generation. He was of incalculable service to Wagner, for whose operas, while no one thought of the exiled master and his art, he founded a home upon the Weimar stage; in this way, by his indomitable energy, he broke a pathway for them. No new musical manifestation of any sort of significance remained disregarded by him, and the matinées held every Sunday in his house exerted their attraction far and wide.

Progress—even though it "progress backwards"—is an essential condition of art; and we cannot suppose that any exception will be made to the general law in the present instance. This being the case, it may not perhaps, be altogether unprofitable to consider, as closely as circumstances will permit, the probable character of the future which lies before us, more especially with regard to the influence which Wagner's works and teachings are likely to exercise upon it.

We are not left wholly without such data

[From the article "OPERA," by W. S. ROCKSTRO, in Part XI. of Grove's Dictionary of Music.]

as may enable us to form an opinion on certain points connected with this very important subject; and, first, we may state our belief that it is simply impossible for such works as Der fliegende Holländer, or Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, to be forgotten, twenty years hence. It seems much more probable that they, and Tannhäuser and Lohengrin and perhaps also Tristan und Isolde, will be better understood, and more frequently performed, than they are at present. But what about the Tetralogy? Does there seem a reasonable hope that that, too, may live? The probable longevity of a work of art may be pretty accurately measured by the nobility of its conception. Die Zauberflöte is as young to-day, as it was on the evening when it first saw the light: Der Dorfbarbier is not. Now it is an universally received axiom, that, of two works of art, both equally true to Nature, that in which the greatest effect is produced by the least expenditure of means will prove to be the noblest. The greatest operas we have are placed upon the stage with wonderfully little expense. For the worthy representation of Fidelio, we need only some half-dozen principal singers, a chorus, an ordinary orchestra, and a couple of scenes such as the smallest provincial theatre could provide at a few hours' notice. For Der Freischütz, we only need, in addition to this, a few special "properties" and a pound or two of "red fire." But, in order that Der Ring des Nibelungen might be fitly represented, it was found necessary to build a new theatre; to construct an orchestra, upon principles hitherto untried, and to fill it with a matchless company of instrumentalists representing the most brilliant talent in Europe; to enrich the mise en scène with waves, clouds, mists, flames, vapors, a dragon—made in London, and sent to Bayreuth in charge of a special messenger—and other accessories which put the stabled horses and led elephants of "Berenice," and the singing-birds of "Rinaldo," to shame; and, regardless of expense, to press into the service of the new school all the aids that modern science could contribute or modern ingenuity invent. Surely this is a great sign of weakness. There must be something wanting in a drama which needs these gorgeous accompaniments to make it attractive; and it is difficult to believe that such a display will ever again be attempted, except under the immediate superintendence of the author of the piece. But, supposing the "tetralogy" should be banished from the stage, from sheer inability to fulfill the necessary conditions of its production, will the principles upon which it is composed be banished with it? Is it not possible that Wagner's teaching may live, even though some of the grandest of his own individual conceptions should be forgotten? Undoubtedly it will live, in so far as it is founded upon purely natural principles. We have already spoken of his intense reverence for dramatic truth. He cannot have taught us the necessity for this in vain. It is absolutely certain that, in this particular, he will leave a marked impression for good upon the coming generation. Whether or not he has carried his theories too far for successful practice is another question. His disciples say that he has not, and are so firmly convinced of the truth of their position that they will not even hear an argument to the contrary. Nevertheless, there are many, who, despite their unfeigned admiration for his undoubted talent, believe that the symmetrical forms he has so sternly banished might have been, and still may be, turned to good account, without any real hindrance to dramatic action; and many more there are who doubt whether the old Florentine ideal, re-inforced by all that modern improvement can do for it, can ever be made to take the place of that which Mozart so richly glorified, and from which even Beethoven and Weber only differed in individual treatment. The decision of these questions must be left for the future. At present, "Non piu andrai" and "Madamina" still hold their ground, and may possibly win the day, after all.

In close and not very encouraging connection with this subject, there still remains another question, which we would willingly have passed over in silence, had it been possible; but, having entered upon our inquiry, we must pursue it to the end. We may be sure that Wagner's most enthusiastic supporters will attempt to carry out his views very much further than he has carried them himself. Will they also think it desirable to imitate his style? It is to be hoped not. It would take a long day to tire us of Wagner—but we cannot take him at second-hand. "Wagnerism," nor gods nor men can tolerate. Yet there are signs of imitation already. Not only in the lower ranks—there, it is a matter of no consequence at all, one way or the other—but among men who have already made their mark and need no stepping-stones to public favor. Nor is it only at the opera—the place in which we should naturally have sought for its earliest manifestation—but even in instrumental music; one whose name we all revere, and from whom we confidently expect great things, has been betrayed into this imitation, in a marked degree, in the finale of one of his most important orchestral works. It is more than possible, that in this case, the plagiarism of manner—it does not, of course, extend to the notes—was the result of an unconscious mental process, not unnaturally produced by too keen an interest in the controversies of the day. But be the cause what it may, the fact remains; and it warns us of serious danger. Danger that the free course of art may be paralyzed by a soulless mannerism, worthy only of the meanest copyist. Danger, on the other hand, of a reaction, which will be all the more violent and unreasonable in proportion to the amount of provocation needed to excite it. Should the cry of the revolutionary party be for melody, it will not be for melody of that heavenly form which true genius alone can produce, but for the vulgar twang, with which we have long been threatened, and of which we have already endured far more than enough. Between these two perils, stagnation and reaction, which beset our path like "a ditch on one side, and a quagmire on the other," we shall, in all probability, come to some considerable amount of grief. Yet we must not lose heart on that account. Art is not now passing through her first dangerous crisis; and our history has been written in vain if we have not shown that her worst crises have always been succeeded by her brightest triumphs. There may be such a triumph in store for her, even now. Before the new period dawns, a leader may arise, strong enough to remove all difficulties from her path; a teacher, who, profiting by the experience of the last half century, may be able to point out some road, as yet untried, which all may follow in safety. Let those who are young enough to look forward to the twentieth century watch cheerfully for his appearance; and, meanwhile, let them prepare for the difficult work of the future, by earnest and unremitting study of the past.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

The "æsthetics of musical art" is not at first sight a very promising topic; it is certainly the most difficult in the whole range of philosophic art criticism, for the reason that music by its very essence defies explanation by words. Dr. Hand has done little to enliven the subject, less to solve its mystery. His treatise is a curious mixture of physical and metaphysical speculations, which proves what every one accepts, and leaves untouched what stands in need of proof. He even thinks it necessary to raise the question "whether the object of music consists in its being expressed or sung, or whether it exists simply to delight when listened to?" It would be as well to ask whether a mutton-chop becomes a mutton-chop only on being eaten and being found tender. It is equally superfluous to prove that music is exclusively an art of time and becomes perceptible through means of measured portions of time called rhythm. Aristoxenus was fully aware of that fact when he defined rhythm as the division of time into shorter and longer parts recurring at equal intervals and applied to certain movements performed in that time (τὸ πρὸς μὲτρον) that is, in music, to melody. Even with Dr. Hand's elaborate proof that music is meant to move the soul, not merely to tickle the ears, we would willingly dispense, although, perhaps there was more need for it in his time than there is at present. When his book appeared (in 1837) the philosophy of music was in its infancy, not to say non-existent. Amongst the Greek sages, Plato was the only one capable of regarding music in connection with the idea of the absolutely beautiful, and of separating it from its mathematical basis. To that basis it remained fettered in the books of philosophers for centuries to come, and even Leibnitz saw in music no more than an "exercitium arithmetice occultum nescientis se numerare animi." Hegel, in this as in other respects, displays that happy faculty of knowing nothing about everything to which he owed his reputation for omniscience. Historians called him the greatest physiologist, artists the finest critic of poetry, poets the most learned historian the world had ever seen. Only in his own special branch each thought him somewhat deficient. No wonder that Hegel, when he deigns to speak of the divine art, blunders sadly and goes so far as to assert that instrumental music is meaningless and incomprehensible. At a time when such a writer was accepted as the representative philosopher of the philosophic country par excellence, even Dr. Hand's treatise may not have been without a certain value. But it baffles conjecture to discover the motive of Mr. W. E. Lawson in translating such a work forty-three years after its first publication, unless it be the not uncommon prejudice that a very dull book must be a very learned book, especially if it happens to be written in German.

If Mr. Lawson had taken the trouble of inquiring into the subject, he might easily have found a worthier object of his reproductive zeal, and would not have committed himself to the statement "that since the publication of Dr. Hand's treatise but few works on the æsthetics of music have been given to the world." There is, on the contrary, a large choice of such works, ranging from a popular treatise to a profound philosophic disquisition. We may mention, for example, Dr. Hanslick's extremely well-known book, Vom Musikalisch Schönen, which has gone through many editions in the original, but has, as far as we are aware, never been translated into English. Dr. Hanslick, by many people considered the leading German critic of music, is essentially a "littérateur," and the grave manners of the philosopher are no more natural to him than they are to Mephistopheles in his interview with the student in Goethe's Faust. At the same time, he is thoroughly familiar with his subject. He has read about music, and perhaps even thought about it; and his book, moreover, is written in agreeable German, which M. Charles Beauquier has paraphrased in still more agreeable French. If Mr. Lawson had given us a readable translation of Hanslick he would have done useful and agreeable work. Or again, if his ambition had been of a higher order, he might have tackled the musical chapters in Schopenhauer. Schopenhauer is the only German metaphysician who has said anything worth listening to on the subject of music, and in whose system it plays an important part—more important, indeed, than all the other arts. It is true that in order fully to grasp his meaning one must be acquainted and to some extent in sympathy with his philosophy in general. But even those who refuse to contemplate music in its relation to the "Platonic ideas," in Schopenhauer's sense, cannot help being struck with the new light thrown by that philosopher on the art which, according to him, is, as it were, by one degree nearer to the sources of all life than poetry or painting or sculpture. For while all these have to borrow their ideas from the external objects of the world, music expresses the secret emotions of the soul by its own unaided efforts. It communes with the Spirit of the World, and the echoes of this converse are melody and harmony, saying nothing to the reasoning faculty and everything to the heart.

[Dr. Hanslick "has read about music, and perhaps even thought about it." Here we spy the cloven hoof of the Wagnerite, who quotes Hanslick as the burnt Vanini quoted the Saints.—DR. BLIDGE.]

THE CECILIA.

FOURTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT,
JUNE, 1880.

I have the honor, in accordance with your by-laws, to present the annual report of the progress and condition of the Cecilia for the fourth year of its independent existence, and the sixth year since its original foundation as a branch of the Harvard Musical Association, and to congratulate you upon another season of continued success.

The year has been so notable in musical work and enterprise in Boston that we can but be encouraged that our little club has held its own in the great flood of harmony, and has fully retained its interest with both active and associate members. The list of singers has been fuller than ever before. Indeed, the pressure for admission has been such that the number of active members has constantly exceeded the prescribed limit of one hundred and fifty. The balance of vocal parts has also been improved, and the regularity and punctuality of attendance have been better than in any previous year.

Our public performances have been given under conditions less favorable in one respect than heretofore. The destruction of Tremont Temple by fire obliged us to resort to the Music Hall. It cannot be denied that this room is too large to present the Club, and the music which it desires to sing, to the best advantage. We may admit this without being accused of detracting from the pride which all musical Bostonians feel in this admirable hall, and the regret which they would experience if it should be swept away by the inroad of trade. When its preservation was endangered, I considered it my duty to appear as your president in its behalf; but I was nevertheless conscious that its loss would be felt by you not as a society but as individuals, and I am sure that you will agree with me when I express the longing that I have had during the past season to return to a smaller room. To give a cantata of Bach, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Gade, or Bruch, with our present vocal force and a full orchestra, in a place no larger than that in which we sang four years ago, would certainly be an exquisite pleasure. But here comes the dreadful question of expense. We require the support of a larger number of associates than can be accommodated in Horticultural Hall. A reasonable compromise as to size of audience-hall is all that we can hope.

The greater expense of singing in the Music Hall, and our determination, which has every year become firmer, to employ an orchestra as often as possible, rendered it necessary at the commencement of the past season to raise our assessments. Our associates generously acceded to this change, and have provided all the money we have really needed. Cordially recognizing their kindness, aware that "gratitude is always a lively sense of favors to come," and convinced that we could spend even much more than they have already given us, and that it could all be spent for our mutual benefit and for the good cause, we beg to assure them that we shall be ever ready to meet them half way, and shall no sooner be tired of asking than they of giving.

The question of employment of an orchestra, on which theme I have spoken in all my previous reports, is, I trust, finally settled for this and all other clubs which undertake to give complete cantatas. It is everywhere, and by all competent to judge, admitted that a work written for orchestral accompaniment comes before its audience with tongue-tied and stammering utterance, if presented with the feeble support of a piano. The jewel has not merely lost its setting, it has also lost its color and brilliancy. We, shall therefore employ an orchestra as often as the means furnished by our associates allow.

There is one other advantage, on no account to be overlooked, in having an orchestra frequently at our service. That is the opportunity of making our performance more interesting and satisfactory by introducing a certain amount of pure instrumental music to relieve the otherwise continuous flow of vocal sound. The monotony of an evening of male part-singing has been frequently remarked. The ear craves the variety of voice and pitch which mixed part-singing affords. In like manner, uninterrupted vocal music, though for mixed voices, after a while palls upon the senses. We hope, if not next year, certainly in the future, to be encouraged to introduce into our programmes some numbers of pure instrumental music.

[Here we omit paragraph quoted in our last number, containing the suggestion of an Amateur Orchestra.]

I have only to review briefly the performances of our past season, and to announce our plans for the coming year.

We announced at the beginning of the season, instead of three programmes, each repeated, which had been our plan in previous years, four different programmes without repetition. We were obliged to depart from this plan, in consequence of the peremptory demand of our associates for the repetition of Bruch's "Odysseus." We gave, December 22, the "Odysseus," with orchestra; February 27, a miscellaneous programme, with piano; April 12, Schumann's "Manfred" and Bruch's "Fair Ellen," with orchestra; May 24, a repetition of the "Odysseus," with orchestra.

The "Odysseus" of Max Bruch, a cantata occupying an entire evening, is a capital specimen of modern romantic composition. The old Homeric story is cast into a form as dramatic as an opera. Choruses, duets, and songs are skillfully interspersed, and the instrumentation employs all the resources of the orchestra. The work is tuneful throughout, and contains many distinct melodies which linger in the memory. It is by no means an easy thing to sing. The success of the Club in coping with its difficulties at the first concert, on December 22, may best be judged by the general demand for another performance. We have probably never produced a work which excited such interest at the first hearing. The female chorus was excellent throughout, and of the ladies and gentlemen of the Club who sang the solos nothing can be said but praise. The success of the evening was also largely due to Mr. Charles R. Adams, who filled the title rôle. A baritone part makes a hard requisition upon a tenor voice. No higher commendation can be given to Mr. Adams's rendering than to say that we almost forgot that he was a tenor.

The second concert, on February 27, commenced with a Bach cantata, "Bide with us." It was sung and heard with attention and interest by all, with delight by a few. I hope that the time is coming when the delight in the works of this wonderful genius shall be coextensive with the interest and attention. May the Cecilia persevere in its efforts to bring about this result. This concert contained much of Mendelssohn,—the Forty-Third Psalm, scenes from the "Athalia," an aria exquisitely sung by Dr. Langmaid, and a part-song. There were also a new part-song of Franz, a glee of Stewart, a prize madrigal of Leslie, and an accompanied female part-song of Gade. Everything except the glee went well.

On April 12, Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" was given entire, and given admirably. Mr. Howard M. Ticknor did us good service in reading the necessary parts of the drama. The evening ended with Bruch's cantata, "Fair Ellen," given some years ago, with piano, by the Cecilia, but inspiring fresh interest now by the addition of the orchestra.

On May 24, the "Odysseus" was repeated, and was found to realize all the favorable impressions of the first hearing. It ought to become a stock-piece with vocal clubs.

The season has been most encouraging, and our time seems to have been well spent. I trust that we have offered our associates nothing unworthy of the aim, the standing, or the reputation of the Club. If they have received as much gratification and improvement from the hearing as we have from the practice and performance of our music, I am more than content.

We hope to have good things to offer next year. Shall we again venture upon a Bach cantata? I trust so, sincerely. We also have upon our list Schumann's "New Year's Song," one of the shorter Psalms of Mendelssohn, his "Lorelei," and one of his motets for female voices, part-songs by Rheinberger, Grieg, and Hofmann, glees by sundry English composers, one of Wilbye's madrigals, Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" music, Liszt's "Bells of Strasburg," and, as our largest pieces, which will certainly be attacked, whatever of the rest is allowed to go over for another year, the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz, and the "Faust" of Schumann.

In conclusion, I have only to say that I look forward to the coming season in full confidence that it will be most interesting and profitable. Each year, thus far, seems to me to have been with us one of musical progress. I believe that the next will be no exception.

S. LOTHROP THORNDIKE,
President of the Cecilia.

MUSICAL CHATS.

BY GEORGE T. BULLING.

NEW SERIES.
I.

It is a pity that so few artists in music are also real men and women. All truly great and honored artists have proved themselves to be noble human beings, as well as gifted exponents of their art. But there is a large class of musicians, composed of men and women who are more or less artistically gifted, yet who possess very small souls, when they are looked upon in the light of members of the great human family. It is a praiseworthy thing to see a man living the life of an artist devoted to his art; indeed, without such depth and sincerity of purpose, he can accomplish little. But, when he goes so far as to forget that he is under sacred obligations as father, son, husband, or brother, he is actually injuring, instead of elevating the noble art of which he would be a representative. It is a monstrosity which you cannot fail to have observed, the man who is successful as an artist, but a failure as an individual with the feelings and affections of a man. One consolation remains: he can never ultimately become a truly great and remembered artist. All the great men and women in music whom we honor to-day, possessed that individual nobility of character which largely helps to constitute the really great musician. The devotion of Beethoven to an ingrate nephew; the affection of Chopin for his family and country; the sweet nature and home-loving attributes of Mendelssohn; the devotion of Schumann to his wife, are but a few of the numerous instances of the fitting combination of great artist and noble man, which universal history holds forth to us. I have frequently observed that the great artist who is not a true man or woman usually excels as a virtuoso, and not as a real expressionist in music; though it is not impossible to meet with a sweet-voiced opera singer who would not hesitate to beat his wife, if he wanted to; but such a man is always morally and physically a coward, as the sequel continually shows, and he really lives more for the applause of the multitude than for his art. Is he a happy man?

Upon the weak and frivolous portion of the multitude of listeners to music, be they men or women, the physical presence of the artist has considerable effect. The magical impression of a handsome face or figure makes the silly members of an audience go wild over—what? why, a handsome face and figure; that's all. So, on this score, you need not be alarmed for the cause of music, my friend, since those poor deluded mortals who are thus affected by physical beauty have but little control in the elevation of that spiritual beauty which is infinitely the most potent of all. It is well enough that a mind and soul of spiritual loveliness should be enclosed in a physically beautiful form and face, as a subtle suggestion of the commingling of forms of beauty, infinite and finite; but it is absolutely immaterial, so far as the highest and only form of beauty is concerned. Music itself has a physical effect, which is subjective, and not intrinsic. Its greatest and strongest attribute is that its spiritual effect can be felt, but not described. It is the indefiniteness, the airy intangibility, the holy and awful mysteriousness of music which give it that all-potent charm which it possesses above any of the arts. There is no such thing as mere sensual music. It is the individual mind and physical organization which adds the sensuality to music. The pure soul and elevated mind finds purity and elevation in all music. The earnest artist is capable of painting the most voluptuous forms of physical loveliness, without the while even a sensual thought. He is held pure by his art, though he is human. Music, being an excitant of the imagination, will affect men's minds in conformity with their own natural bent. I have found that the man who will tell you that music is pre-eminently physical in its effects, speaks from his individual experience. He may be compared to the intoxicated man who looked round about and saw everybody drunk and reeling but himself.

You have noticed that, during the past few years, there has been a morbid leaning towards the intense in music. The increase in number of virtuosos, who are not necessarily musicians, and the crashing, unnatural effects with which composers have invested their instrumentation, are unwholesome signs of this malady. It cannot last, because it is not built on a sound foundation. Science is permitted to enter just so far and no farther into the domain of music. Music is stronger than science, just as sure as feeling is more powerful than intellect. It were absurd to assert that music must not progress hand in hand with science, for both must advance in conformity with men's ever-changing ways of feeling and thinking. The law of continuity cannot be reasonably ignored. Still, the greatest would-be reformer cannot but admit that music has fundamental laws of beauty which originated with man himself, if not with nature, as the visionists will have it, and these laws are not to be broken with impunity. There are fashions in music, as there are in articles of apparel. If it be fashionable for a while for orchestral composers to use the brass and instruments of percussion so as to smother the beautiful effect of the strings and wood, why, let them do it. Music will be temporarily affected thereby, but, in the very nature of things, it will ultimately return to its normal state. There is a happy medium, which the composer himself may see some day, if he should live long enough to let his musical mind pass through its transition state.

E. F. WENZEL.

The last Musikalisches Wochenblatt brought us the sad news of the death of Ernst Ferd. Wenzel, the well-known pianoforte teacher at the Leipzig Conservatorium. In him the institution lost one of its oldest and ablest teachers, one whose interest in all the pupils and in all that concerned the Conservatory, never flagged.

He was, an eccentric man, full of wit and humor, a keen observer, a sharp critic, a careful and thorough teacher. To those of his pupils who were earnest and diligent in their studies he was gentle, kind and encouraging; but woe to those in whom he detected carelessness, indifference, or obstinacy! Whether they were talented or not, he showed them no mercy; his keen sarcasms and biting irony he did not spare, and his patience was soon exhausted, if they persisted in their errors. When his anger was once aroused, it knew no bounds. I have seen him, in a fit of fury at the glaring faults of some pupil, snatch the music from the rack and fling it into the farthest corner of the room. At another time after repeated endeavors to get a pupil to play some notes in a certain way, he would, in perfect despair, roughly knock the pupil's hand off the keyboard, in order, as a last resort, to show how the thing was to be done. This he never did, until persuaded that the idea could not be got into the pupil's head—which he considered a preferable way of imparting instruction to the more mechanical one of allowing the pupil merely to imitate what the teacher does. He wished the pupil to think for himself. In pursuance of this plan he would work away at the dullest, most stupid pupil, at first with a patience wonderful to behold. He would explain in the clearest manner and gentlest tones what was to be done, then tell the pupil to do it. Of course it would be wrongly executed. Then he would repeat the directions, raising his voice slightly, and emphasizing it with an occasional blow of his fist on the piano. Again a failure to comprehend. Raising his voice still higher, and pounding the piano still louder, he would repeat his words, and this would go on until the wretched pupil had mastered the lesson, or until, with a muttered "Donner-wetter!" he would sweep the offender's hands from the key-board, and show what he meant—clumsily enough too, for he was no pianist. When at last the pupil was able to play the passage correctly, Wenzel would look at him "half in anger, half in amazement" and say: "So! Why didn't you do that at first?"

I have seen young ladies, accustomed to a gentler mode of instruction, shed tears at his scornful remarks, or furious actions, rendered all the more so by the wonderful faculty he possessed of making the most ferocious grimaces. At all times his face was a study, for it was a most expressive one. Each changing emotion was mirrored therein, in the quick succession, and with the utter unconsciousness of childhood; scorn, curiosity, anger, fun,—there was no need of hearing him speak, to know his thoughts. On the street he was conspicuous by his singular appearance; he would rush along, with a preoccupied air, his white hair flying picturesquely, his overcoat unbuttoned and flapping in the wind, and the ends of a gay-colored neckerchief gracefully floating behind him. Every one in Leipzig knew him by sight, and people smiled to themselves as he passed.

Wenzel was born in 1808, in the little village of Waldorf, and was in his seventy-third year when he died. He was a clever writer and contributed to different musical journals.

Personally, he was short and squarely built; his head, like those of so many musicians, was a little like Beethoven's, particularly the broad, square, massive forehead. His eyes were always handsome, though the shaggy white eyebrows over them, and a perpetual scowl made them rather forbidding at first sight. But at a second glance one could see that the eyes were kind, in spite of scowl and shaggy brows, and under the rough exterior there was as kind a heart as ever beat. A legend was current, among the pupils of the conservatory, whose origin no one knew, to the effect that Wenzel had been disappointed in love, early in life. The object of his affections became the wife of one of his friends and is still living, being, in fact, no other than Madame Clara Schumann. For the truth of this statement I do not vouch, merely telling it here as it was told to me.

Among Wenzel's pupils are two, well-known in America, Ernst Perabo, and S. B. Mills. Since he is gone, there remains but one friend and contemporary of Mendelssohn, Schumann and Hauptmann, at the conservatory, and that one is its venerable director, Conrad Schleinitz.

THE LONDON "MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS."

IV.

Our survey now brings us to those we must call the composers of to-day, since we shall have to deal with the works of living musicians, with two exceptions only.

The first name on our list is that of Woldemar Bargiel, the step-brother and disciple of Schumann, who was introduced to these concerts, November 8, 1875, by a performance of his Trio in D-minor, Op. 6. Sir Julius Benedict, who has been associated with the institution from the commencement, we find represented as a composer once only, November 25, 1867, when a Berceuse and Monferina for violoncello and pianoforte were given (bearing the joint names of "Benedict" and "Piatti"). Here we omit notice of the benefit-concert, in March last, when several works from the veteran composer were brought forward. Johannes Brahms was first introduced, February 25, 1867, and seems gaining ground; as eight works of his have been added to the répertoire during the last four seasons. The total number of his compositions given, is seventeen, including the "Ungarische Tänze," arranged for pianoforte and violin by Joachim. The performances reach the number of fifty-seven. Selections from the "Tänze" have been given nine times—generally at the closing concerts of the seasons. Next in order comes the Sextet in B-flat, which has been heard eight times; the "Liebeslieder-Wälzler" (first set); following with seven performances. Hans Von Broussart appears once, November 18, 1878, when his Trio in G-minor was given. Max Bruch is represented by his Romance in A, Op. 42 (originally for violin and orchestra), introduced November 11, 1876, and repeated the following year. Anton Dvorak had his chamber-music introduced in this country, February 23, of the present year—an occurrence fresh in the memory of our readers. The Sextet in A, Op. 48, then given was repeated the following month. Somewhat tardy was the recognition of Niels W. Gade, whose Octet in F, for strings, was produced so late as February 2, 1878, remaining the only work heard so far. Friedrich Gernsheim has had two works produced, the Quartet in E-flat, Op. 6, and the Trio in F, Op. 28—both for pianoforte and strings, the performances numbering four. We now come to a name, that of Hermann Goetz, probably unknown in this country until the year of his death, 1876. Notice of his now familiar opera "The Taming of the Shrew," had appeared early that year, but of his other compositions next to nothing was known. His Trio in G-Minor was introduced at these concerts, February 8, 1879, followed by the Quintet, in March, and the Quartet in E, Op. 6, in February last. Karl Goldmark was represented by his Suite in E, Op. 11, for pianoforte and violin, April 6, 1878, the work being repeated January 18, 1879. Eduard Grieg was introduced February 6, 1875, with his Sonata, Op. 8, for pianoforte and violin. There is a better, Op. 13, to which attention may be directed. Stephen Heller, introduced in 1864, at the Ernst "Benefit," has had (besides the Pensées fugitives, written jointly with the composer just named), but three pianoforte pieces given—two in 1864—and some of the "Lieder ohne Worte" in 1868; after a lapse of eleven years, the Pensées fugitives were again heard in 1879, making four performances in all. Only one opportunity was afforded Adolph Henselt, who was represented by some of the Études, Op. 2, April 15, 1878. Dr. Ferdinand Hiller performed, with Signor Piatti, his Sonata in E-flat, Op. 22, for pianoforte and violoncello, February 17, 1872—the first time his name appeared in the programmes as a composer. We reproduce a paragraph from a former series of this journal, commenting on that occasion:—"Greenhorns should be apprised—for they seem to be unaware of the fact—that Dr. Hiller is no ordinary man, to be put on a par with artists who do not pretend to possess creative genius. He is the Altmeister of Germany, and a great composer." This notwithstanding, we have only to add an Adagio for the violin, given April 8, 1878, to exhaust the record of his works. Joachim, as a composer, if we except the arrangement of the "Ungarische Tänze," is limited to a Romance from the "Hungarian Concerto," performed March 4, 1878. Friedrich Kiel was introduced, December 5, 1874, by his Quartet in A-minor, Op. 43, for pianoforte and strings; two other works were given last season. The Prelude and Toccata, pianoforte, of Vincenz Lachner, performed December 15, 1877, is the only mention of this musically celebrated family. Lotto, the violinist, was represented by a Morceau de Concert, Op. 2, December 7, 1863. Piatti has had five pieces for violoncello in the programmes, but only during the last four seasons—a rare example of reticence, considering the artist's long connection with the concerts. Joachim Raff is represented by seven works and nine performances, the Cavatina in D claiming three. The first work heard was the Trio in G, Op. 112, February 7, 1874; the last, the Tarantella for two pianos, December 8, 1879. The name of Carl Reinecke appears for the first time, April 15, 1878, when the Impromptu for two pianos, on a theme from Schumann's "Manfred," was performed. A similar work, "La Belle Grisélides," was given last December, and that is all we hear of this prolific writer. To Joseph Rheinberger are accorded two works, and eight performances; the Quartet in E-flat, Op. 38, for pianoforte and strings, having been given seven times. Anton Rubinstein comes in for six works, and eighteen performances, the favorite appearing to be the Sonata in D, Op. 18, for pianoforte and violoncello, which has been given six times. Camille Saint-Saëns claims three pieces—a Sonata, a Trio, and a Quartet, the Trio being performed twice. Madame Schumann, as our readers know, is a composer, as well as a great player; and it is pleasing to find recognition of both capacities: the Scherzo in D-minor, and Romance in E-flat minor, Op. 11, were both presented last year. Giuseppe Verdi, of operatic fame, finds here a place, January 21, 1878, when his string Quartet in E-minor was produced, and repeated the following month. Henri Vieuxtemps, the violin virtuoso, has his name to seven works, the performances being nine; the last so long ago as June, 1866. Henri Wieniawski, another virtuoso, whose loss the world of art has so recently (April 2), had to mourn, was represented by a "Legend" for the violin, February 11, 1878—the only occasion when his name appears as a composer. Our record of composers of to-day closes with the mention of another lady, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, whom we could almost claim as a compatriot, whose Suite, Op. 19, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, found a place in the programme of March 8, last.

We shall find that the composers of to-day outnumber those of any period we have considered—a matter for surprise, perhaps, but also for congratulation; for no art can be said to be in a healthy vital condition if it is unproductive. Mr. Chappell has displayed both liberality and enterprise in thus adding to his catalogue works from some hitherto little-known continental composers. The pieces referred to in this article only number eighty; but the selection has been taken from the works of twenty-nine composers. This, it must be admitted, is a very fair recognition of living talent for any single institution to exhibit.—Lond. Mus. Standard.

GROVE'S DICTIONARY OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS. PART XI.

This eleventh of the twelve quarterly parts originally promised is exceedingly rich in valuable and instructive matter. Beginning in the middle of Mr. W. S. Rockstro's important contribution on the Opera, it ends in the midst of what promises to be a very satisfactory article on Palestrina, such as we may expect in a work which has contained Mr. Grove's own admirable and almost exhaustive essays upon Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and which has invested the familiar histories of Handel, Haydn and Mozart, as well as the critical analysis of their styles and peculiarities, and the recognition of their several contributions to the progress of the art of music, with wonderfully fresh interest. Besides the Opera we have from the same writer a very clear and complete history of the origin and progress of Oratorio,—30 close pages—tracing its course for convenience through fifteen distinct periods, after a similar division of the Opera into twenty periods (Handel's operas forming the ninth, Gluck's the eleventh, Mozart, etc., the thirteenth, Weber, Spohr, and other masters of the Romantic School, the fifteenth, English opera (Purcell, etc.), the seventeenth, and Wagner, whom he treats generously and fairly (see extracts in this and the last number of our journal), the twentieth. These two articles are full of musical illustrations.

Then come Orchestra and Orchestration,—both again by the prolific, learned, and clear-headed Mr. Rockstro. To the article on the Orchestra is appended a very useful comparative table showing the numerical proportion of the various instruments in two of the oldest orchestras of note: that of Dresden under Hasse in 1754, and that at the Handel commemoration in Westminster Abbey (1784), and of twelve of the most celebrated orchestras of the present day, not omitting our own Boston Handel and Haydn Festival of 1880, and including the London Philharmonic and Crystal Palace orchestras, those of the French Conservatoire, of the Leipzig Gewandhaus, of Berlin, Dresden, Vienna, New York Philharmonic, the Birmingham and Rhine festivals, and the Wagner festival at Bayreuth.

Mr. Hopkins, the accomplished organist of the Temple church in London, contributes an elaborate and fully illustrated description and history of the Organ; and "H. J. L." a history of the Overture, with examples in notation of successive schools and periods.

Besides these weightier treatises (think of all this in a single quarterly number!) there are shorter but good articles on Paganini, on Paër, Pacini, Paisiello, and our own John K. Paine. But once in a while, we are sorry to see, this minute dictionary descends into the trivial. For instance, under the head "Orpheus," a well-known collection of little German part-songs, it gives the complete list of contents,—230 or more songs: why not as well print Novello's or Oliver Ditson's catalogue?

Plainly Grove's Dictionary will have to exceed the limits originally contemplated by possibly another year's quarterly installments. And why not? Who does not wish to see it as complete as practicable? We only wonder how any person really interested, and who desires to be intelligently interested, in music, can afford to be without this work. The cost ($4.00 per annum) is trifling measured by its value. Better spend from twelve to sixteen dollars upon so full and satisfactory a book of reference, than fritter the same amount away on cheap tenth-rate ephemeral manuals and pamphlets, as so many do. Let every musician and music-lover therefore, whom our words can influence, send to Macmillan & Co., London or New York, and subscribe for what cannot of course be a perfect dictionary of music, but what is by far the best (at least for English and American readers) that has yet appeared in any language.

CONCERTS.

The great multifarious music-making army is advancing upon us, and some slight skirmishes have already occupied some portions of the field. During the past week we have had, (not to speak of "Lecture" courses) two, to be followed this afternoon by a third, of those miscellaneous combination concerts which the superintendent of the Music Hall is so ingenious in contriving, and commonly makes so attractive by a startling array of artists' names; also the semi-private debut of a young Danish pianist of merit; we read also of another of a young English pianist,—both of these at Chickering's warerooms.

—Manager Peck's constellation this time consists of Miss ANNIE CARY, the contralto, Herr WILHELMJ, the violinist, and Herr JOSEFFY, the pianist,—all of rare lustre,—besides the Temple (male quartet) Club, and Mr. W. C. Tower (one of that club), the tenor singer. We can only speak now of the first concert, which occurred last Monday evening and was honored by a large audience,—one of the encoring audiences, alas! which encored nearly every piece. It seems that we cannot commonly rely on the good sense or self-respect of artists or conductors, still less on the self-interest of artists' managers and agents, for the abatement of this nuisance. How would it do to organize a league among the really musical persons who commonly attend concerts, and have it mutually understood among them that, whenever the offence appears likely to be carried too far, they should all, at a concerted signal, quietly get up and leave the hall? We claim no reward for the suggestion. That is the way the aggrieved minorities are apt to do in Democratic caucuses.—The programme was as follows:

- Quartet, "The Drum March," Krugh.
 Temple Quartet.
 German Songs—
 a. "Liebesbotschaft,"
 b. "Ich will meine Seele tauchen,"
 c. "Der Wand'rer," Fesca.
 Mr. W. C. Tower.
 Violin Solo, "Andante e Intermezzo," . . Max Vogrich.
 First time.
 Herr August Wilhelmj.
 "Vedrai Carino," Don Giovanni, Mozart.
 Miss Annie Louise Cary.
 Piano Solo, "Andante Splanato and Polonaise," Chopin.
 Herr Raphael Joseffy.
 Quartet, "Salve Regina," Schubert.
 Temple Quartet.
 Violin Solo, "Otello Fantasia," H. W. Ernst.
 Herr August Wilhelmj.
 "Oh, cessate di piangermi," Perugini.
 Miss Annie Louise Cary.
 Piano Solos—
 a. "Cantique d'amour," F. Liszt.
 b. Spinnerlied, "Flying Dutchman,"
 c. "Etude on false notes," Rubinstein.
 Herr Raphael Joseffy.
 Part-Song, "Turkish Cup Bearer," Mendelssohn.

The great violinist, simple, noble and impressive in appearance, like an intellectual young giant, played in the same broad, noble style, and with the same earnest feeling, that enchanted every listener two years ago. His tone seems even fuller, larger, richer than before. We failed, however, to become much interested in the composition by Vogrich. Ernst's Otello Fantasia, including Desdemona's "Willow" aria, was more satisfying in its way; but the Bach Aria—the well-known one on such occasions—was the best of all, and sang itself to all hearts.

Herr Joseffy's rendering of the smooth and even Andante and the fiery Polonaise of Chopin was in his best style, though his pianissimo was sometimes carried to a point which requires very apprehensive ears to make it audible at all. Recalled, he played his own delicate and charming setting of the song: "Tre giorni son che Nina," by Pergolese. In the Liszt-Wagner Spinning Song his facility of rapid fingering, and his exquisite grace and fluency of execution in all such florid arabesques, betrayed him into some hurrying of tempo which we did not notice in his other interpretations. The Rubinstein Etude (absurdly entitled on "false notes," since they are merely strongly accented appoggiaturas) was played with great force and brilliancy.

Miss Cary was in excellent voice and spirits and sang delightfully. Only we had the feeling that "Vedrai carino" was taken a trifle too fast. We never saw before the name Perugini as that of a composer; the song, however, ("Cease to wound me") was of a tender, plaintive and beseeching character, beautiful in itself and beautifully sung. Miss Cary, of course, had to pay her full share of the encore tax. Mr. Tower sang with chaste feeling and expression, using his sweet voice with much taste. The Temple quartet sing almost too well; it gets to be almost finical and sentimental.

—Chickering's long upper room was nearly filled last Saturday evening by an eager and appreciative crowd of listeners, for the first time, to some piano recitals of Mr. ORRO BENDIX, of Copenhagen, a fellow-student in Germany of Mr. Sherwood and Mr. John Orth of this city. The programme was well chosen:

- Beethoven, Op. 57, Sonate, in F-minor.
 Allegro assai—Andante—Allegro non troppo.
 Chopin, Polish Song, arranged by Liszt.
 Chopin, Op. 66, Fantasia Impromptu, in C sharp minor.
 Moszkowski, Op. 17, Waltz.
 Chopin, Op. 62, Ballade, in F-minor.
 Liszt, Ave Maria.
 Liszt, La Campanella.

Mr. Bendix has a clear and vital touch, and showed superior execution alike in passages of force and delicacy. Of the Sonata Appassionata we should say that he gave a very fair rendering, could we only banish from our mind the impression left by Joseffy's magnificent reading of it last spring, not to speak of Rubinstein, Bülow, Mehlig and others. The Chopin ballade was to our mind the most successful performance of those we heard; he played it with delicacy and fine musical feeling. The last two pieces we were obliged to lose; and it is but fair to state that we listened to disadvantage from the rear part of that long, narrow room, so that we need a better opportunity to form a clear estimate of this young artist's talent. His manner certainly was modest and prepossessing.

BEETHOVEN'S VIOLIN.

TRIESTE, September 6, 1880.

MY DEAR DWIGHT:—

I find a paragraph going the rounds of the newspapers, stating that an English purchaser has recently obtained one of Beethoven's violins from the widow of the Viennese musician, Carl Holz.

I suppose all your readers know, that Prince Lichnowsky presented a full quartet of strings to the (then) young composer—first and second violins, viola and violoncello. One of the violins was purchased at the sale of Beethoven's effects by Carl Holz, and it is this which is now said to be in England. I question its authenticity.

In the autumn of 1862, a newspaper notice of the four instruments, as then being in the Royal Library at Berlin, attracted my attention, and drew from me, in the Deutsche Musikzeitung, a "request for an explanation," of which this is the substance:

"Alois Fuchs describes, in the Wiener Musikzeitung, No. 146, of the year 1846, the four instruments, and says of the first violin: 'A violin made by Jos. Guarnerius of Cremona, in the year 1718, is now in possession of Herr Carl Holz, director of the Concerts Spirituels in Vienna.'

"Afterwards, says Fuchs: 'Under the necks of all these instruments the seal of Beethoven is impressed, and on the so-called "Boden" of each, a large "B" scratched by Beethoven's own hand.

Within the last few years I have seen this instrument (if genuine) several times; the last time the 23d of September, 1862, with the large "B," and some remains of a seal. It is in possession of the Widow Holz."

The result of this call for an explanation was this: Mr. Espagne, then librarian of the musical department of the Berlin library, forwarded several documents to Mr. Bagge, editor of the Deutsche Musikzeitung for my inspection. The result of the inspection is contained in a letter to Mr. Bagge, printed in his Zeitung Nov 8, 1862, of which the following is a sufficient translation:

"MY DEAR SIR,—

"You now ask me for an explanation, which I gladly give. In April and May, 1860, I had a correspondence with a gentleman in London, who desired to purchase this instrument, provided it was really one of very fine quality. Not being a judge of instruments, I took the opinions of several competent judges here in Vienna. Not one of them expressed any doubt as to the authenticity of the instrument, nor did any one speak in any strong terms of its excellence. Not long before, a pupil of Vieuxtemps told me, that his master had tried it, and found it to be 'a very fair instrument, but not of first quality.' I so reported to the gentleman in London, who thereupon declined the purchase. I therefore had no further occasion to inquire into the authenticity of the violin, but, like the other gentlemen, rested satisfied with the testimony of the widow and her son, with the great 'B,' and with what I took for marks of Beethoven's seal.

"When I saw, some months since, the first notice of the gift to the Berlin library of the four instruments, I was among the first to congratulate widow Holz on the sale of the violin, and was not a little astonished to learn that this was not the case. Seeing the notice repeated, I thought it my duty to the widow Holz, to the Berlin library, and to myself, to seek some solution of the enigma.

"The documents, which you have placed before me for inspection, are decisive. The truth is evident, that Holz sold the Beethoven violin in 1852, and left in possession of his widow an imitation of it!

Your obedient servant, A. W. T."

It is this imitation of the original, which has recently been purchased by the London gentleman.

THE SCHINDLER-BEETHOVEN PAPERS.

TRIESTE, September 6, 1880.

MY DEAR DWIGHT:—

When Schindler, in 1845, sold the Beethoven papers, in his possession, to the Prussian Government for the Royal Library at Berlin, (2,000 thalers down, and an annuity of 400), he retained a certain portion of them, which were of a more private nature, and which to a great extent were personal to him, or closely connected with statements made by him in his biography of the composer.

On occasion of my visits to him in Frankfort am Main, or the neighboring village Bockenheim, he showed me some few of the autographs thus retained, but, laying his hand upon the portfolios, he said earnestly: "As long as I live, no human eye will see these papers!"

Time passed on. Schindler died, and all these papers and relics went into the possession of his sister, a certain Widow Egloff. She lived in Mannheim, and L. Nohl, of the neighboring Heidelberg, catalogued them for her,—making some very droll mistakes, by the way—and had the use of them in finishing his Beethoven book. What became of them afterwards I had no means of ascertaining, and feared that they were lost to me.

It is perhaps fortunate for my work, that for a long period I was unable, in addition to my official duties, to perform any serious and continued literary labor; for last year, while mourning over my enforced delay in resuming the Beethoven studies, what should I receive, but a note from Mr. Emanuel Nowotny, of Altröhan, near Carlsbad,—a gentleman utterly unknown to me, as I (personally) to him—asking me some question relating to Beethoven, and concluding by informing me, that he had become the purchaser of the collection complete, and that he gladly placed it at my disposal not only for any studies I might desire to make, but for copying to any extent!

Upon noting in the catalogue certain papers to be copied for me, he crowned his goodness by sending me one of the portfolios, and since that time, has entrusted to me the rest! I feel it a duty, as well as pleasure, thus publicly to express my gratitude. All the more, because he has now transferred them to the Royal Library at Berlin, where they properly belong as a portion of the Schindler-Beethoven papers.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHICAGO, OCT. 18.—Musical matters are beginning to take a positive shape, and we are having a few concerts, even if it is early in the season. The Mme. Emma Abbott Company have been giving us something that they call "English opera," and for the past two weeks we have been thus honored. To call such performances opera, is to rob the name of its true signification. Musically, the efforts have been depressing, when taken as a whole, although with some of the members, particularly Mrs. Seguin, a bright exception may be made. Signor Brignoli has been struggling with the mysteries of the English language, and has sung as well as could be expected considering his worn voice, and the difficulties that were in his way. Yet it was broken-English opera in more senses than one. Miss Abbott is a lady of energy and life, and has battled for a position as a singer most heroically. Yet she is in no sense an artist, and never will be; although her energy may win her a certain reputation and notoriety. A large number of our American people are still in the early stages of a musical understanding, and they are attracted by the idea of an opera in English; and, therefore, the success of this company has been good, notwithstanding its character. Musically, the opera is bad; financially, its success has been remarkable.

Mr. Boscovitz made his first appearance here as a pianist last week. He played the "Italian Concerto" of Bach; a Nocturne, Mazurka, the Berceuse, a Valse, and the Ballade, Op. 47, of Chopin; a sonata by Nichelmann, the twelfth Rhapsodie by Liszt, and some smaller pieces, including three compositions of his own. A frank opinion bids me say that I was disappointed in the playing of this gentleman. He takes too many liberties in tempo, and in interpretation, to be called a correct player. With the Chopin music, his taste or caprice led him into mannerisms that bordered upon the sensational, and while he manifested sentiment, it was of such an exaggerated order that its point and meaning seemed lost. Yet he is called a pupil of that master. What seemed most marked in his playing were two characteristics, one of striking the notes with great force, and the other with delicacy. In the quiet passages he was at his best, but there was no gradual development of tone from the soft to the loud. It was uneven playing. Every player has a personal right to his own ideas, and they are entitled to respect; and while we may not agree with them, we at least honor the independence of thought. Mr. Boscovitz played a "Hunting Jig" by Dr. Bull, written about 1590, with a grace that was pleasing, and also did the last movement of the Bach Concerto with much quickness and finish of movement. Yet, in my humble opinion, he cannot approach the rank of the great players in any particular. Other recitals may show him in new lights, and he may win appreciation; and it is only fair to the gentleman to wait until he has given us larger and better programmes before we classify his merits even in our private judgment.

I understand that Mr. Thomas is to visit us in November, and give some orchestral concerts in connection with Herr Joseffy, the pianist. He will be welcome, and the concerts enjoyable beyond a doubt.

Everything that aids the progress of music by furnishing standards of either performances or criticism, is worthy of our honest respect, and hearty support.

LOCAL ITEMS.

The first two programmes of the Harvard Symphony concerts are essentially arranged, as follows:

First concert, Nov. 18. Programme: Overture to "The Water Carrier," Cherubini; Aria (Miss Lillian Bailey); Seventh Symphony, Beethoven; Songs; Overture to "Julius Caesar" (first time here), Schumann.

Second Concert, Dec. 2. Symphony in C—No. 3, Wüllner edition—(first time here), Haydn; Piano Concerto in A, (first time), Liszt (Mr. Max Pinner); Short Symphony, No. 2, in A-minor (first time here), Saint-Saëns; Piano Solos; Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven.

The list of orchestral works to be given in the subsequent six concerts has been somewhat modified, and now stands thus:

Symphonies. Beethoven, No. 8; Schumann, "Colonne" (E-flat); Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique, second time; J. K. Paine, "Spring," second time; Raff, in G-minor, first time; Symphony by F. L. Ritter, first time.

Overtures. Gluck, "Alceste"; Mozart, "Titus"; Beethoven, "Leonore," No. 3; Spohr, "Faust"; Mendelssohn, "Melusina"; Schumann, "Manfred"; Bennett, "Wood Nymph"; and for the first time, Berlioz, "Carnaval Romain"; Goldmark, "Penthesilea"; Bazzini, "King Lear."

Miscellaneous. Bach, Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio; Beethoven, Adagio and Andante from "Prometheus"; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from the Reformation Symphony; Schumann, Overture, Scherzo and Finale; Berlioz, Marche Nocturne, from "L'Enfance du Christ," second time; Wagner, "Siegfried Idyll"; Bennett, Prelude and Funeral March, from "Ajax," first time; Dvorak, Slavonic Dances, first time; Norbert Burgmüller, Andante (with Oboe Solo) from Symphony in D, second time; Liszt, "Orpheus" (Short Symphonic Poem), first time; Goetz, Intermezzo from Symphony in F; Fuchs, Serenade, first time.

Other works may be found desirable and practicable as the concert season approaches. Solo artists, vocal and instrumental, will be announced in due time.

Subscriptions for the season of Eight Concerts, at Eight Dollars, are invited. The lists will be open until Nov. 8, when three days will be allowed for the subscribers only, whether members of the Association or not, to receive their tickets and select their seats at the office of the Music Hall.

On Thursday, Nov. 11, the public sale of season tickets will begin; and on Monday, Nov. 15, that of single admissions.

Those wishing to subscribe are requested to address the Chairman, or any member of the committee; or place their names on one of the subscription papers to be found at the Music Hall, at Chickering's, or at Ditson's, Prüfer's, or Schmidt's music store, at Sever's bookstore in Cambridge, etc., before Nov. 8.

Concert Committee: J. S. Dwight, (12 Pemberton Square), C. C. Perkins, J. C. D. Parker, B. J. Lang, S. B. Schlesinger, Chas. P. Curtis, S. L. Thorndike, Augustus Flagg, Wm. F. Apthorp, Arthur Foote, Geo. W. Sumner.

The final matinee of the three Cary-Wilhelm-Joseffy Concerts, under the management of Mr. Peck, will take place at the Music Hall this afternoon. Mr. Wilhelm will play a Fantasia of his own, and a Polonaise by Lohb. Mr. Joseffy is down for an Allegro and Passacaille by Handel, the Tarantella by Liszt, a "Polka noble" and Waltzes of his own, Nocturne in F-minor, Chopin, Aria by Pergolesi, Spinnerlied, Wedding March, etc., Mendelssohn. Miss Cary will sing "Divinités du Styx" from Gluck's Alceste, and "Volche sapete," from Mozart's Figaro. Mr. Tower, the same group of German songs which he sang on Monday evening. And the Temple Club will sing Mendelssohn's "Cheerful Wanderer," Schubert's Salve Regina, and the "Three Huntsmen" by Kreutzer.

The absorbing topic of next week will be the new Tremont Temple, which will open October 11, with a performance of the Messiah, in which Miss Lillian Bailey, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. William J. Winch, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney will appear. On the 12th a grand concert will be given by the Philharmonic orchestra, Bernard Listemann, conductor, and on the 13th, Eljah will be given with Miss Fannie Kellogg, Miss Winant, Mr. Charles R. Adams and Mr. J. F. Winch as soloists. The new organ built by Messrs. Hook & Hastings for the Temple, will be used on both occasions. Mr. Carl Zerrahn will conduct and Mr. B. J. Lang will be the organist.

The following choice programme was performed at Wesleyan Hall on Monday afternoon, before the pupils of the New England Conservatory:

1. Pianoforte Trio, Op. 70, No. 2, Beethoven; Introduction and Allegro non troppo; Allegretto non troppo; Allegro; (J. C. D. Parker, C. N. Allen and W. Fries.)

2. Violoncello Solo; (Mr. Wulf Fries.)

3. Sonata, piano and violin, Op. 21, Gade; Allegro di molto; Larghetto; Allegro vivace; (Messrs. Parker and Allen).

PEDAL CABINET ORGANS. Messrs. Mason & Hamlin have received the following testimonial from S. Parkman Tuckerman, Mus. Doc. Cantab. England, Hon. Member of the "Academy of St. Cecilia," Rome, and, for eighteen years, organist and director of the choir of St. Paul's Church, Boston.

MESSRS. MASON & HAMLIN:

Gentlemen,—The Pedal Cabinet Organ arrived yesterday and is now placed in the position designed for it in my music-room. It seems superfluous for me to say one word in praise of this truly wonderful instrument, for certainly it speaks its own praise better than any one can speak for it. I do not wonder that all the distinguished organists and musicians of the day are unanimous as to the superiority of your instruments; nor does it seem possible that a better substitute for the more costly and intricate pipe-organ can ever be made.

During a long residence in Europe, I had unusual facilities for examining every kind of instrument belonging to the harmonium or reed-organ family; and I am now convinced that the Mason & Hamlin Organ Co. have already distanced all rivals, on both continents, in the manufacture of cabinet organs; and in my opinion, their instruments, of every size and style, are as near perfection, in all essential particulars, as it seems possible for human skill and ingenuity to make them.

This letter was not written for publication, but you are at liberty to use it for that purpose if you please. (Signed) S. PARKMAN TUCKERMAN. Sept. 20, 1880.

Miss Helen Lamson, of Boston, who has been studying music in Stuttgart for years three past with Pruckner, Lebert, Faist and Alweus, returns to this city the latter part of this month. Miss Lamson has been an indefatigable worker, accomplishing far more than is done by the average musical student who goes abroad. Not only has her playing been carried to a high degree of perfection, but she has become a proficient in such matters as counterpoint, fugue, reading orchestral scores, etc. The testimonials from her teachers as well as the newspaper criticisms are very flattering. She will most likely be heard in Boston during the coming season.

NEW YORK. Manager Mapleson's plans and engagements have been summarized as follows:

Soprani—Mme. Etelka Gerster, Mlle. Alwina Valeria, Mme. Marie Louise Swift, Mlle. Bianca Mentesini, Mlle. Isidore Martinez, Mlle. Valerga and Mlle. Lorenzini-Gianoli.

Contralti—Mlle. Anna de Belocca, Mlle. Ricci and Miss Annie Louise Cary.

Tenori—Sig. Revelli, Sig. Runcio, Sig. Lazzarini, Sig. Crazzi and Sig. Campanini.

Baritoni—Sig. Del Puente, Sig. Bellati and Sig. Galassi.

Bassi—Sig. Monti, Sig. Ordinas, Sig. Baldaesare Corsini, and Sig. Franco Novara.

The orchestra, which has given such satisfaction in the past, has been further improved by several important changes. The chorus has been placed under the charge of Sig. Zarini, chorus master of La Scala, Milan. As director and conductor Sig. Arditi has been specially engaged. Selections will be made from the subjoined extensive repertoire: "Robert," "Traviata," "Barbiere," "Huguenots," "Nozze," "Lucia," "Don Giovanni," "Don Pasquale," "Rigoletto," "Figlia del Reggimento," "Talismano," "Martha," "Favorita," "Sonnambula," "Faust," "Trovatore," "Flauto Magico," "Frelschütz," "Diogenes," "Lohengrin," "Carmen," "Forza del Destino," "Ruy Blas," "Lidia di Chamouni," "Aida," "Mignon." The season will commence on Monday evening, Oct. 18, on which occasion will be performed Donizetti's opera, "Lucia di Lammermoor." The subscription will consist of 30 nights and the terms will be as follows: Parquet seats and balcony (first three rows), $300; balcony (other rows), $60; boxes, $250, $300, $400, $500, according to location.

WORCESTER, MASS. The twenty-third annual festival of the Worcester County Musical Convention was held in Mechanics' Hall, during the past week. We may say at the start that the affair was abundantly successful, in every particular, and, this much admitted, there is little left to say beyond the bare record. The choral force was 437 strong, and its work was generally good, at times remarkably so, especially if one considered that it was made up of detachments from Worcester and neighboring towns, and that opportunities for rehearsal, ensemble, were not possible until the week preceding the festival, while that with the orchestra did not come off until the very day of each concert in which an orchestra assisted. The orchestra, all from Boston, numbered thirty-six, and its work also was creditable, due allowance being made for the few possible rehearsals. The concerts were eight in number, — each afternoon, from Monday to Friday, inclusive, each evening beginning Wednesday, the festival closing Friday evening with Handel's Judas Maccabæus. We have not the space to devote to a repetition of the programmes in full, but we can point out their prominent features sufficiently to indicate their generally dignified character and great variety. The choral works were as follows: Jubilate, Garrett; Ave Verum, Mozart; Farewell to the Forest, Psalm XLIII, Hear my Prayer, Mendelssohn; O Lord, our Governor, Marcello; Send out Thy Light, Nazareth, Gounod; Gypsy Life, Schumann; The Trumpet's Loud Clangor, from Ode for Saint Cecilia's Day, Judas Maccabæus, Handel; Requiem Mass, Verdi. The most ambitious orchestral work presented was the fifth symphony of Beethoven. In all the list there were no novelties, that is, none which would be so called in a Boston concert-room. Then there were performances of part songs by the Swedish vocal quartette, female voices, and the Schubert company, male voices; of piano solos by Teresa Carreno; of harp solos by Madame Bohrer; of violin solos by Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Eichberg; of cello solos by Mr. Fries. Mr. Zerrahn presided over all, and the labors of accompanist at organ and piano were shared by Mr. B. D. Allen, Mr. E. B. Story and Mr. G. W. Sumner. The soloists were nearly all so well known to Boston concert-goers, that anything more than the list, with the assurance that each made a creditable appearance, is hardly needed. These soloists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Lillian Bailey, Miss Fannie Barnes, Miss Annie Cary, Miss Ita Welsh, Mr. Adams, Mr. Babcock, Mr. Hay, Mr. Tower and Mr. Whitney. Mrs. J. C. Hull and Mrs. Edward P. Hoff were strangers to most of the audience. Each lady made, we were given to understand, a good impression. Mr. Toedt's fine tenor voice and tasteful delivery proved highly agreeable. Miss Bailey's time in Europe had been, apparently, profitably employed. Her style is, of course, more matured, but none of its directness and artistic simplicity have been sacrificed in the ripening process. Mrs. Osgood, too, was as charming as of old, her clear, sweet and true voice, and her distinct enunciation being especially captivating. The solos in the two most important choral works were assigned as follows: In the Requiem-Mass of Verdi — Mrs. Osgood, Miss Welsh, Mr. Adams, Mr. Hay; in Judas Maccabæus — Mrs. Osgood, Mrs. Hull, Miss Cary, Mr. Tower, Mr. Hay, Mr. Whitney. — Courier-Sept. 26.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LONDON. The following extracts from the Musical Standard (Sept. 20), will give some idea of the great variety of music which has been performed in the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts during the past month:

On Friday, Sept. 10, there was an "English Choral night," when Mr. Frederick Clay's cantata "Lalla Rookh" was performed for the first time in London, having been written for Mr. Kuhé's Brighton Festival. The vocalists were Miss Anne Marriott, Miss Ellen Lamb, Mr. Frank Boyle, Mr. A. Oswald, and Mr. W. Lemare's excellent choir. The orchestra performed Balfe's overture, "Bohemian Girl," and F. H. Cowen's "Festival" overture. Mr. Charles Hallé played on the pianoforte (a) Nocturne in F-sharp, and (b) Polonaise in A-flat (Chopin).

The concert on Saturday night, Sept. 11, which brought one of the usual Saturday crowds to the theatre, was a fair specimen of the "miscellaneous" programmes which appeal so irresistibly to the tastes of the many. An overture by Auber, three of the ballet pieces from "Masaniello," one of the liveliest Finales from one of Haydn's liveliest symphonies (in G — known as "Letter V") and a new selection from "Carmen," by M. Audibert, constituted the orchestral pieces in the opening part, which included also a masterly performance by Mr. Hallé of the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's first pianoforte concerto, and the Ballade and Polonaise of Vieuxtemps, extremely well played by Mr. Sutton, a promising young violinist, pupil of M. Sainton. The singers were Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antonette Sterling, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Harold Russell.

On Monday, the 13th, being a "Mendelssohn night," the programme was devoted chiefly to the works of Mendelssohn, the scheme including the Symphony in C-minor, which is really the thirteenth of Mendelssohn's symphonies, but usually known as "No. 1;" the incidental music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream;" and the Rondo Brillante in E-flat (for pianoforte and orchestra), played by Mr. Charles Hallé. Mr. Hallé also played Schubert's valse, "Caprice," in A-minor, arranged by Liszt. A selection from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera" was also given by the orchestra.

On Tuesday, the 14th, Mr. Charles Hallé played on the pianoforte, Mozart's Andante and Finale from Concerto in B-flat; also Impromptu in A-flat (Schubert); and Tarantelle in A-flat (Heller). The orchestra performed a work by Saint-Saëns, and Cowen's march, "Maid of Orleans," and a few other pieces.

Wednesday, Sept. 15, was a "Classical night," when the programme included Gade's overture, "Im Hochland;" Gluck's "Airs de Ballet;" Haydn's Symphony in B-flat; and a selection from Verdi's Aida. The concert opened with the overture composed by Gade, and belonging to the same period as his first symphony (in C-minor), which attracted the favorable notice of Mendelssohn towards the Danish composer, who has since produced many works that have made him one of the few celebrated composers of whom his country can boast. This overture contains much effective orchestral writing; but is scarcely suggestive of the impressions implied by the title. In strong contrast to this clever but somewhat vague work, is the bright, clear, and genial symphony of Haydn, which is a fine specimen of the older master, being one of the set composed by him expressly for Saloman's London Concerts, towards the close of the last century. The other orchestral music of the classical part of the programme consisted of airs de ballet from Gluck's Iphigénie en Aulide. These and the other pieces referred to, were effectively played by the fine band so ably conducted by Mr. F. H. Cowen. A specialty in the selection was Mr. Charles Hallé's fine performances of Schumann's pianoforte Concerto in A-minor, which was received with appreciative attention. The classical vocal music comprised Handel's "Let the bright seraphim," well sung by Miss Anna Williams (with trumpet obbligato by Mr. Ellis), Schubert's "Erl King," finely declaimed by Mr. Santley, and the contralto solo, "Fac me vere," from Haydn's "Stabat Mater," expressively rendered by Miss Orridge.

The "Humorous night," on Thursday, Sept. 16, proved a great success. The first portion of the programme began with "Kamarinskaja," an orchestral fantasia by Glinka, on national Russian airs — a "Wedding song" and a Dancing song. This was followed by Mozart's divertimento entitled "Ein Musikalischer Spass" (a Musical Joke) composed in the year 1787. The piece was thrown off with that facile rapidity and love of frolic which were characteristic of the composer: the intention having been to caricature both the feeble style of much of the music of the period and the inefficiency of many of the executants. It is written (for stringed instruments and two horns) in symphonic form, comprising an Allegro, Adagio, Minuet (with trio), and Finale. The wrong notes, false entries, and omissions which are indicated for the several instruments are most amusingly contrived, especially comic being the imbecile indication of a fugue in the finale; another special feature being the burlesque cadenza for the first violin (in the adagio), ending in a most absurd wandering out of the key. This was played by Mr. A. Burnett with an admirable rendering of its intended incorrectness, and was greatly applauded. Another specialty was Bernhard Romberg's "Toy Symphony," composed for stringed band and children's diminutive instruments, the latter comprising imitation cockoo, quail, nightingale, and woodpecker — triangles, rattles, bells, drums, and penny trumpets. There is not much musical merit in the piece.

Other orchestral pieces were Weber's characteristic Chinese overture, Turandot, a "Humorous Meditation" (Scherz), in which the styles of Bach, Mozart and subsequent composers, down to, and including, Wagner, are parodied with intermixed passages. Weber's charming pianoforte solo, the "Invitation to the Waltz," was admirably played by Mr. Charles Hallé, who elicited continuous applause which only subsided on his returning to the instrument and giving with equal excellence, Chopin's Waltz in A-flat (from Op. 34).

LEEDS, ENGLAND. — Of the Festival, which is to take place Oct. 13-16, Figaro says:

Although there were some years ago several musical meetings at Leeds, the first festival proper was given in 1858, when Sterndale Bennett (the conductor) produced his "May Queen." The triennial festivals began in 1874, and in that year and in 1877 Sir Michael Costa conducted. This year, in consideration that Mr. Arthur Sullivan would write a grand oratorio on the subject of "David and Jonathan," the conductorship was offered to and accepted by the composer of "Pinafore." Mr. Sullivan subsequently found that Holy Writ was not suited to his capabilities, and in place of the Biblical text, the great composer of "The Sorcerer" has selected finer language from the pen of the late Dean Milman, adapted and doctored by Mr. William Schwenk Gilbert. "The Martyr of Antioch" as it now stands consists of seventeen numbers, five of which are choruses pure and simple. Starting with the chorus of fire worshippers, "Lord of the golden day," we next have a baritone solo, "Break off the hymn"; a tenor solo, "Come, Margarita, come"; a baritone solo, "Great Olybius"; and a chorus, "Go on thy flower-strewn road." The unaccompanied chorus, "Brother, thou art gone before us," has a march-like rhythm, and it is not difficult to foresee in it "The Martyr of Antioch March." A bass solo, "Brother, thou slumberest," is followed by a hymn, "For Thou didst die for me," to be sung by Mme. Albani. A duet, "My own, my lord, my beauteous child," is set for soprano and baritone. It leads to the chorus of maidens, "Come away with willing feet"; a recitative and aria, "See what Olybius's love prepares for thee," for tenor; a duet, "Oh, hear me, Olybius," for soprano and tenor; and a chorus, "Now glory to the God," of heathen maidens and Christians. A song for contralto solo, and chorus, "To Pæan," is followed by a concerted piece, "Great is Olybius and his mercy great," for the quartet of soloists, and by a quartet, "Have mercy, unrelenting heaven"; the work ends with a soprano solo and chorus, "What means yon blaze of light." Altogether, the work will, it is hoped, prove abundantly that Mr. A. Sullivan is worthy the knighthood which, it is stated, awaits him, and that the poet, Mr. W. S. Gilbert, will be found worthy of at least similar honor. The solos will be entrusted to Mesdames Albani and Patey, Messrs. Lloyd, Henry Cross, and Frederic King.

ST. PETERSBURG. — This capital already possesses a German, an Italian, and a French theatre, besides native establishments of the kind. The list is to be increased by the addition of an exclusively Jewish theatre, where the repertory, consisting of plays, in prose and verse, relating to historical Jewish subjects, including comic operas, will be exclusively from Jewish pens. The company will also be Jewish. The theatre is also to open in November with The Fanatic, a comic opera by the manager, A. Goldfaden, a Jewish actor favorably known to Moscow.

COPENHAGEN. The success of Mlle Vanzandt has been confirmed beyond all expectation. She has really made a great "hit" — which is not always easy at Copenhagen. The theatre has been nightly crowded and tickets sold at double, sometimes treble, prices. At the most recent performance of Mignon, the Royal Family of Denmark, as well as the King and Queen of the Hellenes, were present, and sent their congratulations to Mlle Vanzandt. The director of the theatre, M. Hallesen, has engaged the gifted young singer to appear three times more — twice as Mignon and once as Zerlina, which makes nine performances in all (at 1,000 francs for each performance).

BAYREUTH. — Some time ago Hans von Bülow announced his intention of giving a series of concerts to raise 40,000 marks in aid of the Bayreuth Fund. Last year he forwarded 28,000 marks. In consequence of his neuralgic attack, however, he is unable to give more concerts at present; but, in order that the fund may not suffer, he has made up the deficiency — 12,000 marks — out of his own pocket.

A FINNISH RUNE.

Rendered into English by FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

Name not my name with the names of the singers,
Magical dreamers, great rune-weavers!
Not from within can I weave wild music,
'Tis from without that I weave sweet music.
Blossoms and brooks and birds and branches,
I can but sing what your voices sing me,
Borne on the winds and the rushing waters!
Could I, afar, through the wide world wander,
Far from the cares and the chains that crush me,
Then would I lull the wild sea to slumber,
Sing the wild sea to a lake of silver,
Lull the wild voice of the storm to silence,
Sing the gray sea-foam to milk and honey,
Were mine the magical power of the singers,
Musical rhymers, great rune-weavers!
Were mine the wondrous spell of the singers,
Golden hay-ricks should stand in the meadow,
Pease on the shelves, in the press, fine linen;
Fragrant fruit-trees should flower in the orchard,
Red-ripe apples should stud the green branches,
Rainbow dew-bloom on every ripe apple,
Cuckoos sipping the rainbow-bright dew-bloom,
Pearls in showers from their silver beaks falling,
Strings of pearl for my pretty wife's girdle.

Were mine the godlike power of the singers,
I would invoke, with songs of enchantment,
Love, health, beauty, justice, truth, plenty,
Joy to each heart, and peace to each hamlet,
Were mine the wonderful spell of the singers,
Magical, musical, strong rune-weavers!

Already, during his travelling and virtuoso life, Liszt had produced a respectable series of works, which, written for the piano, were intended to serve the immediate purpose of his virtuosity; but simultaneously with the new, and, compared with all before his time, unheard of technical perfection which they founded, these works for the most part gave expression to a poetic element. Such were his studies and transcriptions (particularly of Schubert's songs,) his Paraphrases, Fantaisies, and Polonaises, his "Hungarian Rhapsodies," the "Consolations," "Années de Pèlerinage," "Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses," the piano arrangements and transcriptions of the Beethoven Symphonies, and of the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz, as well as of works of Wagner, Rossini, Weber, Schubert, Bach, and others, in which he has achieved something inimitable.

And now, during his residence in Weimar, larger and more comprehensive musical deeds were ripening. Liszt now came forward as the master of great orchestral forms, and astonished the musical world with his twelve "Symphonic Poems." Wholly new appearances of their kind, they were both in idea and form his most unique creations. He takes some poetic theme, some fiction, some poetic character or incident for a ground thought, and, winning from it its musical sides, reproduces it in musical expression. The outward form grows out of the subject matter; it is as multifarious as the theme itself, and is more related to the overture than to the symphony. The sonata form, on which the latter rests, showed itself not elastic enough for the reception of a new poetic content representing a continuous progress of ideas, and so Liszt seized upon the free form of variations, as Beethoven had used it in the vocal movement of his Ninth Symphony—the point of departure for Liszt's collective instrumental writing. Out of one or two contrasted themes—or Leitmotive, if you will—he develops a whole succession of the most various moods, which through rhythmic and harmonic changes appear in ever new forms, corresponding to the three-fold law of alternation, contrast, climax.

This law, on which rests the principle of the sonata structure, is valid also here, in spite of the thematic unity and the one-movement form which leads to a freer construction of periods; indeed, the outlines of the four traditional movements are more or less discernible, although condensed. In his two grandest and most comprehensive instrumental poems, "Dante" and "Faust," which he entitled symphonies, Liszt preserved the independent division into movements, but within that division he manages matters in his own way. In both, which reproduce in tones the most profound poetic works that we possess—the Divina Commedia and Goethe's Faust—he has, again following the example of the Ninth Symphony, introduced choruses in the concluding movement. To the single movements he has given explanatory titles (for instance, Faust, Gretchen, Mephistopheles), as also to his symphonic poems, to make it easier to understand them and enjoy them; and he has prefixed programmes to explain the progress of ideas which he has essentially followed in their creation. In these he gives us either independent little poems, such as the verses of Victor Hugo and of Lamartine, for the "Mountain Symphony," for "Mazeppa" and the "Preludes," or an allusion to well-known larger poems, as in "Tasso" and "Prometheus," or he introduces us in "Orpheus" to a familiar mythical person, and in the "Heldenklage" lets us anticipate the great historical event there celebrated. The "Festival Sounds" and "Hungaria," as also "Hamlet," "The Battle of the Huns" (after Kaulbach), and "The Ideals" (after Schiller), he has left without programme, since he believed the title a sufficient indication of the ideas which guided him.

It is just this poetico-musical double nature of Liszt's orchestral creations, combined with their novelty of form (simply a result of their ideal contents) that has made them hard to understand, and, through their uncommonly exacting claims upon the public, has operated against their wide diffusion. In spite of their instrumental splendor, of the harmonic and contrapuntal art which they reveal, an opposition has fastened itself upon them, such as his piano compositions, serving the purpose of his virtuosity, had not experienced. But this opposition could not prevent the poetic tendency of Liszt from gaining ascendancy in all kinds of music, or from a steady progress in their popular recognition. Indeed, have not the most taking of his symphonic poems, like the "Preludes," "Tasso," "Orpheus," etc., and others of his instrumental works, like his piano concertos, which are based upon the same principle of thematic unity, already found their way into all concert halls? And are not his songs, also, and his church compositions heard with growing favor?

In the song, Liszt represents the carrying out of the poetic principle to its extremest consequences. The musician subordinates himself completely to the poet; a free declamatory element prevails, resembling Wagner's song-speech ("Sprechgesang"). I need only mention here the beautiful "Ich liebe Dich" (from Rückert); while, on the contrary, the most popular of all Liszt's songs, "Es muss ein Wunderbares sein," approaches the older song form the most nearly.

The poetic-character principle which Liszt has followed in the song and in his productions generally, the thematic unity principle which pervades his instrumental works, asserts its full right also in his compositions for the church. The Leitmotive (leading motives), out of which Wagner weaves the web of his musical drama, Liszt now makes available for the first time in the mass and oratorio. He turns to their advantage all the modern conquests of instrumentation and of the free play of form. Here also, true to the necessities of his nature, he creates what is new and great. As everywhere else, so also here, where his problem has been nothing less than the regeneration of the Catholic church music, he has given with full hands. Out of the fullness of his gifts we can only allude here to the mass for the Gran festival; to the Hungarian Mass for the coronation of the Austrian Imperial pair at Pesth; to the Missa Choralis, the Mass and the Requiem for male voices, the Psalms and Hymns, and the oratorios "Saint Elizabeth" and "Christus." This last named work, a creation full of incomparable originality and spiritual depth, is Liszt's most powerful achievement in the sphere of ecclesiastical art.

But the greater number of his religious compositions germinated not in Weimar, but in Roman soil. When, in December, 1859, the opera "The Barber of Bagdad," by Cornelius, a pupil of the master, fell through, the victim of a coterie opposed to Liszt, the latter retired from the direction forever. Moreover, since Dingelstedt became intendant of the Weimar theatre, the chief weight in the management of that stage was put upon the drama, while at the same time the foundation of the school of painting claimed too large a share out of the court budget to allow what would be required for the support of an opera and orchestra worthy of a Liszt. Suffice it to say, in 1861 he left Weimar and betook himself to Rome. There he received, on April 22, 1865, from Cardinal Hohenlohe, in the Vatican Chapel, the consecration which gave him the rank of an Abbate, to which has lately been added the dignity of a Canon.

But the favorite of Pio Nono remained still true to his artistic calling. Since 1869 he has returned once a year for several months to Weimar, taking up his abode there in the "Hofgärtnerei." Since then he has lived alternately in Rome, Weimar, and Pesth, where he formally entered upon his office as president of the Academy of Music in February, 1876.

We must count it among the finest merits of Liszt, that he has paved the way to publicity for innumerable aspirants, as he always shows an open heart and open hands to all artistic strivings. He is the first and most active furtherer of the Bayreuth enterprise, and the chief founder of the "Allgemeinen Deutschen Musikervereins." And for how many humanitarian objects has he not exerted his artistic means! If during his earlier virtuosic career he made his genius serve the advantage of others far more than his own,—saving out of the millions that he earned only a modest sum for himself, while he alone contributed many thousands for the completion of Cologne Cathedral, for the Beethoven monument at Bonn, and for the victims of the Hamburg conflagration—so since the close of his career as a pianist his public artistic activity has been exclusively consecrated to the benefit of others, to artistic undertakings, or to charitable objects. Since the end of 1847, not a penny has come into his own pocket either through piano-playing and conducting, or through teaching. All this, which has yielded such rich capital and interest to others, has cost only sacrifice of time and money to himself.

So also in his literary labors, in his celebrated works on "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "F. Chopin," "Robert Franz," and in his miscellaneous essays, he has exhibited, apart from the splendor of the exposition, and the wealth of intellectual ideas and points of view, this fine trait of his nature: this of lending the weight of his authority to things beautiful and great which were not understood, and thereby helping toward their better understanding. Therefore, from whatever side we contemplate this fruitful artist life, it shows us the exalting image not only of a great, but also one of the noblest of men.

MUSIC AT THE ENGLISH UNIVERSITIES.

[From Education.]

It is much to be regretted that at Oxford and Cambridge, although their respective Faculties of Music are of tolerably ancient date, there is no university school of music at which undergraduates desiring to take musical degrees can put themselves through a regular and defined course of training. It is true that at either university a few good musicians can be found of whose private tuition men are able to avail themselves, but practically nothing is done by the university authorities in the way of providing a recognized curriculum for such as are desirous of preparing for the musical profession. Beyond prescribing the work to be done for the preliminary and degree examinations, the universities have had little to say hitherto as to the mode in which the student is to acquire experience, as well as technical efficiency. Residents at Oxford or Cambridge have no frequent opportunity of hearing standard orchestral works performed by first-class bands. In both the university towns there are very creditable amateur orchestras, but of these can hardly be expected the perfection of skill to be met with at the operas, or at the Crystal Palace, and other important London concerts. When, therefore, any newly-made Doctor of Music is called upon to perform his degree-exercise at Oxford (the performance of the exercise is no longer required at Cambridge) he is compelled, at his own very serious expense, to engage the greater part of his orchestra in London, and convey them to the university. The time of professional orchestral players being very valuable, the candidate is constrained to hurry over the rehearsals, and hence it is that as a rule the exercise is imperfectly performed, and becomes at once an infliction upon the audience and a source of chagrin to the composer. We cannot see, therefore, what purpose of art these degree performances may be said to serve, unless it be to call attention to the lamentable lack of musical resources at the university.

Even in respect of church music, the ancient nursing-mothers of the arts can boast but little. The chapels of Trinity and King's at Cambridge, and of Magdalen and New at Oxford, still maintain their old reputation, but of the main body of college choirs the less said the better. Very little interest appears to be taken in the college services, or, indeed, in any musical matter, by the heads and Fellows of colleges in general, and as these together form the actual governing body of either university, we can hardly hope that the initiative steps towards reform will be taken by the universities themselves. External pressure must be brought to bear upon them; they must be made to feel that the art of music has claims upon them which they are bound to treat with respect, and that they have little moral right to hold examinations in a subject to the study of which they give no practical encouragement. Each university possesses its professor of music; but neither professor is resident, and the duties of each are limited to about half-a-dozen lectures per annum, and attendance at a half-yearly examination. It may reasonably be said that the universities could hardly compel the residence of musicians of such eminence as Sir Frederick Ouseley and Dr. Mcfarren; but in such a case they should be prepared to pay for their indulgence in a luxury by appointing well-qualified deputies to look after the well-being of the art within university precincts throughout the year. The lectures should be as frequent and numerous as those in other departments of science; while the practical studies should be cultivated under the eye of competent authorities armed with the direct sanction of the university. With the latter object, each university ought to subsidize a small but complete and efficient orchestra, for the illustration of lectures and the performance of classical works. It is as absurd to expect music to be cultivated in any high degree, minus these practical resources, as it would be to expect astronomy to be studied without an observatory, or chemistry without a laboratory. Not until we hear of such steps being taken can we hope that music will take its proper and ancient place among the Faculties, or its representatives hold a duly recognized rank in the "aristocracy of learning." While Sir Robert Stewart at Dublin, and Sir Herbert Oakeley, at Edinburgh, are fostering, by their presence and example, the art and its interests at those universities, English musicians have a right to ask for more downright earnestness and activity in the same direction at Oxford and Cambridge.

LA MUSIQUE AUX PAYS-BAS.¹

Among the numerous works connected with music which have of late years been issued from the press, a prominent place must be assigned to M. Edmond Vander Straeten's book entitled Music in the Low Countries, and at present in course of publication. Already most favorably known as a learned musicologist, M. Vander Straeten has by this latest production from his pen more than maintained his deservedly high reputation. The fifth volume now offered the public is even more interesting than the four volumes which preceded it, and bears abundant testimony to the patient research and conscientious zeal of its clever author. To use a vulgar but expressive saying, it is as full of matter as an egg is full of meat.

Mankind never, perhaps, stands perfectly still, but at no period, probably, has its progress been so marked and so rapid as during the last few years. This is exemplified not only by the electric light, monster steamships, sewing machines, and telephones, but by the improvement manifested in the way of treating intellectual subjects, such as that now occupying M. Vander Straeten's attention. In a note addressed to the Royal Academy of Belgium, on the 6th February, 1851, that is to say very nearly thirty years ago, M. Fétis, senior, said: "There can be no doubt that a good and solid history of Belgian music is to-day a possibility." By the way, it may be remarked that, as a rule, doubt, especially in relation to his own powers, was an element unknown to Fétis, senior, who, like the Prime Minister of whom Sydney Smith spoke, would, we are inclined to believe, had the chance been offered him, have willingly accepted the command of the mail-steamer and dingy, which about constitute the Belgian fleet. Commenting on the opinion enounced by M. Fétis, M. Vander Straeten inquires what, at that period, had research done for religious music, folk's-songs, the musical instrument trade, the maîtrises in the churches, vocal competitions, the ménéstrandies or corporations of minstrels, operas, or the private and professional life of prominent native composers and virtuosos? What archives had then been explored, with regard to these subjects, at Bruges, Ghent, Brussels, Ypres, Tournai, Liège, and numerous other populous and industrial centres, where there is an almost endless abundance of documents belonging to collegiate institutions, abbeys, communes, and guilds? Fétis believed, as M. Vander Straeten observes, that with the help of a few interesting facts, picked up here and there, and a collection, mostly exotic, of books, amassed with a patience certainly deserving the highest praise, he would be able to build up a musical history as important, complex, and difficult as that of the Netherlands. "What an enormous error!" says our author. "He was only at the commencement of the task to be executed and he thought he had reached the end. He had merely turned over the surface of the ground, and he already beheld an exhaustless mine!" From the above remarks, which, though severe, are merited, the reader may easily picture to himself the spirit animating M. Vander Straeten. We must add that the latter's ability and zeal worthily second his perseverance and enthusiasm. His examination of the dusty records of past ages, his ransacking of ancient archives, and his eager perusal of monkish chronicles, have yielded him a rich store of materials, a portion of which he has fashioned in the fifth volume of La Musique aux Pays-Bas into five chapters, headed respectively: 1, Van Helmont (Adrien-Joseph), or Popular Songs; 2, Monte (Philippe de), or the Imperial Flemish Chapel at Vienna; 3, De Croes (Henri-Jacques), or the Royal Chapel at Brussels under Prince Charles of Lorraine; 4, Monqué (Antoine), or Musical Bibliography; and 5, De Sany (Théodore), or the Glory of the Chimes. Such are the matters set forth, explained and illustrated in the five chapters. As the limited space at our disposal forbids our entering into details, we must content ourselves with praising generally M. Vander Straeten's latest contribution to musical literature, by cordially recommending it, and by saying with old Montaigne: "C'est icy un livre de bonne foy, lecteur." — London Musical World.

MUSICAL CHATS.

BY GEORGE T. BULLING.

NEW SERIES.
II.

I think there is nothing in the world which bespeaks a narrower mind, than the blind and absolute worship of old masters in music, and the utter ignoring of the new. Bowing down to old fossils while we wilfully forget the living and breathing life round about us, is equal to burying our head in the sand, ostrich-like, so that nobody may steal a march on us. Let us treat both new and old with equal respect. We must not, however, place Wagner ahead of Mozart, for instance, purely by reason of the newness of his musical ideas. He has only created a new era in music for his successors to alter and prune down, just as he is pruning down, or, should I say, embellishing the music of the masters who lived before him. He is a greater scientist in music than he is musician. He is intensely original as well as originally intense by nature. The beautiful compositions of his earlier years, which he now disowns, were the outcome of his original nature.

His later works exhibit the intensity of the scientific side of his nature. Yet, no fair-minded man will deny that Wagner will do great good for music. It will be a battle of the same ever-contesting forces — the physical and the spiritual. It is impossible to deny that Wagner aims at highly physical effects, and has dogged will-power and strong intellect to force those effects on men's minds. But, the physical must wither and die, while the spiritual lives on forever. Just as sure as his ideas and effects are invested with this indispensable spirituality, they will live. If they are merely physical, they are doomed to die. His music-dramas appeal to the eye and to the ear. His blare and crash of brass in the orchestra must certainly be looked upon as an effect calculated to startle the ear, rather than appeal to the more delicate musical feelings of the listener. His great aim seems to be to envelop everything in an exciting mystery, even from the mythical subjects of his music-dramas, down to placing the orchestra out of sight, and doing likewise with melody itself. That simplicity which is the birth-mark of true and pure art, does not seem to belong to Wagner's music. But let us listen attentively to the compositions of the startling innovator, we may learn something from them.

The law of association of ideas acts a prominent part in music. Most of us have experienced that two or three notes from a strain of music will be sufficient to start within us a long train of remembrance, sad or sweet, as the case may be. This accounts, in a measure, for the personal likes and dislikes for certain compositions which individuals so frequently exhibit. A man may dislike a certain work simply because it has certain associations connected with it which are unpleasant for him to recall. In this connection, the perfumes of flowers have an analogous effect on human beings. There are strong individual associations connected with them. They, too, like music, vividly excite the memory and imagination, and the measure of their effect is usually governed by the extent of the poetic susceptibility of the individual concerned. On most fine poetic organizations, the perfume and sight of beautiful flowers has an effect akin to that wrought by sweet music, or the contemplation of grand works in painting and sculpture. Such effect has its physical attributes, which are by no means necessarily sensual. The deep lover of nature must possess strong poetic sensibilities, and, therefore, usually has a sincere appreciation of art. The man who loves the perfume and sight of flowers is pretty sure to be a music-lover. The artistic organization which does not appreciate beauty in all the multifarious phases of nature and art, is more or less incomplete. Of course, in a man, the burden of his appreciation will be held by that branch of nature or art toward which he has a special leaning. If his soul and mind be eminently musical, the contemplation of nature or works of painting and sculpture will suggest to him musical feelings, and even ideas. If he be a painter, his listening to grand music, or his contemplation of the inspiring scenes of nature, will stimulate him to new exertions in his special field of art. Hence comes the positive advantage to an artist of living in a distinctly artistic atmosphere. Here he will be surrounded by everything that will tend to develop his genius. He must possess an eminently broad soul which will grasp every thought and subtle suggestion, and yet focus them all to the aggrandizement of the special branch of art for which he lives and labors. Therefore, an artist should not live too exclusively shut up in his own art, but ought to exist more or less for all art and all nature. The bee gathers sweet succulence from many flowers, and yet devotes it all to the luscious honey. The musician who knows little or nothing outside of music, sadly belies his title. The limits for his adequate musical education, extend far beyond the line of music proper. He may become a wanderer in many lands, and yet return to the home of his heart with greater joy and understanding than ever.

THE DEATH OF OFFENBACH.

Jacques Offenbach, the best known of the three representative composers of opera bouffe, is dead. Hervé and Lecocq remain. There is a popular notion that Offenbach was the creator of this flippant school of music, but this is an error. Hervé was the real founder, and brought out his earlier works, which were in one act, in little café concert-halls. They were full of drollery, bizarre scenes, and rollicking music, and the libretti were suggestive and humorous. They soon became the rage, and all Paris heard them with acclaim. His success brought Offenbach into the field, and later Lecocq. Hervé did not write his larger works, like "L'Œil Crevé," "Chilperic," and "Le Petit Faust," until Offenbach had thoroughly seized upon and developed his ideas, and the school of opera bouffe was permanently established. In reality, Offenbach's "Orphée aux Enfers," the first of his works, was the death-blow to Hervé's popularity, and afterwards Lecocq, with his "Les Cent Vierges," "La Fille de Mme. Angot," "Girofle-Girofla," "Le Petit Duc," "La Camargo," and other works, helped to dim the lustre of Hervé's success, though he was a better musician than either of the other two. Hervé's fame was local to Paris. Offenbach spread the reputation of opera bouffe all over the world, and thus it is that his name is the most closely identified with it.

Offenbach was born at Cologne, June 21, 1819, and was a Jew. Had he been a German it is doubtful whether he would ever have located himself in Paris and made for himself a reputation in a school of opera which has not a German characteristic in it. Germany has no writers in this school. Von Suppé is often called the German Offenbach, though there are no points of similarity between the two. Suppé's operas more nearly resemble the opera comique. There is nothing of the bouffe flavor about them. For two years, Offenbach studied in the Paris Conservatory, and in 1847 was appointed leader of the band, as Barbereau's successor, in the Théâtre Français. His first works were mere trifles, set to the fables of La Fontaine, and showed that he had an aptitude for pleasant, jingling melodies. The only legitimate reputation which he made was as a violoncello soloist, and his love for that instrument may be seen by the effective manner in which he uses it in his scores. In 1855, he became director of the Bouffes Parisiennes, where his earliest works, "Les Deux Aveugles," "Bataclan," and "Trombal-Cazar," were produced, but these were mere trifles. Not long after he assumed the directorship he made the acquaintance of Meilhac and Halévy, then rising dramatists, and they conceived the idea of going into ancient mythology and reducing the gods and goddesses to the condition of the modern farce. They commenced with the legend of Orpheus searching through Hell for Eurydice, in which the entire group of the Olympian deities is modernized, both dramatically and musically, in the most ridiculous manner. The piece was an instant success, and "La Belle Hélène" followed, which was a laughable travesty of life in the royal household of the King of Sparta, in which these ancient heroes appear in a manner anything but stately or dignified. "Orpheus," which is his best work, ran 800 nights. "La Belle Hélène" was brought out in 1864, and first made Mme. Schneider famous. "Barbe Bleue" was the third opera of his writing. It was produced in 1866, but it was lacking in brilliancy as compared with its predecessors and has never been a great success.

His rivals already began to charge that he had written out, but in the next year he astounded them all and made his name known the world over with "La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein." It was a travesty on the Spanish Court, and it is said to have actually assisted in driving Isabella from the throne. Be this as it may, its coquettish Duchess, bombastic General, intriguing courtiers, and ridiculous army commended themselves instantly to popular favor. Its music was unlike his other works. Its melodies were very taking, its instrumentation very brilliant, and its spirit of burlesque keen, sharp, rollicking, and excruciatingly droll. There is not a song in all his writing that can compare with the "Dites lui" for real beauty, unless it be the "Serenade" in "Genevieve de Brabant," and there is not a situation in any of his operas that can compare with the conspiracy of Gen. Boum, Baron Grog, and Prince Paul in the Duchess's apartments, in drollery, and in the happy reflection of the sentiment of the text in the music. Schneider made a triumph in the title rôle. All Paris rushed to see it. It was played in twenty-three French theatres at one time. It traveled over Europe like wild-fire. It crossed the water a year afterwards and soon went the length and breadth of our own country. It was whistled and sung on the streets. It was played on every piano and hand-organ. The bands caught it up. Innumerable potpourris appeared. It infected opera-goers, and the decline of the legitimate opera began with its advent here. It was kept alive with fresh actresses, who excelled each other in vulgarity and positive indecency. It heralded the coming of the spectacle and the leg drama. So fascinated were people with its lively numbers that they forgave even the bestiality of a Tostée.

"La Grande Duchesse" brought Offenbach to the summit of his fame. He has written numerous operas since, among them "Genevieve de Brabant," "La Perichole," "La Princesse de Trebizonde," "Les Brigands," "Le Roi Carotte," "La Vie Parisienne," "Les Braconniers," "Madame Favart," and numerous others, but in all of them he repeats himself. The vein in which he worked has yielded little since "La Grande Duchesse." There is every indication that opera bouffe has had its day, and none stronger than the tendency of the opera bouffe troupes to take up the works of the opera comique and even legitimate operas for performance. It was the fashion of a period, — a fashion which for a time did great harm to legitimate music, corrupted the popular taste, and at least did not benefit public morals. Its day has passed, however, and now that its representative writer is no more it will pass from the stage still more rapidly. The most that can be conceded to Offenbach is facility in lively melodies, agreeable dance rhythms, and a harmony that has some superficial brilliancy. His first four or five works were strong in these effects. The others have kept the stage by means of coarseness and suggestiveness in the dramatic situations and lavish displays of personal charms on the stage. But these in their turn have ceased to attract, and without them opera bouffe is tedious and dry. Much as we may admire Offenbach's humor, his industry, and his thorough and keen appreciation of burlesque, he has written nothing that will live, nothing that has made the world better, nothing that has refined or elevated music. His name as well as his music will soon be forgotten. — Chicago Tribune.

A FRENCH VIEW OF WAGNER.

The distinguished French littérateur, M. Henri Blaze de Bury, includes, in a recently published volume, a paper on Richard Wagner and the so-called Music of the Future. M. Blaze de Bury is a man of very decided opinions, which do not form themselves upon the popular model. As to music, at all events, he is far from being, in thought and in feeling, a typical Frenchman, since he never hesitates to attack the most distinguished French composers with a vivacity and point that, to an onlooker, are quite refreshing and edifying. When such a man speaks about Wagner, his remarks, whatever their actual value, cannot fail to be of interest, and on the strength of this assurance we ask attention to the substance of his paper on the Bayreuth master.

The writer begins by repeating a conversation he once had with Meyerbeer on the subject of Richard Wagner. The theme was far from pleasant to Meyerbeer, who could not hear Wagner's name pronounced without a disagreeable sensation which he, ordinarily discreet in such matters, took no pains to conceal. M. Blaze de Bury's words are, that "the name of the author of 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin' had upon Meyerbeer the effect of a dissonance" — a result hardly to be wondered at, perhaps, even by those who look for its cause no further than the pages of "Oper und Drama." On one occasion Meyerbeer rallied M. Blaze de Bury for being reticent about Wagner, and then ensued the following dialogue:—

B. "The music of the future, you know my opinion—it is 'Don Giovanni,' 'Fidelio,' 'Guillaume Tell,' 'Der Freischütz,' 'Les Huguenots.' There is not an idea in the pretended theories of Wagner that has not been worked out in advance by Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, and yourself. But, on the other hand, there are many things in 'Fidelio,' 'Der Freischütz,' 'Guillaume Tell,' and 'Le Prophète,' which Wagner and his school have left out of their system, because they could not use them in their scores. However"—

M. "Ah! there is a 'however'?"

B. "Yes, maestro, for me at least, who have seen so many knowing ones deceive themselves, and so many oracles of to-day confounded by the verdict of to-morrow."

M. "But the public! do you dispute that we have there a very important criterion?"

B. "Important, yes, but not infallible; witness 'Il Barbiere' hissed at Rome, and the immortal 'Freischütz' rejected at the Odéon."

M. "Then, according to you, a day is coming when Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' will rank with those chefs-d'œuvres?"

B. "Please heaven such consequences will not follow. It is not sufficient to weary, provoke, and deafen the present in order to have a right of appeal from it to the future. . . . The author of 'Tannhäuser' is revolutionary only in his theories, for his music presents nothing that Beethoven and Weber have not said, and said better. As is that music to-day, so it will be in ten years, in thirty years. It has no secrets to show, and that is why I reproach it. You read as in an open book its merits and its defects—merits, alas! negative; defects without character—good sometimes, tiresome often, unintelligible never. . . ."

After this prologue, which is perhaps open to the complaint that Meyerbeer did so little of the talking, M. Blaze de Bury addresses himself to his argument.

Our author begins with a laugh at Wagnerian pretensions. To claim for Wagner the highest personification of art, present and future, is, he says, "one of the pleasantries which should be left to men gifted with skulls hard enough to make a breach in the sacred temples of the old masters"—men such as he who recently was so good as to say that "Mozart's operas are still of some value, and worth preserving." Reference is then made to Wagner's embodiment of the genius of poetry and music in one person. Here M. Blaze de Bury hits out. "At one time," he tells us, "Wagner thought himself a simple poet, and wrote dramas in verse which no one would play. Finding that poetry treated him hardly, he turned to music. 'You prevent me from making a small fortune; be it so, Monseigneur, I will make a big one,' as the future Cardinal de Bernis said to the Minister who refused him a place. Had the young dramatist's piece succeeded the least in the world, Richard Wagner would have been content to remain a poet like others, without a thought of reforming an art, even the elements of which he had not, at that ingenuous epoch of life, troubled himself to master. O supreme power of Vocation! how many things explain themselves thus? I have cited the example of Cardinal de Bernis. Richard Wagner appears to me rather to resemble those misunderstood priests who found a religion through hatred of that which has not made them bishops. Sprung from a race of comedians, he scribbled tragedies, mixing up in a heap 'Hamlet' and 'King Lear.' One fine day, hearing Goethe's 'Egmont' at Leipzig, with Beethoven's music, he thought that if some such music had been written for his piece, perhaps it would have been put on the stage somewhere. A disappointed poet; a musician by circumstances; a comedian by race—there you have all the man and all the artist."

Our author next deals with the "continuous melody," which expresses not only a situation but a word. This he accuses of making into a whole things intended to exist apart, each in its particular sphere, and to develop themselves according to their proper natures and end. M. Blaze de Bury strongly insists upon this distinction. "Music is one art, and poetry is another; which does not imply that, though perfectly separate, they ought not to approach each other. All good music has its poetry, as all good poetry has its harmony, its rhythm, its music; but each art keeps to itself its technical means, reserving them for employment in due time and place. . . . Did Schiller and Goethe, in creating their theatre, fancy themselves cutting out work for the musicians of the future. On the other hand, did Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, writing sonatas and quartets, in which poetry abounds, imagine themselves to be composing anything but music?" Protesting that music is sufficient unto itself, our author goes on to say: "A sonata of Beethoven's has no words; but that does not prevent it from having poetry. What clearness there is in this intimate dialogue of the master with his instrument! Follow the musical phrase and, better than the best verse, it enables you to understand the profound drama of humanity unrolling itself before you. No feature of the master's soul escapes you, you hear its most secret vibrations of joy and sorrow, its tenderness, its meditations, its frenzy, and when it laughs or weeps the expression remains always simple, always true; a moral altitude maintains itself. . . . But in the works of the poets, especially in their dramas, there is material with which music does not agree. Music assimilates to itself characters, passions, and situations; but long tirades disconcert it; the recitatives of Telramond, like those of Thérèse, terrify it. A few drops of essence suffice to perfume a vase; four words of love, jealousy, or anger, are enough for the development of a grand morceau." As to the supremacy of music and the composer, as compared with poetry and the poet, we read: "The moment music comes into play it commands, and the words obey. For proof, observe that, however bad the verse may be, it cannot affect the music; while the finest stanzas are unable to do anything on behalf of music that is worthless. Such power has the musician that he can save the poem, if it be ridiculous, and destroy it, if it be sublime. Let the composer be Beethoven, and out of a berquinade springs 'Fidelio'; let him be Weber, and from the most incoherent, the most silly book of fables 'Euryanthe' disengages itself." Continuing the argument, our author denies the possibility of any such instantaneousness between word and note as Wagner's theory assumes. "In spoken language the words arrange themselves successively, and I perceive them only after the phrase is formed and my memory has collected them. Music, on the contrary, seizes me from the first note, and takes me along without leaving either the time or the power to return upon my steps. How can we hope to establish a complete union between forces so diverse?"

Taking as a text the remark of Ambros, that "if Wagner's principles become generally recognized and adopted as the laws of art, we may at once cry 'Finis musicæ!'" M. Blaze de Bury discusses, in a very interesting manner, the question whether music has not reached the limit of its development. Here space does not allow us to follow him, but we may quote one passage which shows pretty clearly his view that the present is a time of decadence. After referring to the "joyous and cordial parody of the ancient régime," he says: "This is not the parody by which the actual theatre is poisoned. Modern burlesque humor kills the idea, and with the idea the man who has been inspired by it. They speak of reviving Gluck upon the stage, and we shall see what becomes of 'Iphigenia,' 'Orpheus,' 'Eurydice' developing their grand pantomime, and their serene majesty, before an assembly saturated with cynical jokes, and still warm with the refrains of 'La Belle Hélène.' 'The music of the future! here it is,' said Rossini, one day pointing to a score of that repertory, comparable to certain plants, rank, entangled, that cover the surface of a lake, and keep from its waters, once transparent and profound, the light that comes from on high. Enthusiasm, respect for beautiful and holy things, we have renounced, but in return we scoff, sneer, and gambol to a marvel, and if we do not lift our hands towards heaven, we lift our legs in turning wheels." If the music of the burlesque theatre be one form of the music of the degenerate future, our author asserts that there is another—the music of Bayreuth, and "the more foolish of the two may not be that generally supposed." "Look on the side of the Fichtelgebirg, to the little town where lived the honest, modest, excellent Jean Paul; there dwells, enshrined in his presumption, a man who believes himself the Deity, and to whom his faithful priests never cease to sing mass. He thrones himself in his Walhalla among giants, Norns, and Walkyries, and when he has finished talking to Odin, he proposes to himself a task—strange, unlikely, even for a god—to correct Beethoven and amend Gluck. . . . Alphonse X., King of Castile and Leon, was fond of saying, 'If God had done me the honor to consult me, many things in creation would be better than they are.' So reasons this personage. 'In Beethoven's place, I should have done thus, and without more ceremony he gives to the clarinets the part of the oboes, cuts, writes over, adds to, and generally treats the text as though it were the work of a pupil. . . . To correct Beethoven and amend Gluck is less the effort of a great mind misled than of a Prudhomme."

The author professes to discover in Wagner much adroitness in turning the flank of difficulties, and much skill in, by a move of the hand, making riches out of poverty. "No one knows better than he the defects in his cuirass, and hence his habit of getting inside the mailed coat of legendary heroes, assured, in advance, of public favor." More than this, he diverts public criticism from his music to his theory, and appeals from the present to the future, which has no voice wherewith to condemn. "To address the future is always a convenient thing, and it costs little to proclaim truths which cannot be contradicted by experience. True art knows nothing of such pretensions as these."—London Musical Times.

A GERMAN EISTEDDFOD.

A month ago the narrow streets of the old city of Cologne were crowded with five or six thousand men—Belgians, Dutchmen, Switzers, and Germans, members of singing societies, who had come to take part in the Festival by which the Kölner Liederkrantz—the oldest singing-club in the town—celebrated its jubilee. The chances of travel found me at hand, and at ten o'clock on Monday morning I joined the crowd which was pouring into the Gürzenich, a fine old hall of the fifteenth century, broad and lofty, with noble roof of carved wood—our own Westminster Hall in miniature. At least three thousand people were packing themselves within this hall, filling not only every seat, but every inch of standing room. The heat was stifling, yet the interest was keen.

This was not the beginning of the Festival. On Saturday evening there had been a reception of visitors, and an instrumental concert. On Sunday morning the societies, arriving by train and steamer, had been marshalled in one long procession, which had paced the principal streets. Before the start, the Liederkrantz had sung Kreutzer's well-known part-song "It is the Sabbath Day." The procession over, the afternoon had been devoted to the preliminary competitions held simultaneously in five concert-halls, before juries made up from the twenty-two judges who were engaged for the occasion. Altogether there had been on Sunday eight competitions, in which no less than 118 Societies had taken part, and it was the eight victors who were now on this Monday morning to compete for a prize given by Her Majesty the Empress of Germany.

The orchestra, which was not large, was nearly filled with listeners; only a small vacant space in the centre marked the spot where the competing choir was to stand. In front of the orchestra, some yards back, was the judges' table, where I recognized the large and manly figure of the veteran Franz Abt, beside whom Ferdinand Hiller, short and round, was almost eclipsed. But who are these in gray jackets, a white cock's feather in their high felt hats, who file up on to the orchestra amid deafening applause? This is a Tyrolean choir from Innsbruck, and they sing with much delicacy and gentleness, the conductor guiding them with his hand merely. They are followed by the Cecilia Society of Godesburg, a Rhine-land village, which shows drill, but also a hardness of tone which more or less characterizes all the German choirs we hear. The next burst of cheers heralds an Amsterdam choir, in which we notice the fine basses—human bombardons—which seem to flourish only on the Continent. After another German choir comes the St. Nicholas Society of Liège, in Belgium, singing with a fire and force that was terrific, and a touch and attack that spoke of hours of patient and searching drill. A German choir from Nippes sang next, and then the Dresden Liedertafel, refined and smooth, showing culture more than force. The last was a second choir from Liège, the Cercle Chorale de Fragnac. Then came a few moments of eager expectancy. The vast audience stood waiting the verdict of the judges. It was soon given, and with a shout of "Dresden" the crowd made for the doors.

At five o'clock in the evening the hall filled again. Choirs which had won a first prize in previous Festivals, formed, in this Festival, a class by themselves, called the Highest International Honor-Class. These choirs were larger, and sang more difficult music than those we had heard in the morning. The choirs at the earlier competition had each sung a piece of their own selection; the five choirs which now entered the lists sang two pieces each, one of them an "Hosanna" by Ferdinand Hiller, which occupied a quarter of an hour, and was crowded with difficulties. The minimum strength of choirs in this class was seventy, and the best of them showed largeness of effect, voluminous tone, with the precision, the ease, and the neatness of fine machinery. At half-past eight the verdict was given. The Verviers Choir (Belgian) took the first prize, the Chénée Choir (also Belgian) the second, and the Rotterdam Choir the third. Thus the Germans were left wholly out in the cold. The members of the Continental Singing Societies, as is well known, are but imperfect readers. Each part is rehearsed separately, and learnt by heart from the piano; the parts are then combined. One does not like to say anything which may seem to disparage the power of reading at sight, but this habit of memorizing produces the most finished and perfect results. English choirs, with one or two exceptions, do not know the meaning of "precision" as it is predicated of these foreign choirs. They have the altogetherness and the perfectly united movement which we find in a first-rate orchestra, the members of which have played together for years. Neither in attacking nor in leaving the tones, whether they be loud or soft, can individual voices be distinguished; all is blended and homogeneous. Short staccato chords are delivered like the volley firing of a crack regiment; it is "all at once and nothing first." The only fault which need be noticed is the tendency to force the voices at the expense of smoothness and pure tone. This is perhaps natural to men whose lungs are generally stronger than their throats.

The large audience greeted each choir as it ascended the platform with great cordiality, and applause, more or less vociferous according to the character of the singing, marked the conclusion of each piece. The first sign of every choir was a heavy banner richly embroidered with gold, and hung in most cases with many medals, which rattled against each other as the standard bearer advanced. This was followed by a small banner on which the name of the choir and the number of singers it contained stood out in clear white letters.

It is curious that in all the competitions the minimum, not the maximum, number of singers in each choir was fixed by rule. The result was that the choirs varied considerably in size. The mode of classifying the choirs was interesting. There were four classes for the German choirs, each of which had its prizes. The first class was for choirs from villages of less than 3,000 inhabitants, consisting of at least 20 singers. In the second class these numbers were raised to 10,000 and 25 respectively; in the third class to 25,000 and 35; in the fourth class the town must contain upwards of 25,000 inhabitants, and the choir at least 50 singers. The Belgium choirs were divided into two classes on the same plan, 20,000 inhabitants being the dividing line. The Dutch choirs, being few, were not divided. At the first blush this method of classification seems arbitrary, but one sees the justice of it on reflection, for large towns will naturally have a larger pick of singers, and ought, therefore, to produce larger and better choirs than the small towns. Pretty medals were cast in honor of the Festival and worn by most of the singers.

The conductors arrayed their men in very compact form, evidently counting much on this to promote solidity of style. With the exception of the Switzers, whose characteristic dress I have already noticed, the singers wore broadcloth. They clustered close around their conductor, and fixed their eyes on him while singing.

The etiquette of the Festival was interesting. No societies or individual singers belonging to Cologne were allowed to take part in the fray. They were in the position of hosts, and the competing societies were their guests. For each competition one of the city societies was told off as a "greeting choir" (Begrüssende Verein), and the proceedings invariably began with a chorus sung by the greeting choir. In every way this was a happy arrangement. It displayed the modesty of the Cologne societies, while it allowed the public to see how they could sing. The organization of the Festival was complete. Five committees managed severally the music, the literature, the art, the lodgings, and the procession. The programme was a most carefully edited pamphlet of 144 pages, sold at the very low price of sixpence. It begins with a poem which gives vent to the feelings proper to the occasion. Then follow lists of officials, conditions, prizes, with the names of the honorary, active, and inactive members of the Cologne Liederkranz. We then have a history of the Society from its foundation in 1855, to the present time, written in a somewhat mock-heroic tone, which must be excused at such a moment. The programme of the four days follows, and then the words of no less than 137 pieces which the different societies had chosen to sing. These were numbered, and the number being called out as each began, the words were easily found. The last section of the book is occupied with lists of the members of all the competing societies.

On Tuesday morning the winning choirs assembled for the distribution of prizes by the mayor. There was some instrumental music, and the Liederkranz sang Mendelssohn's "Festgesang." But on Monday afternoon and evening the great majority of the choirs left the town. As the day wore on they crowded the railway station, and snatches of their songs mingled with the shrieking of the engines and the hissing of the boilers. The men who belonged to successful choirs wore in their hats a card with the word "Preis" written hurriedly upon it, and looked rather jaunty, while those who carried no label looked matter-of-fact. But all were in a good humor.

It is instructive to study a Festival of this sort, which fits so naturally into Continental habits, and yet would be utterly foreign to English ways. The first remark an Englishman makes, especially if he is married or hopes to be, is that these five or six thousand men represented probably an equal number of wives, present or future, left at home. To say nothing of musical advantage, the way in which English men and women take their pleasures together is surely better than the separation which prevails abroad. In England we hear men's-voice singing as a rare and delightful change from the prevalent mixed-voice singing. On the Continent the proportions are reversed. Now, men's-voice singing much sooner becomes monotonous than mixed-voice singing. The Germans themselves feel this. A German musical critic whose acquaintance I made during my subsequent stay at Bonn, spoke very disparagingly of the singing clubs, in which, he said, art was subordinated to beer. He regarded mixed-voice choirs as much better in every way. The reform, however, does not lie with the musicians to accomplish. The men's singing clubs are the expression of a social condition, and this must be changed if mixed choirs are to become common. — Tonic Sol-Fa Reporter, Oct. 1.

TREMONT TEMPLE CONCERTS.

ORGAN EXHIBITION. As a sort of prelude to the dedicatory oratorios and concerts in the new hall, there was a private exhibition, numerously attended, on Friday evening, Oct. 8, of the splendid organ built by Messrs. E. and G. G. Hook and Hastings to replace the one destroyed in the burning of the Temple. A description of the organ will be found below. The selections on this occasion were well suited to exhibit the qualities of the noble instrument, which contains 52 speaking registers and a total of 3,442 pipes.

The first part of the programme was purely classical and performed by Mr. B. J. Lang. That grand, full-flowing five-part Fantasia in G-major of Bach, with its sparkling prelude, which Mr. Lang used to play some years ago on the great organ of the Music Hall, was followed by an exquisitely sweet and tender movement from Bach's Pastoral in F. The former showed the full organ, with its massive and well balanced harmonies, to good advantage. The latter was played upon a stop so soft and delicate, that, what with some noise around, we found it difficult to hear some parts of it. Then came one of Schumann's fugues on the letters of Bach's name; but not the improvisations or a theme from Bach set down in the programme.

Mr. S. B. Whitney, organist of the church of the Advent, in a Bach fugue in C, a Fantasia in three movements by Berthold Tours, transcriptions of the Vorspiel to Lohengrin and other things from Wagner, and a transcription of his own Vesper Hymn, put the organ through its paces as an orchestral and solo instrument. A great variety of voices of bright and individual character and color were exhibited, — more of the brilliant than of the subdued and tender, as it seemed to us, like the shine of fresh paint, — but great distinctness, and prompt outspokenness. The "Stentorphone" and "Tuba Mirabilis" (8 ft. pipes), which he casually let loose, were tones of startling solidity and loudness, such as might wake the dead. But if excess of brilliancy is too much the prevailing character of the organ, probably there is much which time and use will mellow and subdue and sweeten.

HANDEL'S "MESSIAH" was given on the formal opening night (Monday, Oct. 11,) by the Handel and Haydn Society, Mr. Zerrahn conducting, and Mr. Lang at the organ, as usual. The chorus of the Society, about one hundred short of its usual number on account of the limitation of the stage, was well displayed upon the curving tiers of seats in front of the elegant and cheerful architecture of the organ, and the orchestra occupied the space in the middle, the whole being brought so far out into the auditorium, that everything was clearly heard. It was as a whole a very spirited and excellent performance. The choruses came out with uncommon unity and promptness of attack, sharpness of outline, and a ringing, rich ensemble. The shading, too, was good, and the accompaniment for the most part felicitous. Miss Lillian Bailey, who sang here for the first time since her studies in Paris, and her successful career in England, took the soprano solos; and, considering her youth, and the yet juvenile though much improved quality of her voice in firmness, evenness and fullness, acquitted herself most creditably. In the scene "There were shepherds" one missed of course the grand power and nobility of the great sopranos we have heard in that, like Jenny Lind, Nilsson and others; but the young lady's tones are pure and clear as a bird, her intonation faultless, and all the exacting arias were well studied and agreeably sustained with good style and expression. Miss Emily Winant's rich contralto voice seemed richer and more satisfying than ever before; she sang with unaffected, simple truth of feeling. Mr. Wm. J. Winch, somehow, was not at his best in the tenor airs and recitatives. Mr. M. W. Whitney gave the bass solos in his grandest voice, and with rare spirit and effect. The chorus singing frequently roused the audience to enthusiasm. But the audience was only moderate in numbers. The greater part of it occupied the cheaper seats in the vast upper end balcony, — the best place undoubtedly for hearing; but the heat and want of ventilation there were complained of as intolerable. This, we presume, can be remedied.

THE PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA, of forty instruments, B. Listemann conductor, gave the second of these concerts on the following (Tuesday) evening. At the hour announced for the beginning, half-past seven, scarcely any audience had presented itself. At about ten minutes before eight, people began to pour in, about half filling the floor; the great end gallery we could not observe from the back of the floor, where we sat waiting until after eight for the musicians to appear upon the stage, a searching, cold, pneumonic draught the meanwhile sweeping through the open doors behind us (how much more safe and comfortable the side entrances of the Music Hall!), so that one of the prime conditions of yielding one's self up heartily and freely to the influence of music, however excellent, was wanting. This was one of those little drawbacks incident to the first trials of a new hall, which we trust time will correct. — Mr. Listemann's orchestra appeared to be thoroughly trained, and gave a satisfactory rendering of what we dared to stay and hear of the following programme:

Overture, "Leonore," (No. 3) Beethoven
Introduction to "Lohengrin" Wagner
Violoncello solo, "Fantasie Melodique" C. Schubert
Mr. Alexander Heindl.
Serenade and allegro (with orchestra) Mendelssohn
Mr. Otto Bendix.
Remember now thy Creator Rhodes
Ruggles St. Church male quartet.
Two Slavonic dances Dvorak
Melodie, "Sätterjens Länding" Ole Bull
(Arranged for string orchestra by Svendsen.)
Miniature march Tschalkowski
Saxophone solo (air Tyrolenne Varié) Leo Chic
Mr. Eustach Strasser.
Polonaise in E List
Piano solos, Prelude Chopin
Rhapsodie List
Mr. Otto Bendix.
When evening's twilight Hatton
Ruggles St. Church male quartet.
Concert waltz, "The Village Swallows" Strauss

Mr. Heindl's cello solo was artistically played; and Mr. Bendix gave a clean and graceful rendering of the Serenade and Allegro gioioso of Mendelssohn. The selections of the church male quartet were rather monotonous and commonplace, but were sung with sweetly blended voices, in a style refined almost to sentimentality, after certain more experienced models.

MENDELSSOHN'S "ELIJAH," again by the Handel and Haydn Society, drew a considerably larger, but no means a full audience on Wednesday evening. Again we had a spirited and careful rendering of this popular oratorio as a whole. There was a change of solo vocalists. Miss Fanny Kellogg, to whom were entrusted the principal soprano arias, seems to have gained in volume and in carrying power of voice, and sang with intelligence and fervor, and with much declamatory force. Miss Winant, the only soloist in the preceding cast, sang "Oh rest in the Lord" in a manner most impressive. We have heard nothing more beautiful in its way for a long time; and all her part was equally satisfactory, she bearing off the chief honors of the evening. Mr. Charles R. Adams gave the first tenor recitative and aria: "If with all your hearts," with that artistic perfection of style, enunciation, and expression, which is always his so long as his voice is free from hoarseness. Through this air it served him well, but became somewhat clouded afterwards, although "Then shall the righteous shine" was superbly sung. Mr. John F. Winch appears to have studied lately to some purpose, for he was in great voice, and sang with more freedom and energy than he was wont to manifest. The assistants in the quartets and angel trio were Miss Lucie Homer, Mrs. C. C. Noyes, Mr. G. W. Want, and Mr. D. M. Babcock. All rendered good service.

It was on the whole an unfavorable week for a series of grand concerts, particularly in an unaccustomed hall. Many of the most musical families were still out of town; there was too much politics in the air and in anxious patriotic minds; beautiful evenings and a reluctance to give up the summer's fascinating freedom, etc., etc., all together proved too strong for the charmer, music, to overcome.

MR. OLIVER KING'S CONCERTS.

This young man of twenty-four, pianist to the Princess Louise of Canada, is devoting his holidays, during the absence of the Princess in Europe, to making himself a little known both as pianist and as orchestral composer in the States. He was born in London, and studied first with Barnby, afterwards for four years at Leipzig, where his piano concerto, dedicated to Reinecke, was produced at the annual Hauptprüfung at the Conservatory.

His first concert here, on Monday evening, Oct. 11, was unfortunate in want of management. The evening was badly chosen, being that of the Messiah at the Temple. The place was badly chosen; the great Music Hall, not a quarter filled, and mostly with unmusical deadheads, recruits at the last moment evidently, — people who went out in the middle of a piece, slamming the doors behind them, — must have had a chilling influence upon the young artist. Yet he carried through his very classical programme, with the assistance of Miss Fanny Kellogg in some songs, with the amiable patience of a saint, and managed to prove himself an accomplished interpreter of such works as Liszt's transcription of Bach's G-minor Fantasia and Fugue, a Prelude and Toccata by Lachner, Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E-minor, the "Carnaval" scenes of Schumann, the Ballade in A-flat of Chopin, the "Wilde Jagd," by Liszt, besides a tender and graceful "Legend," by himself. Mr. King has a clear and brilliant touch, a fluent execution, and plays like an intelligent musician, perfectly at home and at ease in his work. The chief fault was uniformity, the same unflagging, unimpassioned, even energy throughout, not wanting in freedom, grace or accuracy, but in fire. He played all from memory.

His second concert (Friday evening) was remarkable as offering three of his own compositions in large form, with orchestra: a piano concerto in three movements, a symphony in five movements (never performed before), and a concert overture. This was a courageous undertaking for so young a man. Of course there was the disadvantage of a brief rehearsal; but Mr. Listemann and his orchestra gave it their best care, and it was evident that the young composer had the sympathy of the musicians. It was at least shown that he had made earnest studies. He knows how to compose, how to shape a thing in regard to form, how to develop themes; and he understands the use of the orchestra. In spite of crudities, of youthful extravagancies, of leanings here and there toward Liszt and Wagner, we found the works interesting; the overture particularly, which is perfectly clear and symmetrical, composed of three distinct subjects, in marked contrast to each other, and all three worked out together to the end.

In all these compositions he shows no lack of ideas and resources, but he is not always so successful in the products as he is in this overture and in the finale of the Symphony, which is clear, original, and beautiful. The first Allegro is in strict sonata form, to be sure, and has interesting themes, yet somehow, as it went on you could fancy yourself in the middle of some Lisztian Symphonische Dichtung. The short Andante was pleasing and idyllic. The Allegro Scherzando (in 6-8 measure) was of the wildest, most audacious in its sudden contrasts — no lack here of fire! The Adagio was more than we could fathom; very long, obscure, monotonous it seemed, abounding in close, chromatic, creeping harmonies, and altogether modern. The Concerto was to us the least satisfactory of the three works. It has brilliant passages, which he played brilliantly, but, taken as a whole, we felt a lack of clear and positive intention. It is, however, absurd to pass any judgment on such works after a single hearing; they have merit enough, at all events, to entitle them to a nearer acquaintance and examination. Certain faults of instrumentation were more than once apparent. For instance, the tiresome, persistent Wagnerian squel of the violins upon very high tones; sudden irruptions of trombones, etc., vanishing as suddenly; and, worst of all, the pervading restlessness, the want of repose, which is so characteristic of the new school of music. But Mr. King has talent, perhaps something more; and he is so earnest a musician, so well read and trained, and so appreciative of Bach and Beethoven, that we confidently expect something better from him. He is modest, open and ingenuous, as well as earnest; and he has already won respect and sympathy here among those whose appreciation is worth having.

The concert was relieved by some artistic and effective harp performances by Mme. Chatterton-Bohrer. Her rendering of a Gavotte by Gluck was particularly edifying after a restless modern symphony.

THE NEW TREMONT TEMPLE AND ITS ORGAN.

The reconstructed Temple has been opened and used as a hall for music during the whole of the past week. There was a private exhibition of the new organ, one of the very finest in the city, on Friday evening of the week before, and many persons were invited to go over the whole building on the following (Saturday) evening and inspect its many beauties and conveniences. On Monday (Oct. 11) and Wednesday evenings the oratorios of the Messiah and Elijah were performed; on Tuesday there was an orchestral concert by Mr. Listemann's Philharmonic orchestra; on Friday evening, a popular concert; and on Saturday a children's matinee. Of the first three we speak elsewhere. We deem it unwise to form an opinion of the acoustic qualities of a great hall, as compared say with the Music Hall, before we have had time enough to begin to feel perfectly at home in it. There are always numerous little drawbacks and confusing circumstances in the first trial of a brand new hall, — a certain sense of rawness, however brilliant its aspect, and however distinctly every sound asserts itself within its walls. This commonly wears off in time, as all that speaks to eye and ear gets gradually toned down and harmonized. In the matter of sound, in fact, we have often imagined that it must be with music halls as it is with violins, that it requires time and use to bring all the vibrations into sympathetic accord. We must say, however, for the present, that we found the hall extremely beautiful, and that the sounds of instruments and voices came out clear and brilliant. We missed the amplitude and simple grandeur which we feel on entering the Boston Music Hall, and we miss, of course, the thousand musical associations, the inspiring memories of musical experiences such as we can hardly hope to ever have surpassed, which hang about those noble walls. The new hall, in spite of its elegance, still seems a little cramped and stiff to us in comparison with it. And we fear that the problem of making it seat an equal number of persons with the Music Hall has been only solved by too close packing, while the enormous depth of the end upper gallery, and the great width of the side galleries contracts the main hall so that the sense of spaciousness is wanting. Yet we have little doubt, that, next to the Music Hall, it is one of the very finest halls for music in this country. — But let experience report of it from time to time. Meanwhile we borrow a description from the Daily Advertiser:

There was little in the appearance of the reconstructed Tremont Temple, as it was opened for the first time last evening for a private exhibition of the new organ, to remind one of the old Temple that has been only a memory for more than a year; not always a fragrant memory, either, as one thinks of it dingy, sombre, ill-ventilated, and so difficult of entrance and egress. Very few persons went up the steep, narrow stairs which led to the gallery without a moment of suffocation as the thought flashed across them what would be their probable fate in case of a fire. Such ugly thoughts were stifled as soon as possible, although they had a very uncomfortable way of obtruding themselves at intervals during an evening. It was fortunate that when the fire did come it was at a time when no one was in the trap. With the new building everything is most radically changed, and there is no place in the city which can be cleared more readily in case of fire or panic. The halls and corridors are wide, with doors opening into them at short spaces, and there are three stairways leading from the second gallery to the floor. The entire building can be emptied in a few minutes, even of a crowded audience. This fact alone will tend to make it one of the most popular concert halls in the city, and its exquisite architectural beauty and artistic decoration will also aid in this direction. A double flight of easy marble steps leads from the street to the floor of the Temple. A handsome vestibule occupies the space between the stairways, and the ticket offices, of which there are two, are situated directly under the stairways. Out of the corridor at the head of the stairs the main hall opens. Nothing remains to remind of the old hall but the square outline, which is much the same, the coloring and arrangement are so different. The platform, which is lower than the old one, occupies nearly half the floor, but there is a semi-circle of seats in front and on either side of the organ, so that no space is lost by the depth of the platform. The organ occupies the entire end of the building, and is one of the handsomest organs ever seen in Boston. It is in the cathedral shape, is painted a delicate cream color, with exquisite decorations in dull gold; the pipes are of black tin, as bright as burnished silver, and in perfect accordance with the other coloring. While there is some beautiful carving, the general effect is of elegant simplicity. There are two balconies, each easy of access, and with numerous doors swinging outward. The front of the balconies is white, and is in a very pretty design. The chairs are of ash, covered with green leather. The coloring is particularly harmonious and restful. The walls are tinted a pale chocolate ground, and with this color buff and blue are used with the most charming effects. The ceiling shows panels of blue crossed off with heavy carved beams in dark wood. Four large chandeliers with crystal jets and drops, and fourteen smaller ones in the same design, add lightness and brilliancy, while the side lights in the first balcony have also the crystal drops. A very little gilt is used, just enough to give life to the cooler tints, but not enough to become obtrusive. The corridors are tinted pale blue, all the wood-work being painted a soft, pale brown to harmonize. It is entirely unlike any other public building in the city, and certainly goes far ahead in the beauty of architecture and harmony of decoration. Mr. Carl Fehmer, the successful architect, has every reason to be proud of his achievement.

The Meloson is as much altered for the better as the Temple itself; while the approach remains the same, yet the room itself has the appearance of being more "above ground," and it has been raised and well arranged for ventilation, and is now the very prettiest small hall in the city, and the best adapted for chamber and classical concerts, recitals, etc. A gallery surrounds three sides of the hall, which seats over two hundred persons. The decorations are chiefly in pale neutral tints, with here and there a touch of color; the chairs are of ash, with maroon leather covering, and the gas jets surround the eight ornamented columns which support the hall above. The work of rebuilding has been thoroughly done, and although the exterior remains unchanged, that is all that is left of the old Tremont Temple.

THE NEW ORGAN.

The new organ built by Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook & Hastings was privately exhibited last night before a large audience, in which the musical profession of Boston was largely represented. The organ is the fourth which the firm have built for the Temple, the two large ones which preceded it in 1846 and 1853 having been burned in 1852 and 1879 respectively. In the matter of size it is exceeded by several in this city. But so far as artistic completeness is concerned, regard being had for the avowed purpose of the builders — the production of an organ for concert use — and in thoroughness of construction, it is outranked by none. From the schedule which we print below it will be seen that brilliancy is the main feature of the instrument. In this respect it bears a strong resemblance to the most famous French organs, and it will be found especially adapted for the performance of transcriptions of orchestral compositions. The full list of registers is as follows:—

GREAT ORGAN.

16 ft. Open diapason, metal.	24 ft. Twelfth, metal.
8 " " "	2 " Fifteenth, metal.
8 " Viola de gamba, metal.	4 " Rks. mixture, metal.
8 " Doppelflöte, wood.	4 " Rks. acuta, metal.
8 " Gemshorn, metal.	16 " Trumpet, metal.
8 1/2 " Quint, metal.	8 " Trumpet, metal.
4 " Octave, metal.	4 " Clarion, metal.
4 " Flute harmonique, metal.

SWELL ORGAN.

16 ft. Bourdon, wood.	4 ft. Rks. dolce cornet, metal.
8 " Open diapason, metal.	16 " Contra fagotto, metal.
8 " Salicional, metal.	8 " Cornopean, metal.
8 " Std. diapason, wood.	8 " Oboe (with bassoon), metal.
8 " Quintadena, metal.	8 " Vox Humana, metal.
4 " Flauto traverso, wood.	4 " Clarion, metal.
4 " Violina, metal.
4 " Octave, metal.
2 " Flautino, metal.

CHOIR ORGAN.

16 ft. Lieblich Gedackt, wood.	8 ft. Melodia, wood.
8 " English open diapason, metal.	4 " Flute d'Amour, wood and metal.
8 " Gelgen principal, metal.	4 " Fugara, metal.
8 " Dulciana, metal.	2 " Piccolo, metal.
8 " Std. diapason, wood.	8 " Clarinet, metal.
	8 " Vox angelica, metal.

SOLO ORGAN.

8 ft. Stentorphone, metal.	8 ft. Tube Mirabilis, metal.
----------------------------	------------------------------

PEDAL ORGAN.

16 ft. Open diapason, wood.	8 ft. Octave, wood.
16 " Dulciana, metal.	16 " Trombone, wood.
16 " Violone, wood.	8 " Trumpet, metal.
10 1/2 " Quintflöte, wood.	32 " Bourdon, wood.
8 " Violoncello, metal.

There are fourteen couplers and other mechanical registers, and ten pedal movements and combinations, including a "grand crescendo" by means of which the whole organ may be brought on from the softest stop, and diminished at the will of the player. All the newest discoveries and inventions in the art of organ-building, including a water-engine for keeping the organ supplied with wind, have been made use of. The scale of the pedal organ is from C-1 to E-o, thirty notes, and of each of the manuals from C-o to C-4, sixty-one notes. Summing up its resources we find that there are 52 registers (besides the mechanical movements), which embrace 3442 pipes. Only those organists who have been permitted to play on the instrument can speak "by the card" of its action, but from one of them, at least, and a high authority, we have the most enthusiastic praise for its quick response. As for its sound, we can safely say that it gave great satisfaction to those who take most delight in brilliancy.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., Oct. 10. — I have neglected this correspondence a long time, and hereby apologize, offering as an excuse nothing better than summer laziness, and a dearth of important musical events. I ought to qualify this latter statement, however, for I might have given you an account of Mr. W. S. B. Mathews's summer Normal at Evanston, where I had the honor of being a teacher. The full corps of teachers was as follows:

W. S. B. Mathews, Principal,—Lecturer on the Art of Teaching, and Musical History; Teacher of the Piano-forte and Musical Interpretation.
Wm. B. Chamberlain, A. M., Voice-Building, Singing, Elocution, Chorus Directing, and Song Recitals.
John C. Fillmore A. M., the Piano-forte, Harmony, and Counterpoint.
Calvin B. Cady, the Organ, Piano-forte, Harmony, and the Art of Teaching.
Miss Lydia S. Harris, Piano-forte Recitals, and Teaching.
Mrs. Julia E. Hanford, Voice-Building and Singing.
Miss Mary H. How (Contralto), Song Recitals and Solo Singing.
Wm. H. Sherwood (Virtuoso Pianist) in five Recitals—Aug. 12-17th.

The pupils of the school were not numerous, but their intelligence and their eagerness to learn made the work of teaching delightful. Then, whoever works with Mr. Mathews finds himself stimulated to his highest activity, and the best in him drawn out, so that the result of the whole was a musical and intellectual atmosphere such as I have not often found in this country. Mr. Sherwood (finally assisted by Mrs. Sherwood) gave us five noble programmes in a thoroughly admirable way, and the song recitals of Miss How and Mr. Chamberlain were also very valuable.

As for music here: We have a new violinist in Mr. Gustav Bach, son of our local orchestra conductor, Mr. Christopher Bach. This young man has just returned from three years study in Leipzig, and has given a concert in which he played the difficult Lipinski concerto, and two smaller pieces of his own composition, and made a most favorable impression both as executant, interpretative artist and composer. He was creditably assisted by his father's orchestra, and by local soloists.

The Heine Quartet announces a series of six recitals of chamber-music.

The Arion Club announces no concerts, but may give one or two by and by. They are now working privately, and I hear that Mr. Tomlins is training them vigorously.

The Musical Society has issued the following programme of its thirtieth season:

First Concert, Friday, Oct. 22.
Symphony by Joachim Raff, "Im Walde" (In the Forest), first time.
Scenes from the "Golden Legend."
Prise Composition by Dudley Buck, for Soli, Chorus and Orchestra.
First Soirée, Tuesday, Dec. 7.
Second Concert, Friday, Jan. 28, 1881.
"Odysseus," for Soli, Chorus and Orchestra, by Max Bruch.
Second Soirée, Tuesday, March 15.
Third Concert, Friday, April 22.
"Elijah," Oratorio by Mendelssohn, for Soli, Chorus and Orchestra.

The mixed chorus is composed of 120 members; the Grand Orchestra will number 60 performers.
Members have free admission to the general rehearsals. J. C. F.

CHICAGO, OCT. 15. — Since my last note to the Journal, there has been some controversy going on in the Chicago Tribune, in regard to the merits of Mr. Boscovitz as an interpreter of Chopin's music. There was considerable doubt expressed, by one writer, that Mr. Boscovitz was in reality a pupil of that master. This brought a reply from another writer, that Mr. Boscovitz took lessons of Chopin during the last year of the composer's life; Mr. Boscovitz being at that time eleven years of age. To a person outside of the musical circle these little controversies would seem very trifling. But they arise from the fact that musicians have allowed themselves to be badly managed, or that they follow false advice. To have a pianist advertise himself as a pupil of Liszt and Chopin, and to depend upon that statement to advance his claims to public attention, is a mistaken notion. We have had too many examples of people hiding in the shadow of another's greatness, and expecting to gain a reputation thereby. It matters very little to a public who the instructors of a musician may have been. The question they are interested in, is, what is the man himself; what are his talents and accomplishments? And by these alone will he rise or fall in the public's estimation. We have had a number of pianists who claim Liszt for a teacher, and I have never discovered that this fact made any difference in the estimation that the musical people made of them. A true artist will seek nothing but personal recognition, and this will come from the manifestation of his own powers. It is possible that even a pupil of Liszt might play badly, and that a pianist who had been under the direction of Chopin might be mistaken in his interpretation of the great master's musical thoughts. It is far better, in these days, to stand or fall by one's own ability, than to gain notoriety by living in the shadow of another's fame. I have often thought, that in the art-world many musicians bring upon themselves the censure of the thinking people, simply by indulging in controversies of which there is not the slightest need. When a pianist appears in public we have nothing to do with his teachers, but we draw our estimation of him from his own performance. If he be a Rubinstein our admiration is unbounded, and if he is even a pianist of fair skill, we give him a measure of our praise, but he must be content to stand by himself, for thus alone will the world judge him.

The Liesegang-Heimeudahl String Quartet opened their season with a concert on Tuesday evening of this week. They played Mozart's quartet in E-flat, and the quintet of Schubert in C-major. Mr. Charles Knorr sang an air from the Joseph of Mehl. The playing of this club is very enjoyable, being marked by sympathy and correctness of balance. Quartet playing is very enjoyable when each musician is deeply in sympathy with the work to be performed, and plays with finish and a proper sense of feeling. Each player must be one part of a whole, and aim at a completeness of performance, which forbids anything like self being made a prominent element. Each instrument is made subordinate to the other, until they all agree in one purpose,—that of a perfect whole. Thus it is possible for the work to be rightly performed. In every musical composition of any real merit, there is an art-principle which connects every part into one perfect whole. It is in realizing this central idea, and making it understood by the listeners, that the power of the real musician is made manifest. To magnify one melody, or to intensify one part of the work, at the expense of the other portions, may indeed call the attention of an audience to one beauty, but it disfigures the art-form, which is intended to give the content and meaning of the composition when taken as a whole. A composition may have beautiful moments, but it must form also a beautiful whole, to be considered a complete work. Our little organization is beginning to realize the need of proper interpretations, and each member is sinking the idea of self, and is thus perfecting the quartet. They deserve praise for their true effort in behalf of correct quartet playing.

A pleasant concert was given last evening in Fairbanks Hall, which presented a varied programme, although mainly devoted to piano-forte music. Mrs. B. F. Haddock, Misses Morton, Dutton, Mrs. Smith, Messrs. Clark, Boscovitz, Shafer and Baird, taking part. The programme contained some good music, and taken as a whole proved attractive. Mr. Emil Liebling will shortly give the first of a series of piano-forte concerts. He will produce some of the modern works for the piano-forte and string instruments. The Apollo Club are rehearsing Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," which will be performed at their first concert. It is a mighty work, and will require great endurance and skill on the part of the choruses, when a full performance is given. — But my letter lengthens. C. H. B.

LOCAL ITEMS.

BOSTON. Mr. John A. Preston gave the first of three Recitals on the new Tremont Temple organ, last Wednesday noon. His selections were interesting: 1. The great G-minor Fantasia and Fugue of Bach, which, though otherwise well played, he took at a fast tempo better suited to the piano, making the lower voices in the harmony not quite distinct. 2. Mendelssohn's Sonata in F-minor, beautifully rendered with fine combinations and contrasts of stops. 3. A very characteristic Rhapsodie in A-minor, by Saint-Saëns, new here, pastoral, romantic, quaint. 4. Chorus from Handel's Judas Maccabeus. — In the second recital, to-day noon, he will be assisted by Mr. George Chadwick, in a Fantasia for four hands, by Adolph Hesse. Last recital Wednesday next.

The Handel and Haydn Society's programme for the coming season, as far as made up, is as follows: Sunday, Dec. 26, "The Messiah," with Mr. W. C. Tower and Mr. George Henschel, as soloists; Jan. 30, Mozart's "Requiem Mass" and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives;" Good Friday, (April 15), Bach's "Passion Music," with Mr. W. J. Winch, Mr. J. F. Winch, and Mr. Henschel; Easter Sunday (April 18), an oratorio not yet decided upon. All of these concerts will take place in Music Hall.

The first concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra will be given Nov. 5, Mr. Franz Rummel appearing as piano soloist. There will be five concerts. See circulars at Music Hall, etc.

— The full programme of the first Harvard Symphony concert (Nov. 18), is as follows: Overture to "The Water-carrier," Cherubini; Aria (first time) from Handel's opera "Alessandro," Miss LILLIAN BAILEY; Seventh Symphony, Beethoven; three old Scotch and Irish songs, arranged by Beethoven, with piano, violin and 'cello accompaniment, Miss BAILEY; Overture to "Julius Cæsar" (first time), Schumann.

Second concert (Dec. 2): short Symphony in C, (first time here), Haydn; Piano Concerto, No. 2, in A, Liszt, Mr. MAX PINNER, of New York; short Symphony in A-minor, No. 2, (first time) Saint-Saëns; piano solos; overture to Egmont. The third concert (Dec. 16), will contain (second time) Prof. J. K. Paine's "Spring" Symphony; Violin Concerto, Max Bruch, played by Mr. T. Adamowsky; two short overtures to "Alceste," Gluck (first time), and to Tito, Mozart; and probably a vocal Aria.

Subscription lists for the eight concerts will remain open at the Music Hall and principal music stores until Nov. 8.

— Madame Capplani has returned from her visit to the West, where she was cordially received, and where the demands upon her professional services occupied nearly all her time. She will divide her residence this winter between Boston and New York, having taken rooms in the latter city, at 351 Fifth Avenue, where she will receive her pupils on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday each week; meeting her pupils here on Thursdays, Fridays, and Saturdays.—Gaz.

— Signor V. Cirillo, by the advice of his physicians, will spend the coming winter in Italy, where he will visit and thoroughly inspect the great schools of singing, and inform himself upon every new feature introduced into their courses of instruction within the last eight years.

Sig. Vanini, also, has been forced to return to Italy for health.

CAMBRIDGE. — The Harvard students having decided to rival the success of the Oxford students in producing a Greek play, looked about for some one who would undertake the leading part and finally found an excellent man in Mr. Riddle, who has undertaken to learn seven hundred lines of Sophocles's "Oedipus Tyrannus" before next May. The remaining characters will be taken by students. Though the work has but just started, it has received more than the necessary impetus by the intense interest already felt by professors and students. Professors White and Goodwin are to drill the actors in pronunciation; Professor Charles Elliot Norton will plan the costumes, with reference, of course, to strict historical accuracy: the one scene is to be designed and superintended by a prominent architect, and George Osgood will lead the chorus. Sanders Theatre is admirably adapted to a Greek play, and, if the plans are brought as near historical and dramatic perfection as they already promise, the production of "Oedipus Tyrannus" will be an epoch in the history of classics at Harvard.—N. Y. Tribune.
Mendelssohn composed no music to the Oedipus Tyrannus, and Prof. Paine has been invited to try his hand at it.

CINCINNATI. The directors of the College of Music, anxious to utilize their immense hall in every worthy way, now come forward with the announcement of a grand Opera Musical Festival, to be given by the College, with Col. J. H. Mapleson, during six days in February next, and "on a scale of magnificence unparalleled in this country or in Europe." The musical directors will be Sig. Ardit, Otto Singer, Max Maretzek, and concertmeister S. E. Jacobsohn. Orchestra of 100 musicians; mass chorus from Cincinnati, of 300 voices; great organ; "largest and most complete stage in the world;" and a long array of distinguished solo singers, including Mme. Gerster, Mlle. Valleria, Mlle. Belocca, Miss Annie Cary, Sigs. Ravelli (first appearance), Campanini and other tenors; Sig. Del Puente, Galassi, Monti, etc., etc. The repertoire includes Lohengrin, Moses in Egypt, (Rossini), Fidelio, Boito's Mefistofele, and the Magic Flute. It is called "The People's Opera," and the prices are put within the reach of the masses. We trust the best hopes will be realized, and that the interests of good music will be promoted by this novel festival.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE. The new Stadttheater was opened on the 18th October, in presence of the Emperor Wilhelm, with a Festspiel, written expressly for the occasion. The opera was Don Juan. The dramatic season will be inaugurated by a performance of Schiller's Wilhelm Tell, got up on a scale of appropriate magnificence. The 18th of October was selected for the opening, because it is the anniversary of the battle of Leipzig and the birthday of the Crown Prince.

SCHUMANN ON STRINGED QUARTETS (1838).¹

FIRST QUARTET MORNING.

Quartets by J. Verhulst, L. Spohr, and L. Fuchs.

"We have had the Schuppanzigh, we have the David quartet, why should we not also have"—thought I to myself, and then conjured up a four-leaved clover. Then, addressing these, said I, "It is not long since Haydn, Mozart, and another lived and wrote quartets; have such fathers left unworthy descendants behind, who have learned nothing from them? May we not investigate, and somewhere perhaps discover a new genius in the bud, and needing only the touch of encouragement to bloom? In a few words, respected friends, the instruments are ready, and there are many novelties, some of which we may play in our first matinée." And, like experienced musicians, without much ado they were soon seated at their desks. I shall gladly give a report of such works as occupied our morning, if not in critical lapidary style, at least in the easy manner suitable, yet firmly holding to first impressions, such as they made on me and on the players; for I rate the impulsively outspoken execration of musicians higher than whole systems of aesthetics.

Nothing ought to be said of the quartet by Verhulst, as it was yet warm from the workshop, still in manuscript, and its composer's first quartet. But as the future will certainly offer us many delightful things by this young artist, as his name is certain to reach final publicity, he may be introduced as a musician of fame, whose Dutch nationality makes him doubly interesting. We have lately seen young talent of all sorts of nationalities arising among us: Glinka of Russia, Chopin of Poland, Bennett of England, Berlioz of France, Liszt of Hungary, Hansens of Belgium; in Italy every spring brings forth some, whom the winter destroys; finally, we have one from Holland, a country that has already given us many good painters.

The quartet of our Hollander betrays nothing of the phlegm with which his countrymen are reproached, but, on the contrary, a lively musical disposition, that has certainly found some trouble in restraining itself within the bounds of so difficult a musical form. It was promising to find that precisely that movement in which the existence of genuine music best expresses itself—I mean the adagio—was the most successful of the quartet. On such a path the young artist will attain strength and facility; an instinct of order and correctness secures him from great errors, and it need only be his care to attain more fulness, elevation, and refinement of thought, though this is certainly more the affair of intellect than of will.

Our quartettists then played a new one (Opus 97) by Spohr, in which the well-known master greeted us from the very first measure. We soon perceived that a brilliant display of the first violin was more the object here than an artistic interweaving of the four parts. Nothing can be said against this manner of quartet writing, which makes great demands on a composer, when it is done openly and naturally. Forms, changes, modulations, melodic entrances, all were in the well-known Spohr manner, and it seemed as if the quartettists were discoursing in the work of a very well-known subject. A scherzo—not exactly this master's strong point—is wanting, but the whole possesses a contemplative didactic character. In the rondo we are attracted by a very pretty theme, which, however, needs a second more marked one as a pendant. The following remark was suggested to me by a complaint of one of the quartet players. Young artists, who always desire something novel, and, if possible, eccentric, esteem too lightly the easily-conceived and perfected works of finished masters, and are greatly mistaken in supposing that they could accomplish the same thing equally well. The difference between master and scholar can never be overcome. The hastily thrown off pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven, and still more those of Mozart, are equal proofs in their heavenly ease of these masters' pre-eminence, as are their deeper manifestations; finished mastery plays loosely about the lines drawn from the beginning of the work, while younger, more uncultivated talent, whenever it leaves the foot-hold of custom, strains ever tighter at the yoke until misfortune is the result. To apply this remark to Spohr's quartet: If we forget the composer's name and his famous achievements, we still find a masterly form, invention, and mode of writing as far removed as heaven itself from that of the scribbler or student. The advantage of the superiority won by means of study and industry is, that it remains ductile even to advanced age, while superficial talent loses facility through neglect.

A quartet (Opus 10) by L. Fuchs, published about a year ago, was highly interesting to us all. The composer lives in Petersburg, where he cultivates our noble art in small circles, generally esteemed as a teacher of composition, of which he proves himself now to be practically a master. The quartet is not too involved to be comprehended, at a first hearing, in its heights and depths, when one holds the score in one's hand, as we did; and even without this latter assistance, its originality in form and contents is striking. One thinks oftenest of Onslow as the composer's model; and yet he gives proof of having studied the remote art of Bach, as well as the more recent manner of Beethoven. This is, in contradistinction to that by Spohr, which we have just described, a true quartet, in which each part has something to say; and often really fine, often oddly and unclearly interwoven conversation between four men, during which the spinning out of the threads is as attractive as in model works of the most recent period. We do not often find the concentration and reserve of Beethovenian thought—in this the quartet is a little behind-hand; but it is generally interesting throughout for its rare earnestness and polished force of style, if we except a few insipid measures. Its form seems to us a good one, and is especially piquant in the jig and the last movement. The jig does not properly belong to this quartet; I am certain of it, for the manuscript contains quite a different scherzo, one more suitable to the other movements, but less interesting than this; yet from its alteration it happens unfortunately that the jig is in B-flat major, while the following (last) movement is in C-minor; a succession of keys which I cannot endorse in a form that draws much beauty from the quality of severity. In the andante, the new Russian popular song (by Lwoff) is introduced and varied, after the manner of a well-known Haydn quartet. Such foreign ideas rarely fall in with one's own flow of thought, and I, in this case, should have preferred to offer a work all my own, rather than one in which strict criticism cannot even recognize the attraction of patriotism. However, we trust this esteemed artist may really possess, as we hear he does, a store of quartets, wholly his own, ready for publication and for the gratification of the friends of genuine quartet music.

SECOND QUARTET MORNING.

Quartets by C. DECKER, C. G. REISSIGER, and L. CHREUBIN.

If I compare together the faces of many trembling musicians ascending the Gewandhaus staircase, on the way to perform some solo or other, with those of our quartettists, then the latter appear to me far more enviable. They form their own public, and need not feel any anxiety whatever; nor does the appearance of a listening child at the window, or the interruption of some nightingale outside, cause them any disturbance. And so they prepared, with the usual enthusiasm, to plunge into a newly-arrived quartet from Berlin (Opus 14), of Herr C. Decker, and found it just the thing for such an enthusiastic mood; that is to say, of a very cooling nature. What can be said of a work that certainly displays preference for noble models, and striving towards an ideal, but that yet produces so little effect, that we envy the talent of Strauss, who shakes melodies out of his sleeves and gold into his pockets? Shall we blame? Shall we mortify a composer who has done all that is possible to him? Shall we praise, where we feel that we have not experienced any real pleasure? Shall we dissuade the author from further composition? That would be of no advantage to him. Shall we advise him to write more? He is not rich enough to do so, and would drive the business in a mechanical manner. So we prefer to bear witness to the artistic zeal of those who compose without the inspiration of genius, and at the same time advise them to write on industriously, but with the prayer that they will not, therefore, publish everything. Even the errors of great talent, from which we can learn and reap advantage, belong to the world; but mere studies, first attempts, should be kept within one's own four walls. I term the quartet of this composer, studies in quartet style. He succeeds in many ways; he perceives correctly the style and character of music in four parts; but the whole is dry, bony, wanting in swing, in life. The good and well-designed beginning of the quartet awakens hope, but there it stops; the second theme appears poor, and sticks fast. The working out in the middle movement, with the inversion of the theme, is not devoid of merit, though we perceive that it has been done laboriously; but the return to the original key is easily and happily done, and the close of the first movement is praiseworthy. But we have to search for all that is good in it. The adagio has the same dryness; on the other hand, we meet with more vital elements in the scherzo, some very pretty groupings and reflections, amid which the trio stands out very well, especially on its repetition. The finale has the same faults and good qualities which we have remarked in the first movements, with the apparently increased life which a quicker tempo brings with it, and some good points, but nothing that touches more deeply or gives more pleasure. Good will and intelligence have the pre-eminence here; the heart is left empty. But we cannot deny him the consideration which every young composer deserves when he makes an attempt in one of the most difficult styles; so we advise him to write on courageously, but first, if possible, to spend a year in fair Italy or elsewhere, in order to nourish his imagination with gay pictures, and to bring forth fruit and flowers at some future time in place of the leaves and branches of to-day.

And then we came to something new in musical literature, a quartet by chapel-master Reissiger, the first he has published (Opus 111). It pleases one beforehand to find a composer, whom we had supposed perfect in certain forms, trying his hand at something different and more difficult. No man works with greater freshness than when he commences at a new style. On the other hand, every new attempt in a yet unfamiliar form presents its difficulties even when undertaken by a master-hand. Thus we see Cherubini shipwrecked on the symphony, while even Beethoven—as we learn from Dr. Wegeler's recent information—must have often made the attempt at his first quartets, since a trio was the result of one, and another became a quintet. So many points in this first quartet by Reissiger, such as the frequent quaver accompaniment in the second violin and viola, certain orchestral syncopations, etc., betray the practised vocal and pianoforte composer; but his good qualities are also lavishly displayed; we find rounded form, lively rhythms, euphonious melodies, though certainly interspersed with familiar things that remind us of Spohr (the commencement), Onslow (the trio of the scherzo), Beethoven (the passage in E-major in the first half of the first movement), Mozart (the C-sharp minor passage in the adagio), and many others. I cannot allow great original value to the quartet, or predict for it a very long life; it is a quartet for good amateurs, who will have enough to do in it, though the artist will be able to read a page through at a glance; a quartet to be listened to openly by clear candle-light among fair women, though Beethovenians may close their doors to luxuriate over his every single measure. To speak of separate movements, I give the preference to the scherzo, especially bars five to eight in the trio; and next to this the first movement, if it only possessed a less commonplace form and a less insipid close. The adagio seems to me too flat for its breadth. The rondo is ordinary throughout; just so might Auber compose a quartet.

We closed with the first of the already long-published quartets by Cherubini (No. 1 in E-flat major), regarding which a difference of opinion has arisen even among good musicians. The question is not as to whether these works proceed from a master of art—about this there can be no doubt—but whether they are to be recognized as models of the genuine quartet style. We have grown accustomed to three famous German masters as models in this branch, while, with just recognition, Onslow, and then Mendelssohn, have been admitted to the circle of followers in the path of the three first. And now comes Cherubini, an artist who has grown gray in his own views, and in the highest aristocracy of art, the best harmonist yet among his contemporaries in spite of his age; the learned, refined, interesting Italian, whom I have often compared to Dante, on account of his firm exclusiveness and strength of character. I must confess, however, that even I experienced an unpleasant impression on hearing this quartet for the first time, especially after the first two movements. It was not what I expected; many things seemed to me operatic, overlaid, while others appeared small, empty, and opinionated. It may have been the result of that youthful impatience in me which did not at once discern the significance of the graybeard's often wonderful discourse, for in many ways I otherwise traced the master commander to his finger tips. But then came the scherzo, with its enthusiastic Spanish theme, the uncommon trio, and lastly the finale, that sparkles like a diamond whichever way it is turned, and there could be no doubt as to who had written the quartet, and whether it was worthy of its master. Many will feel like me; we must first become acquainted with the peculiar spirit of this, his quartet style; this is not the well-known mother tongue with which we are so familiar; a polite foreigner speaks to us; but the more we learn to understand him, the more highly we must respect him. These remarks, which give but a slight idea of the originality of this work, must suffice to call the attention of German quartet circles to it. For performance it needs much—it needs artists. In an attack of editor's arrogance I wished for Baillot (whom Cherubini seems to have had in his mind) as first violin, Lipinski as second, Mendelssohn at the viola (his principal instrument, with the exception of the organ and pianoforte), and Max Bohrer or Fritz Kummer at the violoncello. But I heartily thanked my own quartettists, who, at parting, promised to return soon, and to make me, as well as themselves, acquainted with the other quartets by Cherubini—regarding which new readers may expect new communications.

(To be continued.)

ERNST FERDINAND WENZEL.

[From the Leipzig Signale. Translation from the Boston Evening Transcript.]

Among the many thousands who during the last forty years or more have visited Leipzig or watched the course of musical events, there are surely not many who will not at one time or another have come across the name of Wenzel; and no doubt all regretted to hear of the death of one, whose chief characteristics were his amiability, truth, fidelity, extraordinary perceptive powers, and vast experience. Hundreds of pupils of both sexes have passed under his guiding hand and attained proficiency by his untiring efforts throughout the last decades. Over one and all he exercised the same healthy and beneficent influence, furthering and developing their talents, cultivating their several tastes, widening their mental horizons, and almost invariably inspiring them with a love and reverence which in individual instances amounted to positive adoration. In truth, he deserved no less!

With Ernst Ferdinand Wenzel, one of the last veterans of Leipzig's greatest musical epoch, in which Mendelssohn and Schumann held sway, has passed away. He was the oldest member of the Conservatorium faculty, with which he had been uninterruptedly connected ever since the foundation of the school in 1843, and performed his duties with a degree of conscientiousness and devotion seldom to be met with. To the last moment he remained true to his art, his calling, and his beloved Leipzig, and with these he became so closely identified, that to have torn him out of an atmosphere so congenial to his mental and physical existence, would have meant almost certain death.

Wenzel was a living record of Leipzig's doings in matters musical; and his extraordinary memory, together with his exceptional powers of conversation, never left him in the lurch when called upon for information about persons, works or facts of the classical past in which he spent his youth.

As rarely as it happens, however, he kept steady pace with advancing times. He had the same lively interest for all noteworthy productions of the present, not alone in music, but in all the various branches of art and literature. His attainments and general culture were of a degree seldom to be met with in musicians, and over everything that he knew, or that excited his interest, he exercised an acute and sound judgment.

It is to be lamented that his natural aversion to writing, which manifests itself even in the scarcity and brevity of his letters, should ever have debarred him from literary activity. What little he did write was pre-eminent in point of style, elegance, acuteness, wit and matter, and considering how much good might have resulted from his vast knowledge and experience in the domains of critical and art-philosophical discussion, it is an endless pity that he could never at least put himself to the task of writing his memoirs. There we might have had a treasure of personal impressions, clever judgments and an endless mass of little-known facts such as only a man with his keen observing powers and eventful past could have given us.

Ernst Ferdinand Wenzel was born on the 23d of January, 1808, at Waldorf, near Löban. Of his early years little is known. He was never heard to speak of his youth any more than he was known to talk of himself in general, a thing his extreme modesty (one of his few shortcomings) forbade. We may be certain, however, that he was poor as a boy. Later he attended the Leipzig University, where he studied philology. He was destined to become a school-master, but his musical gifts soon manifested themselves and changed the course of his life. Enlisting as a pupil of Frederick Wieck, he renounced his philological studies and devoted himself entirely to his music. This was about the year 1830, at the time when Wieck's house was the social and artistic centre of Leipzig's musical life, when the precocious Clara Wieck excited the enthusiasm of the younger generation of musicians with her piano playing, when Robert Schumann emerged, and the "Davidites" were called to life.

With Schumann he soon became intimately acquainted, and remained his friend up to the time of the master's death. There must have been a number of valuable letters from Schumann in his possession, which it is to be hoped have not been lost. With the others of the Davidites, also, Wenzel was closely connected and actively engaged, and participated in the founding of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, to which in the first years of its existence he is known to have contributed a number of articles, the mode of signature of which it has been impossible to ascertain, however. Whether Wenzel ever made any attempts at composition it is impossible to say. In any case his essays, it would seem, never came to any great issue. For his was not a productive nature, but rather receptive and reproductive. Under Wieck he became a very good piano player, his technique in particular being fine and clear like that of most of Wieck's pupils. But he soon preferred the more modest sphere of a teacher to that of a concert pianist, and henceforth devoted himself exclusively to the instruction of others. For a public player he had not the requisite amount of self-confidence, another thing his modesty stood in the way of attaining. Moreover, it is not improbable that his intercourse with Wieck and Schumann, and afterwards with Mendelssohn and Gade, somewhat demoralized him, in so far as their examples soon taught him to see how useless any competition with such masters might prove. It is, therefore, not difficult to understand, taking into account his natural reticence, that he preferred to move in a lesser sphere than his exceptional capacities otherwise might have enabled him to exist in. Everything that he knew and felt, however, was imparted to his pupils, and proved an inestimable benefit to them.

I have never known of a pianoforte teacher who worked assiduously and exercised so stimulating an influence over his pupils. The spirit of a composition and its adequate rendering were to him most essential; the purely mechanical he cared less about. For this reason we find fewer "virtuosi" amongst his pupils, but instead the more thorough musicians. His extensive literary knowledge he never ceased to convey to his pupils, nor tired of devising means of shaping their judgments, or extending their mental horizons. Prejudice and one-sidedness were utterly alien to his nature. With every artist he never failed to discover what was characteristic of the man or his work, and was ever ready to acknowledge whatever noteworthy qualities a man possessed. For such reasons mainly it was that Schumann induced Mendelssohn, at the time the Conservatorium was founded, in 1843, to appoint Wenzel, together with Plaidy (who was more of a technician than an æsthetically cultivated musician), as a teacher of the pianoforte. From this time henceforth Wenzel devoted his time and energies exclusively to that model of music schools, the Leipzig Conservatorium, which soon attained a celebrity that has continued to the present day. His unswerving efforts in behalf of the school, its ends and its aims, were as remarkable as his sense of duty and perseverance, and it can hardly be said of him that he ever missed a lesson or appointment of any kind. He entertained a high opinion of the Conservatory as a school, although in matters of administration he often found it advisable to submit to the views of the directors, when his own convinced him quite to the contrary. For he was of a more progressive and liberal turn of mind than is compatible at times with the purposes of a school. Within the limits of the Conservatorium he worked incessantly, yet he always managed to find time for private tuition, to which he devoted himself with no less energy.

Wenzel was never known to be ill. Simplicity was the rule in his mode of life, and of an evening, after a day's hard and continuous labor and activity, he was ever the most amiable and inciting companion, a friend much sought after from many quarters where he was wont to teach, and well known to all artists visiting Leipzig. He never left his favorite haunt except in times of vacation. Then he would resort to the mountains, to Switzerland, the Tyrol, etc.; never to large cities, but always to nature itself, which he was passionately fond of and knew thoroughly.

Last week he became suddenly ill, which with him meant the beginning of the end. The weight of years asserted itself, which his otherwise healthy and robust nature could no longer withstand. By order of his physicians he was sent to the baths at Kösen — to return no more alive. After a few months' trial of the baths he already imagined himself sufficiently recovered to express hopes of soon returning to his home and resuming his lessons at the Conservatorium for the winter term. But his cherished hopes were suddenly frustrated on the 16th of August, when a stroke of paralysis cut off his life on the very day the summer vacation of the Conservatorium began, thus sparing him the misery of prolonged sufferings.

The news of his death was a blow to the whole of Leipzig. It became more evident than ever how numerous were his friends and admirers. Enemies it may hardly be said he ever had! No one could possibly have lived a more unostentatious or unselfish life. Never putting himself in the way of any one, he never pushed himself into the foreground. All demonstrations of allegiance he steadily rejected. Honors and distinctions he never sought, and therefore had few conferred upon him, living as he did in a time of competition and puffery such as ours, in which a nature like his is but seldom rightly understood. But his name will continue to live in the musical history of Leipzig; he will always be remembered in the hearts of his pupils and friends, and in the annals of the Leipzig Conservatorium he is assured a place of honor for all time to come.

His remains were brought from Kösen to Leipzig and here interred with appropriate solemnity. A long and brilliant array of artists, music lovers and pupils of both sexes followed him to his last resting-place. At his grave, the deacon, Dr. Peschek, a countryman of Wenzel's, spoke with much feeling and fervency, choosing as his text, "This disciple shall not die," from the gospel of St. John — a saying significant at once for the reverence implied for the departed one, and the consolation contained in it for those left to mourn his loss (his only brother was present among the mourners). The ceremony opened and closed with vocal selections sung by a choir composed of pupils from the Conservatorium. Amongst the many floral tributes which accompanied the body to the grave was a laurel wreath which a former pupil from Munich had sent. It was well bestowed, and probably was the first ever conferred upon him. Crowns had been more according to his deserts, so long as he lived; but these he would never have accepted. Sacred be his memory!

PROFESSOR MACFARREN ON MUSIC.

Professor Macfarren, the principal of the Royal Academy of Music, on Saturday addressed the students at the Academy in Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, on the inauguration of the new academic year. There was a numerous attendance, among those present being Professors Walter Macfarren, Brinley Richards, W. Shakespeare, H. C. Banister, A. H. Jackson, F. R. Cox, E. Fiori, S. Holland, E. R. Evers, E. Fanning, W. H. Holmes, F. B. Jewson, A. O'Leary, H. Thomas, and Mr. John Gill, the secretary. Professor Macfarren said they had one common bond which bound them all in mutual interest, their devotion to music, which united them in such a manner as to make their connection and relationship for the life long. He dwelt on the responsibilities of the professors, and the manner in which they discharged them, observing that the pupils had not come there for a bald technical education. There was a higher function in the duties of the professors — the function of moral influence, which they exercised in a marked degree upon the pupils confided to their care. Referring to the sub-professors, he said the appointment was the highest honor that could be paid to a student, the committee selecting for it those among the pupils who were most advanced and were best deserving, and thus giving to them the peculiar advantage of being taught to teach. The professors, however, were responsible for the progress of the pupils who were placed under the sub-professors. He then asked those who were pupils to consider what their duties were in the Academy. They came not to study music as an amusement. It would degrade the wonderful subject which engrossed their life's attention to regard it for a moment as a pastime and recreation. If they entered into the pursuit of that study it must be the prime, he could almost say the sole, object of their attention, and other subjects which engage their thoughts should all bear upon that one chief consideration. To be a musician was, in itself, a great and glorious privilege. He regarded it as a very high privilege to be entrusted by the committee of management with the office which he held, as it made him the medium of communication between all of them and the committee, and gave him the hope of being the means of cementing the friendship which he believed existed among all of them. Addressing them as musicians, he asked them to think for a moment what was the important calling of an artist. He reminded them of Schiller's beautiful apologue of the division of the earth, and of the complaint of the artist to Zeus that there was no portion of the world left for him. "Yes," said the King of the Gods, "you are not unregarded. I will say for you, the heart of man. Be that your study and your empire." All the arts were connected, and the reflection upon one another enhanced the beauty of each. In sculpture they saw the imitation of natural forms, and from that they took their word that art was the imitative power of reproducing nature. In painting they had form with color added; in acting they had form, and color, and gesture; in literature those three qualities were lost; but in uttered speech they had the thoughts of the persons who were the subject of the work of art. It must be borne in mind, however, that Goldsmith said, and Talleyrand quoted, that speech was given to man, not only to express his thoughts, but to conceal them, while music had a higher function than the expression or concealment of thoughts. Music uttered what was beyond the reach of words, and whereas speech might describe our feeling, music went beyond the description and produced the feeling itself. Architecture had been claimed as the fittest analogy to music, in that neither reproduced natural objects; but architecture was based on natural principles of geometry, perspective, and proportions, and it had the power of conjuring in the thoughts of the beholder images of the mind apart from images of the building—feelings of reverence, or lightness, or respect, or gaiety. Music could awaken all those ideas, the highest sublimity, the lightest mirth, and it could present every shade of feeling between them. With the knowledge that they were studying that most intense, most delicate subject, they could not for a moment feel that there was anything trifling in the pursuit they were undertaking. After urging them to make the best use of the talents they possessed, he drew attention to the class for acoustics and the operatic class, and observed that recent times had very much strengthened the general desire among musicians at large to obtain particular distinctions for their artistic qualifications. They now proceeded to Universities for degrees in very far larger numbers than until recent years, and the Universities had made the standard of excellence to which the degrees testified very far higher than formerly. In one University in particular, a knowledge of acoustics was imperative in every candidate who obtained graduation. In the Academy every opportunity for musical study in every department was open to them. The class for acoustics was under the care of the present examiner of the subject in Cambridge University.

There seemed in the operatic department to be more appearance of amusement; but if it was to be sought as an amusement only, the study of operatic music could only be degraded to triviality. Still, there was not the severe tax on the attention in that particular branch of study that there was in the scientific subject to which he had just alluded—the subject which touched upon the grandest phenomena of nature, and which showed the source of music itself. The operatic class was open to singers who need not necessarily have a view to theatrical performances, and the experience of the past few years had proved that to practice with action gave a freedom to the performances of singers who aimed at nothing further than the concert-room or the drawing-room, and took from them certain restraints which impeded good qualities until such freedom could be acquired. Dealing with a “tender subject” to them all—the result of the annual examination—he said it brought gratification to all of them, but with the gratification there were several disappointments. The obtaining of medals should be regarded as a secondary consideration in their studies, for they must bear in mind the many circumstances which might interfere with success at an examination. An examiner could take no account of what was yesterday or would be to-morrow, but could only inspect what passed under notice at the very moment of the trial, and the idea was fallacious that work was to be slackened, or painstaking abandoned because no prize was gained. In support of this contention he referred to Alceste and the tragedy by Euripides, which was offered in competition at the Olympic Games, and failed of a prize. Mr. Browning's beautiful poem of “Belaustion's Adventure” had given a transcription of the play, which was involved in the story of the failure of the Athenian's war upon Sicily, and the hardships to which the Sicilians subjected the Athenian captives. The captives, however, recited verses of Euripides from the play of Alceste, and so charmed the Sicilians that for every one who could recite passages from the play indemnity from service was accorded, and they were released from their bondage. He concluded, amid warm applause, with which his remarks had been frequently greeted, by quoting the two last lines of the poem he had referred to—

“It all came from this play which gained no prize;
Why crown whom Zeus has crowned in soul before?”

RAFF'S “SUMMER” SYMPHONY.

The special novelty at the first Crystal Palace concert was the new Symphony in E-minor of Joachim Raff—the ninth of his symphonic works, and the 208th published composition of this too prolific writer. It is one of a series of four, illustrative of the seasons, the first of which, entitled “The Voice of Spring,” was produced at the Crystal Palace on the 15th of November last, while the “Autumn” is to be produced at Leipzig or Vienna this Winter; the “Winter” symphony being still only sketched in Raff's portfolio. In his symphony in E-minor, entitled “Summer Time,” Raff again comes forward as a composer of programme music, and with a “programme” well-nigh impossible of performance. The first movement or “part” is entitled “A Hot Day,” and this will, it is presumed, be considered the reductio ad absurdum of programme music. How on earth can a man depict in music “a hot day”? It is true that Mr. George Grove, whose imagination is only equalled by his musical enthusiasm, fancies that in the opening of the movement beginning piano with the first violins (divided) and second violins only, which gradually by the addition of instruments increases to a forte, he sees the “burst of the sun.” It is equally true that the sun, whether at rising, at noon, or at sunset, has never yet in the history of astronomy been known to “burst,” and that the phrase must be accepted as a flight of fancy or as a mere flower of speech. Minds more imaginative (if that were possible) than Mr. Grove's might perhaps perceive in the semiquaver figure which follows, an illustration in music of the flies which on “a hot day” worry the bald head of an angry man. But beyond this speculation ceases. The second subject is duly announced, and the movement proceeds to the “working-out,” where we have once more the “burst of the sun,” the “fly on the angry man's bald head motive,” and so on. At the coda we have again the “burst of the sun” motive, this time extended, without any particular effort of heaven's artillery, followed by the other themes, “settling down at length into a touching allusion to the original subject.” This is our old friend the “burst,” again, in which Mr. Grove, with a curious reversion of feeling, “imagines the sun to sink, and the twilight, in which the movement commenced, to again fall over the landscape.” Mr. Grove is, however, conscious that he is dead out of his reckoning, and he admits, “After this, a few noisy bars seem somewhat out of keeping.” Perhaps the composer means to illustrate the old rhyme—

“The sun which ‘burst’ once in a way,
May rise to ‘burst’ another day.”

The scherzo in F (after E-minor!) is tolerably plain sailing. We have the meet of the fairies, the call to the hunt, the appearance of Oberon (violinello) and Titania (viola), a duet; the hunt and the return of all parties, the movement or “part” being fanciful in design and admirably scored. The slow movement, entitled “Eclogue,” is a true “pastoral poem,” and the two middle movements must be considered the best in the work. On the finale, entitled “Harvest Home,” it would be nonsense to waste words. It does not afford the remotest idea of a harvest home, and the workmanship is commonplace and often coarse. The symphony altogether will certainly not be considered the best work of its most unequal composer; though its performance by the Crystal Palace orchestra under Mr. Manns left nothing to be desired.—London Figaro, Oct. 16.

F. J. CAMPBELL.

THE BLIND EDUCATOR OF THE BLIND.—HIS ASCENT OF MONT BLANC.

“The blind leading the blind” are proverbial words, often cited to illustrate an example of extreme folly, but there is a blind leader of the blind whose life demonstrates his ability for leadership among any class of men, be they sightless or seeing. His name is F. J. Campbell, the blind gentleman who recently achieved the remarkable feat of ascending Mont Blanc. Mr. Campbell is a native American, and is well-known in Boston and its neighborhood, especially in Newton, where he lived for many years. He was born in Tennessee, and lost his sight when he was about three years old. He received his education in an institution for the blind in that state, came to Boston when a young man, and was soon placed at the head of the department of music in the Perkins Institution for the Blind at South Boston. Having a remarkably fine talent for music, he soon raised that department from a condition of comparative insignificance to a state of high efficiency. He also performed the same service for the tuning department. He had a spirit of dauntless energy, was self-confiding and self-asserting. He was bound to make his mark, and the controlling idea of his life has always been that a man by reason of blindness does not become an object of charity, or only fitted to earn his livelihood by some simple means, such as the making of brooms or the weaving of door-mats, but that nearly all spheres of activity in which seeing men are engaged are also open to him. To prove this has been his aim in everything that he has done, and he has striven to make his life a running illustration of the feasibility of his views. His great intellectual influence was not slow in making itself felt beyond his own department at South Boston, and, during his long stay at the Perkins institution, he was, next to Dr. Howe, the leading spirit in its management.

HIS AMERICAN LIFE.

Many interesting things, showing the wonderful energy of the man, are told by his friends and neighbors. During the civil war, although a native of the South, he was intensely patriotic. So enthusiastic was he for the Union cause that he cherished an irrepressible desire to enter actively into the service, and he exhausted all his powers of persuasion in endeavoring to induce the authorities to allow him to serve his country in a capacity which he felt confident he was able to fill with credit to himself and profit to the Union arms. One of his favorite projects was to secure for blind students the advantages of Harvard University, and he regarded it as highly unjust that blind youths who had the desire and the capacity for the highest education should be denied the privilege of obtaining it. He, therefore, drew up several memorials to the university authorities seeking that end, but owing, it is said, to the lack of sympathy with his purpose on the part of others, who would most naturally have been expected to use their influence toward the furtherance of a higher educational movement for the blind, he never succeeded in getting any attention called to his petitions.

Mr. Campbell was able to find his way all over Boston with wonderful facility, and it would be difficult to distinguish between his power in this respect and that of a seeing man. One evening, when in town attending a concert, he missed his last train home; it left somewhere in the neighborhood of 10 o'clock, the suburban public in those days not being so well accommodated in the matter of late trains as at present. But, knowing that a horse-car went to Watertown, he took that and made the best of the way to his home in Newtonville on foot, through streets he had never traversed before, asking his way of no one.

Old citizens of Newton remember the great school festival he organized one Fourth of July before the war. School musical festivals were not the common thing in those days that they are now, and, music not being so generally taught, it was no easy task to get them up. Mr. Campbell conceived the idea of giving a grand open-air concert by the pupils of the public schools in a natural sylvan amphtheatre on the shores of the pond near Gov. Clafin's estate; a most beautiful natural spot. He succeeded in enlisting the co-operation of the school committee, drilled the scholars, brought over his band from the Perkins Institution, and, with the assistance of the Newton band, gave a concert which was highly creditable artistically, and a great popular success, over 5,000 people being present, and highly delighted with the affair, which was the great event of the day's celebration.

HIS TRIP ABROAD.

Several years ago Mr. Campbell was given leave of absence from his duties at the Perkins Institution, and went abroad on a vacation trip, taking with him his invalid wife. His special object was to spend considerable time in the study of music in Germany under the best masters. This object accomplished, on his way homeward he stopped in London. While there he chanced to attend a meeting of some blind persons, and he was so struck with their pitifully helpless condition that he determined to remain and endeavor to introduce into England the same enlightened treatment of the class universally pursued in his native country; for in this respect, at that time, the English educational methods were strikingly deficient. Nearly all the blind persons in the country were either paupers or semi-paupers, and those who earned their own living had only the ancient, conventional resources of mat-weaving, chair-mending, and the like. Mr. Campbell's wonderful energy here came into play. The circumstances under which he began his work might have been discouraging to a man in full possession of his physical faculties. Everybody who knows English society will testify to its suspiciousness of strangers, and the necessity for good credentials, if a stranger should desire to make any headway in any project he has in hand. Yet here was Mr. Campbell, an utter stranger, with no recommendations to persons of position and influence, almost penniless—for his slender purse was nearly drained—with a very sick wife, and sightless. But he overcame every obstacle, and earned the gratitude of the English nation as a great public benefactor. Because he was blind, it might be suggested; through that he excited sympathy, and so succeeded. But Mr. Campbell scorned to be looked upon as an object of pity. He never regarded himself as such, and would never tolerate the idea on the part of anybody. He always insisted on his cause being looked upon strictly on its merits. On the day when he received his first slight encouragement he had reached the end of his monetary resources. But he succeeded in obtaining the funds to make a modest beginning, and he started an institution for the blind based upon his educational methods. This was in 1871. It rapidly grew in public favor. He was fortunate in attracting the attention of exalted personages, and it soon developed into the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, under the patronage of Queen Victoria, the Prince and the Princess of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh figuring as vice-patrons, and with the Marquis of Westminster as president. The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne also took deep interest in the institution. Almost wholly through Mr. Campbell's personal exertions the institution has received money amounting to something like $250,000. The institution has now beautiful buildings at upper Norwood, London, very near the Crystal Palace, near which it was purposely located on account of its musical advantages. One enters an arched gate-way, and looks down a terraced hill with green lawns diversified by flowers and trees in picturesque groups, with great clumps of rhododendron and hedges of hawthorn and laurel. At the top is a light gray building, where the girls sleep and all the school takes its meals. "You may not think," says a writer in the Spectator, "it means much to these blind people that pretty tiles peep through luxuriant ivies on its corner tower, that the sun streams into it widely through generous windows, and that a fair prospect stretches far westward. But those who live with the blind learn that the presence of beauty does influence them as much as those who see. Experience proves that for them also does it stimulate the imagination, refine the taste and give cheerful pleasure. And do not the blind, in their narrower path, need this more than others?"

"Going down from 'the mount,' you pass, near it on the left, the cosy little home of Mr. Campbell. A few terraces below, still more to the left, is a four-storied new building, with its arches and gables. Here are the school-rooms and the boys' quarters. At the extreme left, before reaching this, is a large open-air gymnasium. It is fun to see the boys swarm up those ropes, hang headlong from the swings, and turn somersaults on the soft floor of tan, and hear their merry shouts. Are those active, happy creatures really blind? To any stranger's eye these many staircases and paths and banks and bridges seem to lead at random into the basement or second story of any of the three main buildings on the terraced hill-side; yet these sightless girls and boys dash along unerringly at full speed. Sometimes you hold your breath to see them, but nothing happens. Any of them will show you round the pretty garden, if you choose, and tell you which they like best of the bright flowers bordering its strips of velvet lawn; and, perhaps, they will ask you to sit down under the spreading arbutus tree, which his grace, a certain duke, says is the finest that he knows. Their faces will brighten as you exclaim: 'What a beautiful view!' for they feel as if they saw it also, having so often heard it described; and their trained ears hear meanwhile what yours do not, as the breeze sweeps through the variously sounding branches of the many sorts of trees grouped here and there. Some of these trail on the ground, in marked contrast with the tall, straight pines, the quaintly stiff Japanese evergreens, the sturdy tulip and catalpa, and others of more familiar mien. Below the garden is the meadow, so called, a smooth plot of turf, with not so much as a shrub to prevent a blind child's running to his heart's content. It is bounded by a shaded gravel walk, and every boy and girl here knows that ten times round the meadow twice a day is no small exercise. At the four corners are laid boards to tell the foot when to turn, for the blind manager here knows better than a 'sighted' person how to help these pupils to learn accuracy and confidence in their movements. It is the evident purpose of every arrangement of the school to teach real independence, both in feeling and in act, to reduce to the minimum the inequality between the blind and the seeing."

The institution has a beautiful new music hall, where some of the finest music in England may be heard. While the new building was going up, it is related of Mr. Campbell that at night he used to make his way all over the structure, up ladders and along narrow scaffoldings, to make sure that everything was progressing satisfactorily. One day, while watching the laborers at work, he found that there were no windows, nor any provision for ventilation, in one room. He soon learned that the architect had disregarded the question of light and air, considering that the blind had no use for either. He was determined to have the amplest supply of both, knowing that they were essential to the health of all human beings, whether seeing or blind. He therefore would not rest until he had succeeded in getting the architect dismissed, and a more intelligent one put in his place. An instance of Mr. Campbell's thorough American independence of character is shown in the fact that the grand duke of Hesse, on observing the remarkable advantages of the institution, wished to place his blind son, Prince Alexander, under Mr. Campbell's charge as a pupil. He desired, however, that he should have a princely establishment, with something like a score of servants about him. This condition Mr. Campbell at once refused to consent to, and adhered to it inexorably, even though he risked offending his royal patrons by so doing. He said he would be happy to receive the prince under his charge, but that he would have to come on the same conditions as the other pupils, and be placed on an equality with them in all respects. The prince came on these conditions, and became one of the best friends of Mr. Campbell, besides developing a high musical talent. It was with Prince Alexander that Mr. Campbell went into Switzerland last summer. His ascent of Mont Blanc was made to illustrate his views that a blind man, by reason of his infirmity, need not be excluded from undertaking the most difficult tasks that other men have accomplished. He felt confident of his success when he set out, having practised for a month in glacier work, and in climbing lesser mountains. Mr. Campbell's letter to the Times, modestly describing his adventure, was followed by a letter from the secretary of the Alpine Club, commending his pluck, but criticising one of the details of the descent, blaming the guide for permitting it to be made in such a manner, Mr. Campbell having descended beside the guide, instead of following him, as demanded by the rules of safety. The next day the Times devoted an editorial of over a column to the affair, speaking of Mr. Campbell in the most complimentary terms. From it is quoted the following: "The praise of the reformers of the education of the blind is that they insist upon relegating what is only a drawback, and not a prohibition, to common human fellowship, to its proper category. As a demonstration to that tendency and truth, Mr. Campbell's ascent of Mont Blanc deserves commemoration, not because a mountain ascent merits any blowing of trumpets, whether the adventurer have as strong sight as an eagle or as little as the fish of the Adelsberg caverns."

Mr. Campbell is described as a slightly built man, with a thin, energetic-looking face, his sightless eyes concealed by dark glasses. His wife died not long after the beginning of their mission in England. He married again, his second wife being a Boston lady, formerly a teacher at the Perkins Institute. She is a treasured helpmeet in his great work, and, like his first wife, is blessed with vision.—Sunday Herald, Oct. 24.

MR. OLIVER KING.

Of this young artist, as a pianist, and as composer of orchestral works, the Evening Gazette, of Oct. 23, wrote as follows:

We will first give our attention to Mr. King's playing. He has a brilliant and a fluent technique, a refined taste, and a clear and precise touch, but his method is somewhat too deliberate and unimpassioned to afford entire satisfaction. His style is by no means versatile, and is lacking in the finer and warmer shades of expression. He is always correct, always calm, always deeply in earnest, and there is a pleasing absence of all attempt at meretricious display in his playing, but its effect is coldly monotonous through want of contrast in effect. Even in the most fiery climaxes, Mr. King is never stirred from his imperturbability, and his admirable finger work, equally perfect in both hands, fails to make any deeper impression than that of masterly mechanism. This want of fire and passion in a young artist is rather unusual, for, as a rule, such are oftener in need of curbing than of spurring.

We were greatly surprised by the rare merit of Mr. King's compositions, especially when his youth is taken into consideration. Of course, it cannot be expected that justice can be done to a symphony, a concerto and a concert overture at a single hearing, especially when all three are heard on one occasion. It is impossible to do more than to give the general impression made upon us by the works, and that was highly favorable. Mr. King understands the orchestra thoroughly, and handles it like a master. He appears also to be thoroughly familiar with the most recondite intricacies of harmony and of counterpoint. He is fluent in idea and fertile in resources, and though his playing may be wanting in fire and variety of effect, when he takes the pen in hand, there is certainly no fault to find with him on these points. His style is preëminently polyphonic, and it is just here that fault is to be found with his scores, in the excess to which he carries his work in this respect. The principal themes are so overlaid by elaborate treatment that it is often difficult to distinguish them from the subjects that move with and cross them in every part of the orchestra. In the symphony and the concerto this exuberance of florid counterpoint and this over-luxuriant blending of counter themes, though rich and sensuous in effect, was embarrassing rather than edifying to the listener. The overture has less ornate treatment, and is clear, interesting, vigorous, and wholly pleasing. The faults we have pointed out, however, are in the right direction, since it is better to be too rich in fertility of resource than too poor. In the first instance, it is easy to crop the superfluous luxuriance; but in the second instance it is by no means so easy to supply what is lacking. Mr. King is a follower of the new school of melody and of orchestral development; and his works have the restlessness, the constant groping after novelty of effect, the placing of higher value upon the treatment of an idea than upon the idea itself, and the subjugating of inspiration to thematic jugglery that characterize the higher music of the day. His melodies are of the "endless" description that Wagner has made so familiar; his harmonies run to the extreme of chromatic eccentricity; the general effect is feverish, and the ear at last is wearied by the unceasing sensuous flow, and yearns for a resting-place, but in vain. We hope that Mr. King is young enough to outgrow strict fealty to the school he at present follows, for these works show him to possess decided genius and that productive industry which is its invariable companion.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1880.

SCHUMANN'S ESSAYS AND CRITICISMS.

The second series of Mme. Ritter's admirable translation of Robert Schumann's collected writings¹ (Gesammelte Schriften) about music and musicians is now before us. It forms a beautiful volume, uniform with the first series, which appeared in 1877. This completes the collection. The entire contents of the four small German volumes, published at Leipzig in 1854, were translated by Mme. Ritter at the instance of the composer's widow, Mme. Clara Schumann, who, writing to her (in 1871) on the want of a more satisfactory and more intimate biography of Schumann than any we yet have, and expressing the opinion that the time for such a work had not yet arrived, concludes with the suggestion: "but perhaps you, who display so much appreciation of my husband's character and works, might find it a not ungrateful task to translate his writings, which give so much insight into his heart, at least to the reader who is himself qualified to understand." This task was undertaken con amore, and was performed so well that even one familiar with the German language may enjoy the writings best in their English dress. For, while preserving, to a remarkable degree, the spirit and the individual flavor of the original, the translation is an improvement upon Schumann's often involved and obscure style, in being clearer and more readable. Moreover, the translator's annotations, and especially her excellent preface to the first volume, embodying an appreciative sketch of his career, with an explanation of the circumstances under which these flying leaves were written, add much to the value of the book. The account of the "Davidite Society" (Davidbund), — that pleasant fiction which Schumann introduces into his criticisms in the earlier numbers of his Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, dividing himself as it were into several characters, as Florestan, Eusebius, Meister Raro, besides bringing in the contributions of his young, enthusiastic friends, so as to discuss composers and their works from many points of view, is also interesting and essential to an understanding of many of the essays.

Mme. Ritter and her publishers did not risk the publication of the entire work, so full of food for thought, at a single venture. The first series (1877) was a selection of the more striking and important papers, forming about one half of the whole. In this we may read Schumann's first recognition of Chopin (an "Opus 2"); his articles on "A Monument to Beethoven"; on the "Four Overtures to Fidelio"; on the discovery of Schubert's great C-major Symphony, that of "the heavenly length"; his elaborate analysis of the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz; his appreciations of Gade, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Robert Franz, Sterndale Bennett, Ferdinand Hiller, and of many other greater and lesser lights. Also, his "Aphorisms," which are full of meat, and his "Rules and Maxims for Young Musicians," which we believe we had the honor of first translating in this Journal, twenty or thirty years ago, and which have been so often translated since. The genial, hopeful, brave, progressive spirit shown in all these writings; the clear, sure insight of the critic, always sympathetic, quick to see and to appreciate, and backed by profound knowledge and by personal experience in the things whereof he wrote; the imaginative, poetic quality displayed in his writings as well as in his music, and his happy faculty of illustration, besides lively wit and humor, and sometimes keen satire, but far oftener a most kindly, hopeful, and encouraging tone toward young aspirants, — the wealth of matter, and the charm of manner of the whole collection, make it an invaluable æsthetic guide-book to the student of music. It inspires a true and lofty aim, a sense of the true dignity and sacredness of Art, and bids us all be earnest.

Such solid, and, for the general musical public, unaccustomed, sometimes puzzling, reading was naturally slow in making its way into general favor; but that first series has been on the whole so well received, that the time came at last for issuing the second. This volume, too, is full of meat, of pithy hints and suggestions, of most valuable and instructive criticism. Unlike the first part, it is occupied entirely with (brief, for the most part) critical reviews of compositions which appeared during Schumann's editorship of the Neue Zeitschrift. These, though often dealing with works and with composers who have since died out of memory, are always significant and well worth the reading. And the translator, wisely as we think, has arranged them in convenient order, both for reference and for comprehensive and intelligent over-sight of all belonging to each class or form of composition. Thus, first we find interesting analyses of a Danish and of several German operas, which have long since disappeared upon the stream of time, but which nevertheless are curious to read about. Then come oratorios: Hiller's "Destruction of Jerusalem," and "The Saviour," by Edward Sobolewsky, who emigrated to America in 1859, conducted the Philharmonic Society of St. Louis, and died at his farm near that city in 1872. New symphonies for orchestra come next, including symphonies by Preyer, Reissiger, F. Lachner, and C. G. Müller. Comparing one of these with the easier, happier, and more perfect work of Mozart and Beethoven, he exclaims: "Would some young composer but give us an easy, merry symphony, in a major key, without trombones and doubled horn parts! Of course that is very difficult; only he who knows how to command masses can sport with them," — and more which we would gladly quote. Then a motley procession of new overtures passes in review, including an "Ecclesiastical Overture" by Julius Stern, Riets's "Hero and Leander," Bennett's "Naiads," which he was among the first to praise, and several others. Piano concertos follow: Thalberg, Ries, Moscheles, Mendelssohn, and more. Then an attractive company of Song and Lied composers. Then a goodly representation of the writers of chamber-music: sonatas, trios, quartets, septuors, etc. This department, Schumann being himself a pianist and composer in nearly all these forms, is naturally crowded. His grouping together of string quartets, with his pleasant chatty description of the first trial of them in the intimate artistic circle, is extremely interesting and admits the reader into the most select and sweet communion of artists. Of these chapters we have borrowed a first instalment for the earlier pages of our present number.

But there is no corner of the contemporary musical field which Schumann has surveyed more thoroughly and critically than that of pianoforte studies. All of any real significance, whether by way of example or of warning, which met his notice during these years (and their name is legion) he has taken pains to sift and weigh and analyze, separating the wheat from the chaff, and constantly referring to the nobler examples of Cramer, Moscheles, and Chopin. The mass of these little occasional reviews constitutes a most instructive essay, teaching by example, on the whole vast department of Etudes; and at the end he classifies them according to their several aims, both technical and as regards expression.

Rondos, Fantasias, Caprices, Variations, and all the modern miscellaneous forms of pianoforte music, reviewed with utmost patience and impartiality, occupy the remainder of the thick, rich volume. It is impossible for us to enter into anything like a full and exhaustive estimate of these two invaluable volumes; that would require a lengthy article in some solid quarterly review. We must content ourselves, for the present, with heartily commending the work and the translation to all seekers for the truth in music, and with such specimens as we can from time to time find room for in these columns.

CONCERTS.

Since the week of the Tremont Temple opening there has been a period (about three weeks) of very little public music in this city. Mr. PRESTON's third and last Organ Recital, at the Temple, on Wednesday noon, Oct. 27, has been about the only concert of any real note; and that, we were glad to see, was better attended than the previous ones. The programme was excellent:—

Toccata in F-major	Bach
Concerto in B-flat	Handel
Andante Maestoso — Allegro — Adagio — Allegro, ma non Presto.
Canon in B-flat	Merkel
Canon in G-major	Whitney
Nuptial March
Elevation	Guilmant
Fugue

Mr. Preston's rendering of Bach's Toccata was altogether worthy of the strong, lively, noble work, taken at just the right tempo, which was evenly sustained, and the whole form and meaning were brought clearly out. The Handel Concerto was highly interesting. The genial work, with all its variety of themes and contrasts of color, was made most appreciable. The Canon by Merkel was given so pianissimo that we heard it only as we might the vague murmur of the breeze through distant pines; but that by Whitney was more clear and positive. Guilmant's Nuptial March was quite original and captivating, and clearly worked up; and its return in the midst of the fine strong fugue gave unity to the three pieces as a whole. The gifted young pianist has certainly made his mark also as an organist by these three concerts.

— There was a concert, which we were unable to attend, at Union Hall, on Thursday evening, Oct. 28, given by Mrs. FANNIE M. HAWES, a soprano vocalist, with the assistance of good artists. It was her first appearance here, and report speaks well both of her voice and training. This was the programme:

Hunting Song	Anon
Especially arranged for Schubert Quartet.
Cachouca Caprice	Raff
Ernani Involami	Edward A. Cary.
Sonata, for violin, in A	Fannie M. Hawes.
In Absence	C. N. Allen.
Ballad,	Schubert Quartet.
Ballade	Fannie M. Hawes.
	Edward A. Cary.
	Reinecke

 Faunle M. Hawes.
 Extravaganza Anon
 Especially arranged for Schubert Quartet.

— Last evening (too late for notice now) the first of Mr. LISTEMANN'S Philharmonic Orchestra Concerts was given in the Music Hall, with a programme bristling with new-school novelties: a "Romeo and Julia" Fantaisie by Svendsen; Grieg's piano concerto in A-minor, played by Mr. Franz Rummel; Raff's "Im Walde" Symphony; two Slavonic Dances by Dvorak; Liszt's Hungarian Fantaisie for piano and orchestra; while of the older composers there was a Musette from a concerto of Handel, adapted for oboes, bassoons, and string orchestra by Gevaert, and the Freischütz overture for a conclusion.

The second concert (Nov. 19) offers the "Carnaval Romain" overture by Berlioz; the first part (Inferno) of Liszt's "Dante" Symphony (new here); "The Youth of Hercules" by Saint-Saëns; a melody of Ole Bull's arranged for string orchestra; a miniature march by Tchaikowski; and a Valse Caprice by Rubinstein. Miss Gertrude Franklin is to sing a concert aria by Mozart, and songs by Spohr, Schumann and Widor.

— This evening Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood gives a concert at the Meionaon (Tremont Temple), mainly for the introduction here of Mons. Alfred Desève, a young violinist from Paris, Canadian by birth and recently violinist to the Princess Louise. We had the pleasure of hearing M. Desève play the Kreutzer sonata with Mr. Sherwood, at the latter's room, a few days since, and have since heard him play in private the Mendelssohn concerto. He has admirable execution and plays with rare taste, intelligence and feeling. Mr. Charles R. Adams will assist to-night as vocalist.

— Next week, on Friday evening, Mr. B. J. Lang will give a second and improved performance of the Damnation of Faust by Berlioz, with the celebrated baritone Herr Henschel in the part of Mephistopheles, Miss Lillian Bailey as Margaret, Mr. Wm. J. Winch as Faust, and Mr. Clarence Hay as Brander. There will be a male chorus of 200 voices, a female chorus of 100, and an orchestra of 60 instruments.

— We learn that it is Herr Henschel's intention to give a series of song recitals here this season.

— Subscribers to the Harvard Symphony Concerts can receive their season tickets and select their seats at the Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday next. The public sale commences on Thursday, Nov. 11. The first concert will take place on Thursday afternoon Nov. 18. The programmes of the first three concerts were given in our last.

— The full programme of the Euterpe for the current season has been made up, and assigned, as follows: December 1, at the Meionaon, Listemann Quartet—Quartets, Op. 27, G-minor, Grieg; No. 1, E-flat major, Cherubini. January 5, Beethoven Quintet Club—Quartets, No. 2, C-major, G. W. Chadwick; posthumous, D-minor, Schubert. February 2, same players—Quartet, Op. 44, No. 2, E-minor, Mendelssohn; Sextet, Op. 36, G-minor, Brahms. March 23, New York Philharmonic Club—Quartets, No. 6, C-major, Mozart; Op. 59, No. 2, E-minor, Beethoven. April 20, same players—Op. 132, A-minor, Beethoven; Op. 41, No. 2, F-major, Schumann.—Courier.

— The Cecilia has the following works in preparation for the four concerts to be given during the current season: God's Time is Best, cantata, Bach; New Year's Song and Faust, Schumann; a short psalm and a motet for female voices, Mendelssohn; the music for The Ruins of Athens, Beethoven; The Bells of Strabury, Liszt; At the Cloister Gate, Grieg; Romeo and Juliet, symphonic cantata, Berlioz; part-song by Rheinberger, Grieg and Hoffmann; a madrigal by Wilbye; and glees by sundry English composers, including Little Jack Horner, by Calcott. At the first concert, to be given about the 15th December, probably in Tremont Temple, without an orchestra, the programme will include the Bach cantata and a choice collection of part-songs and glees for mixed and female voices. Schumann's Faust will be presented at the last concert of the season.

— The Boylston Club, at their first concert, November 17, will present several new works, including a quintet for strings and pianoforte by Hermann Goetz, a Kyrie Eleison by Robert Franz, a short motet by Bach, new part-songs by Rheinberger, Loewe, Rubinstein, Vierling, Eitner Kücken and others. The part-songs embrace all descriptions, for male, female, and mixed choruses. For the second concert there will be a Paternoster—five-part chorus by Verdi, the Hoffman waltzes, called Romance of Love, Seasons of the Year, for female chorus and solos, by Gade a short cantata, new and exceedingly choice part-songs for the male chorus, and other part-songs of all kinds for all the portions of the Boylston Club. The club have under consideration for their concert, the Faust of Schumann or the Requiem by Brahms, for orchestra, chorus and solo. The club was never so large and enthusiastic as at present. The associate list is full and a waiting list as well. Mr. Osgood has brought a fresh stock of songs from abroad, and the club and their friends look forward with much pleasure to the coming season.

— The Handel and Haydn Society will give its four concerts in Music Hall. Saint Paul has been selected for Easter Sunday. The following vocalists have been engaged for The Messiah, December 26: Mrs. H. F. Knowles, Miss Anna Drasidil, Mr. W. C. Tower, Mr. George Henschel.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHICAGO, OCT. 30. Since my last note to the Journal, I have made a short visit to Council Bluffs and Omaha, and perhaps some mention of the musical activity I found there may prove interesting. Culture and progress move westward, until the earth is encircled with the brightness of human intelligence. Thus even art is progressive in the far-away places of the great West. I must confess that I was both astonished and delighted to note the many signs of development in a taste for music that were being made manifest in both those places. The trip from Chicago is a pleasant one, and the journey far from wearisome. The Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific Railroad run such elegant sleeping-coaches, and are supplied with dining-cars which offer bills of fare most tempting, that travelling seems rather a luxury than a task. Indeed, I never was upon a railway that seemed so pleasant and comfortable.

Council Bluffs is a little city that must be seen to be appreciated. The high bluffs that nearly surround the business portion of the city are both picturesque and romantic. They are very high, and varied in formation, like mountain ranges, and stretch along the Missouri River as far as the eye can see. The effect of the light and shade at sunrise, or at the early evening hour on these hills is very beautiful, and the view from the top of the highest of them extremely diversified and lovely. The little city has many of the comforts and some of the luxuries of the East, and presents a scene of constant activity. Musically, I find there is much taste, and no small amount of talent. I saw the little house in which Miss Fannie Kellogg, now of Boston, used to live, and I felt proud of the talent and energy that could force its way to a public recognition, even when starting from a simple home in the far West. It was an example of what may be made of a gift, when its possessor has power of will to overcome difficulty in its many forms. The light of talent will find its true place in which to shine, whenever it has purpose and true ambition for its actuating forces. I was pleased to learn that through the influence and energy of Mrs. F. F. Ford, and other helping musical people, there has been a good deal accomplished for classical music in this city. Mrs. Ford has a school for music, and has often engaged artists to come there and give song and pianoforte recitals, that her pupils might learn to enjoy good music, and to have that appreciation that comes from understanding art in its higher forms. Miss Nellie Stevens, a very delightful pianist, spent a short time in this city, and did much to cultivate among the young people a love for the good compositions of the worthy masters. Miss Stevens has won a lasting admiration for her fine playing. Mr. W. S. B. Mathews, of this city, has also visited Council Bluffs and given lectures upon musical subjects.

In Omaha I found a number of cultivated amateurs and teachers who were earnest in working for what is good in art. There are music stores that seem to do a good business, and also musical societies that bring out choral works; and thus there is a foundation for a constant and healthy progress in these little cities of the West. I can but regard every sign that shows the advancement of culture and a love of the beautiful, either in art, music, or nature, as something worthy of encouragement and praise, and I transmit my few words of description to the Journal, that these worthy people, who are working for art, may know that their efforts will always find recognition in the East. Art knows no country nor place, but makes her home wherever the creative power of man can mould nature into forms of the beautiful. Reflective thought opens the way, and the ideal takes a positive shape, when man directs with reason and taste.

In our own city there has been very little of moment in a musical way. A large organ has been placed in our new Music Hall. It was formally opened by a concert in which Mr. H. Clarence Eddy and Mr. McCarell were the organists. Being out of town I did not hear the concert, and must reserve my account of the organ until another time.

Musical matters are to be somewhat quiet until after the election, when our concerts will begin with a rush. I trust that we shall be compensated for our long vacation, and that our season will be rich in good music.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., OCT. 27. The local concert season is now fairly begun. The Heine Quartet have begun their series of chamber-music recitals, their first programme being as follows:

1. String Quartet, Op. 44, No. 1, Mendelssohn
2. Sonata for Piano and Violin, Op. 13, Rubinstein
Misses Mary and Lizzie Heine.
3. Trio for Violin, Viola and Violoncello, Op. 9, No. 1
Beethoven.
4. Prize Quartet for Piano, Violin, Viola and Violoncello,
Op. 18, (First time in America) A. Bunge

These young players have improved since last season, and the series promises to be a valuable contribution to our musical life and culture.

The Musical Society has given its first concert,—Raff's Symphony, "In the Forest," and Dudley Buck's "Golden Legend." Both were very successfully performed. The orchestra was enlarged to sixty performers, partly by bringing players from Chicago, and if there was something to be desired in the way of finish, that was no more than was to be expected from an orchestra unaccustomed to its leader and to one another. On the whole the symphony was given not unworthily, difficult as it is. In the Golden Legend, both chorus and orchestra went well. We had Miss Annie B. Norton of Cincinnati in the part of Elsie, to our great satisfaction. Mr. Max L. Lane, a new comer here, trained in Leipzig and Munich, sang the tenor part of Prince Henry. He has a pure, sweet voice, and a fine method, but lacks the power for anything but light lyric work. The contralto and bass parts were taken by Miss Bella Fink and Mr. Edward Niedecken, two local amateurs, whose work was entirely creditable. Altogether, the concert was a marked success, and shows that there is vigorous life in the old society.

MUSIC ABROAD.

LEEDS FESTIVAL. The correspondent of the London Musical World, in a letter dated Oct. 11, (two days before the festival began) gives the following outline of the week's programme:

During the four days' proceedings no fewer than seven compositions by native authors will be performed, the majority of them works of high pretensions. Taking the seven in order, we have, first, a cantata by Mr. John Francis Barnett, founded upon Longfellow's poem, "The Building of the Ship," the actual words of which constitute its text. This is set down for performance on Wednesday evening, under the composer's own direction, and will be followed at the same concert by Mr. Henry Leslie's part-song, "The Lullaby of Life." Mr. Walter Macfarren's overture, Hero and Leander, a work not unknown to London amateurs, holds a conspicuous place in Thursday morning's programme, having as its companion Sir Sterndale Bennett's favorite pastoral, The May Queen. The most capacious will decline to dispute the propriety of choosing Bennett's cantata, the claims of which rest rather upon intrinsic and unchallengeable merit than upon the fact that our late regretted master was a Yorkshireman, and composed The May Queen for the Leeds Festival of 1858. It would perhaps be resented in some quarters if I were to claim as an English oratorio Samson, written by the naturalized Englishman, George Frederick Handel, and set down for performances on Thursday evening. Passing this by, I find in the selection for Friday morning a new musical sacred drama, The Martyr of Antioch, the music composed by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, who has, also, with the help of Mr. W. S. Gilbert, adapted the words from Dean Milman's poem of the same name. It is so long since Mr. Sullivan produced a work of this character, that considerable interest is naturally felt in the present effort, the fate of which, however, I am not disposed to assume. Enough that The Martyr of Antioch contains a good deal of bright, picturesque, and effective music, and such music as ought to meet with instant favor on Friday. The other English pieces are a new overture, entitled Mors Janua Vitæ, by Mr. Thomas Wingham, and a part-song, "The Better Land," in which the Leeds chorus-master (Mr. Broughton) displays his skill as a writer for the voices he so well knows how to train. Turning from these native productions to the representation of universal art, I find Mendelssohn's Elijah, Mozart's Symphony in G-minor, Weber's overture to Oberon, Mendelssohn's psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Mass in C, Schubert's "Song of Miriam," Cherubini's overture to Anacréon, Bach's cantata, O Light Everlasting, Raff's Symphony, Leonore, Spohr's Last Judgment, and the first two parts of Haydn's Creation.

The soloists in Elijah, with which the festival opened on Wednesday morning, Oct. 13, were Mines. Albani, Osgood, Patey and Trebelli, Mr. Maas and Mr. F. King.—Of Mr. Barnett's new cantata, given in the evening, the same writer says:

Mr. Barnett has preserved the characteristics which distinguish its predecessors. This was to be expected, since, even if the composer had a tendency towards varied style, he would, in all probability, be restrained by the reflection that it is safer to go upon lines already approved by the arbiters of success. The Ancient Mariner pleased greatly, and Paradise and the Peri was received with applause. Why, then, should Mr. Barnett essay a "new departure," destined most likely to end in the trouble a man often brings upon himself when he opposes his own instincts, and does violence to his nature? Our composer is much too wise for any such course. As he feels and speaks in his first cantata, so he feels and speaks in the third, while in both he is equally honest and equally able. We recognize at once the familiar features. The hand may be the hand of Coleridge, or Moore, or Longfellow, but the voice is the voice of John Francis Barnett, and a gratified public welcome its pleasing accents. What if the utterances of the voice do not startle or puzzle? The vast majority of us do not want to be startled or puzzled. Things with this tendency are met plentifully in the matter-of-fact world, and ordinary folk have no desire to run up against them when seduced by music into a world which is ideal. Besides, how pleasant it is in this time of universal distortion to meet with a composer not ashamed of his own honest face! Composers there are, it is true, who, by long and rapt contemplation of a great master, have been gradually "changed into the same image," and Mr. Barnett may have looked to some such effect upon the beautiful face of Mendelssohn. But in these cases there is no pretence. The expression of the idol becomes the expression of the worshipper by force of a natural and irresistible law. In no such category can we place the musical jugglers who go about wearing the masks of better men than themselves, and who are ready to throw down one counterfeit presentment, and take up another, whenever it seems likely that the change will attract the public to their show.

It is scarcely needful to go through The Building of the Ship number by number, nor would the result of such endeavor reward its toil. Enough if I touch upon some salient points, leaving the rest to be taken for granted—a course, by the way, that involves little risk when the work concerned is one of Mr. Barnett's, since he is always safe. Our composer uses to a moderate and, therefore, endurable extent, the often exaggerated device of representative themes, and one of these appears in the orchestral introduction, which has three movements, illustrating, first, sunrise on the seashore; second, the aspirations of the Youth to the hand of the Master's daughter; third, the scene of activity in the Shipyard. Its principal feature is a broad and fluent melody suggesting the "aspirations," and destined to prelude an air sung by the "Youth":

"Ah! how skillful grows the hand,
That obeyeth Love's command!"

Mr. Barnett should be complimented upon the discernment here shown. He could not have done better than connect the principal subject of his introduction with the governing thought of the poem—Love inspires and rewards Labor. That the piece is well written goes without saying, for Mr. Barnett is everywhere known as a deft handler of the orchestra. Another representative theme appears in the opening recitative of the Merchant, "Build me straight, O worthy Master!" and several times re-appears when reference is made to the ship. Following this are two or three numbers about which it is difficult to speak, for the reason that, while free from anything objectionable, they are devoid of character. Mr. Barnett, however, should not be blamed for this, the fault lying with words which, to the musician, are colorless and insignificant. A much better result is attained when the love element comes to the front. This lights up charmingly some portions of the Master's address to the Youth, wherein he promises his daughter's hand on the day of the launching of the ship; it gives beauty and interest to the music descriptive of the Maiden's appearance as she stands at her father's door, and makes instinct with true feeling the song of the happy lover, "Ah! how skillful grows the hand." The song is an exceedingly graceful composition, and will no doubt, become a favorite. From this point the interest of the music continues some time unabated. A long chorus, "Thus with the rising of the sun," describing the life and bustle of the shipyard, though by no means elaborate in structure, is recommended by well-sustained vigor and effective climax; while the admirable contrast of the Master's cottage in the peaceful evening time, as the lovers sit in the porch, and the old man tells them tales of the sea, loses nothing by association with Mr. Barnett's sympathetic and unaffected music. The duet for soprano and tenor, in which the home picture appears, ranks among the best things in the work, being none the less entitled to its place on account of an obbligato for Corno Inglese, which is an independent source of melodic charm. Another vigorous and extended shipyard chorus, introducing the Ship Theme, further exemplifies Mr. Barnett's method of producing effect by simple means; after which comes a largely developed scene for soprano, "To-day the vessel shall be launched." Upon this, Mr. Barnett appears to have lavished all his care, with considerable success. It is not his fault that the nature of the subject prevents him from appealing to our deepest emotions, and we may fairly wonder that so much has been done with a hard and dry material. The description of the wedding on the deck of the as yet unlaunched ship brings in a more serious element, and the composer seizes upon it to introduce a quasi-religious chorus, "The prayer is said," with organ accompaniment, followed by a solo for the Pastor, having a tuneful theme, presently combined with the chorus and afterwards made prominent in the finale. The actual launch of the ship is happily illustrated, and achieves so conspicuous a musical success that it cannot fail to call up hopes of Mr. Barnett one day devoting his talents to a strictly dramatic subject. Those who know the finale of The Ancient Mariner will have no difficulty in believing that the finale of the new cantata is an elaborate and studied climax. The composer tells us that it illustrates "the scene of a multitude witnessing a vessel leaving the shore." This explains the opening orchestral passages imitative of the sailor's cry, after which the burden of the pastor's song is taken in full choral harmony, and worked out with ever increasing effect to the end.

I have no doubt as to the popularity of Mr. Barnett's cantata. It contains all the elements of a success, to be determined by the general voice, and deserves consideration for the reason that it supplies the public with music in which there is nothing open to objection from the most fastidious critic.

BERLIN. At the Royal Opera-house Herr Niemann selected Spontini's Ferdinand Cortez for his first appearance this season. The theatre was crowded and Herr Niemann's reception enthusiastic. Gluck's Iphigenie in Tauris, after a long absence from the boards, was performed on the Empress's birthday. Mme. Mallinger, though suffering from indisposition, gave a fine rendering of the principal female character, especially in the second and the third act.—Franz von Suppé's Donna Juanita has been produced at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theatre, but has failed to achieve the success which attended his former works, Boccaccio and Fatinitza.—A new concert-hall, the Winter Garden, as it is called, of the Central Hotel, has been opened. For size and magnificence there is no other concert-room here that can be compared with it.—Herr Bitter, Minister of Finance, author of the well-known work on Johann Sebastian Bach, and a great musical amateur, was married recently to Mile. Clara Nerenz, daughter of the late Professor Nerenz. The formal betrothal took place only five days before the marriage. As the interval fixed by law had not elapsed after the betrothal, the Emperor granted a special dispensation. The bridegroom is sixty-seven; the bride, thirty-seven.—On the 1st inst. Herr Blise, the Hof-Musikdirector, celebrated his fiftieth professional anniversary.

OBERRAMMERGAU. Following the system hitherto adopted in Munich, King Ludwig ordered that the last performance of the Passion Play should take place with himself as sole auditor.

PESTH. The Hungarian Chamber has voted the suppression of the Government grant to the German Theatre. The Emperor of Austria being dissatisfied at this, has ordered the subject again to be considered, and that German artists reduced to want by the vote of the Chamber shall receive assistance from his private purse.

MEININGEN. At the Seventh and Non-Subscription Concert, to follow the series of Beethoven Subscription Concerts, under the direction of Herr Hans von Bülow, at the Ducal Theatre, in November and December, the Ninth Symphony with Chorus will be performed twice, an interval of fifteen minutes for refreshment being allowed between the two performances!

VIENNA. There is now to be a "Weber Cycles" at the Imperial Opera, including Preciosa, in which most of the characters are to be sustained by members of the Burgtheater company. Euryanthe will open the Cycles at the end of the present month. Baron Dingelstedt has resigned his post as manager.—The concerts of the Gesellschaftsconcerte commence on the 14th November. The 12th April is fixed for the Extraordinary Concert. Mme. Norman-Néruda plays at the first; Herr Auer, from St. Petersburg, at the third; and Mr. Charles Hallé at the fourth; The Creation being reserved for the second. Franz Liszt will again be invited to take part in the "Extraordinary Concert," on April 12, 1881.—Herr Johann Strauss has achieved a decided success with his new buffo opera, Das Spitzentuch der Königin, at the Theater an der Wien. Book and music pleased much, and the critics, headed by Dr. Ed. Hanslick, all speak favorably of this latest production from the master's pen. The music, a great deal of which is in "dance form," is light, pleasing, and melodious. On the first night five pieces were encored.—Herr Bachrich, tenor, and Herr Hummer, violoncello, both masters at the Conservatory, have seceded from Hellmesberger's Quartet, and been replaced by Herren Loh and Suizer, members of the orchestra at the Imperial Opera-house. The Quartet Evenings of Herren Radnicky, Siebert, Stecher, and Kretschmann, will be continued this winter, and will take place at the Bösendorf Rooms.—Mr. George Grove was here a short time since on matters connected with Schubert.

—By his new engagement as Capellmeister at the Imperial Opera-house, Hans Richter is granted two months additional leave of absence in order that he may conduct his concerts in London. The months selected are May and June, the Italian season here. Herr Jahn, Capellmeister at Wiesbaden, succeeds Baron Dingelstedt as artistic manager. A new ballet, Der Stock im Eisen, has proved a hit. It has a great advantage in being founded on a legend connected with a famous wooden block—at the corner of the Kärnthnerstrasse—in which now, as for ages, every wandering Bursche who passes through the Austrian capital drives a nail. The custom is somehow or other connected with the adventures of a smith's apprentice, who, after making a compact with the Prince of Darkness, on the usual condition, of course, for the Prince's aid in producing a master-piece, eventually ignores the bargain, gives his demoniacal acquaintance a sound thrashing, and leads home his bride, the reward of the master-piece aforesaid, in triumph. Composer, scene-painter, costumer, and carpenter have done wonders in aiding the ballet master, and the public are in ecstasies. A true "Wiener Kind" loves a good ballet.

LONDON. The removal of the Sacred Harmonic Society from Exeter Hall to St. James's Hall has involved a re-arrangement of their orchestra; but though reduced in numbers, the committee believe that this will be more than compensated by the new conditions under which the society will now be carried on. The prospectus for the forty-ninth season, 1880-81, announces nine concerts, commencing on December 3, with a programme of three works which have not been performed for some years, viz.: Beethoven's Mass in C, and Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion and Christus. The Christmas performance of The Messiah will take place on December 17. Among the works to be performed during the season will be found Handel's coronation anthem, "The King shall rejoice," and oratorio, Samson; Mendelssohn's Athalie, Hymn of Praise, and Elijah; Cherubini's Requiem; Benedict's St. Cecilia; Costa's Naaman; and Rossini's Stabat Mater and Moses in Egypt. The band will still comprise the most eminent performers in the musical profession. The artists already announced are Mmes. Sherrington, Anna Williams, Osgood, Marriott, C. Penna, Enequist, and Jones (sopranos); Mmes. Patey, Enriquez, Hancock, and Orridge (contraltos); Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Edward Lloyd, Maas, Wells, and Cummings (tenors); Messrs. Atley, Bridson, King, Hilton, and C. Henry (basses). Mr. Willing continues his post as organist, and Sir Michael Costa, whose great abilities have for the past thirty-three years been exerted on behalf of the society, will still fulfil the important duties of conductor.

Herr Brahms has just completed a new, his third, orchestral symphony, which, considering that about half a dozen serial orchestral concerts are to be given in London during the winter and spring, it is hoped we shall soon hear in London. He has also, during his holidays, written an overture (one account says two overtures) and a pianoforte trio, which Mr. Arthur Chappell will doubtless secure.

ROME. One of the most impertinent feats of the irascible composer, Wagner, is reported from Rome. On the occasion of the Palestrina festival, the committee sent invitations to the most eminent musicians to send in some suitable compositions. Gounod, Verdi, Ambroise Thomas and others cheerfully promised to do homage to the "Prince of Music;" but Wagner could not do a graceful action; he sent a copy of the greatest of Palestrina's works, the world-famed "Missa Papæ Marcelli," to the festival committee. In this copy he had erased all the original annotations relating to time, pianos, crescendos and fortes, and corrected them by his own interpretation of the venerable work. The insult flung in the face of the festival committee will be properly appreciated when it is remembered that this music has been sung in Rome for three hundred years.

PARIS. The chief novelties announced by M. Colonne at the Paris Châtelet concerts are a "Suite Algérienne," by M. Saint-Saëns, a violin concerto by Lalo, a piano concerto by M. Godard, and M. Duvernoy's cantata, "La Tempête." The concerts begin Oct. 24. M. Pasdeloup announces a series of historical concerts of works by French composers, from Lully to the present time, and works new to Paris by the Russian composers, Glinka, Dargomijsky, Rubinstein, Seroff, Tchaikowsky, and Rimsky-Korsakoff, and by the Italian writers, Verdi, Boito, and Ponchielli. M. Pasdeloup also proposes another attempt to popularize the works of the German school in Paris, and to produce compositions by Wagner, Brahms, Raff, and Goldmark.

LEIPZIG. The Gewandhaus concerts began on the 7th, with a performance of Bach's Suite in D for string quartet and wind, and Goldmark's Violin Concerto, played by Lauterbach, of Dresden.

SCHUMANN ON STRINGED QUARTETS (1838).¹

THIRD QUARTET MORNING.

W. H. VET. Second Quartet for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello, E Major. — Opus 5.
J. F. E. SOBOLEWSKI. Trio for Piano-forte, Violin and Violoncello, A-flat major, manuscript.
LEOPOLD FUCHS. Quintet for two Violins, two Violas, and Violoncello, E-flat major. — Opus 11.

Our third meeting was quite remarkably brilliant, from the addition of a pianist and a viola-player, whom we found necessary for the execution of a piano-forte trio and a quintet; and this change was not proposed by me without other reasons. The beautiful can only be enjoyed in moderation, and I could more easily spend a night in listening to Strauss and Lanner dance music than to Beethoven symphonies, the tones of which pierce the soul until its wounds ache. And we need freshness in listening to quartets only, if not an especial fondness for that species of composition also. Composers always go away after the first, reviewers after the second; it is only the patient amateur who can support a third. One of these brave connoisseurs told me that he had been once entirely without music for three months, and that in his great hunger for it he played quartets on his first visit to the city during three consecutive days. "To be sure," he added, partly in excuse, "I play a little myself, and therefore took the second violin." So we introduced a little variety among our quartets; and who knows whether we may not admit one instrument after another among us, in contrary fashion to Haydn's well-known symphony, until our four-leaved clover is transformed into a complete orchestra? For the present, however, we are quite satisfied, especially as we now have to make our reader acquainted with several delightful novelties.

Some German towns are famed for their indifference towards persons of talent residing within their walls; others content themselves with praising their resident talent when there is question of rivalry with other towns; a third class can never cease boasting of its talented sons and daughters. Prague belongs to this last class. Whatever report we may happen to take up that proceeds from Prague we find its home artists treated with a delicate respect, an almost maternal cordiality; and among such criticisms we are sure to meet with the name mentioned first at the head of this article. And as even the field, merely, which the young composer has chosen to display his talent on, proves that his aim is no common one, I listened to his work — as one should listen to every work — with a favorable preconceived opinion. The score, neatly written in a refined, musician-like hand, enabled me to unravel the web still more easily.

A tone of cheerfulness and contentment breathes through this whole quartet; deep and sorrowful experience seems unknown to the young composer; he stands at the entrance of life with music as his fair companion; the work sparkles with a soft glitter. Its form presents no remarkable boldness or novelty; it is correct, and carried through with a hand already experienced, it would appear. The harmonic conduct of the whole, as well as of separate parts, is worthy of especial praise; a clearer, purer, correcter fifth opus has seldom been written. And from the manner in which the composer treats the string instruments, it is plain that he understands and has often played them. I might characterize the work to readers who have not facilities for easily obtaining it, as standing next to the Onslow quartet in manner; certain echoes of Spohr have become common property in this form; but a few Auberian passages appear out of place in it. After the scherzo, the first movement is most to be commended, in which I only object to the retrogression in the middle as too straggling, too little interesting; besides, in the preceding working up, the complete minor key (E minor) is touched on, a harmonic succession that we find almost wholly avoided in model works. Yet these are but trifling faults, scarcely worth mentioning in comparison with the counterbalancing excellence of the movement. The adagio was on the point of seeming monotonous to me, when, just at the right moment, the composer reintroduced the principal melody, giving to it an altered, exciting character. This determined the movement. The first part of the scherzo is excellent, worked out artistically and industriously; the trio is more effeminate. The last movement satisfies me the least. I know that some of the best masters close in a similar merry rondo style. But when a work is seriously and energetically taken hold of, it should be ended in the same manner, and not with a rondo, especially with one the theme of which reminds too strongly of a familiar Auber melody. In the middle he tries to interest us with some short fugued passages (in which firm theorists might draw his attention to the false entrance of the comes); but I never had a high opinion of this kind of work, which does not venture beyond the first entrance on the fifth, and which can excite learned wonder in none save amateurs. Notwithstanding this the movement is pretty, and certain to please, if well played in public. May this composer strive ever onwards and higher, and on novel paths! He has already acquired much, and is sure to sustain himself with honor on broader fields of battle.

The next thing we played was the above-mentioned trio by J. F. E. Sobolewski; and now the reader must depend wholly on our opinion, as the work is still in manuscript; and there is a great deal to be said about it. This composer's music is a witness to the fact that he lives by the seashore in the North. The trio is different from all others, original in form and spirit, full of deep melody. It may be often heard, well played; and yet it does not produce a decided effect; like the whole, it seems to have arisen at a time of crisis, during a struggle between old and new ways of musical thought. It does not appear, either, that the pianoforte is this composer's instrument; he writes for it "thanklessly" enough, my pianist thinks. It would be presumptuous to decide as to what degree of talent this composer possesses from a single trio, especially as this has been written a long time, since when he has brought out larger works, cantatas, an oratorio, "Lazarus," etc.² But we doubly respect him as critic, in which capacity he is best known to us, since we learn that he is also a poet in his art.

We next turned with pleasure to the quintet by L. Fuchs, whose compositions we made acquaintance with on our first quartet morning, and at once reported in our paper. I cannot, unfortunately, go much into detail, as I have not the score at hand, and some time has passed since the morning of performance, while only the general impression, the cheerful mood in which it set us, remains behind. It is scarcely conceivable how the addition of another viola at once alters the effect of the string instruments, or how very different is the character of the quintet from that of the quartet. The middle tints have more force and life; the single parts work better together than masses; if, in the quartet, we listen to four separate players, we now imagine we have an assemblage of them before us. Here a clever harmonist, such as we know this composer to be, can let himself go as he fancies, winding the parts in and out, and showing what he is capable of. All the movements are excellent, the scherzo especially so, and next, the first movement. Certain details in it surprise us as though we caught on the lips of a soberly-clad citizen a verse from Goethe or Schiller; and it was plain that my enthusiastic quintet players were pleased and much interested in a work that ought to be generally known.

When I have in mind the highest description of music, such as Bach and Beethoven have bestowed on us in some of their creations, — when I speak of those rare moods of mind, such as the artist should inspire in us, — I demand that each of his works shall lead me a step forward in the spiritual dominion of art, and I demand poetic depth and novelty everywhere, in detail as well as in the whole; but I have long to seek for this, and none of the above-mentioned, little of recently-published music, satisfies such a demand. In our next quartet meetings, we tried some of the music of a young man who seemed to draw it from a living depth of genius at times; yet there are certain limits to this opinion, of which, as well as of the subject that suggested it, I shall now speak further.

² Since the above was written, he has made a name as dramatic composer (Schumann's note of 1883).

FOURTH AND FIFTH QUARTET MORNINGS.

I will now relate so much as belongs to the public of these two secret musical gatherings. I call them secret, because in them only the manuscripts of an until now wholly unknown (as composer) young musician, Hermann Hirschbach, were played. As an author, he must certainly have awakened the attention of our readers by the boldness and penetration of the views he has made public in a few articles in our paper. After so much promise, it was natural for me, on taking the measure of his intellect, to expect extraordinary things from him as a composer. I cannot even think of his works without deep sympathy; fain would I bury myself in remembrance for hours together, and talk with my reader of him. It may be, besides, that all that is twofold in the character of his compositions, — so like my own in this little-understood quality, — has made me susceptible, has quickly revealed his music to me. Of this much, however, I am certain, that his endeavor has been the most remarkable of all I have chanced on among young talent for a long time. The form of his music can scarcely be defined in words; it is itself speech, yet it speaks to us but as the flowers, or as eyes that relate secret histories to each other, as transmigrated spirits may converse; the speech of the soul, the truest musical life. We played and listened to three great quartets and a quintet, all written on passages from Goethe's "Faust," more as a decoration than as a description, though the music is clear enough in itself; it was a longing aspiration, a call for salvation, a continuous rushing onwards, — and amid this, happy forms, golden meadows, rosy evening clouds; I hope I do not exaggerate when I say that the composer sometimes seemed himself to be the gloomy magician Faust, as he brought before us, in floating outlines of fancy, the varied scenes of his life. Besides these, I have seen an overture to "Hamlet" by him, a grand symphony in several movements, a second, half finished, the movements of which should proceed one after the other in a breath; both equally fantastic, full of vital strength, differing in form from all preceding ones except those of Berlioz, with some orchestral passages such as we are only accustomed to hear from Beethoven, when he hurries like a destroyer to the battle-field against the entire world. And now comes my "best." It is with us here as it often is when we first look on the pictures of genial young painters, which, from their grandeur of composition (even outwardly), richness and truth of color, etc., so completely take us captive, that we only wonder, and overlook falsehoods in detail, errors of drawing, etc. When I listened to these things for the second time, certain passages already began to annoy me; passages that sin — I will not say against the first rules of the schools — but against the ear and the natural laws of harmonic progression. I do not count fifths among these only, but also some conclusions in the bass, and some modulations such as we meet with in inexperienced writers. These faults were as disagreeable to my musicians as to me.

There is a sort of instinctive mastery of cadences, and so on, that seems to be the gift of nature, upon which that ordinary musical understanding, common to nearly all professional musicians, is grounded. If a young composer offends against this, it matters not how intellectual he may be, he is certain to find such men draw back from him, and scarcely even regard him as one of them. Whence comes this lack of a refined sense of hearing, of a correct management of harmony, amid so many other great gifts? Did the composer discover his talent too late? Did he abandon study too soon? Is it that, in his richness of idea, his command of a generally very deep principal melody, full of meaning, in the upper part, he is unable to invent equally well for the lower ones? or are his organs of hearing really inefficient? This is a great question, as also is that, as to whether or not there is any help for the fault. The world will probably never see these works; and, to speak honestly, I would only counsel their publication on condition of many previous alterations, and even great omissions. This is, however, advice which we leave to the composer to accept or reject. This article is simply intended to call attention to a talent, beside which I could not place on the same level a single one among my recent discoveries; and music which, a result of the deepest psychical powers, has often touched me to the soul.

MR. SULLIVAN'S "MARTYR OF ANTIOCH."

(From the London Daily Telegraph.)

Mr. Arthur Sullivan, looking about for the subject of a composition to be produced at the Leeds Festival, came upon the late Dean Milman's dramatic poem, The Martyr of Antioch, and selected it. He must have seen something there able to make amends for the staleness of the story. Perhaps because Biblical incidents have been used up, English composers some time ago began to choose their themes from the records of the early church, naturally selecting those which set forth the constancy of the Martyrs. Thus we have an oratorio, St. Polycarp, by the Oxford professor of music, Sir Gore Ouseley; a cantata, St. Cecilia, by Sir Julius Benedict; a second work of the same description, Placida, by Mr. William Carter; and yet another, St. Dorothea, by Mme. Sainton-Dolby. Varied in treatment and character as are these works, there are yet points of resemblance, due to the fact that they all deal with the same general theme — the persecution, constancy, and death of those who counted all things, even love and life, but dross for the sake of the Master to whom they had given their allegiance. Mr. Sullivan knew perfectly well, therefore, that his choice of Dean Milman's story involved a sacrifice of freshness, but his resolve may have been strengthened by a determination to treat it from an original point of view, and thus, while avoiding comparisons, secure the element of novelty wanting in the subject. It is the fashion now for composers to follow, more or less, longo intervallo, in the wake of Wagner, and construct their own libretti. Sometimes they are successful, more often they fail; but Mr. Sullivan is hardly a distinct addition to either category. I shall not trouble the reader with details of the measure and the manner in which the book of The Martyr of Antioch departs from the original poem.

That is a point of small consequence, and may be passed over for the important fact that an examination of the libretto shows Mr. Sullivan to have been guided more by his instincts as a musician than by his taste as a dramatist. We learn from the preface that besides writing some rhyme verse for the piece, Mr. W. S. Gilbert gave his friend and collaborator the benefit of certain suggestions. It would seem, however, that Mr. Gilbert, out of profound sympathy with Mr. Sullivan, refrained from hints which in their result might have restricted the composer's opportunity for appealing to popular tastes. The exact significance of this remark will appear as I take the "sacred musical drama" — Mr. Sullivan rejects the term "cantata" — and examine it scene by scene.

The action opens at Antioch towards the close of the third century, when Syria was governed for Rome by the Prefect Olybius. We are first shown the Temple of Apollo during the celebration of rites in honor of the Sun God. Youths and maidens chants his praises with grateful reference to his various attributes, as Lord of Day, as Master of the Lyre, whose music makes even lovesick damsels heedless of their lovers' approach, and so on. When the hymn ceases, the prefect (tenor) notices the absence of the priestess Margarita (soprano) from her place at the altar. Margarita is betrothed to Olybius, who calls for her in impassioned strains. To his appeal there is no answer, but the high priest Callias (bass) seizes the opportunity to reproach the prefect with indulgence shown to the Christian sect. Olybius confesses the guilt of undue leniency, but swears that henceforth no mercy shall be granted, whereupon the crowd salute him as the "Christian scourge," and the scene closes. This part of the drama will bear examination, although it may be charged with want of symmetry, owing to the great length of the opening hymn — which fills no less than seventy out of ninety pages. But the "argument" of the scene is compact, and comes to an end significant as well as definite, since we are bound to remember the absence of Margarita, and to see a dark shadow projected upon her path as Olybius, the maiden's lover, and Callias, her father, make the compact of extermination. Nor should the fact be overlooked that expectation is called forth by keeping back the priestess till a moment when, owing to the omens of her fate, all interest centres in her person. The music of the scene is faithfully representative of the general character Mr. Sullivan has given to his work. I have already pointed out that seven-ninths of the pages devoted to it are taken up by the Pagan chorus, whence it follows that the real action is treated in a somewhat sketchy manner. As here, so throughout the drama; and, as throughout the drama so here, few music-lovers will feel inclined to visit the composer with censure. Our judgment may warn us of too much lyricism, and that the dramatic element is being hurriedly passed by, but our feelings are likely to over-ride our judgment, since Mr. Sullivan is most charming when represented by the incense, flowers, and songs of Apollo's maidens. With these are all his sympathies, and he invests them with so much musical beauty of form and color that they command our sympathies likewise, and make the poor Christians and their lugubrious strains appear as uninteresting as they are sombre. The scene is preluded by an arrangement for orchestra of the theme sung by Margarita at the stake, which need not be referred to here more than is necessary to eulogize the scoring. Thus early the composer indicates the quarter whither we must look for one of the chief attractions of his work. In setting the long hymn to Apollo, efficient precautions are taken against monotony. The hymn is divided into six sections, presenting a good deal of variety in style and character, some being given to female and others to male voices only, while, again, others employ the full chorus. There is also a contralto solo, "The love-sick damsel laid," which may fairly be included among Mr. Sullivan's most beautiful conceptions. A languid and, in some respects, original melody is supported upon the close harmonies of low strings, while two clarinets reiterate in thirds and sixths a "figure" composed of three notes only. The harmonic progressions, as the songs, are as far removed from commonplace as its general character, and wherever The Martyr of Antioch goes, connoisseurs will discover "The love-sick maiden" one of its principal beauties. Mr. Sullivan has undoubtedly been influenced by Mendelssohn in the Pagan chorus, not, perhaps, as to form, and certainly not as regards details, but the sentiment and general character of the music have a family relationship with the sentiment and character of the German master's illustrations to Sophocles. The local color, as determined by Mendelssohn, is well sustained; and the orchestration, especially for violins, is unusually brilliant and picturesque, while the various parts of the extended hymn are cunningly welded into a whole by an occasional use of a phrase with which the first opens. Passing from this to the dialogue of Olybius and Callias, not much is found calling for note, and musical interest centres chiefly in the prefect's invocation of his bride-elect, "Come Margarita, come." The song—which, like "The love-sick maiden," was vociferously encored at Friday's performance—is a perfect gem in its pretty, yet, withal, artistic way. Melody and expression are alike charming, but the connoisseur will admire its structure as much as either. Each verse ends in a different key—F, E-flat, D-flat—the return to the original key (B-flat) being in every case made by an exquisite transition through D-minor, on the words, "Come Margarita, come." No such contribution to English lyric music has been made for years past.

The second scene opens in a Christian burial-place what time a funeral service is performed by the Bishop of Antioch, Fabius (bass). After the assembled people have sung a hymn, the bishop begins an address, but is interrupted by an alarm of advancing foes, and dismisses his flock to their homes. One, however, remains behind, and that one is Margarita. Taking the lyre she had used before the altar of Apollo, the priestess sings a hymn in praise of Christ, at the close of which her father, Callias, enters, bidding her attend the waiting rite. At this Margarita declares her change of faith, and the action of the scene ends. Some objections are obvious. In the first place, too much time is taken up by the funeral anthem—an extraneous business altogether; and, next, the interview between Callias and his daughter has no adequate conclusion, while in character it is tame and unnatural. A father and child, conscious that the life of one was at stake, would, in the first moments of grief and terror, hardly enter upon a discussion about their respective gods. We demand to know, moreover, what comes of Margarita's declaration, but receive no answer, the scene suddenly closing in. As regards the music, I must say of the Christian anthem as of the Pagan that, whatever its dramatic impropriety, no one will complain. It is a very beautiful, tender, and impressive setting of the well-known hymn, "Brother, thou art gone before us," and will be heard on many an occasion as mournful in real life as that which calls it forth in the drama. Margarita's song to the Saviour, with its introductory recitative, presents another capital number. The recitative is full of expression, and the song of a chastened joy, mingled with deep reverence, and pity for the sufferings entailed by human guilt. I cannot so highly approve the music to the dialogue of Margarita and Callias, and it only serves to show how far Mr. Sullivan has overlooked the seriousness of the situation when we find as principal theme a melody light enough for the entrée of some heroine of comedy. Mr. Sullivan has made a mistake here, and, as an expositor of human feeling, is a disappointment. But the music itself gives no cause for offence. Those who are as superficial at itself have a right, indeed, to be pleased with it.

At the opening of the third scene we are introduced to the house of the prefect, near which our composer's favorites, the maidens, are inviting one another to quit the busy streets and breathe the balmy evening air in the groves of Daphne. When their song ends, Olybius addresses Margarita—who has somehow or other made her way to the palace—and paints a dazzling picture of her future pomp. In return, the ex-priestess reminds Olybius of his thirst for glory, and offers him that which shall be eternal in the Heavens. The prefect answers in a mood playful and tender, but when he hears her entreat him to become a Christian, curses rush to his lips—curses which would be invoked upon the head of Christ himself but that Margarita arrests the words. At this the maiden bids her betrothed farewell, and, when asked whither she was going, replies, "To my prison, sir," by which we are left to infer that she voluntarily immures herself. When I state that the whole of the scene between the lovers occupies but five pages of the pianoforte score, it will be obvious that Mr. Sullivan has again treated his drama with scant respect. The maidens' chorus, on the other hand, fills twenty-one pages. Again, however, the consolation comes to us that we would not shorten it by a bar, preferring, for the sake of so much beauty, that the story should be treated as a peg to hang it on. The chorus, "Come away with willing feet," is one of the most charming the work contains. Written in two parts for female voices and in two sections (B-flat and G-minor), it adds to lovely and characteristic melody the interest of an accompaniment made fascinating by a delicate use of the wind instruments against a moto continuo for muted violins, throughout which a gruppetto of six notes is almost incessantly repeated. More thoroughly enjoyable and at the same time characteristic music could not have been written. The song of the prefect to Margarita, "See what Olybius's love prepares for thee," is inferior in charm to his first air, though not without decided merit. The music to the lovers' dialogue descends by comparison to insignificance.

We now enter upon the fourth and last scene. Mr. Sullivan's maidens hasten to the Temple of Apollo, past the prison of the Christians, singing as they go. The Christians hear them, and chant the praises of the true God. Meanwhile, prefect, priests, and people have gathered for the test of Margarita and Julia (contralto). A representative of the heathen creed demands the presence of the accused. As she is brought forth, a hymn to Apollo is sung, and when the martyr stands face to face with her persecutors, Julia, Olybius, and Callias set before her the choice—Olybius's throne or a blasphemer's fate. She unhesitatingly accepts death, whereupon the multitude call fiercely for instant execution. In reply, the martyr, like her prototype at Jerusalem, vindicates her faith and appeals to the final judgment. Once more the people shout, "Blasphemy!" but Margarita, undaunted, sings the glory and might of Him who protects her, and is so beautiful in her fervor that the prefect exclaims, when her loosed locks flow in the frantic grace of inspiration from the burst fillet down her snowy neck, "Never yet looked she so lovely." A last appeal is now made by Julia, Olybius, and Callias, and a last formal tender offered of sacrifice to Apollo or death. As the martyr remains constant, fire is applied to the pyre on which she stands, and Margarita then bursts into a rapturous song. She sees visions of Heaven, the starry pavement of the city "not made with hands," the angels, Cherubim and Seraphim, appear to her ecstatic gaze, till at last she beholds the Son of Man himself, and exclaiming, "Lord, I come," expires, as a brief chorus of glory to the Almighty is sung by the on-looking Christians. The dramatic construction of this scene is not open to objection in any serious degree. It tells the story with conciseness and point, and, if it represents the father and lover of the martyr as singularly calm in their concern for the victim, it puts the martyr herself in a strong and sufficient light. The music once more illustrates Mr. Sullivan's preference to the heathen, the opening chorus of maidens being as charming as most of its predecessors. But the palm of merit unquestionably belongs to the hymn "Io Pæan," sung as Margarita is brought forth. It is chiefly remarkable first for a broadly phrased solo with characteristic chorus, and next for an accompaniment consisting of a one-bar phrase continually repeated, after the model set by Mr. Sullivan's revel chorus in the "Prodigal Son." The number is one of striking cleverness, and right well deserves the encore it obtained at the performance on Friday. Margarita's address to her judges contains some fine music, principally orchestral, but the choruses of the incensed people, if not too brief, are decidedly too conventional for the interest they might otherwise have excited. A quartet for Margarita, Julia, Olybius, and Callias, "Have mercy, unrelenting Heaven," though pleasing, lacks the intense feeling natural to the situation. On the other hand, the martyr's final song is one of great beauty and power. Not only may the melody be described as rapturous, but the movements, color, and rhythm of the orchestra seem to suggest the full, throbbing, ecstatic life about to be merged into the life eternal, and gather force as the song proceeds and the end draws near. The change to short and agitated phrases at the vision of the Saviour is well managed, and the gradual piling of force and strenuous expression till the triumphant chorus bursts in belongs emphatically to the good things of art.

Taking The Martyr of Antioch as a whole, I do not question its chance of the popularity for which Mr. Sullivan has striven. It is a work that no one, be he musician or not, can hear without interest and admiration. At the same time criticism will always point to the fact that the drama is treated substantially as a pretext for charming choruses and airs. But while the finger of criticism is thus engaged, the voice of criticism will, for the sake of those choruses and airs, say as little as possible.

HANSLICK ON JACQUES OFFENBACH.¹

When Offenbach came in February last year to Vienna, for the purpose of directing the final rehearsal and first performance of his Madame Favart, he resembled a crumbling ruin, which may noiselessly collapse in the night. His friends remarked with dismay the hippocratic expression in the weary face of him who was once so lively, and on taking leave had a presentiment that it was forever. This last journey of his, ill as he was, to his tenderly beloved Vienna, was one of the numerous proofs of the marvellous strength of will and love of work which triumphed over all bodily ills. Nothing, save such strength of will and love of work, could have effected the miracle of prolonging for another year the life of a man whose constitution was so shattered. Musical talent of a perfectly unusual order and a brilliant specialty have passed away with Offen-bach. The popularity of his works cannot possibly be greater than it was during his lifetime, but German critics may, perhaps, be induced by his death to form a more impartial estimate, and judge them from a musical and not merely from a one-sided moral point of view, as they have hitherto done. Much as he wrote, Offenbach was always original; we recognize his music as "Offenbachish" after only two or three bars, and this fact alone raises him high above his many French and German imitators, whose buffo operas would shrivel up miserably were we to confiscate all that is Offenbachish in them. He created a new style in which he reigned absolutely alone, and, though that style certainly held a subordinate rank in the hierarchy of the drama, it afforded millions of human beings for a quarter of a century the almost lost pleasure derivable from a copious stream of fresh, easy-flowing, joyous music. To musical tragedy and the higher musical comedy, Offenbach added a third and well-justified category: the musical farce. That there is now a serious overflow in a style which, before his appearance, had dried up, is something that cannot be laid to his charge. Of his many successors, not a single one comes up to him in combining melodic talent and accomplished technical skill; the most that can be said is that Johann Strauss approaches him nearly in the former, and Lecocq in the latter respect.

At present that death — that undesired but still finally indispensable aid to criticism — has closed Offenbach's career, we are enabled to take a survey of his enormous activity. This may be divided into three periods, corresponding pretty nearly with the three last decades — the 50's, 60's, and 70's. The first period includes his short one-act pieces with songs interspersed, and exhibits his talent in its most amiable and unpretending aspect. In the second, we see him advancing to larger forms, while his fancy grows more luxuriant and his technical skill more certain, his effects at the same time becoming more elaborated; it is the period which with Orphée, La Belle Hélène, Geneviève, Barbe-Bleue, etc., enters on the dangerous domain of extravagant travesty and parody, and reaches almost to the end of the sixties. Thenceforth, Offenbach left the field of travesty and again turned rather to comedy properly so called; at the commencement of the third period, he wrote some charming pieces, half farce and half comedy — such as La Princesse de Trébizonde, La Vie Parisienne, and Vert-Vert — but he grew weary in the concluding years, and, though still wonderfully fertile, gave us as a rule only a weak reflex of his former compositions.

What rendered Offenbach's name all at once celebrated and popular was, as we know, the short one-act pieces interspersed with songs with which, during the International Exhibition of 1855, he inaugurated the little theatre in the Champs Elysées. These pieces had, however, been preceded by a number of attempts of which the world knew nothing, and probably lost nothing by its ignorance. When a young man, Offenbach had, from 1845 to 1855, been indefatigable in writing operas and buffo operas, with which he had in vain knocked at the doors of Parisian theatrical managers. So he set up a miniature theatre of his own, and, in his one-act pieces interspersed with songs, hit upon the right form for his fresh and graceful talent. With three or four artists, who could just manage to sing, and a tiny orchestra, but without chorus or dancers, and without the slightest outlay in mounting them, Offenbach gave in the quickest succession those one-act buffo operas which, merely by the charm of their joyous, graceful, and at the same time, characteristic melodies, attracted the public in crowds, and permanently held them spell-bound. Rossini, who better than any one else knew how to appreciate that rarity, prolific melodic talent, designated Offenbach, jokingly but significantly, as the "Mozart of the Champs Elysées." Vienna knows most of these short one-act pieces: Le Mariage aux Lanternes, Monsieur et Madame Denis, Les deux Aveugles, La Chanson de Fortunio, etc., from their having been performed at the Treumann-Theater and the Carl-Theater. The general and joyous welcome accorded to the unpretending little works was well deserved and easily to be explained. The short one-act piece, with songs for four characters and without chorus, may be considered an invention of Offenbach's, or, at least, a modern revival of a style of writing which, cultivated in the last century by Monsigny, Philidor, and Grétry, had fallen into oblivion. This style gradually re-appeared just as the opéra-comique approximated more and more to the style and magnificent mis-en-scène of the grand opera. More and more rarely were one-act pieces given at the former theatre as levens de rideau to half-empty benches. By so-called "comic" operas with the grand pretensions of L'Etoile du Nord or Dinorah, this form of art was so entirely impelled in the direction of the grand opera, that the old cheerful aspect of the opéra-comique was no longer recognizable, and comic pieces interspersed with songs were threatened with extinction. With his buffo operettas (which hold pretty much the same position relatively to comic opera that comic opera holds to grand) Offenbach filled up a very sensible gap, and, after a long drought, once more supplied mankind, eager for laughter and thirsting for melody, with a stream of musical cheerfulness. With all its originality, Offenbach's style is more nearly related to that of Auber and Adam than to any other. The French is the prevailing but not the sole element in him. Certain youthful impressions not to be obliterated, especially from the operas of Mozart and C. M. Weber (the only composers of whom he spoke with enthusiasm), a ray of German romanticism, and the comic carnivalesque extravagance of his native town, Cologne, were combined in him with the frolicsome grace of his adopted country, France. Finally, there was a third national element without which Offenbach can no more be thoroughly explained than H. Heine: the wit and acuteness of the Jew. Of all Offenbach's works, the group of one-act pieces interspersed with songs, with their irresistible humor and perfect form, please us to-day more than any others. How many potentates of la haute critique would fain persuade themselves and others that such trifles are easily written. Yes, so they are for any one possessing the grace of God. By what is it that this gift is so rare?

It was natural that Offenbach's talent should soon endeavor to extend the narrow limits of his first short productions. He wrote the music of pieces in more acts, and decked out dramatically as well as scenically with greater richness. Such works were Orphée, La Belle Hélène, Barbe-Bleue, Geneviève de Brabant, and others. In these works of his second period we find not only his ambition but likewise his art have undeniably grown. In musical wealth and wit the better scores of the second period are undoubtedly superior to his previous ones, but they sacrifice the early simplicity and natural charm that they may do justice to plots of which some are frivolously grotesque and some pompously rampant. Though very far from being the advocate of such librettos as Orphée and La Belle Hélène, we will mention in Offenbach's favor two mitigating circumstances for the consideration of those who condemn him unconditionally. In the first place, the notion of parodying the stories of Greek heroes and gods in comic musical pieces is not by any means new; it flourished in the last and in the present century on the German stage, especially in Vienna, the home of Blumauer's Travestirte Aeneide. Only the text and music were then immeasurably more trivial and senseless than in Offenbach's operas. In the latter, the librettists with all their extravagance are witty. The idea of the good-natured music-master, Orpheus, being compelled by "public opinion" to fetch back from the world below his deceased wife, who during her lifetime worried and deceived him, is decidedly clever. The domestic life of the gods in Orphée, the parody of the oracle-business and the Olympic games in La Belle Hélène, are unquestionably very witty notions. The same applies to the fundamental idea of La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein, which exhibits with much humor the autocracy of petty states, as exemplified in the rapid promotion of the private Fritz to the rank of general, and his equally quick degradation to the ranks again. Secondly, when there is a question of serious criticism, Offenbach's music should be held responsible neither for the excesses of the librettists nor those of the actors. While, to begin with, his works lose much of their wit and sharpness in the German versions, they suffer very much from the way they are usually performed in Germany. Admirable representations of his best pieces were given at the Carl-Theater (when, besides Teweke, Knaack and Motras, Carl Treumann, Grobecker, Müller, Fontelive, and, subsequently, Gallmeyer and Meyerhoff were members of the company). The same is true of the Theater an der Wien, with Mme. Geistinger — who was discovered and induced to adopt this style of piece by Offenbach himself — and the triad, Blasel, Rott, and Swo-boda. But the coarse, senseless, and unattractive performances of Offenbach's operas in the smaller court and town theatres of Germany, are something astounding, and critics who derive all their knowledge from such exhibitions generally, of course, judge Offenbach angrily and unjustly.

It is at the end of the 60's, say, after La Grand Duchesse de Gérolstein, that we would fix the termination of Offenbach's second period, which was more especially that of parody and travesty. The commencement of the third period is marked by several charming three and four-act pieces, more nearly resembling comedies, and exhibiting the composer's talent in all its freshness, while they are at the same time more refined and moderate in tone, and with only rare relapses into the grotesque extravagancies of the second period. These pieces were La Princesse de Trébizonde, La Vie Parisienne, and Vert-Vert, (performed at the Carl-Theater under the title of Kakadu). Induced to make an attempt in a higher style, Offenbach wrote at this period two more important works for the opéra-comique, Le Roi Barkouf, and Robinson Crusoe, both of which proved non-successful. Two similar attempts in Vienna convinced his friends that his light and ready talent, devoid of contrapuntal and polyphonic resources, and incapable of pathetic expression, did not suffice for serious subjects dramatically developed. We allude to the romantic opera Die Rhein-Nixen (the graceful ballet music of which Herbeck saved by introducing it into the third act of Nicolai's Lustige Weiber von Windsor) produced, in 1864, with but little success at the Kärntner-Theater, and the opera of Fantasio, which kept possession of the boards of the Theater an der Wien only a short time. In both cases, Offenbach got hold of a bad libretto, and, what was still worse, one not in keeping with his own individuality. He took all possible pains to be serious and passionate, to stretch himself out beyond his natural length, but the most he could accomplish were a few isolated happy moments. Art is better served, however, by those who acknowledge than by those who deny their own peculiar nature. Offenbach acted wisely, therefore, in again devoting himself entirely to the lighter style of buffo opera. In the last six or eight years, there was an undeniable diminution of his power of invention, and he had recourse to frequent reminiscences and loans (though only, by the way, from his own capital). Every one, even the weakest, of his subsequent operas was always adorned by one or more pieces in which his former talent shone full and bright; but detached beauties were not enough for lasting success. The operas of his last period known in Vienna are Les Brigands, Les Braconniers, Boule de Neige, Le Corsaire Noir, La Créole, La Jolie Parfumeuse, La Boulangère a des Ecus, Madame l'Archiduc, and, to conclude, La Fille du Tambour Major. The last according to his own reckoning, is his hundredth opera. Thus, with the two unacted works Les Contes d'Hoffmann, and Lurette, which he was completing on his death-bed, his dramatic efforts amounted to 162.

To astounding facility of production Offenbach united the most exemplary industry. He was able (like Mozart and Rossini) to compose amid all conceivable kinds of interruption at all times, and in any place. I have often beheld him quietly working, with friends and acquaintances chattering close to him, and, whenever he came to Vienna he brought with him a goodly number of sketches, which he had jotted down with a pencil in the carriage. But more astonishing than aught else was his self-command and patience, when, ill and racked with pain, he would go on indefatigably working, and confer every day, on a bed of sickness, with his librettists about the next scenes. His exertions by no means concluded with the completion of a score. He was continually changing and improving during the rehearsals; he never hesitated an instant cutting out a pleasing number if he found that it impeded the action, and he was quite as ready in composing a new one at the last moment. He knew the stage as well as any one living, and never rested till he had given each of his pieces the most effective dramatic form and the greatest possible finish. In this respect, he was one of the most conscientious of artists. His melodies, too, lightly as they flowed to him, he altered often and long, if their rhythm did not strike him as sufficiently catching and original. In inventing various forms of rhythm he was marvellous; in this respect (the weakest point of our present operatic composers) his German colleagues might all take a lesson from him. We saw him remodel ten or twelve times the theme, "Oh, que j'aime le militaire," in La Grande Duchesse till the rhythm pleased him. Melodically inexhaustible, he required only the very simplest accompaniment of two or three chords whereon to write an endless series of the prettiest and at the same time most characteristic songs. This is something exceptionally rare in these days of over-loaded and far-fetched accompaniments. Far weaker than his talent for melody and rhythm was his knowledge of harmony, while his contrapuntal acquirements, stood almost at zero. In its eminently comic power his music is well nigh unrivalled; he possessed this rare quality in a far higher degree than Lortzing, Nicolai, or Flotow. His delicate feeling for characteristic instrumentation, which however, never became intrusive, admirably backed up his talent for the musically comic element. And as the last, but not the least, merit of his operas, the separate musical numbers always grow naturally out of the situation and delight us nearly invariably by their well-balanced and nicely rounded form. Whatever objections may be raised against him, Offenbach was a musician of genial gifts and extraordinary knowledge of the stage. He was, moreover, a good, kindly-intentioned man, particularly susceptible of friendship, who could be as weak, but also as naïf, unsuspecting, and good-natured as a child.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

—London Musical World.

A CONCERT BY THE BLIND IN LONDON.

In the large majority of cases a few lines of record suffice for the notice of pupils' concerts; but that which was given last Saturday afternoon at the Crystal Palace, by the pupils of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, was, for more than one reason, of such exceptional interest as to deserve a more detailed criticism in these columns. . . .

In the first place, the programme, selected, we presume, by Mr. F. J. Campbell, the principal of the school, was noteworthy for the very high character of the music performed; but, besides this, the rendering was distinguished not only by remarkable mechanical accuracy, but by an amount of taste and feeling which is rare indeed with performers still in the state of pupillage. The concert opened with Bach's well-known Organ Fugue in G-minor, well played by Mr. Arthur Stericker, a few slips which were noticeable being apparently due to nervousness. Dr. Macfarren's Overture to Chevy Chase followed, being played by the Crystal Palace band under the direction of Mr. Manna. The performance of Leslie's trio, "O Memory," by Miss Dick, Miss Carson, and Mr. A. Wilmot, was, in our opinion, one of the gems of the concert. The exquisite taste and feeling with which this melodious little piece was given can scarcely be overpraised. Other remarkable performances among the solo numbers were Mr. J. West's singing of "It is enough," from Elijah, and Miss Reece's rendering of "Che farò," from Gluck's Orfeo. Both performers have good and excellently trained voices, and both sing with an amount of genuine feeling which recalled Beethoven's dictum, "That which comes from the heart goes to the heart." The two soprano singers, Miss Dick and Miss Campbell, also deserve praise, while the choir of the institution, consisting of some thirty voices, sang two part-songs by Smart and Bennett, and the Reapers' chorus from Liszt's Prometheus most admirably. In the unaccompanied part-songs the gradations of light and shade and the unity of style and phrasing of the whole choir were particularly striking. Two pianists appeared, Mr. W. F. Schwieler and Master Alfred Hollins. The former took the pianoforte obligato part in Gade's Symphony in D-minor (No. 5), a very interesting and beautiful work, which had not been heard at the Crystal Palace since 1860. The combination of the piano with the orchestra, is, of course, a familiar one when the former is employed in a concerto as a solo instrument. In Gade's symphony, however, we find an instance, so far as we know unique, of the use of the piano simply as an orchestral instrument—just as the harp is frequently used. It is only occasionally that it comes into prominence, but united with other instruments several novel effects of coloring are produced in the quieter parts of the music. In a fortissimo it would of course, be overpowered by the orchestra. Mr. Schwieler performed his part of the symphony in a most artistic manner, though it is probable that he would have been heard to even more advantage in a solo. It is not unlikely that the selection of the symphony may have been designed to prove what some people have doubted—the possibility of a blind pianist playing with the orchestra with absolute precision, though of course unable to be guided by the conductor's beat. If this were the object, it was undoubtedly fully attained. Master Hollins, a lad of only fourteen years of age, gave a truly admirable performance of a prelude and fugue by Bach, and a showy piece (Tour à Cheval) of Raff's; the playing of the latter was especially remarkable on account of the frequent skips for the hands, which would not be easy even for a pianist who could see the keys, but which were, nevertheless, taken with faultless accuracy.

We have dealt more largely than is our custom in superlatives in speaking of this concert, because it is the simple truth that we have seldom, if ever, listened to a performance given by pupils of such a high average of merit from an artistic point of view. The excellent teaching of the various professors at the Normal School has, of course, much to do with this; but there can be no doubt whatever, in the mind of any one qualified to form an opinion, that quite as much, if not more, is due to the artistic influences brought to bear on the pupils, and especially to the musical performances at the Crystal Palace, at which they are constant visitors. For this reason we join most heartily with Dr. Armitage in deprecating the proposed removal of the school to Windsor. Such a course appears to have absolutely nothing to recommend it, while it would take away from the pupils the almost unrivalled advantages for their artistic development which they at present enjoy.—Athenæum, July 17.

BOITO'S "MEFISTOFELE."

The following description of the Italian opera founded upon Goethe's "Faust," and which has formed this week the notable novelty of Messrs. Strakosch and Hess's season of opera in English at the Globe Theatre, appeared in last Monday's Advertiser.

The following description of the work has been prepared from the piano score,—never thoroughly satisfactory as a means of giving a complete idea of a composition, and now that the orchestra has been assigned the most important duties in lyric dramas, only of use to furnish suggestions of an author's method of treatment. "Prologue in Heaven"—thus stands the title, following that of Goethe. Concealed in clouds are the Celestial Phalanx, a mystic chorus, cherubim and penitents. Mefistofele stands alone. Seven trumpets, one for each tone of the scale, resound, here and there, and a simple motif of but two notes asserts itself, alternating with a broader theme, the Salve Regina assigned apparently to harps. The celestial voices sing the praises of the Most High,—a double chorus in five parts for each choir,—and heavenly echoes repeat the last syllable of each stanza—"Ave." This movement is, at first, a simple chant, without cadence; gradually it becomes more and more complicated, with constant changes in key; but, on the whole, it is dignified and impressive. At its close, the trumpets are again heard in their simple motif of two notes. Then follows an orchestral scherzo, wild and uneasy, introducing Mefistofele who greets Jehovah in mocking speech,—as in Goethe's drama,—the music of which, admirably fitted to the words, is the continuation of the subject of the scherzo. The shrill tones of the wood wind sharpen the effect of this passage. Jehovah speaks through a mystic chorus of bass voices: "Dost thou know Faust?" This idea is not unlike that of Mendelssohn in "St. Paul," where the Almighty calls, in a chorus of female voices, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" Goethe's dialogue between the powers of good and evil is reproduced in recitative, interrupted by the short motif for the trumpets and phrases of the scherzo (Jehovah's replies being uttered by the bass chorus), and at one point accompanied by a solemn Sanctus, sung by the celestial phalanx. The cherubim (boys' voices) sing at a most rapid rate "On the winds, o'er the world, through azure depths we fly," the voices of penitents greet the Queen of Heaven in grave measures; the two movements are combined with wonderful skill and great effect, and there is even added a third for the celestial phalanx, a prayer for the dead; heavenly echoes repeat "Ave," and the three choirs unite in a repetition of the opening chorus. The voices cease as the two-note motif again sounds in the full orchestra, and the prologue, for which Boito has chosen as a motto Jehovah's query, "Dost thou know Faust?" is over.

Part I, is divided into three acts. Act I, scene I, is entitled "Easter Sunday," and corresponds with scene II, of Goethe's drama. We are at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, before the city gates. All sorts of people pass and repass. There is a brief orchestral movement, ushered in by bells, of a martial character, with an odd rhythmic construction, the measures being in 3-4 and 2-4 time, alternately. The people, students, and boys, sing a bright chorus, the Easter bells sounding now and then. Faust enters, with Wagner. Faust, an old man, utters his longings for the springtime of life. A gray friar dogs Faust's footsteps. A bit of the scherzo in the prologue betrays his identity. The music of the entire scene is animated and expressive. There is a waltz for dancers and chorus, phrases of which interrupt the dialogue of Wagner and Faust, and are even heard as the scene changes to Faust's study. It is night. Faust enters, followed by the friar, who conceals himself in an alcove. Faust sings, in a meditative mood, and to a melodious theme:

"Behind me, field and meadow sleeping,
I leave in deep, prophetic night," etc.

(Taylor's Goethe; Scene III.)

Mefistofele is forced to reveal himself by Faust's soliloquy on the Scriptures, but suddenly changes his disguise to that of a cavalier. A duet follows, the compact between Mefistofele and Faust is concluded, and the curtain falls as fiend and mortal are whisked away on the magic mantle of the former. The music of this scene, which is entitled "The Compact," is very strong. The scherzo-motif is heard through the duet, in which is included a cantabile for Faust of great beauty. In the latter occurs the phrase which Boito has adopted as the motto for the act:—

"When then I hail the moment flying,
Ah! still delay—thou art so fair!"
[Taylor's Goethe; Scene IV.]

[That is to say: "You serve me now; but if I ever find the experience so satisfying that I would fain arrest the fleeting moment, then we exchange parts and I become your slave forever."]

Some of the phrases assigned to Mefistofele are notable for their scornfully sarcastic character.

The second act bears this motto:—

"Who shall dare to say the word 'Credo in Deo?'"
[Scene XVI, Goethe.]

The first scene is in Marta's garden. Faust, a blooming youth calling himself Henry. Margherita, Mefistofele and Marta are the only characters. All the music is extremely sensuous, and its passionate character increases as Faust's love-making grows more and more ardent. There is an elegant simplicity in the tranquil opening of the scene and in Margherita's aria. In fact the music assigned to each character is distinctly expressive. There is an andante for Faust as melodious as heart could desire. There is an ingeniously constructed quartet, with syncopated phrases for Margherita, against legato motives for Faust and Marta and a staccato movement for Mefistofele. Margherita flies from Faust, who pursues her, and the same game is played by Marta and Mefistofele. A knowledge of Goethe's drama is essential to an understanding of this scene, as Boito has not prepared any equivalent for Goethe's scenes describing the preceding meetings of the lovers. Scene II. is "The Walpurgis Night," scene XXI of Goethe. We are on the Brocken, in a wilderness of rocks. Mefistofele and Faust come. There is a short duet between the pair, in which there is a most uncomfortable sounding series of sequences in fifths, and the Witches' Sabbath begins. The will-o'-the-wisp lends his fitful and treacherous aid. A chorus of witches (allegro veloce) has some original ideas, though one is occasionally reminded of the Incantation scene in Der Freischütz. Here is a chord repeated through several measures: G (fundamental), D, A, E, corresponding to the open strings of the violin. The effect of this dissonance must be inexpressibly horrible, if it does not become ridiculous. Mefistofele reveals himself, and the witches do him reverence. Some of them dance to wild, fantastic strains. Mefistofele sings a sarcastic "ballad of the world." A vision of Margherita, pale and wan, appears to Faust, accompanied by the strains of the garden duet. The infernal uproar is renewed, the music grows more fast and furious and becomes positively exciting, there is a sequence of strange chords, the scene is over and the act is ended.

Act III. Margherita's death. Scene XXV of Goethe. The motto is Mefistofele's utterance "She is judged!" Margherita, the murderer of mother and babe, all for love of Faust who has deserted her, awaits in a dungeon the penalty of her crime. She utters a wild prayer for mercy, but earthly feelings still cling to her as there are again heard phrases of the garden duet. It is an aria of a decidedly florid sort which is assigned to the unfortunate victim of love, more after the style of Verdi than of Wagner. Faust vainly strives to induce Margherita to fly. Again Boito shows his skill in the combination of themes and harmonies which shall express the sense of the text and the dramatic situation—Margherita's terror, relieved by momentary gleams of hope; Faust's desperate pleadings; Mefistofele's sarcastic advice. Margherita asks for strength from the Supreme, and the Ave Signor of the Celestial Phalanx in the prologue resounds in the orchestra through her prayer. "She is judged!" thunders Mefistofele, "Oh, anguish," cries Faust; "Henry, thou mak'st me shudder," are the dying accents of Margherita; "She is saved!" chant the heavenly choir; "Come with me," calls Mefistofele to Faust, and the curtain falls.

Part II includes one act and an epilogue. The act, numbered IV, is entitled The Night of the Classic Sabbath. Part II, act II, scene III, of Goethe's Mefistofele annihilating time and space, bears Faust to ancient Greece. The river Penens, surrounded by nymphs and tributary streams, greets us; the moon sheds her silvery rays on Elena (Helen) and Pantis, who are in a boat of mother-of-pearl and silver, with sirens about them. Extremely sensuous is all of the music of this scene. There is a duet for Elena and Pantis, with very simple but captivating themes. Faust's passionate cries to the Grecian queen are heard. Mefistofele enters and acts as interpreter. The sirens endeavor to scatter Elena's sad reflections as she recalls the horrors of the Trojan war, by a stately dance. There is a song for Faust as he pays court to the fair cause of all the woes of Troy, leading into a concerted movement, in which the chorus takes part, which is worked up with great skill and effect. Elena utters the motto of the act (to Faust), "Canst thou to me that lovely speech impart?" To which Faust replies: "'Tis easy; it must issue from the heart." There are two passionate concerted movements for Faust, Elena and chorus, the second of which has a most inspiring theme, and this ends the scene.

There still remains an epilogue with the motto, "Ah! still delay—thou art so fair." Faust has seen and enjoyed all that Mefistofele has promised him, "in both the little world and the great," and we now meet him again, an old man, in his study, oppressed by recollections of hours forever fled. A theme of the scenes of the preceding act is repeated in the orchestra. Faust's meditations are on eternity. Mefistofele endeavors to divert Faust's thoughts, and even spreads his mantle by whose magic aid they can defy time and space. The air accompanying this action is the same as in the close of Act I, the scene of the compact. Different visions greet Faust's eyes. Heavenly beings appear in confused groups. Mefistofele accepts the challenge to a contest between Heaven and the Powers of Darkness. We hear the celestial trumpets—the motif of two notes—and a part of the Ave Signor, and the celestial vision fades away. The sirens appear as Mefistofele sings the theme of the love duet in Act IV, but the heavenly choir resume their song. Faust cries in an ecstasy, "Ah! still delay—thou art so fair," the sirens vanish, and Faust falls on his knees and dies, while on him drops from heaven a shower of roses. Mefistofele, discomfited and enraged at the loss of his victim, and writhing under the light and flames, sinks from view. The choir of angels and cherubim continue their hymns of praise, the trumpet-motif of the prologue is sounded—the end is reached.

CONCERTS.

PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA. The first of the five concerts by Mr. Listemann's thoroughly drilled and excellent orchestra of forty instruments took place at the Music Hall on Friday evening, Nov. 5. It was an auspicious opening, the audience being large and evidently well pleased. This was the programme:

"Romeo and Julia"—Fantaisie for orchestra. J. S. Svendsen
Concerto for pianoforte in A-minor, Op. 16. E. Grieg
"Im Walde" (In the Forest)—Symphony in F, Op. 153. J. Raff
Musette from Concerto No. 6. Handel
Adapted for oboes, bassoons and string orchestra by F. A. Gevaert.
Two Slavonic dances. Anton Dvorak
No. 3, poco allegro; No. 4, tempo di minuetto.
Fantaisie on Hungarian airs for pianoforte and orchestra. E. Liszt
Overture to "Der Freischütz". C. M. v. Weber

The modern element was altogether paramount in this selection. There was plenty of brilliant, elaborate, richly-colored instrumentation, a general restlessness of mood, and much of the wild, dreamy northern character. The Romeo and Juliet Fantaisie by Svendsen, given for the first time here, seemed somewhat vague and wandering in form, and what passion there was in it Northern rather than Italian, while it contained much that was beautiful and tender. The romantic Concerto by Grieg, full of interesting ideas throughout, with rich, deep, lovely adagio, and bold, impetuous and brilliant in the two allegro moderato movements—the finale being strongly accented—was played by Mr. Franz Rummel in a most masterly manner. His touch is clear and bright, his execution never at fault, and the whole interpretation was most satisfactory in strength, in breadth, in delicate finesse, conveying the ideal poetry and color of the work. Mr. Rummel plays even better than he did in a Symphony Concert here two years ago.

Raff's Forest Symphony is perhaps his richest and most imaginative work in that form. The daylight impressions and feelings of the first part (allegro) are vividly and happily suggested. The second part, "In the Twilight," presents a happy contrast between its two scenes, the one called "Reverie," the other a bright fantastic "Dance of the Dryads." The third part represents a night in the woods; it is of course in a low tone of color, and the low murmur of the streams, the creeping of the breezes through the leaves, and all the vague interweaving of the various sounds in the woods by night, is very poetically and musically rendered. Then come the echoing horns, and the wild hunt, approaching and receding, with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. This is weird and exciting, but worked out to a tedious length. The break of day forms an appropriate conclusion. The very elaborate and difficult symphony was faultlessly interpreted.

Gevaert's adaptation of the brief Musette from the Handel Concerto, was soothing and refreshing after so much of the wild, uneasy and exacting kind. The Slavonic Dances by Dvorak were original and quaint enough in rhythm and in fancy; and Mr. Rummel's performance of that everlasting Hungarian Fantaisie by Liszt was so full of fire and brilliancy, and in every way so superlatively clever, that it lent a new freshness to the hackneyed thing. Then came one of those idiotic, irrepressible calls for an encore; the artist bowed his thanks, and was evidently reluctant to play any more, being (as we have since learned) in fear of losing the train for New York. Yet the childish public insisted, and he had to return to the piano. What he played we did not stay to hear; for the concert had been very long, and what we would fain have heard by way of comfort after so much heavy "newness," the good old Freyschütz overture, we were obliged to lose. Is there no remedy for this great concert nuisance, no protection against the Encore Fiend? Really it seems to us that the responsibility should rest with the conductor, where there is one. He may be presumed to have reached the age of discretion, and to know when such a demand is unreasonable; and knowing it to be so, he should take the matter into his own hands, rap his orchestra to order, and go doggedly on with the next piece in the programme, let the crowd thunder as it will. At the Birmingham Festival no encore is granted without an approving signal from some Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot, or whatever noble lord may chance to be the honorary president of the occasion. Here, having no such person nor such custom, the musical conductor would seem to be the one to exercise the encore censorship. Or how would it do (we think we have made the suggestion before) to have a sort of secret league among the really musical concert-goers, whereby upon a certain signal agreed upon, they should all rise and leave the hall whenever such an imposition is insisted on! That might shame the offenders into silence, when nothing else would. That might nonplus the Fiend.

Mr. Wm. H. SHERWOOD gave a very interesting concert at the new Meionaon (under Tremont Temple), on Saturday evening, Nov. 6. The special object of the concert was to introduce the young Canadian-French violinist, Mons. Alfred Desève, who, after studying with Viouxtemps in Paris, held for a time the place of violinist to the Princess Louise. He is a very young man, of prepossessing and refined appearance, having the artistic temperament, full of enthusiasm, and evincing more than ordinary talent and high culture. The concert opened with the "Kreutzer" sonata of Beethoven played by him and Mr. Sherwood. Pure intonation, free, broad, finished execution, great abandon and intensity of feeling, were the characteristics of his playing. His tone, however, cannot be called large. His interpretation is free from any nonsense, or extravagance of ornament; but somehow the treatment of the whole Sonata by the two artists seemed overwrought in point of feeling, as well as in display of virtuosity. There could be no doubt, however, of their thorough mastery of the composition and of their instruments.

Mr. Charles R. Adams sang two songs by Schumann: "Du bist wie eine Blume" and "Ich grolle nicht" (in English, to which we could hardly reconcile ourselves) in the most artistic style, and with the truest taste and feeling. Mr. Sherwood then played a Valse Caprice and Barcarolle by Rubinstein, and the A-flat Polonaise of Chopin as very few can play them. At this point another engagement called us off. The remaining pieces were the Andante and Presto of Mendelssohn's violin concerto (which we have heard M. Desève play exquisitely in private), a couple of songs by Raff ("Abendbild" and "Immer bei Dir"), and Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Mazeppa," arranged for two pianos, played by Mr. and Mrs. Sherwood.

The new Meisonaon is an attractive hall, a good deal larger than the old one, and seemed to be very good for chamber-music.

OLD BAY STATE COURSE. Here is certainly a remarkable programme for a popular audience, — a "lecture" audience — cramming the Music Hall in every nook and corner, and listened to attentively all through, with frequent outbursts of enthusiasm, as was the case on Thursday evening, Nov. 11.

Quartet in E-flat, Op. 44, (Allegro-Vivace). . . Mendelssohn
Mendelssohn Club.
Mazeppa, Symphonic Poem for two pianos, (After Victor Hugo). Liszt
Mr. and Mrs. Sherwood.
Aria, "Und ob die Wolke," (Der Freischütz). . . Weber
(With 'Cello Obligato by Mr. Giese).
Miss Bailey.
Fantaisie for violin on Gipsy Airs. Sarasate
Mr. Schnitzler.
(First appearance in Boston).
Aria, "Revenge, Timotheus Cries," (Alexander's Feast). Handel
Mr. Henschel.
Quartet, entitled "The Miller's Pretty Daughter." Raff
a. The Declaration. b. The Mill.
Mendelssohn Club.
Duet, "Caro bella," (Julius Cæsar). Handel
Miss Bailey and Mr. Henschel.
Piano Solo, Grand Polonaise in E. Liszt
Mr. Sherwood.
Songs, a. The Arrow, b. Sing Heigho. . . . G. Henschel
Miss Bailey.
Solo for violoncello on "Le désir." Servais
Mr. Giese.
Ballad, The Two Grenadiers. Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Finale from the Quartet in A-minor, Op. 41. B. Schumann

A quartet of strings, in our vast and crowded Music Hall, could hardly be audible to all ears, nor satisfactorily so to any. Yet the two quartet selections appeared to be listened to with close attention and respect by all. The old Quintet Club is for the most part now the new one. Thomas Ryan alone remains of the old members. Mr. Frederick Giese, the very young but excellent violoncellist, has been in the club, and in this country, but a year. The new violinists, Isidore Schnitzler and Ernst Thiele, besides Mr. William Schade, who plays flute and viola, help to make up a quartet and a quintet never yet surpassed among us, and Boston classical music-lovers can but feel the club's infrequent and short stays at home here to be somewhat tantalizing.

The great point was the first public appearance here of the famous German-English baritone singer and composer, George Henschel, who is affianced to Miss Lillian Bailey. His rendering of the Handel aria proved him to be all that has been said of him. With a fine, manly, genial, intellectual presence (for he is a thoughtful looking-man), he throws himself into the spirit of the author and the work; and his thoroughly trained, rich, musical voice (which, however, vibrates not so freely in the lower tones as one could wish), his perfect phrasing, breadth and dignity of style, consummate ease and evenness of execution (as shown particularly in the way he dealt with the long passages of rapid Handelian roulades), his command of light and shade, and the pervading truth of sentiment and faultlessness of taste, were proof enough of the complete artist, one of the finest mould. We only regretted that in that particular piece Mr. Henschel (since there was no orchestra) did not play his own pianoforte accompaniment; for in private we have heard him do it both in this aria, and in "Why do the heathen rage," playing with a breadth and power and an intensity of accent as if it were an orchestra, and at the same time singing with full freedom and effect. In fact, Mr. Henschel is a complete musician as well as a singer; in whatever he does there is the air—not in the least assumed—of one who knows perfectly well what he is about; you feel that the moment he sits down at the piano, whether to accompany another or himself. Being warmly recalled, Herr Henschel sang, to his own accompaniment, an old Italian air. His second solo was "The two grenadiers" of Schumann, to which he of course, did justice. He also sang with Miss Bailey a fine duet, "Caro bella," from one of Handel's Italian operas, Giulio Cesare.

Miss Bailey sang the serious aria from Der Freyschütz very tenderly and sweetly; voice and style were admirable. The Henschel songs, too, charmingly original, became her well. The piano performances of Mr. and Mrs. Sherwood were most brilliant and effective, winning great applause. Mr. Schnitzler by his solo-playing proved himself to be one of the best violinists who has come among us, and Mr. Giese more than confirmed the fine impression which he made last winter. The concert was long, it evidently pleased, yet somehow the Encore Fiend was practically kept out! Tell us how, Oh clever managers!

BOSTON CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC. An interesting matinée, under the direction of Julius Eichberg, took place at Wesleyan Hall, on Friday, Nov. 12. The principal feature of the programme was the opening number, the glorious old B-flat Trio (Op. 97) of Beethoven, of which a high satisfactory performance was given by Messrs. Hermann P. Chelius, piano, Albert Van Raalte, violin, and Wulf Fries, 'cello. To the two younger members the effort was extremely creditable; of the 'cellist, of course, that goes without saying. We were unable to hear the rest of the concert, consisting of:

Song, "The Lost Chord." Sullivan.
Mr. Carl Pflüger.
a. Fugue in E-minor. Bach.
b. Nocturne in F sharp major. Chopin.
c. Military Polonaise. Chopin.
d. Träumerei. Schumann.
e. Valse in A-flat. Chopin.
Mr. Chelius.
Song, "Yeoman's Wedding." Poniatowsky.
Rhapsodie, No. 6. Liszt.

Of Berlioz's Damnation of Faust, of which Mr. Lang gave a second performance on Friday evening, Nov. 12, we can only say, at present, that it was a great improvement on the first presentation here last spring, both as regards choruses, male and female, orchestra, and solo singers, and that the interest and fascination of the strange, weird, in parts extremely beautiful music grow upon one as he becomes more familiar with it. Miss Lillian Bailey sang the part of Margaret with unaffected sweetness and simplicity, and with great tenderness, her voice being lovely in itself, and her style and execution fine. Herr Henschel's Mephistopheles was a potent contribution to the life and power and point of the whole performance. His rendering had great dramatic force, besides being in every way thoroughly artistic; a fine vein of true Mephistophelian irony pervaded the whole. Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Hay, sang in a praiseworthy manner also. The chorus of 200 male and 100 female voices had the charm of careful, critical selection, beautiful ensemble of tone quality, as well as of precise, well-shaded, and finely effective execution.

More we cannot say now, but may be more prepared to enter into details, and receive an abiding impression of the work after the third performance, which Mr. Lang has been prevailed upon to give on the 30th of this month.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, Nov. 15. Our musical season may well be regarded as "inaugurated," for the Symphony Society gave its first concert on Saturday evening, Nov. 6, with an interesting programme, as will be seen:

Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven
Scene from "Alexander's Feast," Handel
Herr Henschel.
1st Symphony, C-minor, Brahms
Aria from "Euryanthe," Weber
Herr Henschel.
Symphonic poem "Mazeppa," Liszt

It would seem as if no finer orchestral work could be done than that achieved by the musicians under Dr. Damrosch's competent leadership. Critics have at times seemed disposed to cavil at a certain so-called unsoundness which in former years perhaps marred the effectiveness of Dr. D.'s conducting; but in these days his equipoise and self-control are simply wonderful, and the intense vitality of his nature rarely displays itself in any more decisive way than by an occasional quick motion of the wrist. Such a conductor inevitably inspires an orchestra, for the musicians know that their director is thoroughly in sympathy with his work.

Of the Brahms symphony there seems to be little to say, except that no interpretation will ever make it an agreeable work. No one can or will raise the least question as to the seriousness of its intent or the masterly skill displayed in its construction and orchestration; but it lacks something, while it is not perfectly easy to say what that something is. It is too ornate, and too diffuse, and wholly fails to reach even the faintest touch of that divine simplicity which emanates from genius as does the perfume from the flowers.

Herr Henschel came, saw, and conquered us all: his style is so superb, his phrasing so broad and free, and his musical intelligence so unmistakable, that he fairly carried everything before him, and rode to the very apex of public favor upon a tidal wave of enthusiasm that almost seemed hysterical in its intensity. For myself, I do not especially admire the quality of his voice; but tastes will differ, and it suffices to say that he is a great artist, and a musician of the broadest culture.

The house was very full, and the present season of the Society's work has commenced most auspiciously. The second concert will occur Dec. 4.

The New York Philharmonic Club "inaugurated" — on Tuesday evening, Nov. 9, — the third season of their charming concerts of chamber-music. I give the programme:

String Quartet, D-minor, Schubert
Three pieces either arranged or adapted for the Club.
Piano Quartet, E-flat, Reinecke

Who has not heard and thoroughly enjoyed that delicious Schubert Quartet with the lovely andante in G-minor (theme and variations)? At this late day I have no intention of striving to strain the English language in the attempt to express my admiration of this andante. It was given with great delicacy and sentiment, as one might well expect from the competent artists who form the club.

The "three pieces" serve to illustrate a new departure on the part of the club. It is the intention of these gentlemen to introduce at each time some compositions which have either been adapted or written for the club. On Tuesday evening one of the pieces thus "arranged" was Schumann's "Warum." The attempt was not successful, and it is to be hoped the "arrangers" will in future draw a line somewhere. The other selections were more happy, and their fine performance excited and received a hearty encore, to which the club responded with the march from the "Ruins of Athens"; this was very attractive to the audience, and so another recall was insisted upon, and to this the response was Schumann's "Evening Song," which was very well played, and certainly quite effective in this new shape.

Mr. S. B. Mills took the piano in the Reinecke Quartet, and to his credit be it said that he played well, for he seems to have learned that in a quartet all of the instruments ought to have a chance to be heard; in consequence of his new departure, the breezy, crisp quartet went with a dash and brilliancy that was very exhilarating.

On Saturday evening, Nov. 13, the first concert of the Philharmonic Society took place, with a programme which included the "Eroica" and Henschel's piano concerto played by Joseffy.

The orchestral work was in the main well done, and the Beethoven Symphony was exceedingly well played. Mr. Thomas's ideas of tempo are not invariably according to rule or precedent, which may be regarded at times as a misfortune, and at other times as a blessing. He gave the "Funeral March" in excellent time; it was dignified, but not "draggy"; the whole movement is too long, every way, and ought to be clipped if any one could be audacious enough to do it.

Joseffy, having recovered from his recent indisposition, played the Henschel concerto in a noble way; he has certainly improved in breadth and scope since last season; he has worked hard during the entire summer, and with splendid results. He received an enthusiastic recall, and could have had a second if he had so chosen.

LOCAL ITEMS.

Mr. Wm. F. Apthorp's course of six lectures on the History of Music, from the days of St. Ambrose down to Wagner, will commence at the Lowell Institute next Monday evening. The topics of the several lectures are given in the advertisement in the daily papers. We fear we only tantalize too many of our readers, for we learn that about all the tickets were at once taken up. But the lectures might be repeated elsewhere.

Mr. Lang announces a third and last performance of The Damnation of Faust, on the same grand scale as last Friday, for Tuesday evening, Nov. 30. There will be the same fine orchestra of over 60 instruments, and the same admirable chorus of 200 male and 100 female voices. The solos will be sung by the same artists as before with the exception of the part of Faust (tenor), for which Mr. Julius Jordan has been engaged in the place of Mr. Winch. Miss Lilian Bailey will be Gretchen, Herr Henschel, Mephistopheles, and Mr. C. E. Hay, Brander.

Some of the most musical ladies of Boston, Cambridge, Brookline, etc., have been for some time organizing, in a quiet way, a complimentary concert to that most estimable, modest gentleman and artist, who has been so many years identified with all good musical things in our city and elsewhere, Mr. WULF FRIES. It is to be at Horticultural Hall, on Saturday evening, Dec. 4, and many of the best artists will assist. The tickets have been mostly disposed of in private without reservation of seats. Indeed the whole movement was kept a secret to Mr. Fries himself, until within a few days. We shall be happy to be the medium through which a few more tickets may be obtained, provided they be bespoken early.

Miss Josephine C. Bates, a charming pianist, of New York, announces a concert for next Saturday evening, at Mechanics' Hall. Messrs. Geo. L. Osgood and Gustav Dannreuther will assist. We hope that the right sort of people, and plenty of them, will be there to hear.

Prof. J. K. Paine, at Harvard, is said to be getting on very successfully in the composition of music for the chorus in the proposed performance of the Edipus Tyrannus of Sophocles. The members of the chorus, who have already rehearsed the numbers so far finished, speak of them with admiration, as being music altogether fit and noble.

This, from the papers of Thursday, speaks for itself. We only wish it understood that it is none of our doings, and sprang from no direct or indirect suggestion, or least hint on our part. We copy it mainly in order that our friends and readers in other places may know what has been brewing in the birth-place of this Journal of Music.

THE DWIGHT TESTIMONIAL. The following correspondence has just been exchanged.

BOSTON, Nov. 15, 1880.

"Mr. John S. Dwight:—

Dear Sir,—A number of your friends who remember your long and faithful services in behalf of the cause of music, and who are deeply grateful that it has been permitted to you to accomplish so much in elevating the standard of public performances and in refining the public taste, have determined to offer you a testimonial concert, to be given on a fitting scale, early in the coming month, at the Boston Music Hall. They respectfully ask your acceptance of the compliment, with their united good-will and affection, and with best wishes for your continued health and usefulness.

BOSTON, Nov. 16, 1880.

"To the Hon. J. P. Putnam, Chairman, etc.:

"Gentlemen,—Your kind and courteous offer touches me deeply, and demands fitter answer than I know how to make. Such a recognition—entirely spontaneous, unexpected, and undreamed of, on my own part—of my poor persistent labors to convince others of the beauty and the holiness of the art which I have always loved, and always shall love, comes upon me as an exquisite surprise. After many periods of misgiving, many fears that the old tree had proved fruitless after all, this comes to revive hope and motive, and give me as it were, the sense of a new life—at all events to encourage me to attempt yet further and (let us hope) better work. I am sure I understand you, gentlemen. What you would honor in me is simply the high purpose, the honesty and the consistent perseverance of my course; to this, and to nothing more, can I lay claim. When my work began, music was esteemed at its true worth by very few among us; I simply preached the faith that was in me. Now we are almost a musical people; those who come forward now learn music as it should be learned, learn to speak of it with knowledge (the knowledge that comes of practice), and will readily outstrip me. What more could I desire? To a committee so largely representative of the best elements of the musical profession, of the best and wisest friends of music, as well as of the honored names of dear old Boston, and for the proffered concert, which, in such hands, is sure to be a noble one, I can never be too grateful. But let me come to the point at once and simply say, that I most thankfully accept the compliment you offer. I am respectfully and cordially yours.

JOHN S. DWIGHT.

The date of the concert has been fixed for Thursday afternoon, Dec. 9, at the Boston Music Hall. Many of our best solo singers and pianists, besides Mr. Zerrahn, and the orchestra, have kindly offered their services.

STONEHAM, MASS. Miss Lizzie Strange, assisted by Miss Fannie Kellogg and Messrs. John Orth and Wulf Fries, gave a concert in the Town Hall here Nov. 15, with the following programme:

Piano Duo, a. Marche Heroique, Schubert
b. Marche Militaire Rubinstein
Piano and Violoncello, — Trois Morceaux, Op. 11,
Song, Air Varié Mr. Fries and Mr. Orth.
Piano Solo, Les Adieux, Fantaisie Weber
Piano and Violoncello, Airs Baskys Platti
Song, a. Lehn deine Wang Jensen
b. Slumber Song Wagner
Piano Solos, a. Arie transcribed by Joseffy Pergolesi
b. Norwegian Cradle Song Kjerulf
Violoncello, a. Nocturne, Op. 63 Lachner
b. Gavotte, Op. 23 Popper
Piano Solo, Allegro Di Bravura Weber
What are they to do? Randegger
Piano Solo, — Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 15 Liszt
Mr. Orth.

NEW YORK. The "second thought" about Dudley Buck's comic opera reads as follows in the Sun: "It is a little curious that while the opera has several very ludicrous situations, it is not on the whole a very funny and scarcely an amusing work. It awakens interest, but not laughter. Mr. Croffut seems to have had an excellent perception of humorous situation, but has not been able to carry this humor into his dialogue, which is often commonplace, sometimes coarse (not meaning indelicate, but rough), seldom clever, and never witty or humorous. Nor has Mr. Buck created any humorous music such as Sullivan so often produced to match Gilbert's words. That probably is not the bent of his talent. He is a man unquestionably of thorough knowledge of counterpoint, an excellent harmonist, and of serious and at times of poetic fancy; but lightness and brightness and sparkle are not the directions in which he excels, so far as this work is an indication. Then, too, Mr. Buck's music lacks character and variety. It is built too much on trite and hackneyed forms, and he has missed his opportunities for picturesque local coloring. Having a chorus of soldiers, he has failed to produce any military music. Having Indians, he has no suggestion of the barbaric, except in the opening chorus, and much might have been done that was novel in this direction. Having Mormons, he gives no inkling in his music of their canting ways. For these reasons the music is often monotonous, in spite of the variety given to it by orchestral color. But the opera has many points of merit which called for the most decided expression of gratification from the audiences at various parts of the performance. These merits, being solid, and not meretricious ones, will be the more appreciated as the work is more frequently heard, and there is every reason to believe that it will find great favor in the extended tour throughout the country to which it is destined."

The new tenor who shares with Campanini the leading rôles in Mapleson's Italian opera, made a very good success in "Lucia." Says the Times, "Judged by our standards, he cannot be called a great singer. He has much in his favor, however. His voice is expressive and musical. He knows how to use it judiciously, and he has the requisite power to make it effective. Moreover, he has been well schooled, and has the smooth Italian style which the operatic stage demands. In the 'Che me frena,' neither he nor Mme. Gerster was as effective as was to be expected, but in the finale of the opera, Signor Ravelli deserved even more applause than was bestowed upon him, though he was more than once recalled. He delivered the two arias of this well-known scene with the taste of a musician. He was listened to by the crowded audience attentively and critically, and his future appearances will be watched with interest."

CINCINNATI. The Musical Festival Association, Theodore Thomas, director, has issued the following circular: "The fifth festival of the Cincinnati Musical Festival Association will be held in Cincinnati, in May, 1882, and in pursuance of the policy adopted by it in connection with its last festival, the association offers a prize of $1,000 for the most meritorious composition for chorus and orchestra, to be performed on that occasion. Competition shall be open to all citizens of the United States, irrespective of place of birth. The following distinguished authorities have kindly consented to act as judges, in conjunction with Theodore Thomas, namely—Herr Kapellmeister, Carl Reinecke, Leipzig, and Monsieur Camille Saint-Saëns, Paris. Works offered for competition must not occupy more than one hour in performance. A full score and piano score, accompanied by a sealed letter, must be placed in the hands of the committee on or before Sept. 1, 1881, and should be addressed to 'Committee on Prize Composition, Musical Festival Association, Cincinnati, Ohio.' The scores submitted of the successful composition shall belong to the association."

WELLS COLLEGE, AURORA, N. Y. Here is a couple of programmes of concerts given at this institution, of which Mr. Max Piutti is the musical director, on the 25th and 26th of October. The performers on both occasions were: Miss Elizabeth Cronyn, soprano, (who sang so pleasantly here in Boston in the Symphony Concerts), Mr. Gustav Dannreuther, violin, and Miss Nellie M. Taylor, Mr. Wm. Piutti, and Mr. Max Piutti, pianists. The first concert was in the name of a college society, "The Castalia." These were the selections:

1. Prelude, } From Suite for Violin and Piano. Franz Riea.
Gavotte } Messrs. Dannreuther and Max Piutti.
2. Aria, "Ah, non son io che parlo," (from Edo). Handel
3. a. Romance, Op. 28, No. 2 Schumann
b. Nocturne, Op. 31, No. 1 Chopin
4. Introduction and Variations on a Russian Theme. David
5. Songs: a. Sterne mit den goldenen Fuesschen,
b. Ach wenn ich doch ein Mäuschen wär,
c. Um Mitternacht Franz
6. Ballade, Op. 20 Reinecke
7. Greeting to the Woods Reinecke
(With violin obligato.)
8. Sonata for Piano and Violin, Op. 8 Greig.

The second programme (for the thirty-seventh concert of Wells College) has at the top the motto placed by Mendelssohn over the stage of the Gewandhaus: Res severa est verum gaudium, and is as follows:

1. Sonata for Piano and Violin, C-Minor, Op. 30, No. 2 Beethoven
2. Romance, The Rose Spohr
3. a. Moment Musical, Op. 7, No. 3 Moszkowski
b. Berceuse, Op. 57 Chopin
4. Sonata in A-major Handel
5. a. Stille Liebe (Secret Love) Schumann
b. Der Traum (The Dream) Rubinstein
c. O Süsser Mutter (O, Dearest Mother) Reinecke
6. a. Largo Handel
b. Rondo Hongrois Scharwenka
Mr. Dannreuther and Miss Taylor.

LONDON.

Black in the midnight lies the city vast.
Its dim horizon from my window high
I see, shut in beneath a misty sky
Red with the light a million lamp-fires cast
Up from the humming streets. And now at last
With lessening roar the weary wheels go by;
At last sleep drowns the din and revelry.
Now wakes the solemn visionary Past,
Peopled with spirits of the mighty dead,
Whose names are London's glory and her shame,
Seers, poets, heroes, martyrs—deathless lives
Long blazoned in the chronicles of fame.
The inglorious Present veils its dwarfish head;
England's ideal life alone survives!

SCHUMANN ON STRINGED QUARTETS
(1838).¹

SIXTH QUARTET MORNING.

LEON DE ST. LUBIN. First Grand Quintet for two Violins, two Violas, and Violoncello, E-flat major.—Opus 38.
L. CHERUBINI. Quartet for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello, No. 2 in C-major.

Judging from his music, I imagine the first-named composer to be an emigrant, one who has left his own country either voluntarily or of necessity, has chosen a new fatherland, and adopted its speech and customs. His quintet is a mixture of French and German blood, not without resemblance to Meyerbeer's music; Meyerbeer, we know, borrows from every European nation for his works of art, and it is impossible to say what he may yet bring back with him when he undertakes a journey (similar to Spontini's composition-tour through England), among the Bushmen, for his own inspiration to new creations, and to inspire others with these. However, I praise my mother tongue, when spoken with purity, for its resonance, power, and capability of expression; but I cannot blame an emigrant like St. Lubin, because he is not yet perfectly master of it; I, on the contrary, respect his endeavors. This quintet does not leave a completely elevating impression behind it; we are drawn hither and thither, without gaining a firm foothold. The most striking point is its lack of original invention; whatever in it is most deeply touching seems to me borrowed, or else suggests a model; and where the composer gives us his own ideas, he does so in a vague and general way. Thus the beginning is, at bottom, that of Mozart's G-minor symphony; the first theme of the last movement is a Rossinian idea from "Tell"; the second has a Beethoven thought from the A-major symphony at its foundation. I cannot point to the source of the schерzo; but it is not remarkable. In the adagio, I first had a clear idea how far the composer can go; here, where the lord of provision and treasure first generally reveals his inward life, things looked sadly dull. On the other hand, the quintet betrays an easy and rapid pen, much feeling of form and acquaintance with harmony. Still, after listening to it, I longed to cry out, "Music, music, give me music!"

We turned to the next piece in a very chilly mood; but we were scarcely encircled by Cherubini's handiwork ere we forgot the preceding. This second quartet seems to me to have been written long before the first one in the same collection, and perhaps even before the symphony, which, if I am not mistaken, pleased so little on its first performance in Vienna, that Cherubini refused to publish it, and afterwards transformed it into a quartet. And thus a double failure has arisen; for if the music, as a symphony, sounded too much like a quartet, the quartet is too symphonic. I am opposed to all such remoulding; it seems to me an offence against the divine first inspiration. I recognize in its simplicity (which quality distinguishes Cherubini's older compositions from his later ones), its earlier origin. To be sure, if the master himself should enter and say, "You err, friend; these quartets were written at the same period, and originally nothing but quartets," I should be defeated. Therefore my remarks must only be accepted as suppositions and suggestions to further thought in others. On the whole, this work is raised sufficiently above the level of contemporary publications, above all that Paris has lately sent us; and it would be impossible for anything of the kind to be produced by any writer who had not earnestly studied, thought, and written for a long series of consecutive years. Some dry passages worked out by the understanding alone are to be found here, as in most of Cherubini's works, but also much that is interesting,—contrapuntal refinement, an imitation; something that gives matter for thought. The scherzo and the last movement contain the greatest amount of swing and masterly life. The adagio has a highly original A-minor character, something Provençal and romance-like; its charms reveal themselves more and more on frequent hearing. The close is of that kind in which one prepares to listen again, while yet knowing that the end is near. In the first movement, we meet with reminiscences of Beethoven's B-flat major symphony, an imitation between violin and viola, like the one in that symphony between fagotto and clarinet; and at the principal retrogression in the middle, we have the same figure as that at the same place in the same Beethoven symphony. But these movements differ so greatly in character that the resemblances will strike few persons.

Towards the close of this morning of music, we set to work at a manuscript quartet that had been sent to us. The at first serious faces gradually acquired an ironical expression, until all began to titter uncontrollably, while all the players' bows appeared to dance up and down. A Goliath among the Philistines stared at us from this quartet. We have really no advice to offer its composer, who certainly has scored his work according to his powers; but we heartily thank him for the good-humor of which he was the cause in our assembly.

PRIZE QUARTET.—BY JULIUS SCHAPLER.

Here is truly German ill-luck! royal misfortune! One invents a prize quartet, one writes it down, one prints the score,—and, lo! even on the title-page there is an error of the press in the very name of the composer! This stands Schabler in the place of Schapler. However, it does not injure the work itself. We must first praise the judge who found out that this was more than a merely good, and, according to form and grammatical law, a correct composition, and then the judged, who has given us more than a merely good work. The mere choice of a quartet form by those who offered the prize was a good one. First, because the form being in itself noble, leads us to attribute considerable cultivation beforehand to the combatants, and secondly, because that form seemed to have come to a full stop. Who does not know Haydn's, Mozart's, Beethoven's quartets, and who dare throw a stone at them? Though it is an indisputable proof of the indestructible vitality of those creations, that, after the lapse of half a century, they still delight all hearts, it is no good sign for the recent artistic generation, that in so long a period of time nothing to be compared to these has been since created. Onslow alone found an echo, and after him Mendelssohn, whose aristocratic-poetic nature was especially fitted to this musical form; while in Beethoven's later quartets, beyond and outside all these, treasures may be found which the world scarcely yet knows, and amid which we may mine for years to come.

We Germans are, therefore, not poor in quartets; but very few among us have known how to augment the existing capital. We must, therefore, praise the Mannheim Musical Society for bestirring themselves on the subject, and rejoice, since the idea has brought forth fruit. Judgments regarding Schapler's quartet vary much; but they agree in considering it as something out of the common, something that is not to be understood at the first glance.

Those who are acquainted with Beethoven's later works will express themselves differently. This romantic humor has produced its effect on the young artist, and as he is himself a remarkable player and connoisseur of the instruments for which he wrote, he was safe on one side, at least, from utter failure or extravagance. No one can deny that the quartet displays, above all things, aspiration towards fine form. This is seen, pure and firm, in the first movement, and, in the second, in the humoristic and in no way distorted relations. But the outlines of the adagio are paler. The last movement, however, corresponds, up to the somewhat hasty retrogression, to the first one, in sharp cut and regularity. Thus the form of this quartet is less uncommon than its intellectual meaning. Here, we feel at once, we are addressed by a very different man from the ordinary run of men. The judgment of a Philistine confuses all things; he calls everything that he does not understand romantic, and only sees encouraging symptoms of a returning pig-tail epoch in what is clear to his understanding. Therefore we rejoice in the prize quartet judgment, that it was able to recognize a new and a novelty-promising artist, and that, in spite of the somewhat tempestuous character of the composition, it was not measured by school-master rule.

Unfortunately I have not heard it performed. But it spoke sympathetically to me, and I found no dark passage in it. I could not give the preference to any one number; each seemed inwardly related to the other. Its character may be described in a few words: A somewhat pensively elegiac mood rises through tranquil gravity, and then humorousness, to a bold, energetic desire for action. Music already possesses a composition containing a similar progression of feeling, and that in no less a work than Beethoven's A-minor quartet. A mind of no ordinary cast expresses this again here in its own way, and it is well worth while to become familiar with this manner. We hail the work as a thoughtful, original one, and we direct the attention of German quartet societies to it. But its composer must not stand still; he must give us still further proof of that mood of active power in which we now find him. "To win the prize in the contest, one must not stand still and reflect," he has given out as his own motto; and there are yet other and loftier contests. Good fortune has already been friendly to him for once; let him understand and make use of his success.

FLORESTAN.

STRING QUARTETS.

H. HIRSCHBACH. "Pictures from Life," in a cycle of Quartets for Two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello. First Quartet.—Opus 1.
J. J. H. VERHULST. Two Quartets for Viola, &c.—Opus 6.

Two of the above quartets were spoken of as manuscripts, by us, some time ago. We hailed them both, each in a different manner, as the first great result of talented aspiration, and signalized the former as original and poetic, while the lively and picturesque characteristics of the young Hollander awakened no less sympathy within us.

Since that time both of these young artists have industriously continued their labors; one is well known, his name has speedily attained publicity, as he is director of a concert society. The position of the other is somewhat more difficult; what cares the world for the poet's study, unless it is to be found in the exposed façade of a palace? And, therefore, only this one of his compositions has heretofore appeared, his first, a cycle of quartets which he entitles "Pictures from Life," and prefaces with mottoes from Goethe's "Faust."

It is probable that many of our readers will feel anxious to examine the first work of the young man who has often spoken to them in our paper, and who must be at least partly known to them through many boldly announced opinions. The highest things will be expected from him; he will be measured according to the standard by which he judged others. And those who start with this determination will find much to object to in him. But if we are able to judge separately the critical and the creative artist within him, we shall not be able to deny him the sympathy that every character that endeavors to hew out its own path merits to the utmost. He cares not to flatter or fascinate; his very mottoes frankly speak out his meaning: "No dog would care to live longer so," and, "I greet thee, thou single phial, whom I take down reverentially, honoring human art and intellect in thee." Yet let no one draw back from his music as from something inimical to humanity or existence, and let no one dive too deeply into it, in the endeavor to discover whether or not it reflects Faust's discourse, word for word. If we are not mistaken, the mottoes were added when the composition was finished. The composer probably found in them something generally allied to his already expressed mood of mind; and indeed, they only really suit the character of the first movement; the others, though sufficiently serious, exhibit less wildly melancholy physiognomies, and hold fast to the recognized characteristics of such movements.

The composer certainly spoke from his heart; a lively impulse of inventiveness may be unmistakably discerned in every number of his quartets. Compared to the superficial aims of other young composers, his, at least, possess a character that demands respect, if there is not even something sublime in them. We see everywhere that he is determined to be called a poet, and that he, therefore, tries to withdraw from mere stereotyped form; Beethoven's last quartets appear to him as the beginning of a new poetic era, and he desires to continue this; Haydn and Mozart lie too far behind him. He has much in common with Berlioz; bold desire to create, a preference for grand forms, a poetical disposition, an inclination to despise what is antiquated, and, like Berlioz, he also received the early education of a physician, and only wholly devoted himself to music at the age of twenty. This last circumstance is worth remark. He who begins to study his occupation early becomes sooner master of it, and youth alone is favorable to the development of certain mechanical powers. But our young artist does not seem to have enjoyed the advantage of an early and correct guidance. To be sure, he has devoted other powers to the service of the Muses, and a many-sided cultivation such as is not always found among his caste. He is well versed in the history and poetry of many lands, and he takes a lively interest in the struggle of to-day. It is, therefore, not surprising that a youth so advanced in the knowledge of other things, does not exactly begin at the A B C of music, when he wishes to discourse and poetize freely. Many things succeed in the first fresh start; here and there, however, the faulty schooling of the musician betrays itself, and disturbs us with a feeling such as that caused by errors of orthography in a letter that is, notwithstanding, written intelligently. Yet we must confess that we have experienced the same feeling sometimes in the case of Berlioz. We do not care to cite every separate passage in the quartets in which any musician will perceive the still unfinished artist. The thoroughly German character of the whole work stands far above its execution. There is thought and truth in these pictures from life, and perhaps those yet to come, which are to complete the cycle, will display that mastery yet lacking. In the meanwhile, we assure him that we love the aspirations of youth, and Beethoven, who struggled even with his last breath, is to us a noble example of human grandeur; but in the fruit-gardens of Mozart and Haydn, stand heavily-laden trees that we cannot easily overlook, unless we deny ourselves, to our own injury, as elevated an enjoyment as may be vainly sought elsewhere in the world, and to which, after useless searchings and wanderings, many return,—but, alas! too late, with frozen hearts that can enjoy no longer, and with trembling hands that have lost the power of construction.

The other young artist named above has looked far deeper into those fruit-gardens; we see that he is happy in his vocation of musician; above all, he demands music, fine tones; he broods over no Faustian by-fancies. Already, in a description of one of his overtures, we gave an idea of the style of his talent and of his promising disposition; we scarcely know what further to add to what we said then. As a quartettist he displays uncommon talents; he comprehends the real character of this form, he endeavors to sustain every part independently, and these wind and cross each other in an interesting manner; but a sort of symphonic fury overcomes him here and there, as if he were trying to force the modest four beyond their natural limits into orchestral effects. The quartet No. 2 was composed first, and is written in A-flat major, a key hitherto almost unused in the quartet; and it has its difficulties. In form and succession of movements, it endeavors to follow the older masters as models. Cheerfulness and enjoyment of life predominate in its character, which is only clouded here and there by exhibitions of a more thoughtful earnestness.

Its melodic treatment displays no decidedly original stamp; a few lively outbreaks remind us of Mendelssohn. The pure construction of the periods, and their often artistic involutions, are throughout praiseworthy. The entire work, if well studied and performed, can only produce a favorable impression. The second quartet, in D-minor, creates a still more agreeable one. Both seem to have been written at the same period, or in immediate succession, and the works contain some resemblances; but the composer moves more easily and cleverly in the second—to which result the easier key no doubt contributed. The first movement rushes hastily by; it breaks off too suddenly, too much as if the composer had at once lost pleasure in his work. In the adagio he rises to a more joyful elevation of mind. The third and fourth measures certainly remind us of a theme of Mozart's in "Don Juan;" but as fresh a vein of inventiveness runs through the whole piece, notwithstanding, as is only possible in youth; and certain little harmonic surprises render it quite peculiarly attractive. The scherzo moves gaily, spite of the minor key, and the bolder its performance, the greater will be its effect. The last movement begins, almost note for note, like the last of the "Eroica" symphony. Did this escape the composer's observation? If not, why did he allow it to remain? But soon an original idea dances out, 'cello and viola begin to beckon, and the merry sport goes bravely on. The knot grows more and more intricate, and threatens to become entangled. The whole finally resolves itself well enough, closing in clear major, somewhat bombastically, but not so much so as to make us angry with the composer. We must highly recommend the endeavors of this young artist to the world's favorable opinion. The truly vital part of a work cannot be pointed out in words; therefore, those who would know it, must themselves play and listen. Let the composer show himself soon again on a ground where it is not easy to find footing; above all outward success, he must value that inward gain, which every exercise of power in difficulties bears within itself, and the consequence of which is certain to prove beneficial to the artist in every other labor.

ABOUT OVERTURES.¹

Overture (Fr. Overture, Ital. Overtura), i. e., Opening. This term was originally applied to the instrumental prelude to an opera, its first important development being due to Lulli, as exemplified in his series of French operas and ballets, dating from 1672 to 1686. The earlier Italian operas were generally preceded by a brief and meagre introduction for instruments, usually called Sinfonia, sometimes Toccata, the former term having afterwards become identified with the grandest of all forms of orchestral music; the latter having been always more properly (as it soon became solely) applied to pieces for keyed instruments. Monteverde's opera, "Orfeo" (1608), commences with a short prelude, of nine bars, termed "Toccato," to be played three times through; being, in fact, little more than a mere preliminary flourish of instruments. Such small beginnings became afterwards somewhat amplified, both by Italian and French composers; but only very slight indications of the Overture, as a composition properly so-called, are apparent before the time of Lulli, who justly ranks as an inventor in this respect. He fixed the form of the dramatic prelude, the overtures to his operas having not only served as models to composers for nearly a century, but having also been themselves extensively used in Italy and Germany as preludes to operas by other masters. Not only did our own Purcell follow this influence; Handel also adopted the form and closely adhered to the model furnished by Lulli, and by his transcendent genius gave the utmost development and musical interest attainable in an imitation of what was so entirely conventional. The form of the Overture of Lulli's time consisted of a slow Introduction, generally repeated, and followed by an Allegro in the fugued style, and occasionally included a movement in one of the many dance-forms of the period, sometimes two pieces of this description.

¹ From the article OVERTURE, in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians.

The development of the ballet and of the opera having been concurrent, and dance-pieces having formed important constituents of the opera itself, it was natural that the dramatic prelude should include similar features, and no incongruity was thereby involved, either in the overture or the serious opera which it heralded, since the dance-music of the period was generally of a stately, even solemn kind. In style, the dramatic overture of the class now referred to, like the stage-music which it preceded, and indeed all the secular compositions of the time, had little, if any, distinguishing characteristic to mark the difference between the secular and sacred styles. Music had been fostered and raised into the importance of an art by the Church, to whose service it had long been almost exclusively applied, and it retained a strong and pervading tinge of serious formalism during nearly a century of its earliest application to secular purposes, even to those of dramatic expression.

As regards the overture, then, Handel perfected the form first developed by Lulli, but cannot be considered as an inventor and grand originator, such as he appears in his sublime sacred choral writing.

Hitherto, as we have said, the dramatic overture had no special relevance to the character and sentiment of the work which it preceded. The first step in this direction was taken by Gluck, who was for some time contemporaneous with Handel. It was he who first perceived, or at least realized, the importance of rendering the overture to a dramatic work analogous in style to the character of the music which is to follow. In the dedication of his Alceste, he refers to this among his other reforms in stage composition. The French score of Alceste includes, besides the invariable string quartet, flutes, oboes, a clarinet, and three trombones. Even Gluck, however, did not always identify the overture with the opera to which it belonged, so thoroughly as was afterwards done by including a theme or themes in anticipation of the music which followed. Still, he certainly rendered the orchestral prelude what, as a writer has well said, a literary preface should be—"something analogous to the work itself, so that we may feel its want as a desire not elsewhere to be gratified." His overtures to Alceste and Iphigénie en Tauride run continuously into the first scene of the opera, and the latter is perhaps the most remarkable instance up to that time of special identification with the stage music which it heralds, inasmuch as it is a distinct foreshadowing of the opening storm scene of the opera into which the prelude is merged. Perhaps the finest specimen of the dramatic overture of the period, viewed as a distinct orchestral composition, is that of Gluck to his opera, Iphigénie en Aulide.

The influence of Gluck on Mozart is clearly to be traced in Mozart's first important opera, Idomeneo (1781), the overture to which, both in beauty and power, is far in advance of any previous work of the kind; but, beyond a general nobility of style, it has no special dramatic character that inevitably associates it with the opera itself, though it is incorporated therewith by its continuance into the opening scene. In his next work, Die Entführung aus dem Serail (1782), Mozart has identified the prelude with the opera by the short incidental Andante movement, anticipatory (in the minor key) of Belmont's aria, Hier soll ich dich denn sehen. In the overture to his Nozze di Figaro (1786), he originally contemplated a similar interruption of the Allegro by a short, slow movement—an intention afterwards happily abandoned. This overture is a veritable creation, that can only be sufficiently appreciated by a comparison of its brilliant outburst of genial and graceful vivacity with the rapid preludes to the comic operas of the day. In the overture to his Don Giovanni (1787), we have a distinct identification with the opera by the use, in the introductory Andante, of some of the wondrous music introducing the entry of the statue in the last scene. The solemn initial chords for trombones, and the fugal Allegro of the overture to Die Zauberflöte may be supposed to be suggestive of the religious element of the libretto, and this may be considered as the composer's masterpiece of its kind. Since Mozart's time, the overture has adopted the same general principles of form which govern the first movement of a Symphony or Sonata, without the repetition of the first section.

Reverting to the French school, we find a characteristic overture of Méhul's, to his opera, La Chasse du Jeune Henri (1797), the prelude to which alone has survived. In this, however, as in French music generally of that date (and even earlier), the influence of Haydn is distinctly apparent. His symphonies and quartets had met with immediate acceptance in Paris—one of the former, indeed, entitled La Chasse, having been composed seventeen years before Méhul's opera. Cherubini, although Italian by birth, belongs to France; for all his great works were produced at Paris, and most of his life was passed there. This composer must be specially mentioned as having been one of the first to depart from the pattern of the overture as fixed by Mozart. Cherubini, indeed, marks the transition point between the regular symmetry of the style of Mozart, and the coming disturbance of form effected by Beethoven. In the dramatic effect gained by the gradual and prolonged crescendo, both he and Méhul seem to have anticipated one of Rossini's favorite resources. This is specially observable in the overture to his opera, Anacreon (1803). Another feature is the abandonment of the Mozartian rule of giving the second subject (or episode) first in the dominant, and afterwards in the original key, as in the symphonies, quartets and sonatas of the period.

The next step in the development of the overture was taken by Beethoven, who began by following the model left by Mozart, and carrying it to its highest development, as in the overture to the ballet of Prometheus (1800). In his other dramatic overtures, including those to Von Collin's Coriolan (1807), and to Goethe's Egmont (1810), the great composer fully asserts his independence of form and precedent. But he had done so still earlier, in the overture known as "No. 3," of the four which he wrote for his opera Fidelio. In this wonderful prelude (composed in 1806), Beethoven has apparently reached the highest possible point of dramatic expression, by foreshadowing the sublime heroism of Leonora's devoted affection for her husband, and indicating, as he does, the various phases of her grief at his disappearance, her search for him, his rescue by her from a dungeon and assassination, and their ultimate reunion and happiness. Here the stereotyped form of overture entirely disappears; the commencing scale passage, in descending octaves, suggesting the utterance of a wail of despairing grief, leads to the exquisite phrases of the Adagio of Florestan's scene in the dungeon, followed by the passionate Allegro which indicates the heroic purpose of Leonora. This movement, including the spirit-stirring trumpet-call that proclaims the rescue of the imprisoned husband, and the whole winding up with a grandly exultant burst of joy,—these leading features, and the grand development of the whole, constitute a dramatic prelude that is still unapproached. In No. 1 of these Fidelio overtures (composed 1807) he has gone still further in the use of themes from the opera itself, and has employed a phrase which occurs in Florestan's Allegro, to the words An angel Leo nora, in the coda of the overture, with very fine effect.

While in the magnificent work just described, we must concede to Beethoven undivided pre-eminence in majesty and elevation of style, the palm, as to romanticism and that powerful element of dramatic effect, "local color," must be awarded to Weber. No subjects could well be more distinct than those of the Spanish drama Preciosa (1820); the wild forest legend of North Germany, Der Freischütz (1821); the chivalric subject of the book of Euryanthe (1823); and the bright Orientalism of Oberon (1826). The overtures to these are too familiar to need specific reference; nor is it necessary to point out how vividly each is impressed with the character and tone of the opera to which it belongs. In each of them Weber has anticipated themes from the following stage music, while he has adhered to the Mozart model in the regular recurrence of the principal subject and the episode. His admirable use of the orchestra is specially evidenced in the Freischütz overture, in which the tremolando passages for strings, the use of the chalméau of the clarinet, and the employment of the drums, never fail to raise thrilling impressions of the supernatural. The incorporation of portions of the opera in the overture is so skilfully effected by Weber that there is no impression of patchiness, or want of spontaneous creation, as in the case of some other composers—Auber, for instance, and Rossini (excepting the latter's Tell), whose overtures are too often like potpourris of the leading themes of the operas, loosely strung together, intrinsically charming and brilliantly scored, but seldom, if ever, especially dramatic. Most musical readers will remember Schubert's clever travesty of the last-named composer, in the Overture in the Italian Style, written off-hand by the former in 1817, during the rage for Rossini's music in Vienna.

Berlioz left two overtures to his opera of Benvenuto Cellini, one bearing the name of the drama, the other called the Carnaval Romain, and usually played as an entracte. The themes of both are derived more or less from the opera itself. Both are extraordinarily forcible and effective, abounding with the gorgeous instrumentation and bizarre treatment which are associated with the name of Berlioz.

Since Weber, there has been no such fine example of the operatic overture, suggestive of, and identified with the subsequent dramatic action, as that to Wagner's Tannhäuser, in which, as in Weber's overtures, movements from the opera itself are amalgamated into a consistent whole, set off with every artifice of contrast and with the most splendid orchestration. A noticeable novelty in the construction of the operatic overture is to be found in Meyerbeer's incorporation of the choral Ave Maria into his overture to Dinorah (Le Pardon de Ploermel).

In some of the modern operas, Italian and French (even of the grand and heroic class) the work is heralded merely by a trite and meagre introduction, of little more value or significance than the feeble Sinfonia of the earliest musical drama. Considering the extended development of modern operas, the absence of an overture of proportionate importance or (if a mere introductory prelude) one of such beauty and significance as that to Wagner's Lohengrin, is a serious defect, and may generally be construed into an evidence of the composer's indolence, or of his want of power as an instrumental writer. Recurring to the comparison of a preface to an operatic overture, it may be said of the latter, as an author has well said of the former, that "it should invite by its beauty, as an elegant porch announces the splendor of the interior."

The development of the oratorio overture (as already implied) followed that of the operatic overture. Among prominent specimens of the former are those to the first and second parts of Spohr's Last Judgment (the latter of which is entitled Symphony); and the still finer overtures to Mendelssohn's St. Paul and Elijah, this last presenting the specialty of being placed after the recitative passage with which the work really opens. Mr. Macfarren's overtures to his oratorios of John the Baptist, The Resurrection, and Joseph, are all carefully designed to prepare the hearer for the work which follows, by employing themes from the oratorio itself, by introducing special features, as the Shofar-horn in John the Baptist, or by general character and local color, as in Joseph. The introduction to Haydn's Creation, a piece of "programme music," illustrative of Chaos, is a prelude not answering to the conditions of an overture properly so-called, as does that of the same composer's Seasons, which, however, is rather a cantata than an oratorio.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ŒDIPUS TYRANNUS. Harvard University has decided, it seems, in emulation of Oxford, to enact an ancient Greek tragedy, and has chosen Sophocles's Œdipus Tyrannus for the occasion, which will be some time during the present academic year. Those having charge of the work—they are said to be signally competent—expect to excel in completeness of detail the production of Æschylus's Agamemnon at Oxford last spring. They have already finished the score for the first chorus, and the parts have been assigned. The choruses will all be sung, and the dance to accompany them may also be attempted. A play by Sophocles may be the best choice of Greek tragedy that could be made, for his writings are almost universally regarded as the perfection of the Attic drama. He has been called the high priest of humanity. He made tragic poetry an actual reflex of the mind and heart, and showed the moral significance of human action. His works are declared to be a happy medium between the indefinite and sombre supernaturalism of Æschylus and the too familiar scenes and frequent bombast of Euripides. Antigone or Electra might be better adapted, or less unadapted, to modern representation than Œdipus Tyrannus, which is, however, ranked by many critics as the finest of his seven extant tragedies. As a classic performance, the rendering of the play will be curious and interesting to scholars; but as a drama, in any modern sense, it will be well-nigh grotesque. It would be amusing if the author could be present at the Harvard representation. He is reputed to have been one of the most amiable and contented of mortals. But he would, we query, be greatly irritated to find that he could not, as we venture to say he could not, understand a single word of his own immortal composition. The late Professor C. C. Felton, considered the best Greek scholar in this country, with few equals anywhere, paid a visit the latter part of his life to Athens, and was unable, as he said himself, to make any body comprehend the simplest Greek phrase. Although Romain is quite different from the old Greek, it is founded on that, and it might be supposed there would be enough in common between the two to make the latter somewhat intelligible to the ears of contemporaneous Grecians. But there is not, apparently. There is no rational doubt, if Demosthenes were now extant, that he would not understand a syllable of Greek, as taught anywhere at present, any more readily than he would understand Choctaw or Tammany English.—New York Times.

GLUCK AND WAGNER. In the chapter devoted to Gluck in his Moderne Oper, Eduard Hanslick speaks of Richard Wagner's additions to the score of Iphigenia in Aulis. The criticism is very favorable, and the good opinion expressed gains emphasis from the fact that Hanslick is one of Wagner's most bitter opponents. The article was written anent a performance of Iphigenia in Vienna during 1867. Dr. Hanslick's remarks are as follows: "Richard Wagner's work on the score of Iphigenia in Aulis contributed not a little to the genuine success of the opera. The revision shows the hand of a master, both in the change made and in what was allowed to remain unaltered. We perceive a conservative appreciation of what was characteristic in the past, and a lucid perception of modern requirements. We know that many voices, and among them voices of sufficient prominence to arrest our attention, are continually protesting against the modernizing of important works. Their protest would be just if it concerned an historical concert or a performance before antiquarians. But it is a different matter when the real purpose is to introduce Gluck's music with happy effect upon a modern public. In this case an intelligent and modest revision is not only permissible, but even necessary. Of course, critics cut a better figure when they cry out against the slightest alteration, and lament the sacrifice of a note as an irretrievable loss. But the practical musician who leads a Gluck opera to victory, with the sacrifice of a few external properties, does more for Gluck than the purists who watch its failure from their classic heights. Wagner had to work in a good many directions. In the first place we owe him a new translation of the French libretto, and, as regards the recitatives, the restoration of proper form and meaning which had disappeared in the usual miserable translation. Then he strengthened the instrumentation where it was too sparse and monotonous for modern hearing. Iphigenia in Aulis needed this strengthening in particular, for in it Gluck avoided the trombones which we have heard so effectively in Orpheus and Alceste!"

WELLESLEY COLLEGE. A contributor to the Advertiser, writes:

So much has been written and said of Wellesley College, its praises have been so often repeated, that nothing new can be added; still the impression made by such an institution is always deep and fresh. More than three hundred girls, more than thirty professors and teachers, all busy as bees; it is a little world in itself, and so advantageously placed, where, in a sense, there is only Nature and Wellesley College; and yet so near an active centre of intellectual life and growth as to be able to profit by all the advantages thus afforded. There are already many works of art, both in the halls of the college and in the art gallery; nearly 20,000 books in the library; a fine building nearly ready for occupation, to be entirely devoted to music, and built with special reference to its use, such as deafened walls and floors and double doors to the thirty-eight rooms for lessons and practice, and a hall for concerts and choral instruction. Courses of five years' study in music and art have been added to the other courses laid out at the opening of the institution, and the scientific courses are equally comprehensive as well as the advantages for laboratory work. The new "Stone hall" will be ready for use in September, 1881, and will provide for a new class of students, that is, those who are already teachers and desire advanced studies. Much has been accomplished at Wellesley in the few years of its existence, and, since progress seems to be its capital principal, and it has many friends ready to aid its realizations, one can safely say that as yet "the half has not been told." IN EARNEST. During a performance of Fidelio at the Town Theatre of Mayence, Herr Mann, the leading baritone of the company, was about, in the character of the wicked Don Pizarro, to undergo the penalty of his evil deeds, the stage business requiring that he should be led away to confinement by two guards at a sign from the minister of State. The brace of supers told off for this duty were private soldiers, belonging to an artillery regiment in garrison at Mayence—two sturdy Brandenburgers, drilled and disciplined to a nicety. As they took up the position assigned to them on either side of Pizarro, previous to marching him off the stage, the chorist entrusted with the part of officer commanding the escort, whispered to them, "Remember, the man is a State prisoner; guard him carefully." Obedient to orders, they led Pizarro away to his dressing-room, where he rapidly exchanged his theatrical costume for private clothes, and, opening his door, was about to go home to supper as usual, when, to his amazement, he found his passage barred by a couple of crossed halberds. Indignantly inquiring of the inflexible supers facing him with outstretched weapons what they meant by interfering with his movements, he received the stolid reply that they had strict orders to guard him closely as a State prisoner, and that he must not attempt to leave his room. Some time elapsed before the accidental arrival on the spot of the stage manager, whose authority they were induced with difficulty to recognize, finally resulted in Mr. Mann's emancipation from restraint.

WAGNER'S NEW PAMPHLET. The title, Religion and Art, is a pure misnomer. There is in it little or nothing about art, and still less about religion; the brochure being devoted almost exclusively to the religion of the stomach and the art of eating. Herr Wagner was, it seems, shocked during the Bayreuth performance by the hunger of the audience. Those who were present will not easily forget the fights for food, and Herr Wagner seems to be very much disgusted that his faithful followers cannot subsist entirely upon his music. A bold advertisement follows of the projected production of Parsifal in 1882, when Herr Wagner hopes his audience will renounce meat, and be content with "higher food," that is to say, vegetables. Pages of his pamphlet are filled with fierce invectives against those who eat "the corpses of murdered beasts," with assertions that to flesh eating may be attributed the degeneration of humanity, and with commands to the faithful to henceforward subsist on sauer kraut and potatoes. All this sounds like satire, and it is hoped, almost beyond hope, that the whole thing is a hoax. If not, it is lamentable to see a great intellect in its decay, and the perpetration of a folly which will excite pity in the minds of both foes and friends. — London Figaro.

CONCERTS.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The sixteenth season of Symphony Concerts opened auspiciously on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 2. The Music Hall looked unusually populous and cheerful for a first concert; programme and performance were excellent, and satisfaction could be read in almost every face.

First came Cherubini's noble overture to The Water Carrier, with its grave and stately introduction and ponderous downward gravitation of the basses, followed by that spirited and brilliant allegro in which the violins are used so finely, and very finely were they played. It was a capital interpretation.

Then came a soprano recitative and aria (never heard here before) from Handel's Italian opera Alessandro, sung by Miss Lillian Bailey. This opera was composed in 1726, and "drew very much," says Colman. Two famous prime donne, Faustina and Cuzzoni, were employed in it, and Handel treated them with equal favor, giving them well contrasted solos suited to their voices, and once at least letting the two sirens warble a duet. Faustina, in the character of the captive Princess Roxana, who captured her conqueror's heart in turn, has always a bright and joyous rôle to sing. Crysander says: "When she receives her liberty from Alexander, she answers him with a melody which flutters away on the air like a bird escaped from its cage. But a song-bird escaped from its cage commonly comes back soon; it loves its prison and its master more than freedom. The melody swings itself aloft, fluttering this way and that way, and then sinks back to the low tone with which it started; out of love to its master the song-bird makes its way back to its little golden cage." This, however, is not the aria which Miss Bailey sang for us, though what she did sing (Rec. "Ne' trofei d' Alessandro"; Aria: "Lusinghe più care") is of the same joyous, brilliant and enthusiastic character with all the melodies entrusted to Roxana; while those sung by Cuzzoni in the part of the unfavored but magnanimous rival, Isaura, are in the mournful and pathetic tone more native to the singer's voice. Miss Bailey gave the recitative with fine accent and phrasing, and sang the florid, rapturous Handelian allegro in a most pure, clear, finished style, entirely unaffected and refined, with a voice of rare delicacy and sweetness, such as wins its way even without great strength and volume. The orchestral parts had been carefully arranged by Mr. Henschel from the score of Handel.

The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven rose like "the monarch of mountains" in the middle of the programme—though its heights are anything but snowy; for it is full of warmth and happiness almost divine; the very heavens seem to open in the Trio of the Scherzo. The rendering was remarkably fine, and it was heard with such delight and satisfaction, such a sense of blissful rest in perfect harmony, that one could almost pray that it might keep on forever. The performance showed that the orchestra has been kept in nice and careful drill of late, alike creditable to Mr. Zerrahn and Mr. Listemann.

The Symphony was followed by three of those beautiful arrangements (one hundred or more) which Beethoven made, for Thomson, of old Scotch and Irish popular melodies, with accompaniments for piano, violin and 'cello. Beethoven's genius shines in these gem-like, characteristic settings, as clearly as in all his works; the short prelude, accompaniment, and closing instrumental measures, seize in every instance the spirit of the song, preserve and heighten its native flavor, and make it a little art-work, while it still remains a folks-song. Mr. J. C. D. Parker played the piano part, and Mrs. Listemann and Fries the violin and 'cello, and all went nicely, supplying the right background to Miss Bailey's simple, charming and expressive singing. Two of the songs were Scotch ("The lovely lass of Inverness" and "Faithful Johnnie."); Between them came the Irish melody: "Sad and luckless was the Season," in which might easily be recognized an older, if not the original, form of "The last Rose of Summer." In a smaller room, of course, these things would have been more appreciable.

The one instrumental novelty of the programme, closing the concert, was Schumann's overture to Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, Op. 128, composed in 1851. Though in a dramatic sense not satisfying the expectations prompted by its title, and by no means so marked and marvellous a creation as his Manfred and Genoveva overtures, it is yet thoroughly Schumannesque. Three dramatic elements are discernible in its subject matter. First a strong, imperative proclamation by brass instruments, with wide intervals, suggestive enough of threatening universal empire; then, occupying most of the middle part, half-suppressed murmurs and misgivings, anxious fears and consultations, (violins and soft wood instruments) and then a strong victorious finale. But one listens in vain for any intimation of the fall of Caesar; and the finale, if it means the momentary victory and hope of Freedom, is too slightly different in character from the threatening theme of the beginning. A certain sense of incompleteness remains when the work is over. But it is interesting, and was well presented.

PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA. Second concert, Friday evening, Nov. 19. —

Valse-Caprice. Ant. Rubinstein
Adapted for Orchestra by Muller-Berghans. New. First time in Boston.

Here is another sort of programme. Of the concert one may say in a word: the manner (performance) excellent, the matter extremely and monotonously modern. In all these brilliant and surprising pieces—not without contrasts either, and not without moments of oppressive sombreness and dullness—was there a single movement of which one could say, as we have said above of the Seventh Symphony, or as Faust says when he at last tastes perfect satisfaction and would fain arrest the fleeting moment: "Ah! still delay, thou art so fair!" Is there anything that transports the listener into a state of heavenly bliss which he would fain prolong forever? And is not that the test of real, inspired, perfect music? What is so fatiguing, so confusing, as an unbroken series of surprises dazzling brilliancies, unheard of strange effects? When you have heard them through, nothing abides with you; there is no unity of total impression, no rounding to a period of vital, soulful, sweet repose. Here have been all these waves of sound, a vast wilderness thereof, foaming and tossing about you, and still they foam and toss in the jaded brain; but what has it all given you that you rest upon, what that you can love and fondly call back like the impression of a lovely person? These men, these modern Boanerges of the tone-art, all seem striving to do something more wonderful and strange than ever yet was done, not something intrinsically lovely and ideal, which it looks hardly possible to do as well as has been done. The result is, that after you have heard a few programmes of this sort, they all sound alike, till there is more of the real sense of novelty and ideality in the smallest, slenderest symphony or quartet of old Father Haydn. Nevertheless we will thank Mr. Listemann and Mr. Thomas, and many more, for making us so very familiar with this sort of thing, that we shall return to the sincere old masters with an altogether fresh and unmisgiving feeling of their greatness.

The Roman Carnival Overture of Berlioz—one of the two he wrote for his opera Benvenuto Cellini—certainly contains remarkable things; some charming, some surprising, and shows his mastery of instrumentation perhaps as well as anything. It is one of the new works, which we shall be glad of an opportunity to hear again, when we trust we shall understand it better.

Liszt's "Inferno" is infernal. What has music to do with such a theme? How, but by almost ceasing to be music, can it paint such a picture and suggest such horrors. Granting that there is an appalling grandeur in the tones he has used for the inscription over the gate of Hell, and that he seized upon the episode of Francesca di Rimini for a few strains of tender melody, still the general character of the work is harsh, extravagant and noisy. Whether even the pursuit of knowledge would reconcile us to hearing this again, is more than we dare promise.

The Ole Bull melody was a graceful tribute to his memory. The Miniature March by Tchaikowsky, for the soft wind instruments without bassoon, and strings also without basses, was a very pretty, dainty, musical-box affair, fanciful and clever, and charmingly rendered. The orchestration of Rubinstein's Valse-Caprice, too, was highly effective.

Miss Gertrude Franklin made a very good impression by her singing of the Mozart Aria. Having heard her hitherto mostly in bright, florid music in the upper range, we were surprised at the volume and the pleasing individual color of her tones. Her style and execution, too, were creditable; but she was more nearly at her best in the three German songs, which she sang with much expression, and in a true and simple way.

We are glad to see that the next Philharmonic programme (Friday of this week) is not all new school, but includes Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

POSTPONED. False calculation of the length of matter set up for this number of the Journal, robs us of further room for our review of concerts. A long list must lie over: two fine ones of the Apollo Club; Mr. Lang's splendid repetition of the Damnation de Faust (this time in Tremont Temple); the first Euterpe Concert; the second Harvard Symphony; third Philharmonic, &c.

IN PROSPECT. This evening the most loyal part of musical Boston will pay its tribute of respect and love to the man and artist, WULF FRIES, for nearly two generations associated with all good things in our musical experience. The concert is at Horticultural Hall. Mr. Fries will play a violoncello Concerto by Svendsen. The Cherubini Quartet in E-flat, and the great Schumann Quintet for piano and strings, form other features of the programme.

—For the complimentary concert to Mr. John S. Dwight, to take place in Music Hall on Thursday afternoon of next week, the following artists have generously volunteered: Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Miss Fanny Kellogg, Miss Lillian Bailey, Miss Fannie Louise Barnes, Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mrs. J. H. West, Miss Edith Abell, Mrs. J. W. Weston, Miss Lucie Homer, Miss Ita Welsh, Mrs. Jennie M. Noyes, Miss May Bryant, Mr. Charles R. Adams, Mr. George L. Osgood, Mr. Charles E. Hayden, Mr. John F. Winch, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Charles H. Morse, Mrs. W. H. Sherwood, Mr. J. C. D. Parker, Mr. W. H. Sherwood, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. J. A. Preston, and the orchestra of the Harvard symphony concert, Mr. Bernhard Listeman, leader, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor. The programme will be as follows:

1. Fifth symphony in C-minor. Beethoven
2. Twenty-third Psalm. (Female chorus). . . . Schubert
Conducted by Mr. George L. Osgood.
3. Concerto for three pianos and string orchestra. J.S. Bach
Messrs. J. C. D. Parker, Arthur Foote, and J. A. Preston.
4. Concert-Stueck, for piano and orchestra. . . . Schumann
Mr. B. J. Lang.
5. Quartet, from "Fidelio". Beethoven
Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Miss Edith Abell, Mr. Charles R. Adams and Mr. John F. Winch.
6. Overture. — Beethoven at Sea, and Happy Voyage. . . Mendelssohn

—The Third Harvard Symphony Concert will take place Dec. 16, with this programme: Overture to "Alceste" (first time), Gluck; Violin Concerto, No. 1, in G-minor, Maz Bruch (played by Mr. Timothe d'Adamowski); Symphonie Fantastique (second time), Berlioz; Leporello's Aria from "Don Giovanni"; "Madamina, il Catalogo," etc., Mozart (Mr. Clarence E. Hay); Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," Mozart. Prof. Paine's Spring Symphony, previously announced, is postponed to a later concert, owing to the non-arrival of the score and parts, which are being printed in Germany.

In the fourth concert, January 6, Mr. George Henschel will sing two Arias with orchestra, neither of which has been heard here before. One is from Handel's Italian Opera, Sirde; the other is Lysiat's Scena and Aria from Weber's Euryanthe: "Woberg ich mich." Perhaps, too, he will give some songs with his own accompaniment.

—The Handel and Hayden Society announces a series of four performances for its sixty-sixth season, as follows: Sunday, Dec. 26, "Messiah"; Sunday, Jan. 30, Mozart's "Requiem," first time in twenty-three years, and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," first time in twenty-seven years; Good Friday, Bach's "Passion Music," according to St. Matthew; and Easter Sunday, Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The soloists engaged for the first performance are Mrs. H. M. Knowles, Miss Anna Drasdil, Mr. W. C. Tower, and Mr. George Henschel. Mr. Henschel will also sing the part of Jesus in the "Passion Music." For the other performances the following solo engagements have been made: Miss Ita Welsh, Mrs. Jennie M. Noyes, Mr. C. R. Adams, Mr. W. J. Winch, Mr. J. F. Winch, and Mr. C. E. Hay. The orchestra will consist of sixty performers, under the direction of Mr. C. Zerrahn, with Mr. Lang at the organ.

—Mr. Henschel will give probably four song recitals here in January, with Miss Lillian Bailey, Mr. Charles E. Hayden, and a pianist.

—Mr. A. P. Peck has completed arrangements with Mr. Theodore Thomas for the projected series of concerts at Music Hall in January, and the sale of season tickets will at once be opened. Mr. Thomas will bring his unrivalled orchestra from New York, and there will be four concerts—three in the evening and one matinee. The concert, January 24th (Monday) will be of an old-time popular character. The second concert (Wednesday evening) will include a part, if not the whole, of a symphony, together with popular selections. At both these concerts Herr Rafael Joseffy, the distinguished pianist, will assist as soloist. Berlios's great dramatic legend, "La Damnation de Faust," will be brought out, under Mr. Thomas's direction, on Friday evening, Jan. 28th, and repeated Saturday afternoon, the 29th. A full orchestra, a large and well trained chorus, and eminent soloists will take part. In this latter connection Miss Fanny Kellogg, Mr. W. C. Tower, the tenor, and Mr. George Henschel have already engaged.

EMMA OF NEVADA.

[Our genial "Diarist" of a former generation—Beethoven's biographer—having returned to his Consulate at Trieste, has heard there what would seem to be a young American Gerster, and writes to us thus glowingly about her.]

It happened on this wise:

He was a middle-aged gentleman of pleasing address, who entered; evidently at first sight an American, which his card confirmed—"W. W. Wixon, Physician and Surgeon, Austin, Nevada." His companion, a sweet, intelligent girl of some nineteen years, had upon her card "Emma Nevada." We adjourned to the other room, chatted a few minutes, and then it came out. She was his daughter, and, under the assumed name of her State, was to sing next evening, October 2d, her second appearance in any theatre, in the part of "Amina" in La Sonnambula; and they came to invite me to be present.

I had never heard of Emma Nevada; had not even noticed the placards announcing the new operatic season at the Polytheama; nor even seen any notice of her one appearance in London. To tell the candid truth, I had no overwhelming desire to see and hear a young American girl attempt the florid music of Bellini's hackneyed old sentimental opera; but of course I could find no honest excuse for not attending.—I went.

"Evviva, evviva, Amina!" etc., etc., from the chorus; the scene between Lisa and Alexis, etc.; and now she comes from the mill, with her good old (stage) mother—just the sweetest, simplest, lovablest Swiss girl that you can imagine, not particularly hand some, but with a most expressive face, lighted up by such glorious eyes! She greets her "dear companions" assembled to do honor to her wedding-day; recites her tenderness and love for the "dear, loving mother;" and coming forward, begins the well-known Come per me sereno. Not a strong voice; but such purity of tone; such perfect intonation; such soul; at the close such a staccato, such a shake, such a portamento—the most hackneyed old theatre goers were instantly made captive.

You know how I hate the wiggle-voiced women. Judge then the satisfaction of once more hearing a long-drawn tone without a waver from beginning to end; the most perfect crescendo and diminuendo, of a high note; at the close a gliding down of the voice to the final shake, as exquisitely executed as by a skilful violinist on his instrument.

I have had the pleasure of seeing much of her during the month she has spent here, in which she has sung thirteen times, nine or ten times as "Amina," the rest as Lucia in the Bride of Lammermoor. I have found her utterly free from all "stagyness," just as simple, unaffected, bright, intelligent, well-educated and lovable as any one of the sweet girls who made my day at Wellesley College last Summer so pleasant—nay, as Susan herself.—If you don't know Susan, I wish you did.

Dr. Wixon, a native of the State of New York, an alumnus of Michigan University, settled in California, where his daughter was born, and removed thence to Austin, Nevada, where his home now is.

Emma was educated at Mills Seminary, Oakland, Cal. From her earliest childhood she gave promise of the artist, which she has become, singing and carolling all the day long like a bob-o-link or canary. She is all music. So after leaving school, nothing would do, but she must come to Europe and study singing. Some three years since a Dr. Eberl (or, some such name) of Berlin, went to the United States to seek a certain number of young ladies to come over with him en pension, as they say here, he to supply them with all things necessary, masters included, at a certain sum per annum. He returned with about a dozen, Emma Nevada being one. The vessel cast anchor in the Elbe, and her passengers were transferred as usual from the large to a smaller boat to be landed. Eberl, who had been suffering, passed over with the rest, went into the cabin, sat down, and died! And here were those young American girls in Hamburg, with small funds, or none at command, unknown and friendless. How the rest fared I do not know; but Miss Emma made her way to Berlin. There she was assured that, if singing was her object, she must push on to Vienna and become a pupil of Marchesi.¹ So she wrote home for money, and away to Vienna. Luckily, a pupil had just finished her course, and Emma took her place, not only with Marchesi, but in the excellent family where the former pupil had lived. Two and a half years she remained there, learning to chat German like a native, and to sing like an angel, (I never heard an angel myself; but I take it for granted other people have, considering how often they use this comparison). I now learn from friends, that she long stood at the head of her fellow-pupils; one of them told a lady of my acquaintance, whom she met at a watering-place, that by far the most excellent and promising vocalist of them all was a young American girl. And now she is before the public, and the question will soon be decided, if not already, whether that promise will be kept.

Our local Italian papers praise with true Italian extravagance; and but one voice has failed to give her the credit, that, with very few exceptions, if any except him, all admit to be her due. Do you remember Patrick Henry's defence of Venable against John Hook? Venable had taken two steers from Hook for the use of the American army at the Siege of Yorktown, in 1781. After the surrender of Cornwallis and the return of the country to its normal condition, Hook sued Venable for trespass. "But, hark," said Henry, in his speech, "what notes of discord are those, which disturb the general joy and silence the acclamations of victory? They are the notes of John Hook, hoarsely brawling through our American camp: 'Beef, beef, beef!'" So here amid the general satisfaction and delight, which our young American songstress awakened, we have the Smelfungus of the Triester Zeitung, "disturbing the general joy" by his "damning with faint praise."

One comfort, in hearing this sweet girl execute the most daring flights, is the security you feel that there is no danger of failure. All is done so easily, with so little effort, that you simply admire and enjoy. Who fears that a canary bird will attempt too much?

Heller—he has been these twenty years music director in our Schiller Verein—is a superb violinist—was in his younger years a member of the orchestra in the Court opera at Vienna, and has heard no end of the greatest operatic singers—well, Heller said to me, coming out of the theatre, the other night, that he never heard the "Ah non giunge" (at the end of the Sonnambula), "given with such execution; Jeany Lind herself had not equalled it!"

This Emma—"energetic," "industrious," in old German, says the dictionary—does the most daring things. Think of a young singer like her not hesitating to take this note and giving it as true and pure as the first flute can execute it, dropping finally as gracefully as the skylark an octave or so to a long and perfect trill, before striking into the final chord.

Madames A, B, C, and all the rest of them down to X, Y, Z, so far as I have heard them for forty years past, always at the end of a series of roulades, where the grand shake or trill comes in, brace themselves up, stand as rigid as a statue, draw a long breath, and, in short, make all those preparations, which say to the audience as plainly as the Frenchman's words: "Now, you shall see, vat you shall see"—and when the difficult part is accomplished, the mutual admiration society holds a session—the audience admires the trill; the triller admires the applause, and—the devil is to pay.

That is not Emma of Nevada's way. You remember the roulade duet between voice and flute in the crazy scene at the end of Lucia di Lammermoor?

She was not satisfied with it; so she set to work, discarded all but the first four bars, and composed one for herself, of scales and staccatos, of runs and trills, and the Lord knows what all, which the flutist told me was even very difficult for him to play—but all as graceful as it is difficult, and ending with an immense shake. Now, what did this crazy girl do? The voice and flute had ended their competition (the voice the victor) and the full, firm shake, as effortless apparently as the simplest strain, was about half through, when she suddenly started and ran off the stage, the shake continuing just as perfect all the way; and as she disappeared behind the scenes, she left us a final note away up somewhere in the clouds—I'm blessed if I know how high it was.

She has a staccato polka (written for her), with orchestral accompaniment, that she sang one night between acts. It is graceful and pretty, though its object, of course, is to show her immense execution. She forgot to take breath in due time, and for once, the final sky high note failed her. The poor girl was sadly mortified; but I "laughed consumedly," and told her I was delighted to find, that the bare possibility did exist of her not doing everything without some painstaking.

On her last evening—Sonnambula—the 2d act was omitted, and she sang the grand air in Linda, and the duet (of the billet-doux) of Rosina and Figaro in Rossini's Barbiera. We had heard her before only in the two operas named above; and the exquisite neatness of her comic acting in this scene took us all by surprise. She was just as easy and natural now, in her splendid Spanish costume, "duetting" with Figaro, as she had been half an hour before, in her simple village dress, and in an opera already performed so many times. All now desire to hear her in a comic part.

In these days of wiggle—of the everlasting tremolo of voices ruined by Verdi and Wagner—what I, after all enjoy most in this sweet girl's singing, are her pure, sustained notes, as superior to those of the flute or violin, as the human voice made by God is to the sounds of instruments made by man's hands. When I hear one, I incontinently parody Dr. Watts, and mentally shout,

There is a tone of pure delight!

Above, I called her lovable. I was on the stage one evening through the performance and saw for myself, how her winning, kindly ways, her treatment of all as also human beings and not mere servants of the prima donna, had won a feeling something warmer than respect for her talents and acquirements, from those who were employed with her. She tells me that her stage mother in Sonnambula—she is the wife of our excellent first flutist—when they are on the scene together unemployed, chats with her and caresses her as if all was real. (By the way, I wish you could hear her chatting German with this one and Italian with that, just as with me English). At her last appearance, on Monday evening, (Nov. 1), in the closing scene, where this good woman and artist comes from the mill and entreats the villagers not to disturb by their loud singing, her poor Amina, who has at last sunk into slumber and a momentary oblivion of her sorrow, she gave her recitative in such touching tones, that all the audience felt them. Next day, when she called at the hotel to bid the Wixons farewell, she fairly broke down and cried.

On Wednesday morning they departed for Bologna, where Emma is to sing in the Puritani.

To sum up: she is the greatest singer, of her years, I ever heard—Adelina Patti I have not heard—not the greatest voice, though it will develop and strengthen; at present its tones are flute and oboe-like, though sweeter, and of a penetrating quality: so that, as you distinguish the fine tone of a cremona violin above and through the crash of an orchestra, you can hear her final tone in alt, above all the tumult of chorus and orchestra in the concerted pieces.

Happily, her father is an experienced physician, and fully understands the necessity of festina lente—of the hasten slowly—and has therefore refused, since here, a call for her to the imperial opera in Vienna. Hence, I do not fear for her the fate of so many promising young singers of the last thirty years, who, for present applause, and for sake of gain, have taken engagements in the great opera-houses, have screamed away their voices in Verdi and Wagner, and sunk in a very few years irretrievably into the populous limbs of wiggle-voiced women.

Her repertoire already, if I understood her aright, comprises twenty-three Italian and four German parts in opera.

Here the reader breaks in:

"But, my dear old Diarist, you have been describing a phenomenon, in superlatives."

Diarist.—"Well, yes; considering her youth—I just have." A. W. T.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, Nov. 29. The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society began its season on Saturday evening, Nov. 20, with the subjoined programme:

Symphony No. 8, Beethoven
Concerto for Piano, Op. 16, Hensel
R. Joseffy.

Stegfried Idyl, Wagner
Recitative and Aria, Orpheus, Gluck
Miss Annie Louise Cary.

Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Op. 16, Berlioz

Notwithstanding the disagreeable weather, the opening concert of the Society's 23d season drew to the Academy a very large audience; all the seats were taken, and many, indeed, were compelled to stand during the entire performance.

The orchestral numbers were well given, and much enthusiasm was evoked by the two soloists, one of whom (Miss Cary) is usually a favorite in our sister city, and the other was most warmly received and applauded for his admirable performance of the exceedingly difficult concerto. And just here it is the duty of a conscientious critic to say that the wonderful Hungarian seems to be—so to speak—over-trained (to borrow a pugilistic phrase); in other words, he absolutely gives the impression of an overworked artist. He has practiced too much, if such a thing be comprehensible; his very anxiety and eagerness to do his best—together with an entire summer of unrelenting and assiduous finger-exercise—caused him to make a few skips which are entirely foreign to his usual unerring accuracy. The best result of his labor is a broadening of style which is undeniably excellent, and was, perhaps, needed.

In response to a hearty and most demonstrative recall he gave the Scherzo from the Litolf concerto, which he played on the preceding Saturday evening, at the late concert of the New York Society.

At the second concert, which will take place Dec. 18, will be given among other selections, Schumann's 3d (Cologne) Symphony, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus."

Last season the concerts occurred on Tuesday evenings, which was an encroachment upon a time-honored custom; this year the former system has been adopted, and will doubtless prove far more satisfactory to every one concerned. Each concert is preceded by two rehearsals, one an orchestral one, and the other a full rehearsal. I am given to understand that the financial outlook is satisfactory to the directors, and I am glad to believe that such is the case.

It is impossible to omit some mention of the exquisite floral display which is such a happy feature of these entertainments; on the evening in question the orchestra was hedged in by a profusion of magnificent calla lilies and other growing plants, so that the eye was delighted, while the ear was charmed.

On Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, Mr. W. Müller, the well-known violoncellist, gave a concert at Steinway Hall, which was well attended, although the artist mentioned had but indifferent supports as regards his associates upon the programme. Mr. M. displayed his full, rich tone and usual dexterity in two selections, and also played with a lady pianist Mendelssohn's well-known Variations Concertantes in D, Op. 17.

On Saturday evening, Nov. 27, our Oratorio Society gave its first concert of the season, and afforded our music-loving public a treat by its artistic rendering of the Elijah. Mr. Henschel confirmed the favorable impression already made by him; Miss Drasill created a genuine furore by her marvellous singing of her two arias: "Woe unto them," and "Rest in the Lord." Mr. Simpson sang carefully and well, albeit he never will learn to articulate his words, or to infuse any real warmth into his efforts. The orchestra did excellent work; and the chorus work was in the main most admirable, thanks to the indefatigable drill of Dr. Damrosch, whose conducting deserves genuine and unstinted praise. Of the other soloists it will be chartable to omit any mention; probably they would have done better if possible.

The Symphony Society's second concert will occur on Saturday, Dec. 4, and we are to have Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," with Mme. Valleria and Messrs. Henschel, Harvey and Bourne, for soloists.

During the first week of May, 1881, the "Music Festival Association" of New York will give a grand "Music Festival" in the seventh regiment's armory, under the direction of Dr. Damrosch. Seven performances will be given, four in the evening and three in the afternoon. Among the works to be produced will be:

Dettingen Te Deum, Handel
Tower of Babel, Rubinstein
Grand Requiem, Berlioz
Messiah, Handel
Ninth Symphony, Beethoven

Mr. Henschel announces four vocal recitals beginning on Dec. 7, and will be assisted by Miss Bailey (soprano), Mr. Hayden (tenor), an unnamed contralto, and a pianist from Boston. In addition to his vocal efforts, Mr. H. will play with the Boston pianist Moscheles' "Hommage à Handel," for two pianos. Mr. Henschel will sing from a most extensive repertoire, the authors being Haydn, Handel, Carissimi, Henschel, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Beethoven, Frauck, Pergolesi, Loewe, Franz, and Rubinstein.

Joseffy announces four orchestral concerts—with the aid of Mr. Thomas—to begin Dec. 13. These will take place in Steinway Hall, and will consist of two evening performances and two matinees; he is also announced to appear at Metropolitan Hall on Tuesday evening next.

A word or two with regard to the above-mentioned hall. Through the untiring energy and persistent efforts of Mr. Aronson—a young musician of this city—a very large sum of money was raised, and a very beautiful building was erected. It includes a restaurant, a concert-hall, and a variety of other things, and is really a delightful place of resort. During the summer a series of Popular Orchestral Concerts was given under Mr. Aronson's direction, and the season was a successful one. In the early autumn the directors (for it is a stock company which manages the enterprise) thought it wise to engage Mr. Thomas to conduct some of its concerts. Under his management each Thursday evening is a "Classical Night," and Friday is a "Request Night," and on Sundays a "Gala Night" is the attraction. But the audiences have not been very large, and Mr. Thomas's old-time prestige has not sufficed to attract paying houses; hence, the present order of things will probably be of short duration.. F.

CHICAGO, NOVEMBER 26.—Since my last note to the Journal, but few entertainments have been given. First in order came a performance of Chamber music, by the Liesegang-Heimendahl String Quartet. The following were the numbers performed:—

Quartet, op. 11, Tschalkowsky.
Serenade, for Quintet, S. G. Pratt.
Trio, op. 20, G. Jadassohn.

A glance at the little programme will show that our club lent itself to the interpretation of modern musical thought, its expressed by three living composers. Our age may be termed that of reflection, for human reason is reaching out on every hand and seeking for the truth. Thus in science, religion, and philosophy, much investigation and consideration is being carried on, and human knowledge is enlarging its sphere.

This desire for progress even enters the more quiet domain of art, and we see the result pictured in new attainments. In music, however, although the actuating motive seems to try to invent new forms, and to reach greater heights, there is less real progress than in some other directions of human attainment. One great reason for this is, doubtless, that we are not yet fully acquainted with the accomplishments of the past, and that we seek to attain the novel rather than that which is pure. In order for a greater musical development to take place, we must be able to realize the faults, as well as the merits, of what has been accomplished. Our modern composers seem afraid of duplicating the ideas of the old masters, and thus we have very marked contrasts in the music of the present, from that which was called beautiful in the days now gone. Perhaps it might be wise for us to still study the works of the great composers of the past, for there may be something for even modern musical thought to gain thereby. These reflections came to me as I listened to the works that were performed in the Chamber Concert, to which I refer in the beginning of these remarks; for I found in them an influence that seemed at variance with itself. There was an aim that was indefinite, and the ideas seemed confused, as if, perchance, the mind was not sure of its own meaning. It seems to me that true music must be fully satisfying, and that it should leave the hearer in a state of contentment, when its last echo fades away in the distance. A beautiful picture, a lovely poem, or a grand thought will bring satisfaction to those who are in sympathy with them. And surely music should always afford satisfaction to those who love it, if it be in truth real music. All gentle sounds that pulsate in unison with each other may not be representative of a musical idea. All soft music may not be good music, nor loud music grand. An art principle must hold together the contents of a musical composition, and make the whole a beautiful unity. This feeling for the beautiful was a true instinct with the old masters, and they expressed it in their works. Modern endeavor has not reached that height that renders the old of little value. It is well to be progressive, but we must be sure that what we do is really in advance of that which has been attained, before we can be fully satisfied with our accomplishments.

The Beethoven Society gave its first reunion last week, with an attractive programme. This organization is to give Mendelssohn's Elijah early in December, with Herr Henschel in the title role.

Mr. Boscowitz gave another piano-forte recital, with a programme largely made up of Chopin selections. He also performed the Grieg Concerto in A-minor, and the "Spinning Song" of Wagner-Liszt. This performance did not impress me any differently, in regard to the artistic merits of the gentleman. His playing has some beautiful moments, but his performance, as a whole, lacks that unity of interpretation that alone will give full satisfaction. He plays with too little evenness, and lacks in breadth and dignity of style, although his soft passages are given with much grace. His phrasing is often very novel, and his idea of light and shade differs from that of any pianist that I have heard. In art, fortunately, there is perfect liberty, and all moods and sentiments may find representation.

Miss Litta sang at the Central Music Hall, last evening, appearing with her concert company in a popular programme. I did not hear the entertainment, and, therefore, can only make a passing mention of it.

MUSIC ABROAD.

PARIS. Le Comte Ory, the revival of which I briefly noticed the other evening, was repeated on Wednesday night, and appeared to interest more deeply the regular habitués of the opera than the special audience assembled at the Première. It is beyond question that the texture of the music is somewhat light for the enormous salle of the new operahouse, and that the delicate grace of Rossini's facile strains would be better appreciated in the smaller locale of the Place Favart. It is no less certain that the present generation of singers have not the secret of the Rossinian roulades, but the work is so full of spontaneous inspiration from beginning to end that, executed beyond reproach so far as orchestra and chorus are concerned, Le Comte Ory cannot fail to delight all genuine dilettanti. Mlle. Daram sings the principal soprano part with insufficient voice, but with good style, while M. Dereims as the Comte Ory looks at least the lady-killer to perfection. But the most capable of the executants is M. Melchisedec, who, as Raimbaud, the hero's attendant, sings and acts with equal spirit. His chief solo, by-the-by, is taken bodily from Rossini's pièce de circonstance, Il Viaggio à Rheims, the names of the wines found in the cellar in this Bacchanalian air being substituted for the enemies slain in the original song, which was a description of the Battle of Trocadéro, in memory whereof was laid out the place utilized for the exhibition of 1877. Nothing is more remarkable than the skill with which Rossini has utilized, in Le Comte Ory, a comic opera, the pieces originally composed for an à propos cantata, written in celebration of Charles X.—(Paris Correspondence of the "Daily Telegraph.")

The re-opening of the Popular Concerts is at present the most important musical event. The "classical basis" was strictly adhered to, the opening number of the first concert being Beethoven's Symphony in A. Two novelties were brought forward with success, viz., a "Brésilienne" by B. Godard and a "Sara-bande" by N. Girard. For the second concert a still greater novelty is promised. The Kreutzer Sonata will be played by M. Ritter and all the first violins, eighteen in number. We abstain from conjecture!!

—The programme of the third Chatelet Concert, Oct. 3, is as follows:

Symphonie Pastorale, Beethoven.
Ouverture de Béatrice, Bernard.
Introduction et Allegro, pour piano, Godard.
Le Rouet d'Omphale, poème symphonique, Saint-Saëns.
Concerto in Ut mineur, pour deux pianos, Bach.
"Le Dernier Sommeil de la Vierge," Massenet.
Ouverture de "Zanetta," Auber.

At the concert given at the Trocadéro for the benefit of the Orphanage for artists, 35,000 francs were realized, 4,500 more than the required sum, the artists all giving their services, for which they received the heartiest plaudits.

BERLIN. The Symphonie Kapelle—the only band of the kind which the capital possesses—distinguished itself a few days ago by a performance of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," which strangely enough had never before been performed in Berlin. That composer, says the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, has been brought nearer to the German public by the energetic efforts of the North German School, Liszt, Bülow, and the Musikverein, and even in conservative Berlin is now no longer a stranger.

COLOGNE. The Concert Society will give this winter ten Subscription Concerts under Dr. Ferdinand Hiller. Among the works selected for performance are St. Paul, Mendelssohn; Die Kreuzfahrer, Niels von Gade; "Funeral March," Handel; "Gloria," Max Bruch; the Grosse Passion, J. S. Bach; an Orchestral Work, C. Saint-Saëns; the "Ninth Symphony," Beethoven; "Ländliche Hochzeit, Goldmark; and "Im Schwarzwald," Corder. MM. Gade and Saint-Saëns have promised to conduct their own works.

VIENNA. Dinorah was performed, for the first time this season, at the Imperial Operahouse, on the 21st ult., with Mlle. Bianchi as the heroine. Three days later, Aida was given at the express wish of the ex-Khedive, Ismael Pasha, who, as is well known, commissioned Verdi to compose it, and was anxious to see how it was put upon the stage and performed here. Signor Ciampi will shortly appear as the Marquis in Linda, and Dulcamara in L'Elisir, singing on both occasions in Italian, which, out of courtesy to him, will be the language employed by Mlles. Bianchi, Stahl, and Herr Walther. —As already announced in the Musical World, Mlle. Bianchi has been created an Imperial Austrian Chamber Singer, a rare distinction for a fair artist after an engagement of only six months. The other ladies bearing the title at present, are Mmes. Dastmaun, Artôt-Padilla, Gomperz-Bettelheim, Adellina Patti, Friedrich-Materna, Pauline Lucca, and Christine Nilsson.

LONDON. "Cherubino" writes in Figaro (Nov. 6): The two principal works of last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert were a pianoforte concerto in A-minor, by Herr J. H. Bonawitz, and the C-minor symphony of Beethoven. Not that there is the slightest analogy between the two works. As wide a space separates Bonawitz from Beethoven as divides Bach from Offenbach. The concerto, which appears to be the thirty-sixth work perpetrated by the pianist, is of the feeblest sort, and its presence in a Crystal Palace programme will suggest the famous simile of the fly in amber. Mr. Thomas Wingham's overture, "More Janua Vitæ," produced only fifteen days before at the Leeds Festival, was admirably played by Mr. Mann's orchestra. The remaining novelty was a brief selection from M. Massenet's new oratorio or "sacred legend," entitled "La Vierge," a composition which yet awaits a hearing, even in the land of its origin. The first piece, "The Last Sleep of the Virgin," which is scored for muted strings, and a solo violoncello unmuted, is sufficiently somnolent to justify its title; while the second, "A Galilean Dance," is almost throughout in a minor key, and is likely to create an impression that the fishermen of the Sea of Galilee were very doleful devotees of Terpsichore indeed. Mlle. Pyk's selection of "Casta Diva" for a Crystal Palace concert was not happy, and could she have been in the "connoisseurs' gallery" she would have noticed more than one well-known musician gravely twirling his fists in imitation of grinding a barrel organ. She succeeded far better in some Swedish songs, and she is indeed a vocalist worthy of better music. The great feature of the concert was, however, the performance of the C-minor symphony of Beethoven by the Crystal Palace orchestra under Mr. Manns.

The twenty-third season of the Monday Popular Concerts began at St. James' Hall on Monday last. This year Mr. Arthur Chappell has put forward no special prospectus, being content to simply announce the dates of the twenty-one evening and twenty morning concerts, well knowing that his supporters will be fully content with the good things he is likely to offer them. The institution of the Popular Concerts is probably unique. Started in 1859, by Messrs. Chappell & Co., mainly in order to utilize the then not very popular St. James' Hall, of which they, Messrs. Cramer, Beale, Chappell, and others, were shareholders, the chief attraction they were at first able to offer was cheap prices. Instead of the guinea reserved and half-guinea unreserved seats which then ruled, their prices were five shillings and a shilling. At first the programmes were of a miscellaneous sort, including ballads and drawing-room pieces, conducted by Sir Julius Benedict. The success of these concerts was comparatively trifling; and Mr. Arthur Chappell, at the suggestion of Mr. J. W. Davison, who was practically the founder of the Popular Concerts, resolved that the programmes should be exclusively classical. Two Beethoven nights, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Weber, and Mozart nights were arranged, and, after a struggle for existence, the concerts at last became popular. Their success completely revolutionized the old system of concert-giving; the old-fashioned guinea and half-guinea concerts were knocked on the head, and benefit concerts—which, at that time, where not only numerous but of considerable importance—received a blow from which they have never recovered. In short, it is to the Monday Popular Concerts that we primarily owe the popularizing of high-class music in this country; and, thanks mainly and at first to their influence, classical music ceased to be a mere luxury of the opulent, and was placed before the people. When once the demand became obvious, the supply was soon forthcoming. The directors of nearly all the serial concerts were compelled to reduce their prices; other enterprises started up; and the establishment of the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace gave further impetus to the cause of music in the metropolis. The Popular Concerts are now a highly valuable institution. Up to the present time upwards of 700 concerts have been given, attended by probably a million and a half of amateurs. The subscription-list must amount to three or four thousand pounds a season, and this is altogether apart from the support afforded by the great shilling public. The great orchestra is crowded by earnest amateurs, who often, when there is any special attraction, wait an hour at the doors in order to obtain a good place. The spectacle can hardly be equalled in Europe of a couple of thousand music-lovers assembled twice a week to listen to a programme uncompromising in its severity, and which is formed of string quartets, classical trios and duets, and piano and other sonatas, with nothing in the scheme lighter than a couple of classical songs.

The programme of the first Popular Concert contained no part for the violin, a fact which is so unusual that it may reasonably be noticed. The principal feature was the serenade in E-flat for wind, written by Mozart at Vienna in October, 1781, and therefore very nearly a century old. The parts for two oboes were, it is stated, subsequently added by Mozart to his first manuscript, which was for two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons only. The work is full of pure Mozartian melody, and the slow movement is especially beautiful. It was admirably played by Messrs. Dubruuc, Horton, Lazarus, Egerton, Mann, Standen, Wotton, and Haveron. Mlle. Janotha played the andante with variations in E-flat, Op. 82, of Mendelssohn, and afterwards, for an encore, the capriccio in E-minor, Op. 16, of the same master. Songs for Madame Koch Bosenberger, a violoncello sonata by Locatelli for Signor Piatti, and Beethoven's trio in E-flat, Op. 41, for piano, clarinet, and violoncello, were also in the programme.

BERLIN. As predicted, Suppé's Juanita did not hold possession of the bills long. It has made way for Lecoq's Petite Mademoiselle, re-named Die Feindin des Cardinals. It is said that the last new French fairy piece, L'Arbre de Noël, for which Lecoq has written some of the music, will shortly be performed at the Victoria Theatre. —Miss Emma Thursby made her first appearance here at a concert in the Sing Akademie on the 23d ult., and achieved a signal triumph. She was much admired and rapturously applauded in all her songs, but more especially in Mozart's "Mia Speranza adorata," her rendering of which was pronounced by every one exceptionally fine. She was supported by Mlle. Ottilie Lichtenfeld, Herren Gustav Holländer and Heinrich Grünfeld, all of whom afforded perfect satisfaction to a large and highly intelligent audience. —The first concert for the season of the Royal Domchor, or Cathedral Choir, took place on the 25th ult., when the programme included the double-chorus: "Fratres, ego enim," Palestrina; "Pecavi" for alto, tenor and bass, Caldara; "Misericordias Domini," Durante; "Dixit Maria ad Angelum," Hasler; and "Fürchte Dich nicht," J. S. Bach. The more modern compositions were a "Benedictus," R. Suco, and setting of the Twenty-Second Psalm, E. F. Richter. —The last annual report on the musical educational institutions in connection with the Royal Academy of Arts comprises the period from the 1st October, 1879, to the 1st October, 1880. There are, as most persons know, three such institutions: I. The High School, Section for Musical Composition, was attended during the winter-half by 30, and during the summer-half by 27 pupils; the masters are Herren Grell, Taubert, Kiel, and Bargiel. II. The Section for Executive Musical Art, for which there are 23 regular, and 13 extra masters, showed 237 pupils during the winter-half, and 218 during the summer-half. The number of amateurs taking part in the choral practice and performances was from 40 to 50. There were 5 public and 12 private performances. III. The Institute for Sacred Music, in which department Professors Haupt, Julius Schneider, Löschhorn, and Herr Ressel, Kammermusik, are the instructors, had 24 pupils, of whom 6 left at Easter; the normal number is 20.

"AIDA" AND ITS AUTHOR.¹

BY DR. EDWARD HANSLICK.

Aida is a remarkable, genuinely artistic, and, compared with Verdi's previous operas, a very surprising production. A careful perusal of the score reveals many musical beauties, which pass unnoticed at the first time of hearing the opera. The first impression is indeed favorable, and, according to the individuality of the hearer, more or less affecting; yet there is a mixture of displeasing and oppressive sensations. While we are charmed by certain delightful melodies, we are also pressed down as with an invisible hand by the fatal and gloomy character of the material and music. Pervading the entire music there is something unspeakably melancholy something like the subdued disconsolateness of Lenau's poetry. Then, too, the argument is unmercifully tragic. Aida, a prisoner, is in love with her captor. He returns her love, but is a victim to the fatal passion of the king's daughter, who finally succeeds in marrying him, knowing that his heart belongs to another. Everything, even from the beginning, sinks into ruin—a ruin, against which no successful effort from either side can be made. The poet fails to provide cheering lights or a friendly change of colors. Slowly and oppressively the horrible end of being buried alive is neared. The composer follows the subject with the truest devotion. He scorns any frivolous effect, and thus, by the powerful means of his music, greatly increases the bitter anguish of the poetry. True, Amneris is seen at first with happy nuptial musings; subsequently Aida and Rhadames for a moment contemplate flight and future happiness, but in neither instance is there a comforting expectation. So true is the music that, by listening to it, whatever consoling hopes may have arisen are at once dispelled. Even among these few green oases the coming disaster murmurs like a hidden fountain.

Completely filled with the fundamental character of the tragedy, Verdi does here, instinctively and unknowingly, what Gluck has done intentionally in the Iphigénie: the consciousness-stricken Orest talks of peace returning to his soul, but the turbulent accords whisper, "He lies!" Even the festival songs in Aida are permeated with tones of complaint. The triumphal march has indeed splendor, but no cheerfulness. Composer, as well as poet, has neglected too much the effects of contrast. Slow tempi and binary rhythms predominate in a striking degree. The first two acts have no triple measure, which first appears in the third act in two short andante passages, sung by Aida, and finally in the last act, in the duet between Amneris and Rhadames.

The almost unbroken elegiac treatment and the Egyptian costumes are the two chief defects which mar the effect of Aida, taken as a whole. The politics and religion, the oddities of dress and civilization of the ancient Egyptians are altogether too strange for us. We do not feel at ease among a lot of brown and black painted men. It may be urged that this is merely external, yet, for all, the spectator's sympathies are chilled, let the cause be the hideous idols, the colossal statues, or the various sacred beasts, which terrified even the Persians when they were conquered by the Egyptians. Think of nothing but dark-colored singers on the stage! Then, besides, the ugly, vaulting negroes and the dancing women dressed and painted in the most repulsive manner! An opera should present something of the lovely and agreeable, and no ethnological exactness can compensate for a total lack of beauty. It is also not pleasant to see continually so many priests and priestesses, and to witness nothing but Egyptian ceremonies.

Aida was composed by wish of the viceroy of Egypt, and was first performed in Cairo, in 1872. The treatment of Egyptian affairs was one of the chief conditions imposed. The subject-matter of the opera was originally written in prose by a learned Egyptian. Verdi has displayed great skill in giving his music the national coloring. In this he has been moderate and characteristic. The dances and temple songs have the peculiar, whimpering melody of the Orientals, with its predominant fourths and scanty sixths, its meagre harmony and simple, quaint orchestration. Two original Egyptian melodies are employed in the first finale: in the song of the priestesses with harp accompaniment, and in the dance melody in E-flat, performed with three flutes. A genuine master-hand is seen in the ingenious and charming handling of these two national motiven.

We have, now-a-days, plenty of foreign local coloring, but Verdi excels in his sense of musical beauty by which he assigns these peculiarities to their proper, i. e., to a subordinate place. He does not present the Orient to us with photographic accuracy, but gives us an idealization through the grace and richness of our modern western European harmony. Verdi, who hitherto has shown no liking for local musical colors, but always remained Italian in his music, shows in Aida, for the first time, that he is also master of this foreign-field. Yet, after all, the Egyptian garb in Aida hinders the full display of his talent. If he would use the same energy, the same creative faculty, and the same fidelity, now, in composing an opera from Roman material, and with variegated treatment, he would, without doubt, surpass Aida and all of his other former works.

All of Aida's outer, strange splendor is, however, of minor importance compared with the luxurious charm of its melodies, the dramatic force of its rhythm and the warm current of feeling which flows through the entire music. Think, for example, of Aida's beautiful and fervent, "And, my love, must I forget it?" of Amneris's splendid theme in D-flat, "No, you will live, joined to me in love"; of the touching, revealing close of the final duet, "Farewell, O earth!" and of many other similar passages.

It is remarkable and yet just that Aida, the latest production of a sexagenarian who has long since reached the height of his fame, should be praised chiefly on account of the progress the author has made. In truth, there are in Aida a dramatic faithfulness, an industry in the technical elaboration, and, more than all, a nobleness and unity of style, which, coming from the composer of Ernani, are indeed surprising. The German critic, who, as a rule, is almost hostile to Italian opera, is most happily set to rights by these superior features of Aida. Perhaps they force him to admit that a composer who now, in old age, reaps and deserves such praise certainly could not formerly have been entirely worthless, as some harsh critics have painted him for twenty-five years past. It may be said that in Aida Verdi has become another person completely, that his identity is lost; but this is an error which can be made only by those who do not know his former operas. Although he did not have the desired degree of culture and development, yet Verdi possessed great dramatic talent from the start, like many other of his celebrated and uncelebrated countrymen. While Rossini, the genial buffoon, clings to the historical customs of the Italians, of composing charming melodies for their own sake, regardless of their adaptation to the subject (so that even his serious operas, with the exception of Tell, are only concertante comedy music), Verdi, who has none of Rossini's grace and humor, has seldom composed a melody which lacked passionate, dramatic force. The criticism must be made on every one of Verdi's operas (and it has been done indefatigably) that a great deal of coarseness crops out near beautiful and affecting passages; yet justice requires that we direct our attention to the great dramatic talent and fertile creation which are manifested among these very crudities.

In Don Carlos and in Aida, Verdi has displayed the same artistic scrupulousness in returning to great simplicity and quiet expression. Discarding all outward considerations for the pretensions of the singers and for popular applause, he this time follows only his best and recently matured judgment. He has not thought of transient success alone, but of "immortality," as it is flatteringly called when a work has a relatively long life. In this latest production appear the passionate eloquence and dramatic power which characterize his previous operas,—artistically interwoven, refined, in a sort of æsthetic catharsis. Nevertheless, it is fully and genuinely Verdi. An imitation of Wagner, as many critics have asserted, is out of the question. True, Verdi, like every other modern operatic composer of intelligence, is indebted to Wagner for important innovations; but in Aida there is not a single measure which the Italian owes to the German. If Aida be called Wagnerish, so must also Gounod's Romeo and Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, because they depart from the old models, follow the words with more accuracy, give greater prominence to the orchestra, and adopt certain instrumental effects which have become customary since the production of Tannhäuser. Verdi, like Gounod and Thomas, has not refused, narrow-mindedly, to profit by the modern development of music. On the contrary, he has, without injury to his individuality (which indeed has been given long since a public stamp), made use of the best, or what for him were the most available features of those dramatic reforms which, foreshadowed or initiated by Weber and Meyerbeer, have been methodically carried on by Wagner. Besides, whenever Wagner's influence is manifested in an Italian or a Frenchman, it is only the influence of his earlier style, particularly that of Tannhäuser, which still passes for half orthodox. Of the distinct, later phase of Wagner's dramatic music, begun in Tristan, continued in the Meistersinger, and culminated in the Ring des Nibelungen,—of this colloquial, declamatory song about the endless melody of an insatiable orchestra, there is not the slightest trace either in Aida, or in any other Italian or French opera.

The expressive melody of the singing voices predominates over everything in Aida; the song does not follow so much the literal words as it does the significance of the situation; wherever dramatic continuity requires it, the form is freely handled, and this, too, by preserving the harmony between the romanza and the duets, trios, and recitatives. Dramatic law rules in the entire composition, like an invisible church, yet its visible head from beginning to end is musical beauty. In short, it affords pleasure to see how a man of Verdi's genial talents has produced such a beautiful opera, which has for its foundation the repulsive and dissolute customs of the Egyptians.

In the village of Busseto, duchy of Parma, Italy, Giuseppe Verdi was born, Oct. 9th, 1814. The local organist gave the boy his first musical instruction, which could hardly have gone beyond the most necessary rudiments. Verdi, when nineteen years old, felt the defectiveness of his musical schooling and was eager for better opportunities, such as are, as a rule, obtainable only in large cities. His family being poor, he was enabled to carry out his plans only through the generosity of a neighbor, Barezzi, and, in 1833 he went to Milan, but was refused admittance to the conservatory. The reason for his refusal (which has been bitterly enough repented of), has never been satisfactorily explained. Fétis, in his "Musical Lexicon," is of the opinion that the director of the conservatory, Francesco Basili, one of the last strictly schooled masters of the preceding century, saw nothing in Verdi's outer appearance to indicate a successful artistic future. "It is evident," adds Fétis, "that never was the physiognomy of a composer less a revealer of talent." Aside from the fact that a person's talent is not rated by his face, it seems to me that Verdi's physiognomy, in this respect, was most unjustly judged. It is sad, immovable, yet anything but expressionless or uninteresting. When I had the honor of forming his acquaintance in Her Majesty's Theatre London, a few years ago, his earnest, quiet (if not too amiable) manner made a favorable impression. However it may be, Verdi was not admitted to the conservatory; he was forced to be satisfied with the teachings of Lavigna, the leader of the theatre orchestra; but under this teacher's thoroughly practical guidance, and in spite of Maestro Basili, he soon realized enough from his music to buy a number of extensive and valuable estates in Busseto, where he now lives in the full employment of his good fortune.

His beautiful villa at Busseto, is known among the people as La villa del professore Verdi. Every peasant for miles around can direct the stranger to the charming chateau and tell whether Verdi is at home or not. Here the composer rests from his labors and triumphs. With a gun over his shoulder or a book in his hand he roams about, calling upon his numerous tenants and discussing with them the details of their work. Herr Escudier, Verdi's publisher and most enthusiastic admirer, has written a description of his country life. According to him, Verdi has as much knowledge of farming as of harmony (happy fields!) The farmers worship him and manifest their attachment in all sorts of ways. In the evening, when he and his wife walk out, the peasants assemble and welcome them with choruses from his operas. He seems to be constantly surrounded by fervent adoration. Two original types are his father-in-law and his valet. Papa Antonio can never hear of him or his music without crying, and he preserves as a sacred relic the first musical scribbles of his son-in-law. Love of music changed Servant Luigi's vocation from that of hackman. Verdi is "his god," and whoever delights in the productions of Rossini, Bellini, or Donizetti is to him "a cretin."

Verdi is at home in the literature of all nations, and is conversant with all the great political, social and scientific questions of the day. He was elected member of the Italian parliament simply as an "incomparable patriot," which seems all the more strange because he has never spoken a word in the chamber. Yet his name is not without political significance; the opposition party used it as a harmless mask in the form of an anagram. When the cry Vivi l'Italia! was stopped in Lombardy, Rome, Tuscany, and Naples, the people shouted Viva Verdi! The name of Verdi was indicated as follows:

Vittore Emanuele Rè d' Italia.

This mysterious inscription is still on the walls of many public buildings whose occupants have thought of nothing less than of Verdi and his operas.

OLE BULL.

[Translated from Aftenposten].

... Ole Borneman Bull was born in Bergen the 5th February, 1810, and was the son of Johan Storm Bull, an apothecary of Bergen, and his wife, Anna Dortha Bull, born Geelmuyden. Just at that time Bergen held a prominent social position. It had many good old families engaged in trade, with an inheritance of culture and a lively interest in intellectual and refined pleasure, and the social life of those days stood far above what the tradesmen's families of our time regard as the acme of convivial enjoyment. Their exuberant mirth might often break out in drinking songs, and ringing choruses, but it was in an amiable and harmless spirit, and always associated with a desire and an effort to devote their friendly gatherings to higher ends; private theatricals and musical entertainments belonged to the order of the day.

These two tastes were represented in both the Bull and Geelmuyden families, and especially was "Uncle Jens" (Geelmuyden) an ardent quartet man, at whose house Mozart's, Haydn's, and others' quartets were constantly well played. The little Ole Bull had inherited the talent, but he began in a modest way. When he was three or four years old he had to be satisfied with two chips, representing fiddle and bow, but on these he scraped indefatigably, as seated in a corner he hummed a tune. Uncle Jens thought the boy might have a little better violin, so he took out of his store a Nuremberg fiddle with "real strings," and on these the talented little fellow soon learned to coax the tunes he had heard others play.

His schooling did not amount to much, but he made progress in playing, and at seven and eight years old he enjoyed the honor of being present at Uncle Jens's to hear "the quartet."

It happened to be just his eighth birthday when he showed what he had been teaching himself in secret. The Quartet was assembled at Uncle Jens's, and the first violin, "Kammermusik" (Royal Musician) Poulsen had been drinking so much that he was not to be relied on. So Uncle Jens said in fun that Ole might play, and this he did, to the astonishment of all, so creditably, that the reward was a new violin from Uncle Jens.

Ole Bull still continued his self-instruction until 1822, when for the first time he had regular lessons from a clever Swedish violinist, Lundholm, who at that time came to settle in Bergen. He then made remarkable progress, and learned to play very difficult pieces.

At school he was an indifferent pupil, and when he came to Christiania in 1828, to pass his examination at the University, he was rejected on Latin composition—fortunately, we must add.

In the meantime, some musical occupation was found for him when Waldemar Trane, leader of the orchestra at the theatre, became so ill that it was necessary to put another in his place, and Ole Bull secured it. But now a stronger desire was aroused in him, the desire to become an artist, to come out in the world, to learn and hear and work with all his might. He must go to Spohr, who then stood first in the estimation of our musical circles.

The 19th of May, 1829, he started with very little money in his pocket, but all his artist's courage in his breast. He found Spohr, but it is easy to understand that two natures, so diametrically opposed, could find no attraction in each other. Spohr, a virtuoso and composer, strict, formal, classically severe in form, could not harmonize with the eccentric, bizarre, original Bull, and vice versa. After several fruitless attempts to accomplish something in Germany, he was obliged to return home again.

He made his next appearance as leader of the orchestra in Christiania, but in 1830 he went to Trondtjem and Bergen to give concerts, and in Bergen directed the "Harmony." By these means he earned money enough to set out on the longed-for journey to Paris.

Here his struggles began in earnest. No recommendations were of any avail, no one would help him, and we all know what it means to be living on scanty traveling funds. As a final blow, he was robbed of the last money he had, his violin, and everything except his clothes. It was difficult for him to obtain credit for his lodging, and he was exposed to annoyances of all kinds.

To this epoch in his life belongs the oft-told anecdote of how, just as he was casting longing eyes on the waters of the Seine, he was enticed into a gaming-house, where he put up his last five francs and won, but, owing to his indistinct pronunciation of the language, instead of five, he carried off a hundred francs.

His affairs were now at a standstill, when, by chance, he was heard by the Duke of Montebello in a drawing-room, where he was trying some manufacturer's violins. By the aid of the Duke's recommendation he was able to give a concert, and with the proceeds he started on a concerting tour which took him down into Italy. Here, at last, his star was to rise, and this episode deserves to be related in the words of Wergeland's Biography.

He had arrived in Bologna. Here the violinist, Beriot, and the singer, Malibran, were engaged for the season by the Philharmonic Society; but just before one of the concerts, both suddenly became "indisposed," on account of some uncertainty in regard to their salary.

This threw the director of the Philharmonic Society, Marchese di Zampieri, into the greatest perplexity. Just then, towards evening one day, the well-known singer, Madame Colbran, (afterwards married to Rossini), in passing by Casa Soldati, a low inn for soldiers, vetturini and muletters, heard through an open window some wonderful bars of music on an instrument which she did not seem to recognize. It was Bull. In his white-washed garret in this miserable inn, to which he had been driven two weeks earlier by the faithlessness of some one who had borrowed money of him, while the whole town was only talking of Beriot, Malibran and Colbran, he had written his first important composition, his "Concerto in A-major"; but, unacquainted with the rules of art necessary for its transference to paper, he was sitting by the open window playing over the airs. The singer stood listening a long time.

"It must be a violin; but a divine one. That makes up for Malibran and Beriot. Off to Zampieri."

In the evening near ten o'clock, when Bull, hungry and ill, had been in bed for a couple of hours, a knocking was heard at the door. "Cospetto di Bacco, what stairs!" It was Zampieri himself, the most musical of all Italy's nobili, renowned from Mont Cenis to Cape Spartivento. Bull must get up and improvise. He was the man for it! Leave Malibran to her migraine and goodness knows what. Not only was he dragged up, but off to the theatre at once with Zampieri, where he found a brilliant assembly, the Grand Duke of Tuscany himself, and Beriot, with his hand hypocritically bound up in a handkerchief. All were transported with Bull. He took his courage in his hands, and begged the ladies for subjects. The wife of Prince Carlo Poniatowsky gave him one from "Norma," two other ladies, one from "The Siege of Corinth," and one from "Capuletti and Montecchi." At the closing strains, he was covered with flowers by the enraptured ladies; Zampieri, Beriot, and the whole company complimented him. It was a trouvaile. He was to have the assistance of the whole company at a concert of his own, if he would first give his assistance at one already announced; the society would subscribe for sixty tickets. Emilio Loup, (a Swiss) who owned a large theatre, placed it at his disposal together with the orchestra, and one private individual alone took a hundred tickets. Ala ca ira! Now Fortune's wheel had turned. The Fates seemed to have reeled off their black threads and begun to spin new and shining ones. He played at the Society's concert, and gave one for himself at Loup's. After the latter he was complimented by a torch-light procession and appointed honorary member of the first class by the Philharmonic Society. Ca ira! This was only a beginning; it was Bull's real beginning.

From this time he went on with giant strides, giving concerts in numerous cities, until in 1835 he appeared at the opera in Paris. On this occasion a piquant feuilleton of Jules Janin effected miracles, as once before at Rachel's début at the Théâtre Français; and all the concert-halls in the country were now open to him. After marrying in Paris, Alexandrine Félicité Villeminot, to whom he had become engaged in his days of suffering, he started on his musical tours. First he visited England; afterwards, in 1837, Brussels, Hamburg, Lübeck, Schwerin, Königsberg, Riga, St. Petersburg and Moscow, and everywhere achieved a brilliant success. From Moscow he was called home by the news of his father's death. Passing through Finland, in whose principal towns he made his appearance, and Stockholm, where he was heard five times, he returned to Christiania in July, 1838. He was received by his countrymen with the enthusiasm and distinction to which he was entitled by the glory he had won for his native land. He did not remain long at home, but started on a new artist's journey, giving concerts in Denmark, in several cities of Germany, in Bohemia, Vienna, Paris, England, and Russia. In 1841, he took up his residence with his family at Valestrand, a paternal country-seat near Bergen, remaining there until the following summer, when he moved to Christiania, whence in 1842-1843 he made short musical tours to Denmark, Sweden, and Germany. From 1844 to 1846, he played in America, where, owing to his eccentricities as an artist, to which he there gave full rein, he reaped gold and laurels in abundance. Thence he proceeded to Paris, where, after the revolution of February, 1848, he gave a concert for the benefit of the wounded, and the same year he returned through Belgium to Norway. Here he gave many concerts under storms of applause, and in 1849, took under his protection the well-known Thorgeir Audunsson (the miller-boy), whom he assisted so far that he was able to give concerts in several towns.

At that time a new national life was unfolding through the presence among us of such artists as Tidemand, Gude and others, driven home by the disturbances abroad. The strong influence which our people in their daily lives and the colony of artists now settled among them exerted on each other, called forth an inspiration, which marks an era in the history of our art and literature, and it is no more to be wondered at that Ole Bull was affected by this revival, than that a man with his energy and world-wide reputation was compelled to find listeners to his ideas.

He had now become a wealthy man, and he wished to devote part of his fortune to the establishment of a Norwegian theatre. This plan he carried out in his native town of Bergen, where a national theatre was opened on the second of January, 1850, and called into existence such actors as Johannes Brun, Fru Brun, Fru Wolff and others.

He spent large sums of money on this enterprise, but fell into disputes with the authorities on the employment of the funds, for of course he had not the capacity for occupying himself with the details of such an institution, and consequently it soon found its way into other hands, but existed! And it cannot be denied that Ole Bull, by his energetic, patriotic grasp, laid the corner-stone of the national edifice we are now raising; for in the theatre of Bergen lay the germ, and thence proceeded the impulse to what has been accomplished in other respects for national dramatic art. Therefore Ole Bull's name will always be associated with the history of our theatre, and take its place among the most prominent names; for although his theatre was closed in the course of a few years, it lived in a new form in Christiania, and is now reopened in Bergen, where, however, they cling so strongly to all Danish traditions — spite of much external Norwegianism — that the very question of a national theatre becomes doubtful just where dramatic talent and other necessary conditions are most readily found.

After placing his theatre in other hands, Bull made a short professional journey to Denmark and Germany, after which, in 1852, he started for America, where he hoped to found a distinctly Norwegian colony ("Oleanna"). He purchased in Pennsylvania a large lot of land, of a man who did not own it, and as the business turned out unfortunately in other respects, he lost in it nearly all his fortune. In 1857 he returned to Norway.

In 1860 he again started on professional journeys to Sweden and Russia. In 1863 he labored, but without success, for the establishment of a Norwegian Academy of Music in Christiania. A couple of years later, after the death of his wife, he again went to America, and from this time made his home there, returning to spend the summers in his native land, where he owned a beautiful villa on Lysøen, near Bergen. A few years ago he married an American lady, Sara Thorpe.

As an artist, Ole Bull bore the stamp of his time, an era of virtuosi. Then all that was ingenious, piquant and eccentric, combined with melting harmony, was in high favor, and called forth a special execution. Taking this into consideration, Bull was the foremost of his time, and one could not but be carried away by his indisputable genius. But with the progress that has been made, other qualifications are now demanded. Paganini would certainly no longer awaken the same astonishment as when he was at the zenith of his fame. Execution has won still greater triumphs since those days, and such men as Joachim, Laub, Wilhelmj, Wieniawski and Sarasate are also in that respect the exponents of a far higher school of art than the Paganini, to which Ole Bull belongs. As regards Bull, perhaps the foundation of his art rested a little too much on self-instruction. In other respects, too, the times have changed. We demand now a deep insight into the thoughts of the composer, rather than a brilliant exhibition of individual genius. Ole Bull's repertoire was therefore quite different from that of the modern virtuoso. He played, for the most part, such pieces of his own and others as gave opportunity for a sort of instrumental fireworks, composed of enticing and bizarre conceits.

This the critic must say in the interests of truth and justice; but let us not forget that the artist too is "enfant de son siècle." If we keep this in mind, as well as the undreamed-of life to which his violin awakened Norwegian airs for us, and the brilliant genius with which it gave utterance to his virtues and his faults, our nation will always have a right to reckon him among its great men, among those richly-endowed natures who have shed a lustre on their native land.

His own compositions — apart from the few delicious airs we owe to his rich imagination — must for the most part be regarded as a sort of pot-pourri, freely treated. Bull was neither adapted by nature, nor theoretically educated to be a composer in the proper sense. His most important pieces are, "Norges Fjelde," "Concerto in A-major," "Polacca Guerriera," and "The Taran-tella." His study of the construction of the violin is well worth attention. Such men as Vuillaume listened to his opinions with profound interest, though they could not always find a place in the system of the practical instrument-maker; but it will surprise us if his idea for a new pianoforte, whose principles undoubtedly rest on the primary laws of acoustics, does not sometime win acknowledgment, though it may be carried out in another and better form than proposed by him.

Taken all in all, Ole Bull was a remarkably gifted man, an original and talented nature, with sun-spots, it may be, but likewise rays of dazzling brightness. Like many of his countrymen, he was too apt to rush heedlessly on, relying on "Providence" and his own genius to keep him up, and perhaps with too little faith in the great power of training in art; but this genius was really so rich, that it bore him up many a time when others would have been lost without the guidance of discipline.

One thing is certain; at the news of his death, only the picture of the brilliant and patriotic artist, always so zealous for the honor and reputation of Norway, stands before our minds, and a sympathetic chord is struck, wherever Norwegians are found. With all critical reservations, we cannot deny that Ole Bull's name and personality had grown together with our national consciousness.

Nor can we close these lines without expressing our joy that he died in his own land, and here his remains are laid.

On the last day of his life, as he opened his eyes in the morning, he stretched out his hands to heaven, exclaiming. "Min Gud, jeg takker dig!" ("My God, I thank Thee!") A short time after, when the physician informed him that his end was near, he took an affectionate farewell of those around him. They describe him as calm and composed in mind, although not quite without hope of recovery. He smiled to them as he looked at the roses and the heather in blossom, which they constantly brought him. As he felt death approaching, he expressed a wish to hear Mozart's Requiem, and listened with folded hands, while his wife played it through several times. As the notes died away, the change came over him which announces final dissolution. Ole Bull breathed his last on the 17th of August, at noon. On the 23d, he was buried in Bergen.

At seven o'clock in the morning, Ole Bull's family friends and other guests, among whom were the Governor of the district, the Burgomaster, etc., proceeded to Lysø, on the steamer "Kong Sverre." In the concert-hall, the rector of Fane and others, addressed their last thanks and farewell to the deceased, a simple and affecting ceremony. The casket, covered with flowers, among which lay a violin made of flowers and moss, by ladies of Bergen, was carried on board by peasants. The composer, Edward Grieg, bore the gold crown from San Francisco, and Dr. Danielsen the orders of the deceased. At "Krarven" the "Kong Sverre" was met by fourteen steamers, which escorted it in two lines to Molo. A salute was given from the steamers and fortress. At Nordnes Point, a grand procession of five thousand persons awaited them. At two o'clock in the afternoon, the steamer stopped at Holbergs Bridge, and, under minute-shots from the fortifications, the funeral cortège passed by the Svane apothecary-shop, Ole Bull's birthplace, which was magnificently draped in mourning, down across the market-place, by the bridge, through King Oscar's Street, to the cemetery, where Rector Walnum conducted the funeral ceremonies. These were followed by a speech from Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson, which we give below. Edward Grieg offered a laurel crown from Norwegian musicians, and Bendixen one from the National Theatre of Bergen. The weather was magnificent, and the procession of immense length. It was a solemn and affecting national fête, in which twenty thousand people joined. Flags draped with black were displayed over the whole bay and town. The people were all dressed in mourning, and steamers and boats by the hundred. The King sent a telegram expressive of his grief to the widow of Ole Bull.

Ole Bull left to the Bergen Museum his orders, set in diamonds, a silver music-stand, which had once been presented to him by the students of Moscow, and a Hardanger fiddle, to which he had been much attached.

[A translation of Bjørnson's speech at Ole Bull's funeral will follow in next number.]

Reference has hitherto been made to the overture, only as the introduction to an opera, oratorio or drama. The form and name have been, however, extensively applied during the present century to orchestral pieces intended merely for concert use, sometimes with no special purpose, in other instances bearing a specific title, indicating the composer's intention to illustrate some poetical or legendary subject. Formerly a symphony, or one movement therefrom, was entitled "Grand Overture," or "Overture" in the concert programme, according to whether the whole work or only a portion thereof was used. Thus, in the announcements of Salomon's London concerts (1791-4), Haydn's Symphonies, composed expressly for them, are generally so described. Among special examples of the overture, properly so called, composed for independent performance, are Beethoven's Weihe des Hauses, written for the inauguration of the Josephstadt Theatre in 1822; Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream Overture (intended at first for concert use only, and afterward supplemented by the exquisite stage music), and the same composer's Hebrides, *Calm Sea*² and Prosperous Voyage, and Melusine. These overtures of Mendelssohn's are, indeed, unparalleled in their kind. It is scarcely necessary here to comment on the wondrous Shakespearean prelude produced in the composer's boyhood, as a concert overture, and in after years associated with the charming incidental music to the drama, passages of the overture occurring in the final chorus of fairies, and thus giving unity to the whole; nor will musical readers require to be reminded of the rare poetic and dramatic imagination, or the exquisite skill by which the sombre romanticism of Scottish scenery, the contrasted suggestions of Goethe's poem, and the grace and passion of the Rhenish legend, are so happily illustrated in the other overtures referred to.

Schumann's overtures of this class — Bride of Messina, Festival Overture, Julius Cesar, Hermann and Dorothea — though all very interesting, are not very important; but in his Overture to Manfred he has left one work of the highest significance and power, which will always maintain its position in the first rank of orchestral music.³ As the prelude, not to an opera, but to the incidental music to Byron's tragedy, this composition does not exactly fall in with either of the classes we have given. It is, however, dramatic and romantic enough for any drama, and its second subject is a quotation from a passage which occurs in the piece itself.

Berlioz's overture Les Francs Juges, embodying the idea of the Vehmgericht, or secret tribunals of the Middle Ages, must not be omitted from our list, as a work of great length, great variety of ideas, and imposing effect.

The concert overtures of Sterndale Bennett belong to a similar high order of imaginative thought, as exemplified in the well-known overtures entitled Parisina, The Naiads, and The Wood Nymph, and that string of musical pearls, ³ But not a word about Genoveva? — Ed.

the Fantasia overture, illustrating passages from Paradise and the Peri. Benedict's overtures Der Prinz von Homburg and Tempest, Sullivan's In Memoriam (in the climax of which the organ is introduced), and Di Ballo (in dance rhythms), J. F. Barnett's Overture Symphonique, Cusins's Les Travailleurs de la Mer, Cowen's Festival Overture, Gadsby's Andromeda, Pierson's Faust and Romeo and Juliet, and many more, are all independent concert overtures.

The term has also been applied to original pieces for keyed instruments. Thus we have Bach's overture in the French style; Handel's overture in the first set of his Harpsichord Suites, and Mozart's imitation thereof among his pianoforte works. Each of these is the opening piece of a series. Beethoven has prefixed the word "Overtura" to the quartet piece which originally formed the Finale to his B-flat quartet (op. 131), but is now numbered separately as op. 133; but whether the term is meant to apply to the whole piece, or only to the twenty-seven bars which introduce the fugue, we have nothing to guide us.

IMPRESSIONS IN NEW YORK.

BOITO'S "MEFISTOFELE." — HERR HENSCHEL. — SARA BERNHARDT. — HOLMAN HUNT'S "SHADOW OF DEATH."

THE ISLAND, Dec. 10.

DEAR MR. DWIGHT:

The first production of Boito's opera "Mephistopheles" has been the most interesting event, so far, of the musical season in New York. It has proved attractive and successful, but not overwhelmingly so. A novelty was of course welcome amid the old and worn operatic repertoire, and the dramatic foundation — Goethe's "Faust" — of this novelty is a very popular one (in the high sense of popularity). But we may question whether Boito's manner of treating it has been such as to ensure lasting success for his work. It lacks the vital element of permanent success, originality. Originality, almost invariably a failure at first, almost as certainly succeeds at last. Boito's work was denounced, twelve years ago, at Milan, as "an innovation," and its author so discouraged that he half abandoned composition afterwards, having written (so far as we are aware), since that time, only one opera; had the judgment of his Milan critics been more liberal and enlightened, had they been able to discover in "Mephistopheles" talent endeavoring to free itself from the old-fashioned operatic traditions, but yet unconsciously entangled in the fetters of Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner, he might have felt encouraged to proceed on his career, and would have perhaps attained, ere now, to genuine originality.

In this work Boito has not aimed at dramatic unity or development; taking it for granted that every one knows the story of Faust, he has merely grouped together some salient points of the poem, and illustrates them by music, action, and spectacular display. The first part or prologue, Mephistopheles's wager with the Deity, is rather symphonic than dramatic, and has many fine points, though the orchestration is sometimes coarse. The music of the Easter Sunday scene is displeasing, noisy, trivial, with only a faint point of light in a rather pretty waltz. But even Auber has given the sense of the youth, freshness, out-door hopeful gayety of Easter Sunday better in certain now hackneyed choruses of Fra Diavolo. The larghetto sung by Faust on returning to his laboratory is good in its large, expressive phrases; better still is the following aria in which Mephistopheles declares himself as a spiritual and intellectual Nihilist. But the heart of the opera is to be found in the garden scene, fine from beginning to end, and rising to an ecstatic close. Again, in the Brocken scene, we have "highly intellectual music" (without heart, supernaturalness, awe-inspiring power). It is chiefly grotesque, though not without striking dramatic movements, as for instance, the sudden rush and prostration, and then the hush of the multitude before Mephistopheles. This scene offers many opportunities for spectacular display, but they are essentially theatrical, and not novel—the appearance of Margaret's fetch is exactly like that of the ghost of the mother of Max, in the Freischütz, and other effects are of the traditional ballet type. There is true music, again, in the prison scene, expressive and dramatic, with a lovely duet, softly murmured by the lovers, "Lontano, lontano," and the act is worked up to a fine climax. A soft, harmonious, illusive atmosphere, similar to that through which Corot enables us to behold his pictorial groups and scenes, breathes from the music of the fourth act; if not so lovely and serene as that of the Elysium illustrated by Gluck, it is still charming, and lovely are the flowing phrases sung by Helen and Pantalès. And yet, though this pleases our fancy, it touches us not; we feel too well that it is all but a dream. The epilogue, too, is wearisome; in spite of many fine points in it, we "assist" coldly at the struggle between good and evil beside the death-bed of Faust.

The opera is well presented on the whole. The central character is of course Mephistopheles, very well, if not ideally, represented by Novara; in Faust, Campanini was all that could be desired, but the part does not offer the same opportunities for dramatic passion as some of the characters he has become identified with, such as Lohengrin and Don José. The female characters are secondary in this opera; Margaret is a pretty, simple, pleasing, and ignorant peasant girl, a Margaret more true to the life, no doubt, than Gounod's ideal heroine; and Valleria was charming and altogether satisfactory in the part, which does not appear to call for the powers of a Nilsson, though Nilsson might invest it with a consequence it does not seem to possess. Miss Cary, too, was more than excellent as Martha and Pantalès. On the whole, the opera seems to have awakened two sets of impressions after a few hearings of it; one class of people says, "yes, it is very clever, yet rather wearisome, though showy; but it is cold, and, do you think it is music?" The second says, "Boito is not a prophet, but one of the most gifted followers of the modern school."

The other, and finer Faust, that of Berlioz, is renewing its tremendous success of last season, under the scholarly and enthusiastic leadership of Dr. Damrosch. The part of Mephistopheles having been found, on the first performance, unsuited [!] to Mr. Henschel, has been resumed by Mr. Remmert, who so finely sustained it last year, with a fire and a power exceeding that displayed by him, perhaps, in anything else he has done. In his recitals, Mr. Henschel will doubtless justify the great reputation that preceded him, though he has not fulfilled expectation in his Elijah or Mephistopheles, perhaps only because expectation was too highly wrought. In Elijah, very finely performed by the Oratorio Society under Dr. Damrosch, Mr. Henschel proved himself a highly intelligent singer, a thorough musician; but his vocal method is deficient, and he lacks both mellow charm and rough power, of voice. Both power and charm are heard in Miss Drasdil's fine and well-trained organ, hence her success in the contralto music of Elijah was greater than that of Henschel in the part of the prophet. And yet, when we listen to Henschel, we feel how dependable, intelligent, satisfactory he is, and that he does his conscientious best, which is very thorough workmanship. We wait for his Lied singing, to decide whether he possesses the power of touching, charming, transporting the listener.

Who shall dare to say that no one cares for art in New York? Immense audiences crowd to Mephistopheles, Berlioz's Faust, Mendelssohn's Elijah; yet audiences as immense crowd to see and hear Mlle. Bernhardt, especially at her matinées, where ladies throng by hundreds and thousands, many to find no place at all, many satisfied to stand through the entire performance. She has proved at great success; a first a swift disappointment, at last, a slow surprise. A disappointment, because many people, unfamiliar with the progress of dramatic art in France during the past ten years, and uninterested in following up its manifestations, have not become acquainted, by report, with Mlle. Bernhardt's peculiar style of art, and have therefore expected something different—a grand, classic tragedienne, in the large, broad style; and she has since proved to these very people a gradual surprise, as they slowly learned to admire and to appreciate—not the qualities they expected, but different ones, which do not startle, but grow upon us. Grandeur, repose, the overwhelming emotion that springs from the depths of a noble heart, the elevated, imaginative power born of the fervor of a noble brain, the pathos of unconscious innocence, the impulse of unselfish feeling—these find no adequate representation in the art of Mlle. Bernhardt; hers is not outdoor, it is indoor feeling, passion, thought. But in the expression of this she is supreme, especially when it is displayed in such a character as that of Blanche de Chelles—as Lord Astley says: "One of those women, interesting products of our excessive civilization, who are born ripe, so to say; who, in consequence of erroneous education, are tired of life before they have lived, and for whom the forbidden fruit, even before they have tasted it, has no attraction, unless, indeed, it is made attractive by the addition of some extraordinary flavor."

For Mlle. Bernhardt, being, in herself, and in her art, unique, shows at her best in characters of a somewhat abnormal type, such as Blanche in Le Sphinx. On seeing her at first in such a part, one that is to a certain degree repulsive and unwomanly, because heartless, one instinct with feverish and morbid, not genuine, passion, we are apt to ascribe the limited effect of the character to the actress's limited powers, especially when the tragic end of Mme. de Chelles strikes us, not with pity and pathos, but only with horror; but after we have witnessed other impersonations, we render justice to her varied conception of characters alike in their type, and to the refined art, the absence of exaggeration that withholds Mlle. Bernhardt from introducing other colors into each of her performances than those that properly belong to each. She has pathos, passion, tenderness, but of a nature peculiar not only to the singular types of modern French life,—Frou-Frou, Camille, Mme. de Chelles,—which she best represents, but also apparently peculiar to herself. Within such a range of characters she is perfect; varied even in her mannerisms, natural in all that is abnormal, sparkling with vitality, truth itself in her delineation of what is, nevertheless, untrue. She is a complete representative of a certain type of womanhood, typical of the ideas and actions of an entire class of society, to be found, under modified conditions, not only in aristocratic French society, but in every country of the civilized world. Such characters are not original and expansive, they are individual and concentrated. And concentration and individuality are the qualities that most impress us in Mlle.

Bernhardt's acting. She pleases, she charms, she entertains, she thrills us, and she fascinates; but she cannot profoundly touch or attract, absorb or overwhelm us.

She is very pretty on the stage; more so than we had been led to expect. Does the subtle Sarah, with fine coquetry, cause the accounts of her thinness and plainness to be spread abroad, in order the more pleasantly to surprise those who see her for the first time? Miss Cushman is reported to have said that she was spared one of the greatest obstacles to success, one of the greatest trials that ever befall an actress—beauty. Mlle. Bernhardt, no doubt something of a cynic, doubtless understands that enthusiastic laudation of an actress's beauty lays her open to the danger of making at least half her own sex her enemies before they see her. In movement, gesture, attitude, she is all grace,—supple, natural; and although her toilets are rich to an extreme, her refined and delicate taste, her artistic temperament may be traced even in their slightest details. I have not seen her yet in the romantic and classic dramas of her répertoire: Adrienne, Hernani, Phèdre. Can she satisfactorily render the large, the generous passions? Hers is intensity; not breadth, depth, height; still less does she embody romance and ideal poesy, though she is ideal in her way.

The same elements of prettiness, grace, fineness, limited harmony, may be traced in her pictures, as in her acting; but these are rather the work of a highly accomplished amateur than of an artist forced to express her nature in this branch of art by irresistible vocation. Her sculpture displays more power. The bust of Emile de Girardin is ruthlessly life-like; a head of a young girl, with a foulard tied over the brows, charming; the "Ophelia" is largely modelled, full of poetry in conception; and she has displayed a grotesque and brave spirit of irony and finesse in the bronze inkstand, surmounted by her own bust, from the shoulders of which fantastic, demoniac wings start, while she has tipped her fingers with griffins' claws. In all Mlle. Bernhardt's female heads a likeness to herself, more or less pronounced, may be traced; indeed, one or two of these pictures resemble her more than her photographs, which do not render her justice. The likeness is doubtless involuntary. Every painter insensibly reproduces the type of his own race, or that of people about him, even in his delineations of foreign types.

From Sarah Bernhardt's "Griffon" to Holman Hunt's "Shadow of Death," is a long step up; yet here we detect the same peculiarity. Every race looks out of its eyes in a manner that belongs to itself, and Hunt's Christ, in this picture, looks out of his eyes, not as an Oriental, but as an Englishman does; and this in spite of the fact that Hunt sought a model for years in the East, before he found one to satisfy him. This picture has been very severely criticized here; was that the reason why I was agreeably disappointed in it? Yet I am not an admirer of Hunt. But I am sure that many, while blaming the excess of detail, wonderfully painted, though inharmonious, have nevertheless been carried away by that, to such an extent that they have overlooked or become blind to the purpose and very soul of the picture, the touching pathos and ideality of the face, which renders the shadow of the cross a secondary effect, and ennobles such pictorial trickery in that as may be displeasing to a fastidious taste. FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

LEISURE.—The date of the fifth Gewandhaus Concert coincided with the anniversary of Mendelssohn's death, and the programme was devoted entirely to works from his pen. They were Psalm 98, Symphony in A-major, hymn for soprano, chorus, and orchestra, overture to La Belle Méusine, "Ave Maria," and fragments from the unfinished opera of Loreley. At the sixth concert Herr Leschetizky, the pianist, performed Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C-minor; Ballad in A-flat major (Chopin); Gavotte and Variations (Rameau). The instrumental pieces were Cherubini's overture to Anacreon; symphony (No. 4, B-flat major) and the third Leonore overture (Beethoven).

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1880.

ANOTHER YEAR! The present number completes the Fortieth Volume and the twenty-ninth year of this most long-lived of the many musical journals of America. A Title-Page and Index for the past two volumes (to be bound in one) will be furnished in a few weeks.

Vol. XLI will begin with the number for January 1, 1881; and now is the time for the renewal of the annual subscriptions, and for the coming in of new subscribers, of whom we hope there will be many. Our Journal needs them,—always needed them; for, in spite of all that has always been said in its praise, in spite of the splendid "testimonial" just tendered to its editor, so warmly and so widely, this journal never yet has been remunerative. The recognition and reward came last week in another shape, one unmistakably heartfelt, and most generous, most beautiful, most gratifying; it was well worth waiting for! But may we not regard it also as a token of renewed interest in the old DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,—the promise of a wider rally of appreciative friends to its support, and its improvement, through the humdrum cheaper way of regular annual subscription, as well as advertising patronage? Double its subscription list, and you increase its advertising columns, and then there will be no need of "testimonials" except in the harmless way of compliment and flattering approval.

THE TESTIMONIAL CONCERT.

In timely aid of the above New Year's announcement, comes this unexpected, to us almost overwhelming endorsement of our Journal and our well-meant, if not always wise or efficient, labors in behalf of music, on the part of a committee of citizens which we have already characterized as "largely representative of the best elements of the musical profession, of the best and wisest friends of music, as well as of the honored names of dear old Boston." And their appeal was instantly and heartily responded to on all sides. Greetings and warmest signs of recognition, kindest notes of sympathy (often from most unexpected quarters), prompt, enthusiastic offers of musical service in any concert that might be arranged, poured in upon the Editor, who all at once found himself the object of unusual attention, and in danger of developing (but that he is too old for that) a most enormous egotism. Hand and heart were offered wherever he met an old acquaintance; everybody seemed full of the bright idea that had struck somebody just "in the nick of time." We never knew we had so many friends; and some, whom we had supposed, if not to be our enemies, yet to look askance upon our labors, suddenly threw off the disguise and shone among the foremost and the friendliest, who through the press, as well as by voice and pen in private, created an interest in others, and helped to organize the plan so beautifully realized on Thursday of last week. It gave us a better opinion of human nature,—not that we ever entertained a very poor one; we never did, and never can, base our feeling of the worth and the significance of music, as a certain great musical "reformer" does in his essay on Beethoven, upon the theories of a pessimistic metaphysician.

For such a testimonial, so sincere and hearty in the inception, so admirably prepared, with such consummate tact and delicacy, so beautiful, resplendent in the full flower, the concert, and so fraught with solid tokens of esteem and friendship, we can hardly trust ourself to find fit words of thanks. We accept it both with pride and with humility, for it is a formidable thought to us that we seem now more than ever bound to go on trying (perhaps in vain) to perform any service that shall in any degree vindicate the faith which hosts of friends have in this touching way reposed in us.

But leaving all we wished to say to be imagined, as it readily will be in a musical and social atmosphere so sympathetic as this in which we just now have the happiness to live and move and have our being (although it seems like passive dreaming), let us come at once to the concert itself, which was in every way a signal, memorable success, and which we flatter ourself we could and did appreciate about as keenly as any other man or woman in that great and really distinguished audience. Both programme and performance were of so exceptionally fine a character as to claim special mention among the many good things we have heard, or shall hear this winter. Never was a finer programme, either intrinsically or in its fitness for the occasion, presented in Boston; never a more conscientious con amore rendering; seldom one with finer means, and all by artists who had kindly, eagerly offered their coöperation freely, including the orchestra of the Harvard Symphony Concerts, with Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann, violin leader, besides a small army of our best vocalists, pianists, violinists,—more than could possibly find place in a single concert, making the task of the programme committee a delicate one indeed. Here is the programme in full, for it is worth preserving:—

Fifth Symphony, in C-minor, Op. 67, Beethoven
Allegro, Andante, Scherzo and Finale (Triumphal March).

Twenty-Third Psalm, "The Lord is My Shepherd," Schubert

Four-part chorus for female voices.
Sung by a volunteer choir, including members of the "Boylston" and "Cecilia" Clubs.
Under the direction of Mr. George L. Osgood.
Concerto in C, for three pianos, with string orchestra,
J. S. Bach

Allegro, Adagio, Fugue.
Messrs. J. C. D. Parker, Arthur Foote and John A. Preston.

Concert-Stueck, in G, for piano and orchestra, Op. 92, Schumann

Introduction, and Allegro Appassionato.
Mr. B. J. Lang.

Quartet (Canon), from "Fidelio," Beethoven
Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Miss Edith Abell, Mr. Charles R. Adams and Mr. John F. Finch.

Overture: "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," Mendelssohn

Illustrating Goethe's poem: 1. "Beckalmed at Sea";
2. "A Breeze and a Prosperous Voyage."

What so fit for the occasion, what so worthy, as the glorious old Fifth Symphony?—as glorious now, and full of meaning in the musical history of Boston, as it was in the year of its first performances in the old Academy concerts given in the Odeon (Federal Street theatre) in 1841. To the present writer it gave as it were the keynote—rather say the "normal pitch"—to his whole musical life. Of musical Art in Boston, it will ever stand the corner-stone, though The Messiah and the old Oratorio Society laid the earlier foundations. To us, and to many in the Music Hall, it had a deep significance, for never was a higher standard set than that had set for all of us from the first day of our interest in great orchestral music. How we all waited for the four opening notes, the pregnant motive! and how all the old miracle revived with a new charm and freshness as the work once more developed! Never did that symphony ring out more inspiringly, more full of meaning. The great life-struggle typified in the Allegro; the heavenly encouragement and exhortation of the wonderful Andante; the nerving of the heroic, restless soul for action, with the superhuman effort of the double basses, in the Scherzo; and finally the broad, sublime triumphal march,—grandest march ever written or conceived,—a march as of ranks of solar systems sweeping in vast majestic circles round the inmost central Sun invisible!—all was played vom Herzen aus, as if every member of the band felt it, meant it. You noted that cadenza for the oboe played so charmingly by Mr. de Ribas, in the middle of the first movement: did it not sound precisely as it did when he played it the first time in 1841, and as he has played it ever since? Yes, the fifth Symphony was indispensable and all-rewarding in that concert.

Then,—what more fit again?—that chorus of sweet, fresh, flexible, pure angel voices, singing of trust in the Lord! When have we heard a female chorus sung more exquisitely than that was by fifty ladies of the Cecilia and Boylston Clubs, reinforced by many of our best solo singers? Then, in that Concerto for three pianos, the cheering and invigorating influence, the strong handshake as it were, of old Sebastian Bach, the healthy, hearty, genial, pious, profound master of masters in the tone-art, who, every time we hear him, seems to hold the whole history and world of music in the hollow of his hand! Thanks for that selection, and for the zeal and the effect with which it was interpreted! Thanks, too, for the exquisite, the delicately imaginative, poetic concert piece of Schumann, in which Mr. Lang seemed at his best. (And thanks for other contributions of the same fine order warmly offered, but not found practicable in the programme!)

Then the wonderful Quartet (in canon) from Fidelio, by which the audience were so carried away that it had to be repeated. It may be easily imagined that the opening words: "Mir ist's so wunderbar!" chimed fully with the feeling of the wondering chief listener on that occasion; he will not soon outlive the wonderment of the whole situation in which that testimonial placed him.

Finally, for the parting God-speed, that overture of Mendelssohn which so graphically illustrates the two contrasted scenes of Goethe's little poem (also set by Beethoven for voices): 1. A dead calm in mid ocean,—no breath, no motion,—weary, helpless, almost hopeless; 2, the springing up of a breeze, the boatswain's whistle (flute), the swinging round of the great sails, and away the good ship bounds, until she comes in triumph into port with flying colors and salute of guns and trumpets. Surely the allusion there was understood, for the orchestra played it splendidly and with enthusiasm.

Now, was not that a concert to be remembered all one's life? Handel said that, while composing the Messiah, he "knew not whether he was in the body or out of the body." We may not say so much; but we can say, that when the thought came over us: "Why! all this is for us!" we could hardly tell whether it were real or a dream. And now reserving special thanks to all and several, who have been so philanthropically moved to cheer our path fast nearing to its end, we must conclude this long-winded acknowledgment, to save a little room for notice due to other concerts and to other matters.

CONCERT REVIEW.

A few brief notes upon the concerts of the past three weeks is all we can afford in our contracted space. And first the concerts of the APOLLO CLUB, Music Hall, Nov. 26 and 29. We never heard those seventy men sing better; and we were struck by the remarkable preservation of their voices, many of them being original members, veterans in the service. Rich, sweet, manly quality of tone, large, generous volume, admirably blending of the voices in a grand organ-like ensemble, combined with rare unity, precision, light and shade in producing a fine impression. The selections were comparatively short pieces. Gernsheim's "Salamis" for baritone solo (Dr. Bullard) and chorus, has something of the solemnity and classic dignity of Mendelssohn's choruses to the Antigone, etc. The harmony is full and strong, and the work grows fervid and interesting as it goes on. Rheinberger's Roundelay: "Awake, ye lords and ladies gay!" is a rich and dainty piece of coloring, full of life and charm.

This was followed by a Serenade by Widor, for a peculiar combination of instruments: piano (Mr. Arthur Foote), violin (Mr. C. N. Allen), 'cello (Mr. Wulf Fries), flute (Mr. Rietzel), and organ-harmonium (Mr. S. B. Whitney). It is a light, fresh, delicate and graceful work, not without poetic charm, and the effect was unique and pleasing:—a nice sort of music, we should think, for fairs and floral festivals. A Serenade by Tours, with baritone solo (finely sung by Mr. J. F. Winch); Horsley's "By Celia's arbor," beautifully rendered by Mr. Want, Mr. Allen A. Brown, Dr. Bullard, and Mr. Aiken; and Sullivan's "The Beleaguered," a brilliant, vigorous chorus in march rhythm, filled out the first part agreeably.

Part second contained Dudley Buck's setting of Longfellow's "Nun of Nidaros," for tenor solo (Mr. Want) and chorus, with accompaniment of piano and harmonium; "The Young Lover," by Koschat, which was encored; Handel's Polyphemus Song: "O ruddier than the cherry," superbly sung by Mr. John Winch, with masterly accompaniment by the conductor of the Apollo, Mr. B. J. Lang; a couple of 'cello solos played by Mr. Fries (Nocturne, by Lachner, and Gavotte, by Popper); and, for a popular finale, the "Champagne" part-song by Schroeter. — The usual repetition of this programme, with change of instrumental pieces, a few evenings later, we did not hear.

The next Apollo concerts are announced far ahead,—the 4th and 9th of February. Max Bruch's "Frithjof," for soprano and baritone solos, male chorus, and orchestra, will then be given entire for the first time in Boston.

—Nov. 30. Mr. LANG gave his third presentation of the Damnation de Faust, this time at the Tremont Temple; and it must be admitted that all the details of the music, all its greatest and its least effects, came out with a remarkable distinctness, and with satisfactory intensity of sound. It was an even better rendering, under, in some sense, better acoustical conditions, than the two before. The work, with all its strangeness, has certainly grown popular. Even its most diabolical suggestions and infernal pictures such as "the Ride to Hell," are far less bizarre, do far less violence to all sense of beauty and of harmony, than the atrocious finale to the same morbid, madcap composer's Symphonic Fantastique. And it has romantic beauties of a very high order and originality. The choruses, both male and female, were most beautifully rendered; even the rollicking refrains of soldiers and of students, so difficult in their combination, were successfully given. Miss Lillian Bailey again sang the part of Marguerite with her wonted purity and truth and tenderness of voice and feeling. Herr Henschel confirmed the first fine impression of his characteristic, intellectual, subtle and dramatic rendering of the rôle of Mephistopheles. If his voice, in the lower range, is not altogether pleasing, nor of great weight and power, that is made up for by the fine imaginative conception, and the certainty of power with which he enters into the spirit of the part, and by his admirably artistic style and execution. He was enthusiastically encored after the Serenade. The tenor part of Faust was this time entrusted to Mr. Julius Jordan, to whom we listened with great satisfaction throughout. He is a very intelligent and conscientious singer; evidently understands himself, his means and his task perfectly; and, if his voice is not remarkable for beauty or for power, it is nevertheless a good voice, always kept well in hand, and equal to the work. He sustained himself with no flaw or flagging to the end, and he is plainly one of those reliable and useful tenors whom it would be a gain for us to have here. Mr. Hay was again successful in the one thankless little song of Brander (the "Rat"). The orchestra was remarkably complete and satisfactory, from violins, oboes and bassoons, to cymbals, gong, and all the kitchen utensils. The Racoekzy March created a furore.

Now, apropos of the Damnation, we are tempted to insert just here, for better or for worse, and open to approval or protest from any one, the following letter which we have received:

MR. EDITOR: The recent production and favorable reception in this city of a certain work of Hector Berlioz, in which that writer, by means of a hotel gong and other unmusical instruments, seems to attempt to sever music from its traditional sphere of the emotions and couple it with that of the nerves, leads one to inquire in what direction modern musical taste is drifting. Of course, we look to the programmes of our miscellaneous concerts for the true index of feeling on this subject. Of these programmes I have before me that of the Second Symphony Concert of the Harvard Musical Association; one as severe in its character as any we see. It consists of five numbers: the first by Haydn, the next three by Liszt, Saint-Saëns, and Chopin; the last going back far enough to include the name of Weber. Turning to the programmes of our piano recitals, we find them headed by something of Mendelssohn's (possibly a Beethoven sonata) and the rest all Rubinstein, Liszt, Gade, etc., etc. The same plan holds true especially in our Chamber concerts; the sentiment of all seeming to be to apologize, by means of something from an eighteenth century composer, for a string of things by composers, most of whom are living. Not that the new things are not, some of them, very good indeed; but in the rage for the latest novelty, some very indifferent things creep in.

I asked, the other day, one of our most prominent pianists and musicians, why Haydn and Mozart are never played in public by our pianists; to which he replied, that they only wrote for a piano with five octaves; as if anything written in that compass was not worthy to be played; or, as if the octave at each extremity of the keyboard of our modern pianoforte contained the essential notes of a good composition for that instrument. Might we not as well discard Bach's organ music because his instrument might not have had a vox-humana stop, or a crescendo pedal?

I am not one of those who would continually advocate "the old masters," to the exclusion of our modern composers, from whose pens we certainly have an immense amount of remarkable, and a considerable amount of good music; still there are a great many old things that would be new to a Boston audience; and until these are exhausted, why act as if the newest in point of years must be the youngest in all respects?

With an apology for the hasty way in which these thoughts are expressed, but with no apology (if you please) for the thoughts themselves, I remain,

Very Truly, GEO. C. COLLINS.

MEDFORD, MASS., Nov. 30.

—EUTERPE, Dec. 1. The first Chamber Concert of the third season was given in the new Meionnon (Tremont Temple), before a large, appreciative and sociable looking audience; for the seats were disposed in hollow square, the platform in the middle. It all looked genial and cosy; and the hall proved very good for sound, although there was some sense of roughness in strong violin passages, which may have been partly owing to the too frank and unparing acoustics of walls still fresh and crude. The programme consisted of two string quartets: the fine one in E-flat, (No. 1) by Cherubini, which was played last season, with its larghetto and most interesting variations; and the one in E-minor (Op. 44, No. 2), by Mendelssohn, composed in 1837, which has all the Mendelssohnian elements, especially the fairy vein, and to the beauties of which the modern ears of the majority appeared more keenly sensitive than to the work of Cherubini. The interpreters were the Listemann Quartet, consisting of Bernhard and Fritz Listemann, John Mullaly and Alexander Heindl,—all superior artists. — Next time (January 5) the Beethoven Club will take its turn, when an original quartet (No. 2) by Mr. Chadwick will get its first hearing here, to be followed by the Posthumous Quartet in D-minor, by Schubert.

—The Tribute to WULF FRIES, suggested and arranged by a number of the most musical ladies of Boston, Brookline, Cambridge, etc., in whose families this favorite artist had been for years esteemed and loved as teacher and companion in the parlor practice of classical trio and sonata music, took the form of a beautiful Chamber Concert at Horticultural Hall, on Saturday evening, Dec. 4. The audience was very large and sympathetic, the programme very rich and choice, and the interpretation excellent throughout, for all the artists took part with the heartiest good will. It was a genial, cheerful, beautiful and sweet occasion,—yet with one shadow cast upon it by the absence and the mortal illness of one of the ladies who was first inspired with the idea of such a tribute, and whose whole heart was in the work,—a bright spirit, full of musical enthusiasm, and one of the finest amateur pianists in our city, whose death occurred, sad loss to music and to hosts of friends, upon the very day of that other "testimonial,"—a shadow felt, too, even there!—We can only place the programme here on record; the Quartet and Quintet were performed by the Beethoven Club, (Messrs. Allen, Dannreuther, Heindl, and Wulf Fries):—

Quartet, No. 1, in E-flat, Cherubini
Song—"The Message," Blumenthal
Mr. W. J. Winch.

Variations for two Pianos (Op. 35) on the Minuet from the Beethoven Sonata, Op. 31, No. 3. St. Saëns
Mr. Lang and Mr. Foote.

Songs, with Violin Obligato, Op. 10, Oscar Weil
{ a. Autumn,
b. Spring.
Mrs. Allen.

Concerto for 'Cello, Op. 7, Svendsen
Allegro—Andante—Finale,
Mr. Wulf Fries.

Duet—"Oh Flower of the Verdant Lea," from the Cantata of Rebecca, Barnby
Mrs. Allen and Mr. Winch.

Quintet, for Piano and Strings, Op. 44, Schumann

—Here we must pause, leaving two Harvard Symphony concerts, two of the Philharmonic, one of the Cecilia, etc., for future notice. Fortunately, Christmas comes, and there will be a week or two of clear field not much competed for by concert-givers, so that we can turn our thoughts to things past, undisturbed by the rush of new things passing.

—One event, however, will be the annual performance of The Messiah, by the Handel and Haydn Society, on Sunday evening, Dec. 26. The solos will be sung by Mrs. H. M. Knowles, soprano; Miss Drasdil, contralto; Mr. W. C. Tower, tenor; and Mr. George Henschel, baritone.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 29. The concert season at the Peabody Conservatory has opened with the so-called students' concerts, that is, concerts of chamber music given every Saturday evening as part of the course of instruction for students of the conservatory. Thus far four of these concerts have taken place, and the programmes have included the following works:

String-Quartet, D-major, No. 21, Mozart
Serenade, D-major, work 8, for violin, viola and 'cello, Beethoven
Piano Trio, C-minor, No. 2, work 66, Mendelssohn
String-Quartet, E-minor, work 47, No. 1, Rubinstein
Piano-Quartet, E-flat, work 47, R. Schumann
String-Quartet, A-minor, work 1, Svendsen
Suite, A-minor, work 66, for violin and piano,
J. P. E. Hartmann

Also, some songs by Schubert, Liszt and Wagner. The string-quartet is composed, as last year, of Messrs. Allen, Fincke, Schaefer, and Jungnickel.

The number of symphony concerts has not yet been definitely decided on; but the prospects are very bright for at least five concerts during the winter. Mr. Asger Hamerik, the director, is engaged on the finale of his first symphony, which, however, will probably not be performed here until next season.

In the way of vocal instruction, there is quite a novelty to chronicle in the opening last month, by Prof. Fritz Fincke, of the Peabody Conservatory, of a private school for the training of young female voices, from the ages of 7 to 16 years, principally for the purpose of obtaining good material for future choruses. The general plan for instruction is proposed to be as follows:

1. Careful directions as to the correct use of the voice, and especially the artistic treatment of the much abused head-voice; solo and chorus singing.
2. Exercises for the ear, and in connection therewith lessons in intervals and chords, as also systematic practice in time-keeping.
3. Instruction in the history of music in order to encourage thought on musical topics. Biographical sketches of the most important authorities, and explanations of the different musical styles, by means of practical illustrations.

The idea is a novel one for Baltimore, and the beneficial influences which such an undertaking, if continued in the proper spirit, must in time exert, are certainly sufficient to commend it to all friends of vocal culture in general, and of good chorus music in particular. Moreover, it is always a matter of satisfaction to find an earnest laborer in the fields of art, with objects above and beyond the expectation of immediate returns for his efforts, sowing where others besides himself may reap. From the very outset, I am happy to say, the school has met with every encouragement.

Of the choral works practised in our city at present, the only ones deserving special attention are Judas Maccabeus and Eljah.

CHICAGO, Dec. 10. Our musical season may now be announced as fairly begun, for we have had two important concerts by the Apollo Club, a number of representations of English Opera by the Strakosch and Hess Company, and no end of small entertainments. On Monday evening the Apollo Club gave Handel's Acis and Galatea, and the Spring and Summer of Haydn's Seasons. The solos were given by Miss Fannie Kellogg, Mr. M. W. Whitney, Mr. Fritch, and Dr. C. T. Barnes. I only heard Acis and Galatea, as I was called to the opera during the remainder of the evening. The work may only be said to have been fairly performed, for there were many drawbacks. Tuesday the Club gave another concert, bringing out Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," for the first time in this country, Mr. Whitney, Mr. Fritch, and Mr. McWade taking the solo parts. The orchestra numbered forty men, the chorus one hundred and fifty, and there was the added aid of the organ. Any musician, who has studied the full score, would at once be forced to admit that, for a complete performance, the force we had engaged was inadequate. A double, and even treble chorus is required, while the orchestral demands are very great, and the solo numbers must be in very safe hands to enable the work to be fairly heard. It will be remembered that Mr. Thomas intended to produce this work at the last Festival at Cincinnati, but for some reason it was not given. I followed the work very carefully, score in hand, and endeavored to see its full possibilities. When it is entrusted to a larger number of singers, and a more complete orchestra, I have no doubt that the work would impress one with a feeling of grandeur. The subject is hardly one to excite great interest, for modern research has rather unsettled many of the old stories, that were once held so sacred. Yet the dramatic element is not wanting, and the influence of the mysterious is supposedly present; and thus the composer has outlet for his musical fancy in at least two directions. The influence of modern composition, or the new school, is of course seen throughout the work. Every form of development tends to the gigantic in expression, and the full resources of vocal and instrumental aid are called into use.

In regard to the music, one must frankly admit that it is rich in coloring, even if novelty has an influence in it also. The solos for the tenor require a very powerful and high voice. Mr. Fritch was not able to sing them as written. In both his solos, where the high B-flat and the B-natural occur, he was obliged to alter his score. Yet it is better not to attempt and fail, even if the music is made to suffer by the innovation. Signor Campanini is doubtless the only tenor that could adequately sing these solos. The orchestral part of the work is rich in contrasts, and the instrumentation of the scene in which the destruction of the Tower is represented is very expressive. A storm is pictured, but not of the commonplace order of rain and wind, with thunder and lightning, but rather as if some dread mystic power was making the elements do its will. There is a strangeness about it that is electrifying, as well as novel. The double chorus, expressive of the wonder that God had done, in protecting Abraham from the flames of the furnace, is a very dramatic number, and it will always create interest when well sung. The part of Nimrod was entrusted to Mr. Whitney. There was hardly passion enough in his singing to make the rôle so dramatic as it should be made, although his noble voice was used with dignity, and his style of delivery was very good. The last number, or climax of the work, is a triple chorus, divided as follows:—a chorus of angels, a chorus of people, and a chorus of demons. There is a unity of idea, even if the elements of evil and of good are brought into action at the same time; for while the people and the angels are praising the Lord, the demons are proclaiming the power of Satan, and the thought of praise is common to both parts of the chorus. To give this number with that intensity that rightfully belongs to it, at least six hundred voices would seem necessary. The Apollo Club only attempted two of the choruses, for that portion belonging to the "demons" was left out. While we may not call the performance a very fine one, we may at least be thankful to the Club for giving us the opportunity to become somewhat acquainted with the work, and I am sure they deserve the praise of every musician for the honesty of their endeavor.

Monday evening, Mme. Marie Roze made her first appearance in English opera, as Carmen. She gave a very lady-like representation of the rôle, but was hardly the brilliant and bewitching Carmen that the opera calls for. She made her rôle as interesting as she could, however, for doubtless she has very little sympathy with it. Her support was very commonplace, and not worthy of her. She has also appeared as Aida during the week. Next week we shall have the Eljah, by the Beethoven Society, with Herr Henschel.

C. H. B.

NEW YORK, Dec. 13. On Thursday evening, Dec. 2, the New York Philharmonic Club gave its second concert at Chickering's, before a very intelligent and appreciative audience. The salient features of the programme were these:

String Quartet, F, Op. 59, Beethoven.
P. F. Quartet, B-flat, Saint-Saëns.
(Mr. Richard Hoffman.)

The performance was a good one, particularly in the work of Saint-Saëns, which was given with a precision and an oploomb most pleasurable. Owing to a new disposition of the instruments upon the stage, the effect was greatly enhanced. Heretofore the piano has been placed at the extreme right, with the strings occupying the centre of the platform; this is manifestly inconvenient, and even awkward for the pianist, who is really the leader, and has been compelled to throw his head over his shoulder in order to give the cue in making an "attack"; by the new plan every one can see every one else, and unity of action becomes not only possible, but almost certain. Mr. Hoffman is a most admirable artist—cela va sans dire—and his excellence and finish were never more clearly demonstrated than upon this occasion; he never overdid anything, and never attempts to force the piano into a position which it was not intended to occupy. He plays like the artist and the gentleman that he is; and that is certainly saying a great deal in these degenerate days of turbulence and boisterousness, which seem to be characteristic of modern pianism.

There were some vocal selections with regard to which a charitable critic would not wish to say anything; a club of this kind is sometimes "taken in," and as the infliction will never be repeated, let us suppose that the blot never existed. Mr. Mills will play at the next soirée, and at the fifth; Mr. Hoffman will appear at the fourth and sixth. An earnest lover of good music would be glad to see larger audiences.

It has long been the opinion of shrewd observers that Chamber Music will not "pay" in New York. Messrs. Arnold, Werner, and their associates, hold a contrary opinion; they are determined to make their concerts successful, both artistically and pecuniarily, and have resolved to "fight it out on this line if it takes" several winters. All success to them and their laudable efforts!

On Saturday evening, Dec. 4, the Symphony Society gave its second concert with Berlioz's Damnation.

The solos were taken by Mme. Valleria and Messrs. Henschel, Harvey and Bourne. At the risk of being considered a fossil or an antediluvian, I must say that the text—as furnished by the printed edition in use—is a trifle too broad for a refined audience; it would seem as if some way might have been contrived to avoid certain obnoxious phrases and expressions which displeased many who attended the concert.

Too much commendation could hardly be accorded to Dr. Damrosch, for his faithful and effective drilling of the orchestra and chorus; their work was well done. As for the soloists, Mme. Valleria acquitted herself well; Mr. Henschel did less with his part than had been expected and hoped; Mr. Bourne's part was too small to afford much chance for display, while Mr. Harvey was a trifle too stiff and cold—except in two or three instances—to impress the audience very favorably.

The Damnation will be given at the Academy of Music to-morrow (Tuesday) evening, with Mr. Remmert as Mephistopheles.

On Tuesday evening, Dec. 7, the season at the Metropolitan Hall came to a close, with Joseffy as a special attraction. It is stated that the "Winter season" will open in January with Thomas's orchestra; but it may be safely predicted that the project is a problematical one; thus far the Hall has not been quite so successful as could be wished, and—as I stated in a former letter—Mr. Thomas did not give the "boom" to the enterprise that had been evidently desired. At all events, the Spring season will probably open with Mr. Arondsen as conductor, and he will undoubtedly furnish a class of music that will please the large number of people who do not care for classical music, but who merely wish to be amused.

On the same Tuesday evening, Mr. Henschel gave the first of his series of vocal recitals at Steinway Hall. Mr. Henschel was at his best, and proved himself the reliable artist that we know him to be. Miss Bailey, who assisted him, has a very sweet, flexible voice of sympathetic quality, and while she can scarcely be termed a great singer, is yet possessed of a refined style and musical intelligence that are most satisfactory and pleasing. Mr. Henschel's second recital will occur on Tuesday, Jan. 4, 1881.

Mme. Constance Howard, a pianiste of ability, and persevering in her aim, has given two piano recitals recently, and merits commendation, more, possibly, for her promise than for her present excellence; she is to possess the true artistic instinct, and her playing, as many pleasant qualities.

On Wednesday evening, Dec. 8, the Frankos—a musical family—gave a pleasant concert at Steinway Hall; there were vocal solos, and solos for the piano, and for the violin; many of these were rendered intelligently and acceptably, and the young artists are to be congratulated upon their successes.

On Saturday evening, Dec. 11, the Philharmonic Society gave its second concert, with this programme:

Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven
Symphony, N. 8 (unfinished) Schubert
Siegfried (Final Scene, Act I) Wagner
"The Welding of the Sword."
Siegfried, Mr. W. C. Tower.
Mime, Mr. Max Truemann.
A Faust Symphony, Liszt
Tenor Solo and Concluding Chorus.
(Liederkrantz, Beethoven, Maennerchor.)

Your Boston readers are doubtless familiar with Schubert's lovely fragmentary symphony, which is a very great favorite with New York audiences; it was well played—in the main—but exception must be taken to the scrupulous smothering of the contrabass, which resulted in the almost entire inaudibility of the low pizzicato notes, upon which the effect of the second movement so greatly depends. The wind instruments, also, were not entirely in accord with the strings: it isn't pleasant to say these things, but somebody must tell the truth.

In the Siegfried selection, Mr. Thomas and the orchestra were emphatically at their best. The performance was admirable, and a very exhausting thing it must be for every one concerned. There is an impressive dignity, a grandeur about the grand sweep of the composition that holds one spell-bound until its conclusion; there is no "padding," nor is there a single ineffective note; everything has a purpose, and above all, there was no anti-climax. This number was the success of the evening.

Of Liszt's wild, incoherent symphony there is little to say. The prodigality of genuine orchestral effects is only equalled by the paucity of ideas and the triviality of the "Faust theme." It was well played, but is a most ungrateful thing to hear, except as a matter of musical geometry.
